The EXECUTIVE Constitutional Mandate

Demystifying The Fountain Of Honor: Presidential Powers Over Reach In Uganda

Isaac Christopher Lubogo

THE EXECUTIVE CONSTITUTIONAL MANDATE:

DEMYSTIFYING THE FOUNTAIN OF HONOR

PRESIDENTIAL POWERS OVERREACH IN UGANDA

First Edition

ISAAC CHRISTOPHER LUBOGO

THE EXECUTIVE CONSTITUTIONAL MANDATE:

DEMYSTIFYING THE FOUNTAIN OF HONOR

PRESIDENTIAL POWERS OVERREACH IN UGANDA

First Edition 2021
ISBN: 978-9970-9800-4-8

First published in Uganda by

Jescho Publishing House
A member of Jescho Group Ltd
Maria's Galleria, Level 3 Room 17,
Luwum Street,
Kampala (U), East Africa.
Tel: +256 414 660 286, +256 782 395 293,
+256 702 055 211, +256 752 055 211
E-mail: jeschogroupltd@gmail.com

D E D I C A T I O N

SAULIS POPULI SOLIS VEI…. THE WELFARE OF THE PEOPLE IS SUPREME

This book is dedicated to all those innocent souls, the unsung heroes of this nation who have given their lives, blood, tears and sweat for this nation Uganda. God bless their souls.

FOR GOD AND MY COUNRTY

OPENING SCHOLARY REMARK

When a counrty is hurtling towards its destruction merit and intergrity are sacrificed at the Alter of atavisitic ethnic jingoism camofaulegled through processes that are carefully choreographed to hoodwink the casual observers (Prof. PLO Lumumba)

In my much coveted book Obuntu Bulamu and the Law: An Extra Texual Aid Statutory Interpretation Tool (Lubogo 2020), I explain how Prof. Oloka-Onyango in Ghosts & the Law, An Inaugural Lecture, explores how the ghosts have infested the law in Uganda concerning, for example, judicial restraint and conservatism. He considers the Political Question Doctrine (PQD) as the essence of the ghost of ex parte Matovu, (in the case of Uganda v. Commissioner of Prisons, ex parte Michael Matovu[1]), which influenced the outcome of most cases which even simply challenged the exercise of executive power. (which this book intends to achieve)

Thus, in the case of Opoloto v. Attorney General[2] which concerned the dismissal of the then army commander for refusing to execute the order to attack the Kabaka's palace, the court held that the Ugandan president had inherited the prerogative powers of the British monarch to dismiss at will officers in its service.[3] This is a demonstration of the spill-over of the Western colonial influence on post-independent legal system in Uganda. The author contends that Matovu's case has found a way of holding the courts ransom in several court decisions.[4] In his judgment in the Tinyefuza case[5] in the Supreme Court, Justice Kanyeihamba observed that certain boundaries existed over which the Judiciary should not cross, he however, overruled the decision in Opoloto's case, arguing that "In this age of modernity, democracy and entitlement to human rights and freedoms, Opoloto's case can no longer be treated as good law.[6]

Prof. Oloka-Onyango (2017) in his book, when Courts Do Politics: Public Interest Law and Litigation in East Africa, considers how courts relate to and are affected by politics such as in the appointment of Judges by the executive. He contends that the present defenders of impartial judiciary would not easily claim that courts have nothing to do with politics. The political operation of the courts, he suggests can be determined by examining where the Judges come from, what they did prior to getting onto the bench, and how they got there. For those that rose through the ranks, their decisions in the lower courts could be examined. For those from academia, a review of their published works could be examined. Such analysis could help determine a Judge's ideological orientation, what he describes as judicial politics. The author dispels any guarantee of a status quo once a Judge has been appointed, and argues that such orientation and perceived loyalty to the appointing authority was prone to change.

---

[1] [1966] EA 514
[2] [1969] EA 631
[3] (Oloka-Onyango (2015) Ghosts & the Law, An Inaugural Lecture, p.28
[4] Prof. Oloka-Onyango (2015), Ghosts & the Law, An Inaugural Lecture.
[5] Major General David Tinyefuza v. Attorney General (Constitutional Case No.1 of 1996).
[6] (Oloka-Onyango (2015) Ghosts & the Law, An Inaugural Lecture, p. 41

ABOUT THE BOOK

The first thing I would like to ask my readers is to imagine a different President in office. If they support the current President and believe those who oppose him are doing so for partisan or otherwise illegitimate reasons, they should visualize a President whom they completely distrust. Conversely, if they dislike the current President, they should conceive of the President in power as someone they support and that those opposing him are acting illegitimately. This exercise is helpful, I believe, for focusing attention on the underlying constitutional issues rather than upon the wisdom, or lack thereof, of a particular President's policies.

Views as to whether or not an exercise of presidential power is legitimate tend to be based less upon legal abstractions than upon perceptions of the particular President in power. Someone supporting a particular President, for example, is likely to believe that parliament should not have the power to interfere with the President's unilateral decision to send troops into armed conflict or that parliament should not have the authority to demand the President to extend or remove his term limits. Conversely, someone who believes a President's agenda is improperly motivated or ill-advised is more likely to support constitutional principles that provide significant checks and balances upon the President's exercise of power.

In this way, views on presidential power tend to be more variable than views on other constitutional issues because they intuitively relate to who is in power in a way that views on other controversial constitutional issues such as freedom of speech and assembly, or freedom of religion do not.

For this reason, this book on presidential power is well timed. Because the question of who will hold the Presidency after the next election should always be much in doubt, this is the perfect opportunity to examine the nature of presidential power as an abstract matter, rather than as a criticism or as an apologia of a specific President's actions. This is what I intend to do in this book.

Specifically, I contend that the power of the Presidency has been expanding since the founding, and that we need to consider the implications of this expansion within the constitutional structure of separation of powers.

No matter which party controls power. This book makes the descriptive case by briefly canvassing a series of factors that have had, and continue to have, the effect of expanding presidential power. It further suggests this expansion in presidential power has created a constitutional imbalance between the executive and legislative branches, calling into doubt the continued efficacy of the structure of separation of powers set forth by the Framers.

The book offers some suggestions as to how this power imbalance can be alleviated, but it does not present a silver bullet solution. Because many, if not all, the factors that have led to increased presidential power are the products of greed and selfish needs.

Thus, this book ends with only the modest conclusion that regardless of who wins the Presidency, it is critical that those on both sides of the aisle work to assure that the growth in presidential power is at least checked, if not reversed.

MY INDIE PERSON THOUGHTS

My idle thoughts…

The story goes that Marcus Aurelius hired an assistant to follow him as he walked through the Roman towns square. The assistant's only role was to, whenever Marcus Aurelius was praised; whisper in his ear, "You're just a man. You're just a man."

They say two things define us. Our patience when we have nothing and our humility when we have everything. You know the greatest thinkers on the planet believe that they're habitual learners, habitual students of reality and of life. It was actually Maya Angelou who said, "I've learned that I still have a lot to learn" The person that we will become in 5 years is defined by the people we spend time with today, and the books that we read today. That's why who we associate with, who we spend time with, who we absorb our energy with will really define what's on our mind. Often what limits our learning is that we believe we already know. We already believe that we have knowledge. We already believe that we have answers but actually opening up ourselves to learn from the people around us, selectively choosing people who can be guides and wise advisors. We often find that this feeling of « knowing» makes us actually judge others and criticize others. And that's why we see that judging is critical but observing can be educational. And therefore, we should be so focused on improving ourselves that we don't have any energy to criticize anyone else. And when we're focusing on improving ourselves we surround ourselves by people who challenge the way we think and question the way we behave. And that's why if youre looking around and you find yourself being the smartest person in the room, change rooms, you're in the wrong one. You want to be around people who lift up the way you think, who lift up your mindset, who really take you to new dimensions and horizons that you could ever never imagine yourself. I believe that we should never let compliments get to our head and never let criticism get to our heart, because when we do that we can start to build with genuineness and authenticity. When we're humble we can actually grow and rise up and always feel that we re learning, always feel that we're developing, always feel that someone can share insight at any moment that can change our lives. Have you ever found it that similar situations keep coming into our life and actually nothing ever goes away until it teaches you what it needed to learn so, when we don't extrapolate lessons from situations we have to take this test again. We almost have to learn that lesson again.

Therefore, simultaneous or repetitive situations keep approaching in our lives. When we realize that we're students for life, instead of making people see how powerful we are, we want people to understand how powerful they are. And we learn how to empower others. We'll actually attract people to work with us to achieve our goals. That say it's better to know how to learn than to know. Because when we know how to learn it becomes a habit. It becomes a part of your mindset; it becomes a part of the way that we daily navigate life. We're trying to draw lessons from every person, every situation, very interaction, every moment that can actually teach us something about ourselves, teach us something about society, tach us something about our world. Teach us something about how we can interact with space. And that's why Brain Herbert said: "The capacity to learn is a gift, the ability to learn is a skill, but the willingness to learn is a choice." Let's now begin to learn, Alvin joffer once said "the illiterate of the 21st century will not be the individual who cannot read bit one who cannot learn, unlearn and re learn." We are not makers of history we are made by history long fellow said "in this world a man must either be an anvil or a hammer" meaning that you are either a molder of society, or molded by society.

We should never be thermometers that record or register the temperature of majority opinion, not thermostats and regulate the society, majority is not always right your conscience is always right, fear not to stand and take positions out sharply and clearly from the prevailing opinion.

Thomas Jefferson wrote "I have sworn upon the alter of God eternal hostility against any form of tyranny over the mind of man" Never be a mental slave this book will free you,

James Russell Lowell wrote "they are slaves who fear to speak for the fallen and weak. They are slaves who will not choose hatred, scoffing, and abuse, rather than in silence shrink from the truth, they are slaves who dare not be in the right with two or three" because in the end as Rev. Dr. Martin Luther puts it "in the end we will not remember the noice of our enemies but the silence of our friends "

Nothing in the entire world is more dangerous than sincere ignorance and conscientious stupidity, for Shakespeare wrote "for sweetest things turn sourest by their deeds, lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds."

In my book treatise to my learned friend the Attorney at Law I quote Adolf Hitler and say Adolf Hitler realized that soft mindedness was so prevalent among his followers that he said "I use emotion for the many and reserve reason for the few" and in Mein Kampf he asserted by means of shrewd lies, unremittingly repeated, it is possible to make people believe that heaven is hell - and heaven is hell…the greater the lie the more readily it will be believed."

Lastly in men of good hope 1951 Daniel Aaron quoted religious leader Theodore Parker warning "if powerful men will not write justice with black ink, on white paper, ignorant and violent men will write it on the soil, in letters of blood, and illuminate their rude legislation with burning castles, palaces and towns." This book is re awakening for now and future generations to always make a distinction between the demagogue and the truly inspired.

ANNOTATED ACRONYMS

ADF	Allied Democratic Forces
AG	Attorney General
IBEAC	Imperial British East Africa Company
RWI	Research World International
MP	Member of Parliament
AIGP	Assistant Inspector General of Police
ARDS	Acute Respiratory Distress Syndrome
BC	Before Christ
BSD	Basic Structure Doctrine
CA	Constituent Assembly
CBE	Commander of the (Order of the) British Empire
CCEDU	Citizens' Coalition for Electoral Democracy in Uganda
CEC	Central Executive Committee
CDF	Chief of Defence Forces
CIC	Commander in Chief
CJ	Chief Justice
CMI	Chieftaincy of Military Intelligence
CMS	Church Missionary Society
CRC	Constitutional Review Commission
DCJ	Deputy Chief Justice
DISO	District Internal Security Organisation
DP	Democratic Party (Catholic, southern party)
DPP	Directorate of Public Prosecutions
EC	Electoral Commission
ECHR	European Convention on Human Rights
ESO	External Security Organisation
FBI	Federal Bureau of Investigations
FDC	Forum for Democratic Change
GCM	General Court Martial (military tribunals)
GISO	Gombolola Internal Security Organisation
GoU	Government of Uganda
HE	His Excellency
HM	Her Majesty

ICCPR	International Covention on Civil and Political rights
ICJ	International Court of Justice
IGG	Inspector General of Government
IGP	Inspector General of Police
IHR	International Health Regulations
IHR	International Health Regulations
ISO	Internal Security Organisation
ISPs	Internet Service Providers
JA	Justice of the Court of Appeal
JAFT	Joint Anti Terrorist Task Force
JCC	Justice of the Constitutional Court
JSC	Justice of the Supreme Court
KAR	King's African Rifles
KCCA	Kampala City Council Authority
KCMG	Knight Commander
KMC	Kira Motors Corporation
KY	Kabaka Yekka (Buganda royalist party led by the Kabaka)
LAP	Local Administration Police
LC	Local Council
LDU	Local Defence Unit
LRA	Lord's Resistance Army
MBE	Member of the British Empire
MERS-Cov	Middle East Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus
NCC	National Consultative Council
NIRA	National Identification & Registration Authority
NRA	National Resistance Army
NRM	National Resistance Movement (Museveni's southern party)
NUP	National Unity Platform
OBE	Officer (of the Order) of the British Empire
OIC	Order in Council
OTT	Over The Top (OTT) tax
PBUH	Peace Be Upon Him
PISO	Parish Internal Security Organisation
PM	Prime Minister

POMA	Public Order Management Act
PQD	Political Question Doctrine
PRA	People’s Redemption Army
PRA	People's Resistance Army (alleged rebel group linked to FDC)
PS	Permanent Secretary
RC	Resistance Council
RRU	Rapid Response Unit
SARS	Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome
SFC	Special Forces Command
UCC	Uganda Communications Commission
UDI	Unilateral Declaration of Indepedence
UGMP	Uganda Governance Monitoring Platform
UHCHR	UN office of the High commission for Human Rights
UHRC	Uganda Human Rights commission
UJSC	Uganda Journalist Safety Committee
UJSC	Uganda Journalists Safety committee
UK	United Kingdom
ULS	Uganda Law Society
UMSC	Uganda Muslim Supreme Council
UNLA	Uganda National Liberation Army
UNLF	Uganda national liberation front
UPC	Uganda People's Congress (political party)
UPDA	Uganda People's Democratic Army
UPDF	Uganda People's Defense Force (formerly the NRA)
UPF	Uganda police Force
UPM	Uganda Patriotic Movement
UPPC	Uganda Printing and Publishing Corporation (UPPC)
URA	Uganda Revenue Authority
USA	United States of America
USDS	United States Department of State
WHO	World Health Organisation

TABLE OF CONTENTS

CHAPTER ONE

UGANDA

The Republic of Uganda is bordered on the east by Kenya, on the southeast by Lake Victoria, on the south by Tanzania and Rwanda, on the west by the Democratic Republic of Congo, and on the north by South Sudan. It is also predominantly Anglican country with many different co existing ethnic groups.

UNMASKING THE TRUTH BEHIND UGANDA'S NAME (THE UNTOLD STORY OF IDENTITY)[7]

A lot of controversies have been raised concerning the origin of Uganda's name some alleging that it was derived from Buganda the then strong kingdom and others Rugandaa word among the Mpororo ethnic group that means clan.[8] This book has therefore adopted a comprehensive historical theoretical framework to analyze the question of Uganda's identity. Thus a contextual analysis has been done with the aim of establishing the potential source from which the identity was obtained through examination of the available literature on the subject.

Until the British extended their African colonial rule over the area, Uganda did not exist as an administrative unit. It was an area filled with Bantu-speaking groups of people that were grouped in centralized systems of administration.

The notion started with the coming of the Arabs at the coast of East Africa. The Arabs arrived at the coast around the 7th Century and by the 8th Century, they had introduced the Swahili culture after their mixture with Africans and Swahili became their language. The coast blossomed into a number of trading cities which included Mombasa, Mogadishu and Zanzibar.

At their height from the 12th to the 15th Century, the Swahili started trade with the African tribes deep in East Africa, Arabia, Persia and India.[9] Around 1843, a caravan of Arab traders led by Ahmed Bin Ibrahim, widely believed to have been the first Arab or non-African visitor to Buganda kingdom, arrived at the court of Kabaka Muteesa I.[10] Trade in Ivory had thrived at the coast so they moved deep in the interior in search for trading items. Bin arrived in caravan with mirrors, beads,

[7] Refer to Appendix A (Pictorial), "The truth behind Uganda's name"
[8]Saturday Vision. Mpororo, not Buganda gave Uganda its name. June 5th, 2021 by KiberuKahirita.
[9] Mark Cartwright, M. 2019,April 1. Swahili Coast.World History Encyclopedia. Retrieved from https://www.worldhistory.org/swahili-coast jewellery and spices to trade but it was the guns on or the guns-that caught Kabaka's attention. Muteesa therefore welcomed Bin Ibrahim and became willing to trade with him.
[10]Daily Monitor. Guns and Ivory: How Arab traders uncovered the heart beat of Africa. Retrieved 22 Jun 2021.

Throughout the trade, "Uganda" was a Swahili word for Buganda used to refer to the land of the "Ganda" by the Arab and Swahili traders on the East African coast referring to the kingdom of Buganda deep in the interior of Africa.[11] When the Europeans arrived at the coast during the scramble and partition of Africa, Kanyeihamba asserts that, "the first Europeans to visit the region were accompanied by retainers from the coast who were Swahili speakers and as a result of their mispronouncing of the name Buganda by pronouncing Swahili -Uganda, the whole territory was later to become Uganda. The retainers found challenges in pronouncing the word "Bu" that dominated the Bantu speaking groups and as such, Buganda, Busoga and Bunyoro became Uganda, Usoga and Unyoro.

Upon settling in Buganda that was organized, the Europeans ended up adopting the same pronunciation of Uganda. Following unsuccessful attempts to retain its independence against British imperialism, Buganda became the center for the struggle to conquer other territories.[12]

After the promulgation of an Orders in Council, the British realized that there was need for a name of the area that they had conquered. In their brave move, "Uganda", the Swahili term for Buganda was adopted by the British and eventually, it became the name of the protectorate.[13] It's therefore worth highlighting in the strong sense that Uganda derived its name from Buganda the then strong kingdom in the region.

UGANDAN FLAG A GERMANY COLONIAL LEGACY MYTH?

The Ugandan flag was adopted on 9th October 1962, the date that Uganda became independent from the British Empire. It consists of six equal horizontal bands of black (top), yellow, red, red black, yellow and (bottom). A white disc is superimposed at the Centre and depicts the national symbol, a grey crowned crane, facing the hoist side. During the colonial era, the British used a British blue ensign defaced with the colonial badge, as prescribed in 1865 regulations. Buganda, the largest of the traditional kingdoms in the colony of Uganda, had its own flag.

However, in order to avoid appearing to give preference to one region of the colony over any other, the British colonial authorities selected the crane emblem for use on the blue ensign and other official banners. When the Democratic Party ruled the country, a design for flag was proposed. It had vertical stripes of green-blue-green, separated by narrower yellow stripes, and in the Centre had [11]Uganda-Buganda.The Library of Congress County Studies; CIA World Factbook.

[12]H.B. Thomas and A.E Spenser.A History of Uganda Land Surveys Entebbe, 1938.Published in 1935 by Oxford University Press on the Authority of the Uganda Protectorate Government.
[13] The Proclamation of 1908, G 1909, 65. The Kingdom was to remain Buganda and the Territory Uganda.

the silhouette of a yellow crane. After the party lost the national elections on 25 April 1962 the newly elected Uganda People's Congress (UPC) rejected the former design and instead proposed the current design. It was based on the UPC flag, a tricolor having horizontal strips of red, yellow and black. Majority scholars are hesitant to assert the ideology that Uganda adopted her Flag colors from Germany during the colonial era however, it should be noted that it was a mere preference by the Minister for Justice Grace Ibiringia that the Ugandan flag adopts Germany colors with the UPC party colors as the winning party and was officially approved in 1962 but not any deeper historical events between Germany and Britain during the struggle and partition of Africa because even the Salisbury's African policy and Heligoland offer of 1890 was a treaty in which the British had a way and prevent Germany expansion towards Uganda & headwaters of the Nile by offering to cede the island to the Germans as an attempt to safeguard British interests in East Africa.

The British administration gave their approval to this before the country's independence. The flag on behalf of the British was designed by C. Todd, Professor of Fine Art at Makerere university. He also designed the Uganda Coat of Arms & various ceremonial items which he registered with the college of arts in London. The three colors are representative of native ethnic groups of Africa (black), Africa's sunshine (yellow), and African brotherhood (red)being a color of blood through which all Africans are connected. The grey crowned crane id fabled for its gentle nature and was also the military badge of Ugandan soldiers during British rule. The raised leg of the crane symbolizes the forward movement of the country.

THE FORGING OF UGANDA'S EXECUTIVE IMPERIAL MANDATE

My first occupation was to map the country.[14] -John Hanning Speke. Well into his third year of trekking inland from Zanzibar, in 1863, John Hanning Speke rounded the swampy western shores of Lake Victoria and stepped into a "rich garden", a "wonderful country, surprisingly rich in grass, cultivation, and trees."[15] He thus became the first European to set foot in the kingdom of Buganda. His adventure had little immediate impact on the peoples living on either Victoria's shores or the hinterland.

Upon his return Speke wrote his memoirs, journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile, and accompanied it with the first accurate map of what was to become the state of Uganda (Map 2a). It was this map that would lead British explorers, missionaries and colonizing bureaucrats to Buganda and its neighbours.

Speke's map also foreshadowed the spread of British "rule of law" in Uganda. Kampala, a small village near the old Buganda capital, would become the colonial capital. Buganda itself, rendered in fine detail by Speke's cartographer, formed the pillar of the new colony. Britain's imperial mandate would soon envelop three other Kingdoms-Toro, Ankole and Bunyoro-in separate treaties. Eventually the swaths of uncharted lands would fall to direct civilian or military rule by the colonial government. Speke's map is thus the original representation of the monolithic image of a hierarchical legal system, maps are familiar metaphors for legal systems, families or traditions.

14 John Hanning Speke, Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile (Edinburgh: W. Blackwood and Sons, 1864).
15 Id. at 266 & 272.

CONSOLIDATING THE IMPERIAL COLONIAL EXECUTIVE MANDATE.

When Lugard first secured the Kabaka's agreement to cede some sovereign powers to the Queen, he faced a pragmatic dilemma. How could he and a handful of Europeans control a disciplined, militarised kingdom numbering a few hundred thousand? His solution expounded in The Dual Mandate in British Tropical Africa was quite simple: indirect rule.[16] Colonial administrators would first seek out local chiefs and secure their loyalty by written agreement, sweetened with gifts of firearms and gold. In return, these native leaders would use their authority to implement British policies. A British colony would thus require only a skeleton crew of colonial administrators to liaise with the native authorities, the so-called "traditional chiefs", and backed by the King's African Rifles, an armed force of Africans trained and led by European officers. For Speke and Lugard, Buganda seemed the ideal chiefdom "of a type ... not unfamiliar to Europeans": authoritarian, centralized and obedient. [17] They need only secure the Kabaka’s loyalty to control the kingdom. Buganda thus became the cornerstone upon which to build the colonial state of Uganda.[18]

The Uganda Agreement formalized the existing Baganda nobility into four levels beneath a European administrator, called the District Commissioner, each of which corresponded to an administrative unit. The ten sazas, major chiefs under the Kabaka, of Mutesa's time were doubled to twenty and their roles expanded to administering law, maintaining roads, raising taxes paid directly to the colonial Commissioner and supervising "native affairs"[19] In return, the Kabaka would pay them a regular cash income.

The Lukiiko was the legislative body of Buganda composed of three Ministers of the Kabaka, the twenty saza chiefs as ex officio members, as well as three "notables" from each saza and six others all chosen by the Kabaka.[20]

The Lukiiko, or a sub-committee of it, would be a court of appeal from the saza chiefs' courts. The

---

[16] See Lugard

17 William Malcolm Hailey, An African Survey: A Study of Problems Arising in Africa South of the Sahara, rev. 1956 (London: Oxford University Press,1957) at 478.

[18]"Uganda" is the Swahili word forBuganda.

[19]Monis &Read, supra.

[20]Id.at16.

gombolola court was the lowest native court and mostly dealt with civil matters like family and land disputes. Decisions by the gombolola chief could be revised by the saza chief in his court and then the Lukiiko itself. This Agreement restructured their administration and delimited the kingdom's borders.[21] The new legal order did not limit.

The 1902 Uganda Order in Council granted "Her Majesty power and jurisdiction in the Uganda Protectorate" and placed its administration solely in the hands of a Commissioner appointed in London. The Order also created a High Court of Uganda with full civil and criminal jurisdiction over persons in Uganda in conformity with the Civil Procedure, Criminal Procedure and Penal Codes of India. But when "natives" were parties, the court must rely on "customary law" so far as it was (i) applicable, (ii) not repugnant to justice and morality, and (iii) consistent with other government statutes and regulations. [22] Customary law was supposedly distinct from statutory laws created by the British Parliament or the Lukiiko. [23]

The Native Authority Ordinance[24] of 1905 created "native courts" supervised by a European officer who was not to interfere with the courts' application of customary law, "save where their actions were contrary to justice or morality or to the laws of the Protectorate. [25] This ordinance effectively tied native chiefs to colonial administrators since "... once salaries replaced customary payments, the chief was in the pay of the native administration, it was to the District Commissioner that he naturally turned as his master".[26] Thus the Uganda Agreement and Uganda Order in Council created a bifurcated system of justice with a formal (civil law) court staffed by professional judges for Europeans and an informal "native" (customary law) court headed by chiefs or native authorities for Africans.

Before looking at the bifurcated state legal system in 1966, however, it is first necessary to retrace how customary law was invented as a distinct type of state law. Early native courts were largely free from direct colonial interference. In Buganda, civil disputes over family and land issues began in the gombolola court headed by the gombolola chief directly below a saza chief (see Table 1).

Looking back on his time as a gombolola chief in the 1940s, W.P. Tamukedde wrote:

I presided over the legal courts and we superintended the prisons and so forth. All these duties incidentally made us more powerful than the present [1970s] chiefs. After arresting ... a law-

[21] The Crown signed similar treaties with the Two, Ankole and Bun*yoro* kingdoms: see Toro Agreement 1900, Buganda and United Kingdom,1900,Rev.LawsofUganda1951,vol.VI at 2; Ankole Agreement

[22] Morris & Read, at 19.

[23] Id. at 20.

[24] See generally T.W. Bennett, A Sourcebook of African Customary Lawfor Southern Africa (Cape Town:] uta, 1991). 148 No.

[25] Ibid

[26] P. Tamukedde,"My Life as a Chief and District Commissioner" in Robertson, A.F.,ed.,Uganda's First Republic :Chiefs, Administrators and Politicians,1967-1971 (Cambridge:AfricanStudiesCentre,Cambridge University,1982)at58.

breaker, we tried him in our own courts and if he was convicted we sentenced him to serve in the prison we supervised and often made him work for our own personal benefit.

A typical court day began at 11:00 a.m. since most litigants were poor peasants who walked long distances to see the gombolola chief. In his court, Tamukedde relied on a mixture of an English penal code[27] and "customary" Ganda law. Despite his gombolola chief title, he did not determine customary Ganda law himself and relied on the oral testimony of male Baganda elders.[28] The elders would recount their community's ancient practices, from which Tamukedde would draw legal principles to resolve the dispute in question. He would then give an oral judgment and impose a sentence- subject to revision by the District Commissioner. Gombolola chiefs also jailed convicts in makeshift prisons (a British invention), imposed a fine or coerced free labour from the poorest. No one supervised Tamukedde in his day-to-day duties, nor were there any other institutional checks on his fused executive-administrative-judicial powers over his sub-county.

Tamukedde represented a new figure in colonial Uganda: the native administrator.[29] Despite his chiefly title, Tamukedde was not born noble.[30] After the Uganda Agreement of 1902, the Kabaka appointed Tamukedde's father as one of the ten new saza chiefs. Since chiefly positions were now by the Kabaka's appointment under British influence, his father taught him both courtly Ganda manners and British morals.

The two influences are evident when he recalled how he "used to play together with the children of peasants without any distinction in the true spirit of sportsmanship."[31] Tamukedde continued his colonial education at King's College, an English-language boarding school,[32] and then overseas at British and American universities. [33] At just 24 years old he was appointed a gombolola chief and began his duties administering customary law described above. At about this time Michael Matovu was made Pokino, the saza chief of Buddu province in Buganda.[34]Their stories were similar to a generation of Baganda, Batoro, and Banyoro boys educated in Etonian boarding schools who would staff the "native" bureaucracy in the colonial government. But while Tamukedde threw his lot in with the colonial government, Matovu placed his loyalty in his Kabaka's Lukiiko.

While the British administrators justified the chiefly Buganda hierarchy as the traditional system in [27]Penal Code (No.7of1930) &Criminal Procedure Code, No.8 of 1930(these replaced the Indian Penal Code imported from Britain's more established eastern colony in 1919).

[28]Tamukedde, supra at 117.

[29] Chinua Achebe perfectly captures the tension between the ambivalent loyalties of independence-era African leaders. "No man can deny," he wrote, "that Chief the Honourable M.A. Nanga, M.P. was the most approachable politician in the country." Part chiefly tradition and part modern leader, Nanga's authority was built purely on personal relations: Chinua Achebe, A Man of the People (London: Heinemann, 1966) at 1.

[30] While not a noble born, he was raised that way. As he recalled," ... we used to play together with the children of peasants without any distinction in the true spirit of sportsmanship.": see Tamukedde, supra

[31] Id. at 54.

[32] About King's College", online: King's College, Budo <http:/ /www.kcbudo.sc.ug>.

[33] Tamukedde, supra

[34] Like Achebe's chief Nanga, Matovu carried a customary title (pokino) and a colonial title (saza): W.A. Crabtree, "The Languages of the Uganda Protectorate" (1914) 13J. Royal Afr. Society 152 at 164-65

Buganda, it is important to note that Baganda clan leaders at the time of Speke's visit with Mutesa had very few of the absolute powers later invested in them by the British. Traditional leaders like Matovu and Tamukedde had one face turned to a glorified Buganda past and another turned to a modern future as the key administrators-in-the-field for the British colony of Uganda. For example, an Englishman observed that in pre-colonial Buganda "a little judicious bribery could ensure victory and was unhesistantly practiced."[35] Tamukedde admitted that "gift giving" was still common in 1940s gombolola courts.[36] While he accepted the gifts, Tamukedde claims to never have let this affect his judgments. His claim is not based on the principle of judicial impartiality, one of Lewis's civilizing principles of English law.[37] Rather, Tamukedde knew the colonial government would remove chiefs from their posts for "corruption".[38] By stamping out bribery, the colonial government ensured that chiefs relied solely on it for their livelihoods. More than anything, this shifted chiefs' loyalties from families and clans, to district commissioners and the colonial state in the 40 years.

LEGITIMIZATION OF COLONIAL EXECUTIVE MANDATE

If traditional chiefs like Tamukedde embodied colonial power on the ground, then customary law legitimised the entire colonial project. Speke's map is the first European attempt to order the fluid borders of the peoples living on northern shore of Lake Victoria. But even Buganda's relatively stable geographic borders had both fluctuating borders and "tribal" porosity across those borders. The proximate cause of Obote's coup was his decision to permit two "lost counties" in Buganda to vote on whether to return to the Bunyoro kingdom. Moreover, many non-Baganda migrants, especially Rwandan Tutsis, worked in the fields of Buganda and carried with them their own laws, identities and loyalties from the Rwandan realm.

The British divided their Uganda Protectorate into four provinces, each composed of defined tribes bounded within discrete geographic areas. This tribal mapping presumed geographically distinct tribes that each possessed a unique customary law. This customary law was likened to medieval English common law as a "primitive" or "undeveloped" system of rules reproduced from oral retelling by (male) elders. For example, Justice Peason described an idealized Buganda, where "the members of the [Superior Native] Courts being the superior elders in each Principality or Province, native custom is, I presume, in the breasts of the courts."[39] Thus African customary law residing in the Baganda chiefs was seen as a primitive common law, an embryonic collection of rules with the potential to evolve towards the English ideal.

[35] H.R. Hone, "The Native of Uganda and the Criminal Law" (1939) 21 J. Comp. Legs. & Int'l. L. 179 at 186.
[36]Tamukedde, supra
[37] Lewis, supra
[38]Tamukedde, supra
[39]Kagimu v. Lukiiko (1949) N.S.D.25.

COURTING THE KABAKA'S EXECUTIVE MANDATE

Speke's sportsmanship easily blended with the Kabaka's love and passion for hunting this even further precipitated speaks love for Buganda kingdom and his casual cruelty all made a strong impression on Speke and later English visitors.[40] Buganda appeared to them like medieval Albion, rough and barbaric, but pregnant with the promise of enlightened rule. Speke was even convinced that Mutesa and the Ganda nobles belonged to an aristocratic race with possibly "a small residue of European stock". Speke betrays this prejudice often. For example, he consistently mistranslated Mukaabya, Mutesa's birth name, as "monarch" in the English sense.[41] Thus Speke decided that the noble Mutesa and his subjects ("every Muganda seems by instinct to be a sportsman") deserved the same enlightened rule England had bestowed upon India. His book and its map helped later British explorers, missionaries and bureaucrats in grafting a civilizing state on the Buganda kingdom.

Mutesa was the last truly independent Kabaka. He had just won a decisive victory in a civil war against powerful clan chiefs that pitted Christian and Moslem against unconverted Baganda. [42] His internal weakness and threats from the neighbouring Bunyoro kingdom forced him to seek British military strength to consolidate his rule. Mutesa died in 1884, a decade after Speke left and six years before Frederick Lugard, the consummate colonial administrator, arrived as representative of the Imperial British East Africa Company.[43] Lugard built the first permanent British structures in Buganda, a fort and then Luzira prison on hills overlooking Kampala. He also negotiated treaties ceding Ganda self-government until the British grudgingly declared Uganda a Protectorate in 1894.[44] Six years later Special Commissioner Sir Harry Johnston consolidated British gains with the Uganda Agreement of 1900.[45] This treaty would form the basis of Anglo- Ganda relations until independence, fulfilling Speke's hope of making all Muganda "persons enjoying Her Majesty's protection" as subjects of the British Crown.

---

[40] For example, Speke reported the king asking a page to take a cocked rifle and test it on a passerby.

[41] Sean Redmond, Book Review of journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile by John Hanning Speke (1997) 3J. Afr. Travel-Writing 87.

[42] The Buganda civil war, fuelled by the slave and ivory trade introduced by Arab traders, lasted from 1857 to 1899. The Kabaka's succeeding Mutesa managed to consolidate the authoritarian institution he first created, but only with the help of British mercenaries. This would ultimately cost Buganda its independence with the Uganda Agreement of/900: see generally Holly Elisabeth Hanson, Landed Obligation: The Practice of Power in Buganda (Portsmouth, N.H.: Heinemann, 2003) at 93-121.

[43] Lugard, supra

[44] London Gazette, 19 June 1894

[45] Revised Law-sof Uganda 1951, vol. VI, at 12.

"personsenjoyingHerMajesty'sprotection"assubjectsoftheBritishCrown.m

THE BIRTH OF THE KABAKA AND HIS CHIEF'S EXECUTIVE OVERREACH

Customary laws, however, were no mere repositories of rules remembered by tribal elders. Chanock argued that customary law was created by the struggle of native authorities to contain the vast social and economic changes in the first half-century after the Uganda Agreement 1900.[46] Buganda, for example, moved from an economy driven by the slave and ivory trade during Mutesa's time to the cash-cropping and small industry economy of the 1950s. Economic changes saw a largely agrarian Buganda shift to a capitalist economy based in urban centres.

Young women and men left their villages for new urban centres to work at wage-paying jobs. For chiefs who had derived their authority from a captured peasantry and for older males who most benefited from the practice of bride-presents, this change towards individualized economic relations and nuclear families was a serious economic threat.

Chiefs reacted to this economic upheaval by inventing "a retroactive fantasy" that likened customary laws to a set of "ancient" tribal roles.[47] For example, chiefs portrayed customary marriage as "an idealized version of traditional marriage, honed down into 'roles', with which they sought both to preserve their position and to provide the necessary moral stabilisation for urban dwellers."[48] This had the added advantage of fitting with preconceived European ideas of African laws as primitive English law. In 1960, J.P. Musoke, the omulamu={j (Minister of Justice for Buganda), wrote that the "validity of customary law ... is not merely the 'Conscience' of each individual judge but a body of roles of human conduct which have their roots in antiquity."[49] This fit with English descriptions of customary marriage as a paternal union in which husbands had property-like rights enforceable against wives in court.[50]Haydon, a former Buganda judicial advisor, even claimed, "beating of wives was a time-honoured Ganda tradition"![51] Two examples from Buganda family law illustrate how Ganda chiefs appropriated the rhetoric of roles to mask "ancient laws" invented to limit the new economic freedoms of young men and especially women.

The Marriage Act of 1902[52] and a later Marriage of Africans Act [53]copied the existing English law but made some changes, like permitting polygamy for Africans. Not many people married under

[46] Chanock, supra
[47] Id.
[48]Chanock, supra at 193
[49] Preface, E.S. Haydon, Law and Justice in Buganda (London: Butterworths,1960) at v
[50] Morris & Read, at 368.
[51] Haydon, supra at 104
[52] Cap. 211
[53] Cap. 212 (This Act permitted Christian Africans to marry without the formalities of the Marriage Act, but with the same punishment of up to five years' imprisonment for bigamy by having contracted another marriage under customary law).

either act other than Europeans and a relatively small set of educated, Christian Africans.[54] Most people instead married under the customary law of their tribe administered by native courts. A customary marriage was "a union, potentially or actually polygamous, involving a contract between a bridegroom and the bride's father" including a bride-price paid by the bridegroom to the father,[55] Since there was no need to register marriages, a couple could also avoid its costly procedures. If litigated marital disputes reflect a preferred regime, then customary marriage was vastly more popular than statutory marriage. In 1936 alone, the colonial mid-way point, civil courts heard cases 2,002 civil cases and native courts heard 35,665 cases.[56]

The first example comes from Haydon's confused description of the two parts of bride-price made by a groom to his betrothed's family.[57] The first part, ebintu lry'obuko, includes gifts for the girl's relatives like "one prime goat ... bark cloth for girl's mother ... 2-4 gourds of beer", but a groom with a wage-paying job could pay in cash instead. The second part, omutwalo, is a sum in hard cash that is less than the value of the ebintu lry'obuko. Haydon remarked that Baganda confusingly referred to the entire bride-price, gifts and cash, as the omutwalo. If customary law is the evolving set of ancient Ganda rules, then how does this present day use of omutwalo square with the two distinct parts of an ancient bride-price? The simple answer was that it did not.

In urbanizing Buganda, bride-price was fluid and contested by young men working for wages in cities.[58] Since their financial security no longer depended on economic rights controlled by a girl's father, young men could simply pay-off a family or not even pay a bride-price at all! Chiefs responded to this change by both increasing the bride-price and converting it into hard cash to compensate fathers for their fading economic rights over their daughters. Haydon himself mentioned two earlier accounts from 1889 and 1911, which only mention animals, bark-cloth and beer as the bride-price.[59] If these were accurate, then it appears that omutwalo was a recent invention by village fathers to capture some of the cash wealth of urban men. But Haydon's rule-seeking English eyes were blind to the way chiefs changed custom to include cash payments as part of an inflated bride-price.

The second example was the Kabaka himself, who reshaped custom to benefit from the Wills Law of 1916.[60] The Act provided for written wills signed with two witnesses, but did not invalidate the

[54] Morris & Read, supra at 360.
[55] Id.
[56]The lopsidedness held in criminal cases as well, where civil courts5,693 cases and native courts heard 68,000: Hone, supra at 192.
[57] Haydon, supra at 93.
[58] Chanock provides an illuminating comparative analysis between Malawi and Zambia: see Chanock, supra at 192-216.
[59] Id. at 90.
[60]Wills Law of /916, Rev.L.,1951, vol.VII,1233.

"traditional oral will" found in the customary rules of succession.[61] During Mutesa's time oral wills were affirmed when a man held a feast "providing a goat and a calabash of beer" in his heir's honour according to Haydon. [62] Other people at the feast "were witnesses essential to the validity of such a testamentary disposition." Then the man verbally willed his property to his chosen successor. If the clan leaders wished, however, they could always annul an oral will.

While Haydon's account of settled "ancient" practice was consistent with the idea of customary law as a repository of a tribe's legal rules, it masked how the Kabaka manipulated custom to give himself more power over inheritance at the expense of Baganda clan elders. The Kabaka signed the Succession Order, 1926, but never promulgated it because he did not want to openly encroach upon clan leaders' powers protected in an earlier treaty.[63]

The Succession Order forbade choosing an "heir" from outside one's clan, but permitted leaving parts of one's estate to anyone one liked. The law also granted the Kabaka new powers to alter this discretionary option for any will. In practice native courts applied the Succession Order, including the kabaka's powers of revision. By manipulating the "ancient "practice of succession, the Kabaka managed to capture clan leaders' traditional powers to revise oral wills by framing them as his ancient right and then mobilizing the weight of the colonial justice administration behind him.

Early colonial administrators believed oral customary laws would develop towards the English ideal under the civilized guidance of the District Commissioner. In 1937, H.R. Hone, the Attorney-General of Uganda, argued that, however widely the system of native justice may have differed originally in form and appearance from our own civilized system, it has in the last fifty years developed along similar lines to our own system and has indeed arrived at a stage in development ... in close approximation to our system.[64]

Like most early administrators, Hone strongly believed in the civilizing potential of British law. Each tribe's customary law progressed along a civilized arch, such that "the early English system is indistinguishable in many fundamental particulars from the native system of justice". [65] By likening African laws to a rule-based legal system administered by native authorities, Hone could justify it as a "primitive" form of English law that had to be guided by British oversight.

Magistrates and District Commissions thus limited themselves to shearing customary law of its more barbarous customs through the repugnancy clause. "Progressive" young chiefs like Tamukedde embraced this modernizing ideal and interpreted tradition as evolving towards the

[61]Morris & Read, *supra*at372.
[62]Haydon, *supra*at222.
[63] Morris Haydon, 168 at 222.
[64]Hone, supra at192.
[65] Id.

British legal principles they studied in English and American schools, and witnessed in the High Court of Uganda. [66]

The colonial state thus had to insulate British law governing Europeans from the barbarous influence of native law, at least until it progressed to the same level of civilization. The civil courts were at first ambivalent in extending their jurisdiction over the three kingdoms that had written treaties with the Crown.

THE BIRTH OF CUSTOMARY LAW AS AN EMBYONIC ENGLISH LAW

Uganda had to decide whether the Uganda Order in Council 1902 abolished the Batoro and Ankole chiefs' jurisdiction over "native" cases. They referred the question to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Westminster as required when an issue dealt with "the existence or extent of any jurisdiction of Her Majesty in a foreign country".[67] Their decision in Katosi v. Kahizi[68] confirmed the Secretary's opinion that the earlier agreements did, in fact, preserve the kingdoms' rights to hear such cases.

A year later the High Court heard a similar case where Justice Carter confirmed that the Kabaka retained all his traditional powers not expressly ceded to the Crown in the Uganda Agreement if 1900.[69] The High Court's hands off approach fit well with the idea of customary law as an embryonic English common law.

By the 1940s, however, this optimistic view was losing out to a cynical pragmatism. The growth of urban centres attracting wage labour placed enormous stress on extended family structures in rural villages. British administrators were having a difficult time controlling mobile labour, but did not want to spend much money to fit it. They responded in part by reforming the court structure with the Subordinate Courts Ordinance of 1940, which firmly placed native courts into a single hierarchy below the High Court.[70] This reformist trend was resisted by some, like Hone, who concluded his 1937 speech with a warning that "some imperfectly conceived and untried modernized system of primitive native law and custom" will jeopardize the "convergence of [customary and civil] systems, aided by the march of civilization and the standards it enforces".[71] But his stance was losing ground to the pragmatists, like Lord Hailey, author of the African Surory--the colonial equivalent of the Domesday book. Hailey accepted Hone's idea of progress and even

[66]Tamukedde, for instance, saw himself as a nationalist and an admirer of Europeans: see Tamukedde
[67] Morris & Read, supra at22.
68,1U.L.R.22(Ugan. H.C).
[69]Kibuka v. Smith (1908),1U.L.R.41
[70] Cited in*J. N.D.* Anderson, Islamic Law in Africa (London: Cass,1970) at 151
[71] Hone, supra at 179.

conceded the risk "of any attempt by a Colonial Power to impose its own concepts of law on peoples who are at a different stage of civilization". But, he countered, the economic and social institutions of European civilization have a dynamic quality which leads Africans (particularly those of a 'progressive' character) almost automatically to adjust their own custom to that which is characteristic of Europe.[72]

Codification of customary law, led by "progressive" Africans like Tamukedde, would speed up its evolution towards the English ideal.[73] And in extreme circumstances, civil courts judges should directly intervene to "progress" customary law.

Yet it was the Kabaka and his Lukiiko, not the British government or civil courts, who pioneered a codified customary law in Buganda. Soon after the Lukiiko was created by the Uganda Agreement of 1900, the legislature began to pass written statutes codifying its previously oral laws. Some of the first codified laws limited the right to sell and will away land to non-Baganda, or to churches and other religious societies.[74] Successive Kabaka's realized that codifying custom could reinforce their relatively weak power in Buganda, as the Succession Order example showed.

THE BIRTH OF THE KABAKA AUTHORITANIAN EXECUTIVE MANDATE

In 1926, well before Hone warned of the dangers of a unified, codified legal system, Kabaka Daudi Chwa envisioned a "Code of Buganda Native Law" to replace unwritten laws that he claimed would cause "bitter discontent among the more enlightened Baganda."[75] The institution of Kabaka that emerged by mid-century was far more authoritarian than during Mutesa's time.

Codified customary laws entrenched the Kabaka's privileges and stymied many of the "civilizing" goals that justified British control. Lukiiko laws limiting the upper value for bride-prices, for instance, were frequently passed to cap soaring prices in the new cash-run economic relations in cities.[76] But each successive law was resisted and contested by emerging social practices among young city-dwellers.[77] On the whole, however, codification proved an effective means to employ "custom" as a check on new socio-economic relations that threatened the Kabaka and his rural, patriarchal supporters.

The civil courts only caught up with this trend in the 1930s. The High Court in R v. Baganda Cotton Company[78] held that, "the terms of a treaty are not part of the municipal law... a treaty is not the creature of legislature and is not made by legislative authority so as to bind the subject or to

[72] Hailey, supra at641.
[73] Morris&Read, supra at73.
[74] Possession of [LandLawof1908, Rev.L.,1951, vol.VII,1219; Land Succession Law of 1912, Rev.L.,1951, vol. VII, 1225.
[75] Cited in Haydon, supra at, vii.
[76] Morris & Read, supra at 373.
[77] Chanock, supra at209
[78] *Rv. Baganda Cotton Company*1930) 4 U.L.R.34(Ugan.H.C.).

afford the subject rights in a court of law."[79] The ruling placed the native courts in a clear subordinate position to state law for the first time.

THE COMPLETE SURENDER TO COLONIAL EXECUTIVE MANDATE

The high watermark came in a 1959 High Court case, Ndibarema v. Enganzi of Ankole. [80] The Court cited Lord Justice Denning in another case, which showed how its view had shifted fully in favour of Hailey:

Although the jurisdiction of the Crown in the Protectorate (of Kenya) is in law a limited jurisdiction, nevertheless the limits may in fact be extended indefitnitely so as to embrace almost the whole field of government [...] the courts themselves will not make out the limits [...] nor will they inquire into the usage or sufferance or other lawful means by which the Crown may have extended its jurisdiction [...] once jurisdiction is exercised by the Crown the courts will not permit it to be challenged.[81]

Any limits on the High Court's jurisdiction in the three kingdoms' treaties were now exposed to the creeping laws of the Crown. While the Court continued to defer to the colonial government, it no longer restricted itself from interfering with native law "even if an Order in Council or other legislative act appears to exceed the jurisdiction originally ceded by the treaty".[82] The Ndibarema decision thus cleared the way for the universal applicability of British colonial laws over all persons within the borders of Uganda.

By the early 1960s, two leading British commentators could conclude that customary law had "accommodate[d] itself to the changing outlook."[83] During this transition, colonial administrators moved, "from the zeal of a civilizing mission to a calculated preoccupation with holding power, from rejuvenating to conserving society, from being the torchbearers of individual freedom to being custodians protecting the customary integrity of dominated tribes."[84] State and customary laws then became primarily an instrument of colonial control over restive peoples.

The Magistrates' Court Act of 1964 formally created a unified legal system with a strict hierarchy of appeal, rather than informal revision.[85] The Act abolished all subordinate and native courts, replacing them with a magistrate's court with appeals to a Provincial Court and then the High

[79] Rv. Baganda Cotton Company (1930) 4 U.L.R.34(Ugan.H.C.).
[80] Cited in Morris &Read, supra at 23.
[81] Njali Ltd v Attorney General (1956), [1956}1Q.B.1[C.A.J[emphasis added].
[82] Cited in Morris&Read, supra note135at23.
[83] Id. at 369.
[84] Mamdani 1996, at 286.
[85] Magistrates' Courts Act, 1964, Cap. 36.

Court. All the courts' jurisdictions included customary law, English common law, and statutory laws of the Ugandan Parliament. "Civil customary law" was defined in the Magistrates' Court Act of 1964 as, "the rules of conduct which govern legal relationships as established by custom and usage and not forming part of the common law nor formally enacted by Parliament."[86] The Act had attempted to bring this customary law under the unified hierarchy of a single judicial system. However, the Act exempted Buganda since Section 74(5) of the 1962 Constitution stated that the Buganda Courts Ordinance could only be amended or repealed with the Lukiiko. Needless to say, a hostile Kabaka, Mutesa II, resisted having his courts absorbed into the state judicial hierarchy. By 1 July 1965 the Magistrates' Court Act had been applied to all Uganda, except Buganda and Karamoja.

The magistrates' courts replacing native courts continued in practice to function with little reference to High Court precedent or procedure, despite codification of Buganda customary law and statutory reforms in 1940, 1954 and 1964. A 1957 High Court case in the West Nile District, Wango v Manano, illustrated the defacto separation of (former) native and civil courts.[87]Wango sued Manana for allegedly "stealing" his wife and demanded compensation. The sub-county (gombolola) court agreed and ordered Manana to pay compensation. On appeal the county (saza) court upheld the decision, but also fined Wango for agreeing to a higher bride-price than the legislated maximum. The Central Native Court (the district's equivalent to the Lukiiko) quashed this decision since Wango had not yet paid the bride-price in full, and thus was not married and had no right to compensation. The District magistrate made a revisional order upholding the Central Native Court decision, but on the different ground that the marriage had never been registered. Ultimately, the High Court rejected the magistrate’s order since Wango was married "according to native custom” based on the evidence that “the bride-price was greater than that permitted by the district council's by-law".

In Wango, the distinction was striking between the former native courts still staffed by Africans and the civil courts exclusively of Europeans. The African official without legal training in the sub-county court simply declared in favour of the aggrieved husband. The higher native courts focused on the bride-price itself. Did Wango pay too much or not enough? The courts relied on codified customary laws capping bride-price to decide the case. While the magistrate court was tempted to correct Wango's failure to properly follow rules for registering under the Marriage of Africans Act, the High Court recognized that this law had little practical effect in Wango and Manana's community. Rather than impose a civil rule that is not obeyed, the Court approved, in a roundabout way, the first native court's instinctive decision.

[86]Cap. 211, s. 37(1).
[87] Wango v. Manano, [1958) E.A. 124 (H.C.); cited in Morris & Read, id. at 373, fn 40; see also D.D. Nsereko, "The Nature and Function of Marriage Gifts in Customary African Marriages (1975) 23 Am.]. Comp. L. 682 at 693-94.

At first glance, mapping the customary laws of Uganda by 1966 appeared to demand an egocentric projection. Every African belonged to a distinct tribe with a chief administering its unique customary law. This law was personal since it attached to an individual as a tribal marker. In the native court, a chief had only to pluck ancient rules from the memories of elders who formed "the breasts of the courts". Chiefs then simply applied the rules with an informal, simplified procedure. The colonial government would thus leave each chief to evolve his tribe's customary law in isolation towards its ideal end: English common law. This was consistent with a positivist ideology that saw laws as rules in a (benign) hierarchy beneath the constitution. So when custom evolved too slowly, native legislatures and the colonial government began to codify each tribe's law to speed up their evolution. Courts likewise took a more active approach to imposing state law directly on customary rules.

This gilded vision was belied by the arbitrary and harsh realities of the native courts in Buganda and elsewhere. Chiefs and native legislators drove the "retroactive fantasy" of customary law in their struggle to deal with the challenges presented by an urbanizing youth. Contrary to their rhetoric, customary law was largely a colonial creature with an essentially geocentric projection. The laws that chiefs created in native courts relied upon the territorial jurisdictions measured out by the colonial government. Within his sub-county gombolola chief Tamukedde re-interpreted custom as he saw fit, limited only by the oral testimony of elders and interventions by the District Commissioner in the name of morality. However, a chief's writ went no further than his administrative boundaries. "Educated" and "progressive" Africans, invariably living in Kampala, could escape customary law by opting for civil law like marrying under the Marriage Africans Act. If customary law could not prevent young people from migrating to new urban centres, it would retain the rights of fathers and landowners through codification led by the Lukiiko in Buganda. The Magistrates' Court Act reforms in 1964 did little to alter this geocentric projection because it continued to recognize customary laws as a valid source and perpetuated rural isolation from the civil law of the capital. While a useful reform, it did not breach the watertight judicial despotism of chiefs withholding the power to make arbitrary, if contested, decisions in the name of ancient customary rules.

THE BAKONZO CRISIS: A CHECK ON THE EXECUTIVE

Mount Speke rises nearly five kilometres high in the rain-soaked Ruwenzori mountain range along Uganda's western border. It is named after John Hanning Speke who was one of the first Europeans to see it as he passed by on his search for the Nile's source. Europeans dubbed them the "Mountains of the Moon" after Ptolemy's famed description of a supposed equatorial range. The remote Ruwenzori were left unmapped well after Speke saw them and remained among the least visited places on the African continent. Their upper slopes are a formidable frontier to all but those who live there, the Bakonzo and the Bamba. When mapping the Ruwenzori range, elevation matters far more than latitude or longitude.

The spurs and slopes of the Rwenzori nurtured a long-simmering rebellion from the early 1960s to 1982. The conflict's roots can be traced back to the "creation" of the Toro kingdom with the Taro Agreement of 1900. Toro, Ankole and Bunyoro were each modelled (and modelled themselves) after the Buganda paradigm to maximize the privileges that flowed from British rule.[88] It reproduced the five-level administrative structure of chiefs under the Umukama (the Kabaka-like ruler).

Unlike Buganda, the boundaries given to the Toto kingdom in the Taro Agreement of 1900 did not include the Bakonzo and Bamba lands. Thus nearly half of the Toro district's population were not Batoro, but Bakonzo and Bamba living on the Ruwenzori slopes and in its valleys and adjacent plains. This might not have been a problem if the Batoro had not (with colonial encouragement) taken prime land, banned all but the Kitoro language, and kept most chieftainships, scholarships and hospitals. However, no saza chiefs and only 6 of 38 gombolola chiefs were Bakonzo or Bamba. By independence in 1962, the Batoro began to repress their neighbours with tacit support from Obote's new government, which needed Toro to counterbalance the strong Buganda kingdom.

The Batoro push for hegemony over its nominal territory created a backlash amongst the Bakonzo and Bamba. Isaah Mkirani, a primary schoolteacher, had founded the Bakonzo Life History Research Society to raise self-awareness of their grievances against the Batoro. Information gathered by the Society was then used to frame 232 The Toro Agreement, for example, was an almost complete copy of the Buganda Agreement. Toro Agreement, supra grievances in written petitions and as evidence for the Sembeguya Commission.[89] Mkirani started and led the Ruwenzururu movement's armed struggle in 1962, which soon spread all along the Ruwenzori range despite his capture by Ugandan troops that same year. Two years later, armed Batoro, supported by Ugandan police and soldiers, raided up the lower slopes of the Ruwenzori in tens days of looting and killing. Yet even this outrage did not mean the Ruwenzururu was a purely ethnic revolt.[90] Many wealthier Bakonzo peasants fled to the relatively safe plains after the raid and even within the movement itself one faction preferred negotiations over armed revolt. It was the poorest peasants in the upper arms of the Ruwenzori range who would form the spine of the Ruwenzururu rebellion when, in 1964, Mkirani and his followers declared a kingdom with him as king and set about consolidating their rebel state.

[88]The Toro Agreement, for example, was an almost complete copy of the Buganda Agreement. Toro Agreement, supra.

[89]A government commission blamed the Ruwenzururu rebellion on the Toro government's antagonistic policies. Despite their leaders' declared desire for modestre form, the Batoro rejected all but unconditional surrender. The commission recommended negotiate settlement, which Obote's government rejected since it would alienate crucial Batoro support: see Uganda Government*SessionalPaperNo.1of1963* (Entebbe: Government Press, 1963) cited inid.at 484.

The Ruwenzururu consolidated their rebellion by creating local governance structures modelled on those in the Toro (and originally Buganda) kingdom. An old guerrilla fighter recounted why Mkirani was made king: "He was fighting a king. He could not fight him as a subject. Therefore, he had to become a king himself."[91]

Similarly, since they were fighting a hierarchical kingdom, they had to become one and adopted the 5-level paradigm of Buganda (see Table 1). But the Ruwenzururu also introduced novel democratic elements into their governance structures. [92] While chiefs at each level retained administrative and executive powers, the popular assemblies were given judicial and legislative powers. This reform split the fused powers found in Batoro and Baganda chiefs. The village assembly included all adult villagers and dealt with local matters and all higher assemblies were elected indirectly from the assembly below. The reforms created a rudimentary democracy in the Ruwenzori, although the king and chiefs retained significant power.

The new quasi-democratic assemblies challenged the state and customary legal system's hegemonic claims. Peasants were relatively free (although subject to intimidation by both Batoro and Ruwenzururu) to move across the de facto border, and thus choose between competing legal orders. In Ruwenzururu territory, its laws governed and were enforced by the army. Even in territory occupied by Ugandan.

A government commission blamed the Ruwenzururu rebellion on the Toro government's antagonistic policies. Despite the rebel leaders' declared desire for modest reform, the Batoro rejected all but unconditional surrender. The commission recommended a negotiate settlement, which Obote's government rejected since it would alienate crucial Batoro support: see Uganda Government, Sessional Paper No. 1 of 1963 (Entebbe: Government Press, 1963) cited in id. at 484. soldiers, peasants might obey the Ruwenzururu laws, especially in paying taxes to support the armed resistance. For the most part, however, the physical border corresponded to the frontier of state and rebel laws. Not only did elected popular assemblies make and adjudicate laws, they did so without any written texts. Instead, "songs became the principle cultural form of the Ruwenzururu, and its youth its main cultural agency."[93] The songs often recalled specific events like assembly elections, demands made to Ugandan officials and their leaders' ideas and decisions[94] Political songs were sung by young people 8-15 years old in large groups composed by their schoolteachers guided by Ruwenzururu chiefs. Unlike other popular Bakonzo songs, only children sung them and had to memorize the lengthy and complex verses of each song. A typical song recalled Obote's failure to quash their rebellion:

[90] Mamdani 1996, supra note 13 at 196-200.
[91] Mzee Muhindo, quoted in Mamdani1996, *supranote*13at198.
[92] Id. at 199-200

- We are with you
- We are with you
- We are with you

The “content and structure" of these children's songs "reflect[ed] the demands to be made on those [i.e. children] for whom they were composed." School children and their teachers reproduced the quasi-constitutional norms of the popular assemblies, such as mandatory democratic elections, through the oral medium of song. Moreover, the Ruwenzururu invented this medium to perpetuate their new local councils and ingrain their values in children.

Not only did the Ruwenzururu challenge the state (and its legal system) through an armed struggle, they also replicated the Toro (and thus the Buganda paradigm) governance structures with notable democratic reforms to mobilize its people. Political songs written by teachers and performed by youngsters, however, were the secret to the movement's resilience in the face of two decades of state-backed violence. "Every assembly," Mamdani reminds us, "was charged with preparing songs that gave meaning to popular experiences. " the legal norms captured in those songs were not egocentric, however, as they applied to all people living in the people in the Ruwenzori whether or not they were Ruwenzururu. Songs passed relatively easily across the rugged kingdom and united otherwise isolated peoples. Since Ruwenzururu law was a geocentric construct, its authority ceased once a Mukonzo chose to descend to the plains and accept state law administered by Batoro. The no-man's land at where Toro plain met Ruwenzori slope marked the frontier of two competing geocentric legal orders.

The incomparable Tamukedde was appointed District Commissioner 1n 1967 with the special task of restoring "law and order" and seeing off the "self-appointed 'king' Mukirane (sic)".[95] He did

[93] Id.
[94] Peter Cooke & Martin Doornbos. "Rwenzururu Protest Songs" (1982) 52 Africa: J. Int'l Afr. Institute 37 at 39.

[95]Tamukedde was more concerned about soldiers from neighbouring Zaire who raided across the western border in violation of “Uganda territorial integrity." These soldiers, however, were chasing Bakonzo relations rebelling against President Mobutu's regime far to the west. Tamukedde and Mobutu's soldiers were both chasing the rebels that lived in the Ruwenzori range bifurcated by the Uganda-Zaire international border: Tamukedde, *supra at*70-1 succeed in capturing Mkirani, but the Ruwenzururu leadership fought on until a final political settlement in 1982 when the rebel army disbanded and its civilian councils were incorporated into the state system. The songs continued, however, and reproduced memories of old grievances and the political structures of the independent kingdom created to remedy them. As the National Resistance Movement was to discover in the late 1980s, the people of the Ruwenzori could conjure up a mountain kingdom from children's songs if their vital interests were threatened.[96]

THE RE SHAPING OF UGANDA BY THE EXECUTIVE

Only some of Uganda's legal multiplicity is represented to illustrate the concentric dissipation of state laws' authority as one moves away from the capital in Kampala. However, it goes a long way in dispelling the most persistent presumptions of the positivist ideology of the Ugandan judiciary. The idea of law as a system identified with, or identical to, the state fails to explain the spread of state law up to and after independence. Instead a map emerges of decreasing authority of government laws and increasing state violence in the effort to impose them on other laws.

Customary law was in fact a form of state law that nevertheless was largely independent of civil authorities. In Buganda, the Kabaka and his chiefs reinterpreted or codified customary law for their benefit. Moreover, the Ruwenzururu directly contradicted the High Court's claim in Matovu that Obote's coup was effective since there was no resistance to its new legal system. The rebellion had modelled itself on the Buganda paradigm and established a mini-kingdom detached from the greater state. Its seamless reintegration into Batoro would reveal how the validity of the state legal order did not depend on identification with the state (nor vice versa). In fact, the only time law was identical to the state was in the person of the military administrator for Karamoja. All powers of the state were fused in this official, but he had to resort to violence when confronted with the orality of the Karamojong.

Early colonial administrators envisioned law as a tribe's ancient rules reproduced in the oral memory of its male elders. Baganda chiefs perpetuated this "retroactive fantasy" while reinterpreting, and later codifying, rules to consolidate their newfound power. Even reforms that created a single judiciary failed to bridge the gap between former native courts and the civil courts as Wango v. Manano illustrated. In practice, the two systems operated in isolation, one in the city and one in the countryside, and thus Mamdani concluded that state law was bifurcated into "a modern power regulating the lives of citizens and ... a despotic power that governed peasant communities.[97]

[96]Arthur Syahuka-Muhindo,"The Rwenzururu Movement and the Democratic Struggle" in Mamdani &Oloka-Onyango, supra at 273.

Thus customary law always occupied an uncomfortable place as not-quite-state law in Uganda. While men like Hone argued for keeping customary laws and courts distinct from civil laws and courts, later administrators and chiefs encouraged codification to make it popular and predictable (colonial shorthand for effective and valid, respectively). Yet by the time of Obote's coup, very little customary law outside Buganda had been codified. And so the laws governing the great majority of people's daily lives were unwritten. The Ruwenzururu and Karamojong merely confirm the relative rarity of written laws in the lives of most people. If a written form was a prerequisite for a rule's validity, then Uganda could hardly have been said to have a legal system at all.

At its most fundamental, a legal rule assumes that those it purports to guide share what Wittgenstein called a form of life. This is essential, as Hart argued, for shared behaviour to develop the normative force of law. Even in his critique of Kelsen, Finnis assumed the society in question was homogenous. But at what point can we say that a single homogeneous people had become two distinct groups with different forms of life? A persuasive answer relied on Hart's own metaphor of a balding head: when a new form of life develops, we will recognize it. In Uganda, the Ruwenzururu seemed like a distinct society from the plains-dwelling Batoro. But their principle difference, a respective reliance on song and written laws, was more form than substance since their songs were pragmatic inventions of a literate elite for an illiterate population spread across an inaccessible mountain range. The Karamojong, in contrast, did appear to have a form of life distinct from all other peoples discussed above. Whatever a "rule" might be to a Karamojong, it certainly was nothing like an ordinance or bride-price custom-though it was no less "law" for that, the bloodlessness of Obote's coup, with the exception of the army's destruction of the Kabaka’s palace, was striking. Why didn't the people rise up if they opposed Obote's gambit for total control in Kampala? The answer should now be obvious. Civil laws originating from the capital had little or no impact on the daily lives of most people. As the map's scale slides from small to large, state law fades away and is replaced by a myriad of laws oscillating between ego- and geocentric projections: nascent practices in urban centres, contested customary laws in villages, shari'a laws shying away from state meddling and the dominant orality at the map's frontiers. The High Court judges in Matovu might well have imagined this legal complexity in their circuits of the provincial capitals. Instead of engaging it, however, they raised Kelsen's handy foreign theory as an ideological shield to the threatening plurality outside the capital. Their choice would have lasting consequences in Uganda up to the present day.

[97] Mamdani 1996, supra at136.

CHAPTER TWO

THE PRESIDENCY FROM HISTORICAL TIMES TO PRESENT MODERN TIMES. ORIGINS OF PRESIDENTIAL POWERS, DECREE AND MANDATE.

THE PRESIDENCY

Presidential power can be defined as the executive authority granted to the head of state by the constitution. Both the word and the sword as pairs for imperialism paved way for colonialism in the world, which became the first instance for growing presidential powers wherever the seeds were sowed.

After Uganda was declared a British protectorate in 1984, and after the signing of kingdom agreements especially Buganda agreement, the colonial rule was formalized by the 1902 order in council and section 4 to 5 of the 1902 OIC provided for the office of commissioner assisted by the deputy commissioner who was to take over all the control of the administration of the protectorate and he was the representative of Her Majesty's government. Sir Harry Johnston therefore was the first leader of Uganda though he was doing so on behalf of queen and then later in the 1920 order in council, his title changed from Commissioner to Governor.

In Uganda's case, colonialism failed by commission and omission to lay profound foundations for the building of a nation out of the protectorate. The idea of 'protectorate', connoting to provision of protection to colonies, effected the nature of administrative establishment and running of Uganda. The elements that the colonial economy imposed were subjective and account for the makeup of the post-colonial chaos. The Sword and the Bible were catalysts that planted divisionism on which the colonial government survived. The Bible, plunged Buganda into civil war in the 1880s that left her divided and an easy prey, and in 1890s the incorporation into the British empire by captain Fredrick Lugard.

The divisions brought by the Bible soon crossed to embrace the protectorate and these divisions still plague independent Uganda, that's the legacy of colonialism! The period of 1890 and 1920, imperialism wielded the sword in earnest to pacify and secure her colonial possession, Uganda. A premium was put up by imperialism to establish law and order when the virtual purpose was to police the populace. This character cannot be mistaken for any other except colonialists because imperialism was intolerant of opposition and relied more on the sword other than dialogue. Therefore, the British conquered Uganda through use of force and fraud and these became a cancer for generations.

Uganda's final geographical shape in 1920s, had people from three linguistic groups; Nilotic, Sudanic and Bantu from the two major language families- Nilo-Sahara and Congo - Kordofanian.[98] They were brought together into one central protectorate. The logical thing to do thereafter was unite these diversities but imperialism had no intention because it essentially survived on divided nations. This strategy therefore helped in consolidating and conquering of the Ugandan regions. Nationals like the Nubians formed part of the colonial army established in 1895.

Where force was not used to conquer, fraud was at play. This was done through fraudulent agreements between the British and Buganda, Bunyoro, and Ankore providing acceptance and establishment of a local constitution. A critical example of this is when in the 1926 Privy Council judgement in Sobhuza II vs Miller[99] where it was established that agreements with native rulers can never be binding on the British crown.[100] Ibingira to this effect observes that agreements lacked the force of law and bound the British government during its pleasure.[101]

From the triumph of conquest, the British moved to a stage requisite of power and that is administration. A dual system of administration was devised, that of natives authoritative and a central administration. The domain of native administration was delineated by boundary wherever possible, along ethnic lines in conjunction with the indirect rule policy.

Within the domain of native administration, Buganda was governed by the Uganda agreement of 1900 and the rest of Uganda by the Native Authority Ordinance of 1919, a constitutional arrangement which emphasized the division between Buganda and the rest of the country.

The 1900 agreement, powers came with the fragmentation of authority in strategic spheres of influence. The economic and administrative authority were mainly vested in the protectorate government and then some scattered powers were to the king of Buganda. The person of "Her Majesty's government representative" meant the commissioner, high commissioner, governor, or principal official of any designation who is appointed by her Majesty's government to direct the affairs of Uganda.[102] There was in addition to that direct control of land, especially the natural resources rich areas and other fertile lands in all regions of Uganda.

Later on in 1952, we see Andrew Cohen arriving as a governor and sought education and training of African administrators and placing of local governments on a stable, democratic and viable foundation and then in between there a Kabaka crisis of 1953 sparked off where by Governor

[98]Ladefoged, Glick and griper. Language in Uganda, part 1. Nairobi, oxford university press, 1971
[99] Privy Council Appeal No. 158 of 1924, from Swaziland Special Court Judgment.
[100] Quoted in G.S.K. Ibingira, "The forging of an African nation", p.13.
[101] Ibid, pp.14-15
[102] Ibingira, Forging of an African nation, pp. 18-19

Cohen wither recognition from him under the Buganda agreement. He declared a state of emergency and swiftly deported him in the United Kingdom. We see that after the deportation, the Lukiiko refused to select a successor Kabaka and the affairs of the kingdom were placed under regents.

It was not until May 1955 that Mutesa II was allowed to return with a new Buganda agreement of 1955 in place and the main feature of this constitution was that Buganda government was transformed in structure, if not in spirit, into a constitutional monarchy.

It was then at the height at of the human face reforms that Uganda's first recognized genuinely nationalist party, the Uganda national congress was set up on 2nd march 1952 by Ignatius musaazi and its thriving force was the desire to transfer power and authority from colonialists to indigenous Black Africans and it adopted a slogan `cry for self-government now' to give expression to these ideas.

Later on in 1954, the Democratic Party was also established as a national party and its main aim was addressing what was perceived to be the historical discrimination suffered by the peoples of Catholic faith under colonial rule. Events followed another up to the first constitutional conference that was held in September 1961 and there were delegates from HM government, the governor of Uganda in the own capacity and the Uganda government led by Ben Kiwanuka, the opposition UPC members of districts and urban authorities. All those that attended were ensuring that its interests were fully accommodated especially as the primary objective of the conference was the promulgation of a constitution providing for internal self-government.

The 1955 Buganda agreement propagated the same except that this time the governor had more powers of the high office. Executive authority still divided between native and protectorate authority but precedence was with the British authority. The powers of the Governor were all round. Although Buganda was just another province of Uganda, and although the agreement, as noted earlier, bound the British crown at its pleasure and was not justifiable, Ibingira asserts that the agreements with African rulers were for political reasons strictly adhered to by the British rulers who departed from only in rare cases when it seemed in the best interests of peace, good government or imperial authority to do so.

The native traditional authorities had to be the agents of indirect rule. Peoples participation in or the creation of national institutions were not encouraged. For example, in 1922 there was a suggestion that an African central assembly would be formed to provide all natives of Uganda with a single political forum but this suggestion was vetoed by the governor. Through the power allocated through the 1955 agreement, he also vetoed the meeting proposed for the leaders of Buganda, Busoga, and Toro. In 1925. when both the legislative and executive councils were established by 1920 OIC. The Africans to this end did not get access to the legislative council until 1944 and the executive council until early 1950s

Therefore, representative institutions were opposed by imperialism and the basis of colonial state was autocracy.[103] These tendencies flowed to the proceeding time of the next (ceremonial) presidents of Uganda. Apart from the periodically elected parliament, the constitution provided for a cabinet drawn from and responsible to parliament.

The powers of the presidency can be traced back to the first legislation of Buganda. Buganda being the central kingdom and epitome of government among the native people. Although the Buganda constitution provided expressly for the Kabaka as the head of Buganda government expressed under Article 2 of the 1955 Buganda agreement, Article 4 of the 1955 Buganda agreement recognizing the office of the Kabaka. The power to appoint ministers under 13 and 30 (1), termination of powers traced in Article 19 (2), with the 1955 constitution of Buganda, the corner stone for the establishment of presidential mandate, its foundation can be analyzed in lieu of the presidential rear of Uganda.

The president elective by Parliament from among the 5 sub-national monarchs. Kabaka (president) Muteesa II in-statement as the President of the new Uganda one could say attracted all hungry hounds for power which created the revolution of military rule or involvement as shall be discovered. The formation of political parties[104] as to contest for the presidency and the coming up of different political personalities Obote, John Kakonge, Itesot Cuthbert Joseph Obwangor. Well as Muteesa legitimately got presidential powers, although there was no universal suffrage, the next president Obote opened a new chapter to military rule.

Hegel, while discussing the subject of African barbarianism said the, "history of the world is none other than the progress of the consciousness of freedom, a progress whose development according to necessity of its nature, it's our business to investigate." and it is with this notion that in the consciousness of freedom, the political landscape of Uganda started taking turns from reign to reign motivated each by a certain consciousness of what ought to be.[105]

Furthermore, Africans while enforcing the idea of owning or acclaiming their history and in advancing their world spirit with pride. Hegel commented, as having a character "difficult to comprehend, for the very reason that in reference to it, we must quiet give up the principle which naturally accompanies all our ideas the category of universality" [106]but to what end this statement

[103] The first Africans to be appointed to the Executive Council in 1952 were Mukasa and kulubya, to the Legislative Council in 1945, Kawalya-Kagwa, Zirabamuzaale and NyangabyakiAkiiki.
[104] Uganda People's Congress, UPC Youth League, Kabaka Yekka
[105] G. W. F. Hegel, The Philosophy of History, trans. J. H. Clarke (New York: Dover, 1956).
[106] Olufemi Taiwo Exorcising Hegel's Ghost, Africa's challenge to Philosophy (1998)1. African studies quarterly 4 holds truth, is subject to debate. Because the infestation of character to what Hegel throws these lines, by witness of history and the separate sense of African civilization, is not a doing of Africans per Se.

Through exercise of the transition process, Obote successfully instated himself in power under the demise of the interim constitution of 1966 behind the guard of "we the people of Uganda hereby assembled in the name of Uganda"[107] perhaps this action alone was not enough, within the threats from the aggrieved parliament to impeach him and other ministers of corruption for example Idi Amin. On 22 Feb 1966, in a statement to the nation by the prime minister Obote assumed all government powers and suspended Sir Edward Muteesa II allocating to himself almost unlimited powers under the state of emergency rules. (the gold scandal). In addition to forceful acquisition of power, Obote furnished his presidency with nearly unlimited power, stating himself as head of state, commander in chief, leader of national assembly of the majority party. Article 37(1)[108] afforded him powers in office in perpetuity as the only way he could leave office was by resignation. The essential elements in the 1966 constitution, we can say, the office of presidency was merely inherited by virtue of his numerical strength of the party in the national assembly. Having direct control over the legislative assembly, added to that is the law-making power with the equivalence of an act of parliament. With the power conferred in him (Obote) by the Pigeon hole constitution he dissolved parliament and presumably under Article 73(1)[109] which effects "the president may at any time prorogue parliament" albeit, the exercise of this power was a bombshell style and the suspension was indefinite.

The subsequent exercise of power continued inherently to Amin Dada through a military coup. Therefore, a presidential system is a form of government in which a head of government (President) leads an executive branch which is separate from the legislative branch. Being also the head of state, the head of government is elected or in some cases appointed by other authorities (Muteesa appointed by governor Andrew Cohen) is responsible to the legislature, which under normal circumstances cannot dismiss it except through impeachments which in my opinion is historically very significant in various parts of the world especially Africa.

In America the evolution of this office, started out by election from other delegates, was the president of the continental congress later, named the president of the confederation was the presiding officer of the continental congress, from the convention of delegates that emerged as the first transitional national government of the united states during the American revolution. This is similar to the mode of the first presidential office in 1963 in Uganda, where the first president was elected to lead the new independent Uganda of 1962. Although the title of president in Uganda was so from the start, in the united states as formerly discussed took a permanent step to becoming the president of the united states upon ratification of the Articles of confederation in March 1781.

[107] By 55 votes of 4
[108] The Uganda Constitution, 1966
[109] Ibid

The evolution of the presidential power takes a turn at appointment or election of a different president. Every president may introduce new mandates to his liking. In America the president's office has constantly changed by presidents and completely restructured from the old normal.

Historian Edmund Burnett said it right when he said that,

"the president of the united states is scarcely in any sense the successor of the president of the old congress. The presidents of the congress were solely presiding officers, possessing scarcely a shed of executive or administrative functions, whereas the president of the united states is almost solely an executive officer, bearing likeness in social and diplomatic precedence, the two offices are identical only in the possession of the title." [110]

In Uganda now the first life of this office as already mentioned was 1963 by Muteesa II, held office from 1963–1966. The criteria of election being that every constitutional lead qualified, Heads of kingdoms. Including the Kyabazinga of Busoga authority qualified where to elections UPC. Caucus discussed the matter and came up in support of their vice president, civilian Wilberforce Nadiope the Kyabazinga of Busoga leaving Kabaka (who was president of UPC) without support. However, after much deliberation, the UPC. Grudgingly accepted support Muteesa, a more powered by Obote.[111]

The election of Muteesa was indeed a ceremonial gesture to call the racing sentiments among the Buganda. This being a tactic used in India as well as the united states and elsewhere in the world to elect previous political prominent. Well-argued by prof. Gordon wright. What can be the functional equivalents of monarchy in countries like the united states as India which have lost that institution irretrievably? Once such is the ceremonial presidency which can be safely bestowed upon some prestigious & cooperative member of the former ruling elite for the various satisfaction of the rest of the group. Under the 1963 constitution of the republic of Uganda, the president replacing the Monarch as ceremonial head of state were elected by the national assembly for a 5 year term.[112]

In the Uganda context, the president and the prime minister having out rightly parallel agendas, the office was faced with indisputable political turmoil. The zeal to further personal interests greatly created clashes and I can say the first president did not even warm the seat. The mesh among the

[110] Burnett 1941 p. 34
[111] Daily monitor wed, August 2013
[112] Morris, HF (1966) the Ug. Coustin, April 1966 journal of African Law. 10(2) 42-47

leaders fuzzed the dream of peaceful, democratic transition of power in little Uganda

The contrast here is, the united states presidency evolving from similar criteria as Uganda in the initial stage, Uganda to the left turn by presidency by coup and yet us maintained from election by delegates to a more stable universal surface system for clamity even though Uganda apparently exercises the same system

In pursuance of the presidential powers, the later president above through his pigeon hole constitution banished and outlawed all other political parties to consolidate his mandate as president and was the beginning of an error of terror and enormous tribulation for the people of Uganda.

This followed the rule of Amin dada who on January 25th 1971 ousted his predecessor in identical action. The situation became recurring by other presidents until to date where people hang in imbalanced suspension as whether the roots of the original sin of Uganda may shoot again.

PRESIDENTIAL MANDATE

Presidential mandate starts from establishment of a presidential office. As we appreciate the subject, we must know that there is no presidential mandate without presidential authority drawn under presidential office. Whereas we have discussed the past presidents in the last pages, perusing through their presidency, this part serves to concentrate on the legality of the presidency. The common feature in all Uganda's presidents is that they derived their mandate although differently but yet with scantiness of a constitutional mandate. Kabaka Muteesa II, almost hereditary go his from the 1955 Buganda agreement and the 1962 Ugandan constitution, which took effect at independence. The constitution provided for a complex system of devolution within Uganda. There are various understandings of the term presidential mandate in various parts of the world in terms of how it works.

The idea of presidential mandate is subjective & politically changed. Newly elected candidates mostly invoke the idea of mandate, specifically as a justification for execution of their ideas to which they may be popularly elected upon. Some are inclined to believe that every winner has a mandate to govern simply by virtue of winning their election. But this has to be in accordance with the law. Others however assert that the mandate is only as strong as the president's margin of victory. Translating to one with land slide victory to have decisive mandate and having freedom to enact his desired policies. However, one with a slim margin may have less weak mandate.

Modern scholars have written about the presidential mandate as a myth or a fictional device used solely as rhetoric to further a political agenda. After all there is no basis for the idea in written law. The words presidential mandate does not appear anywhere in the constitution academy. However, the concept of president mandate is powerful not because it is any kind of legal statute, but because it is an idea of how power and leadership work in a representative democracy. Therefore, the president may be the most powerful person in a country, but the sources of their mandate (power) stems from the citizens. In which sense Uganda has seen a mixture of people power and appointed power.

In Uganda now the first life of this office as already mentioned was 1963 by Muteesa II, held office from 1963 – 1966. The criteria of election being that every constitutional lead qualified, Heads of kingdoms. Including the kyabazinga of Busoga authority qualified where to elections UPC. Caucus discussed the matter and camped in support of their vice president, civilian Wilberforce Nadiope the Kyabazinga of Busoga leaving Kabaka (who was president of UPC) without support. However, after much deliberation, the UPC grudgingly accepted support Muteesa, a move powered by Obote.[113]

The election of Muteesa was indeed a ceremonial gesture to call the racing sentiments among the Buganda. This being a tactic used in India as well as the united states and elsewhere in the world to elect previous political prominent. Well-argued by Prof. Gordon Wright. What can be the functional equivalents of monarchy in countries like the United States as India which have lost that institution irretrievably? Once such is the ceremonial presidency which can be safely bestowed upon some prestigious & cooperative member of the former ruling elite for the various satisfaction of the rest of the group.

Under the 1963 constitution of the republic of Uganda, the president replacing the Monarch as ceremonial head of state were elected by the national assembly for a 95-year term.[114] In the Uganda context, the president and the prime minister having out rightly parallel agendas, the office was faced with indisputable political turmoil. The zeal to further personal interests greatly created clashes and I can say the first president did not even warm the seat. The mesh among the leaders fuzzed the dream of peaceful, democratic transition of power in little Uganda.

The contrast here is, the United States presidency evolving from similar criteria as Uganda in the initial stage, Uganda to the left turn by presidency by coup and yet US maintained from election by delegates to a more stable universal suffrage system though Uganda apparently exercises the same system. Therefore, to appreciate the concept of presidential mandate, we may have to take a drift from modern presidency and trans back to history and its modus operandi looking at various common wealth jurisdictions.

The word mandate connotes to the authoritative command. In politics a mandate is the authority granted by the constituency, in this matter the state or people to act as its representative. On election night in 1980, the vice president elect informed the country that Ronald Reagan victory was

[113] Daily monitor wed, August 2013
[114] Morris, HF (1966) the Ug. Coustin, April 1966 journal of African Law. 10(2) 42-47

"...not simply a mandate for change but a mandate for peace and freedom, a mandate for prosperity, a mandate for opportunity for all Americans regardless of race, sex or creed, a mandate for leadership that is both strong and compassionate, a mandate to make government the servant for people in the way our founding fathers intended, a mandate for hope, a mandate for hope for the fulfillment of the great dreams…"[115]

This is not only an exaggeration as some writers put it, in the elation of victory, it should be in fact, the least expected if I may say, celebration of presidential mandate. It should serve this purpose because more can be done.

The presidential mandate of the president of Uganda is mainly invested in chapter seven of the 1995 constitution of Uganda. It then shoots back and forth between chapter six and eight penetrating legislative and judicial powers in what may seemingly be justified as checks and balances or contended to be mere presidential controls. To appreciate the concept presidential mandate, we may need to demystify the mandate.

Since the bloodline of Uganda presidency has very strong semblance with the historical days, in light of the 1980 speech of the vice president of America on the victory of Ronald Reagan, we may set the standard of presidential mandate to the mandate in that speech in line of the notorious past previous presidents.

The 1902 order in council played a concrete role in the establishment of presidential powers and creating the sense of entitlement by the president. in furtherance the 1902 OIC most eminently sawed the powers of leadership in the highest office. It vested the power of appointment and presidential discretion in the Governor, section 8 -10 effects the political economic and social powers in decision making to the governor alone. The powers of appointment of judicial officers stipulated in section 15 (1) and dismissal in the commission. This ghost haunted all presidents that came after 1962. And what about the 1920 OIC which were enforced directly the discretion and independence of the governor. (having the power to decide independently) which in other sense vests all power in one person. This does not differ much with the American mentality in the 1800s that only the president or presidential office could manage the state. From the 1902, 1920 and other agreements made in colonial Uganda, they served primarily in accordance to subject, to create a blue print for three fundamental presidential exercises.

[115] Robert a. Dahl, Myth of the presidential mandate

- Having unrestricted powers to appoint
- Control over funds in government
- Having control over the outcome of the legislation

Being the first colonial (parent) constitution, these rites followed in a trial and it was (would say) almost impossible to do away with this rite and they were maintained through tout independent Uganda. An impair-able aspect about the period of 1902 1nd 1920 as Justice Kanyeihamba described "dictatorial and despotic if not in practice at least in law"[116] though would flip this and say the same but mostly in practice.

FROM ONE SUPREME RULE TO ANOTHER

After a colourful wedding comes a long trying marriage.

The stories of independence throughout history in the world are painted in a manner that portrays the transition of power from one leader to another. The only difference is that the leader advocated for was one known to the people, one who fit in their skin, wore their grief and shared in their struggles. All the revolutions were geared to self-governance and the ability to choose their own leadership.

In the moment, it was more than justified to do so because these revolutions enabled different countries to reset their priorities and establish what they believe was best for their own interests. The ideologies adopted at these stages are so numerous they could not possibly be analysed in this paper. However, it can generally be agreed that they all pointed towards independence.

The independence story was only an event in the history of all the countries. It is celebrated around the world to this day as a day of liberation and self-governance. All the other 365/4 days is the struggle to realise the dream of the revolution. To this end, some countries have achieved greatly in their governance while others, let us just say, they became stagnant.

Of course, arguments can be sustained that the progress of some countries is attributed to how early they attained their independence and the civilization that they were exposed to at the time. This however does not account for countries that achieved their independence late but have still been able to grow in such a short period. It also does not account for countries that attained independence long ago and have for all this time remained stagnant in all spheres.

Human beings are naturally attracted to higher power or deity. When they still lived in isolation, this deity was the wilderness that surrounded them; the provision and protection it granted them in order to exist. When the early societies started forming, this deity was the community heads who provided protection from the environment that proven more hostile than hospitable. It goes without saying that throughout this time, there was a higher power still subscribed to which has over the years been codified as the natural school of thought.

[116] G.W Kanyeihamba, Constitutional and political history of Uganda (1894)

Therefore, even in colonial times, the masters were the deity that ruled the colonies. Even when this rule was solely for their own interests, their harsh rule ensured submission. Even in the stories of the Old Testament in the bible, the Israelites often yearned for a leader. After having priests like Samuel, they required kings like Saul who proved dangerous.

In the same accord, even after successfully revolting against colonialism, many countries yearned a leadership of their own. It mattered not, at least for a time, if this leadership was good or bad, provided it was not the colonial rule. And indeed, most of the early rulers of newly independent countries did not do a great job. Make no mistake, those who led the struggles to independence laid a great foundation. The downside is that the first leaders who took on from them were never part of these struggles and therefore never understood the gravity of the dream.

To some countries therefore, the dream died with the liberation and cruel leadership was reborn, only that it spoke a familiar language and dressed in known skin. Therefore, when we look at most governments today, especially in Africa, it is hard to believe that the dream of the struggle still lives and breathes in the lives of the citizens or at least, the leaders.

This loss of the dream has tarnished leadership and soiled its purpose to the extent that the wrong has become the socially acceptable and most of the young generation born into it today take it to be gospel truth and therefore a way of living. Things like corruption and nepotism have been integrated in the daily lives of the many citizens around Africa that pruning it now seems almost impossible. It has become the light of the country and there is no amount of “darkness” now that can be harnessed to put it out.

Given that many leadership systems have a supreme leader, this paper will analyse how this position has been used to harness the dream or to fade it. Some states are headed by presidents, while others have kings and queens. This paper will follow up on countries with the president as the supreme leader. Close attention will be paid to the Ugandan supreme leadership and how it relates with the entire system of governance.

THE DIFFERENT POWER TRANSLATIONS IN UGANDA.

Uganda has undergone a turbulent power translation under different political parties and different personalities as am going to elaborate more on this hereafter. In respect to the ideal nature in which different power translation in Uganda, history has proven it right that as far as power translation is concerned, it’s very easy to prove rules of overtime characterized with the outstanding, embedded, competent, trained, educated young men who has been gaining power by all means thus including appointments, through successful revolutions and many their powers and respected political parties have been ousted from power through successful coups which later followed their deposition from the office of presidency.

However it is worth noting that as far as power translations are concerned in my country Uganda, different Presidents have ruled Uganda some only attending of presidency for only recognized periods of time thus including days, months and others years since in most cases power only belongs to a particular group of people on either tribal or religion basis and with due regard Uganda has recognized different presidents acquiring power through questionable and intelligent means with the aid of their different political parties and these emphasis will be seen and explained hereafter.

In respect to describing different modes of government in Uganda since the west minister mode of governance thus articulating an aspect where some prime ministers were latter recognized as the head of state and in summary, on the aspect of enjoying the national cake, Uganda has experienced different leadership these includes the Monarchical Rule(1962-1963), followed by the First Republic(1963-1979), followed by the Military Rule(1971-1979), followed by the Second Records(1979-1985), followed by Military Rule(1985-1986) and eventually the coming of the Third Republic(1986-present) and these have been expounded on them as in the following ways with their preserved orders of governance in Uganda.

Uganda became an independent Commonwealth nation on October 9, 1962 under a constitution much influenced by the British. The constitution distributed powers between the centre and the regions, albeit disproportionately. The Buganda kingdom was given more powers at the expense of the other three kingdoms, namely the Ankole, Toro and Bunyoro, and the other districts. The powers granted to the four kingdoms also handicapped the Parliament, which was elected by direct universal suffrage, except for parliamentarians from Buganda who were indirectly elected through the Council of Buganda. Apart from the periodically elected Parliament, the constitution provided for a Cabinet, drawn from and responsible to Parliament, and defined the powers of major government organs, civil service and judiciary. One year later, an amendment introduced a ceremonial President to replace the Governor General as a head of state and Kabaka Mutesa became the first elected president on 9 October 1963.

However, it’s worth noting that from 1962-1963, the Queen of England, Elizabeth II was the head of state that was under the Uganda independence Act 1962 and also recognized the Monarch of other common wealth realm. Living in England, the Queen was represented in Uganda by the Governor General. Following that aspect, Uganda became a republic under the constitution of 1963 and that was the time when Monarch and Governor-General were replaced by the one Ceremonial President who was also replaced by the executive president in 1966.

Uganda became an independent Commonwealth nation on October 9, 1962 under a constitution much influenced by the British. The constitution distributed powers between the centre and the regions, albeit disproportionately. The Buganda kingdom was given more powers at the expense of the other three kingdoms, namely the Ankole, Toro and Bunyoro, and the other districts. The powers granted to the four kingdoms also handicapped the Parliament, which was elected by direct universal suffrage, except for parliamentarians from Buganda who were indirectly elected through the Council of Buganda. Apart from the periodically elected Parliament, the constitution provided for a Cabinet, drawn from and responsible to Parliament, and defined the powers of major government organs, civil service and judiciary. One year later, an amendment introduced a ceremonial President to replace the Governor General as a head of state and Kabaka Mutesa became the first elected president on 9 October 1963.

THE MONARCH SYSTEM (1962-1963)

This was the first rule in Uganda under the attributes of Queen Elizabeth II and it was established on 9th October 1962 and only pushed up to 9th October 1963 and only lasted for just a one-year period but it's believed that the rule recognized the office of prime minister who was by the then Dr. Milton Obote. This rule recognized the Governor as President in the monarchical system in Uganda and exercised most of the powers within the Monarch and his roles were designed by specific period of time(also known as terms) and was actually meant to serve at the pleasures of the monarch and not forgetting that his appointment solely on the advice of the cabinet of Uganda and that happened without any involvement of the British Government and when the office of Governor was vacant then the chief justice served as officer administering the government.

The royal house was in Windsor under the powers of the governor general by names of Walter Courts who is believed to have been born in 1912 and later died in 1988 but his attributes of office began on 9th October 1962 up to 9th October 1963 thus just a one-year period in office of head of state.

THE EVOLVEMENT OF WEST MINISTER MODE OF GOVERNANCE AND ITS APPLICABILITY IN UGANDA.

The West Minister parliamentary system is both a political heritage and a concept. Across the Commonwealth, the Westminster system as a political heritage was either 'implanted' by the colonial rulers or 'transplanted' by the settlers of British ancestry. As a concept, it represents a majoritarian system that constitutionalizes an institutionally marginalized opposition. The west Minister system or Westminster model is a type of parliamentary system of government that incorporates a series of procedures for operating a legislature that was first developed in England, key aspects of which include an executive branch made up of members of the legislature, and that is responsible to the legislature, the presence of parliamentary opposition parties and a ceremonial head of state who is different from the government. A.V Dicey in his book Introduction to the study of the law of the constitution tried to alleviate fears over the spread of democracy by appealing to a constitution within which popular participation was restrained by parliamentary sovereignty, the rule of law, and informal constitutional conventions. In doing so, he provided the classic account of the place of the judiciary within what was to become the West minster Model.

Dicey examined the constitution to dispel this idea. The Westminster Model was to some extent an interpretation of constitutional history developed by conservative Whigs in response to anxieties about popular participation. If parliamentary sovereignty appears as a counter to popular participation, the rule of law is, for Dicey, something of a counter to parliamentary despotism. Legislators in parliament are constrained by a commitment to the rule of law. Dicey identifies the rule of law, rather narrowly, with known rules, equality, and respect for precedent. For a start, Dicey argues that government operates in accord with known rules rather than arbitrary caprice or even discretion. Dicey also argues that Britain, unlike its counterparts, has long boasted a notion of equality before the law, according to which all individuals are treated similarly regardless of class or rank. Finally, Dicey associates the rule of law with the way in which the principles that protect individual liberties have become entrenched over time through the decisions of judges. In his view, although some other states rely on enumerated powers and formalized rights, Britain's use of precedent is in fact a more effective way of ensuring individual liberties.

Dicey's constitutional views proved extremely influential among both academics and political actors. Dicey clearly defined the agenda for legal scholars and others interested in the constitution and the judiciary. Indeed, for most of the twentieth century the dominant image of the British political system was of a Westminster Model defined in terms of parliamentary sovereignty. Within the Westminster Model, the courts are expected merely to interpret Acts of Parliament to the best of their abilities. Judges are meant to rule in accord with the intention of the legislature: their decisions are meant to reflect how a given Act was designed to function. Judges are not meant to challenge, let alone overturn, legislation as they can in, for example, the US. Indeed, by combining parliamentary sovereignty with a concept of the rule of law that was based on precedent, Dicey's followers implied that a judge should never actually challenge an existing law, regardless of whether that law arose from a legislative act or from the past decision of a judge. Any attempt by the courts to reexamine the content of law appeared to be an abuse of power. Thus, the Westminster majoritarian system as an adaptation in former British colonies in Africa, the Pacific, East and South Asian regions face a particularly tough cultural challenge. It is a very popular idea in these regions that the British-trained political elites engrafted the Westminster model upon people 'with very different social structures, religious texture and cultural values.

In Uganda, following the prior colonial legacy that saw the introduction and evolution of two ambits of colonial administrative tools i.e., the 1902 and the 1920 orders in council later saw the arrival of Sir Andrew Cohen in 1952 who tremulously increased African participation in their own governance where for the first time African representatives were seen on the legislative, However it was with sadness therefore that many Ugandans said good bye to Sir Andrew Cohen in 1957 at the end of his tour. Most would have wished to see him remain until independence. It's also worthy while noting that, his works weren't put to waste as his subsequent governors like Sir Walter Cutts who embraced and magnified on what Andrew Cohen had initiated and its therefore not surprising that by 1961, a committee under the chairmanship of Mr. JV Wild and one his report which came to be known as the Wild Report had recommended the Westminster model of Government and a cabinet of ministers responsible to the Legislature. The new Legislative Council would be known as the National Assembly and on its first meeting was to act as an electoral college for the election of the specially elected six members.

The 2nd constitution conference then opened on 2ndJune 1962 under the secretary of state with the governor of Uganda delegation from UK, representatives of kingdoms, districts and urban authorities then opposition DP and by this time, the minister committee had submitted its reports and a new constitution had been prepared on 1st march 1962 however some matters had not been settled for example the status of three other kingdoms that is Ankole, Bunyoro and Toro, then question of head to state among others.

The broadship membership of UPC opposed the idea that the party should not provide the head of state. However, after several discussions, it was resolved to give the office of head of state to one of traditional leaders especially to Kabaka Mutesa. Thus by the constitution of Uganda 1st amendment act no. 61 of 1963, it was stipulated that the president and vice president of Uganda would be elected for a period of 5 years by the national assembly and further that only traditional leaders would be eligible for the offices.

It should be noted that on 4th October 1963, Sir Edward Frederick Mutesa the Kabaka of Buganda and sir Wilberforce William Nadiope the kyabazinga of Busoga became the first president and vice president of independent Uganda respectively.

THE FIRST REPUBLIC (1963-1971)

The first republic came into existence in 1963 and served to the period of 1971. Within the attribute of change in power, under the 1963 constitution[117] , the president there replaced the Monarch as the one ceremonial head of state and in the same kind of appointment the president and prime minister was elected by the one national assembly for aiming of traditional rulers and the constitutional heads of districts aided to serve for a limited period of time that was only five years as the limited term of service.

Following the attributes and the eventual roles of the office of president by 1966, and with that attributes their powers became distinguishable and increased thus followed by the eventual establishment of executive president, but the same rules applied to the 1967 and 1995.[118]

EDWARD MUTEESA (1924-1969)

Sir Edward Mutesa was a distinguished figure well recognized with his leadership aspects who ruled within the recognition of traditional customs, cultures and norms within Buganda tradition. He was born in 1924 and latter died in 1969. Back to his service he was a well-established figure in the political stature which made him attain the power by election in 1963 9th October up to 2nd march 1966 that's serving for the period of two years and 144 days. He attributed the aspect of political parties and he lived a leader under the Kabaka YEKKA Political Party which party recognized the office of prime minister of which this was under the one Dr. Milton Obote as the Prime Minister.

Obote was a legitimate leader with due aspects to manage Uganda and is believed that his well-equipped and legitimate minds with the influence of Uganda people's congress as the party of the candidate. Dr. Milton Obote was born 1925 and later died in 2005. Despite Milton Obote being recognized as a political lad and his office of the prime minister being respected and reserved by Edward Mutesa, this did not prevent Dr. Milton Obote from ousting him out of power and thus replacing him in office of presidency that's on 15th April 1966 and his power lasted to 25th January 1971 thus four years of service and 285 days coming up with the new political movement called the Uganda People's Congress.

THE MILITARY RULE (1971-1979).

The military rule was the rule under the well-equipped, determined and trained General Idi Amin Dada the field marshal, the conqueror, the champion, the supreme of law who ruled by decrees and he was sui generis to the law, to the extent that he made laws himself and in most cases he ordered for implementations who aided for the basic development of his home Uganda.

[117] 1963 constitution of the republic of Uganda.
[118] Constitution of the republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

General Idi Amin Dada was born in 1925 but sadly he later died in 2003 (PBUH) while in exile in Saudi Arabia. He had great tactical political ideologies and military ambition training which he successfully used to ascend to the office of presidency on 25th January 1971 and served as president to a later date that's the 11th April 1979 hence ruling for 8 years and 76 days under the Uganda armed forces and with him, he therefore abolished the office of prime minister and this left him rule supreme and sui generis.

The 1966 crisis had propelled Amin to the forefront of Uganda's political scenes so it was not surprise that upon the departure of Obote for a common wealth conference in Singapore, on the morning of 25th January 1971, the army announced that it had staged a coup-de-tat in order to save a bad situation from getting worse and so marked the onset of the period of militant politics that was to characterize the Amin regime and the coup listed 18 reasons of grievances against the Obote government more significantly violations of human rights through detention, lack of political freedom, state of emergency in the country, corruption, nepotism and tribalism among others

Less than a month after the coup, on February 20, 1971 Idi Amin issued an announcement in the name of officers and men of the Uganda army and air force in the Uganda gazette in which he elevated himself from the position of a major general to full general and suspended elections for at least five years stating "in view if the very bad state of affairs left behind by the last regime we fully appreciate that our government led by his excellence Major General Idi Amin dad is faced with a great task[119]

We also see that the armed forces and state intelligence agencies for example the SRC could carry out arrests, summary trials as well as execute sentences which not eroded the traditional policing function but also judicial powers, the implications of this decree were remarked upon by Justice Russell in the case of Efulayim Bukenya vs Attorney General[120].

The legal instrument that ushered in the Amin regime was a proclamation known as legal notice no. 1 of 1971 and its significance was the introduction of a constitutional legal order in kelsian terms as well as before legitimacy on the new regime

Amin's tenure which lasted eight years was marked by brutality, with hundreds of thousands of civilians killed and tens of thousands of Indians and Pakistanis expelled from Uganda because Amin believed they were exploiting the economy. Despite the above statement, no elections were held

[119] Declaration by the officers and men of the Uganda army and air force made to the nation on the 20th February 1971, The Uganda Gazzette (Feb.26, 1971)

120 HCB 87

Amin introduced a total dictatorship and within space of 2 years, he had completed in turning the country into absolute military institution. Although he released political prisoners detained by Obote,his first act was to suspend political party activities which secured by suspension of political activities[121]. In 1979, his eight years of chaotic rule came to an end when Tanzania and anti-Amin Ugandan forces invaded and topped his regime. Amin had launched an unsuccessful attack on Tanzania in October 1978 in an effort to divert attention from Uganda's internal problems. He escaped to Libya, eventually settling in Saudi Arabia, where he actually died in 2003. Given his connections with Qaddafi, Amin at first fled to Libya, taking his four wives and more than 30 children along with him. Eventually they moved to Jeddah, Saudi Arabia. He remained there until 1989 when he used a fake passport to fly to Kinshasa (a city in what was then Zaire and now is the democratic republic of Congo). Idi Amin died on August 16, 2003, after multiple organ failure. His family disconnected him from life support. Three years later, his character was famously captured by actor Forest Whitaker in an Oscar-winning performance in the 2006 film, the last king of Scotland (so named because Amin claimed to be Scotland's uncrowned king). In the end, the brutal dictator brought economic ruin, social unrest, and oversaw the murders of up to half a million people. There's no denying that his nickname "the butcher of Uganda" was well earned.

THE SECOND REPUBLIC (1979-1985).

The second republic in Uganda was also recognized as the pseudo charge of power in which the translation of power was conducted following the different attributes of minded people gained the office of presidency and these are as explained in the following ways as below and their time of service was limited by the hungry, power thirsty, war mongers and guided political activists these are as explained as hereafter.

The second republic was first under the reign of Yusuf Lule a very recognized political activist, with a very high sense of humor, morality whose yarn for presidency was achieved on an elect basis. Lule was born in 1912 but eventually died in 1985 (PBUH). The main constitution instrument that ushered in the UNLF government was legal notice[122] which effectively restored Article 1 of the 1967constitution. The government of Professor Lule was short lived surviving only 68 days as it was faced with interval wrangling and conflicts over ideology and policy the last straw came about as a result of dispute over appointments.

We shouldn't forget how some members of the NCC insisted that all presidential appointments must be ratified by the NCC on the premises that this was in accordance with the minutes of the Moshi conference were most politicians who attended saw Lule as the cleanest of the all despite the fact that Professor Lule played a mere side role in the fight against Amin and people thought that there was no way he could have become the president. He in fact had not even come for the meeting. He was hastily invited for the conference and subsequently was named the president.

[121] Decree, No. 14 of 1971
[122] No. 1/1979

Having virtually boarded the liberation train at its tail end made Lule merely a puppet of various other forces. Unfortunately, Lule did not even know he had very limited powers and the real power were in the hands of nyerere and Paulo muwanga who was preparing the return of Dr. Milton Obote and the UNLF cohorts. So in trying to assert his authority as president, little did Lule know he was committing a grave mistake. On June 20, 1979, the NCC staged a coup removing lule as president for allegedly making wide ranging appointments in government without consulting them. Out of office, Lule went to exile in Tanzania where he was put under house arrest by President Julius Nyerere. The events surrounding Lule's removal as president were to result in the first constitution case since 1966 and this was the case of Lutakome Kayira & Ors vs Edward Rugumayo & Ors[123]

Subsequently, Godfrey Binaisa was named as his successor. He fell into the same trap when he tried to reshuffle Mwanga, Museveni and Ojok and they nearly got rid of him and a military commission by Mwanga and Museveni was put in place. The Military Commission created an identical commission that comprised on three members, two of who were judges and the other a long serving civil servant. But his body was merely cosmetic and real executive power remained with the military commission and basically army. The military commission then out in place a process of holding general elections that took place in December 1980. These elections are widely to have been rigged in favor of UPC and Obote

Ousting Godfrey Binaisa out of office of presidency paved way for Paul Muwanga who was born in 1921 but solely he died in 1991 PBUH but lived a civilian life and took over office of presidency on 12th may 1980 and he later resigned the presidential office on 22nd may 1980 making him a president for only 10 days ruling under the Uganda National Liberation Front (UNLF) and still during his regime the aspect of office of prime minister was still a story of tell therefore never existed.

On ousting Paul Muwanga out of office of presidency, this left the office for the power monger and braved Dr. Milton Obote II believed to have been born 1925 but unfortunately died in (2005) PBUH. However, he got powers of presidency on 17th December 1980 and was deposed on 27th July 1985 thus making his power lasting for a period of four (4) years and 222 days and he ruled under the Uganda People's Congress (UPC) party movement. The second government of Obote was characterized by a number of significant developments. Among these were attempts to revive the economy ravaged by several years of mismanagement during the Amin years. For the very first time in Uganda's history, a civil conflict broke out as a result of disagreements over elections. It is very difficult to separate patterns of violence against civilians from the general conduct of the civil war that began with in one year of Obote's return to power.

[123] Constitutional case No. 1/1979

The second Obote regime was brutal, the events of January 1983 marked a key escalation in the targeting of civilians. Great appreciation to the influence of Museveni and NRA, public favor came to turn against Obote, who was overthrown in a coup d'état led by Basilio Olara-Okello on July 27, 1985. The contradictions and infighting of Obote's regime tore it apart internally.

MILITARY RULE (1985-1986).

This military rule was influenced and led by General Bazilio-Olara-Okello who successfully led the eventual coup leading to the eventual defeat of president Obote and his government and following the successful coup where General Okello proclaimed himself the President of the State of Uganda.

In articulating more about Bazilio-Okello was born in 1929 and eventually died in 1990 (PBUH) and he successfully took over the office of president on 27th July 1985 and was latter ousted from office Tito-Okello-Lutwa that was on 29th July 1985 under the rule of Uganda armed forces and hence making him being considered a leader for just and only 2 days and he ruled under the Uganda Armed Forces and his reign also its believed beyond doubt that the office of prime minister was still vacant and thus not recognized.

The presidential office was therefore by the General Tito Okello Lutwa believed to have been born in 1914 and latter died on 1996 but he assumed powers of the office of president on 29th July 1985 to 26th January 1986 under the Uganda Armed Forces but this time round for him he recognized the office of prime minister and thus he appointed Muwanga Waligo to attain back the lost glory of the ministerial office in the political structure in Uganda.

THE THIRD REPUBLIC (1986-PRESENT)

In respect to the attributes of the general rule is that the 1995 Constitution[124] provides that the executive is the head of state and is one elected by the popular vote and that's only for a limited period of five years. However, it's also worth noting that in the event of vacancy of the president, the vice president served as acting president.

The 9th president of Uganda is Yoweri Kaguta Museveni believed to have been born in (1944 to date) and it has been imposed to office in all elections starting with the 1996 election, 2001 election, 2006 election, 2011 elections, 2016 election and the most recent of 2021 election. He took over office on 26th January 1986 and is still the incumbent with 35 years and 55 days with the political party of National Resistance Movement (NRM).

[124] Constitution of the republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

It is also worth noting that following his eventual imposition into the office of president since 1986, President Yoweri K. Museveni has ably and systematically recognized the office of the prime minister and this has been occupied by a number of personalities these including the Kisekka, Adyebe, Musoke, Nsibambi, Mbabazi, Rugunda and currently Robinnah Nabbanja.

CHAPTER THREE

CONSTITUTIONALISM

WHAT IS A CONSTITUTION?

A Constitution is the basic law governing a particular society. It is the fundamental law and is regarded as essential in the governance and well being of society. Virtually every state of the world has a Constitution and all these are written except for countries like the United Kingdom (Britain). A Constitution may take many different forms i.e. It may depend on culture, religion and politics.

A Constitution is primarily concerned with the establishment of governmental power and how power is distributed between the various organs of government so that each organ should know the precise extent of its powers and that is important for its relations with other organs of government but most importantly for relations between those organs and the citizens to whom they owe these duties. That is why it is at times called a contract or compact between the governors and the governed. And in this context of immediate concern are individual Human Rights in society. It is the Grundnorm i.e. the very reason for the validity of other laws. It is the super law of the land from which all others stand to be tested.

Why do we call the Constitution fundamental?

i) All laws derive their authority from the Constitution and in this sense each law must be justified from the basis of the Constitution. If that law is inconsistent with the Constitution, then the law shall to the extent of that inconsistency be null and void.[125]

ii) It is concerned with the ultimate distribution of power. It defines how power is acquired in political, administrative and judicial offices, who may be elected, who may vote, what powers the holder of an office may enjoy and how he may vacate office.

iii) It spells out relationship between the individual and the government that is it shows rights and duties of individuals to the government and vice versa. In particular, it establishes the extent of the rights the individual is supposed to enjoy.

[125] Article 2 (2), Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

BASIC CONCERNS OF CONSTITUTIONS

1. The power to make law and the manner in which these powers are to be handled i.e. the Legislative authority of government.
2. Constitutions are concerned with the exercise of executive authority.
3. The manner in which legal and political disputes are to be settled that is the judicial system of government.
4. The Constitution is concerned with identifying fundamental rights and duties of individuals and how these should be enforced.
5. It is concerned with the issue of citizenship.
6. Most Constitutions look at the question of property and property rights including resources like land. It is concerned with public finance i.e. raising of revenue, expenditure, system of control against malpractices.
7. A Constitution will also concern itself with the phenomena of internal and external securities and with the different bodies that make up this security.
8. It is concerned with administration of the public sector for example Local government.

Whatever the specific issues the Constitution is concerned with, the guiding principle is that it should be able to move with the times without destroying its terms that is, it should be time less but flexible.

CHARACTERISTICS COMMON TO CONSTITUTIONS AROUND THE WORLD

1. Supremacy

By supremacy is meant the notion that the Constitution stands over and above any other law, institution, authority or individual in the country as such all the above must obey the essential elements of the Constitution.[126] All previous Ugandan Constitutions have stated that the Constitution is supreme. Under the notion of supremacy, the responsibility of interpretation of the Constitution lies with the Judiciary. Executive authority under the doctrine of supremacy must also be exercised under the dictates of the Constitution. Likewise, the power to make laws to the election of such authority should be done in line with the Constitution.

2. Perpetuity

The Constitution should be perpetual because it is designed as a broad instrument of government. There is a saying that the Constitution is made today in order to identify and address issues of tomorrow i.e. a Constitution takes a long term view of issues and attempts to address the specific problems affecting a country at the time at which it is made but also to be flexible enough in order to take care of future developments.

[126] Articles 2 (1) and (2) and 20 (2), Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

3. Certainty

This means the provisions of the Constitution should be certain or definite. They should be well known and accessible in terms of language so that it can be understood and interpreted in order to enable society to deal with conflicts that may arise over the enforcement of Constitutional provisions.

4. Providing for change

Good Constitutions provide a mechanism which enables the instrument to change to accommodate new social and political economic changes and ensuring that the Constitution can accommodate those changes. There are different ways of providing for amendment of the Constitution. Some can be amended by simple majority of parliament e.g. in Britain, yet others may be amended by referendum while others may require special authority. Amendment is a theory of maintaining that the Constitution remains relevant by providing for a basic change.

SOURCES OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

Where we have a written Constitution, the primary source is the Constitution itself but in addition, there are a variety of other sources of Constitutional law.

i) Ordinary Legislation or laws passed on a daily basis:
ii) With unwritten Constitutions, this becomes the major source of Constitutional law. But even where there is a written Constitution, we must always refer back to the law for example the law provides for the freedom of association or speech. In this way the organic or supplementary laws make part of the Constitutional law.
iii) Decisions of courts of law or the Judiciary particularly the doctrine of precedent which provides for continuity. Decisions of judges are important especially where decisions of Court conflict or where the Constitution is written in general terms.
iv) The source of authoritative writings i.e. the opinions of leading Constitutional law authorities. Here courts look for opinions of authorities or books on Constitutional law.
v) Constitutional Conventions/custom; These are simply Constitutional practices which have been accepted over a period of time in civilized nations of the world. Professor Dicey has described Constitutional conventions as follows “Rules or practices that are not necessarily enforceable by acts of law because they are based essentially on consent or acquiescence rather than enforcement. Nevertheless, they are binding on those to whom they apply. The most famous Constitutional convention was the pre-1945 convention in USA which stipulated that a US President could serve only 2 terms.[127] President Franklin Roosevelt broke this convention.[128]

CLASSIFICATION OF CONSTITUTIONS

There are two broad categories of distinction i.e. the form of the Constitution itself or the type of governance which the Constitution creates. With regard to the form of the Constitution the most obvious is written and unwritten Constitutions.

CLASSIFICATION BY FORM

Where a Constitution is written, then all the principles governing the allocation of power structures and functions of government are contained in one or more documents which together are described as the Constitution of that country. Where a Constitution is unwritten; most of the provisions of that Constitution are spread up amongst ordinary legislation, doctrines of common law, decided cases and constitutional conventions. Collectively, this collection of instruments could be called the Constitution. The most famous of this type is the Constitution of the United Kingdom.

Advantages of a written Constitution

i) It will give you everything about the Constitution in one single document.
ii) Usually the language, style or format will be uniform
iii) The principles and doctrines of a written Constitution are more likely to subsist and endure as opposed to those of the unwritten Constitution. This is mainly because with an unwritten Constitution and parliament as supreme body, such a Constitution can be easily amended by a simple majority i.e. written Constitutions have continuity.

The other classification of Constitutions is that between general and detailed specified Constitutions. A general Constitution is concerned with establishing a broad framework of government and it does this by laying down the main principles by which it will be guided and so it leaves room for interpretation, in contrast a detailed Constitution tries to cover every aspect of Constitutional government in a written instrument. Therefore, it will have detailed provisions as allocation of power, functions of government and so on.

The other classification is flexibility and rigidity. This one deals with the method of alteration. When we talk about the rigid Constitution, we mean that the methods for amendment are relatively [127] The Twenty-second Amendment (Amendment XXII) to the United States Constitution limits the number of times a person is eligible for election to the office of President of the United States to two, and sets additional eligibility conditions for presidents who succeed to the unexpired terms of their predecessors.

[128] Neale, Thomas H. (2009). Presidential Terms and Tenure: Perspectives and Proposals for Change more stringent. Rigid Constitutions are characterized by special procedures for amendment which often take a long time and involve in high majorities either at the legislature or through a national referendum. Flexible ones require a simpler process and have less majority requirements. The second feature of a rigid Constitution is the feature of entrenched clauses i.e. clauses beyond amendment which have been singled out for special protection. As opposed to rigid Constitution, flexible Constitutions are easy to amend. The best example is the United Kingdom Constitution because it needs a simple majority for amendment. In general countries have favoured rigid Constitution. This is because:

a) of the need to provide checks and balances over the allocation of power and resource between different organs of the state.
b) where you have a diversity of people or a large country and the issue of regional interests is an important one, you will then have a federal Constitution and under this Constitution, the Constitution will be made rigid in order to protect the regional autonomy of the federal units and to ensure that the central government does not override those special interests arbitrarily. For this purpose, therefore, the United States Constitution is considered a rigid Constitution because it cannot be easily amended.
c) Countries also need a rigid Constitution to protect young and growing institutions of government or where there has been a violent history characterized by abuse of people's rights and freedoms or civil conflict and war.

CLASSIFICATION BY TYPE OF GOVERNMENT

When we speak of government we refer to the way in which the power and functions of state authority are distributed among different state organs of government. There may always be various types of government but for the purpose of classification, we may talk about certain key indicators. First and foremost is the number of people participating in the top decision making of government, secondly, what type of ruler has the Constitution created i.e. a benevolent, autocratic or democratic ruler and thirdly, we look at the actual distribution of power between the organs of government and the different levels of the government.

Pursuant to the above factors, the first classification is dictatorial and democratic government. Generally speaking, a dictatorial government places absolute power in the hands of a single individual which individual generally rules without the will or consent of the people. People cannot involve themselves in determining their political destiny and other affairs. As such there are no elections or if they are there are usually no choice exercised. In such a government opposition to the incumbent is not tolerated and freedoms and rights of people are violated at the leaders will.

On the other hand, a democratic government is characterised by the dispersal of power amongst a variety of different organs. There are also periodic, genuine and free and fair elections. There is in general respect for the rights and freedoms of individuals. Lastly the powers and functions of the different organs of government are separated from one another.

U N I T A R Y C O N S T I T U T I O N S

The biggest distinction of a unitary Constitution is that all powers are centralized and the system of government in operation is a unified one whereby all powers and authorities are vested in a single central government, to the extent that the regions, district or local government have limited powers. These are powers that are conferred to them by the state and may be taken away by the central government without necessarily infringing the Constitution. The general characteristic therefore is concentration of power in the central government.

Unitary system Constitution tends to be more flexible and can easily be amended. The vast majority of African states employ unitary Constitutions. The idea of federalism was an idea which was rejected by most African states at independence and the arguments being made were that national unity was more appealing. In this case the idea of national identity and a national language were crucial. In between the federal and unitary system of government we have the idea of decentralization which is especially an idea that has gained prominence in the case of Uganda.

F E D E R A L V U N I T A R Y C O N S T I T U T I O N S

The basic distinction between a federal and a unitary system of government relates to the fashion in which various powers and functions of government are vested in the central governing authority and the regions which make up the country. The reasons which necessitate the establishment of a federal system are numerous but among them include:

i) The question of culture: Many federal states become so because they have divergent and different ethnic groups and cherished characteristics which they consider require special protection to secure their identity and allowing for their autonomous co-existence. In such circumstances, it may be felt that a unitary system will destroy those distinctions. Some of countries using or following it are Canada, Switzerland and former Yugoslavia.

ii) The size or expanse of the country: Size becomes a consideration because it is obvious that it is quite impossible for the central government to have effective control over such a vast country. As such, for ease of governance of these autonomous regions, federalism is granted. (Examples of federal states include Russia, USA, Nigeria, and Canada.

iii) The third reason can be found in the historical circumstances surrounding a particular country. So for example a country could have been formed out of several autonomous states which considered it useful to give up some of their autonomy in order to form part of the overall larger unit.

Main distinctions of a federal constitution and a unitary constitution.

1. Generally speaking, the main characteristics of a federal government relate to the way in which power is distributed and there is often a clear demarcation as to what type of powers can be exercised by the federal government and those to be exercised by the different regions so that there is a distribution of power and any violation of the distribution can have grave Constitutional consequences.

There are different ways in which federal Constitutions may achieve this distribution:

i) To list the powers of the central government and by implication those powers not listed will belong to the states

ii) The Constitution may provide the reverse i.e. if it states the powers of the local governments, by implications, the powers so left are for the centre.

iii) To list the powers of both the centre and the regions and then state that any undistributed power shall be dealt with in a specified manner.

2. The second characteristic of a federal government is that rather than having a single Constitution, each state has its own Constitution as well as a central one. So each region is ruled upon its own Constitution but the federal Constitution draws the boundaries.
3. Usually federal Constitutions stipulated elaborate procedures for amendment. These are usually difficult to amend.
4. Federal Constitutions always make provisions for a neutral territory to be the national capital.

REPUBLICAN VERSUS MONARCHICAL CONSTITUTION

The distinction between a republican and a monarchical government is mainly in the manner in which the Head of state is elected. A monarchical system is a system of government where the head of state comes into power by right of his or her birth. He or she derives his authority or power by virtue of a royal lineage.

With respect to the kind of powers that are exercised a monarch can be either absolute or Constitutional i.e. a figurehead or an actual ruler. A Constitutional monarch will have his/her powers spelt out in the Constitution and those powers are largely ceremonial and executive powers are usually left to elected rulers. This is the more common type of monarchies that we have around. An absolute monarch in contrast exercises power absolutely without any necessary reference to any other instruments or institutions of state.

Republican Constitutions are such that the leaders of a country are elected by the people and periodically changed by the people. It does not recognize distinctions related to birth. The emphasis is based on equality of all people and their eligibility to hold responsibility at all level.

THE PRINCIPLES OF CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION

i) Fundamental rights in here in all citizens and are not granted by the state but are inherent in citizens by the very fact of their birth[129]

It was espoused by Lugakingira J in Rev. Christopher Mtikila V AG of Tanzania[130] that 'fundamental rights are not gifts from the state. They inhere in a person by reason of his birth and therefore prior to the state and the law'.

This means that these rights are merely re-stated but the Constitution does not purport to be creating them. They to that extent must be looked at in a different light from other legal rights. It is therefore important that the state should in no way always require permission from its organs and agencies like the Uganda Police in order for the citizens to enjoy these rights.

ii) The Constitution must be interpreted as a whole

It was settled by the Supreme Court of the US in South Dakota V North Carolina[131] that no single provision of the Constitution is to be segregated from others and to be considered alone but that all provisions bearing upon a particular subject are to be brought into view and to be so interpreted as to effectuate the greater purpose of the instrument'.

Therefore, in law the Constitution is a wholesome legal document and all provisions must be regarded as constituting it. The normal logic in this canon is that in order to ascertain the true meaning and intention of the legislators, all relevant provisions must be considered. It is thus dangerous to consider any particular human right provision in isolation of all others and any court which tries to do this is bound to get an inconsistent conclusion.

iii) The Preamble and Directive Principles offer some guidance in interpretation

The Preamble and the National Objectives and Directives Principles of State Policy must when necessary be taken into account to supply the intention of the framers. But critically, this must be done without violating the meaning of the words used. The simple rationale to this canon is that the rights granted by the Constitution do not exist in a vacuum and are not an end in themselves. They are granted upon a given background and it would be lethal for any court to interpret the provisions in total segregation of the preamble and the Directive principles. In Uganda the basic importance of this was stated by Egonda-Ntende J in Major General David Tinyefuza V Attorney General[132] wherein he stated that:

[129] Article 20(1), Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[130] Civil CaseNo.5 of 1993
[131] 192 US268 (1940) 448

"the binding values in this Constitutional dispensation are clearly set forth in the Preamble. These are unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and progress. In order to ensure that all citizens organs and agencies of the state never lose sight of those values and are firmly guided by these values in all our actions, a statement of National Objectives and Directives of State Policy was set forth. The first paragraph states 'The following objectives and principles shall guide all organs and agencies of the state…and persons applying or interpreting this Constitution or any other law… for the establishment and promotion of a just, free and democratic society" That ought to be our first canon of construction of this Constitution. It provides an immediate break or departure with past rules of Constitutional construction".

This is further given life by Article 126[133] which recognizes that judicial power is derived from the people and that it must be exercised by the courts in accordance with the Constitution and 'in conformity with the law and with values, norms and aspirations of the people".

It was held by Kanyeihamba JSC in Attorney General V Major Gen. David Tinyefuza[134] that 'it is therefore important to know and appreciate the historical and contextual background to the Uganda Constitution and the manner in which it carefully demarcated responsibilities and functions amongst the various organs and institutions of state before applying its provisions to given sets of facts and circumstances". Oder JSC also shared a similar view and added that the preamble and the directives must always be borne in mind and noted that the preamble refers to the struggle of the people of Uganda against the forces of tyranny, oppression and exploitation. The same was done by the Supreme Court of South Africa in De Clerk & V Du Plisses & Ors [135]

iv) Where words are clear and unambiguous, they must be given their primary, plain, ordinary and natural meaning.

Such language must be given its common and ordinary sense and natural sense means that natural sense which they bore before the Constitution came into force.

In the case of R V El Mann[136] court cited with approval Craies on Statute Law (6th Ed) 66 wherein the learned author states that' the cardinal rule for construction of Acts of Parliament is that they should be construed according to the situation expressed in the Acts themselves. The tribunal that has to construe an act of a legislature or in deed any other document has to determine the intention

[132] Const. Petition No.1 of 1997
[133] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[134] Const. Appeal No.1of 1997
[135] (1994) 6 BLR 124.
[136] (1969) EA 357

as expressed by the words used…If the words of the statute are themselves precise and unambiguous, then no more can be necessary than to expound those words in their ordinary and natural sense. The words themselves alone do in such a case best declare the intention of the law giver. Where the language of the Act is clear and explicit, we must give effect to it, whatever may be the consequences for in that case the words of the statute speak the intention of the legislature…we are satisfied that a Constitution is to be construed in the same way as any other legislative enactment and that is when the words used are precise and unambiguous they are to be construed in their ordinary and actual sense. It is only when there is some imprecision or ambiguity in the language that any question arises whether a liberal or restricted interpretation should be put on the words'.

v) Where the language of the Constitution is imprecise or ambiguous, then a liberal, flexible, generous and purposeful interpretation must be given to cure the ambiguity.

The rationale for this is that the Constitution is not an ordinary statute capable of amendment as and when the legislators chose.

This was best illustrated in Unity Dow V Attorney General of Botswana[137] where in Amissah J.P said that:

'The makers of the Constitution do not intend that it be amended as often as other legislation, indeed it is not unusual for provisions of the Constitution to be amendable only by special procedures, imposing more difficult terms of heavier majorities of the legislature. By nature, and definition even when using ordinary prescription of statutory construction, it is impossible to consider a Constitution of this nature on the same footing passed by a legislature which is itself established by the Constitution. The object it desires to achieve evolves with the evolving development and aspirations of its people'.

In Salvatori Abuki V Attorney General,[138] Okello J (as he then was) stated that 'If the purpose of the statute infringes a right guaranteed by the Constitution, that statute is declared unconstitutional. Where the purpose of the statute is purportedly within the Constitution, the court would go further to examine its effect. If the effect violates a right guaranteed by the Constitution, that statute is also declared unconstitutional'.

In R V Big Drug Mart Ltd,[139] the Supreme court of Canada stated that 'the interpretation should be a generous one rather than a legalistic one aimed at fulfilling the purpose of the guarantee and securing for individuals the full benefit of the charter's protection'.[140]

[137] (1992) LRC 623
[138] Const. Petition No.2 of 1997
[139] (1985) DLR (4th) 321
[140] See also Attorney General V Momodou Jobe (1984) AC 689.

Connected to this cannon is the meaningful and effective rule. Under this, courts may expand the meaning of a phrase or term to accord it with the legislative effect. In Tellis & Ors V Bombay Municipal Council,[141] the petitioners argued that if they were evicted from their slum and pavement dwellings, that would violate their right to life under Article 21 of the Indian Constitution. They sought to argue that the right to life included the right to livelihood. The Supreme Court accepted their argument and added that 'if the sweep of the right to life conferred by Article 21 is wide and far reaching. It does not mean merely that life cannot be extinguished or taken away for example by the imposition and execution of the death penalty, except according to law. That is but one facet of the right to life. An equally important facet of that right is the right to livelihood. If the right to livelihood is not treated as part of the Constitutional right to life, the easiest way of depriving a person of his right to life would be to deprive him of his means of livelihood to the point of abrogation. Such deprivation would not only denude the life of its effective content and meaningfulness but it would make life impossible to live'.

This case and passage was quoted with approval and agreed to apply 'with equal force to the right to life as protected under the Uganda Constitution'. This was in Salvatori Abuki V Attorney General[142]. In that case, the petitioners were banished from their homes for 10 years after serving a prison sentence for contravention of the Witchcraft Act. The Constitutional court struck down the Act as being unconstitutional and inconsistent with the Constitution which guaranteed citizens from cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, the right not to be compulsorily deprived of property and the right to life. The court took judicial notice of the fact that most people in Uganda live in rural areas and survive on the land. Court considered that the banishment provisions would have the effect of excluding the banished person from shelter, food by denying him access to land and that such a person is rendered a destitute upon leaving prison.

vi) The Constitution must be interpreted as a living document

This cannon enjoins the courts to interpret the Constitution having in mind present day circumstances. It also means that it is meant to cater for both the present generation and those unborn. In Unity Dow V Attorney General,[143] it was remarked that, 'the Constitution is the supreme law of the land and it is meant to serve not only this generation but also generations yet unborn. It cannot be allowed to be a lifeless museum piece. On the other hand, the courts must breathe life into it from time to time as occasion may arise to ensure the healthy growth of the state through it. We must not shy away from the basic fact that while a particular construction of a Constitutional provision may be able to meet the designs of the society of a certain age…it is the primary duty of the judges to make the Constitution grow and develop in order to meet the just demands and aspiration of an ever developing society which is part of the wider and larger human society governed by some acceptable concepts of human dignity'.

[141] (1987) LRC (Const.) 351
[142] Const. Petition No.2 of 1997
[143] (1992) LRC 623

vii) The Harmonisation of conflict principle

This means that where two constructions are possible and one is very restrictive of the guaranteed rights and the other permissive then the latter is to be preferred of the two. In Mtikila V AG of Tanzania,[144] the court was encountered with conflicting Constitutional provisions. The Tanzanian Constitution granted every citizen the right to participate in the government of the country and the right not to be compelled to belong to or subscribe to a particular political party. However, an amendment was passed which barred any citizen from running for any political office unless they were members of and sponsored by one of the recognized parties. In holding that these two provisions read together could not bar independent candidates from standing held that 'when a provision of the Constitution enacting a fundamental right appears to be in conflict with another provision of the Constitution…the principle of harmonization has to be called in aid. The principle holds that the entire Constitution has to be read as an integrated whole and no one provision destroying the other but each sustaining the other...if the balancing act should succeed, the court is enjoined to give effect to all the contending provisions. Otherwise the court is enjoined to incline to the realization of fundamental rights and may for that purpose disregard even the clear words of a provision if their application would result in gross injustice…These propositions rest above all on the realization that it is the fundamental rights which are fundamental and not the restrictions".

viii) Narrow construction to be preferred in case of derogation from a guaranteed right.

It is not in doubt that save for the rights mentioned in Article 44 which are stated to be non-derogable, the rest can be limited. But the power to do so is not at large and is not to be arbitrarily exercised by courts. Indeed, under Article 43, it is stated that in the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms prescribed in this Chapter, no person shall prejudice the fundamental or other human rights and freedoms of others or the public interest. Public interest is in turn stated not to permit among others any limitation of the enjoyment of those rights beyond what is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society or what is provided in this Constitution.

This ordinarily means that all that a victim of infringement has to do is to plead that his right has been violated unreasonably. Once he does this, then the burden shifts to the alleged infringer to prove that this was in the circumstances reasonable and justified. In Charles Onyango Obbo &

[144] Civil Case No.5 of 1993

Andrew Mwenda[145], the two petitioners who were journalists in the Monitor newspaper were charged on two counts of publication of false news contrary to section 50 of the Penal Code[146]. They had run a story which among other had the head line 'Kabila paid Uganda in Gold, says report'. The particulars of offence had quoted a paragraph of the story that "President Laurent Kabila of the newly named Democratic Republic of the Congo (formerly Zaire) has given a large consignment of gold to the Government of Uganda as payment for services rendered by the latter during the struggle against the former military dictator, the late Mobutu Sese Seko". The petitioners claimed that section 50 was inconsistent with Articles 29 (1) (a) and (b), 40 (2) and 43 (2) (c) of the Constitution.[147]

Justice Mulenga espoused the fact that the protection of guaranteed rights is the primary objective of the Constitution and the limitation of their enjoyment is an exception to their protection and is therefore a secondary objective. Although the Constitution provides for both, it is obvious that the primary objective must be dominant. It can be overridden only in the exceptional circumstances that give rise to that secondary objective. He stated on authority that the criteria to be satisfied includes;

a) the legislative objective which the limitation is designed to promote must be sufficiently important to warrant overriding a fundamental right
b) the measures designed to meet the objectives must be rationally connected to it and not arbitrary, unfair or based on irrational considerations.
c) The means used to impair the right or freedom must be no more than necessary to accomplish the objective.

He was satisfied that Section 50 of the Penal Code Act making publication of false news a criminal offence did not satisfy that test. In his view there were two interests to be balanced here. The first was the freedom and self fulfillment from the exercise of the freedom of expression or from receiving information and ideas from those who impart it. The second is that the country as a democratic society derives the benefit of promoting democratic governance. He added however that although no doubt there was a non-quantifiable benefit of protecting the public, the Section to pass the test must have achieved the purpose of protecting them against real or actual danger and not merely speculative or conjectural danger of alarm or disturbance of the peace. He concluded that the second benefit was so much outweighed that it could not in any sense justify over riding the first interest of access to information.

He in showing that Section 50 used a measure which was not proportional at all to its apparent

[145] Const. Appeal No.2 of 2002
[146] Cap 120
[147] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

objective, he noted that the section in fact prevented the publication of expressions likely to cause public fear, alarm or disturbance of peace even if it does not cause any such mischief. That accordingly, to criminalize the publication in this way was akin to killing a mosquito with a sledge hammer. He criticized an analogy that Berko JA had given in the court below that the essence of criminal law is that freedom of expression and speech should not be invoked to protect a person 'who falsely shouts fire, fire in a theatre and causing panic'. In his view, such a 'fire alarm' had to in fact cause panic and that panic had to prejudice the public interest. He also adverted to the fact that it would require with some sense of divine pre-science a person to measure what impact such a statement would have on the public. It was enough if it did not in fact cause any panic but was likely to cause it. This was an unacceptable provision. He also noted the unusual burden of proof of the section in that the prosecution did not have to prove guilty knowledge but instead to avoid liability one had to take provable measures to verify the accuracy of every statement, rumour or report before publishing it. He also considered the impossibility of calculating the public reaction that a certain publication will cause beforehand. He concluded that such a measure of restriction is not proportional to the mischief intended to be cured and could thus not be justifiable in a free and democratic society. He, as well as court held that Section 50 of the Penal Code Act was inconsistent with Article 29 (1) (a) and thus void. Court concluded that where a law places a limitation on a guaranteed right, it can only be valid if it passes the test laid down by Article 43

This limitation in Article 43 (2) (c)[148], cannot sustain the argument that what is acceptable and justifiable varies from society to society. Justice Mulenga in jettisoning this argument by the Attorney General in this case stated that clearly the Article presupposes the existence of universal democratic principles to which every society adheres. While there may be variations in application, the democratic values and principles remain the same. Legislation which seeks to limit rights in Uganda is not valid under the Constitution unless it is in accord with those universal principles.

ix) Where the rules of practice is rigidly applied will defeat the process of giving effect to guaranteed rights, they must be reasonably relaxed

This is perhaps best supported by Article 126 (2) (e)[149] which requires courts of law to dispense substantive justice without any undue regard to technicalities. Accordingly, it is the merits or substance of the petition and not the procedural technicalities that count.

Manyindo DCJ in Tinyefuza V Attorney General[150] stated that 'the case before us relates to the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual which are enshrined and protected by the Constitution. It would be highly improper to deny him a hearing on technical or procedural grounds. I would even go further and say that even where the respondent objects to the petition as in this case, the matter should proceed to trial on the merits unless it does not disclose a cause of action at all. This court should readily apply the provision of Article 126 (2) (e) of the Constitution in a case like this and administer substantive justice without undue regard to technicalities'.

[148] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[149] Ibid
[150] Const. Petition No.1 of 1997

It is surprising however that hardly a year after this very succinct statement of the law, the same court appeared to have abandoned this activism. In Rwanyarare & Anor. V AG[151] it said that, 'we do not see that Article 126 (2) (e) has done away with the requirement for litigants to comply with the Rules of procedure in litigations. The Article merely gives Constitutional force to the well known and long established principle at common law that rules of procedure act as hand maidens of justice'.

In M/s Kasirye, Byaruhanga & Company Advocates V Uganda Development Bank,[152] the Court of Appeal noted after reading Article 126 (2) (e) that 'we have underlined the words 'subject to the law'. This means that clause (2) is no licence for ignoring existing law…a litigant who relies on the provisions of Article 126 (2) must satisfy the court that in the circumstances of the particular case before the court it was not desirable to pay un due regard to a relevant technicality. Article 126 (2) (e)[153] is not a magic wand in the hands of defaulting litigants'.

Whereas the present interpretation of Article 126 (2) (e)[154] remains shrouded by uncertainty, it appears that courts of law do insist on meeting procedural requirements and require a party to plead the Article after proving that he has not omitted procedural requirements. However, realistically speaking, it certainly cannot be right, at least when fundamental human rights are in issue, that courts of law should consider their hands tied and refuse to hear the merits of a Constitutional petition merely because some procedural lapse exists even when they can clearly ascertain the merits of the dispute before them. This would be a very unfortunate trend by our courts yet it appears to be the favoured one.

x) International Human Rights Conventions and Treaties may be used interpretation.

This cannon was well summarized in Unity Dow V Attorney General,[155] wherein the court remarked that although it is common view that conventions do not confer rights on individuals

[151] Constitutional Petition No.11 of 1997
[152] Civil Appeal No.2 of 1997
[153] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[154] Ibid
[155] (1992) LRC 623

within the state until Parliament has legislated and incorporated them into local law, those conventions may be referred to as an aid to construction of the Constitution and that it would be wrong for the courts to interpret its legislation in a manner which conflicts with international obligations.

The rationale is that whether ratified or not, these conventions contain universally recognized human rights to which no civilized nation can derogate from. Even when they are yet to be ratified, it is the clear duty of court to speed up this process by using them in interpretation of the Constitution.

xi) The Sui Generis Rule

The word 'sui generis' means in a class of its own. The Constitution stands on a very different footing from other legislation even though in fact the principles which govern other legislation for the most part (but not always) also govern the interpretation of the Constitution. It is the only reason why all other laws are subjected to it and why they are declared null and void to the extent that they are inconsistent with it.

It is also the reason why the language used is much broader and encompassing than that used by all other statutes. It is intended to cover rights and freedoms for all people without discrimination and because it is made for present generations and those unborn.

B A S I C S T R U C T U R E D O C T R I N E

This was an Indian Supreme Court principle stating that the Constitution of every country or Jurisdiction has the special feature that cannot be amended by its Legislative body. This is hidden in the reasoning that amending such provision would result into change of the drastic pillars of the constitution making it an unrecognizable. This was first affirmed by Jurist from Germany known as prof Conrad Dietrich. In his view, he argues that amending such provision would result into rewriting of the constitution which mandate is not placed in the hands of legislature. His idea was later inhaled by the judges of India and it became part of their jurisprudence in the 1960's and the 1970's which has since influenced the development of constitutionalism and the rule of law in the various democratic jurisdictions across the world. India, it was natured in the landmark case of Kesavananda Bharati V state of Kerala[156] wherein court noted that though the amendment power of parliament is not an limited it does not include power abrogate or change the identity of the constitution. Courts emphasis was that the constitution has specific feature form the spirit of the constitution and their unnecessary amendment would render the constitution unrecognizable as it loses dignity from the masses due lack of such a structure in its spirit. Therefore, any amendment which purports to alter such features is void and ought not to take effect as it tantamount to rewriting the constitution which mandate the parliament does not hold.

[156] AIR 1973 SC. Also cited as (1973)4SCC 225

The decision in this case acted as a piece of spects to enlighten other judges in the land while addressing and determining any matter whose roots were fixed in the basic structure of the constitution. In Minerva Mills V Union of India[157] wherein Court observed that the basic foundation of every constitution in the democratic world is the dignity and the freedom of its citizens which is of supreme importance and cannot be destroyed by any legislation made by parliament. It therefore held that parliament has no power to repeal or abrogate or destroy the basic or essential features of a constitution. Because of its importance, its existence could not be suffocated in other jurisdictions but rather given life supporting machines to uphold the spirit if the Constitution which is the center for trust and belief in the supreme law. In South Africa, it was adopted in Executive council of West Cape Legislature v The president of the Republic of South Africa and others[158]wherein court explained the doctrine in the sense that "there are certain fundamental features of parliamentary democracy not spelt out in the constitution but which are inherent in its nature, design and purpose. There are certain features of the Constitutional order so fundamental that even if parliament followed the necessary amendment procedures it could not change them."

In their wisdom, the judges found it wise to uphold the basic structure of the constitution in order to retain its cognoscibility and respect from the masses. But it is worth noting that in all the cases stated above, courts are reluctant to specify the provisions that form the basic structure of the constitution. But important to note is that these provisions vary from country to country and on a case to case basis basing on the interests of the people in that jurisdiction not forgetting its history based on social, political and economic challenges in line with the natural objectives which one would refer to as the vision of the economy.

In Kenya its face was traced in Njoya v Attorney General and Others[159] wherein Court held that Parliament may amend as many provisions of the constitution as possible so long as the document retains the character as the existing constitution and the alteration of the Constitution does not substitute it thereof for another. In Bangladesh, in Answar Hussain Chowdhery v Bangladesh[160], it was said that call it as it may, basic structure or whatever, but that is the fabric of the constitution which cannot be dismantled by an authority created by the constitution its self.

[157] AIR 1980 SC 1789.
[158] CCT/95: [1995] 2ACC8; 1995(10) BCLR 12 89; 1995(4)SA 877.
[159] AHRLR 157

It's now no doubt that courts in the various jurisdictions do recognize and earn, reword respect to the basic features of the Constitution that form its fabric core centers for its strength in determining such a question, courts tend to draw attention to the preamble of the Constitution, National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy, the Bill of rights and the History of the Constitution.

In Uganda's Jurisprudence, the idea of the basic structure was much discussed in Male H.K Mabirizi and Others v Attorney General and Others[161]. Indeed, the basic structure does find its roots in the 1995 Constitution. The principal character of this Constitution which constitutes its fundamental pillars includes such principles as the sovereignty of the people, democratic governance, the constitution as the supreme legal instrument, a unitary state and the judiciary, Bill of rights ensuring respect for and observation of the fundamental rights and judicial independence. All these are upheld by the various constitutional provisions which I shall deal with later[162].

According to Remy Kasule these include sovereignty of the people, supremacy of Constitution, defence of the Constitution, non-derogation of certain rights, democratic principles especially right to vote, abolition of the one party state and independence of the judiciary while Justice Elizabeth Musoke JCC limited herself to only sovereignty of the people and the non derogable rights in the Bill of rights.

In his dissenting judgment, Kenneth Kakuru's view was broad which to him encompasses sovereignty of the people, supremacy of the Constitution, political order through a durable and popular Constitution and political stability based on the principle unity, peace, democracy, freedom, social justice and public participation. In his wisdom, he saw it necessary to add the rule of law, observation of human rights, regular free and fair elections, separation of powers accountability of government to the people, non derogable rights, the idea that land belongs to the people and cannot be taken away from them by government without appropriate compensation, the idea that the state holds natural resources in trust for the people, the duty of citizens to defend the constitution and abolition of the one party state.

It's worth noting that the Constitution permits its amendment and it's so loud on this matter as it underlines the various ways for its amendment under Chapter eighteen. Article 259(1)[163]is to the effect that "subject to the provisions of this constitution, Parliament may amend by way of addition, variation or repeal any provision of this Constitution in accordance with the procedure laid down in this chapter." The amendment of the constitution can only be done through an Act of parliament.

[161] Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No 2 of 2018
[162] DCJ OwinyDollo in MALE mabirizi and Others v Attorney General Constitutional Petition No49 of 2017
[163]Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

This is critical point of consideration to the effect that the constitution cannot be amended without an Act of Parliament.

The 1995 Constitution therefore allows amendment of various provisions by parliament. These provisions are in three segments. The first segment or category is one that requires a referendum and these are provided for under Article 260.[164] The other contains provisions whose amendment requires approval of District councils and the support of two thirds of all members of Parliament at the second and third readings. The said Articles include Article 5(2), 152,176(1), Article 178, 189 and 197.[165] The last category of provisions is one that requires amendment by Parliament direct so long as it constitutes of at least two thirds of members of Parliament on the second and third readings. For these provisions, there is no need for a referendum or approvals by the District councils for these provisions are directly amended by Parliament.

The provisions in the first category have been noted to form he basic structure of the Constitution which means that they cannot be amended by the normal Constitutional process. Particularity, for this discussion, this paper shall focus on the provisions that can be amended by compliance to Article 260 since they form the basic structure of the constitution The Article provides that; the Bill for an Act of Parliament seeking to amend any of the provisions specified in Clause 2 of the Article shall not be taken as passed unless;

(a) It is supported at the second and the third readings in Parliament by not less than two thirds of all members of Parliament and
(b) It has been referred to a decision of the people and approved by them in a referendum.

These provisions are provided for under Article 260(2)[166] of the constitution and they include Article 1 which concerns the sovereignty of the people, Article 2 which is on the supremacy of the Constitution, Article 44[167] which concerns non derogable rights, Article 69 which is on prohibition of one party state, Article 74 and 75 which concern prohibition of one party state and right to choose a political system, Article 79(2)[168] which is on power of Parliament to delegate its law making powers, Article 105(1) which is on the tenure of office of the president, Article 128(1) which is on the independence of the judiciary and lastly is chapter sixteen.

As already noted, there amendment requires a referendum that is the support of the people and the support of two thirds majority votes of members of parliament. Going by the decision in the British Caribean Bank v The Attorney of Belize[169]such provisions form the fundamental principles of

[164] Ibid
[165] Ibid
[166] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[167] Ibid
[168] Ibid
[169] Claim No 597 of 2011

the Constitution and have been preserved for all times to come and that they cannot be amended out of the existence. Article 102(b), the cause of the historical event of 2017, does not form part of these provisions neither doesn't form part of the provisions under Article 261[170] or the second category. This means this Article could be amended by the normal Constitutional amendment process. Justice Stella Amoko remarks that this provision did not necessitate the requirement of the referendum meaning that Parliament need not to comply with Article 260.

IMPORTANCE OF THE BASIC STRUCTURE DOCTRINE

The basic structure doctrine has become a more significance way beyond the view and expectation of its proponents. The idea that though parliament has wide powers to amend the constitution, its powers are unlimited and does not extend to the power to tamper or do away with clauses which are basic to the structure of the constitution has now become of more importance as a safeguard against the actions and interventions of a party that may be controlling majority in Parliament abusing its majority position to eradicate, erode and diminish the structure of the Constitution by doing away with vital provisions. This may be due to their view that such provisions are becoming a wall against their retention of power or performing their desires by introducing provisions that benefit their desires of entrenching in powers for long.

Though many of the Constitutions prescribe expressly provisions for their amendment by describing an elaborate procedure, many of these provisions are not enough to afford it protection. This can occur where the governing party or group of people or ruling party has majority of members of parliament which circumstance they can rely on to pass any amendment which circumstance they can rely on to pass any amendment. Therefore, in such a situation, the express provisions of the Constitution shall be insufficient to afford the Constitution protection. Sikiri, CJ in Kesavananda Bharat v State of Kerala[171]explained the importance of the doctrine in guarding against the abuse of parliamentary majorities and warned about the likely consequences of such. He observed that;

"A political party with two thirds majority in parliament for a few years could so amend the constitution as to debar any other party from functioning, establish totalitarianism, enslave the people and after having effected these purposes make the Constitution un amendable or extremely rigid. This means that it would no doubt invite extra constitutional revolution."

Therefore, since that can be anticipated by the majority of the constitutional framers and the people, the need to protect the Constitution has driven the judiciary to apply the basic structure to protect and preserve the Constitution. In view, the basic structure is the only shield the people have through the judiciary to protect the spirit of the Constitution where it faces graduated stabbing by the majority members of the ruling party. Therefore, in circumstances where the separation of power doctrine has been violated where by the executive holds a root in the judiciary then the desires of the people to protect such entrenched provisions shall not succeed which may render the supreme law weak by losing its spirit.

[170] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[171] AIR 1973 SC

Having considered that, it's the basis of the reasoning why the five justices of the Constitution court and the seven supreme Court were unanimously in deciding that Article 102(b)[172] of the Constitution is not part of the basic structure of the Constitution. In their finding, those that form the basic structure are those that are entrenched which were categorized and placed under the umbrella of Article 260.[173]

It's on this point that I shall now deal with the limitations of the basic structure doctrine as a mechanism for clear understanding of the doctrine.

ENTREACHMENT PROVISIONS AND CONSTITUTIONALITY

An entrenched clause or entrenchment clause of a basic law or constitution is a provision that makes certain amendments either more difficult or impossible to pass, making such amendments invalid. Overriding an entrenched clause may require a supermajority, a referendum, or the consent of the minority party. The term eternity clause is used in a similar manner in the constitutions of Brazil, the Czech Republic, Germany, Greece, India, Iran, Italy, Morocco, Norway, and Turkey, but specifically applies to an entrenched clause that can never be overridden. The Constitution of Colombia contains similar provisions aimed at making it difficult, but not impossible, to change their basic structure.

Once adopted, a properly drafted entrenchment clause makes some portion of a basic law or constitution irrevocable except through the assertion of the right of revolution. Any amendment to a basic law or constitution that would not satisfy the prerequisites enshrined in a valid entrenched clause would lead to so-called "unconstitutional constitutional law"—that is, an amendment to constitutional law text that appears constitutional by its form, albeit unconstitutional due to the procedure used to enact it or due to the content of its provisions.

Entrenched clauses are, in some cases, justified as protecting the rights of a minority from the dangers of majoritarianism. In other cases, the objective may be to prevent amendments to the basic law or constitution that would pervert the fundamental principles it enshrines. However, entrenched clauses are often challenged by their opponents as being undemocratic.

[172] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[173] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

Over the years, the would have been entrenched provisions of the Constitution have been portrayed not to be. The government has occasionally amended the vital provisions of the constitution.

In 2005, Uganda's parliament overwhelmingly backed the removal of presidential term limits. This is a measure which critics said was designed to install President Yoweri Museveni for life. This move by the legislative arm of government sent chills in the authenticity and pride of the Constitution.

Interestingly, an overwhelming number of the legislators gave the move the bill a green light. A total of 232 MPs voted in favour of the motion, 50 against and one abstained. This was during the time when the parliament speaker was Edward Ssekandi. He would lead the parliament for the next five years and later become the vice president for the next ten years.

This amendment has been acknowledged as a regret by high dignitaries in the incumbent government. Chief Justice Alfonse Owiny-Dollo is recorded[174] to have intimated that;

"I don't think this thing of age limit was a big issue; but what I wept for this country was for the removal of the presidential term limits. That is where we lost it. The mistake we made in the Constituent Assembly was not to entrench, not to make it difficult for anyone to amend the provisions of the term limits… That one, I take responsibility and anybody else who was in the Constituent Assembly; that we should have secured, entrenched that provision so that if you want to amend that particular Article, you would go back to the people. We failed the people of Uganda as a consequence,"

Such an admission from a person so powerful in the government goes to show that the Constitution no longer holds the dream and is just a book where we can freely cross and rewrite our own dreams.

It is also recorded that in 2003, after a meeting at National Leadership Institute-Kyankwanzi, his ruling party initiated the process to amend the Constitution to remove the two presidential term limits. Each MP was paid Shs 5m 'facilitation' to consult the electorate about the amendments, without which President Museveni would not have been eligible to stand again in 2006.

At the time, some senior NRM members and Cabinet ministers opposed the move to remove presidential term limit clauses from the Constitution. Many of them were subsequently sacked from Cabinet. The Constitution was finally amended and the term limits removed in 2005.[175]

Again, in 2017, there was yet another shock wave regarding the removal of the age limit in the Constitution; another vital provision. Article 102(b), which provided for the age limit, was removed from the Constitution in December 2017 after a controversial process that saw the police break up rallies of MPs opposed to the idea and MPs in favour given 'facilitation' to consult their constituencies.[176]

[174]Daily Monitor, 14th October, 2020. I regret removal of term limits for president – Chief Justice, [online] available at; https://www.monitor.co.ug/uganda/news/national/i-regret-removal-of-term-limits-for-president-chief-justice-2480632 (accessed on 1st July, 2021)

[175] Ibid

Results of an opinion poll released by Research World International (RWI) yesterday show that nearly seven out of 10 Ugandans did not support the removal from the Constitution of the 75-year age limit for presidential candidates.

The army invaded Parliament and got involved in a confrontation with dissenting MPs who were trying to filibuster the debate on the removal of the provision, leaving two of them requiring treatment abroad.

The process was challenged in the Constitutional Court through separate petitions by a group of MPs, the Uganda Law Society and an individual, Mr. Male Mabirizi, which petitions were consolidated during the hearing.

The Constitutional Court maintained the amendment by a majority decision of 4-1, and the Supreme Court, on appeal, also maintained it, albeit with a much closer majority decision of 4-3.

The courts ruled that consultation of voters was sufficient, even when some voters attacked pro-age limit MPs or forced others to flee from chaotic meetings. Afterwards, many of the pro-age limit lawmakers sought special protection from the State, claiming their lives were in danger. President Museveni proposed a lead car with army snipers, but the arrangement was shelved over costs and logistical overheads.

Before the 'age limit', as it came to be known, was removed from the Constitution, a poll commissioned by civil society organisations by Citizens Coalition on Electoral Democracy (CEEDU) and Uganda Governance Monitoring Platform (UGMP) showed that 85 per cent of Ugandans opposed the move.

The study titled; "Citizens' Perceptions on the Proposed Amendment of Article 102(b) of the Constitution", sampled 50,429 citizens in 80 constituencies across the country. It covered 22,926 females and 27,503 male respondents.

In the new poll for which interviews, RWI says, were done between April 12 and April 25, over a year after Parliament voted to remove the age limit by 317 voting in favour and 97 against, 65 per cent of the respondents said they did not agree with the decision.

Twenty-eight per cent said it was a good decision. Four per cent said they did not know whether it was a good or bad decision, while three per cent said they had no comment on the issue.

To generate these responses, the following question was put to the respondents: "Some people think that presidential age limit was important and, therefore, removing it was bad, while other people supported the idea of removing the presidential age limit so that anybody can contest as much as he wishes. What are your views?"

[176]Daily Monitor, 6th May 2019, Voters fault MPs on age limit removal, [online] available at; https://www.monitor.co.ug/uganda/news/national/voters-fault-mps-on-age-limit-removal-1824194 (accessed on 1st July 2021)

The question was put to all 2,042 respondents who participated in the poll who, according to RWI researchers, were selected scientifically from across the country, taking into account demographic proportions according to age and region provided by official statistics.

Despite the disagreement by the majority of the citizens, the constitution was again tampered with and made to allow for a possibility of life presidency. This therefore begs the question; does the Constitution really still hold the dream? Or can we say that the country now no longer has the dream.

The story usually told to validate these atrocities is the liberation story of 1986. The incumbent president reckons that the country was in turmoil, 30 years after independence and his aim was to clear the air for a fresh Uganda. Today, for most people who were born after 1986, this story holds no relevance, given the current situation of things. If history was really that tainted with impunity as they put it, then the actions today would all be geared to ensure it never occurs again.

C O N V E N T I O N S

In Liversidge V Anderson,[177] the main issue was imprisonment without trial of the appellant Mr. Liversidge on orders of the Home Secretary empowered by Regulations under the Defence Act when he had reasonable ground of believing that he had a hostile origin. Liversidge challenged the order on grounds that the Home Secretary failed to give him the reasons for detention and that a minimum of such reasons would have been given to him under the law. The majority of court held that under those regulations it was only necessary for the Home Secretary to have reasons for detention but the Home Secretary was under no obligation to give those reasons to the appellant. Rather it was up to parliament to require the minister to explain these reasons if they wished in accordance with the convention of ministerial responsibility which convention stipulated that ministers of cabinet can be compelled by parliament to give reasons for any conduct carried out in execution of their ministerial duties.

C L A S S I F I C A T I O N O F C O N V E N T I O N S

These are of 4 broad categories of conventions.

1. Conventions related to the executive
2. Conventions governing the cabinet

[177] (1942) AC 246

3. Legislative or parliamentary conventions
4. Conventions governing Judiciary.

The majority of these conventions come from British constitutional law and many of them have been incorporated into the written Constitutional provisions which countries like Uganda have.

Examples of conventions:

1. Executive/Royal Prerogative

a) The first is that the Head of state should normally act on the advice of his or her ministers. This is the case where we have there is a honary head of state.

b) The second convention which applies in a multi-party system of government states that the Head of state should invite the leader of the party that enjoys majority support to form the government unless there are serious objections or reasons to such party taking the leadership of government.

c) The Head of state should always by convention give his or her assent to bills presented to him or her by parliament or legislature[178]

2. Conventions governing cabinet/system of ministerial responsibility.

a) The cabinet must be unanimous in the advice given to the state. Once cabinet has made a decision then every individual member of cabinet must abide by that decision in advising the president and the public. Furthermore, when in parliament, the cabinet must provide a united front even if an individual minister disagrees with the cabinet; he must take the common stand. Where he is unable to agree with the position taken, then he or she should resign. Individual members of Cabinet should therefore not disagree publicly in society. This is under the principle of collective responsibility.

b) The government especially in a multiparty system, must enjoy the support of the majority in the legislature or commons. If there is a vote of no confidence in the leader of the majority party or if the party by defections or by other means loses its majority in the House, then the government must be dissolved and a fresh general election be called in order to either renew the mandate or for the opposition to take over government.

c) Cabinet ministers must accept responsibility for the authorized conduct of officials in their ministry so if a minister delegates a person to do certain duties then the minister is responsible for his defaults and must account and protect their conduct. If there is a serious misconduct, the minister or officials responsible should resign.

[178] Article 91, Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

3. Conventions of Parliament/Legislative

a) The first and most fundamental convention is that of parliamentary immunity which says that the member of the legislature shall not be subject to civil or criminal processes for any utterances or statements made in the exercise of their functions as members of government. That immunity covers members of parliament so long as what they are saying or doing is covered by the rules of parliament.

b) Elected members in the House take precedence over nominees or ex-officio members of government. These are non-elected members and must succumb to the will of the elected members.

c) The 3rd convention that applies in multi-party system is that members of the opposition and minor parties must be given opportunity to be heard and that the Speaker of the House must be neutral as to the functioning of the House and he has the duty to give equal opportunity to members of the opposition to present their views.

d) Ordinary members of parliamentary or back benchers must have access to the front bench in the sense of being allowed to question ministers about various issues and the ministers must be able to satisfactorily answer the questions of the MPs.

4. Judicial Conventions

a) Proceedings that are ongoing should not be the subject of public debate in parliament or elsewhere as they may violate the principle of sub judice which is to the effect that a matter still in Court should not be subjected to public debate or discussion as this would damage or distort judicial proceedings.

b) Professional conduct of a Judge should not be criticized in parliament except on a substantive motion of impeachment i.e. for removal of a Judge.

CONSTITUTIONALISM

DEFINING CONSTITUTIONALISM

Constitutionalism is a compound of ideas, attitudes and patterns of behavior elaborating the principle that the authority of government derives from and is limited by a body of fundamental law. Constitutionalism is the idea that government can and should be legally limited in its powers and that its authority legitimacy depends on its observing these limitations. It recognizes the need for government with powers but at the same time insists that limitation be placed on those powers.

Ancient Greece with its scholars such as Aristotle and Plato gave us the idea of modern state and government. It is a descriptive of a complicated concept, deeply embedded in historical experience, which subject the officials who exercise governmental powers to the limitations of higher law. The basic elements of constitutionalism are;

- Rule of law
- Judicial independence
- Human rights
- Separation of power
- Checks and balance
- Popular sovereignty
- Civilian control of military
- Responsible and accountable government

ORIGINS OF CONSTITUTIONALISM

THE MAGNA CARTA (1215)

Magna Carta, or "Great Charter," signed by the King of England in 1215, was a turning point in constitutionalism.[179] The Magna Carta, or "Great Charter," was arguably the most significant early influence on the extensive historical process that led to the rule of constitutional law today in the English-speaking world.

In 1215, after King John of England violated a number of ancient laws and customs by which England had been governed, his subjects forced him to sign the Magna Carta, which enumerates what later came to be thought of as human rights. Among them was:

- the right of the church to be free from governmental interference,
- the rights of all free citizens to own and inherit property and
- to be protected from excessive taxes.
- It established the right of widows who owned property to choose not to remarry, and

[179] Refer to Appendix C, The Magna Carta

- established principles of due process and equality before the law.
- It also contained provisions forbidding bribery and official misconduct.

Widely viewed as one of the most important legal documents in the development of modern democracy, the Magna Carta was a crucial turning point in the struggle to establish freedom.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND DEVELOPMENT IN AFRICA

In Africa, the main struggle since independence has been a struggle to create culture of Constitutionalism but there have been problems which mainly include:

a) Ethnicity (tribalism) i.e. politically favouring certain tribes.
b) Militarism i.e. the use of military force to resolve political disputes and conflicts.
c) Dictatorship evolving gradually into a personality cult and individualizing political power.
d) Political and legal illiteracy.
e) Customs or traditions.
f) Non-Separation of powers
g) Political intimidation
h) Human Rights violation.

CONSTITUTIONALISM FROM THE BIRTH OF UGANDA TO INDEPENDENCE.

Uganda before the coming of colonialists, had three indigenous political systems. the Hima caste system, Bunyoro royal clan system and the Buganda kingship system, however in 1894 the British succeeded in establishing a protectorate situated in Buganda. Constitutionalism in colonialism is about constituting rules, and thereby constituting its self the constitution to make a judgement. The judgement is about what to select in constituting rules. What rules to make, what rules to inherit, co-opt, what to colonize and what to leave out. It's about what rules to make secondary, derivative [180]. Hence colonial constitutionalism took its root with the enactment of the 1900 Buganda agreement. It was with the strike of pen that the masters chose what rules to impose, which areas to colonize, what to make secondary or primary. The constitutional structure of Uganda was drawn with the signing of 1900 Buganda Agreement. It established the commissioner as the head and overall leader on behalf of his majesty, gave Kabaka subordinate powers over his subjects and defined political presentation in the structure of government.

[180]Apter, David E. (3rd April 2013). the political kingdom in Uganda: a study on bureaucratic nationalism. Routledge, p.403.

THE 1902 ORDER IN COUNCIL.

The 1902 Order in Council was a very recognized and proved an important landmark in that the Order in Council was passed as an ordinance where new provisions in the administration of Uganda as an attribute aiding for the enactment of laws and regulations for the better administration of justice, equity good concise and morals thus the good governance.

However, dreaming back to our minds to its start, the 1902 order in council rule was the fundamental law of the protectorate which aimed in the exercising of power granted by her majesty's government provisions under the foreign jurisdiction act of 1890 that's to legislate in regards to foreign territories. The 1902 order in council was subjected to several matters of constitutional significance ranging from both provincial and administrative divisions, also including structures of government and thus the administration of justice and the magnificence of laws thus to statures of natural law, equity and morality.

The 1902 order in council also helped where it defined the province and administrative divisions of the protectorate under Article 1[181] thus the central divisions which constituted of districts including Elgon, Karamoja, Busoga, Bukedi and Labwor. The Rudolf province consisting of the districts of Torkwed, Turkana, and Dabusa. Then also districts of Bunyoro, Toro and Ankole and the islands appertaining there to Article 3 of Buganda government.

The Order in Council also defined the protectorate of Uganda and enumerated its administrative decisions and empowered the King of the United Kingdom, acting through the secretary of state, to declare from time to time, if he so desired that any areas under his protectorate may form part of his protectorate and conversely that parts of the protectorate cease to be so. In the same aspect, the commissioner was vested with powers of the government of Uganda and for the purpose he was to have the official seal by which his acts could be authentic. He was also vested with power of prerogative of mercy which he exercised in the name of the king with the approval of secretary of state.

Following the formation of the 1902 Order in Council, it was aimed to empower the commissioner in the making of laws as pertained under Articles 8-10.[182] In 1902, this function was placed under the legislative council and it's worth noting that by the virtue of 1902 order in council where the commissioner was able to make peace through laws, good governance[183] within the protectorate that was between 1902 and 1920, office of the commissioner was provided under Article 4 and 5[184] who was the overall controller and administrator of the protectorate who was the Chief Representor

[181] 1902 Order in Council.
[182] 1902 Order in Council.
[183] Article 12 of the order in council.
[184] Ibid.

of the High Majesty's in England and was assisted on the same duties by the Deputy Commissioner and other officers.

The order in council also aided and established a unified system of exercise of judicial power comprising of justice courts. In particular, full rights in civil and criminal jurisdiction were all invented in the high court concerning all persons and matters in. This was provided for under Article 15 Clause 1.[185] The Court was referred to as His Majesty's High Court of Uganda.

However, it's worth noting that the 1902 order in council centered a receptionist clause that under the powers of Article 15[186] (clause 2) and the receptionist clause defined law to be applied in the protectorate and in particular in the judicial determination of disputes and matters by courts of law. It's to the effect that the applicable law was to include in law, doctrine of equity and statutes of general application of force. This reception of statutes of general application was legislation in force in as august 1902 and this paved way for laws including the Evidence act[187], Sale of Goods Act, and the Penal Code Act[188] came to be the embedded laws.

Not forgetting the fact that the 1902 orders in council also contained the matter of the repugnance clause and this was articulated under Article 20 and this particularly dealt with the application of native laws and customs in any customs in any dispute arising or involving between natives and this was provided for as long as the issue was not repugnant to the rules of natural justice, equity and morality. In reference to Article 20, this elaborate more on cases of both civil and criminal matters to which natives were parties and aided that every court shall.

1. Be guided by native laws as long as the laws were applicable and not repugnant to factors of justice, good morals and equity.
2. However, court of justice in respect to disputes between natives were required to decide such disputes according to substantial justice without undue regard to matters of technicalities of procedure and without undue delay and explaining case is R v Yowasi K Paulo[189]

However, the repugnancy clause was introduced by section 20[190] which intended to remove those customs and laws that were considered being negative and repugnant thus lived inconsistent with the rules of natural justice, equity and morality and the major problem with the clause was that the negative and repugnant aspect of a custom were perceived in the eyes of the colonial judge in other words, it was a subjective test thus applied according to the moral standards of an English person.

[185] Ibid.
[186] Ibid.
[187] Cap 6
[188] Cap 120
[189] (1922) U.L.R 987
[190] 1902 order in council.

In reference to the case of R v Amkeyo[191]where the issue in point was whether the eventual relationship which existed between the accused and the woman with whom proved to have married basing on customary principles was in position to testify against the accused. In this case Amkeyo had been charged and convicted of possession of stolen property and the main witness in point was the wife with whom he claimed to have married under native customs. However, basing on the note to protect the marital confidence her evidence could not be admissible, but basing on the attributes of the case chief justice Hamilton rejected the notion and held that the relationship between the two in question could not fit the ideal of marriage as understood among civilized people and that the native custom was repugnant to good concise, equity and morality and thus that here the woman was being referred to as a mere chattel and thus the relationship was potentially polygamous.

Explaining case of Mwenge v Migade[192] where the question related to the existence and continuation of customary tenure (Butaka) in Buganda, and the inalienability of such Butaka in ancient customs of Buganda and in this aspect court considering the provisions of the 1900 Buganda agreement and the land registrations passed by the Buganda government in 1908, and not to held that the practice in Buganda showed that the Butaka tenure no longer existed and therefore by the provisions of the land law thus court declaring the existence of the Butaka repugnant to the customs and hence needed be repealed. And other explaining cases include the case of Gwao Bin Kilimo v Kisunda Bin Ifuti[193], and then case of Mukwaba and other v Mukubira and others[194].

THE LANCASTER MARLBOROUGH CONFERENCE (1961)

The Lancaster Marlborough Conference is believed with notice that it's the first Uganda Constitutional Conference on the constitution of an independent Uganda and it was scheduled on 9th October 1961 and it was opened on 18 September 1961 at the Lancaster House in London.

In respect to the outcomes of the Lancaster Marlborough conference was that parties to the negotiations came to agree that Uganda would attain its long awaited and full independence and that's on 9th October 1962. It is worth noting that the conference involved a number of delegations that aimed to represent the United Kingdom, the party also involving the Uganda People's Congress and the Buganda kingdom and also included the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Right Honorable Ian MacLeod, MP, the minister of State for Colonies, the right honorable the Earl of Perth, and the colonies, and the parliamentary undersecretary of state for the colonies, the Honorable Huge Freser, MBD, MP.

[191] (1917) 7 EARL 14.
[192] (1933) ULR 97.
[193] 1938 1 TLR 403.
[194] Civil case no. 50 of 1954.

However, in the meeting sir Hilton Poynton, KCMG, was the named leader of the United States delegates and they included the following Sir John Martin KCMG, CB, CVO, Mr. WBL Manson, CGM and Mr. F D. Webber, CGM. Messers J.M, De Winton, CBE, MC, saved as advisers to the delegates.

Within the conference, Uganda also attained some representatives and these were named the Uganda government delegates and they were under the leadership of Sir Fredrick Crawford, GCMG, OBE (Governor) and with whom he worked with other personalities these included sir Walter Courts, CMG, MBE (Governor designate), the Honorable BKM, Kiwanuka (chief minister), Honorable R.I.K Dresfield, CMG, QC (attorney general), the Honorable CGFF. Mellmoth (minister of finance), the Honorable B.K Bataringaya (minister of local government) and the Honorable C.K Patel, CBE, QC (minister of commerce and industry) and lastly Messers CPS Allen ABD, AC Badenoch served as advisors to the attributed delegates.

In aiming articulate different aspects of parties, Hon.R. A Mbonye Byombi led the democratic party delegates an MP for Bufumbira county and these included as herein after, Honorable members of parliament; HA Vuciri, J.H Obonyo, P.A.U.K, A. Oriekot, N. K Rugyemwa, A. Akaduyu, R.B Bwambale, P.J Wilkinson, QC, M.K Patel and M.M Ngobi and to the party honorable I.D Hunter and the G.B.K Magezi serving as advisor to the delegates.

It's worth noting that Mr. M Kintu led the delegates of Buganda kingdom and the then Katikiro and also had other members who were working as delegates besides him these including Mr.A. K Sempa, Mr.L. N Basudde, Mr. A.D Lubowa, Dr. K Muwezi and Dr. E.B.S Lumu, Messers E.W Kiggundu, A.F Mpagi, E.F.N Gratiaen, C.M. G, G C, IGM Flegg. Dingle Foot, Q.C, MP and then their adviser was DS downs.

However following the great membership representation in the Lancaster Conference, the attributes of the 13 District councils were represented too at the conference and the District Council Delegates included the following as herein after, N.Androvile (West Nile), E.Athiyo (Karamoja), D.K Baguma (Toro), J.W.R Kazoora (Ankole), Y.K Mulondo (Busoga), Honorable C.J Obwagor (Teso), E. Kasoma (Toro), Y.H Wacha Olwol (Lango) and these delegates duties were advised by Messers R Imalingat (Teso), E.Kasoma (Toro), D.K Luboga (Busoga), K.M.S Kikira (Kigezi), and Honorable S. Mbabi Katana (Bunyoro), T.K Mudanye, M.B.E (Bukedi) And then S.K Mutenyo ..(Bugisu).

In respect to the representations of the urban centers thus Kampala and Jinja they were equally represented by a number of personalities these including Messers C. Lewis, C.B. E, and the one K. Evans, Mr.G. F Brooks who also served as the supervisor of the two and in respect to attributes of secretariat of the conference was under the leadership of the one Mr. A Leavett as Secretary-General together with Mr. J. W Staopoole as the Deputy Secretary-General and Messers K.A.F Woolverton, I.N Jenkins, E.G Lomax.T.M Jenkins, K.D Law and D.H doble as the secretaries.

The first constitution of Uganda was the product of the Uganda constitution conference held at the Lancaster house in 1961. it was held to discuss the report of the Uganda relationships commission which had been tasked in projection of the future form of government for Uganda best for Uganda, the relationship between the central government, Buganda and other kingdoms, plus other authorities in the country.[195]

The main Issue of the conference was the status afforded to the different kingdoms especially in recognizing the existence of a new state of Uganda. The issue of the "lost counties" also resurfaced however postponed due to lack of Buganda's support. It therefore provided for the complex system of devolution of power within Uganda.

The kingdom of Buganda particularly gained strong powers of self-governance[196] . the kingdoms of Bunyoro, Acholi, Toro and Ankore and the territory of Busoga also gained the status of "federal states", and were permitted to retain their legislatures. The remaining districts and the territory of Mbale were controlled directly by the central government.

It provided for the direct election of most members of parliament. However, the exception was that Buganda MP's were to be selected by an electoral college made up of members of the Lukiiko. The 1962 constitution was amended 3 times, most importantly to begin with, it was amended to replace queen Elizabeth II represented by governor-general of Uganda Sir Walter Coutts as the head of state with a ceremonial position of president. In 1964 was amended to include the date when the Toro legislative Assembly stand dissolved, and in 1965 it was amended the final time to give effect to the outcome of the lost county's referendum.

On the lost counties issue, violence in Buganda was tied to the considerations of constitutionality, the constitutional provision on the referendum was to the effect that it should be held two years after independence. However, Obote went on to hold the referendum at the earliest opportunity. Constitutional complications were compounded by the fact that Muteesa was Kabaka and at the same time president of Uganda, when then Obote decided that the central government was to take over the issue of the lost counties, Muteesa refused to sign the required documents. To win the referendum however Buganda arranged forex-servicemen to settle in the contested counties to swell the number of votes for Buganda to which later, it was decided that the ex-servicemen were not allowed to vote since they were not part of the 1962 voters registrar of the areas concerned.

The 1962 constitution saw growing contentions as in any way the Kabaka had to protect the interests of Buganda as well as Uganda which was a heavy task given the political climate then. This even resulted in the unintended resignation of Michael Kintu the Katikiro then for failing to protect 'Buganda's sovereignty'.

[195]Mukholi, David (1995). a complete guide to uganda's fourth constitution: politics and the law.
[196]Uzoigwe, G.N. (1983) Uganda and [parliamentary government. The journal of modern African studies. 253-271

The concept of constitutionalism cannot be ignored because at this stage Uganda's politics was played in a setting where each side's apparent need was look for legal loopholes to turn it to its own advantage.[197] The Ugandan state was officially named the sovereign state of Uganda and the concept of multipartyism took its first constitutional chance to contribute to constitutionalism in Uganda. Each party functionary represented a local constituency and most of the constituencies were ethnically leaned and distinct. The organization of the UPC- KY coalition rule 1962-1964 with which the obstacles of UPC in forming a government were about to melt.

STRUCTURES AND ARRANGEMENTS UNDER THE 1962 CONSTITUTION

Promulgation of the 1962 independence constitution was a landmark in Uganda's constitutional history. For the first time, the framework of government was designed to be conducted within specific rules that sought to observe the broad principle of constitutionalism including separation of powers, supremacy of the constitution, independence of the judiciary, human rights etc. Nevertheless, the constitutional framework coupled with the political situation that prevailed in Uganda at the onset of independence meant that a number of problems remained.

There were crucial factors in the constitutional framework that resulted in the period of 1962-1966 being regarded as the stagnant years. And these included;

1. The question of the head of state which was not addressed by the independence constitution.
2. The question of the federal relations in particular between Buganda as a federal entity and Uganda as a unitary state.
3. The question of the relation between Buganda and Bunyoro over the lost counties.
4. Overall problems of governance particularly in the relations between the executive and the other organs of government.

Invariably there were other problems including the opportunistic tendencies on the part of personalities in whom government and political authority was vested.

1. The Question of the Head of state

The independence constitution had maintained Her Majesty the Queen of England as the head of state and so necessitated the determination of a proper head of state for an independent Uganda. There were different opinions particularly between the parties and the kingdoms as to the criteria as to who should be head of state. The broad membership of UPC floated the idea that the party should provide the head of state. Meanwhile KY and Kingdom of Buganda questioned the propriety of a commoner ruling over royalty.

[197] Violent constitutionalism in Uganda. G.F. Engholm and Ali. A. Mazrui. Jstor. org

After several discussions, it was resolved to give the officer of the head of state to one of the traditional rulers. When the debate was later conducted in the National Assembly the majority vote was in favour of a traditional ruler being the only person eligible to be a constitutional head of state. Thus by the Constitution of Uganda (1st Amendment) act No. 16 of 1963, it was stipulated that the president and V.P of Uganda would be elected for a period of 5 years by the National Assembly and further that only traditional rulers would be eligible for election to these offices. On 4th October, 1963, Sir Fredrick Mutesa II, the Kabaka of Buganda, and Sir William Nadiope of the Kyabazinga of Busoga became the president and Vice President of Uganda respectively.

Rather than resolve the lacuna in a constitutional framework, the question of the head of state only took the new dimensions and bread new problems. Although the office of the head of state was largely formal and non-executive (in the sense of constitutional monarchy in a west minister type/style of government), tensions would begin to surface in the relations between the figurehead – head of state and the P.M. The issues would arise as to what the formality of the office of the head of state meant. Most significantly controversy arose as to who had precedence as between the head of state and the P.M, as to who was to represent Uganda at international conferences, as to whether Mutesa II should be allowed the police band at his birth day party etc.

But perhaps most significant as opposed to these rather petty issues was the question of the allegiance of Mutesa II to both offices of head of state and Kabaka of Buganda. The test would eventually come during the referendum on the lost counties when Mutesa II refused to sign the memorandum of transfer the counties to Bunyoro. The situation was made worse because the relations between the two personalities Mutesa and Obote gradually turned out into hatred for each other.

Invaluably the tension between the two personalities was nonetheless underlined by the broader question of Buganda's status in relation to the rest of Uganda. The Kabaka's federalism was seen to be at loggerheads with Obote's perceived unitarism.

2. The question of Buganda's position in relation to Uganda

This question is one that was traceable to the period in the run up to independence particularly the Munster report of 1961 and the constitutional conferences. The federal status of Buganda was as a major feature of the 1962 constitution created a situation in question the demarcations of authority and jurisdiction became all too confused. The potential for tensions to flare up was always manifest in particular as regards matters of jurisdiction by the legislative bodies and courts as well as on matters of finances and revenues. Coming up in 1965 in the wake of the lost counties referendum a year early in 1964, question had had disastrous effect upon the Kabaka's status and relations with Obote, the case highlighted how fragile the constitutional framework of the 1962 constitution was particularly as regards the federal relations of Buganda in a unitary Uganda. The lost counties issue had largely marked the end of the UPC-KY alliance. This case spelt the doom of the 1962 constitutional arrangement (chaos turned out only a year later in 1966).

Facts: The case involved distribution of finances and revenues between the central government and Buganda government and the question of how much in grants Buganda was entitled from the central government. Buganda argued that on the basis of its status, it should obtain a grant of a basis different from the other parts of Uganda. The fact that the matter wound up in court and could not be amicably resolved between the two parties demonstrates how hostile their relation had become.

3. The question of the lost counties

The question of the lost counties had been a controversy at the constitutional conferences and the underlying tensions had remained throughout the early years of independence. By 1961, it was depicted that at least 3/4 of the people in Bugangaizi were Banyoro not withstanding 60 years of Buganda rule. In Buyaga the situation was even more striking with 15 Banyoro for every Muganda – Even Sir Tito Winyi the Omukama of Bunyoro argued that the case of the restoration of the two counties to his kingdom could not be logically denied. The tense relations between the two kingdoms and the aspirations of the peoples of the counties would be underpinned by two developments in 1963 and 1964. The first was the case of Joseph Kazaraine v. the Lukiiko[198] the applicant Mr. Kazaraine was convicted for inciting the people of Buyaga and Bugangaizi not to pay taxes to the Kabaka's government and for obstructing chiefs from carrying out their rightful duties of revenue collection. The issue before the High Court was to whom jurisdiction over the two counties was vested as between the central government and the Buganda government.

Reference was made to the 2nd constitutional conference question had directed that the two counties should vest in the central government. It would obviously follow that the central government was entitled to exercise jurisdiction over the province. However, because it was not clear when exactly the two counties were supposed to come under the jurisdiction of the central government. The court held that Buganda exercises jurisdiction over the counties. It would seem that the court's decision reflected move of a desire not to upset the political set up given the volatile character of the matter and in any event a referendum had been scheduled to resolve the matter.

Kazaraine's case is important for a number of reasons:

[198] [1963] E.A 472

1. It underpinned the tension in the relations between Buganda and the two counties.
2. It portrayed the confusion of the 1962 constitution had brought about with respect to an issue that was not resolved in the run up to independence.
3. It demonstrated the problem of the unitary-federal arrangements of the 1962 constitution were likely to cause.

The second development was the referendum on the lost counties in 1964 between 1962-64 the Kabaka government had laboured to justify why the two counties should remain in Buganda. They presented a number of reasons including;

i) The undesirability of upsetting the administrative arrangements that had existed for such a long period.
ii) The inch endowment of Buganda of Buganda than that of Bunyoro which meant that the two counties would benefit more under Buganda.
iii) The benevolence and non-sectarianism character of the Kabaka's rule.
iv) That the development of the counties had been secure under Buganda rule. Further, there were concerns that the change of administration would adversely affect Buganda land owners in the counties.

Nevertheless, the central government went ahead with the referendum which was held on 4th November, 1964. The two counties overwhelmingly voted to return to Bunyoro under the constitution. Kabaka Mutesa II, the then president was supposed to sign the instrument of transfer of the two counties but refused to do so.

Obote as the Prime Minister then put the matter before the National Assembly and subsequently the motion for transfer of the counties was confirmed through the constitution of Uganda. (3rd amendment Act No. 36 of 1964). The Buganda government petitioned to the High Court challenging the constitutionality of the referendum and lost its subsequent appeal to the Privy Council was also dismissed in the case of The Kabaka's Government V. Attorney General of Uganda.[199] The referendum would mark the final death of UPC – YK alliance following the referendum. There was widespread hostility in Buganda and worsening of relations between the central government and the Buganda government on the other hand.

For Obote and UPC, the referendum acted as a boost as it showed that he could no longer be held at ransom to Buganda's demands, the prevailing political situation was also in UPC's favour. Several KY members of parliament had been persuaded to cross to UPC thereby undermining the strength of KY. Similarly, several members of the opposition DP crossed over including its Secretary General Bail Batalingaya. UPC was therefore stronger than ever to enable central government to control the National Assembly.

[199] P.C A & P 56 – 1964.

In the early years of independence autocratic as well as disrespect for the constitution for the constitution would become a future of governance this was particularly evident in the relation between the executive and other organs of government. Obote's government having the majority in parliament (National Assembly) demonstrated a tendency of the executive to dictate the laws enacted by the National Assembly more significantly though was the disrespect by the executive of the decisions of the independence of the judicially.

This attitude of the executive towards the judiciary was manifested as early as 1962 in respect of the case of Jowett Lyagoba v Bakasonga & Others. [200]

The case concerned w the election of the Basoga District Council and the legality in particular of the election of specifically elected members of the council. The issue was whether a resolution by the council and the endorsement by the governors of Uganda conformed to the provision of the 1962 constitution. The matter ultimately also touched on the legality of William Nadiope's election as Kyabazinga. The High Court upheld the challenge to the elections and declared the various persons were unlawfully elected and would have to vacate the offices.

Three month after the court's decisions, the National Assembly enacted the Busoga Election Validation Act No. 9 1963 which validated the elections and in effect over turned the decisions of the court.

THE 1966 KABAKA CRISIS.

The 1966 Kabaka Crisis can be traced to the growing animosity between Buganda government and the central Government in the aftermath of the 1964 referendum on the lost counties and this was also reflected in the disputes before the courts in 1964 and 1965, further the growing suspicions and conspiracies during the period of 1965 and 1966 (including the Kabaka's relations with the P.M, the power struggles in UPC between Ibingira and Obote and the crossing of the floor by opposition MPs ensured that the country had by 1966 become a powder keg ready to explode. That the 1966 crisis occurred was the inevitable consequence of a series of events commencing in early 1960s.

In January 1966, during a session of the National Assembly, a KY member of Parliament Daudi Ocheng alleged that the PM, Obote and his ministers Adoko Nekyon and Felix Onama and Idi Amin were involved in illegal gold trading in the Congo (Zaire). This allegation was made while the PM was on tour in Northern Uganda and upon his return to Kampala he caused the appointment of a judicial commission of inquiry into the matter.

[200] [1963] E.A 57.

In February during a cabinet meeting in Entebbe, the P.M ordered the arrest of 5 ministers including Ibingira (resulting in the Ibingira and others case).[201] In the same month of February 1966, the P.M suspended the 1962 independence constitution, citing that the country had lost stability and that certain individuals intended to overthrow the lawful government of Uganda. The suspension of the constitution resulted in a number of developments:

1. The abolition of the posts of president and V.P
2. Declaration of a state of emergency in Buganda
3. The dismissal of Shaban Opolot as army commander and his replacement by Idi Amin. (Resulting in the case of Shaban Opolot v. Attorney General[202])

The 1962 constitution was subsequently abrogated in April 1966 with significant implications:

i) The abolition of kingdoms in Uganda and in effect the federal and semi federal status of the kingdoms.
ii) Declaration of Uganda as a republic
iii) The promulgation of the 1966 interim constitution (whose legality was subsequently challenged before the courts) and ultimately the 1967 republican constitution. The reaction to these constitutional developments within Buganda was one of opposition with the Lukiiko passing a resolution in May 1966 for the central government to leave Buganda soil by the end of May 1966. The central government response was to send troops led by Idi Amin to attack the seat of Buganda at Mengo. This resulted in the capture of the major properties of Buganda and the fleeing to exile by the Kabaka where he died in 1969.

IMPLICATIONS OF THE KABAKA CRISIS FOR CONSTITUTIONALISM

The abolition of the kingdoms which followed the abrogation of the 1962 constitution in April 1966. This was later affirmed by Article 118 of the 1967 constitution (this Article remained in place until it was repeated in 1993 by the NRM government. This was illustrated in various court decisions which include;

Shah v. Uganda 1969 E.A 261

Shah had a contract with the defunct kingdom of Buganda from which he was to get a commission. With the abolition of the kingdom most of assets and liabilities of the defunct kingdom were inherited by the central government. When Shah made a claim for commissions on contracts entered into with the kingdom of Buganda before its abolition, the central government purported to amend the Local Government act to bar such claims.

[201] Grace Ibingira and Others v. Uganda [1966] E.A 445(No.2)
[202] [1969]1 EA 631

The declaration of Uganda as a republic with an executive President. This resulted in placing of excessive powers in the president without significant checks and balances which had major ramification for separation of powers in the subsequent years.

The 1967 constitution affected the separation of powers and constitutionalism in a number of instances including the making of the Attorney General a cabinet member as opposed to the 1962 constitution when he wasn't. Further the office of the Director of Public Prosecution (DPP) was brought under the A.G which had not been the case in 1962. This resulted in the politicization of the persecution of opposition leaders.

The declaration of a state of emergency initially in Buganda and subsequently throughout the country. This resulted in several instances of arrest and detentions without trial of individuals. This was particularly reflected in the promulgation of the 1966 Emergency Power (Detention) Regulations which initially applied in Buganda and under which individuals such as Ibingira, Matovu, Lumu etc. were detained. This would in itself bear implications for human rights especially the right to personal liberty and in the attitude of the executive to the negation of judicial independence of the courts.

The Ibingira case followed the arrest during a cabinet meeting in Entebbe and their detention pending an order of deportation under Deportation Ordinance Cap 46. The case involved a challenge as to the constitutionality of orders under the deportation ordinance unconstitutional as was never expected to apply to citizens of Uganda and lawful orders under the 1962 constitution (Article 19) were never intended to be orders that resulted in the deprivation of personal liberty.

The court of Appeal directed that the matter be remitted to the high court for grant of orders of habeas corpus in order to conform with the decision of the court of Appeal, the government brought the Ibingira's from Karamoja up to Entebbe where they released them but upon stepping out of the airport they were rearrested and detained under the Emergency Powers (Detention) Regulations which were then applicable only in Buganda. This resulted in the 2nd Ibingira case in which they challenged their re-arrest and detention as having been undertaken in bad faith by the government and in violation Art. 35 of the interim 1966. In the meantime, prior to their re-arrest, the National Assembly had enacted the Deportation Validation Act which sought to provide government the immunity against any claim for compensation by Ibingira and others in respect of the habeas corpus proceedings in the first case.

The high court refused to hear on merit, the 2nd case brought by Ibingira and once again the matter went before the E. A court of Appeal that there was absence of bad faith in the government bringing the applicants to Buganda where they were rearrested and that it was the applicant's misfortune to be in an area where the detention regulations applied.

The stance taken by the court in the 2nd case demonstrated the demise of the judicial independence of the courts, with the growing tendencies of the executive to ignore or nullify decisions of the courts as well as interfere in the operation of the courts. The courts in themselves seemed content to make decisions in favour of the government.

It raised the question of the legality of extra-constitutional changes of government in light of the abrogation of the 1962 constitution and the promulgation of the 1966 and 1967 constitution. This question was central to the decision in the case of Exparte Matovu where a challenge was made as to the constitutionality and validity of the 1966 constitution. In the final analysis the question before the courts was whether the events leading to the 1966 constitutional change in the legal order. The court referred to the writings of a prominent scholar Prof. Hans Kelsen who had propounded theories on the extra constitutional changes of a legal order.

Basing on his idea of the constitution as a grand norm, Kelsen argued that norms derive their validity from the grand norm. He argued that an extra constitutional change in the legal order occurred in instances where the change is not contemplated or envisaged by the existing legal order. The change must in itself result in an efficacious government with authority over territory and its people.

In the finality, the validity of norms will derive from the new legal order given that the old one has been legal order continue to exist, this is because their existence and validity is permitted by the new legal order.

The phenomenon of extra constitutional changes in the legal order, has defined a larger part of Uganda's constitutional history particularly in the nature of the enactment of legal notice L/N 1 to usher in a new regime for instance.

THE PERIOD OF 1966 AND 1971

It is period of military rule most especially in the reigns of Obote and Idi Amin. Suspension of legal documents and enforcing decrees on the people. Gukiina views the development of authoritarian rule and abuse of power as not only a necessary but an inevitable stage in Uganda's political history largely because of lack of national consensus. However, Ibingira on the other hand rejects the theses of inevitability and attributes these developments on the particular personality of Obote and his motives. [203]

Comparative constitutionalism has been the subject for philosophical and academic inquiry tracing the idea back to Aristotle. Uganda not being any different, throughout the constitutional modifications printed through historical events, adhered to the practice. It has however in the modern period adopted new tactics to constitutional reform.

[203] Ibingira, G.S.K (1980), African upheavals since independence. (West views Press)

THE AMIN REGIME OF MILITANT POLITICS AND THE DESTRUCTION OF FORMAL CONSTITUTIONALISM

The 1966 crisis had propelled Amin to the forefront of Uganda's political scene. It was not surprising that upon the departure of president Obote for a common wealth conference in Singapore, the army announced on 25th January, 1971 that it staged a coup in order to save a bad situation politics that was to characterize Amin's regime. The coup plotters listed 18 reasons of grievances against the Obote government significantly;

1. Violations of human rights including detentions and the lack of political freedoms.
2. The existence of a state of emergency throughout the country since 1969.
3. Corruption, nepotism and tribalism.

The legal instrument that ushered in Amin's regime was a proclamation known as Legal Notice 1/71. It's significance as with all the subsequent legal notices 1/79 UNLF era and No. 1/86 (NRM period) was the introduction of a new constitutional legal order in terms of Kelsen theory as well as to give legitimacy to the new regime. The constitution of Uganda was invariably the 1967 constitution read together with L/N 1/71. The legal Notice comprised the following features; it suspended several Articles of the 1967 constitution including.

i) Article 1 on the supremacy of the constitution. In effect Amin himself became the supreme law and was no longer subject to the constitution. He did rule by decrees.
ii) Article 3 on the amendment of the constitution by parliament which could now be done at will by Amin by way of decrees.
iii) Article 63 on the powers of parliament to make laws which would be vested in Amin through the promulgation of decrees.
iv) Chapter 4 on the executive and the qualifications on election of the president who came to be designated as head of state by virtue of the Constitution (Modification) Decree No. 5 of 1971.
v) Chapter 5 on the parliament, its composition and its legislative powers which would now vest in Amin and a council of ministers by virtue of The Parliament (Vesting of Powers) Decree No. 8 of 1971.

The immediate period of the inception of Amin's regime was characterized by jubilation in some parts of the country particularly Buganda with the return of Mutesa's body while the other parts particularly Lango and Acholi faced purges. Similarly, all political prisoners were released including Ibingira, Abu Mayanja, Benedicto Kiwanuka and the majority were elected into the primary initial civilian government. Nonetheless within a short period of time, a clamp down on the opposition began to take on the character of a military junta with all the institutions of government, the executive legislature and judiciary manned by the military. Amin introduced a total dictatorship and within a space of two years he had completed into turning the country in an absolute military regime. During the 2 years, the regime began a clamp down on human rights through the passing of decrees thus although Amin had released political prisoners detained by Obote's government, the first act of his regime was to suspend political party activities which was secured by the Suspension of Political Party Activities Decree No. 14 of 1971, which provided in part that "no person was allowed to manage, take part in collect subscription for, raise funds or otherwise encourage political party activities. Public meetings or processions designed with political motives are banned as are the signs, symbols, flags, songs, statements, slogans and names of political parties". Several other laws were passed during Amin's regime to deal with political descent resulting in further violation of human rights. These included;

1. The Detention (Prescription of Time Limit) Decree No. 7 of 1979 which allowed for indefinite detention throughout trial for 30 days before reasons are given for detention. The decree also gave powers to arrest and detain individuals to members of the armed forces; the
2. The Newspapers and Publications (Amendment) Decree No. 35 of 1972 which permitted the minister for information to prohibit the publication of any newspaper for an indefinite period if satisfied that it was in public interest. This resulted in the deprivation of the freedom of expression like the banning of the Ngabo newspaper and subsequent disappearance of its editor.
3. Military Police (Power of Arrest) Decree, 1971 which gave the military powers of arrest to civilians and in effect removed its power from the mainstream police force. By this decree the armed forces and state intelligence forces such as the state research bureau, anti-smuggling unit could carry out arrests, summary trials as well as execute civilians which not only eroded the traditional policing powers but also judicial powers. The implications of this decree were remarked upon by Russell, C.J in the case of Ephraim Bukenya v. Attorney General[204]

In all these aspects of the creation of a totalitarian regime the most drastic was the assault upon the judicial arm of government. This was secured through the establishment of quasi-judicial organs not traditionally empowered to exercise judicial power over civilians. This was established by trial by Military Tribunals Decree No. 12 of 1973.

[204] [1972] H.C.B 87.

The implications of the military tribunals decree were to compromise judicial independence of traditional courts and often resulting in the denial of the right to fair trial as in most cases individuals were tried in absentia without legal representation or the right to cross examine witnesses. A similar quasi-judicial organ was the economic crimes tribunal for the offences of smuggling, hoarding, extortion etc.

The erosion of judicial power reached its culmination with the promulgation of Proceedings Against the Government (Protection) Decree No. 8 of 1972. It was promulgated following the release of a British citizen on an application of a writ of habeas corpus by Chief Justice Benedicto Kiwanuka. The decree gave government immunity by ousting the jurisdiction of courts to grant relief with regards to actions for injuries resulting from measures taken to protect the public and security and enforcement of law and order. With the jurisdiction of the courts ousted and the supremacy of the constitution non-existent, the military government was in effect beyond the check of the law.

UGANDA NATIONAL LIBERATION FRONT 1979 – 1980

The period from 1979 can be described as one of a search for constitutional reconstruction. The search was a result of a government formed in exile during the Moshi conference whose main participants were drawn from approximately 22 exile political groups. The main instrument which came to bind the participants consisted of the minutes to the resolution of the conference. The overall body that was ushered in after the fall of Amin's regime was the UNLF which was the umbrella organization of the various political groups associated with the Moshi conference.

The UNLF was made up of distinct organs including:

i) The National Executive Committee with its chairperson as Prof. Yusuf Lule and vice as Akena P. Ojok. The National Executive Committee subsequently became the executive organ of the UNLF government.

ii) The National Consultative Committee which was chaired by Prof. Edward Rugumayo and his vice Omwony Ojok. The NCC would constitute the legal organ or the UNLF government.

iii) The Military Commission which was chaired by Paul Muwanga and his vice Yoweri Museveni.

The UNLF had also established a cabinet while in exile and upon Amin's fall in April 1979 the chairman of the UNLF Prof. Yusuf Lule was sworn in as the 4th president of Uganda. The main constitutional element that ushered in the UNLF government was Legal Notice 1/79 which effectively restored Art. 1 of the 1967 constitutional previously suspended under L.N. 1/71. On the other hand, the legal notice modified chapter 5 of the 1967 constitution to constitute the National consultative council as the legislature body.

The government of Prof. Yusuf Lule was short lived surviving only 68 days. It was faced with internal wrangling and conflicts over ideology and policy and the last straw came about as a result of dispute over ministerial appointment. Some members of the UNLF insisted that all presidential appointments must be ratified by the NCC basing their argument on the premise that this was in accordance with the minutes and resolutions of the Moshi conference.

On the other hand, Prof. Lule argued that the spirit of the Moshi conference had only stipulated that he governs by the 1967 constitution and that the constitution mentioned nothing about ratification of presidential appointments. He therefore argued that as president under the 1967 constitution reinstated as the supreme law of the land, he was not subordinated to the NCC. He therefore organized a cabinet reshuffle in which he transferred Paul Muwanga from ministry of internal affairs to that of labour and replaced him with Andrew Lutakome Kayira. The NCC revolted and in a motion of no confidence, they voted for his removal and subsequent replacement as president with Godfrey Binaisa.

The events surrounding Prof. Lule's removal as president were to result in the 1st constitutional case since 1966. This was the case brought by Andrew Lutakome Kayira and others v. Edward Rugumayo and Others.[205]

The petitioners sought to challenge the removal of Prof. Lule as president with regard to its lawfulness under the constitution. The court held;

1. The existing constitutional framework at the time of Prof. Lule's removal was the 1967 constitution as modified by L.N 1/79. Since the L.N did not make reference to the resolution of the Moshi conference. They were not part of the constitution of Uganda
2. The 1967 constitution did not prescribe a procedure for the removal of a president. Therefore, the removal of Prof. Lule as president was done in a manner not contemplated under the constitution and thus amounted to a coup.
3. An inquiry into the lawfulness of the removal of Prof Lule as president would invariably raise the question of the legality of the then existing government of Godfrey Binaisa. And in that regard Acts and Laws undertaken and enacted by the government. This was a political question into which the courts could not inquire.

The significance of Kayira's case

It tested the extent to which Kelsen theory as postulated in Exparte Matovu's case[206] continued to exercise influence in politics and governance in Uganda and the tendency of courts to refer to this theory in order to secure political continuity.

[205] Constitutional Case No. 1 of 1979
[206] Ex Parte Matovu: Uganda v. Commissioner of Prisons [1967] E.A.L.R. 514 (H.C.).

After Lule's removal, Binaisa fell into the same trap as he tried to reshuffle Paul Muwanga, Museveni and Oyite Ojok and they removed him and subsequently placed all executive powers in the hands of the military commission led by Muwanga and Museveni. The military commission created a presidential commission comprising of 3 members, 2 of them judges and the 3rd a long-serving civil servant. This body was however merely cosmetic as the real executive power lay with the military commission which would then put in place a process for the holding of general elections and which took place in December 1980.

THE PERIOD OF THE NATIONAL RESISTANCE MOVEMENT 1986 – 1995

The new Museveni and NRM regime projected a sui generis revolutionary orientation that seemed to constitute a watershed in the political architecture of Uganda. At his inauguration, Museveni stated that; "no one should think that what is happening today is a mere change of guard it is a fundamental change in the politics of our country

The NRM take-over was seen as a fundamental departure from misrule to political transformation, constitutionalism, rule of law and human rights. The contractual fundamentals enshrined in the ten-point program and promise of a fundamental change that was that already exhibited in the displace of the triumphant rag-tag NRA guerrilla fighters instilled an unprecedented sense of relief in confidence. Ugandans envisioned the end to state-orchestrated wanton murderers; the end of the culture of political violence, torture, arbitrary arrest the repressive modus operand a, above all, all the opportunity to freely elect and peacefully change their leadership. It was considered a dawn of the new era. The exceptions were the people of northern Uganda region, where the defeated armies re grouped and waged an extended war led by Alice Lakwena and Joseph Kony.

Internationally, Museveni's conversion to neo liberalism earned him western acclaim of a unique visionary, charismatic leader' and primus inter pares of the new 'new breed' of African leaders[207]

The period of the NRM period can be described as one involving the search for a new model of constitutionalism. The NRM came to power on the platform of promising a fundamental change in which it declared that it would discard itself from the previous modes of government. The guiding philosophy of the NRM government was to be found in the 10-point programme which outlined the basic elements of its agenda for political and social economic reconstruction of the country.

[207] Oloka-Onyango, Joe, 2004, 'New-Breed' Leadership, Conflict, and Reconstructionin the Great Lakes Region of Africa: A Sociopolitical Biography of Uganda'sYoweri Kaguta Museveni, Africa Today, 50 (3): 29-52; Kjaer, Anne Mette, 'Old brooms can sweep too! An Overview of Rulers andPublic Sector Reforms in Uganda, Tanzania and Kenya', Journal of ModernAfrican Studies, 42 (3): 389-413.

Amongst this was the restoration of democracy, rule of law and respect for human rights. Elimination of corruption, creation of a self-sustaining and integrated economy.

The major constitutional instrument that ushered in the NRM government was Legal Notice 1/86. It retained Art. 1 of the 1967 constitution on supremacy of the constitution. Nonetheless it suspended Art. 3 on the amendment of the constitution. It also suspended Cap. 4 with exceptions of the office of the president. It also modified Cap. 5 and in particular Art 63 by constituting the National Resistance council (NRC) as the legislative organ of the NRM government. The L.N also contained in its schedule a Code of Conduct to regulate and govern the operations of the NRA (army). The code of conduct contained basic principles by which the army was to be guided. In effect, the army was for the first time in Uganda's history subjected directly to the constitutional frame work. In the case of F.E Ssempebwa v. Attorney General[208] issue – the passing of legislation was to be by the NRC and not the chairman of NRM.

In terms of constitutionalism, the NRM government has perhaps had the most profound influence on the constitutional framework of government since independence. It is to be said that at its inception in 1986 the NRM was largely a broad-based government embracing a wide spectrum of political ideologies and opinions and was intended to be a transitional system of government. However, by 1995, the NRM had narrowed down in terms of its composition as well as transformed in the manner in which it operated and described itself as a political system. The major changes introduced by the NRM have entailed constitutional structures as the conceptual frame work of government. At the level of institutional structures, the changes included the following.

(i) The inception of resistance councils and committees. The RC system had already been introduced in areas of S. Western Uganda which had come with the control of the NRA as a rebel group upon coming to power; the RC system was introduced throughout the country. Of significance, the RC system transformed the nature and character of local government by breaking the monopoly of the chief thus for the first time, power at the local level was divested from a single individual and placed in a committee or council. Furthermore, the RC system brought about a new system of participatory democracy at the grassroots whereby the local people were involved in the election of their elders from the village to the district levels. Furthermore, the system also sought to bring about semblance of separation of powers. With the establishment of not only the council and committees which largely exercised legislative and executive powers, but also the resistance council courts which exercised judicial powers.

Resistance Councils and Committees (Judicial Powers) Statute No. 1 of 1987.

It may be said that over the period of time as the NRM entrenched itself, the LC system became more and more like an institutional mechanism for the ruling power as they were now being used to advance the causes of the government. Furthermore, the concept of participatory democracy was limited to L.C 1 and L.C 2 as the other levels of the system was then based on elections by way of electoral colleges. In addition, elections for the L. Cs was primarily based on quenching which did not effectively promote democratic choice as it gave way to instances of intimidation particularly the women.

[208] Constitutional Case No. 1 of 1986

The establishment of the office of the Inspector General of government referred to as the "Ombudsman" in other countries. This was a significant establishment since no other government had previously instituted such an office and it was intended to give effect to the intention of the NRM government to eradicate corruption as stated in its 10-point programme.

The office of the IGG was designed to check on executive excesses (abuse of office) and its mandate included prevention of abuse of office as well as investigation into allegation of corruption, maladministration and abuses of human rights. Nonetheless, an examination of the operation of the office from 1988 when it was established by the IGG statute up to 1995 when it was transformed into a constitutional body under the 1995 constitution reveals a number of shortcomings of the office. First, the IGG was responsible only to the president and this therefore did not ensure independence of the office in order to effectively carry out its mandate. Secondly findings and recommendations of the office were never made public. Thirdly, in the years of its existence, the IGG totally failed to carry out its mandate on the abuse of office.

(ii) Establishment of a Commission of Inquiry into violations of human rights. This was under the chairmanship of Justice Oder and it was mandated to inquire into the violation of human rights since independence up to 1986. In effect, the commission could not inquire into human right violation under the NRM government and its report issued in 1994 does not bear reference to human rights violations in 7 years of the NRM government. In any event, in spite of the commission's report, nobody has been prosecuted for committing human right violations.

(iii) The establishment of a Constitutional Commission. This was established under the Uganda Constitutional Commission Statute of 1988 under the chairmanship of Justice Odoki. The commission was mandated to collect views country-wide on the future constitutional framework of the country. The result of the commission's work was a draft constitution which was debated before a constituent Assembly in 1994/5.

(iv) The Inception of the No-party (Movement) system of government. The NRM government was founded on the principle of non-partisan politics which stressed the importance of individual merit as the basis of political governance. The NRM government was therefore broad-based and as a result at the very outset, political parties were suspended on the argument that they were largely sectarian and divisive and were responsible for the political turmoil experienced by Uganda since 1962. Initially, the suspension of political party activities was largely seen at the result of a gentleman's agreement to allow the new system of government to operate while incorporating individuals from the political parties. However subsequently with the extension of the NRM period in government 1989, the first steps towards outright suppression of political parties occurred. By the time of the elections for the constituent assembly in 1994, the non-partisan principles of the NRM government had side lined political party activity. The Constituent Assembly Statute of 1993 specifically provided that election of delegates would be based on the on no-partisan principles of individual merit and therefore no person would canvass for election on the platform of political parties. There was an attempt to challenge this mode of election based on nonpartisan principles as a violation of rights of association and assembly.

In Rwanyarare v Attorney General[209] the court rejected his petition on grounds that:

1. Limitations on individual rights were permitted in public interest under the 1967 constitution and that public interest was manifested in the desire to ensure maximum participation in the constitution making process.
2. The C.A which was mandated to promulgate a new constitution was only transitional and in effect the limitation on the rights of association and assembly was for a limited duration.

It should be recognized that the NRM government introduced a significant transformation in the gender relations than any previous government. The question of women's rights and representation was accorded as much constitutional and attention. The government put in place significant changes in the law in particularly in respect of women representative in NRC but also affirmative action policies in respect of the appointment of women to public office and in significantly the addition of 1.5 points to women on admission to tertiary institutions.

[209] Constitutional case No. 1 of 1994

CHAPTER FOUR

POLITICAL QUESTION DOCTRINE, KELSEN THEORY, LEGALITY OF GOVERNMENT & CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT

This chapter will argue that the shared assumptions of legal positivism have ossified into a "universalist" ideology of Uganda's judiciary aptly labelled "Matovu's Ghost". Judges thus perpetuate state law as an alien system of norms detached from most people's daily lives, ultimately backed by brute force. Only by re-examining the presumptions of positivism can the study of laws bridge the Hegelian gap. The Chapter will also scrutinize the principal elements of legal positivism derived from the High Court decision in Uganda v. Commissioner of Prisons, Ex Parte Matovu[210]. This book further challenges those positivist assumptions by offering an alternative "map" of laws in Uganda. This map denies the hegemony of state law, but departs from Chanock and Mamdani's focus on the bifurcated civil/customary laws. This book also analyses Uganda's court jurisprudence, or lack thereof, since the 1995 Constitution.

THE START OF CONSTITUTIONAL ABROGATION.

In 1966 February 22, Uganda's prime minister, Apollo Milton Obote, issued a statement to the nation in which he announced that they would assume all powers of government in the interest of national stability, public security & tranquillity. He later suspended the 1962 constitution. However, the courts, the civil services, armed forces and the national assembly were preserved for continuity for functioning of the states.

On April 15, 1966 Uganda National assembly abolished the 1962 constitution by resolution & replaced it with the 1966 constitution to be in force pending the establishment of a constituent assembly to draft & pass a new constitution which later came to be the 1967 constitution. Under this constitution, all executive authority was vested in the president to be exercised with the advice and consent of cabinet. Former president, sir Edward Mutesa has consequently evicted from the state house & eventually forced to flee into exile. The new constitution also abolished the federal states that had been created by its predecessor.

[210] [1967] E.A.L.R. 514 (H.C.).

THE PIGEON HOLE CRISIS: A VALIDATION OF A BLOODLESS COUP.

On the morning of April 15, 1966, the four jets of the Uganda Air Force traced lazy ovals in the sky above Kampala. The streets below were quiet except for the soldiers shifting in their gear at checkpoints throughout the capital city. Ninety odd men made their way through the deserted streets to the National Assembly. Each Member of Parliament found a freshly bound copy of a draft constitution in his pigeonhole. In the parliamentary session that followed, Milton Obote, the former Prime Minister, led a polite debate surrounded by soldiers on the "interim" Constitution of 1966.[211] The opposition parties stormed out in protest, but the remaining members passed it in the name of "we the people of Uganda hereby assembled in the name of Uganda" by 55 votes to 4. Later that day Obote was sworn in as Uganda's first Executive-President of the 1996 Constitution that effectively "emasculated" Parliament as an independent legislature.[212]

Two months earlier Obote had been on a month-long tour of the distant northern districts including his native Apac district. Meanwhile, in the capital to the south, Obote's opponents had hastily prepared and passed a near unanimous motion of censure in Parliament accusing Obote, three Cabinet Ministers and the second-in- command of the Uganda Army, Idi Amin, of corruption. Obote raced back to Kampala to issue his 22 February "Statement to the Nation by the Prime Minister" that announced he had taken over all powers of government and suspended Sir Edward Mutesa II, the President of Uganda and the Kabaka ("king") of Buganda. Part of Obote's statement read: "I call upon the judges and magistrates, civil servants -both Uganda (sic) and expatriate- members of the security forces and the general public to carry on with their normal duties."[213] In a radio address two days later he suspended the 1962 Constitution.

After Obote passed his interim 1966 Constitution and suspended the Kabaka, Ganda chiefs pushed for a confrontation with Obote’s regime. On 20 May, three chiefs, including Michael Matovu, proposed a motion 1n the Lukiiko (the Buganda Parliament) demanding the central government "remove itself' from Buganda soil within ten days. The ultimatum passed unanimously. Three days later Obote countered with Legal Notice No. 4 of 1966, which declared a state of emergency in the Buganda kingdom and had government soldiers arrest the three saza chiefs. Riots broke out across the kingdom demanding their release, and attacking police stations and other symbols of the central government.[214] The next day Colonel Idi Amin led government troops to surround the Kabaka’s palace. After a half-day of bitter fighting, the troops overwhelmed the palace defenders and the

[211] Constitution of Uganda, 1966, promulgated 15 April 1966 (1966 Constitution)
[212] Yash Ghai, Matovu s case: Another comment (1968) 1 Eastern African Law Review 68 at 71
[213] Cited in Uganda v. Commissioner of Prisons, Ex Parte Matovu, [1967] E.A.L.R. 514 (gan. H.C.) [Matovu] at 522.
[214] T.V. Sathyamurthy, The Political Development of Uganda:1900-1986 (Brookfield, Vt.: Gower,1986) at 437

Kabaka fled to London.

The battle over, Amin's soldiers razed the palace and made sure to torch each of the mujaguzo. These revered royal drums, over 200, embodied the kingdom's continuity-spiritual complement of the earthly Kabaka. This deliberate sacrilege devastated the Baganda, the state's most populous group and long-favoured by the British:

Baganda from all ranks, from intellectual to commoner, including those who supported in most respects the central government against [the Kabaka], found the reports of the loss of the drums as a numbing personal trauma.[215]To bereaved Baganda, the smouldering mujaguzo embodied their kingdom's death at the hands of the triumphant modern state of Uganda.

It was Michael Matovu who struck the match that would set alight the mujaguzo and eventually all of Uganda in two decades of civil war. He and three fellow saza chiefs (and Lukiiko ministers) were detained on 22 May 1966, the day before Obote proclaimed a public emergency in Buganda under the purported power of the Deportation Act. The five detained chiefs were driven far north from the capital and Buganda territory to an old colonial prison. On 14 July the East African Court of Appeal heard their application for a writ of habeas corpus and granted it and ordered their release since they were detained against their rights under the 1962 Constitution.[216] Matovu and his fellows were quickly flown south to the infamous Luzira prison, a colonial project of the 1920s, on a hill outside Kampala in Buganda lands. Two days later, Matovu was escorted out to the prison's inner compound, told he was released and then rearrested immediately under the new emergency powers to quell the Buganda riots.[217] For over a month Matovu was held incommunicado in Luzira until he at last met with his lawyer, Abu Mayanja, a member of Parliament for the Kabaka Yekka royalist party, in the presence of police and prison officials.[218] Matovu filed his application for a writ of habeas corpus ad suijiciendum on 6 September 1966 and a mere two weeks later the High Court of Uganda declined another habeas corpus application since the government assured the court that it would allow the East African Court of Appeal to hear their case.[219]

---

[215]M.CrawfordYoung,"Buganda"in Rene Lemarchand, ed., African Kingships in Perspective: Political Change and Modernization in Monarchical Settings (London: Frank Cass,1977) at 200

[216]Ibingira v. Uganda [1966] E.A.306(East Afr.C.A.) [Ibingira]

[217]Emergency Powers(Detention)Regulations, Statutory InstrumentNo.65of1966*[DetentionAct]*

[218] A year after the Matovu decision, Mayanja would be arrested on charges of sedition for an Article he penned against Obote. Binaisa, his opponent in Matovu, would try the case. It ended in an acquital, but Mayanja was immediately rearrested in the courtroom and served two years in prison before being released:Ssemujju Ibrahim Nganda,"A Biography Abu Mayanja Never Lived to Read"The Weekly Observer(10 November2005),online:Weekly Observer <http://www.ugandaobserver.com/ new/archives/2005arch/features/spec/nov/spec200511102.php>

[219]Ibingira, supra

THE MATOVU CASE

Matovu's case finally came before the High Court of Uganda by way of a reference to interpret the Constitution. Three judges sat together -Chief Justice Sir Udo Udoma and Justices Sheridan and Jones- to give their unanimous judgement on 2 February 1967, five months after Matovu's application and almost a year after Obote's coup. The Court's decision began with an extended admonition of the applicant for two procedural errors. First, Matovu did not state to whom the writ was addressed.[220] This was hardly surprising, though, given the chaos following the state of emergency in Buganda. Matovu did not know, nor was he told, who was detaining him. Second, Mayanja filed an affidavit, required for an originating motion, sworn by himself since the detainee, Matovu, was unable to make it himself. The High Court objected that Mayanja did not begin this motion in the name of the "Sovereign State of Uganda". This formality recalled the historical roots of a writ of habeas corpus in England, which began as a direct petition by a subject to the King for release from illegal detention by one of his officers.[221] Since Mayanja's key argument denied that a properly constituted sovereign power existed in Uganda after the coup, however, addressing his motion to the "Sovereign State" would prejudice his case by conceding the legitimacy of Obote's regime. The Court decided they would "jettison formalism to the winds" and overlook the procedural slip-ups since "the liberty of a citizen of Uganda" was at stake.[222] But their concerns and the depth in which they analysed them revealed a sympathetic attitude towards the executive in power.

The Court next addressed the Attorney General's challenge to their authority to decide on the validity of the Constitution. The very fact that the Court was hearing this case presupposed, the Attorney General argued, that the 1966 Constitution was legally valid because the people's representatives properly and legally promulgated it.[223] If not, by what authority did they derive their judicial powers?

The judges quashed any insinuation about their loyalty by noting there was never any "dispute or doubt" about their loyalty to the "Sovereign State of Uganda" and that they remained, "in their posts in response to the appeal by the Prime Minister . . . [which was] clear testimony of their loyalty."[224] This appeal, of course, was Obote's "Statement to the Nation by the Prime Minister", which specifically appealed to "Uganda and expatriate" judges. This was a veiled threat to foreign

[220] Matovu, supra
[221] Matovu, supra and see generally David J. Clark & GerardMcCoy.The Most Fundamental Legal Right: Habeas Corpusin the Commonwealth (Oxford: Clarendon Press,2000)
[222] Ibid
[223] Ibid
[224] Id

judges and resonated with the HC: Sir Udo Udoma, a Nigerian, and British-born Justices Sheridan and Jones. All three judges must have known that Obote had targeted them since they had little popular legitimacy in the eyes of most Ugandans.[225] Having established their loyalty, the judges of the Court addressed the argument that the 1966 Constitution was valid since it came about after a successful revolution.

A DISCUSSION ON THE EX PARTE MATOVU CASE

The case itself, going by its immediate place in the history of Uganda marked the end of a semi federal system of governance with its colonial ties and impositions and heralded the beginning of republicanism in Uganda; it was the starting point of the centralization of modern government in Uganda, the birth of the very political questions and conditions that confront our time as will be discussed later. We must, as an imperative for good study of this period look at the two differing perspectives that led up to this case. The first naturally is the then government perspective of events and the other is that its opposition held both of which I will try to explore in depth here:

Professor Oloka-Onyango gives, in lucid fashion, the different arguments fronted by each side. He says that, "viewed from Obote's angle, the 1966 Constitution attempted to achieve a number of things. First, it sought to introduce political stability to a situation of interregnum and social tension generated…by the Kabaka's attempt to illegally acquire arms. Secondly, it was an attempt at autochthony, in other words the indigenization of the constitutional regime seeing that the 1962 instrument was basically an arrangement with Britain, the departing colonial regime. Lastly, it was cast as an effort to forge national unity within a context in which colonialism had produced and encouraged disparate sub-national identities in classic divide and rule fashion."[226]

Clearly, Obote could not have been aware of the consequences that necessarily flowed from his view of the state of affairs and the subsequent steps taken in remedy of what he perceived as an existential threat to the nascent state of "independent" Uganda. He possibly could not have known that his act was essentially the first act of an illegitimate overthrow of an established constitutional order in favor of another. However noble and well-meaning the abrogation of the Constitution of Uganda, 1962 was done, it was the established order; the grounding that held the entire government in place and the legal instrument that granted legitimacy to Obote himself. In contrast to what is popularly held in history, I do not believe that republicanism was born in Uganda through the Constitution of Uganda, 1966 but rather it died its first death by it because it naturally requires more than merely abolishing monarchies and centralizing government to create a republic. We do not judge the historical significance of an event by its present expression but rather by its future ramifications as we shall see soon.

[225]Mamdani &Oloka-Onyango

[226]Prof. J. Oloka-Oyango, Ghosts and the Law: An Inaugural Lecture. (November 12, 2015) at pg. 17

The transition that Obote envisaged, the transition to an independent Uganda with a structure of government purposed at demonstrating a departure from the colonial way was marred in the manner in which it was executed: "the 1966 Constitution marked the departure into exile of Sir Edward Mutesa, first president of an independent Uganda… and it also commenced the transition from a parliamentary system of governance to a presidential regime, buttressed by a framework of military and autocratic central authority which eventually burst at the seams to give birth to Uganda's second Field Marshal, Idi Amin."[227] I contend that it is precisely these seeds that were sown in 1966 that sprouted as weeds in the fresh constitutional gardens created subsequent to these events and choked the living blossoming flowers of democratic order.

The discussion made above is merely a demonstration of the contrasting political attitudes that led up to the suspension of the Constitution of 1962 and the hasty promulgation of the Constitution of 1966. However, that was not the immediate cause of the historical case of Uganda v Commissioner of Prisons, Ex Parte Matovu[228] (hereafter referred to as the Ex Parte Matovu case). The immediate cause of this case is much wider and considering the political and constitutional crisis then simmering in the country; the case was itself inevitable. If it had not been Michael Matovu, some other person perhaps one in a similar position would have brought it to court. Matovu had been a victim of the infamous Emergency Regulations passed in 1966 that applied particularly in Buganda following the declaration of a state of emergency in Buganda in the aftermath of the Kabaka Mutesa II's exile. He was not alone in this; Grace Ibingira and the other ministers that had been previously deported to Karamoja under the Deportation Ordinance[229] had been rearrested under these regulations upon arrival in Buganda. The frightful broadness of these Regulations demonstrated the vast proportions executive power can reach even in the presence of a constitutional order; such lessons were undoubtedly carried forward with a degree of sophistication into post 1986 politics.

By an application of habeas corpus, other critical questions in respect to the existent legal order emerged beginning with the constitutionality of the Emergency Regulations under which Matovu was detained which automatically called into question the validity of the standing Government and the Constitution of 1966 itself. We might have the court that decided the case to thank for its willingness to ignore the technicalities that plagued the initial petition of Matovu and decide the case on its merits considering what was at stake in the circumstances; the denial of one's fundamental rights such as the right to liberty. It was the basis for now much vaunted Article 126(2)(e) of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (as amended).

[227]Ibid at pg. 18
[228] [1967] 1 EA 514
[229]Later pronounced unconstitutional by the East African Court of Appeal in Grace Ibingira v Uganda [1966] EA 445

Chief Justice Udo Udoma was resolute in his pronouncement that the courts could not review the actions of a separate arm of Government; in as far as the actions of Government that called into question its own validity were concerned the courts had not power to determine such a matter. He consigned such concerns to the realm of "Political Questions" best determined by the political branches of Government. The Chief Justice remarked, "any decision by the judiciary as to the legality of the government would be far reaching, disastrous and wrong because the question was a political one to be resolved by the executive and the legislature which were accountable to the Constitution, but a decision on the validity of the Constitution was distinguishable and within the court's competence." Perhaps this determination was reached with a view of preserving the notion of separation of powers and maintaining the independence of the judiciary. Certainly these considerations were in the mind of the court as can be plausibly presumed if any attention is paid to the authorities cited by the court to wit Marbury v Madison[230]. Progressive activists against the excesses or the deficiencies of the executive may at times look at this determination with contempt especially those that wish to employ court process as a spring board to lawful change where legislative change is not forthcoming.[231]

I might be so bold as to say that the court in the Ex Parte Matovu case essentially gave a sitting government a decisive tool to put certain otherwise unconstitutional acts beyond judicial reach. It is true that the court ought not to engage in politics but as Prof. Joe Oloka-Onyango labors to demonstrate, in matters when the subject of a case extends beyond the immediate concerns of the aggrieved party into the public domain then public perceptions and common politics is bound to follow case into the courtroom. He explains that, "in cases of public interest litigation politics is never far away from the judges' chambers. Consequently, it is not only the parties immediately concerned with the petition who watch keenly for the gains and losses that may result from a court ruling. Such matters will invariably become the concern of the broader public. Because the issues in public interest litigation have typically been the subject of intense social, cultural, or political contestation in other arenas before they reached court, it is simply unrealistic to expect them to have been shorn of these dynamics once they arrive at the Bench."[232]

---

[230] 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803)

[231] One of the most pronounced manifestations of the Political Question Doctrine in present times appeared in the matter between Centre for Health Human Rights & Development (CEHURD) & 3 others against the Attorney General Constitutional Petition No.16 of 2011 that concerned government responsibility to provide adequate maternal health care services in public health facilities. The Constitutional Court, while invoking the Political Question Doctrine, resolved that such determination could not be made in the circumstances as this was the preserve the executive

[232] J. Oloka-Oyango, When Courts Do Politics: Public Interest Law and Litigation in East Africa (Cambridge Scholars

All this considered, it would be an abdication of duty on the courts' part if a matter firmly within the public conscience possessing some degree of political denotations were dismissed for being too political to be dealt with by the courts especially so if such matters have a significant bearing on the fundamental rights of a citizen. Yet this is not the contemporary position of court; politics is sacred ground upon which no judicial foot must tread. The Political Question Doctrine is certainly the theoretical underpinning of this understanding and it only stands to reason to know that such a restrained posture of court leaves glaring vacuums certainly to be occupied by the innate authoritarianism of the executive.[233] In contemporary times I would say that, in as far as the enforcement of human rights and the preservation of the Rule of Law is concerned, it has become necessary for the courts to depart from their traditional role of interpretation into the domain of public policy so as to bring law to bear upon the excesses of the executive that manifest themselves as policy issues with the legal cover of the Political Question Doctrine.

Certainly, the Ex Parte Matovu case had its other side which side as negatively haunted Uganda's road of democratic rule and whose remedy has yet to be found either in reason or in law; the Hans Kelsen theory of change of government. We can certainly credit the Constitution of 1995 with its ingenuity in attempting to exorcise the specter of the Kelsenian theory of change of government and legal revolution; change in the basic norm.[234]

"Change of the Basic Norm: It is just the phenomenon of revolution which clearly shows the significance of the Basic Norm. Suppose that a group of individuals attempt to seize power by force, in order to remove the legitimate government in a hitherto monarchic state, and to introduce a republican form of government. If they succeed, if the old order ceases, and the new order begins to be efficacious, because the individuals whose behavior the new order regulates actually behave, by and large, in conformity with the new order, then this order is considered as a valid order. It is now according to this new order that the actual behavior of individuals is interpreted as legal or illegal. But this means that a new basic norm is presupposed. It is no longer the norm according to which the old monarchical constitution is valid, but a norm according to which the new republican Publishing, 2017) See Introduction

[233]This would be later seen in the final years of the Obote I regime and all other regimes that followed subsequent to it until 1986 with the assumption of power of the National Resistance Movement. During this period, the line that had been drawn so far behind, the line of no jurisdiction of the courts was pushed even further behind such that by the end of the Idi Amin regime in 1979 the courts could hardly be said to be an equal branch of government. In Omwony Ojwok, Frederick Ssempebwa & 8 others Constitutional case no.1 of 1979 the court declined to rule that the action of the National Consultative Council (NCC) in removing the then President Yusuf Kironde Lule had in fact been unconstitutional. This state of affairs was aptly covered by Prof. Oloka-Oyango in his inaugural lecture entitled Ghosts and the Law (cited above) at pgs. 28-29 when he observed that, "Via the ghost of ex parte Matovu, executive power reigned supreme as did the notion that a violent takeover of government would be considered legally valid. Such was the view of the courts well into the early years of the National Resistance Army/Movement government." constitution is valid, a norm endowing the revolutionary government with legal authority. If the revolutionaries fail, if the order they have tried to establish remains inefficacious, then, on the other hand, their undertaking is interpreted, not as a legal, a law-creating act, as the establishment of a constitution, but as an illegal act, as the crime of treason, and this according to the old monarchic constitution and its specific basic norm"[235]A more influential and sacred paragraph was never written in respect to the notion of political change and legal transformation in Uganda.

[234] Article 3 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (as amended) that outlaws any attempt to take government by force of arms thereby likening revolutionary action to treason against the people of Uganda

The fact that the court in the Ex Parte Matovu case adopted this theory as one applicable to Uganda is very surprising indeed. The Kelsenian theory of legal change assumes two fundamental changes to the "grundnorm"; changes to the written basic norm or constitution and changes to the customs of the society to which it applies. The point of the former is that the efficacy of the revolutionary constitution is proven and concretized the moment that constitution begins to become the foundation of the new laws of the State: the point of the latter is made when the society itself changes its customs to accord with the new basic norm.[236] It is certainly true that a new order cannot logically be held to be bound by the old norms but if the idea that social conduct must comport with this new order is to be thoroughly adopted then further considerations must be made.

The first assumption that Kelsen makes is that this socio-political change termed a revolution ushers in a new set of norms: the precise general assertion of the character of law under the Pure Theory of Law is that law is necessarily coercive in nature; laws are "coercive orders of human behaviour. They command a certain human behaviour by attaching a coercive act to the opposite behaviour"[237]If we go by this notion of coercive orders fronted by Kelsen himself, certain human behaviour including resistance to this order would naturally be met by sanction from the revolutionary government. The theory then turns from being one of a democratic order i.e. a transition from a monarchical system to a republic to being one potentially despotic in character and considering the trend of African politics from the immediate post-colonial epoch to the modern day.

If we consider 1966-67 events in Uganda, then the so called "Obote revolution" provided evidence to this assertion. If we say that the election in 1962 founded the democratic order under the Constitution of 1962; if we say then that Kabaka Muteesa II, by virtue of his alliance with the Uganda People's Congress, received the popular mandate of the people then we might be justified in saying that the events of 1966 where the illegitimate contradiction of those of 1962 and the Constitution of 1966 was the subversion of that of 1962. I mention this because it is only sensible and just that a democratic order be ousted in a democratic process, the democratic process in this case being either a plebiscite or an election itself, then taking Muteesa II as democratic president whether he had executive power or not, it would have been pure treason to contest his position by force of arms and the resulting order would be nothing but a despotism. One constitutional order cannot overthrow another without bringing its own legitimacy into question if they both arose out of the same basic norm. It must be noted that even after Kabaka Muteesa II was exiled, the Constitution of 1962 was not entirely done away with; the Prime Minister turned executive President Apollo Milton Obote elected to preserve it with the amendments he had effected, that is, the merger of the offices of Prime Minister and President. By his own confession he said,

[235] H. Kelsen, General Theory of Law and State (1st edn, Routledge 2005) 437
[236] See J.W. Harris, 'When and Why Does the Grundnorm Change?' (1971) Cambridge Law Journal, 29(1), 103 at pg. 117-118
[237] H. Kelsen, Pure Theory of Law (The Lawbook Exchange Ltd, 2005) 33

"There was no constitutional way out, so on February 24, 1966 I called the press and suspended the constitution and hence the posts of president and vice president. On April 15, 1966, I introduced the 1966 constitution in parliament whose only difference from the 1962 constitution was to merge the office of the prime minister with that of the president."[238]

If we go by the Hans Kelsen theory of legal change and change of government which the court in Ex Parte Matovu asserted applied in the circumstances then by implication, in failing to do away completely with the old legal order[239], the grundnorm, the Obote Government of 1966 remained subject to it and bound by its terms so in essence he committed treason against the Government. If we pursue the Kelsenian theory to its letter, then we can say in a certain fashion that customs of the people fashioned after the basic norm and their adherence to that basic norm that was the Constitution of 1962 had not altered in any fundamental respect so no legal revolution occurred in the circumstances.

If we turn to consider in further detail the essential nature of the Kelsenian theory of the change of government and of law, then we might find ourselves staring at despicable creature of contemporary despotism. The Ugandan experience of 1966-67 is one of many such examples but if we step further into the history of Uganda the year of 1966 loses its unique character and becomes something of a commonality. When we speak about the consent of the people we must mean the unequivocal consent of the people best expressed by the concept of universal suffrage not a mere acquiescence of the people. The general 'might makes right' underpinnings of the Kelsenian theory of change of law inhibits in the most drastic manner the free expression of the people. If a revolutionary band of rebels happens to take power, naturally their principle aim must be, irrespective of their agenda, the consolidation of their power and in pursuit of this aim will stifle any emerging voices of dissent. If the consent of the people is coerced and their behaviour altered to meet the new constitutional norm, how then can claim that the new constitutional order was met with the blessing of the people? What would otherwise be a constitutional regime becomes one of unprecedented tyranny. The Bolshevik story is one such example: the strangulation of the political life of the masses that Rosa Luxemburg criticized in her pamphlet titled The Russian Revolution, 1918 came as a necessary result of the immediate tasks of consolidation of power by the nascent Bolshevik Government in spite of their most seemingly noble objectives.

[238] Uganda People's Congress, 'Milton Obote: Telling his own Lifetime Story,' (Victor Karamagi, Daily Monitor, October 24, 2005) as referenced in Prof. J. Oloka-Oyango, Ghosts and the Law: An Inaugural Lecture. (November 12, 2015) at pg. 18

[239] Prof. George Kanyeihamba remarked on this point mentioned, "Analyzing the events of that period and the provisions of the 1966 Constitution, the Independence Constitution of 1962 was neither suspended nor abolished. What happened was that only those part which dealt with executive powers and Head of Government were altered in order to merge the post of President with that of Prime Minister and create an Executive President." G.W. Kanyeihamba, Constitutional and Political History of Uganda: From 1894 to Present (2nd edn LawAfrica Publishing Ltd 2002) 90

THE DOSSO CASE

The Attorney General relied on the authority of Hans Kelsen, in particular his General Theory of Law and State, and a Pakistan case, State v. Dosso.[240]

In Dosso, the Pakistani Supreme Court faced a de facto coup by the President and the armed forces. It relied on Kelsen to characterize the President annulling the constitution and enforcing martial law as an "abrupt political change" not foreseen by that constitution. Since this fit Kelsen's criteria for a successful revolution, the new military regime's laws were legitimate.

Borrowing heavily from the Dosso judgement, the Attorney General proposed four "cardinal requirements" to establish the legitimacy of Obote's regime and the 1966 Constitution. There must be) an abrupt political change (i.e., coup d'état), (ii) not contemplated in the old legal order, that then (iii) destroys the old legal order. The new Constitution and its laws must also (iv) be effective. The Attorney General cited Obote's successful coup and new Constitution passed by members of the National Assembly as evidence fulfilling the four requirements. The judges found his evidence "irresistible and unassailable" and upheld the 1966 Constitution as legally valid.

KELSEN'S GENERAL THEORY OF LAW AND STATE

Only after this decision did the Court justify itself based on two passages in Kelsen's General Theory of Law and State.

First, his "principle of legitimacy" holds that legal norms remain valid so long as they are not invalidated in some way the legal order itself provides. Thus validity depends on conforming to the hierarchy of norms in a legal order.

The exception, however, is after a revolution, when "the legal order of a community is nullified and replaced by a new order in an illegitimate way, that is, in a way not prescribed by the first order itself.[241] Kelsen defines revolution broadly to include anything from a coup d'état to a complete overthrow of state institutions so long as "the order in force is overthrown and replaced by a new order in a way which the former had not itself anticipated."[242] All norms of the old order are no longer valid since the new order is now the ultimate source of validity. While the content of the norms appears unchanged, from a juristic point of view they are now only valid if properly created by the new legal order. Obote's coup, the Court decided, was just such an illegitimate and unforeseen end to the 1962 Constitution.

[240]State v. Dosso (1958),2P.S.C.R.180(Pak.S.C.) [Dosso]

Second, Kelsen's "principle of effectiveness" states that a legal order's validity depends on the social facts of whether, "individuals whose behaviour the new order regulates actually behave, by and large, in conformity with the new order". If people are generally obedient, then the new order is a valid one. A system's validity is thus somehow dependent on its effectiveness. For Kelsen, people's actual behaviour is only legally normative once a new order exists. But the basic norm of this order can only be presumed once the order is shown to be effective. This tension between social fact and legal normativity lies at the heart of Kelsen's theory, For the High Court, however, effectiveness was a simple empirical inquiry.

The Court also considered a third passage discussing international law. Kelsen reiterates that "a national legal order begins to be valid as soon as it has become-on the whole-efficacious; and it ceases to be valid as soon as it loses this efficacy.[243]" Thus the Court, in a somewhat simplified way, stated: "The government brought into permanent power by a revolution or coup d'état is, according to international law, the legitimate government of the State, whose identity is not affected by these events." However, this thesis will leave it aside this international law aspect since the focus in on national and local legal orders: see Hans Kelsen, General Theory of Law and State, trans. Anders Wedberg (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1945) at 117-18,200 & 220. satisfied by evidence proving (presumably on a balance of probabilities though they never say) adherence to the 1966 Constitution and its laws. The only evidence the Attorney-General submitted were a "large number" of affidavits of which the Court mentions only eight, all of which were sworn by members of the executive-the very men would led Obote's coup. The judges accepted the affidavits and concluded in a single paragraph of analysis that the 1966 Constitution was "efficacious" since: the new Constitution has been accepted by the people of Uganda and that it has been firmly established throughout the country, the changes introduced therein having been implemented without opposition, as there is not before us any evidence to the contrary.[244]

[241] The Court also considered a third passage discussing international law. Kelsen reiterates that "anationallegalorder beginsto be valid as soon as it has become-on thewhole-efficacious; andit ceases Tobe valid as soon as it loses this efficacy."Thus the Court, in a some whats implified way, stated:"The government brought into permanent power by evolution or coup d'etatis, according to international law, the legitimate government of the State, whose identity is not affected by these events. "However, this thesis will leave it aside this international law aspect since the focus in on national and local legal orders: seeHans Kelsen, General Theory of Law and State, trans. Anders Wedberg (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard UniversityPress, 1945) at117-18,200&220

[242] Id.

[243] Id.

Here the Court accepted the affidavits as truth, even when a civil war raged in Buganda and elsewhere. This deference is evident throughout their decision in Matovu. Responding to a challenge that many states did not recognize Obote's government, for example, the Court pointed to an affidavit to the contrary by Mr. Bigirwenkya, Permanent Secretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Court's clearest statement of Kelsenian ideology came in its conclusion. On the issue of their powers of adjudication, the judges wrote:

Courts, legislatures and the law derive their origins from the constitution, and therefore the constitution cannot derive its origin from them, because these can be no law unless there is already a state whose law it is, and there can be no state without a constitution.[245]

All legal authority was derived from the Constitution. Moreover, the legal system predicated upon a state, and vice versa. For the Court, no law could exist without a state, and no state could exist without a constitution. Thus they concluded that the Detention Act was validly enacted under the 1966 Constitution. Matovu would not be released, but the government had to provide him with reasons for his detention.

LEGITIMIZATION OF THE KELSEN THEORY IN UGANDA

In 1966, the High Court of Uganda legitimised the new nation's first coup d'état. After two decades of civil war, Ugandans enacted their first popular constitution in 1995. However, the judiciary's dominant positivist ideology, still looms over the legal order.

With colonization came laws written, administered and adjudicated by Europeans. British administrators copied English laws whole and imported their common law. Along with innumerable provisions and principles of English justice, colonial officers and judges brought with them those laws' tradition of Benthamite and Austinian legal positivism. Nor did Ghana's independence in 1957-the first for a British colony in sub- Saharan Africa-launch a judicial "revolution" that condemned this legal philosophy to a phantom presence in old colonial law reports. Surprisingly, expatriate and newly appointed African judges became even more "positivist" that their European brethren. In Uganda, this thesis argues, the judiciary's uncritical application of legal positivism in the distinct context of this African state has ossified into an ideology that continues to burden substantive justice for most Ugandans.

[244] This journal's history chronicles the decline oflegal academia in east Africa. Its physical quality deteriorates over ten years from its first publication by the University of East Africa, Dar es Salaam, in 1968. The thick, type-set first edition, bound in bright green, gradually ends up as a thin, photocopied collection from a hastily type-written original. Volume 11 covered 1978-81 and then only three more volumes came out until it finally ended in 1990

[245] This journal's history chronicles the decline oflegal academia in east Africa. Its physical quality deteriorates over ten years from its first publication by the University of East Africa, Dar es Salaam, in 1968. The thick, type-set first edition, bound in bright green, gradually ends up as a thin, photocopied collection from a hastily type-written original. Volume 11 covered 1978-81 and then only three more volumes came out until it finally ended in 1990

REVOLUTION DOCTRINE: MORE EXECUTIVE MINDED THAN THE EXECUTIVE

Despite an imperfect grasp of Kelsen's finer details, the three judges in Matovu's Case accepted Kelsen's structure of state law and the principles of legitimacy and effectiveness. Two critics of the Matovu decision in Uganda were sympathetic to its reasoning, if not its conclusion.

The eight affidavits were by the (i) Cabinet Secretary, (ii) Attorney-General (Binaisa), (iii) Inspector General of Police, (iv) Permanent Secretary (P-S) to the Ministry of Public Service, (v) Quartermaster- General of the Uganda Armed Forces, (vi) P-S, Ministry of Defence, (vii) P-S, Ministry of Foreign Affairs and (viii) P-S, Ministry of Regional Administrations:

Martin wrote in the Eastern Africa Law Review that the Chief Justice, "while accepting the political realities, was still attempting to express his loyalty to the general ethos of constitutionality."[246] He noted, however, that the outcome was never in doubt because Udoma C.J. had taken the Oath of Allegiance and the Judicial Oath, administered by the self-proclaimed President at Parliament on 15 April 1966, well before the Matovu decision.[247] Moreover, the common law has no principle of "constitutional fact", as in American jurisprudence, so it's unclear how the Court made the key factual finding based on a few affidavits that "the people" of Uganda obey the new constitution.[248]

The second critic, Yash Ghai, had little sympathy for what he saw as judicial subservience to the executive's reasons to detain individuals in emergency situations. He concluded that,

"What is most disturbing about the judgment is not necessarily the actual decision, but its general tenor, which is, to quote Lord Atkin, 'more executive minded than executive'."[249]

Matovu quickly diffused through African Jurisprudence. It is useful to consider how judges and commentators reacted to Kelsen in the High Court of Uganda. Matovu was first invoked to legitimize the Unilateral Declaration of Indepedence (U.D.I) In Rhodesia[250] the sheer volume of academic commentary on the U.D.I cases is staggering[251]

While similar to Obote's bloodless coup, the Smith regime had also cut its colonial ties to the Westminster Parliament in London. The first cases rejected the new

This journal's history chronicles the decline of legal academia in east Africa. Its physical quality deteriorates over ten years from its first publication by the University of East Africa, Dar es Salaam, in 1968. The thick, type-set first edition, bound in bright green, gradually ends up as a thin, photocopied collection from a hastily type-written original. Volume 11 covered 1978-81 and then only three more volumes came out until it finally ended in 1990.

[246]R.B. Martin,"In the Matter of an Application by Michael Matovu"(1968)1*Eastern Africa L. Rev.*61at 66-7
[247] Id. at 63
[248] Id. at 63
[249] Ghai 1968, supra at 75.
[250] Mad:;jmbamuto v. Lardner-Burkc N.O., [1966) R.L.R. 756 (Rhod. Gen. Div.)
[251] [Mad: jmbamuto 1966);

On appeal to the High Court, Chief Justice Beadle accepted Kelsen, but found Smith's regime had de facto, not de jure, authority because its effectiveness was in doubt- thus it hovered somewhere between the old and new basic norms.[252] Fieldsend A.J .A. rejected the legal-political question distinction to hold the new regime illegitimate on the public policy ground that "nothing can encourage instability more" than for coup plotters to know that they can rely on the judiciary's support.[253] But the High Court Appellate Division in R. v. Ndhlovu overturned this line of reasoning. The Court recalled the "political question" doctrine to limit itself to deciding legal, but not political, questions.[254] Relying on Kelsen again, the Court ruled that the Smith regime's constitution was valid and legitimate.

Most critics accepted the Kelsenian analysis as authoritative even if they disagreed with the judges' application.[255] This also assumed that the judiciary should limit itself to legal, and not political, questions. Some like De Smith, however, rejected this interpretation because judges were key political players in the Rhodesia coup.[256] Kelsen's principles of legitimacy and effectiveness, he argued, simply mask political calculations under jurisprudential authority.[257] In her realist critique, Palley said the cases were determined by the judges' positivist ideology.[258] Dias agreed, suggesting that "positivist judges can always take refuge behind the threadbare adage that courts are not concerned with morals."[259] These three dissenting critics all argued along different lines that Kelsen's so-called general theory had little application in Rhodesia judges and leaders lived, worked and played in a tight-knit community isolated from the rural, African population unmentioned in any court case.

Two other cases in Nigeria and Ghana illustrate that the dominant view of the Rhodesian cases was also common in other so-called revolution jurisprudence in Africa. An aborted putsch by young [252]The following Articles are only arepresentativesampleof the many commentaries on the Rhodesian cases in the five years after U.D.I. Interestingly, no academic Articles deal with Matovu at length other than the two by Martin and Ghai: see*e.g.*S.A. deSmith,"Southern RhodesiaAct1965"(1966)29Mod.

---

L.Rev.301; Claire Palley,"The Judicial Process: U.D.I. and the Southern RhodesianJudiciary"(1967) 30 Mod.L.Rev.263; R.W.M. Dias,"Legal Politics: Norms Behind the Grundnoml'(1968)26 CambridgeL.J.233; H.H. Marshall,"The Legal EffectsofU.D.I.(BasedonMadzimbamutov.Lardner-Burke"(1968)17I.C.L.Q.1022; F.M. Brookfield,"The Courts, Kelsen, and the Rhodesian Revolution" (1969) 19U.T.LJ.326; J.M. Eekelaar,"Rhodesia: The Abdication of Constitutionalism"(1969)32Mod.
L.Rev.19; J.M. Finnis,"Revolutions and ContinuityinLaw"inA.W.B. Simpson, ed., Oxford Emrysin Jurisprudence: Second Series (Oxford:

[253] M ad mbamuto 1966b, supra note 50 (The Mad mbamuto decision was given on 10 September 1966, while the Matovu began a month later. Martin believed it was likely that the Ugandan judges had read the Rhodesian case and consciously applied the reasoning of Justice Lewis: see Martin, mpra note 46 at 64).

[254] Madi Jmbamuto 1968, supra note 50 at para. 351-52.

[255] Id. at 430 (Frustrated at his fellow judges' support for the Smith regime, Fieldsend A.J.A. resigned in March 1968: Eekelaar, supra note at 20).

[256]Ndhlovu, supra.

[257] See e.g. Brookfield, supra note 51 at 330-39 & 351-52.

[258]DeSmith, *supra note*51at94.

[259] Id. at 102-03.

army officers against the Nigerian federal government in 1966 set off events culminating in the Nigerian Civil War. Most of the elected government was killed and the surviving members handed over power to the commander of the federal army. Six months later another coup, this one a success, replaced the leader of the military regime in control.[260] When this regime tried to oust judicial oversight over its special tribunals, the issue came before the Supreme Court in Lakanmi v. Attorney-General[261] The advocate for the federal military government advanced the Kelsenian arguments that the first coup was a revolution, and thus its Decrees were the ultimate sources of law. The Court approved Dosso and Matovu, but rejected the Nigerian case by noting it was not an "abrupt political change" since the civilian government had handed over power willingly. Thus the basic norm was still legitimate and the tribunals were prohibited by the 1963 Constitution.

In 1966, the same year as the Nigerian coups, the military overthrew Ghana's first civilian government. When civilian rule was restored three years later, the new constitution contained a transitional provision that let the government terminate all state offices established during military-rule.[262]

The new government had fired Mr. Sallah, a manager at a government-owned company, who was appointed in 1967 by powers conferred in a 1964 act. Sallah challenged his dismissal by arguing the original constitution was still valid in an appeal to the Supreme Court. Following Binaisa's argument in Matovu, the Attorney General argued that the 1966 coup was a Kelsenian revolution, in which case the transition provision allowed Sallah's fling. In the Supreme Court, a majority of judges rejected Kelsen as an authority since, as Justice Sowah said, they would "not derive much assistance from the foreign theories." In his concurring opinion, Justice Archer wrote:

What was the Basic Norm? Was it the proclamation [by the coup leaders]? It was not so because it was not a constitution. How then do we trace the Basic Norm? Is the Basic Norm the people of Ghana who supported the armed forces and police or is the Basic Norm to be detected from the armoured cars at Burma Camp?[263]

The majority did not accept that soldiers could capture the executive and thus wipe out the old constitution by decree. Justice Archer's derisory rhetoric aside, it is clear that he was sceptical of ever finding Kelsen’s elusive norm in putsch-ridden Ghana. Thus a majority dismissed the Attorney General's Kelsenian gambit and upheld Sallah's claim.[264]

Academic interest in coups d’état and other lesser revolutions waned as cynicism set in after the [260] Palley, supra note at 284.

[261] Dias, supra note at 257.
[262] Id. at 253.
[263] Tayyab Mahmud, 'jurisprudence of Successful Treason: Coup d'Etat & Common Law" (1994) Cornell Int'l LJ 49 at 69, fn 123.
[264] (1971] u. Ife L.R. 201 (Nig. s.q.

rise of dictators and one-party states at the expense of an independent judiciary.[265] Some critics supported the Kelsenian doctrine as a valid theory, but not how it was applied by particular courts.[266] Hassan limited it to popular revolutions since it seemed a coup removing the head of state had no impact on the vast majority of the state.[267] The realist critique has also returned in the "implicit bargain theory" that judges enter into a tacit bargain with (military) coup leaders to protect their posts and its privilege in exchange for legitimacy and legal continuity.[268]

Only Tayyab Mahmud challenged Kelsen's applicability to contexts outside Europe.[269] Kelsenian revolutions, he argued, assume the "historical experience of Western Europe and colonial settler states. These include a substantial measure of ethnic unity, linguistic uniformity, cultural homogeneity, political stability, and representative governance."[270]

This is critical to understand why Kelsen's refusal to distinguish between a mass social upheaval and a coup d'état, which he treated as the same from a judicial perspective, was especially troublesome in African states.

Mahmud outlined four socio-political facts that distinguish developed from developing contexts.[271] First, territorial boundaries, especially in Africa, were arbitrarily mapped over existing linguistic, ethnic, religious and other settlement patterns. Second, the defining characteristic of the non-western state is its underdeveloped capitalist economy, which includes (urban) "pockets of prosperity" in a sea of (rural) poverty. Third, state structures are overdeveloped relative to civil society, especially coercive instruments like the military or police. Fourth, a linguistic or ethnic minority often dominates the state despite nominal elections.

"Revolutions" in Africa were unique mainly because coup leaders merely sought to oust the current leader without any more changes.[272]

Most critics, however, accepted Kelsen as an authority on revolution. They accepted that the principles of legitimacy and effectiveness were a legal test that could be applied without judges engaging in a political question. A few commentators questioned this dominant positivist view, whether from realist or moral positions. How does a basic norm explain an obligation to conform to

---

[265] Constitution o/the Republic o/Ghana, 1969, s. 9(1).
[266] Sa/lab v Attornry-General, [1970] C.C.55(GhanaS.C.); see also S.K. Date Bah,'jurisprudence's Day in Court in Ghana"(1971)20I.C.L.Q.315.
[267] Id.[emphasisinoriginal].
[268] Hatchard, John & Tunde I. Ogowewo. Tackling the Unconstitutional Overthrow of Democracies: Emerging Trends in the Commonwealth (London: Commonwealth Secretariat, 2003) at 14 & 17 (Ogowewo is wrong, however, in believing he was the first to notice this implicit bargain. Farooq Hassan argued this very point in his seminal 1984 Article on coups d'etat in Commonwealth jurisdictions:).
[269] Mahmud, supra.
[270] Ibid.
[271] Ibid
[272] Ibid.

constitutional laws when most of the population is outside the reach of those laws? In the words of Dias, "What of the Africans?"[273] Before examining "that niggling moral question" that positivist judges ignored (Section 3), however, we must first outline those positivist presumptions that sustain Kelsen's general theory.

UNMASKING LEGAL POSITIVISIM AS AN EXECUTIVE POLITICAL THEORY

In his General Theory State and Law, Kelsen sets out "to enable the jurist concerned with a particular legal order to understand and to describe as exactly as possible his own positive law," consisting of a system of "positive legal norms."[274] He sees his project as descriptive and scientific since it is restricted to understanding the relation between legal norms related to social facts and distinct from the moral intentions of lawmakers, citizens and others. "Law" is a system of rules governing human behaviour synonymous with neither a fundamental moral order, nor a reductionist (scientific) perspective.[275] Given this general definition, Kelsen's theory is applicable in every society, regardless of its historical, social or political particularities. In his later work, Pure Theory Law, he makes this universal ambition explicit in describing the common features of all legal systems.[276]

A collection of legal norms form a legal order if two conditions hold.[277] First, if norm A directly or indirectly authorizes the creation of another norm, B, then A and B belong in the same legal order. Second, all norms in a legal order are authorized by one norm. Thus no norm can be part of two legal systems. If two norms exist neither of which authorizes the creation of the other, then they are not in the same system. These norms are positive in the sense that they are "created and annulled by acts of human beings".[278] From these two simple axioms and their corollaries, one can identify even very complex legal systems. Each system is thus necessarily hierarchical and linked, in Raz's words, by a chain of validity. The condition for a norm's existence is its validity. A norm is a valid legal norm if created by a definite rule found in another (valid) norm.[279] For Kelsen, norms are also "ought" statements that prescribe (or posit, hence positivism) a course of action. Norms are derived from human conduct, or rather are interpreted as such by people. By observing drivers consistently stopping at a red light, one might interpret this as a legal norm. People stop at red lights, therefore people ought to stop at red lights. But Kelsen rejects this move since he holds fast to Burne's

[273] Dias, supra.
[274] Kelsen,
[275] Id
[276]Hans Kelsen, Pure Theory of Law, trans. By Max Knight (Berkeley: University of California Press,1967).
[277] JosephRaz, The Authoriry of Law: Essays on Law and Moraliry (Oxford: Clarendon Press,1979) at 123.
[278] Kelsen, supra.
[279] Id.

scepticism over whether an "ought" can be derived from an "is".[280] This is not a simple matter of doubting whether one can derive a moral conclusion from a factual premise. Rather, Hume questioned how descriptive (empirical) claims could entail prescriptive (normative) claims. Kelsen's story so far is in trouble since all norms in a legal system are "ought" statements, and thus he cannot derive their normative force by a descriptive appeal to the "is" of social facts.

Kelsen escapes this dilemma by a transcendental move. Since all norms are a system are derived from a single norm, he presupposes this norm since it alone can account for the normative "oughtness" of all other norms in a legal system. This basic norm (Grundnorm) is at the pinnacle of the legal order and directly or indirectly validates all other norms. If a norm is created by an act of will, as Kelsen argues, then each norm is valid only if a higher legal norm authorizes its creation. We continue climbing this chain of validity until a norm(s) is reached that has no explicit norm authorizing its creation. It is here that Kelsen introduces a presupposed basic norm as the source of normativity "beyond which one cannot look for a more ultimate norm."[281] Kelsen's legal system thus derives its normative character by presupposing the basic norm. Moreover, the basic norm provides for the unity of the legal system.

The basic norm is of a different quality than all other norms in a legal system. It is transcendental in character since it is derived from what Kelsen takes as a given social fact, namely the normative legal system described above. The basic norm is the only non-positive law in a legal system because it is not posited by human action (i.e. a validly enacted norm). Since this system's normativity is only explicable by a single and ultimate norm, the basic norm is a logical necessity. Thus Kelsen's theory is distinct from other positivist accounts since it rejects grounding the normativity of posited laws in social facts alone. Kelsen's move, moreover, is open to attacks on the accuracy of his underlying description of a legal system.

In practical terms, Kelsen traces the basic norm back to the constitution and then all previous constitutions until we come to a "historically" first constitution. "The validity of this first constitution," Kelsen argues, "is the last presupposition, the final postulate, upon which the validity of all the norms of our legal order depends."[282] This historical trek up the chain of validity to the basic norm of the legal system illustrates the temporal aspect of Kelsen's theory. A legal order occupies a certain normative space in a society, but it is also organic in the sense of growing or shrinking through time as lower order norms are created or extinguished. The identity of the legal order is constant through these changes since its basic norm remains unchanged.

---

[280] Id see also Hume, David. A Treatise of Human Nature (Bristol: Thoemmes Press, 2001) at Book III, part I, section I.
[281] Id.
[282] Id

By associating the basic norm with a single constitution, Kelsen sees a State as inextricably bound up in a legal system.[283] Here the "State" has a specific meaning when seen from a "juristic point of view": it is "the community created by a national (as opposed to international) legal order."[284] Thus one must identify a State by first identifying its legal system. Conversely, a legal system logically entails a State-no legal system is Stateless. Thus a legal system's laws are valid over the entire territory of the State since validity is a logical fact derived from a law's proper enactment by higher laws. Kelsen acknowledges, however, that some individual laws may be more or less effective in particular points within the State. Effectiveness, unlike validity, is a social fact and capable of degrees of satisfaction. In a sense, Kelsen's legal theory is also a political theory of the State.[285]

We are now better placed to reconsider the two short passages of Kelsen's General Theory cited by the High Court in Matovu. The fate of a legal system during a revolution is ultimately a question of what happens to the basic norm. Kelsen uses revolution' in a broad sense, anything from a radical social upheaval to coups d'état, because his concern is with the process by which a group seizes control of a State. "From a juristic point of view," Kelsen says, "the decisive criterion of a revolution is that the order in force is overthrown and replaced by a new order in a way which the former had not itself anticipated."[286] If the coup succeeds, the norms of the old legal order are no longer valid by the principle of legitimacy since it was violated by the coup. A coup that creates a new efficacious order entails a new basic norm. Otherwise the principle of legitimacy is violated because a new norm (the new regime's constitution or legal notice) not authorized by the old basic norm now claims to authorize all valid laws.

Kelsen explains a revolution's negation of the old basic norm by appealing to social facts in the principle of effectiveness. He argues, "[e]very single norm loses its validity when the total legal order to which it belongs loses its efficacy as a whole. The efficacy of the entire legal order is a necessary condition for the validity of every single norm of the order."[287] Given Kelsen's transcendental argument for the basic norm, it becomes clear why he thinks a new basic norm must be presupposed. Legal norms are valid only when -but not because they are effective. A legal system is valid since its norms were enacted in an authorized way.

Working up this chain of validity, as we have seen, leads to one or more positive laws that are not [283] I will capitalize "State" throughout this book when referring to Kelsen's particular concept of the state in his Genera/Theory: id.

[284] Id
[285] See especially Lars Vinx, Hans Kelsen's Pure Theory of Law: Legality and Legitimag (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007) at 15-24. 120
[286] Kelsen,
[287] Id.

authorized by any higher norm. Here Kelsen made his transcendental leap to the basic norm. Thus the efficacy of a legal order is the social condition that permits one to posit legal norms whose normative validity presupposes a transcendental norm. As Kelsen puts it, "[t)he basic norm of any positive legal order confers legal authority only upon facts by which an order is created and applied which is on the whole effective."[288] ("On the whole effective" concedes that not everyone must obey the new laws.) A new legal order is only created after people behave as though it existed. Only then, when we can presume a new basic norm for this order, can we determine the criteria of validity for the norms in the new order. The principle of effectiveness thus restricts the principle of legitimacy.

This explanation of normative discontinuity is unsatisfactory for a few reasons, any account deriving normativity (however indirectly) from social facts must explain at what point a custom or habit becomes a social rule. Kelsen's answer is especially worrisome since he provides no test to measure the efficacy of legal norms. Deviation from the rule is not a problem, H.L.A. Hart notes, so long as most people's behaviour conforms to the rule and the deviants are criticized.[289] Raz also observes that no attempts to compute the number or ratio or percentage of disobeyers of a rule will ever "make much sense".[290] Some critics point to these concessions as proof that effectiveness, as a binary concept, is incoherent.[291] However this mischaracterizes the ideas of rules and rule-following employed. Inspired by his reading of Wittgenstein's Philosophical Investigations, Hart dismisses this critique as wrongheaded. For him, it "need not worry us more than the question as to the number of hairs a man may have and still be bald."[292] His seemingly casual dismissal sounds similar to the phrases Wittgenstein employed in his Philosophical Investigations when trying to focus the reader's attention on what really mattered: the use of language.[293]

If Hart's justification of efficiency can bolster Kelsen's theory, it is necessary to briefly digress to consider Wittgenstein's particular task in Philosophical Investigations. [294]Rule-following relates to a number of concepts Wittgenstein works with to disabuse us of apparent paradoxes created by our own misuse of language. The public language of social life, or "grammar", enables the very practice of rule-following. Grammar in turn presumes that " the speaking of language is part of an

[288] Id.
[289] H.L.A Hart, The Concept of Law, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961) at 55-6.
[290] Joseph Raz, The Concept of a Legal System: An Introduction to the Theory of Legal System, 2d ed. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1980) at 203.
[291] See e.g. H. Patrick Glenn, "Doin' the Transsystemic: Legal Systems and Legal Traditions" (2005) SO
[292] Hart, supra note 91 at 56.
[293] Hart, supra note 91 at 56.
[294] See generally G.P. Baker & P.M.S. Hacker, Wittgenstein: Rules, Grammar and Necessity, Volume 2 of an Analytical Commentary on the Philosophical Investigations (Oxford: Blackwell, 1985).

activity, or of a form of life".[295] Thus "a form of life" is the bedrock upon which language flows; it is presumed and self evident, but visible only in its effects on grammar-much like a rock lodged in a riverbed is only visible by the ripple on the surface it moulds from below.

The difficult question, which this book will pose and leave unanswered, is whether a form of life is unique to a community, language-group, nation, etc., or human beings as a species? Wittgenstein writes that a form of life is "the common behavior of mankind," which is "the system of reference by means of which we interpret an unknown language".[296] If laws are normative rules, as Kelsen and Hart suppose, we must be alive to the possibility that rule-following might depend on a form of life unique to a particular community, language-group, nation, etc. Moreover, two forms of life might lead to very different rule-following behaviour. Individuals from either form may find each other's behaviour unintelligible as rules in their understanding of the activity. This relativist reading of rules thus challenges the bond between a legal system and a state presumed by Kelsen and to a lesser extent Hart.

The continuity of a legal system through a revolutionary overthrow of governments brings out this tension. Kelsen claims that the "State and its legal order remain the same only as long as the constitution is intact or changed according to its own provisions."[297] As we have seen, Kelsen must admit discontinuity in the normative force of law to explain an illegal takeover by revolution or coup d'état. Finnis picks up on Kelsen's difficulty explaining how a legal system's normativity lapses in this brief interregnum. Do laws really loose their normative force during the legal discontinuity, however brief, of an unconsolidated coup? Finnis attributes "rules of succession" to any Kelsenian legal order, which determine who is authorized as a legal official. Ex rypothi, a coup d'état violates the rules of succession to office and so on up the chain of validity to the basic norm.[298] This leads to an inescapable discontinuity in the legal order since the principle of legitimacy no longer holds and a new basic norm is presupposed.

Finnis proposes an alternative "general principle" permitting revolutionary overthrow of rules of power-conferring laws:

A law once validly brought into being, in accordance with criteria of validity then in force, remains valid until either it expires according to its own terms or terms implied at its creation, or it is repealed in accordance with conditions of repeal in force at the time of its repeal.[299]

Thus a revolution can overthrow a basic norm, rule of recognition, etc., without interrupting the [295] Ludwig Wittgenstein, Philosophical Investigations, trans. G.E.M. Anscombe (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1968) at para. 23.

[296] *Id.*at para.206.
[297] Kelsen, supra note 38 at 368-69.
[298] Finnis 1973, supra note51at46 50.
[299] Id. [emphasis in original].

continuity of other laws enacted by those now repealed laws. In other words, a revolution repeals only higher legal norms governing the rules of succession, but leaves the validity of all other norms unaffected. "A revolution," Finnis argues, "unless it deliberately seeks the total subversion of the order of society, does not challenge, even temporarily, the general principle."[300] Thus for Finnis, a legal system must be more than a logical hierarchy of normative rules to explain its continual force during periods of interregnum.

But his solution to explaining continuity over time comes at a cost (one, we should note, that he is all too happy to pay).[301] Finnis suggests, "the continuity and identity of a legal system is a function of the continuity and identity of society in whose ordered existence in time the legal system participates."[302] He then places law in a moral community. When revolutionaries overthrow a legal system, reasonable people will accept the "general principle" as holding since they want to continue to have a stable order to guide their project of life. The continuity of law for Finnis is thus grounded in the common political project of a distinct (and distinguishable) society.

Despite his fulsome critique, Finnis shares Kelsen and Hart's presumption that a legal system correlates to some definable society. Indeed, Finnis makes an even stronger claim than either, arguing that, "[a]nalytical jurisprudence is intrinsically sub alternated either to history or to ethics or to both". In his view, the only sufficient reason in Hart's "internal view" for a person to obey law is "a specific moral reason for acting."[303]This conclusion obviously contradicts Kelsen and Hart's basic distinctions between what law "is" and what it "ought to be". But what the three of them share is more revealing.

For each, normative legal obligations arise from social facts. Kelsen, if not Hart, would surely disagree with Finnis that a shared moral order in society is necessary to ensure the continuity of the legal system according to his general principle. But they would share his implicit identification of a distinct society within the geographic borders of Rhodesia with the state and its legal system. As Wittgenstein's forms of life problematic reveals, community is an essential concept to understand even the simplest rules. For Kelsen, Hart and Finnis, all people must have a shared understanding of what it means to follow a rule. Thus a rule-based theory of law presupposes a society defined by its shared understanding and acceptance of what counts as proper rule-following behaviour. Although Kelsen rejects the idea that normativity is a social fact, his principle of efficiency is incoherent unless people in society can follow laws validly derived from the basic norm. At the

[300]Id. [emphasisadded

[301] By exposing this embarrassing normative gap in Kelsen's general theory, Finnis creates room for his solution of grounding positive laws in a society's moral practices: see Finnis, Natural Law and Natural Rights (Oxford: Clarendon Press,1980).

[302]Finnis1973, supra.

[303] Matovu, supra.

heart of positivism lies a presupposed community of rule followers whose shared form of life can generate normative meaning.

GODFREY BINAISA'S IDIOSYNCRATIC JUSTIFICATION OF THE OBOTE COUP.

In Matovu, Godfrey Binaisa, the Attorney-General, based his defence of Obote's coup in Kelsen's idiosyncratic definition of revolution.[304] But this idea of revolution is hardly widespread in lay- or philosophical usage. In On Revolution, for example, Hannah Arendt saw revolution (at least the first American and French versions) as individuals coming together in a common purpose to create free public space.[305] A revolution, perhaps led by an elite vanguard, is necessarily a mass uprising with a conscious goal of replacing the old order and those who perpetuated it. Franz Fanon proposed a more radical definition similar to Finnis's idea of revolution as the "total subversion of the order of society". "Liberation" for him was, the total destruction of the colonial system, from the pre-eminence of the language of the oppressor and "departmentalization," to the customs union that in reality maintains the former colonized in the meshes of the culture, of the fashion and of the images of the colonialist.

Fanon recognized that the new African political and business elites, often one and the same, had a vested interest in perpetuating the structures of colonial rule. Thus a total revolution, for him, could only come from the rural peasants. Though quite different, both Arendt and Fanon would agree on restricting "revolution" to truly popular, mass movements.

Revolution, contrary to Kelsen, is something more than a palace coup. The judges in Matovu shared Kelsen's conception of revolution and his positivist presumptions. The legal system was identified with the (post)colonial state as a hierarchy of normative rules. Only laws created by a higher law were valid. And at the top was a basic norm, which the Court identified with the 1966 Constitution. All laws were written, although customary law oral sources were sanctioned by written laws

They also accepted Kelsen's distinction between effectiveness and validity. Effectiveness was an empirical fact, while validity was a logical imperative. Finally, the Court presumed the legal system and state were grounded in a homogenous society with a shared form of life. In some sense, all Ugandans were subject to state law, and all understood it and knew to follow it. These particular presumptions are the essential elements of the positivist ideology of Uganda's judiciary.

This is ideology, rather than prejudice, since the judges accept Kelsen and cases like Dosso as dogma. For the Court in Matovu, Kelsen is not a theorist to consider, but an authority to apply.

[304] Hannah Arendt, On Revolution (London: Penguin Books, 1963).

[305] Franz Fanon, Towards the African Revolution: Political Essqys, trans. Haakon Chevalier (New York: Grove Press, 1967) at 105; see also Franz Fanon, Pour Ia revolution africaine: Ecrits politiques (Paris: Fran<;ois

Nowhere in its judgment does the Court question the context or purpose of Kelsen's General Theory. But their positivist ideology did not begin with Matovu. This book will show, Kelsen's principles of legitimacy and effectiveness were merely effective authority to justify the Court's longstanding deference to the executive and readiness to presume a hierarchical legal order spread across a homogenous society of essentially indistinguishable Ugandans.

THE POLITICAL QUESTION DOCTRINE IN MILITARY AFFAIRS.

The matter of Tinyefuza began on November 29, 1996, when General Tinyefuza testified regarding the insurgency in North Uganda before the Parliamentary Sessional Committee (Sessional Committee) on Defence and Internal Affairs. Overall Tinyefuza issued a scathing attack on the Uganda Peoples' Defence Force in his testimony, criticizing its general behaviour and, in particular, its handling of the insurgency in North Uganda.[306] According to media reports, military authorities believed General Tinyefuza's testimony before the Sessional Committee "did not comply to the military line," and that he should retire from the army and go before the High Command. General Tinyefuza did not consider himself a member of the army when he spoke to the Committee, but he resigned in a letter to the President to clear the air. His resignation was rejected by the Minister of Defence on the grounds that it did not conform with the National Resistance Army (Conditions of Service) (Officers) Regulations 1993. General Tinyefuza saw these occurrences as exposing him to a fearful environment, and he believed his rights were about to be violated.

As a result, General Tinyefuza filed a petition with the Constitutional Court, requesting a declaration that the threats to punish him for his testimony before the Sessional Committee would be in violation of Article 87 of the Constitution; that the rejection of the resignation letter was unconstitutional; and that the army regulations were no longer applicable to him because – at the time of his testimony – he was still serving in the army. The Attorney General appealed to the Supreme Court after the Constitutional Court ruled in favor of General Tinyefuza. The Constitutional Court was reserved by the Supreme Court in a 5 to 2 vote.

Justice Kanyeihamba, writing for the majority, stated at the outset that in order to dispose of this appeal according to the principles of the Ugandan Constitution and laws, it was necessary for him to make some preliminary observations, which he said should guide a court in adjudicating constitutional matters of this nature and others. Justice Kanyeihamba started by looking at the political question concept as it is used in the United States and as it has been developed by Ugandan courts. He stated that the basic rule is that courts have no jurisdiction over topics that are within the legislative or executive's constitutional and legal authority. Kanyeihamba went on to say that even when courts feel compelled to intervene and evaluate legislative or executive activities when challenged on the grounds that an individual's rights have been violated, they do so rarely and reluctantly. In addition, he reaffirmed Matovu's support for the political question doctrine. The political question concept compels the court to assess as a threshold matter in all instances whether the question before it has been assigned by the Constitution to another co-ordinate organ of government, according to constitutional analysts.

[306] See Major General David Tinyefuza v Attorney Genera [1997] UGCC 3 (Justice Manyido opinion).

Before getting to the merits, Justice Kanyeihamba outlined some of the areas in which he believes the political question theory should be applied in Uganda. Among them, he mentioned whether courts should seek proof of whether a bill approved by the legislature was done correctly or not, the handling of foreign relations, and the timing of declaring and ending wars and insurgencies. The majority of observers agree with Justice Kanyeihamba's description of the areas where the political question theory is most relevant. Justice Kanyeihamba was satisfied, based on common law sources, that courts should refrain from ruling on such issues until there are extremely evident incidents of violation or imminent violation of individual liberty. When it comes to the exercise and control of authorities relating to the armed forces' structure, organization, deployment, and operations, Justice Kanyeihamba stated that courts' reluctance to enter the arena reserved by the Constitution for the other arms of government reaches a nadir. In his opinion, the recognized norm is that courts will not substitute their own views of what is in the public interest in these cases, especially when the other co-ordinate organs of government are working within their constitutional competence.

Because military concerns are under the exclusive jurisdiction of both the administration and the legislature, Justice Kanyeihamba argues that it is not for the courts to assess whether the executive's discretion was exercised appropriately, if at all. Parliament, he believes, has the authority to hold the government accountable in these military matters. The United States Court of Appeal in Schneider v Kissinger makes a significant statement in support of Justice Kanyeihamba's position, stating that "the lack of judicial authority to oversee the conduct of the executive branch in political matters does not leave executive power unchecked because political branches exercise checks and balances on each other in the area of political questions." These judicial sentiments are shared by some commentators. For example, in a paper co-authored with others, Ibrahim Imam argues that “we should not be overly concerned that the political question doctrine deprives the courts of enforcement power over certain constitutional provisions because the Constitution and electoral process provide an appropriate substitute.” Thus, Justice Kanyeihamba cannot be criticized for pointing out that Parliament is the proper institution of government to check the executive on military matters, and that this is a sufficient constitutional check on executive power in the context of the political question theory.

Justice Kanyeihamba then discussed the notion of separation of powers in the Ugandan Constitution, emphasizing that courts are not the only actors on the constitutional stage in Uganda, as they are in the United States. He correctly observed, in my opinion, that the constitutional platform is to be shared by the three arms of government, namely the executive, judicial, and legislative arms; that courts must consider the judgments of other repositories of constitutional power concerning the scope of their authority and the necessity for each to stay within its powers, including judicial review; and that courts must consider the judgments of other repositories of constitutional power concerning the scope of their authority and the necessity for each to stay within its powers, including judicial review.[307] Professor Tribe agrees that "as long as the manner in which the Constitution is to be interpreted remains open to question, the meaning of the Constitution is subject to legitimate dispute, and the judiciary is not alone in its responsibility to interpret," "the meaning of the Constitution is subject to legitimate dispute, and the judiciary is not alone in its responsibility to interpret."

Instead, Justice Kanyeihamba declared that the principle of separation of powers requires the courts to refrain from intervening in arenas not assigned to them by the Constitution or Ugandan laws unless there is a clear case requiring intervention for purposes of determining constitutionality of action or the protection of liberty that is currently threatened. Furthermore, he stated that in a democracy, courts must refrain from stepping into areas of disagreement that are best resolved by other government authorities. Cowper and Sossin have similarly observed and argued that “based on the principle of separation of powers, the political question doctrine limits judicial power in a number of circumstances where the other branches of government have a stronger claim to decide the issue raised” in their discussion of the political question doctrine in Canada. Kanyeihamba's statement, I believe, represents the concept that the president and legislature have a stronger claim to decide military issues that have arisen in this situation.

It is clear from Justice Kanyeihamba's analysis that the political question doctrine is acknowledged in Uganda, as it is in Ghana and the United States, as arising from the principle of separation of powers. Furthermore, it is obvious that the political question doctrine's application may be limited; that is, it may not apply in circumstances of evident constitutional infractions or abuses of power. In this sense, Justice Kanyeihamba's opinions are identical to those of Justice Kpegah of Ghana's Supreme Court. The two judges have similar views on the right balance of powers among the three branches of government, arguing that each has equal constitutional authority to interpret and implement the Constitution. Tinyefuza isn't the first time Uganda has used the political question philosophy. The Constitutional Court dismissed a case based on this approach as early as March 2012.

[307]L.H. Tribe, American Constitutional Law (Foundation Press, New York, NY, 1988) at 34–35.

Fast forward to 2021, the supreme court suspended a decision by the constitutional court that proclaimed it unconstitutional for civilians to be tried in the military courts, especially if they haven't subjected themselves to the military system.

The constitutional court in the case of Kabaziguruka v Attorney General[308], The Constitutional Court found in a 3:2 judgment that civilians being tried in military courts is illegal, especially if they have not submitted to the military system.

Justice Kenneth Kakuru, one of the majority three justices, concluded that the General Court Martial's authority is confined to trying offenses defined by the Uganda People's Defence Force (UPDF) Act, and solely in respect of persons subject to military law.

The court's ruling, according to the justices, does not mean that civilians facing military trials are now free. Instead, they ordered that their case files be transferred to civilian courts for further treatment within 14 days of the verdict, on the advice of the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP).

Uganda's Constitutional Court, which was established 26 years ago, has long been thought to be more flexible to the Executive, but following a recent ruling that prevented civilians from being tried in military courts, it might be claimed that the court is on the mend.

The current decision underlines the issues that have plagued this court for years. It was filed in 2016 by Michael Kabaziguruka, who had just been elected Nakawa MP, but the judgment was not delivered until five years later, after he had lost his seat, raising questions about whether justice was served, given that the former MP has spent the last five years with treason charges hanging over his head.

Kabaziguruka, who gave the military court a shot of defiance the previous time he appeared in 2016, made it obvious that as a civilian, the court had no jurisdiction over him. "I'm a civilian who should be tried in a civilian court," says the defendant. I have the financial means to employ a private attorney, but I am unable to do so since I am in the incorrect court. If you force me to stand trial here, I prefer to represent myself," Mr Kabaziguruka added, drawing a standing ovation from FDC members in the courtroom.

The length of time it took the court to deliver the judgment cannot be overlooked because lawyer Ladislaus Rwakafuuzi, who has long opposed civilians being tried in military courts, was healthy when Kabaziguruka gave him instructions to lead his legal team in filing the petition, but he was sick after suffering a stroke by the time the case came up for final submissions last year.

[308] Constitutional Petition 45 of 2016 [2021] UGCC 11 (01 July 2021)

The army supported charging civilians in their court by using Sections 119(1) g and h of the UPDF Act No7/2005, sub-sec (g), which states: ".... every person not otherwise subject to military law who aids or abets a person subject to military law in the commission of a service offence; and (h) anyone found in unlawful possession of I arms, ammunition, or equipment normally monopolized by the defence forces; or (ii) other classified stores as prescribed, is subject to military law and can be tried in military courts as apposed to civilian courts.

"The practical effect of all of this is that, under Sections 119 (1) g and h of the UPDF Act, the General Court Martial and any other military courts established under the said Act are purported to have jurisdiction to try anyone in Uganda, whether or not a member of the UPDF, for any crime under the Penal Code Act or any other enactment. All that is required for this to happen is to allege that a civilian aided and abetted a person subject to military law in committing that crime," stated Justice Kasule, who retired in 2018 but continues to serve on a contract basis.

"This is grossly unconstitutional since Article 210(b) [of the Constitution] restricts the General Court Martial and any other military court to exercise jurisdiction as to discipline over only members of the UPDF."

"By the General Court Martial extending its jurisdiction to try civilians who are not members of the UPDF in respect of all offences under the Penal Code Act and other enactments, it subjects ordinary civilians to criminal prosecutions that have no safeguards of a fair trial and proper administration of justice, the ensuring of which is a constitutional duty of the DPP. This is inconsistent and in contravention of the intent, purpose and overall spirit of articles 28(1), 126(1), and 210(b) of the constitution."

The key point made by activists and the opposition is that the court martial is not an independent tribunal because President Museveni controls it directly, which the majority of the justices agreed with.

"The General Court Martial, therefore, is a specialised court set up by Parliament and clearly is not part of the Judiciary. It is part of the Executive arm of government established under Chapter 12 of the Constitution which provides for the country's defence and national security," Justice Kasule wrote.

"Several attempts by the Executive to place the General Court Martial on the same footing as courts of judicature has in my view originated confusion and discord among jurists, legal practitioners and scholars. It's simply trying to fit a square peg in a round hole."

In as much as this decision seemed to be in the right direction of justice, the supreme court is not likely to uphold the same. This is because the Government appealed this decision to the supreme court. An interim order suspending the implementation of the Constitutional Court decision that barred the Army Court from Prosecuting Civilians was granted by the Supreme Court. A panel of five Justices led by Chief Justice Alfonse Owiny Dollo said that the temporary order would run up to 29th July 2021 to allow the Justices to study Government's case for the intended appeal and make an appropriate decision.

THE POLITICAL QUESTION IN HEALTH ISSUES.

The Constitutional Court of Uganda recently used Tinyefuza to dismiss a constitutional petition in Centre of Health Human Rights v Attorney-General[309] (hereinafter Maternal Health Case), a case challenging government conduct or inaction based on Tinyefuza's political question doctrine. In the Maternity Health Case, the plaintiffs challenged the government's refusal to supply basic maternal commodities in government health facilities by petitioning the Constitutional Court under sections 137(3) and 45 of the Constitution. The plaintiffs sought a ruling that government activities or omissions that had resulted in excessive maternal fatalities in Uganda were in violation of the fundamental right to life and health.

The administration filed a preliminary objection to the Constitutional Court's jurisdiction to hear the case at the outset, claiming that the political question doctrine prevents the judiciary from hearing such matters. The government's preliminary objection in the Maternal Health Case is compatible, at least to some extent, with Justice Kanyeihamba's declaration in Tinyefuza that "courts have no jurisdiction over subjects that are within the constitutional and legal authorities of the political arms of government." Furthermore, the administration appears to agree with Professor Barkow's viewpoint that "in all constitutional matters, the primary inquiry must be whether the question before the court has been delegated to another body of government."

The administration contended that the way the petition was worded required the court to make a judicial judgement involving political matters, and that the court had to establish whether it had jurisdiction to determine those questions at the outset, citing Tinyefuza and other foreign authorities. It further maintained that by hearing such cases, the Constitutional Court would be infringing on political discretion, which is reserved by statute for the government and legislature. Furthermore, the government believed that the Constitutional Court should not deal directly with questions that the Constitution has designated as the sole responsibility of other branches of government; that for the Constitutional Court to determine the issues in the petition, it would be required to review all of the health sector's policies and make findings on them; and that the implementation of the policies would be the responsibility of other branches of government; and that the implementation of the policies would be the responsibility of other branches of government. To back up its assertions, the government presented an affidavit from the Ministry of Health's Principal Secretary, outlining the government's efforts and strategies to improve maternal health services and maintain high standards in the health sector. It then cited sections 111(2) and 176(2)(e) of the Constitution, claiming that they protected the executive and legislative powers to design, review, and implement policies, as well as to allocate resources.

[309] Centre of Health Human Rights v Attorney-General, Constitutional Petition No 16 of 2011.

In dismissing the case, the Constitutional Court supported the Supreme Court's Tinyefuza ruling on the political question theory. While the Court was correct in saying that the Supreme Court had embraced the political question concept in Tinyefuza, it is crucial to note that the Constitutional Court first adopted it in Matovu and then applied it in Andrew Kayira v Edward Rugumayo.[310] Justice Kanyeihamba acknowledged in Tinyefuza that Matovu had adopted the political question doctrine as a sound premise to be applied in Uganda. One of the reasons for recognizing Tinyefuza's adoption of the political question doctrine is that it was the first case to apply the doctrine after the 1995 Constitution was enacted. Prior to Tinyefuza, it was unclear if Uganda's 1995 Constitution allowed for the application of the political question theory.

The Constitutional Court reasoned that the Constitution clearly defined the varied functions allocated to each of the three institutions of government in applying the political question theory in the Maternal Health Case. According to the Constitutional Court, this meant that each government organ's autonomy had to be protected from undue interference from the others. While it is true that the government did not provide sufficient resources to the health sector, the Court reasoned that the executive and no other branch of government had the authority to make such decisions. As a result, the Constitutional Court declared that it is obligated to defer to the president and legislature on certain constitutional problems of a political nature. The Constitutional Court defended its hesitation in deciding the petition's concerns by claiming that doing so would be substituting its discretion for the executive's. In other words, the Constitutional Court was concerned that by deciding the petition's problems, it would be intruding into the executive's realm, which would violate the principle of separation of powers.

As a result, the Constitutional Court upheld the government's preliminary objections, ruling that it lacked the authority to determine or enforce its jurisdiction over matters requiring analysis of government health-care policies because the alleged acts or omissions were committed by the political branches, and thus fell under the political question doctrine. This kind of application is known as the classical political question doctrine, according to Professor Wechsler and other observers. The classical version, according to Cutaiar, was recognized in the historic Supreme Court case Marbury. The classical version's primary premise is that "the political question doctrine is a product of constitutional interpretation, not of judicial discretion." I agree with proponents of the traditional political question concept that the political question doctrine should only be used to jurisprudentially guide the court in establishing the circumstances in which the Constitution has delegated the determination of an issue to another body of government.

[310] Andrew Kayira v Edward Rugumayo, Constitutional Case No 1 (1979).

The political question theory has been frequently used to put the judiciary under the executive's shadow, as evidenced by the above discussion. The notion of separation of powers is still a mystery to the Ugandan government, which it must first decipher and then embrace in its daily operations.

A CALL FOR THE ABANDONMENT OF THE DOMINANT EXECUTIVE POLITICAL QUESTION DOCTRINE

The dominant positivist Executive ideology has not gone unchallenged. A group of judges led by Justice Kanyeihamba at the Supreme Court are questioned the role of the judiciary in the particular legal map of Uganda. In a Supreme Court case challenging the 2006 presidential elections, Kanyeihamba wrote that the Court must abandon the "political doctrine" constraints of Matovu and embark on an inquiry "radically different from an ordinary ... criminal, civil or administrative" trial. One way to do this is to look to the National Objectives and Directive Principles of the 1995 Constitution. If the constitution-making process did manage to distil some common national goals, judges could use those non-justiciable rights to creatively re-interpret their role. The first step would be to identify the positivist presumptions of the dominant judicial ideology and then scrutinize them against the distinct legal map of Uganda. As the recent cases surveyed indicate, a few judges have already begun this process.

A final observation is worth making on the place of human rights in countering despotic governments in Uganda. In their constitutional form, human rights are in essence an individual's justifiable checks against the state. Human rights thus have greater relevance where state law is hegemonic. But where other legal orders compete with or even preclude state law, focusing just on them is misguided. An exclusive human rights discourse is insufficient to address injustices that occur at the frontiers, or along different projections or scales, to state law This discourse is even dangerous since at a fundamental level it accepts the state, if not all its laws, as legitimate. In a nation interlaced with legal orders of which the state's is just one, any language that accepts a single order as superior may stifle inquiry into what justice means within the other orders or in their interactions. The old magistrate, defender of the rule of law, enemy in his own way of the State, assaulted and imprisoned, impregnably virtuous, is not without his own twinges of doubt.

The pervasive presumptions of positivism are deeply ingrained 1n the legal ideology of Uganda's judiciary. Only state law is seen as valid law-or law at all. When confronted with legal orders that do not fit with this ideological form, judges have either re-invented them to fit, ignored them or sanctioned violence to subdue them. Kelsenian judges in Uganda thus identified a legal system with the state. For Kelsen, this had been essential to ward off the dangers of the arbitrary, autocratic state he had witnessed in Europe His theory of law thus relied upon, and contributed to, a political philosophy unique to his European experience. The Ugandan judiciary, however, accepted his theory as an ideology that dominated its work since the Uganda Order in Council 1902.

Any legal theory, even a self-consciously amoral one, presupposes a philosophical foundation. Judges in colonial Uganda applied statutes and case law imported from England and continued to do so after independence in 1962. But most importantly, they reproduced an ideology of interpretation-their particular positivism described in Chapter 2-based on philosophical premises that were as inconsistent with Speke's Buganda as they are with the Republic of Uganda today. Exorcising Matovu's ghost is a pressing precondition for scholars of Uganda and other African states with similar colonial experiences. This work has already begun in several disjointed discourses on law in Africa. For legal scholars generally, this project's findings will also illuminate the particularities of positivism in Anglo-American jurisprudence. The hegemonic claims of Kelsen and Hart have inspired very real ghosts in Uganda.

Yet legal scholarship on Africa is now gravitating towards two distinct poles, (i) legal anthropology, and (ii) international human rights and criminal law. Laws in Africa are thus either exoticized or marginalized, respectively. In practical terms, the former is evident in the rush of nongovernmental organizations to Karamoja to save the pastoralists from AK-47s and ultimately themselves. The renewed interest in the Karamojong reflects a broader trend towards classifying such orally-bound collectivities as "indigenous" and so inherently worthy of study. From the other perspective, the International Criminal Court's indictment of Kony and the LRA has largely ignored its potential impact on the complex political struggle for constitutionalism in Uganda. As vast intellectual resources capital is sunk in on developing an international criminal law, the niggling problems of plural legal orders slides towards the peripheries.

The twin ghosts of Hegel and Matovu hinder any attempts to study how Ugandans navigate and contest the various laws mapping their borders in the “unspoken assumption that Africa does not offer a good enough return to justify deploying resources to its study.” This book argues adamantly to the contrary: not only must Matovu's ghost be exorcized from Uganda's judicial ideology, but non-African legal scholars must do the same for Hegel's ghost. Extracting this spectre turns the burden of proof on its head and state laws must at last justify their once-presumed authority (and violence) against the indigenous norms they seek to map over.

CHAPTER FIVE

THE PRESIDENCY, ITS POWERS AND IMMUNITIES

INTRODUCTION

Society has over the years evolved from living in seclusion to high levels of organisation like democracies and monarchies. In the early ages, it was man against the wilderness and survival majorly based on man's ability to overcome the challenges of the jungle. The main activities were hunting and fruit picking.

As time advanced, so did man. The discovery of fire and iron smelting were one of the events that transformed time from the old stone age to the new stone age. Man was able to make tools and this helped with agriculture. The growing of crops and ability to keep animals encouraged settlement and therefore ended man's nomadic life. With time, there was need to separate labour to provide for the farmers and those who would keep the produce for the times the plants were not ready for harvest and this in the long run introduced classes in the settlements and the growth of cities. This was also the beginning of civilisation.

All these things happened around 10,000 and 5,000 BC. With the growth of settlement and communities, there was also a growth of leadership structures in order to maintain order and peace in these settlements. This in essence saw the rise of great empires around the world and their eventual fall.

All this still does not explain the origin of "president" as a supreme leader of a defined territory of land as we know it in the modern society. The title president is derived from the Latin prae-"before" plus sedere"to sit". As such, it originally designated the officer who presides over or "sits before" a gathering and ensures that debate is conducted according to the rules of order (see also chairman and speaker), but today it most commonly refers to an executive official in any social organization. Early examples are from the universities of Oxford and Cambridge (from 1464) and the founding president of the Royal Society William Brouncker in 1660.

This usage still holds relevance today in the title of such offices as "President of the Board of Trade" and "Lord President of the Council" in the United Kingdom, as well as "President of the Senate" in the United States (one of the roles constitutionally assigned to the vice president). The leader of the bench in the International Court of Justice is addressed as president. The officiating priest at certain Anglican religious services, too, is sometimes called the "president" in this sense.

However, the most common modern usage is as the title of a head of state in a republic.

In pre-revolutionary France, the president of a Parliament evolved into a powerful magistrate, a member of the so-called noblesse de robe ("nobility of the gown"), with considerable judicial as well as administrative authority. The name referred to his primary role of presiding over trials and other hearings. In the 17th and 18th centuries, seats in the Parliaments, including presidencies, became effectively hereditary, since the holder of the office could ensure that it would pass to an heir by paying the crown a special tax known as the paulette. The post of "first president" (premier président), however, could be held by only the King's nominees. The Parliaments were abolished by the French Revolution. In modern France the Chief Judge of a court is known as its president (président de la cour).

The word "presidents" is also used in the King James Bible at Daniel 6:2 to translate the Aramaic term סָרְכִ֔ין (sā·rə·ḵîn), a word of likely Persian origin, meaning "officials", "commissioners", "overseers" or "chiefs".

The nomenclature of the supreme power that was used at the time all seems to have constantly revolved around the modern day understood meaning of president. A single person with the power to oversee the affairs of an organised group of people. It is important to note that these leaders at first had no regulation on how their powers could be used. But this position changed with the advancement of advocacy and the art of rhetoric that saw philosophers develop the art of convincing communities to think different about guidelines or norms set by authorities. No wonder most of these philosophers were killed by those in power because they opposed the supreme rule.

This paper therefore traces the origins of presidency as a position of leadership and its earliest codification. I also uncover the powers that were eventually bestowed on presidency with the modern development of different forms of governance like democracy and dictatorship. I also draw a difference between the powers vested in the president based on the system of governance and how they differ from a system without a president; for example, a monarchy. I then discuss whether the president is in and of oneself law in any given system of governance. If this is not absolutely true, then when can it be said that the president has abused the power vested in him or her. I also discuss the line between the president and the law and how obscure it is, or rather how some governments make it so. This paper ultimately drives to provide an analysis of presidential powers in Uganda.

TRACING THE ORIGINS OF PRESIDENCY

The first usage of the word president to denote the highest official in a government was during the Commonwealth of England. After the abolition of the monarchy the English Council of State, whose members were elected by the House of Commons, became the executive government of the Commonwealth. The Council of State was the successor of the Privy Council, which had previously been headed by the lord president; its successor the Council of State was also headed by a lord president, the first of which was John Bradshaw. However, the lord president alone was not head of state, because that office was vested in the council as a whole.

The modern usage of the term president to designate a single person who is the head of state of a republic can be traced directly to the United States Constitution of 1787, which created the office of President of the United States. Previous American governments had included "presidents" (such as the president of the Continental Congress or the president of the Massachusetts Provincial Congress), but these were presiding officers in the older sense, with no executive authority. It has been suggested that the executive use of the term was borrowed from early American colleges and universities, which were usually headed by a president.

British universities were headed by an official called the "Chancellor" (typically a ceremonial position) while the chief administrator held the title of "Vice-Chancellor". But America's first institutions of higher learning (such as Harvard University and Yale University) didn't resemble a full-sized university so much as one of its constituent colleges. A number of colleges at Cambridge University featured an official called the "president". The head, for instance, of Magdalene College, Cambridge was called the master and his second the president. The first president of Harvard, Henry Dunster, had been educated at Magdalene. Some have speculated that he borrowed the term out of a sense of humility, considering himself only a temporary place-holder. The presiding official of Yale College, originally a "rector" (after the usage of continental European universities), became "president" in 1745.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Money, it is said, is the root of all evil: it has certainly been one of the most prolific stimuli to revolt, rebellion, and revolution--in western history, at any rate.[311] In England, Magna Carta and the Barons' War and the Civil War in 1642;in France--the nobillar revolts of the sixteenth century, the Fronde, and finally the great Revolution of 1789; in Spain--the revolts of the Netherlands, Catalans,and Portuguese: all serve as examples. The American Revolution started as a tax revolt

[311] Especially given that all colonialisms around the world were undertaken majorly to increase revenue for the colonial countries.

too.[312]

The colonial masters had just won a 7-year war against the French in North America at a hefty cost that almost cost them their own country. This doubled their national debt from £75 million to almost £147 million. Not only that: her ever-busy merchants evaded the various Trade and Navigation Acts and carried on a profitable contraband traffic in the West Indies; another loss to the imperial revenue. Yet the 'British Americans enjoyed a lighter tax burden than any people of the western world except the Poles'.[313]

What happened in the ensuing thirteen years was that the British repeatedly made efforts to tighten up the colonial economic laws and to impose taxes on the colonists to help pay to protect the western frontier from Indian attack. The colonists; tempers frayed by the losses now incurred among the contrabandists and by those who had speculated in the western lands which were now closed to settlement; resisted. The British tried one measure, met resistance, withdrew it and tried another, and so forth, each incident contributing to growing bitterness, radicalization--and a sense of solidarity among the colonists.[314]

The British ministers acted with extreme ham-handedness and insensitivity, while each of their blunders was seized on by the firebrands and revolutionaries among the colonists; such as the ineffable Patrick Henry, Sam Adams, and James Otis, who established a network of Corresponding Societies in Massachusetts, an example soon followed in the rest of the colonies. Exaggeration was compounded. One has only to look at the litany of complaints delivered 'to a candid world' in the latter part of Jefferson's Declaration of Independence to see that half were factitious and of the remainder half were grossly exaggerated. Take the Quebec Act, 1774, for instance. Although this left the province's government in the hands of a royal governor and his council, in all other respects this was a liberal, indeed noble, document. It restored French civil law to the Quebecois, and pledged toleration for their Roman Catholic religion. For their pains the British were accused of extending religious toleration to the Catholics so that they could be used to suppress the liberties of the colonists.[315]

To cut the long story short, in the 1770s, the increasingly defiant American colonies began to work toward political independence from the British Government.[316]Tensions continued to escalate until, in 1775, armed conflict erupted. The colonists, who were economically dependent on Europe, recognized that European nations were unlikely to conclude trade agreements with the Americans

[312]Samuel E. Finer, 1999. The History of Governments from the Earliest Times, Vol.3, Oxford University Press, p.1485-1491
[313] Ibid p. 1489
[314] Ibid p. 1490
[315]Ibid p. 1491
[316]https://history.state.gov/milestones/1776-1783/foreword

unless they declared their independence. The U.S. Continental Congress endorsed Thomas Jefferson's Declaration of Independence on July 4, 1776, and, with the endorsement of this document, the conflict with Great Britain became a full-fledged War of Independence.[317]

Unable to defeat the strong British military on their own, the American colonists required foreign assistance. John Adams approached the French with the "Model Treaty," which protected neutral trade and shipping rights in the event of a war. The French decision to sign this commercial treaty with the American colonists made France an implicit ally in the war against Great Britain.

In 1778, France formally established its position as an ally with a treaty of alliance that committed the French to the war on the condition that the Americans did not seek a separate peace with Great Britain. Following the British surrender at the Battle of Yorktown, the Americans negotiated independently with Great Britain despite their agreement with France. The war was not officially concluded, however, until the agreement to the Treaty of Paris in 1783, which was signed in concert with treaties between Great Britain, France, and Spain. The final treaty granted full independence and recognized the borders of the new United States of America.[318]

The 1787 Constitution of the United States did not specify the manner of address for the president. When George Washington was sworn in as the first president of the United States on April 30, 1789, the administering of the oath of office ended with the proclamation: "Long live George Washington, President of the United States."[319] No title other than the name of the office of the executive was officially used at the inauguration.

The question of a presidential title was being debated in Congress at the time, however, having become official legislative business with Richard Henry Lee's motion of April 23, 1789. Lee's motion asked congress to consider "what titles it will be proper to annex to the offices of President and Vice President of the United States – if any other than those given in the Constitution".[320] Vice President John Adams, in his role as President of the United States Senate, organized a congressional committee. There Adams agitated for the adoption of the style of Highness (as well as the title of Protector of Their [the United States'] Liberties) for the President.[321]Adams and Lee were among the most outspoken proponents of an exalted presidential title.[322]

Others favoured the variant of Electoral Highness or the lesser Excellency, the latter of which was vociferously opposed by Adams, who contended that it was far beneath the presidential dignity, as the executives of the states, some of which were also titled "President" (e.g. the President of

[317] Ibid
[318] Ibid
[319]Bartoloni-Tuazon, Kathleen, 2014. For Fear of an Elective King. Ithaca: Cornell University Press. p. 89.
[320] Ibid p. 86
[321] Ibid p.57
[322] Supra note 10

Pennsylvania), at that time often enjoyed the style of Excellency; Adams said the president "would be levelled with colonial governors or with functionaries from German princedoms" if he were to use the style of Excellency. Adams and Richard Henry Lee both feared that cabals of powerful senators would unduly influence a weak executive, and saw an exalted title as a way of strengthening the presidency.[323] On further consideration, Adams deemed even Highness insufficient and instead proposed that the executive, both the president and the vice president (i.e., himself), be styled Majesty to prevent the "great danger" of an executive with insufficient dignity.[324] Adams' efforts were met with widespread derision and perplexion; Thomas Jefferson called them "the most superlatively ridiculous thing I ever heard of", while Benjamin Franklin considered it "absolutely mad".[325]

Washington consented to the demands of James Madison and the United States House of Representatives that the title be altered to "Mr. President".[326]Nonetheless, later "The Honourable" became the standard title of the President in formal address, and "His/Her Excellency" became the title of the President when addressed formally internationally.

Historically, the title was reserved for the incumbent president only, and was not to be used for former presidents, holding that it was not proper to use the title as a courtesy title when addressing a former president.[327] Despite that, some sources maintain that living former U.S. presidents continue to be addressed as "Mr. President", both formally and informally, and some contemporary experts on etiquette maintain that it is entirely appropriate.[328]

REPUBLIC OF CHINA

The fate of government throughout the entire world was galvanized, between 1500 and 1776, by two technological advances--firearms, especially artillery, and the ocean-going sailing-ship--and the union of these two in what were effectively 'floating castles enveloped by all-round batteries of quick-firing guns'. These ships enabled the Europeans to take and settle America and to establish fortified trading posts throughout South and South-East Asia.[329]But they could not penetrate the latter beyond the protection afforded by their gunships. Their significance, then, was that for the first time post-Roman Europe had a significant role to play, alongside the three other great state systems--the Islamic, the Indian, and the Chinese. The significance of the siege-gun was more

[323] Supra note 11
[324]Hutson, James H. March 1968. "John Adams' Title Campaign". The New England Quarterly. 41 (1): 30–39
[325] Ibid
[326]Caroli, Betty Boyd 2003. First Ladies. Oxford University Press US. p. 4. ISBN 978-0-19-516676-7.
[327]Wood, Gordon S. (2006). Revolutionary Characters. Penguin Press. p. 54. ISBN 978-1-59420-093-9.
[328]"Forms of Address: How to Address the President". HuffPost. 1 January 2013
[329]Bull and A. Watson, 1984. Expansion of International Society, Clarendon Press,Oxford,p. 34.

indiscriminate than that of the new type of ship; it strengthened central governments throughout the globe. That artillery could batter down the curtain walls of baronial castles and centralize power in the hands of the monarch is part of the conventional wisdom of European history.[330]

The History of the Republic of China begins after the Qing dynasty in 1912, when the formation of the Republic of China as a constitutional republic put an end to 2,000 years of imperial rule. The Manchu-led Qing dynasty ruled China proper from 1644 to 1912. The Republic experienced many trials and tribulations after its founding which included being dominated by elements as disparate as warlord generals and foreign powers.

Qing dynasty in the late 19th and early 20th centuries was challenged by civil unrest and foreign invasions. Internal rebellions and their repression brought millions of deaths, conflicts with foreign Western European powers brought humiliating unequal treaties, exacted reparations that burdened the fiscal system, and compromised the country's territorial integrity. Popular sentiment among Han Chinese grew that political power should return to the majority Han Chinese from the minority Manchus. Following the Boxer Rebellion and the invasion of the imperialist powers to put it down, the Qing Imperial Court launched fundamental institutional and political reforms, such as abolishing the Imperial examination system in 1905, drafting a constitution in 1906, the establishment of provincial legislatures in 1909, and the preparations for electing a national parliament in 1910. However, Manchu conservatives in the Qing Court thought these reforms went too far and distrustful critics felt they did not go far enough. Reformers were either imprisoned or executed outright. The failures of the Imperial Court to enact such political liberalization and modernization caused the reformists to take the road of revolution.

In 1928, the Republic was nominally unified under the Kuomintang (KMT; also called "Chinese Nationalist Party") after the Northern Expedition, and was in the early stages of industrialization and modernization when it was caught in the conflicts involving the Kuomintang government, the Communist Party of China (founded in 1921), local warlords, and the Empire of Japan. Most nation-building efforts were stopped during the full-scale Second Sino-Japanese War against Japan from 1937 to 1945, and later the widening gap between the Kuomintang and the Communist Party made a coalition government impossible, causing the resumption of the Chinese Civil War, in 1946, shortly after the Japanese surrender to the Allied Powers in September 1945.

A series of political, economic and military missteps led to the KMT's defeat and its retreat to Taiwan (formerly "Formosa") in 1949, where it established an authoritarian one-party state continuing under Generalissimo/President Chiang Kai-shek. This state considered itself to be the continuing sole legitimate ruler of all of China, referring to the communist government or "regime" as illegitimate, a so-called "People's Republic of China" (PRC) declared in Beijing (Peking) by Mao Zedong in 1949, as "mainland China", "Communist China, or "Red China". The Republic of China was supported for many years — even decades — by many nations, especially the United States who established a 1954 Mutual Defense treaty. After political liberalization began in the late 1960s, the PRC was able — after a constant yearly campaign in the United Nations — to finally get approval in 1971 to take the seat for "China" in the General Assembly, and more importantly, be seated as one of the five permanent members of the Security Council. After recovering from this shock of rejection by its former allies and liberalization in the late 1970s from the Nationalist authoritarian government and following the death of Chiang Kai-shek, the Republic of China has transformed itself into a multiparty, representative democracy on Taiwan and given more representation to those native Taiwanese, whose ancestors predate the 1949 mainland evacuation.

[330] Ibid, p. 1064

I N D I A

Some historians choose to take Indian civilization as commencing with the riverine cultures of Mohenjo-Daro and Harappa (2500 BC); others with the Aryan invasions (c. 1500 BC). Either way the fact remains that it is thousands of years old. Furthermore, Hindu religion, its unifying and unique characteristic, is the oldest continuous religious tradition in the world, such that Hindus are still using some of the hymns of the Rig Veda, of c. 1500 BC.

Yet during these three millennia before the Mughal period (1526-1739) there was no single Indian polity congruent with Indian civilization. The so-called empires that commence with the Marians in 321 BC were loosely articulated, short-lived, and few; and in any case their detail is largely unknown recorded history. Instead, there was a multitude of minor kingdoms whose existence was fluid and short-lived.

However, one of the eras worth noting was the era of the Mughal Empire, and this for two most powerful reasons. Unlike any of these other states, it created a stable administrative structure that held together three-quarters of the subcontinent for over 150 years. Secondly, the ruins of this structure served as the basis for the first successful and durable unification in history of all India as we now conventionally think of it. This was British India, the Raj. The Mughals founded an imperial ideal and the Raj took it up and bettered it.

The fact is that until Mughal times India was a geographical expression. It was not like the monocultural and for the most part politically united China. Studying it is more like studying Europe, with its diverse languages, religions, and peoples, and its many states which, like those of India, were continually at war. The India of today is half the area of the USA. It is 2,000 miles from Kashmir to Cape Cormoran, 2,200 from Baluchistan to the eastern frontier of Assam. Eighty-three per cent of its population are Hindu: only 11 per cent are Muslim (though before partition they accounted for 25 per cent). But in addition, there are substantial minorities of Jains, Buddhists, and Christians. No fewer than fifteen languages are officially recognized as such, but if the dialects are considered, they number (according to Sir George Grierson's researches, 1903-28) no fewer than 225. It is perfectly true that linguistic and/or ethnic uniformity are not sufficient or even necessary conditions for statehood: but they do help it along mightily.

Fast forward, India, like many other countries around the world, was colonised. In 1498, a Portuguese fleet under Vasco da Gama successfully discovered a new sea route from Europe to India, which paved the way for direct Indo-European commerce. The Portuguese soon set up trading posts in Goa, Daman, Diu and Bombay. After their conquest in Goa, the Portuguese instituted the Goa Inquisition, where new Indian converts and non-Christians were punished for suspected heresy against Christianity and were condemned to be burnt.[331] Goa became the main Portuguese base until it was annexed by India in 1961.[332]

The next to arrive were the Dutch, with their main base in Ceylon. They established ports in Malabar. However, their expansion into India was halted after their defeat in the Battle of Colachel by the Kingdom of Travancore during the Travancore-Dutch War. The Dutch never recovered from the defeat and no longer posed a large colonial threat to India.[333]

The internal conflicts among Indian kingdoms gave opportunities to the European traders to gradually establish political influence and appropriate lands. Following the Dutch, the British—who set up in the west coast port of Surat in 1619—and the French both established trading outposts in India. Although these continental European powers controlled various coastal regions of southern and eastern India during the ensuing century, they eventually lost all their territories in India to the British, with the exception of the French outposts of Pondichéry and Chandernagore,[334] and the Portuguese colonies of Goa, Daman and Diu.[335]

Again, like many other countries, there was an uprising to remove the colonial rule in India. The Indian rebellion of 1857 was a large-scale rebellion by soldiers employed by the British East India Company in northern and central India against the company's rule. The spark that led to the mutiny was the issue of new gunpowder cartridges for the Enfield rifle, which was insensitive to local religious prohibition. The key mutineer was Mangal Pandey.[336] In addition, the underlying

[331]Glenn Ames (2012). Ivana Elbl (ed.). Portugal and its Empire, 1250–1800 (Collected Essays in Memory of Glenn J. Ames).: Portuguese Studies Review, Vol. 17, No. 1. Trent University Press. pp. 12–15
[332]Sanjay Subrahmanyam, 2012. The Portuguese empire in Asia, 1500–1700: a political and economic history
[333]Koshy, M.O. (1989). The Dutch Power in Kerala, 1729–1758. Mittal Publications. p. 61. ISBN 978-81-7099-136-6.
[334]Holden Furber, Rival Empires of Trade in the Orient, 1600–1800, University of Minnesota Press, 1976, p. 201.
[335]Philippe Haudrère, Les Compagnies des IndesOrientales, Paris, 2006, p. 70.
[336]Saul David, 2003. The Indian Mutiny, Penguin Books, p. 70

grievances over British taxation, the ethnic gulf between the British officers and their Indian troops and land annexations played a significant role in the rebellion. Within weeks after Pandey's mutiny, dozens of units of the Indian army joined peasant armies in widespread rebellion. The rebel soldiers were later joined by Indian nobility, many of whom had lost titles and domains under the Doctrine of Lapse and felt that the company had interfered with a traditional system of inheritance. Rebel leaders such as Nana Sahib and the Rani of Jhansi belonged to this group.

After the outbreak of the mutiny in Meerut, the rebels very quickly reached Delhi. The rebels had also captured large tracts of the North-Western Provinces and Awadh (Oudh). Most notably, in Awadh, the rebellion took on the attributes of a patriotic revolt against British presence. However, the British East India Company mobilised rapidly with the assistance of friendly Princely states, but it took the British the remainder of 1857 and the better part of 1858 to suppress the rebellion. Due to the rebels being poorly equipped and having no outside support or funding, they were brutally subdued by the British.[337]

In the aftermath, all power was transferred from the British East India Company to the British Crown, which began to administer most of India as a number of provinces. The Crown controlled the company's lands directly and had considerable indirect influence over the rest of India, which consisted of the Princely states ruled by local royal families. There were officially 565 princely states in 1947, but only 21 had actual state governments, and only three were large (My sore, Hyderabad, and Kashmir). They were absorbed into the independent nation in 1947–48.[338]

One of the most important events of the 19th century was the rise of Indian nationalism,[339] leading Indians to seek first "self-rule" and later "complete independence". However, historians are divided over the causes of its rise. Probable reasons include a "clash of interests of the Indian people with British interests",[340] "racial discriminations",[341] and "the revelation of India's past".[342]

In August 1947, the British Indian Empire was partitioned into the Union of India and Dominion of Pakistan. In particular, the partition of Punjab and Bengal led to rioting between Hindus, Muslims, and Sikhs in these provinces and spread to other nearby regions, leaving some 500,000 dead. The police and army units were largely ineffective. The British officers were gone, and the units were beginning to tolerate if not actually indulge in violence against their religious enemies.[343] Also, this

[337]Christopher Hibbert, The Great Mutiny: India 1857 (1980)
[338]Pochhammer, Wilhelm von (1981), India's road to nationhood: a political history of the subcontinent, Allied Publishers, ISBN 978-81-7764-715-0
[339]Modern India, Bipin Chandra, p. 76
[340] Ibid
[341]India Awakening and Bengal, N.S. Bose, 1976, p. 237
[342]British Paramountcy and Indian Renaissance, Part–II, Dr. R.C. Majumdar, p. 466
[343]Abid, Abdul Majeed (29 December 2014). "The forgotten massacre". The Nation. On the same dates [4 and 5 March period saw one of the largest mass migrations anywhere in modern history, with a total of 12 million Hindus, Sikhs and Muslims moving between the newly created nations of India and Pakistan (which gained independence on 15 and 14 August 1947 respectively).[344] In 1971, Bangladesh, formerly East Pakistan and East Bengal, seceded from Pakistan.[345]

PRESIDENTIAL SYSTEMS

In almost all states with a presidential system of government, the president exercises the functions of head of state and head of government, that is to say, the president directs the executive branch of government. When a president is not only head of state, but also head of government, this is known in Europe as a President of Counsel (from the French Présidente du Conseil), used 1871–1940 and 1944–1958 in the Third and Fourth French Republics. In the United States the president has always been both Head of State and Head of Government and has always had the title of President.Presidents in this system are either directly elected by popular vote or indirectly elected by an electoral college or some other democratically elected body.

In the United States, the president is indirectly elected by the Electoral College made up of electors chosen by voters in the presidential election. In most states of the United States, each elector is committed to voting for a specified candidate determined by the popular vote in each state, so that the people, in voting for each elector, are in effect voting for the candidate. However, for various reasons the numbers of electors in favour of each candidate are unlikely to be proportional to the popular vote. Thus, in five close United States elections (1824, 1876, 1888, 2000, and 2016), the candidate with the most popular votes still lost the election.

In Mexico, the president is directly elected for a six-year term by popular vote. The candidate who wins the most votes is elected president even without an absolute majority. The president may never get another term. The 2006 Mexican elections had a fierce competition, the electoral results showed a minimal difference between the two most voted candidates and such difference was just about the 0.58% of the total vote. The Federal Electoral Tribunal declared an elected president after a controversial post-electoral process.

In Brazil, the president is directly elected for a four-year term by popular vote. A candidate has to have more than 50% of the valid votes. If no candidates achieve a majority of the votes, there is a runoff election between the two candidates with most votes. Again, a candidate needs a majority of the vote to be elected. In Brazil, a president cannot be elected to more than two consecutive terms, but there is no limit on the number of terms a president can serve.

1947], Muslim League-led mobs fell with determination and full preparations on the helpless Hindus and Sikhs scattered in the villages of Multan, Rawalpindi, Campbellpur, Jhelum and Sargodha. The murderous mobs were well supplied with arms, such as daggers, swords, spears and fire-arms. (A former civil servant mentioned in his autobiography that weapon supplies had been sent from NWFP and money was supplied by Delhi-based politicians.)

[344]Symonds, Richard (1950). The Making of Pakistan. London: Faber and Faber. p. 74. OCLC 1462689. At the lowest estimate, half a million people perished and twelve millions became homeless.

[345]Srinath Raghavan (12 November 2013). 1971. Harvard University Press. ISBN 978-0-674-73129-5.

In most African countries, the president is elected by the masses and uniquely to some African countries, the position is usually finally vied for by a number of people. Therefore, the person with the majority vote is declared president.

It is not so different in Uganda. A president is elected every five years according to the Constitution. the requirements needed today are different from the requirements needed for every last ten years since the promulgation of the Constitution of Uganda in 1995. This goes to show that there must be something either sweet or enslaving about the position of presidency as shall be later discussed.

Some other countries have a semi-president system, also known as the French model. In this system, as in the parliamentary system, there are both a president and a prime minister; but unlike the parliamentary system, the president may have significant day-to-day power. For example, in France, when their party controls the majority of seats in the National Assembly, the president can operate closely with the parliament and prime minister, and work towards a common agenda. When the National Assembly is controlled by their opponents, however, the president can find themselves marginalized with the opposition party prime minister exercising most of the power. Though the prime minister remains an appointee of the president, the president must obey the rules of parliament, and select a leader from the house's majority holding party. Thus, sometimes the president and prime minister can be allies, sometimes rivals; the latter situation is known in France as cohabitation. Variants of the French semi-presidential system, developed at the beginning of the Fifth Republic by Charles de Gaulle, are used in France, Portugal, Romania, Sri Lanka and several post-colonial countries which have emulated the French model. In Finland, although the 2000 constitution moved towards a ceremonial presidency, the system is still formally semi-presidential, with the president of Finland retaining e.g. foreign policy and appointment powers.

The parliamentary republic, is a parliamentary system in which the presidency is largely ceremonial with either de facto or no significant executive authority (such as the president of Austria) or de jure no significant executive power (such as the president of Ireland), and the executive powers rests with the prime minister who automatically assumes the post as head of a majority party or coalition, but takes oath of office administered by the president. However, the president is head of the civil service, commander in chief of the armed forces and in some cases can dissolve parliament. Countries using this system include Austria, Armenia, Albania, Bangladesh, Czech Republic, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, India, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Malta, Pakistan, and Singapore.

A variation of the parliamentary republic is a system with an executive president in which the president is the head of state and the government but unlike a presidential system, is elected by and accountable to a parliament, and referred to as president. Countries using this system include Botswana, Nauru and South Africa.

In dictatorships, the title of president is frequently taken by self-appointed or military-backed leaders. Such is the case in many states: our very own Idi Amin in Uganda, Mobutu Sese Seko in Zaire, Ferdinand Marcos in the Philippines, Suharto in Indonesia, and Saddam Hussein in Iraq are some examples. Other presidents in authoritarian states have wielded only symbolic or no power such as Craveiro Lopes in Portugal and Joaquín Balaguer under the "Trujillo Era" of the Dominican Republic.

President for Life is a title assumed by some dictators to try to ensure their authority or legitimacy is never questioned. Ironically, most leaders who proclaim themselves president for life do not in fact successfully serve a life term. On the other hand, presidents like Alexandre Pétion, Rafael Carrera, Josip Broz Tito and François Duvalier died in office. Kim Il-sung was named Eternal President of the Republic after his death. I understand this description has many thinking of applying it to many presidents in Africa.

The aspect of presidency therefore takes various meanings which are shaped by the kind of governance a country subscribes to. Uganda is a democracy and as such, there are universally known dos and don’ts, powers and restraints that a president under this system of government must heed, exercise or never attempt.

Whether this notion has been acknowledged and respected is a whole other debate that I now interest you with. Most countries with a system similar to Uganda’s have either tremendously thrived and achieved big, or suffer in its shadow and reap its harsh outcomes. Uganda unfortunately sides with the latter.

PRESIDENCY IN UGANDA

Uganda is a democracy with its law enshrined in a constitution which is taken as the supreme law of the land. The powers and authority vested in the president are ably listed in this grundnorm. This means that there is no power other than the one listed in the constitution, no mandate other than the one predetermined by the same.

Remember the history of presidency? Each country was built upon the backs of torture and cruel colonialism and as such, the dream was forged out of the extremes of pain and tyranny in hope of an era of peace, equality, and inclusion. For countries with important documents like the constitution, this dream is well recorded to constantly remind the people of their purpose to act upon the dream. The Ugandan Constitution is not any different. Its preamble provides;

W E T H E P E O P L E O F U G A N D A :

RECALLING our history which has been characterised by political and constitutional instability;

RECOGNISING our struggles against the forces of tyranny, oppression and exploitation;

COMMITTED to building a better future by establishing a socio-economic and political order through a popular and durable national Constitution based on the principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and progress;

EXERCISING our sovereign and inalienable right to determine the form of governance for our country, and having fully participated in the Constitution-making process;

NOTING that a Constituent Assembly was established to represent us and to debate the Draft Constitution prepared by the Uganda Constitutional Commission and to adopt and enact a Constitution for Uganda:

DO HEREBY, in and through this Constituent Assembly solemnly adopt, enact and give to ourselves and our posterity, this Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, this22nd day of September, in the year 1995.

F O R G O D A N D M Y C O U N T R Y

This declaration by the people of Uganda is the spirit that breathes life into every law that governs the country; it is the dream they long to achieve. The president, as leader of this dream is expected to share significantly in this cause; to drive the country towards an era of peace and development.

For this reason, the constitution under Article 98 provides that;

"There shall be a President of Uganda who shall be the Head of State, Head of Government and Commander-in-Chief of the Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces and the Fountain of Honour."

This statement confers power upon the president to do certain duties in his capacity. Head of state and Head of Government, in a Parliamentary form of government, are two different people performing two very different duties. The Head of State has more ceremonial duties, while the Head of Government is responsible for running the government of a country with the approval of his or her cabinet.[346]

In a monarchy, federation, republic, commonwealth or any other form of state, the Head of State serves as an individual who is the chief public representative. The Head of the State is considered the first citizen, or the leader of the nation. His or her role is ceremonial; for example, In the U.K

[346]Read more: Difference Between Head of State and Head of Government | Difference Between http://www.differencebetween.net/miscellaneous/politics/difference-between-head-of-state-and-head-of-government/#ixzz6zIZYYufx

and Japan, the head of the state is a Monarch. In Uganda, the President is elected as the Head of the state.

The main role or duty of the Head of the State, involves attending political functions, exercising political powers, and legitimizing the state. These functions include greeting foreign dignitaries, and calling sessions of parliament. The Head of State also has the power to call for early elections. In some countries the Head of State can call for a President's rule in emergency situations. He or she is responsible for signing off on all laws passed, in parliamentary form of government. The Head of the State is the Chief of the Armed Forces.

In Presidential form of government like in the USA and in South Korea, the President is the Head of the State and serves the country as the chief executive. He is the commander-in-chief of the armed forces. The Head of State supervises various facets of bureaucracy, but does not have the responsibility of the chief legislator. This is quite similar to Uganda which has a separate arm of government doing legislation.

In a parliamentary form of government, the Prime Minister or Premier is the Head of the Government. He is the leader of the ruling party and is the chief of the executive branch. He presides over a cabinet. In the Presidential form of government and absolute monarchies, the Head of the Government and the Head of the State are the same individual. Uganda has both a parliament and a prime minister, but the Constitution puts all this leadership in the hands of the president.

The duties and responsibilities of the Head of the State include implementing laws, supervising bureaucracy, and making all-important decisions with the approval of the cabinet. He/she is also the head of the legislature. In the presidential form of government, the President is not a member of the legislature, thus he is not the head and this is the case in the Ugandan Constitution.

Article 99 of the Constitution further provides that;

The executive authority of Uganda is vested in the President and shall be exercised in accordance with this Constitution and the laws of Uganda.

This provision makes the president responsible for the administration of different executive affairs like implementing the law, and putting into action the policies relevant for a country's development.

This can seem to be so much power since on the onset; it looks boundless and open on how the president can fulfil this responsibility. However, the second part of the provision limits the scope of such powers to strictly "in accordance to [the] Constitution and the laws of Uganda". This would ultimately settle the debate of whether the president is above the law because clearly, he is bound by the law to do what is expected of him as the executive head.

This however does not rule out the possibility of stretching his powers beyond the confines of the Constitution. (Presidential Overreaches shall be covered in Chapter 8 of this book) This is partly because, even the Constitution cannot hold him accountable! Article 98 quite clearly does not envisage an opportunity to take the president to court so as to atone for his/her wrongdoings. It is only possible to do the same once the person is no longer clothed with this power.

This indeed has happened many times in the history of the world. Since 1945, many regime leaders and key figures have been brought before domestic and international courts to answer to charges including genocide and crimes against humanity, amid a larger struggle to promote and enforce the rule of law worldwide.

The famously known include; Nuremberg Trials on the Holocaust; the 1945 Post-war Trial of Japanese General; the 1946-48 Tokyo War Crimes Trials; the 1985 Argentina's Trial of the Juntas; the 1993-2017 International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia set up by the UN Security Council to try those responsible for mass killings of Bosnian Muslims, Croats, and Kosovo Albanians, as well as for abuses against ethnic Serbs, in the Balkans beginning in 1991; the 1994-2015 Tribunal for Rwandan Genocide; the 1998-2006 Legal Battles of Augusto Pinochet; the 2011-12 Trial of Egypt's Mubarak; to mention but a few.

A few of these however, have been charged for the atrocities committed during their time served as presidents and yet, many continue to disrespect their mandate and abuse their powers. Most of these have since retired, or even passed on without ever being questioned about their times as heads of state.

Notably, the former president of South Africa; Jacob Zuma has been sentenced to 15 months in jail by the country's highest court. The sentence comes after the Constitutional Court found him guilty of contempt for defying its order to appear at an inquiry into corruption while he was president.[347]

In 1970, Sir William Wilberforce Kadhumbula Nadiope, the former vice president of Uganda and Kyabazinga of Busoga, was sent to Kirinya Government Prison to serve an 18-month jail term.[348]

In as much as this would serve as a representation of the power of the Constitution over every citizen in Uganda, for many a Ugandan, this was the highest form of betrayal on the part of then president Milton Obote and his ruling Uganda Peoples' Congress (UPC) party where Nadiope was the vice president and had helped the party win the April 25, 1962, general election.[349]

[347]BBC News, 30th June, 2021. Ex-President Jacob Zuma sentenced by South Africa's top court, [online] available at; https://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa-57650517 (accessed on 1st July 2021)
[348] Daily Monitor, 23rd June, 2018. KyabazingaNadiope jailed for fraud, [online] available at; https://www.monitor.co.ug/uganda/magazines/people-power/kyabazinga-nadiope-jailed-for-fraud-1763982 (accessed on 1st July, 2021)
[349] Ibid

THE FOUNTAIN OF HONOR: AN ANALYSIS OF THE POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT AND THEIR EXTENT IN UGANDA

I come to the most significant feature of our time—the increasing powers of the executive. I need hardly remind you of the extent of these powers. They touch the life of every one of us at innumerable points: and they are an inseparable part of modern society. No one will deny that we could not have reached our standards and way of life without them. The constitutional executive powers held by the President are broadly defined and vary in application.

EXPRESSED POWERS

The expressed powers of the President are those expressed in the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda,1995 (as amended)

Article 98 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda 1995 (as amended) creates the executive branch of the government consisting of the President the vice President. Clause 2 states that the executive power shall be vested in a President. (Article 105 (1) states that the President shall hold his office for a term of five years. Article 99(1) is a vesting clause similar to Article 98(2) but it vests the powers to execute the instructions of Parliament which has the exclusive power to make laws.

Article 103 states the method for election of the president where the person submits to the electoral commission on or before the day appointed as nomination day in relation to the election a document which is signed by that person nominating him or her a candidate. The nomination should be supported by one hundred votes in each of at least two thirds of all districts in Uganda.

COMMANDER IN CHIEF (CIC)

The direction of war implies the direction of the common strength and the power of directing and employing the common strength forms a usual and essential part in the definition of the Executive power"

Alexander Hamilton.

Perhaps the most important of all presidential powers is commander in chief of the Uganda Peoples Defence forces. while the power to declare war is constitutionally vested in parliament the president commands and directs the military and is responsible for planning military strategy. The parliament provides a check on Presidential military power through its control over military spending and regulation. While historically presidents initiated the process for going to war, critics have charged that there have been several conflicts in which presidents did not get official declarations including

It is obvious that parliamentary control rights can be conceived as a continuum, deliminated by two extreme points. At one extreme parliaments have no say whatsoever in any deployment decision at the other end of the spectrum, parliamentary consent is required for all operations. In between these two extremes is a dazzling range of options giving parliaments a more or less tightly institutionalized consultative role or say in an increasingly large set of military operations.

Along with the armed forces, the president also directs Ugandan's foreign policy. Through the Department of defence, the president is responsible for the protection of Ugandans abroad and of foreign nationals in Uganda. The president decides whether to recognize new nations and new governments and negotiate treaties with other nations which become binding on Uganda when approved by a two thirds vote of parliament.

The President is the head of the executive branch of the federal government and is constitutionally obligated to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. Generally, a president may remove purely executive officials at his discretion. However, the parliament can curtail and constrain a Presidents authority to fire commissioners of independent regulatory agencies and certain inferior executive officers by statute. To manage the growing federal bureaucracy, presidents have gradually surrounded themselves with many layers of staff who were eventually organized into the executive office of the president of the Republic of Uganda.

The debate over the extent of presidential authority has been argued since the very formation of Uganda. On 8th October 1995, the constitution was promulgated by the constituent Assembly replacing the 1967 constitution. At that time the founding fathers intended to create an effective central government with a wide range of enforceable powers. The president of Uganda was intended to be chief Protector and the representative of the populace.

The Constitutional Executive powers vested in the president provide him with the ability to speedily act in the nations interest. "Decision activity, secrecy and dispatch will generally characterize the proceedings of one man in a much more eminent degree than the proceedings of any greater number. The President is vested with these powers to maintain the common good on behalf of societal interest.

The founders of the constitution intended to create a government that was clothed with all powers requisite to complete execution of its trust. The parliament is granted wide latitude in its authority over the military and the execution of the laws Article 79[350] provides that the parliament is entrusted with the ability to organize arm and discipline the military and make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to execute these powers. These military powers provide parliament with control over undeclared as well as declared actions of war.

[350] The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

Conversely Article 98(1)[351] entails the commander in Chief powers of the president. This provides him with supreme command over land and Naval of the country and he may order the armed forces to perform any necessary military duties as appropriate for the defense of Uganda and to effectuate the defense of Uganda. These specific powers accorded to the president exist both in times of peace as well as in times of war.

The president is also tasked to recommend to parliament consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. In any emergency scenarios, the president may take unilateral action before seeking parliamentary approval and when verification from the Parliament. According to John Locke this unrestrained power can be a concern and a potential threat to the liberty of the people.

"The Reigns of good princes have been always most dangerous to the liberties of their people. For when their successors managing the Government with different thoughts would draw the actions of those good rulers into precedent and make them the standard of their prerogative as if what had been done only for the good of the people. If they so pleased it has before the people could receive their original right and get that to be declared not to be prerogative which truly was never so"

Locke's reference to the prerogative of the people rings true even today as the specific enumerated powers of the president of Uganda have long been subject to the dispute. According to Locke, the executive branch must be able to deal with unforeseen issued that arise especially those which cannot be anticipated by the legislative branch where the law does not provide for all scenarios, the president must have the discretion and the latitude to act in a manner not closely prescribed by law so long as it is exercised for the public good.

The commander in chief powers are based on the checks and balances system subject to set by the legislature and subject to consideration by the judicially while it is true that Congress alone has the power to declare war on other nations, centralising authority within the executive permits the unitary executive evaluate threats consider policy choices and mobilize military and diplomatic resources with a speed and energy that is far superior to any other branch. However, a forward thinking president can reasonably operate within the confines of the constitution to protect the security of the nation. A strong executive would be far more effective and competent for the nation than a weak one.

In Youngstown sheet & Tube co v Sawyer[352] justice Jackson laid out a three pronged test that determine the validity of an exercise of executive power. First when the president acts pursuant to an express or implied authorization of congress his authority is at his maximum. In this scenario, parliament has granted explicit congressional authorization for the president to act when the president and parliament act together to address an emergency situation the president's concurrent powers are at their zenith.

[351] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[352] 3430.5 579(1952),

Secondly the president acts in absence of either a congressional grant or denial of authority, he can only rely upon his own independent powers but there is a zone of twilight in which he and congress may have concurrent authority or in which its distribution is uncertain when the president acts within a zone of twilight, he acts without congress and authorization for his actions and may face the ramifications for doing so at a later date. While acting under the zone of twilight the president's independent powers are at their fullest. In this case the president can act with all embracing swiftly moving authority.

The powers of the president within this zone of twilight must be considered within certain factors. First whether necessity exists to authorize the presidents exercise of powers. This increases the likelihood that a court will later favor the presidents exercise of discretion. The President may act without implied or express congressional approval but he cannot act without necessity. The greater the immediate necessity for presidential action, the greater likelihood that the courts will sustain the presidents continuing independent authority.

Finally, the third standard for presidential authority arises when the President takes measures incompatible with the expressed or implied will of congress his power is at its lowest ebb for then he can rely only upon his own constitutional powers minus any constitutional powers of parliament over the matter. When the President acts in violation of an act of parliament his power isn't its lowest ebb because he acts against parliamentary authority.

The President's war making powers are historically subject to the whim of parliament while a president requires congressional approval to declare war on a sovereign nation, congress may later choose to vote the presidents declaration of war or deny the president the necessary funds to continue the war. However, in the case of an emergency action, such as disaster occurring within a state whereas the president has to send in the National Guard to maintain order the president's power must be absolute and not subject to congressional or judicial scrutiny.

The president also has the power to nominate judges including members of the supreme court of the Republic of Uganda. However, these nominations require parliament confirmation. Securing parliament approval can provide a major obstacle for presidents who wish to orient the federal judiciary toward a particular ideological stance. When nominating judges to district or magistrate courts, presidents often respect the long standing tradition of parliamentary courtesy.

The constitutions ineligibility clause prevents the presidents from simultaneously being a member of congress. Therefore, the president cannot directly introduce legislative proposals for consideration in parliament. However, the president can take an indirect role in shaping legislation especially if the president political party has a majority parliament. For example, the president or other officials of the executive branch may draft legislation and then ask representatives to introduce these drafts into parliament. The president can further influence the legislative branch through constitutionally mandated periodic reports to parliament. These reports may be either written or oral which often outline the president's legislative proposals for the coming year.

THE PREROGATIVE OF THE PRESIDENT

The powers of the President in colonial times were absolute. These powers derived from the absolutism of the Queen. Accordingly, it was in the power of the Crown to dismiss and disappoint as it pleased without qualification. It appears that on the grant of independence, this position was retained and the President had similar powers. The Prerogative of the President and its absolute nature was tested in the case of Opoloto V Ag[353]. The appellant had been dismissed from the Uganda Army in which he had been serving as Brigadier and Chief of the Defence Staff. He was as well detained under the Emergency Regulations. He sought a declaration that his discharge was invalid and that he was still a member of the Armed Forces.

Held (Sir Charles Newbold P)

The prerogative powers vested in the British crown before independence including the power to dismiss at will officers in its service are now vested in the President and to take away this established prerogative right by statute required clear words.

For a long time therefore, it remained the position that it was in the President's power to appoint and disappoint as he deemed fit. This position however did not survive the 1995 Constitution and it was soon to be tested in courts of law. Judicial pronouncements cast great doubt as to the validity.

It was castigated and jettisoned in Major General David Tinyefuza V Attorney General[354] where in Kanyeihamba JSC noted that, 'In England, where the notion of crown prerogative has from time to time immemorial been accepted, English courts have from time to time held that the royal prerogative cannot be used to deprive a citizen of his or her vested interest without compensation…The case of Opoloto V Uganda which concerned the exercise of a Presidential prerogative to remove an officer from his commission was also cited. In this age of modernity, democracy and entitlement to human rights and freedoms, Opoloto's case can no longer be treated as good law… The Constitution and laws of Uganda have provided clear and emphatic provisions for the removal from office of public officers. Removal must be for cause and the person affected must be given notice and opportunity to be heard. Therefore, the Opoloto's case must be confined to its four corners by this court…If the President who is commander in chief of the Uganda Defence Forces had wanted to remove the petitioner from those rights and responsibilities, he should have done so expressly and for one of the causes spelt out in the relevant statute and regulations. Further more, the President has no constitutional or legal power to deprive the petitioner of his vested rights such as his entitlement to pension and other rights which he earned as a member of the Uganda People's Defence Forces...it should be the law to affect the rights of the petitioner and not the prerogative of the President'.

[353] (1969) EA 631
[354] CONST. APP. NO.1 OF 199

Mukasa-Kikonyogo JSC on her part stated that , 'I would be declined to accept the submission of Mr. Lule basing himself on the case of Opoloto V Attorney General[355] that the President had a prerogative right to remove the respondent. To hold so in my view…would be inconsistent with the rights of the individual member of the Army. It would give the president powers to dismiss arbitrarily as apparently it happened in Opoloto's case (supra). As it was submitted by the appellant, in exercise of his powers, the President should comply with the law but not contrary to it'.

(Wambuzi CJ)

'It is my considered view that in the case before us, the President was bound to act in accordance with the law whether or not he was exercising prerogative powers'.

It would appear that absolutism of the President was done away with by the 1995 Constitution. Under Article 20 (2)[356] of the Constitution, it is stipulated that the rights and freedoms of the individual and groups enshrined in this Chapter shall be respected, upheld and promoted by all organs and agencies of government and by all persons (i.e. including the President). Even in the prerogative of mercy established under Article 121[357] to be exercised by the President, he can only exercise it with the advice of an Advisory Committee on the Prerogative of Mercy which consists the Attorney General and 6 prominent citizens of Uganda appointed by the President. (Does the fact of being appointed by the President affect their independence of mind?)

Article 98[358] of the 1995 constitution of Uganda provides for the president of Uganda that; there shall be a President of Uganda who shall be the Head of State, Head of Government and Commander-in-Chief of the Uganda Peoples' Defense Forces and the Fountain of Honor. The President shall take precedence over all persons in Uganda, and in descending order, the Vice President, the Speaker and the Chief Justice shall take precedence over all other persons in Uganda.

[355] (1969) EA 631
[356] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[357] Ibid
[358] Ibid

Before assuming the duties of the office of President, a person elected President shall take and subscribe the oath of allegiance and the presidential oath specified in the Fourth Schedule to this Constitution. While holding office, the President shall not be liable to proceedings in any court. Civil or criminal proceedings may be instituted against a person after ceasing to be President, in respect of anything done or omitted to be done in his or her personal capacity before or during the term of office of that person; and any period of limitation in respect of any such proceedings shall not be taken to run during the period while that person was President.[359]

The president shall be elected as provided under Article 103[360] of this constitution, that; The election of the President shall be by universal adult suffrage through a secret ballot. A person shall not be a candidate in a presidential election unless— (a) that person submits to the Electoral Commission on or before the day appointed as nomination day in relation to the election, a document which is signed by that person nominating him or her as a candidate; and (b) the nomination is supported by one hundred voters in each of at least two-thirds of all the districts in Uganda. The election of the President shall be held during the first thirty days of the last ninety days before the expiration of the term of the President, except in the case of— (a) the first election under this Constitution; (b) an election held under Article 104(6)[361] of this Constitution; (c) an election held under Article 109(2) of this Constitution; and (d) an election necessitated by the fact that a normal presidential election could not be held as a result of the existence of a state of war or a state of emergency, in which case, the election shall be held within such period as Parliament may, by law, prescribe. A candidate shall not be declared elected as President unless the number of votes cast in favour of that candidate at the presidential election is more than 50 percent of valid votes cast at the election. Where at a presidential election no candidate obtains the percentage of votes specified in clause (4) of this Article, a second election shall be held within thirty days after the declaration of the results in which election the two candidates who obtained the highest number of votes shall be the only candidates. The candidate who obtains the highest number of votes in an election under clause (5) of this Article shall be declared elected President. The Electoral Commission shall ascertain, publish and declare in writing under its seal, the results of the presidential election within forty-eight hours from the close of polling. A person elected President during the term of a President shall assume office within twenty-four hours after the expiration of the term of the predecessor and in any other case, within twenty-four hours after being declared elected as President. Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, Parliament shall by law, prescribe the procedure for the election and assumption of office by a President.

[359] Article 98 of the 1995 Uganda constitution.
[360] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[361] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

Under the same constitution, Article 99[362] provides Executive authority of Uganda; the executive authority of Uganda is vested in the President and shall be exercised in accordance with this Constitution and the laws of Uganda. The President shall execute and maintain this Constitution and all laws made under or continued in force by this Constitution. It shall be the duty of the President to abide by, uphold and safeguard this Constitution and the laws of Uganda and to promote the welfare of the citizens and protect the territorial integrity of Uganda. Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, the functions conferred on the President by clause (1) of this Article may be exercised by the President either directly or through officer's subordinate to the President. A statutory instrument or other instrument issued by the President or any person authorized by the President may be authenticated by the signature of a Minister; and the validity of any instrument so authenticated shall not be called in question on the ground that it is not made, issued or executed by the President.[363]

The term tenure refers to the term of holding something. Article 105 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 provides for the tenure of the President. A person who is elected President may hold office for one or more terms, and each term is five years. This implies that there is no limit to the number of terms a president can hold office for as long as he/she is democratically elected. The Constitution originally provided for a limit of two terms for a given president; however, the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2005 removed the limits to the tenure of the office of President. Clause 3 of Article 105[364] provides for two scenarios when the seat of the President can be declared vacant, i.e. on the expiration of the time stipulated, which is five years or if the incumbent dies or resigns or ceases to hold office in accordance with Article 107. Article 107[365] expounds on the grounds that would warrant a president to be removed from office hence declaring the office vacant. The grounds are; abuse of office or willful violation of the oath of allegiance and presidential oath or any provision of the Constitution. This points to the rule of law since the President is subject to the law as well. The other grounds are misconduct or misbehavior, physical or mental incapacity. A president can resign by addressing a signed letter to the Chief Justice indicating his intentions to resign from the office of the President. Such resignation takes effect when the Chief Justice receives it. Upon receiving the President's resignation, the Chief Justice shall immediately notify the Vice president, the Speaker, and the electoral commission about the resignation.

[362] Ibid
[363] Article 99 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[364] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[365] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

Article 106[366] of the constitution provides for the terms and conditions of the president; the constitution of the Republic of Uganda explicitly states the terms and conditions of service of the president. This is to provide the scope under which money shall be allocated to the president and clarify issues concerning taxation and allowances. The law provides that the president shall be paid a salary and allowances and afforded such other benefits as Parliament shall by law provide. The Parliament, following its mandate, went ahead to pass the law on Emoluments and Benefits of the President, Vice President and Prime Minister Act. The law provides for the allowances and salaries of the president, vice president and Prime Minister.

However, the provision under this Act does not cover the benefits for a president who ceases to hold office. It only provides for how they can be removed as provided for under the constitution. The law goes ahead to provide that the presidents' salaries and allowances and any other benefits shall be charged on the consolidated fund. In addition to this, the president is exempted from direct personal taxation of his allowances and other benefits except on the official salary. The law also prohibits the president from holding any other public office other than what is conferred by the constitution. Similarly, the president is prohibited from holding any office of profit or emoluments that are likely to compromise his official capacity. It is also a requirement under the law that the salary, allowances, and other benefits granted to the president shall not be varied to the disadvantage of the president while he or she holds office; the same applies to the president's retirement benefits.

Article 107[367] of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda provides for the grounds and procedure under which the President may be removed from office. The President may be removed from office on grounds of abuse of office or willful violation of the oath of allegiance and presidential oath or violation of any provision of the constitution. The President may also be removed for misconduct or misbehaviour where he/she has conducted him/herself in a manner which is likely to bring the office of the President into hatred, ridicule, contempt or disrepute, and; where the President dishonestly does any act or omission which is prejudicial or inimical to the economy or security of Uganda. The removal of the President on the grounds of abuse of office, misconduct or misbehaviour is commenced by a notice in writing submitted to the Speaker. The notice should be signed by not less than one-third of all the Members of Parliament (MPs). The notice should state that the MPs intend to move a motion for a resolution in Parliament for the removal of the President on any of these grounds i.e. willful abuse of office or willful violation of the oath of allegiance and Presidential oath or any other provision of the constitution, misconduct or misbehaviour. The notice is considered complete when it discloses the particulars of each charge and is supported by necessary documents on which the claim for the President to be investigated for the purpose of removal from office is based.

[366] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[367] Ibid

The Speaker is required to cause a copy of the notice to be transmitted to the President and the Chief Justice within twenty-four hours after the notice has been lodged with/her office. Upon receipt of the notice from the Speaker, the Chief Justice is required to constitute a tribunal comprising three Justices of the Supreme Court within seven days. The tribunal is tasked with the responsibility to investigate the allegations in the notice and to report its findings to Parliament stating whether there is a prima facie case for the removal of the President.

The President has a right to appear at the proceedings of the tribunal and to be represented there by a lawyer or other expert or person of his or her choice. Where the tribunal finds that there is a prima facie case for the removal of the President on any of the grounds alleged in the notice, Parliament is required to vote on a resolution for the President's removal from office. The President is removed from office where the resolution is supported by two-thirds of all the members of parliament. Parliament has fourteen days to move the motion for a resolution for the removal of the President after receipt of the report from the Tribunal by the Speaker.

Under Article 124[368] has the power to declare a state of war it states; the President may, with the approval of Parliament, given by resolution supported by not less than two-thirds of all the members of Parliament, declare that a state of war exists between Uganda and any other country. Where it is impracticable to seek the approval of Parliament before declaration of a state of war, the President may declare a state of war without the approval but shall seek the approval immediately after the declaration and in any case not later than seventy-two hours after the declaration. Where the President makes the declaration of a state of war under clause (2) when Parliament is in recess, the Speaker shall immediately summon Parliament to an emergency session to sit within seventy-two hours after the declaration of a state of war. The President may, with the approval of Parliament, given by resolution, revoke a declaration of a state of war made under clause (1) or (2) of this Article.

Under the Article 110[369] it is further provided that; The President may, in consultation with the Cabinet, by proclamation, declare that a state of emergency exists in Uganda, or any part of Uganda if the President is satisfied that circumstances exist in Uganda or in that part of Uganda— (a) in which Uganda or that part of it is threatened by war or external aggression; (b) in which the security or the economic life of the country or that part is threatened by internal insurgency or natural disaster; or (c) which render necessary the taking of measures which are required for securing the public safety, the defense of Uganda and the maintenance of public order and supplies and services essential to the life of the community.

[368] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[369] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

Subject to the provisions of this Article, a state of emergency declared under clause (1) of this Article shall remain in existence for not more than ninety days and shall then expire. The President shall cause the proclamation declaring the state of emergency to be laid before Parliament for approval as soon as practicable as and in any case not later than fourteen days after it was issued. A state of emergency may be extended by Parliament for a period not exceeding ninety days at a time. The President or Parliament shall, if satisfied that the circumstances for the declaration of the state of emergency have ceased to exist, revoke the proclamation by which the state of emergency was declared. During any period when a state of emergency declared under this Article exists, the President shall submit to Parliament at such intervals as Parliament may prescribe, regular reports on actions taken by or on behalf of the President for the purposes of the emergency. Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, Parliament shall enact such laws as may be necessary for enabling effective measures to be taken for dealing with any state of emergency that may be declared under this Article. Any resolution passed by Parliament for the purposes of clause (4) or (5) of this Article shall be supported by the votes of more than one-half of all the members of Parliament.

Article 121[370] of the constitution provide for the prerogative of mercy; There shall be an Advisory Committee on the Prerogative of Mercy which shall consist of— (a) the Attorney General who shall be the chairperson; and (b) six prominent citizens of Uganda appointed by the President. A person shall not be qualified for appointment as a member of the committee if he or she is a Member of Parliament, the Uganda Law Society or a district council. A member appointed under clause (1)(b) of this Article shall serve for a period of four years and shall cease to be a member of the committee— (a) if circumstances arise that would disqualify him or her from appointment; or (b) if removed by the President for inability to perform the functions of his or her office arising from infirmity of body or mind or for misbehavior, misconduct or incompetence. The President may, on the advice of the committee— (a) grant to any person convicted of an offence a pardon either free or subject to lawful conditions; (b) grant to a person a respite, either indefinite or for a specified period, from the execution of punishment imposed on him or her for an offence; (c) substitute a less severe form of punishment for a punishment imposed on a person for an offence; or (d) remit the whole or part of a punishment imposed on a person or of a penalty or forfeiture otherwise due to Government on account of any offence. Where a person is sentenced to death for an offence, a written report of the case from the trial judge or judges or person presiding over the court or tribunal, together with such other information derived from the record of the case or elsewhere as may be necessary, shall be submitted to the Advisory Committee on the Prerogative of Mercy. A reference in this Article to conviction or imposition of a punishment, sentence or forfeiture includes conviction or imposition of a punishment, penalty, sentence or forfeiture by a court martial or other military tribunal except a field court martial.

[370] Ibid

DELEGATED POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT

The Delegated powers are a list of items found in the Constitution of the republic of Uganda that set forth the authoritative capacity of parliament.

Almost all presidential powers rely on what the parliament does or does not do. Presidential executive orders implement the law but parliament can overrule such orders by changing the law. And many presidential powers are delegated powers that parliament has accorded presidents to exercise on its behalf and it can cut back or rescind.

Delegated powers also called enumerated powers are a set of items found in Article that set forth the authoritative capacity of parliament. The lists of enumerated powers include the following. The parliament shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of Uganda. But all duties, imposts and exercise shall be uniform throughout Uganda. To borrow money on the credit of Uganda, declare war, grant letters of Marque and Reprisal and make rules concerning captures on land and water and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution of the foregoing powers and all other powers by the vested by the constitution in the government of the republic of Uganda.

INHERENT POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT

These are assumed powers of the president not specifically listed in the constitution. They are those powers that a sovereign state holds. In Uganda the president derives these powers from the loosely worded statements in the constitution that the executive power shall be vested in the president. Inherent powers are assumed powers of the president not specifically listed in the constitution. They come from the president's role as Chief Executive. The question of presidential power is complicated by a key omission in certain constitutional sentences language. As opposed to Article 79 which states that the parliament is vested with the legislative powers herein granted, Article 99 does not use that language. It says all executive power is vested in the president. Supporters of the unitary executive theory argue that this means that the president's power particularly the inherent power that come with being commander in chief are open ended and cannot be checked by the other two branches.

EMERGENCY POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT

The president of Uganda as head of the executive branch has the authority to declare a federal state of emergency. A state of emergency is a governmental declaration that may suspend some normal functions of the executive legislative and judicial powers, alerts citizens to change their normal behaviors or order government agencies to implement emergency preparedness plans It can also be used as a rationale for suspending rights and freedoms even if guaranteed under the constitution. Such declaration usually come during a time of natural or man made disaster periods of civil unrest on following a declaration of war or situation of international or internal armed conflict.

To make a declaration of the state of emergency the president as a perquisite must be satisfied of three parameters that; Uganda or a part of it is threatened by war or external aggression.

The security or the economic life of the country or as part of it is threatened by internal insurgency or natural disaster. There are circumstances which render necessary the taking of measures which are required for securing the public safety, the defence of Uganda and the maintenance of public order and supplies and services essential to the life of the community.

PRESIDENTIAL DECLARATIONS

Uganda is a democratic republic and has three arms of government. Each has its roles laid out by the Constitution and therefore one arm must not at any point try to exercise the roles of another arm of government.

Article 79(1)[371] of the Constitution provides that subject to the Constitution's provisions; Parliament shall have the power to make laws on any matter for the peace, order, development and good governance of Uganda. Therefore, this provision gives the parliament the power to make any law that governs the daily workings in the jurisdiction of Uganda.

Article 79(2)[372] further provides that except as provided in the Constitution, no person or body other than Parliament shall have the power to make provisions having the force of law in Uganda except under authority conferred by an Act of Parliament. This provision bars any other body or person from making any other law for governing the country except as provided by the law.

The two provisions vest all the law-making power into the parliament, and the parliament has over time devised a procedure of making the laws, which is peculiar to their work and has over time brought forth the laws that manage the country.

It is important to note that the Constitution envisages other times when laws can be made without following the provisions of Chapter six strictly. Indeed, Article 99(5) of the Constitution provides that the signature of a Minister may authenticate a statutory instrument or other instrument issued by the President or any person authorised by the President; and the validity of any instrument so authenticated shall not be called in question on the ground that it is not made, issued or executed by the President.

[371] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[372] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

This provision of the law seems to give the president the power to make statutory instruments that the minister can pass as law upon signature by the minister. Recently, the president of Uganda made declarations which were later codified by the Minister of Health and signed for operation as guidelines during the subsistence of the law. However, these laws were made according to the powers given to the minister for secondary legislation.

The failure by the government to follow the ordinary law-making process has, in turn, affected the observation of other substantial laws. Central to this is the Human rights violation. Most of the directives issued by the president were to do with movement, assembly, health, to mention but a few. To a certain extent, these rights were limited for purposes of curtailing the spread of the virus. As much as the move was for good intention, the mode of doing the same was not backed up by law and amounted to a violation.

Article 43 [373]of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda provides that in the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms prescribed in this Chapter, no person shall prejudice the fundamental or other human rights and freedoms of others or the public interest. The provision further describes public interest that public interest under this Article shall not permit, among other things, any limitation of the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms prescribed by this Chapter beyond what is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society what is provided in this Constitution. Dr Busingye breaks down the meaning of this provision that the formulation of Article 43(2)[374] was deliberate, and each word as employed in that provision has particular significance. The effect of this provision was to set a high bar for the limitation of human rights.[375]

What is interesting is that Human rights were one aspect that all countries around the world were fighting for in their struggle for independence. They expected these rights to be guarded when it is a familiar face in the position of power. Indeed, the Constitution was deliberate in spelling them out clearly so that they would not be violated any longer. However, the person expected to protect the same has willingly disregarded the same by passing the declarations; an action that would warrant invoking Article 107[376] of the Constitution.

This is solely because of an alternative provided by the same Constitution that was ignored. Article

[373] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[374] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[375] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[376] Ibid

110[377] of the Constitution provides that the President may, in consultation with the Cabinet, by proclamation, declare that a state of emergency exists in Uganda or any part of Uganda.

If the President is satisfied that circumstances exist in Uganda or in that part of Uganda in which Uganda or that part of it is threatened by war or external aggression; in which the security or the economic life of the country or that part is threatened by internal insurgency or natural disaster; or which render necessary the taking of measures which are required for securing the public safety, the defence of Uganda and the maintenance of public order and supplies and services essential to the life of the community.

This state of emergency only subsists for ninety days and then expires, except where Parliament extends the days for a period not exceeding ninety days at a time. Such a declaration by the president must be laid before Parliament for approval as soon as practicable and in any case not later than fourteen days after it was issued.[378]

It is important to note that subject to the Constitution's provisions; Parliament must enact such laws as may be necessary for enabling effective measures to be taken for dealing with any state of emergency that may be declared under this Article.[379] This means that after the declaration, any orders made by the president must be codified by parliament.

During this time, the president would make these declarations and lay the same before the parliament for approval and maintain, uphold the Constitution. This is a fundamental responsibility he is expected to carryout. Article 99[380] of the Constitution provides;

2. The President shall execute and maintain this Constitution and all laws made under or continued in force by this Constitution.

3. It shall be the duty of the President to abide by, uphold and safeguard this Constitution and the laws of Uganda and to promote the welfare of the citizens and protect the territorial integrity of Uganda.

There is no justification so far for the declarations given without the due regard to the provisions of the constitution. what is even more interesting, why hasn't the legislature triggered their Constitutionally granted power to sanction such abuse of power?

LAW MAKING PROCESS IN TIMES OF EMERGENCY

Article 110 of the Constitution provides that the President may, in consultation with the Cabinet, by proclamation, declare that a state of emergency exists in Uganda or any part of Uganda. It further

[377] Ibid
[378] Article 110 (1) (2) (3) (4) of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995, as amended
[379] Article 110 (7), Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[380] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

provides thus;

"If the President is satisfied that situations exist in Uganda or in a specific part of Uganda in which Uganda or that part of it is threatened by war or external aggression; in which the security or the economic life of the country or that part is threatened by internal insurgency or natural disaster; or which render necessary the taking of measures which are required for securing the public safety, the defence of Uganda and the maintenance of public order and supplies and services essential to the life of the community."

This state of emergency only subsists for ninety days and then expires, except where Parliament extends the days for a period not exceeding ninety days at a time. Such a declaration by the president must be tabled before Parliament for approval as soon as practicable and in any case not later than 14 days after it was issued.[381]

It is important to note that subject to the Constitution's provisions; Parliament must enact such laws as may be critical for enabling measures to be taken for tackling any state of emergency that may be declared under this Article.[382] This means that after the declaration, any orders made by the president must be codified by parliament.

The laws governing the law-making process in Uganda are elaborate and envisage many circumstances that may usually affect the law-making process, including times of emergency like global pandemics. To this extent, it remains to establish how Uganda has operated in times of emergency like global pandemics and how its law-making process has been upheld and respected in the face of the same.

TENABILITY OF EXECUTIVE POWERS

It is noted that Uganda's rule as a protectorate was a one-man show, the commission. He was the head of the Protectorate, executive officer and the law-maker making the other officers puppets of the government until 1920.[383]

Today Uganda is considered to a democratic country though with a number of challenges at least in each of her governance and institutional framework there are quite a number of loopholes that one would base on to disqualify her as a democratic state. The major argument would be based on two aspects one being manipulation of a system and institutions by the executive. Though for the past 56 years Uganda has made evident strides towards rule of law and democracy.[384]

[381] Article 110 (1) (2) (3) (4) of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995, as amended
[382] Article 110 (7), Ibid
[383] Kanyeihamba , Constitutional Law And Government in Uganda(1975)
[384] Justice Byaruhanga ; Democracy in Uganda after 50 years of independence; Acknowledgement of the problems and possible solutions pp. 10.

Under rule of law, the authority of law does not depend so much on the law as its instrumental capabilities, but on its degree of autonomy, that is, the degree to which law is distinct and separate from other normative structures such as politics and religion.

In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa: Re Ex parte Application President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (2) SDA 674 (CC) at 67 paragraph 85, the court reasoned that the rule of law requires "that the exercise of public power by the executive and other functionaries' should not be arbitrary. Decisions must be rationally related to the purpose for which the power is given."

Contrary to Article 99 (1) the executive authority of the president does not go beyond the provisions of the laws that is the president must abide by, uphold and safe guard the constitution and people's interests.

Factors that favor the rule of law for proper governance include a legal framework that separates and delineate the responsibilities and powers of the legislative, executive and judicial branches streamlining with the local and state levels plus ensuring functioning accountability.[385]

The adherence to the rule of law requires the executive and all institutions at all levels to implement political decisions in an efficient, transparent, accountable, democratic and coordinated fashion. This requires the existence and application of appropriate mechanisms to ensure accountability and transparency of all relevant bodies in the state. The rule of law entails public and private accountability in the exercise of power, and consistent and fair regulation and dispute resolution, in both national and local contexts.[386]

Democratization takes proper constitutional reforms characterized by introduction of multiparty democracy. These lead to political reforms as to rule of law through reintroduction and sustenance of presidential term limits, institution of fair elections and liberation of legislature as well as judiciary from the executive shackles. The fact is Uganda's constitution recognizes the aspiration of the people in relation to a government based on rule of law.[387]The Constitution also establishes the rule of law as one of the national objectives and directive principles of governance.

That though the constitution confers several powers to the president, these are still limited by the parliament with some powers carried exclusively by the president. Thus where the president exercises extreme powers towards dictatorship the fault lies with him and the parliament.[388]

[385] G. W Kanyeihamba, The rule of law, Judicialism , and Development volume 3
[386] O'Donnell, Guillermo A. 2004. "Why the Rule of Law Matters," Journal of Democracy 15(4); Weingast B. 1997 ;The political foundations of democracy and the rule of law'. Am. Polit. Sci. Rev. 91(2):245–63; UNDP (2011), Strengthening the Rule of Law in Crisis-affected and Fragile Situations. New York: UNDP, at 8, 11.
[387]Article 1 of the Constitution of The Republic of Uganda, 1995 as amended.
[388]Kittredge,j.(2003) Presidents, Congress, and the Use of Force: A Critique of Presidential Powers. The History Teacher, 37(1), 89-98. Doi:10.2307/ 1555603

When acting as administrative authority, the president is required to adhere to the constitutional provisions by following the necessary procedures such as acquiring parliamentary approval.[389]

Article 172 (a)[390] provides the president power to appoint certain categories of public officers such inspector general of police, members of the human rights commission, director of public prosecution among others. Under this execution the president is expected to comply with the requirements of qualification to particular appointment. Follow procedures established in the particular legislations.

Emergencies and a state of war where Article 110[391] of the constitution provides the president in consultation with cabinet power to declare a state of emergency in situations where there is external aggression of war, threat to national security and interest of public safety. Though the having executive authority, the president must act within certain confines not overstep certain bonds of liberty.[392]

Article 124[393] of the constitution further provides the president to declare a state of war with approval of Parliament or seek the same within 72 hours of the declaration were reasonable.[394]

It is worth to note these are extraordinary powers which have rested on the president with the assumption that he will act in the best interest of the country of which this puts the rule of law at risk of presidential power grab.[395]

In terms of international relations, the president has powers under Article 122[396] to make appointments of ambassadors and heads of diplomatic missions.

According to Article 123[397], the president may make treaties, connections, agreements and other arrangements between Uganda and other countries that is, international relations.

Article 124 (a)[398] provides the president with powers to pardon, respite, remission of sentence to persons convicted of crime through exercise of prerogative of mercy done with support of prerogative committee of mercy.

With ministers, their functions will depend on presidential directives as they are not particularly stipulated in the constitution. The constitution provides functions of ministers under Article 113 (3)

[389] Articles 98, 99,111-114 of Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[390] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[391] Ibid
[392] Joshua LFriedman "Emergency powers of the executive: The President's Authority when all Hell Breaks Loose volume 25 J.L & Health (2012)
[393] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[394] The moment the president declares a national emergency, a decision entirely within his discretion. He is able to set aside many of the legal limits on his authority.
[395] https://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/2019/01/presidential-emergency-powers/576418/
[396] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[397] Ibid
[398] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

and 114 (4).[399]

Article 99(5)[400] provides ministers with power to sign statutory instruments on behalf of the president.

Section 12 of the Community Service Act provides ministers with powers make rules, regulations, order or guidelines such as prescribing composition ad duties of officers to include supervising officers and district community service officers.

Section 175[401] provides the minister with powers to amend make regulations as well as amend the schedules to the Act.

Under these functions, the minister is expected to act within the scope of powers with the necessary procedures like approval otherwise, the actions may be challenged on the basis of ultra vires.

PRESIDENTIAL IMMUNITY

NATURE AND SCOPE OF PRESIDENTIAL IMMUNITY

Most of the African countries have adopted and endured to have presidential immunity in their constitutions and it is this that has secured incumbents in African protection from prosecution in domestic courts not only for breach of country's laws but also for breaching international laws.[402]These provisions limit presidential prosecution before the domestic courts but do not necessarily mean that the president cannot appear before a court of law. Indeed, if the president desires, it is in his discretion to decide to appear before a court where he so wishes. For Uganda's case, the journey for presidential immunity is indeed deep. It is traced from the 1968 constitution. Article 34 (2)[403] provided that the president shall take precedents over all persons in Uganda and shall not be liable to any proceedings whatsoever any court.[404] This was as well amplified in the 1967 constitution under Article 24(3). Further this was adopted under Article 98 (4) and (s) of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda they are clear to the extent that the president is immune from criminal prosecution but that, Uganda V Commissioner of Prisons Ex parte Matovu[405] expires when he ceases to be president.

Though this is the case, the practice of the international Criminal Court and the special court for Sierra Leone make it clear that presidential immunity is not a defence for the alleged crimes that are

[399] Ibid
[400] Ibid
[401] local Government Act Cap.243
[402] C.B. Mulungu, Immunity of State Officials and Prosecution of International Crimes in Africa. Unpublished PhD Thesis. University of Prestoria (2011) pp 194-278.
[403] 1967 Uganda Constituition.
[404] The Constitution of Uganda, 15th April 1966.
[405] [1967] E.A.L.R. 514 (H.C.).

committed internationally by the incumbents.[406] So long as an allegation is posed against a president on committing of international crimes like crimes against humanity, privacy, genocide and others as stated by the Rome Statute. Indeed, presidential immunity is a refugee camp for incumbents. The provisions seem to be small but carry a heavy load of importance that cannot be undermined. The rational for these provisions provides a well laid justification for their adoption by most of the countries worldwide in their constitutions in that despite the fact that no person regardless of their social, economic or political rights is or should be above the law, the presidents are given a benefit and a right above others that is due to the functions and powers vested in them.[407]

In Mississippi vs Johnson[408] in 1867, the court placed the president beyond the reach of judicial direction, either affirmative or restraining, in the exercise of his powers, whether constitutional or statutory, political or otherwise. An application for an injunction to forbid the president from enforcing the reconstruction act on the grounds of their unconstitutionality, was answered by the attorney general Stanberg, who urged, inert alia, the absolute immunity of the president from judicial process. the court refused permit the filing using language construable meaning the president was not reachable by judicial process but which more fully paraded the horrible consequences were the court to act. first noting the limited meaning of the term ministerial, the court observed that very different is the duty of the president in the exercise of the power to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and among these e laws the acts named in the bill… the duty thus sense ministerial. it is purely executive and political.

Any attempt on the part of the judicial department of the government to enforce the performance of such duties by the president might be justly characterized, in the language of chief justice Marshall, "as an absurd and excessive extravagance." it is true that in the instance before us the interposition of the court is not sought to enforce action by the executive under constitutional legislation, but to restrain such action under legislation alleged to be unconstitutional. but we are unable to perceive that this circumstance takes the case out of the general principles which forbid judicial interference with the exercise of the executive discretion." …

"the congress Is the legislative department of the government; though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cause subject to its cognizance. The impropriety of the such interference will be clearly seen upon consideration of its possible consequences."

[406] A warranty of arrest was issued against the former president of Sudan while still in office. Recently the president of Kenya was also on trice before the ICC.

[407] Charles Manga Fombad and Enyimba Nwauche (African Journal of Legal Studies 5 (2012) 9-118 Martinus NIJHOFF Publishers)

[408] 71 U.S. 475

Suppose the bill filed and the injunction prayed for allowed. if the president refuses obedience, it is needless to observe that the without power to enforce that process. if, on the other hand the president complies with the order of the court and refuses to execute the acts of congress, is it not clear that a collision may occur between the executive and the legislative department of the government. ? may not the house of representative impeach the president for such refusal.? and in that case could this court interfere, in behalf of the president, thus endangered by compliance with its mandate, and restrain by injunction the senate of the united states from siting as a court of impeachment? would the strange spectacle be offered to the public world of an attempt by this court to arrest proceedings in in that court? one must be aware that the case was decided in the context of congressional predominance following the civil war. the courts restraint was pronounced when it denied an effort to file a bill of injunction to enjoin enforcement of the same acts directed to cabinet officers. Georgia V. Stanton,[409] before and since however, the device to obtain review of the presidents' actions has been to bring suit against the subordinate's officer charged with carrying out the presidents wishes. Kendall. V. United States ex rel. stokes[410],. panama refining Co. Ryan,[411]. In Youngstown sheet &Tube Co. Sawyer[412] Congress has not provided process against the president. In Franklin V Massachusetts[413], resolving a long running dispute, the court held that the president is not subject to the administrative procedure Act and his actions, therefore, are not reviewable in suits under the Act.

In as much as some agency action, the acts of the secretary of commerce in this case, is preliminary to presidential action, the agency action is not final for purpose of APA review. Constitutional claims would still be brought, however see also following Franklin, Dalton V. Spector. [414]

From these court opinions, rarely has the court been had an opportunity to elucidate its opinion. Although presently the court has definitely resolved one of the intertwined issues of presidential accountability. The president is absolutely immune in actions for civil damages for all acts within the outer perimeter of his official duties.[415] The courts close decision was premised on the president's unique position in the constitutional scheme. That was derived from courts inquiry of a kind of public policy analysis of the policies and principles that may be considered implicit in the nature of the president's office in a system structured to achieve effective government under a constitutionally mandated separation of powers. However, in an instance where the president is

[409] 73 U.S (6 Wall). 50 (1867)
[410] 37. U.S (12 Pet) 524 (1838)
[411] 293.U.S 388. (1935)
[412] 343.U.S 579 (1952)
[413] 505 U.S 788 (1992)
[414] 511 U.S 462 (1994).
[415] Nixon v Fitzgerald U.S. 731(1982)

caught in unofficial conduct, the following has and should happen.

In Clinton v jones,[416] the court, in a case of first impression, held that the president did not have qualified immunity from civil suit for conduct alleged to have taken place prior to his election, and therefore denied the president's request to delay both the trial and discovery. the court held that its precedents affording the president immunities from suit for his official conduct primarily on the basis that he should be enabled to perform his duties effectively without fear that a particular decision might give rise to personal liability were in applicable in in this kind of case. more over a separation of powers doctrine did not require a stay of all private actions against the president. separation of powers is preserved by guarding against the encroachment or aggrandizement of one of the coequal branches of the government at the expense another.

In the Ugandan modern constitution of 1995, the immunity of the president is stated under Article 98(4 and 5) exempting the president of any liabilities be of criminal or civil nature whatsoever, during the time he is in office only. It is important to note that this immunity is absolute, that if the president is still holding office, he is completely shielded from court proceedings against him.

However, the ICJ make it clear that presidential immunity isn't a defense for those alleged to have committed international crimes, such war crimes and crimes against humanity. A warrant of arrest was issued for the arrest of the president of Sudan issued by the ICJ although he was an incumbent president. Similarly, the president of Liberia, Charles Taylor was also prosecuted and the president of Kenya was also on trial. Therefore, presidential immunity is absolute only within the boundaries of Uganda.

The parliament of Uganda had tried to pass the international criminal court bill into law to strengthen the justice system in Uganda. Q seminar was held and hosted by Uganda coalition on the ICJ, a project under HURINET Uganda. In the seminar issues of war crimes were discussed wildly including of which was the immunity of the president. Nwoya county MP Simon Oyet supported the view that for justice to prevail, both the LRA and the UPDF commanders who committed war crimes must face courts of law. Oyet added that the year 2002 left a lot of gap for the war crimes were committed before that year. Most of the crimes committed before that time were by the government forces. He asserted that before 2002, many people died at the hands of the national Resistance army, while women were raped and girls were defiled. So, the seminar sought to bring to book all perpetrators including army heads.

One can draw a drastic conclusion that the periods of 1960 were that escaping light through the crevice that natured the form of politics Uganda was to adopt in the years to come. Indeed, it is the various events in this period that groomed the nature of leadership Uganda experiences apparently.

[416] 520 U. S. 681 (1997)

Prof. George Kanyeihamba asserts that the accelerating point for this was the granting of independence to Uganda in 1962 which saw Uganda having Dr. Apollo Milton Obote as the prime minister and Sir Edward Mutesa II as the president.[417] The President was the Supreme Head and Commander in Chief of the armed forces of Uganda. He was to be a constitutional head in the sense that he would act on the advice of the government which was still led by the Prime Minister. Despite all this, Uganda was not a republic.

He was supposed to act constitutionally in accordance with the due advice from the national cabinet.[418] This provision really posed a test to Mutesa who was a president and at the same time the king of Buganda. He had to make decisions that were to be beneficial to Uganda as a whole and yet he was a Kabaka who did not want to betray his people. Many scholars say that the challenge was planted by the 1962 independence constitution that the challenge was planted by the 1962 independence constitution that failed to draw a valley between the powers of the president and the prime minister. This kept the two in a pool of conflicts on who had more powers than the other which eventually led to the collapse of the UPC- KY alliance.[419] It slowly but surely worsened the relationship between the central government and the Buganda kingdom and the bursting moment of the tumor was the 1966 Kabaka Crisis when the Prime Minister ordered an attack of the Mengo Palace to have the president arrested. It is this that led to the unconstitutional overthrow of the president and instituted a new government of Dr. Milton Obote. The final nail to this was the 1967 constitution that was promulgated that saw Uganda becoming a Republic of Obote become the executive president of Uganda.[420] His office was governed by chapter 4. Article 24 (1) provided that there shall be a president of Uganda who shall be the Head of State, Head of Government and Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of Uganda.[421] Just like all constitutions in other African countries, this constitution governed the presidency. It was laid on the presidential appointment powers, immunity impeachment and resignation of the president which shall be handled later. The provisions on this office were to be reflected in the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda. These provisions are crucial. They check on the conduct of the president while in office for the achievement of better administration.

[417] George W. Kanyeihamba. Evolution of Constitutional Law and Government.
[418] Section 67 of the 1962 constitution.
[419] The President declined to sign a statutory instrument for the transfer of the lost counties to Bunyoro after the referendum.
[420]
[421] The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda 1962

ABSOLUTE IMMUNITY

This finds its way out in circumstances where the president or king is granted absolute immunity from both civil and criminal proceedings. Absolute immunity is traced in many constitutions in Africa as a measure to secure concentration of the president to national matters, protecting this dignity of the presidential office and the image of the country. Article 50 (1) of the Lesotho Constitution provides that whilst any person holds the office of king, he shall be entitled immunity from suit and legal process in his private capacity and to immunity from criminal proceedings in respect of all things done or omitted to be done by him either in his official capacity or in his private capacity.[422] In Uganda Article 98 (4)[423] provides that while holding office, the president shall not be liable to proceedings in any court. Article 98 (5)[424] provides that civil or criminal proceedings may be instituted against a person after ceasing to be president, in respect of anything done or omitted to be done in his or her personal capacity before or during the term of office of that person; and any period of limitation in respect of any proceedings shall not be taken to run during the period while that person was president.[425]

This immunity in democratic countries is only available to the president and in monarchies to only the kings. This is sufficient reason as to why in Democratic countries with kingdoms. Kings are subjected to court sessions or are suit for any civil or criminal matter committed by them. In Uganda guidance can be traced from the recently concluded case where male Hasssan Kiwanuka Mabirizi sued the king of Buganda over land matters.[426] Recently as well the Rwenzururu king Charles Mumbere was charged with terrorism. It is so clear that immunity is only available to the president. Other scenarios are located under Article 11 of the Swaziland Constitution which states that the king and Ingwenyama shall be immune from (a) suit or legal process in any cause in respect of all things done or omitted to be done by him. In most Anglophone countries, there is qualified immunity and covers criminal liability. Article 41 (a) of the Botswana Constitution states that whilst any person holds or performs the functions of the office of the president him in respect of anything done or omitted to be done by him either in his official capacity or in private capacity. But really this is so broad that the president shall go away with many crimes without anyone issuing charges even after which may defeat the exception of immunity. This immunity is available in many jurisdictions.

[422] The Constitution of Lesotho 1993, as amended.
[423] Constitution of the republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[424] Ibid
[425] The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda as amended
[426] Kabaka of Buganda V Male H. Mabirizi Kiwanuka CACA No. 184 of 2017.

QUALIFIED IMMUNITY

This is another immunity. It balances two important interests; the need to hold public officials accountable when they exceed or exercise power irresponsibly and the need to shield officials from harassment, distraction and liability when they perform their duties reasonably. Being more specific, qualified immunity protects a government official from law suits alleging that the official violated plaintiff's rights, only allowing suits where official violated a clearly established statutory or constitutional right.[427]

On further emphasis, qualified immunity protects government officials from liability for civil damage sin so far as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.[428] Majority of these countries on the black continent have this immunity in their constitutions.

Countries like Angola under Article 127(1) and Article 43(1) b of Equatorial Guinea Constitution exclude from such immunity, impeachable offences. Malawi constitution under Article 91(2) also harbours qualified immunity. Qualified immunity is very important especially in those countries whose constitutions have no provisions providing for impeachment of president in case of certain serious crimes like Kenya under Article 143 (4) qualifies the immunity further by stating that it will not extend to a crime for which the president may be prosecuted under any treaty to which Kenya is a party and which prohibits such immunity.[429]

In other jurisdictions, immunity exists for life and this may be only lifted by Parliament where it considers it to be a matter of public interest. Article 45 of the Sudanese constitution gives mandate to the National Assembly to stop the president of his immunity from criminal section. Further analysis to this is traced in Zambia where Article 43 (3) of the Constitution was invoked by Parliament when it lifted the immunity of former president Chiluba before criminal proceedings were brought against him for corruption.[430]

In other jurisdiction or countries, this immunity is only available when one is in power and when they cease office, it loses effect to them. Article 133 of the Angolan Constitution states that a former president loses his immunity if he is removed from office and others this may be different but it is very critical and tactical and other countries have a past tenure immunity. Ghana Article 57 (6) of the Constitution allows civil and criminal proceedings to be instituted against a former president for acts or omissions during his tenure if such proceedings are brought within three years

[427] Pearson V Callahan, 555 US 223
[428] Lewis Franklin Powell in Harlow V Fitzgerald, 457 US 800 (1982).
[429] President Kenyata recently appeared before International Criminal Court while still in office.
[430] Scott, T. Beyond Neopatrimonial Leadership: The prosecution of past presidents in African paper presented at the annual meeting of the international studies Association. Hilton Hawallan Village, Honolulu. H.S, March 2005.

after he ceases to be president and beyond this immunity is available. In Burundi, the constitution prohibits any prosecutions of a former president if no proceedings were commenced against him when he was in office. Various countries have immunity in their constitutions basing on the aspirations of the people but generally all countries in Africa and the world at large do have immunity.

The effect with immunities is that they tend and have prolonged leaders in power especially in Africa. Most of the leaders look for a way of prolonging their stay in power upon realization that they are to face changes due to their conduct while in power. It is this that has been a breeding ground for dictators in Africa. This has seen such leaders enforce the removal of term and age limits in the constitutions through regular amendments.

In countries like Equatorial Guinea, in 2010, a constitution was adopted after a transitional government was established. This constitution provided for a two term limit but recently a new constitution was enforced by president conde to bypass that provision so that he runs for the third term. In Uganda, the term limit provision was amended in 2005 following the referendum living the 1995 constitution with only the age limit. This was also amended in 2017 constitutional amendment to enable President Yoweri Museveni contest for another term. One can say that the effect of presidential immunity has natured dictators in Africa.[431]

In the bid to remedy this by the international community, laws have been enacted following the creation of international organizations to oversee, enforce and promotes democracy, human rights and check on dictatorial regimes. These organizations have been joined by many countries in the world. Organizations like African Union, International Court and the International Court of Justice have been established.

RATIONALE FOR PRESIDENTIAL IMMUNITIES

The sole roles, responsibilities and duties of executive powers vested in the presidents are enormous and because of this, most of the countries through their constitutions have granted them immunity. In some it is absolute and in others qualified but the sole purpose for this is to enable them to be able to discharge and dispense their duties with as much freedom as possible. The rationale is that the court proceedings may distract the president's concentration on national matters due to the regular court sessions and cross examination which may hamper with his confidence yet he handles matters of national interest. The executive powers are vested in only the president and exercised by him alone. He may fear liability if his decisions go wrong. It is necessary to protect the dignity of the office and not him personally.[432] As Esther Kisakye JSC noted cross examination in courts of law and court sessions may ashame the president, the office of the presidency and the image of the country therefore immunity should stand as a refugee camp for the Head of State.[433] Indeed because of the singular importance of the President's duties, diversion of his energies by concern with private law suits would raise unique risks to the effective functioning of government.

[431] The Constitution retains the two term limit but is silent on time already served before it came into force enabling conde to seek two more terms. Available at: https://www.theconevrsation.com

But that noted, there is nothing that would preclude the president from waiving the privilege. Thus, if so minded the president may shed the protection afforded by the privilege and submit to the court's jurisdiction. The choice of whether to exercise the privilege or to waive it is solely the president's prerogative. Therefore, it is a decision that cannot be assumed and imposed by any other person.

Presidential immunity is rooted in history. Presidents were granted absolute immunity for example the existence of the common law maxim that "the king can do no wrong" which was adopted in many countries especially the Anglophone countries. The reasoning behind this was that the king could not be made to submit to the jurisdiction of the kings courts.[434] This precluded the king from court sessions since he was viewed to be above others with absolute powers. I dearly, they found no reason of the king featuring in courts that he himself had established and get in some instances, he was viewed as law for at some point he could resolve some matters for which the courts had no answer about. The king indeed had residual powers. But the question as to whether or not absolute immunity achieves the purpose for its available depends on the nature and scope of that immunity.

[432] Nixon V Fitzgerald, 457 US 731 (1982)
[433] Sssekikubo and 4 Others V A.G. and 4 Others SCCA No. 1 of 2015
[434] A.V Dicey. Introduction to the study of the law of the Constitution. Macmillan, London (1945) and Blackstone W. and Brown. Commentaries on the Laws of England. West Publishing. St. Paul, MN, 1897.

CHAPTER SIX

EMERGENCY POWERS OF THE PRESIDENCY.

Article 1(1)[435] of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda provides that all power belongs to people who shall exercise their sovereignty under the Constitution. State authority emanates from the people of Uganda, and the people shall be governed through their will and consent.

Article 2(1)[436] of the Constitution further provides that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land and shall have binding force on all authorities and persons throughout Uganda. Article 46(1) provides that an Act of Parliament shall not be taken to contravene the rights and freedoms guaranteed in chapter four regarding if an Act authorises the taking of measures that are reasonably justifiable for dealing with a state of emergency.

At the start of the novel coronavirus pandemic, many pertinent decisions were made by the government of Uganda to contain the spread of the virus. However, in doing this, a state of emergency was not declared to indemnify the State's actions or excuse the illegality of the directives and measures adopted for similar reasons. Most of the usual routines were affected, halted or even terminated to live within the new normal. It suffices to say that most of these new measures had a significant impact on the jurisprudence of Uganda as it is known to be.

Therefore, this chapter seeks to layout and criticise such impacts and how they have been detrimental or beneficial to the country's rule of law and its citizens at large. This chapter will also try to determine if the new measures should be admitted into the legal system or whether they must be phased out and a better, prepared and accommodative system built in their place.

STATE OF EMERGENCIES

This is a condition of natural danger whereby any government suspends normal constitutional procedures to regain control. It is usually declared during natural disasters, wars, civil unrests, a pandemic or epidemic and other risks. In the 1995 constitution, State of emergencies are provided for under Article 110(1)[437] which is to the effect that "the president any in consultation with the cabinet, by proclamation declare a state of emergency exists in Uganda or any part of Uganda if the president is satisfied that circumstances exist in Uganda or in that part of Uganda". Article 110(3) provides that parliament shall have to approve in any a case not later than fourteen days after the proclamation declaring the state of emergency. Further its only Parliament that has mandate to extend the state of emergency but the extension should not be beyond ninety days. In Uganda, the declaration of state of emergencies has not been so common. Recently in 2007, the Ugandan government declared a state of emergency in flood hit northern and Eastern region. The then prime minister Apollo Nsibambi informed Parliament that the president was to deliver a proclamation for their approval. This ironically proves legislative sovereignty over the executive[438].

[435] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[436] Ibid
[437] Ibid

DEFINITION AND MEANING OF THE STATE OF EMERGENCY.

A state of emergency or emergency powers is a situation in which government is empowered to be able to put through policies that it would normally not be permitted to do, for the safety and protection of their citizens.

The governor declares a state of emergency when he or she believes a disaster has occurred or maybe imminent that is severe enough to require state aid to supplement local resources in preventing or alleviating damages, loss, hardship or suffering. This declaration authorizes the governor to speed state agency assistance to communities in need. It enables him to make resources immediately available to rescue, evacuate, shelter, provide essential commodities (i.e., heating fuel, food, etc.) and quell disturbances in affected localities. It may also position the state to seek federal assistance when the scope of the event exceeds the state's resources.

A government can declare such a state during a natural disaster, civil unrest, armed conflict, medical pandemic, or epidemic or other biosecurity risk.

Justitium is its equivalent in roman law; a concept in which the roman senate could put forward a final decree (senatus consultum ultimum) that was not subject to dispute yet helped save lives in times of strife.

States of emergency can also be used as a rationale or pretext for suspending rights and freedoms guaranteed under a country's constitution or basic law, sometimes through marital law or revoking habeas corpus. The procedure for and legality of doing so vary by country.

ORIGIN OF STATE OF EMERGENCY

The notion of state of emergency as used in situations of national threats is one that derives its roots in ancient times.

The genesis of the idea of special emergency powers can be traced as far as back the aesymneteia, "the elected tyrant" in whom the people of ancient Greece vested absolute powers as a temporary exigency when their cities were under threat.[439]Aesymneteia or aesymnetes meaning a state of emergency was a practice in ancient Greece which was first analysed by Aristotle.[440]

[438]Relief Web.Reliefweb.int.Uganda:Floods Emergency Appeal No MDRUGOO6 Final Report.

The concept of state of emergency also has historical roots that stretch as far back as roman times in the practice of nominating a "dictator" in exceptional circumstances of external attack or internal rebellion.[441]Analogy is also drawn to the institution of roman 'dictatorship" that spanned three centuries of the Republic as well as the Roman law doctrine of iustium.[442]

The legal regime of state of emergency is a relatively modern development with origins in the French revolution that gained a place in most national legal systems by the mid-20th Century.[443]In France, a state of siege was declared in 1971 as a consequence of the 1789 French revolution.[444]The civil law notion of state of siege (l'etat de siege) that was spawned during the French revolution, first codified by a constituent assembly decree of 8 July 1791, and remains embedded in the French Constitution.[445]

During the 1789 French revolution, the concept of state of emergency began with a 1789 decree of the French constituent assembly which distinguished a state of peace from a state of siege the latter being described as a situation where all the functions are entrusted to the civilian authorityfor monitoring order and internal policing pass to the military commander who exercises them under his exclusive authority and responsibility.[446]

Another French revolution occurred in 1848 of which after its occurrence, the Constitution of the second French Republic included a new Article which prescribed that the occasion forms and the effects of a state of siege were to be elaborated in law.[447]

Around the same time, the concept also became relevant in North America particularly in US Constitutional Law and Practice where During the American Civil war the president Lincoln suspended the writ of Habeas Corpus guaranteed by Article 1 where it was deemed necessary.[448]

The modern origins of state of emergency as a legal concept came from the 19th Century in Western

[439]Reynolds, John," The long shadow of colonialism: The origins of the doctrine of emergency in international human rights law"(2010) Comparative Research in law and political economy.Reseach paper No.19/2010. Page 5 http://digitalcomons.osgoode.yorku.ca/clpe/86

[440] Claire Macken. Counter Terrorism and the detention of suspected terrorists: Preventive detention and international human rights Law. Routledge, 2013 page 37

[441] Scott P. Sheeran, Reconceptualizing states of emergence under international Human rights Law: Theory, Legal doctrine and politics, 34 MICH.J.INT'L L. 491(2013) page 496

[442] Ibid, page 5

[443] Ibid page 496

[444] Supra note 391

[445] See Article 36 of the Constitution of 1958

[446]Giorgio Agamben, the state of exception (Kevin Atell trans, Univ of chi press 2005) (2003) page 5 (Quoting Theodor Reinach, De L'Etat De Siege Etude Historique et Juridique 109(1885)

[447] Ibid page 12

[448] Ibid page 20

Europe and from liberal democratic tradition.[449]

The origins of the concept / notion of state of emergency is also evident in Britain with common law traditions of martial Law and emergency legislative systems. The concept of martial law has its roots in Medieval England where it operated as military law as a system of regulations for maintenance of order and discipline within armed forces,[450] and from the 14th Century it applied to civilians.

Many English legal scholars saw martial law as deriving from a common law right of a crown and its servants to repel force by forcein the case of invasion,insurrection, and riot or generally of any violent resistance to the law.[451]

The 19th Century saw the wide spread use of martial Law throughout the empire and evolution to emergency legislative codes.[452]

During the period as British was acquiring the colonies, state of emergencies were proclaimed by Britian in Malaya in June 1948, in Kenya in October 1952, in the Gold Coast in March 1948 and January 1950 and British Guina October 1953.

Emergency Regulations were imposed pursuant to Emergency Powers (Colonial Defence) Order-in-Council of 1939, entailing whole sale powers of censorship, curfew, arrest, detention and deportation.[453]

Such extensive emergency regulations were also introduced for the duration of the Second world war were substantial number of people were detained by government without charge or trial or term set and was justified on the basis of national security.

These intolerances lead to a post war movement for international protection of Human rights emerged with institutions such as the United Nations, Council of Europe.However over time some of the major international Conventions formulated over the course of years like the International Covention on Civil and Political rights (ICCPR), European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) granted pass to state to derogate rights in the event of self-diagnosing emergencies.[454]

Under international law, rights and freedoms maybe suspended during a state of emergency, depending on the severity of the emergency and government's policies.

Though fairly uncommon in democracies, dictatorial regimes often declare a state of emergency that is prolonged indefinitely for the life of the regime, or for extended periods of time so that derogations can be used to override human rights of the citizens usually protected by the

[449]ISupra note 3 page 492
[450] Supra note 1 page 6
[451] A.V Dicey, Introduction to the study of the Law of the Constitution 284, (8th edition.1915)
[452] Supra note 1 page 11
[453]Ibid page 20
[454] ibid

international covenant on civil and political rights.

In some situations, marital law is also declared allowing the military greater authority to act. In other situations, emergency is not declared and de facto measures taken or decree – law adopted by the government. Ms. Nicole Questiaux (France) and Mr. Leandro Despouy (Argentina), two consecutive United Nations Special Rappoteurs, have recommended to the international community to adopt the following "principles" to be observed during a state or de facto situation of emergency: principles of legality, exceptional threat, proportionality, non-discrimination, compatibility, concordance and complementarity of the various norms of international law [455] Article 4 to International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), permits states to derogate from certain rights guaranteed by the ICCPR in "time of public emergency." Any measures derogating from obligations under the covenant, however, must be to only the extent required by the situation, and must be announced by the state party to the Secretary- General of the United Nations.

The European Convention of Human Rights and American Convention on Human Rights have similar derogatory provisions. No derogation is permitted to the International Labour Conventions. Some political theorists, such as Carl Schmitt, have argued that the power to decide the initiation of the state of emergency defines sovereignty itself.

In state of Exception (2005), Giorgio Agamben criticed this idea, arguing that the mechanism of the state of emergency deprives certain people of their civil and political rights, producing his interpretation of homo sacer.

In many democratic states there are a selection of legal definitions for specific states of emergency, when the constitution of the state is partially in abeyance depending on the nature of the perceived threat to the general public. In order of severity these may include;

- Marital law when civil rights are severely restricted by the imposition of military force within a sovereign state, for example during a period of extreme threat of invasion or actual hostilities by foreign forces.
- State of siege when the civil rights of specified persons or groups such as political activists are likely to be curtailed, for example to prevent an insurrection or organized acts of treason by suspected agents provocateurs.
- Civil emergency dealing with disaster areas and requiring the deployment of extra ordinary resources to contain dangerous situations such as natural disasters or extensive malicious property damage such as may occur during rioting or by arson. As well as regular emergency services, sometimes military forces may be assigned to deliver aid under especially dangerous conditions or to prevent looting.

[455] (cf. "Question of Human Rights and state of Emergency", E|CN.4|sub. 2|1997|19, at chapter 11; see also Etat d'exception.)

In Uganda, the notion of state of emergency has its roots in the post-independence era which involved change of leadership. Uganda attained its independence October 9th 1962 with the leadership of Kabaka Muteesa I under the 1962 constitution which was later abrogated by the Prime Minister Milton Obote in 1966 who declared himself an interim president under the 1966 interim constitution accompanied by various changes like abolition of Kingdoms. Later the 1967 Constitution was promulgated and later a state of emergency was declared which led to the one party rule of the nation under the Uganda People's Congress.[456] Later, Idi Amin Dada took over leadership and ruled by decrees and was later succeeded by the Current president H.E. YK Museveni whose regime led to the enactment of the 1995 Constitution which provides for the procedure of declaring a state of emergency under Article 110 and Article 43.[457]

SCHOOLS OF THOUGHT UNDER THE CONCEPT OF STATE OF EMERGENCY

Many schools of thought have come up to explain the concept of state of emergency. The main two broad schools of thought on the legality during a state of emergency also known as a state of exception include the Sovereignty approach and the rule of law approach.

The Sovereignty approach supporters believe that it is neither possible nor desirable to control executive action in times of emergency using standard juridical mechanisms.[458]The sovereignty approach believers basically believe that during times of emergency, the actions of the executive should not be subjected to the law.

Carl Schmitt is the most celebrated profounder of the school of thought and he propounds that:

"The precise details of an emergency cannot be anticipated nor can one spell out what may take place in such a case, especially when it is truly a matter of extreme emergency and of how it is eliminated. The most guidance the Constitution can provide is to indicate who can act in such a case."[459]

The idea behind this thought is that the rule of law constraints may prevent a party from defending it's self in a serious crisis, and that the capacity of a ruler to maintain the existence of the liberal

[456] See http:// WWW.titutionnet.org Accessed on 29 July 29, 2020 at 6:04 pm
[457] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[458]Tom R. Hickman, Between Human rights and the Rule of Law: indefinite Detention and derogation Model of constitutionalism, 68 MOD.L.REV 655 (2005) page 658
[459] Carl Schmitt, Political Theology: Four Chapters on the Concept of sovereignty (George Schwab trans, Univ. Chi Press 2005) (1922)

state may depend on not being bound by the law.[460] However this sovereignty approach has been criticized by many legal scholars the major criticism being that even in a state of emergency the rule of law must still prevail.[461]

The Rule of law approach which basically implies that all the actions of the executive in times of emergency have to be subjected to the legal procedures.The approach had been criticized on grounds of constitutional and political theory rather than internal law separation of powers which may endanger legitimacy of courts.[462]The general public, the comprehensive rule of law approach may raise the objection that judges are inappropriately substituting their own views on a state of emergency for those of the democratically elected public representatives.[463]

THE RATIONALE, PROCEDURE AND CONSEQUENCES OF DECLARING A STATE OF EMERGENCY

A state of emergency is usually declared in situations where there is a national threat and measures are necessitated to control the threat with the rational being that it empowers government to perform actions or impose policies that it would not normally be permitted to do thus making their actions legal in the situation.[464] The key rationale for invoking emergency powers is to trigger federal disaster relief to states.[465]These emergency provisions are necessary because they enable the state to respond effectively to crises while keeping the exercise of emergency power within the rule of law.[466]

The major advantages of declaring a state of emergency is that it provides local governments with the powers necessary to coordinate and implement plans aimed at protecting people and property during a disaster.[467]Then also a declaration of a state of emergency permits a local governing body to promulgate orders and regulations necessary for the protection of life and property such as imposing a curfew.[468] Furthermore, declaring a state of emergency ensures that the local government and its officials and employees are immune from liability when exercising their official

[460] Supra note 3 page 501
[461] See the preamble of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights
[462] Supra, page 502
[463] Ibid
[464] MPs call for declaration of state of emergency posted on 02 April 2020. http://www,parliament.go.ug/news/4590/mps-call-declaration-state-emergency Visited on 28/7/2020 at 12:19 pm
[465] Amy Lauren Fairchild, the Ohio state University, Marian Moser Jones University of Maryland. What does a state of emergency mean in the face of the corona virus? March 26,2020 http://theconversation.com/amp/what-does-a-state-of-emergency-mean-in-the-face-of-the-corona-virus134439 Viewed on 28/7/2020 at 9:59pm
[466] Elliot Bulmer. Emergency powers. International IDEA Constitution Building Primer 18 page 6 (2018)
[467] Joan L Cassman, Cecillia M. Quick. Declaring a state of emergency: What you need to know May 1, 2011.Viewed on 28th July, 2020 at 10:59pm.
[468] Ibid

duties during an emergency.[469]A state of emergency basically legalizes all acts of the government in the bid to curb national pandemics like the COVID-19 Pandemic.

Besides legalizing the acts of the governments in situations of pandemics, declaring a state of emergency also has negative consequences to the various sectors of the government like the health sector thus infringing on human rights as well like the right to health.

The first negative consequences of declaring a state of emergency is that there is limited resource availability because almost all the resources are diverted for fighting the pandemic.[470]Then there is increased dependence on aid due to limited resource availability.[471] Health workers are also poorly paid and also equipment and supplieslike lack of drugs due to limited resourcesavailability.[472]

The other negative consequence is there is an impact on campaigns in that campaigns are disrupted because gatherings are prohibited and the like with the aim of the national crisis being curbed.[473] Disease control and outreaches are also disrupted thus infringing on the right to health of the population with the same aim of curbing the pandemic as lockdowns are put in place.[474]

LEGAL FRAMEWORK OF STATE OF EMERGENCY AND ITS COMPONENTS

A state of emergency in a general sense involves governmental action taken during an extraordinary national crisis that usually entails broad restricts on human rights inorder to resolve the crisis.[475]A state of emergency also derives from a governmental declaration,[476] made in response to an extraordinary situation posing a fundamental threat to the country.[477]A state of emergency also denotes a legal regime in which public institutions are vested with extraordinary powers to address existential threats to public order.[478] During a state of emergency a government gives itself special powers to try to control an unusual difficult or dangerous situation, especially when it involves limiting people's freedom.[479]

Section 1 of the Emergency Powers Act 1968 Cap 297 states that proclamation of emergency means

[469] Ibid
[470] Humanitarian Health Action. Effects and Response priorities in different types of emergency. WHO http://Who.int/hac/techguidance/tools/manuals/Who_field_handbook/annex_2/en/
[471] Ibid
[472] Ibid
[473] Ibid
[474] Ibid
[475] Claudia Grossman, A frame work for the examination of state of emergency under the American Convention on Human rights, 1 AM.U.J INT'L & POL'Y 35, 36(1986)
[476] Cornell Law School http://law.cornell.edu/Wex/stateofemergency viewed 27/7/2020 at 20:55pm.A government declaration is one that states that because of some crisis, the normal workings of political and social life are suspended in the given jurisdiction. A state of emergency may alter government operations, order specific action by individuals, and suspend regular civil rights.
[477] Backgrounder Security Sector Governance and Reform October 2005
[478] Jaime Oraa, Human Rights in states of Emergency in international law 1 (1992) page 7
[479] Longman Dictionary of contemporary English http://ldoceonline.com/dictionary

a proclamation issued under Article 110 of the Constitution declaring that a state of emergency exists. Thus a proclamation of a state of emergency should be according to the procedure provided for in the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda 1995 as amended.

State of emergency is enunciated in various legal instruments at the international, regional and national level.

Internationally, Article 4 (1) of the International Covenant on Civil and political Rights,[480] and Article 27(1) of the American Convention on Human Rights, state that in time of public emergency which threatens the life of a nation and the existence of which is officially proclaimed, the state parties to the present covenant to the extent strictly required by the exigenciesof the situation, provided that such measures are not inconsistent with their obligation under international law and do not involve discrimination solely on the ground of race , colour, sex , language , religion or social origin.In that for a state of emergency to be proclaimed there should not only be a public emergency but the emergency should affect the entire population and should be officially proclaimed which according to the prevailing situation in various countries in the world in Uganda, the COVID-19 Pandemic is affecting the entire population.

Article 15(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights and Article 30 of the 1961 European Social Charter also state that in time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of any high contracting party may take measures derogating from its obligation under its Convention to the extent strictly required by exigencies of the situation provided that such measures are not inconsistent with its other obligation under international law.[481]This provision basically implies that a nation can derogate from its obligations in the convention like an obligation to respect the right to movement in times of public emergency that threatens the life of the nation and it won't be held legally responsible.

General Comment No.29,[482] Paragraph 1 states that Article 4 of the covenant is of paramount importance for the system of protection for human rights under the Covenant. In addition, Paragraph 2 states that measures derogating from the provisions of covenant must be of an exceptional and temporary nature. Therefore, for a state to proclaim a state of emergency there should be a situation that is exceptional in nature like the COVID-19 Pandemic which has caused panic globally and the state of emergency should be temporary which varies from country to country, in Uganda it is for a period not exceeding ninety days as per Article 110 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda 1995 as amended.

[480]International Covenant on Civil and political Rights 1966
[481] Article F of 1996 European Social Charter
[482] General Comment No.29 on Article 4 of ICCPR adopted at the 1950th meeting, on 24th July 2001

Principle 25 of the Siracusa Principles,[483] states that public health may be invoked as a ground for limiting certain rights inorder to allow a state to take measures dealing with a serious threat to health of the population or individual members of the population.These measures must be specifically aimed at preventing disease or injury or providing care for the sick and injured.

Furthermore, Principle 15 of the Siracusa Principles states that no limitation on the exercise of human rights shall be made unless provided for by the national law of general application which is consistent with the covenant and is in force at the time the limitation is applied.

The Siracusa principles being a law that governs limitations also provide for a declaration of a state of emergency where a situation exists that affects the public health of the nation and the limitation in this case a declaration of a state of emergency should be provided for in the national law of which Uganda it is provided for in Article 110 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda 1995 as amended.

Regionally, African Charter on Human and people's Rights, 1981 provides for the notion of a state of emergency however it does not allow for state parties to derogate from their treaty obligation during emergency situation.

Nationally,Article 110 (1) of the Constitution,[484] provides that the president may in consultation with the cabinet by proclamation may declare that a state of emergency exists inUganda, or any part of Uganda if the president is satisfied that the circumstances exist inUganda or any part of Uganda for instance in which the security or economic life of the country or that part is threatened by national disaster and which rendered necessary the taking of measures which are required for securing the public safety.

This provision provides for the procedure to be followed in declaration of a state of emergency in Uganda of which the President in consultation with the cabinet have to first ascertain certain circumstances like the nation, economic life being threatened, and whether the measures are necessary for the sake of public safety. Upon the ascertainment a state of emergency the president declares a state of emergencynot exceeding ninety days and it's subject to extension.

In The Constitution (Declaration of state of emergency) Proclamation 2007 SI No. 44 of 2004, a state of emergency was declared in the Northern and Eastern part of Uganda due to floods giving rise to loss of lives and propertyconstituting a natural disaster under Article 110 (1)(b) of the constitution.This declaration of a state of emergency in 2007 implies that even in this 2020 COVID-19 pandemic a declaration is very possible as the COVID-19 pandemic can be equated to floods as they lead to the death of people and this pandemic is also leading to death of people a so far about three deaths have been reported so far.

[483] Siracusa Principles on the limitation and derogation provisions in the ICCPR.
[484] Constitution of the republic of Uganda 1995 as amended

The declaration of a state of emergency besides being provided for in the law has to fulfill certain elements of which some are entailed in the laws. These elements are unveiled in the essay below. The elements are well discussed in Lawless V Ireland,[485] where the ECtHR defined a public emergency as a danger of crisis that is: Present or imminent, exceptional, concerns the entire population and constitutes a threat to the organised life of a community.

First the circumstance has to be of a public emergency.

Article 15 of the *European Convention on Human Rights (*ECHR) states that state parties may take measures that derogate the rights of a nation where there is existence of a public emergency. Paragraph 2 of the General Comment 29of Article 4 of the ICCPR provides that measures derogating provisions of the covenant must be in a situation that amounts to a public emergency. In the case of Lawless V Ireland,[486] The ECHR defined a public emergency as a danger of crisis that is: Present or imminent, exceptional, concerns the entire population and constitutes a threat to the organised life of a community.

Secondly, the public emergency should threaten the life of a nation.

Paragraph 2 of the General Comment 29 of Article 4 of the ICCPR provides that for measures to derogate the provisions of the covenant to be taken the situation must amount to a public emergency threatening the life of the nation. Further Paragraph 3 states that the committee in para 3 makes it clear that irrespective of whether Article 4(1) is invoked in armed conflict or some other kind of crisis, the situation has to be serious to constitute "a threat to the life of a nation"

In the lawless case,[487]the court held that the natural and customary meaning of the words other public emergency threatening the life of a nation is sufficiently clear considering that they refer to an exceptional situation of crisis or emergency which affects the whole population and constitutes a threat to the organised life of the community of which the state is composed.

In addition in the case of Ireland V United Kingdom,[488] the existence of an emergency threatening the life of a nation was in the view of court, perfectly clear from the facts of the case and had not been challenged by the parties before it.The court simply referred to the summary of facts which showed interalia that at the relevant time in Northern Ireland over 11,500 injured and more than 140,000,000 Euros worth of property destroyed.

In the prevailing circumstances in Uganda, there are 97,795 plus COVID-19 Cases and 2590 confirmed deaths which is public emergency as it affects the entire population as its evident that

[485] Lawless V Ireland [Lawless Commission]1 Eur.ct.H. R (Ser.B) at 82 & 90(1960-1961)
[486] Lawless V Ireland [Lawless Commission]1 Eur.ct.H. R (Ser.B) at 82 & 90(1960-1961)
[487] Eur. Court HR, Lawless Case (Merits), judgment of July 1961, Series A, No.3, Page.56, Para 28
[488] Ireland V United Kingdom, Judgment of 18 January 1978, series A, No.25, P 78, Para 205

nationwide everyone has been affected by the pandemic as everyone has been cautioned to wear facemasks, temperature testing and the emergency laws put in place for the entire nation which necessitates the declaration of a state of emergency.

In Uganda in a bid to tame the spread of covid 19, his Excellency Yoweri Kaguta Museveni issued several presidential directives. The directives were crowned by a national wide lockdown of almost all factors services, leaving just a handful categorized as essential services to continue working under strict standard operating procedures. The president also declared a national wide curfew to commence from 7:00pm and end at 6:30am throughout the period of the lockdown. The presidential directives and restrictions were justified as measures to curb the spread of the novel corona virus

It is critical to pose a typical question whether the presidential directives are binding and constitute law "In answer to this question an inquiry into constitutional in Uganda the 1995 constitution vests all the executive authority in the presidency to uphold safeguard the constitution and laws of Uganda promote the welfare of the citizens and protect the territorial integrity of Uganda.

In issuance of the state of emergency, the President would be required to cause the proclamation declaring the state of emergency to be laid before parliament for approval as soon as practicable and in any case not later than fourteen days after its issuance and the state of emergency would remain in existence for not more than ninety days. This is exactly where parliamentary involvement is by law required. But again, Section 3 of the Emergency Powers Act provides for posing of regulations by the Minister which may be expedient for interalia securing the public safety and for maintaining supplies and services necessary to the life of the community.

Just to pose an intriguing question was it necessary to declare a state of emergency in Uganda following the COVID 19 breakout in answer to this intriguing question.I appreciate the wise views of Dr Busingye that it was necessary to declare the state of emergency, however I would like to agree with Dr Ben Kiramba Twinomugisha who opines that declaring a state of emergency is constitutionally allowed under Articles 46 of the constitution of the Republic of Uganda 1995 (as amended) but that should be done as the last expedient. That is when all other options such as proceeding under the public Health Act and Regulations made there from have proved. At the moment, in light of the case of Covid 19 registered and infections not swiftly increasing one cannot conclude that the life of the country is at risk to necessitates a declaration of the state of emergency. It is a factual truth that covid 19 has resulted in social economic strain but the government is on the right track to contain the situation what the public has to do is to observe the public health guidelines, including social distancing, washing hands staying home and obeying the curfew. Government can also increase interventions to cater for the vulnerable groups inters of health care.

Article 46[489] clearly comes out that government can suspend all human rights and freedoms without necessary declaring a state of emergency. It therefore comes out serbatim from the foregoing analysis that it was not only unnecessary but also unwise for government to declare a state of emergency at the point in time. The public health legislation is robost enough to contain the situation. The second option is to legitimize the presidential directive emanates from Sections 10,11,27,36, 68 amongst other of the public Health Act Cap 281.This is exactly what government adopted to be able to come up with several instruments in order to regulate the Presidential Directives.

Inorder the respective provisions of the Public Health Act,[490] the Minister of Health is empowered to take measures to combat the spread of an infectious disease so for by press time, several statutory instruments had been gazetted to implement various measures announced under the presidential Directives over the period commencing the 20th April 2020 to 5th May 2020.These statutory instruments are detailed in content separately to it.

There are evident challenges and ambiguities between the Presidential Directives and the structure of the Health Instruments. Some of the Challenges have been depicted inform of premature enforcement of the Presidential Directives before they have been legislated into respective legal instruments as a requirement of the law. Many times arrests and detentions of innocent Ugandans by security personnel have been conducted before the presidential directives have been given the requisite legal force. This certainly tantamount to violation of rule of law. It should be noted that the presidential directives do not have the force of law and therefore to be able to enforce them with observance of rule of law respective legal instruments have got to be enacted first.

There are specific areas that require urgent attention in order not to compromise rule of law. For example, there are many changes and new matters which have been made in the presidential Directives after the legal instruments but to date they have not been included in any instruments in order to give them a legal force.

[489] The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[490] Cap 281

CONSTITUTIONALISM IN TIMES OF NATIONAL CRISIS

The choice is not between order and liberty. It is between liberty with order and anarchy without either. There is danger that if the court does not temper its doctrinaire logic with a title practical wisdom it will convert the constitutional bill of Rights into a suicide pact."Justice Robert Jackson, Diss Op Terminiello v City of Chicago (1949). The framers of the 1995 constitution envisaged that there might be critical times in which to guarantee the well being of the state the government would need to be given greater room for action.

In such grave times, the proper course of action appears to be that which the chief Justice and Speaker urged upon the President that is to say, declare a state of emergency. If the President were mindeal to do this, I am sure the Attorney General and other persons who provide him formal and informal legal advice would pointo to the provisions of Article 110 of the constitution. The President is empowered in consultation with the cabinet by proclamation to declare that a state of emergency exists in Uganda or any part of Uganda. At that time a declaration of a state of emergency would be accompanied by a number of important inbuilt constitutional safeguards to ensure that human rights continue to be respected and protected while ensuring that the state has the necessary room for effective action.

IMPACT OR CONSEQUENCES OF THE STATE OR EMERGENCY.

In light of Uganda's recent experience with dealing with the Ebola Virus Disease, the country has very quickly developed a comprehensive plan to contain the spread of Covid-19. Preventive measures were taken as of March 18th, before any cases were recorded in the country. By the time Uganda had recorded its first case on March 22nd, health workers were already on high alert and the promotion of preventive behaviors, such as regular handwashing, was already largely implemented. This blogpost covers the period from March 18th to early June 2020. During this time, there has been a steady rise in the number of COVID-19 cases with the total number of recorded cases now standing at close to 700.

Uganda has addressed the pandemic crisis through a de facto state of emergency. The president chose not to trigger Art.110 of the constitution, which confers him the possibility to declare a state of emergency after parliamentary approval. Instead, he adopted a series of declarations, the legal status of which is quite unclear. The first of the kind was made on March 18th 2020, establishing a strict lockdown and curfew through measures (e.g., closing of schools, bars and churches; prohibition of public gatherings; 14 day-quarantine upon entry into Uganda.)

The Minister of Health later formalized them into a number of Rules and orders, as foreseen in section 29 of the Public Health Act CAP.281, which provides the Minister of Health with wide powers to manage and prevent the propagation of pandemics.

However, most of these measures have been implemented on the sole of basis of the president's directives, even before being enacted in the Health Ministry's Rules and Orders. For instance, the March 18th President's directive only became a ministerial rule, published in the official gazette, on March 24th. Yet, the President's public announcements are not legally binding.

The internet website of the Presidency does offer transcriptions of president Museveni's directives, but Ugandans still have to rely on the media to develop an awareness of the restrictions to their rights and freedoms during the crisis. These reports are usually in English; no official translation in local languages is available.

This way of ruling constitutes a clear breach of international standards. The African Charter of Human and People's Rights provides that limitation to human rights – such as freedom of movement and freedom of assembly (Articles 11 and 12) must be provided for by law, for "the protection of national security, law and order, public health or morality."

A neutralized balance of powers. The stakes are not just theoretical. The decision not to declare a state of emergency has deprived the Parliament of its constitutional mandate to monitor or balance the executive powers' self -assigned' ''exceptional powers'' over the extent of restrictions to rights and freedoms over the past couple of months.

The Parliament's own actions have not avoided criticism either. It decided at an early stage to grant 20million shillings (around 4800 EUR) to each member of Parliament (MP's), on their private bank account, to tackle the pandemic crisis in their constituency. The High Court eventually ordered the MPs to return the funds to either the Parliamentary Commission Account, the National Covid 19 taskforce or the District Covid 19 taskforces.

CASE STUDIES OF NATIONS THAT HAVE DECLARED A STATE OF EMERGENCY

Many nations in the world in the event of the COVID-19 pandemic declared a national emergency or a state of emergency so as to address the national emergency and so as to put in place various measures to curb the threat. The focus in this Article will be on the United States of America and Ethiopia.

In the United States of America, President Trump in March 2020 signed an emergency declaration over the corona virus pandemic unlocking certain government powers to deal with the public health challenge.Congress also enacted more than 100 laws like National Emergencies Act, Stafford Act that permit a president to declare that emergencies exist thus freeing the government from abiding by some of its usual legal constraints like spending of additional funds and lowering legal barriers to certain actions.[491]

The president with the declaration of a state of emergency freed up funds and lowered legal barriers for responding to the pandemic.[492]This declaration of state of emergency makes the measures that follow there under as well to abide by the rule of law thus legalizing the acts of the government in a bid to fight the pandemic.

In Ethiopia, the countryconceded and confirmed to its first COVID-19 Case on Friday 13th February 2020 and by 14th April 2020 the total cases had risen to 82 with 14 recoveries and 2 transferred to their home countries with 3 deaths.[493]

In accordance with Article 93 of the Constitution of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia the government declared a 5 months state of emergency in an effort to limit the spread of the Corona virus.[494]The council of ministers approved the state of emergency thus the proclamation March 2020 also known as "the state of emergency proclamation enacted to counter and control the spread of COVID-19".The accession of the State of emergency the Federal Attorney General HE. Adanech Abebe issues regulation to further define the measures associated with the state of emergency like banning of public gatherings,closure of schools[495],sporting events prohibited which even though they do infringe on certain liberties of the individuals, they comply by the rule of law.

Uganda as one of the nations that is affected by the COVID-19 pandemic has taken many measures as to manage the pandemic and preserve the public health. The country has based its measures on the Public Health Act Cap 281 which include imposition of curfew, closure of entertainment places, places of worship among others which comes with various consequences such as infringing human rights of the citizens. This calls for reformation of the implementation of these measures with the following recommendations.

A state of emergency enables the state to acquire extraordinary powers to curb the threat which makes all the acts done by the nation legal and makes the curbing of the threat efficient because majority of the funds are diverted for fighting the threat just like in United States of America and

[491]Charlie Savage. Trump declared an emergency over Corona virus. Here is what it can do. March 13 2020 https://www.nytimes.com/2020/03/13/us/politics/coronavirus-national-emergency.html
Viewed on 7/31/2020 at 8:59am

[492]Charlie Savage. Trump declared an emergency over Corona virus. Here is what it can do. March 13 2020 https://www.nytimes.com/2020/03/13/us/politics/coronavirus-national-emergency.html
Viewed on 7/31/2020 at 8:59am

[493] Ethiopia Declares State of Emergency to curb transmission of corona virus 14 April 2020 https://www.ethioembassy.org.uk.ethiopia-declares-state-of-emergency-to-curb-transmission-of-coronavirus/ viewed on 7/31/2020 at 8:31am

[494] See also Ethiopia declares a state of emergency to fight corona virus.8 April 2020 GMT +3www.aljazeera.com/news/2020/04/ethiopia-declares-state-emergency-fight-covid-19-200408142519485.html
Viewed on 7/31/2020 at 8:38am

[495] Ethiopia declares state of emergency amid COVID-19 8th April 2020 https://www.aa.com.tr/en/africa/ethipia-declares-state-of-emergency-amid-covid-19/1797422
Viewed pm 7/31/2020 at 8:41am

Ethiopia which declared states of emergency and further set up measures and enacted laws to govern the state of emergency thus making all their acts legal even though carried out with extra-legal powers thus avoiding legal liability as well. In addition, the rule of law is also respected as the notion of a state of emergency is constitutional as it is provided for in the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda 1995 as amended in Article 110.

Additionally, a state of emergency should also be declared as the elements of declaring a state of emergency suffice. There is a public emergency that's the novel Corona virus and it's a threat the entire nation as every one nation wide are affected by the pandemic in various aspects like economically.

Government through the legislature should enact laws to legalize the measures so as to abide by the rule of law.

Measures like use of Local Defence Unit personnel to implement measures like the imposed curfew should be legalized by enacting laws that provide for the operation of the Local Defence Unitpersonnel.Such a law will clearly demarcate the duties and obligation of these LDUs which will control the current brutality that's going on because their duties are not clearly demarcated thus breaching the rule of law.This recommendation is backed by the school of thought of the rule of law in that in a state of emergency the state should abide of with the national laws in the bid to control the spread of infectious diseases such as the COVID-19.

Government should also check the implementation of the measures so as to respect, protect and fulfil the human rights of its citizens.

The government has put various measures in the bid to control the COVID-19 Pandemic like distribution of facemasks, distribution of food to families whose livelihood has been interrupted due to the COVID-19 Pandemic. Such measures should be checked because some people will use such measures as grounds of embezzling funds for these measures thus not realizing the most important thing to do in such a crisis like the staff of the office of the prime minister who were charged with misuse of government funds. Therefore, the government while using the emergency laws like the Public Health Act to respond to the pandemic should check the implementation of such measures so as to achieve the aim of the measures and thus respecting human rights of the citizens.

The checking of the acts of the LDUs while also regulate the brutality of these personnel thus respecting the human rights of the citizens.

With the emergency of the novel corona virus in Africa most nations based on their national laws to respond to the national crisis with the hope that the threat will clear however with the persistence of the threat till date, some countries have declared a state of emergency so as to address the pandemic while some have continued with the use of their emergency laws. The nations that have persisted with the use of their national laws have succumbed to criticisms and loss of confidence from the citizens due to the breach of rule of law in the bid to implement the measures put in place. The most suitable approach for such states is to declare a state of emergency so as to curb the national threat efficiently.

HOW THE STATE OF EMERGENCY CAN BE ABUSED.

The state of emergency can be abused by being invoked. An example would be to allow a state to suppress internal opposition without having to respect human rights. An example was the August 1991 attempted coup in the Soviet Union (USSR) where the coup leaders invoked a state of emergency; the failure of the coup led to the dissolution of the Soviet Union. It is further argued that emergency powers will always provide scope for abuse by the executive. Historically, emergency powers have experienced abuse by the executives.

The most infamous being the abuse of Article 48 of the Weimar Constitution, with Mueller contending this “led to steady shift of decision-making power from parliament to the president between 1918 and 1933.’’there can be no clear provisions that have provided scope for abuse.

PANDEMIC AND CONSTITUTION

The Corona virus disease has fundamentally challenged many aspects of international and national life that we had long taken for granted. As at current count over one million people around the world have tested positive for Covid 19 with over sixty-five thousand deaths thus far. In the midst of this national and global crisis, it might appear insensitive perhaps even distasteful to reflect on legal questions arising in this momemt. However, it is possibly precisely at such a time that we should be mindful if and cling to the safety and guidance to be found in law and in particular the constitution.

It should be recalled that based on a very problematic national history specifically involved in the preamble of the constitution is included a number of deliberate safeguards aimed at ensuring that the human rights of Ugandans would never again be violated with impunity. This is the spirit behind the design and content of chapter four of the constitution.

In particular, Article 43 of the constitution set out an elaborate and delicate framework for balancing individual rights and broader public concerns. On the one hand Article 43(1) stipulates that in the enjoyment of one's rights and freedoms as prescribed in the constitution no person may prejudice the fundamental or other human rights and freedoms of others or the public interest. On the other under Article 43(2)[496] it is stressed that the term public interests as employed under clause shall not permit political persecution detention without trial or any limitation of the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms prescribed under the constitution beyond what is acceptable in a free and democratic society or what is provided in the constitution.

The formulation of Article 43(2)[497] was deliberate and each word as employed in that provision has particular significance. The effect of this provision was to set a high bar for the limitation of human rights. Any such limitation had to be shown to be such as was acceptable and demonstrably justifiable not just in any society but in a free and democratic one. Indeed, since 1995, a number of attempts at limiting human rights have been found to call below this very high threshold and have consequently been struck down by the courts.

It is important to stress the foregoing because it has immediate and direct implications for the options open to the state in its response to the covid 19 crisis. It appears that in the past weeks during which meeting the heads of the Judicial and legislative branches of government urged the President to declare a state of emergency. Apparently however an unnamed cabinet member was able to dissuade the President from adopting the course of action.

At the same time several far reaching measures have already been announced and effected to respond to the crisis. Most of all these measures have been purportedly taken under the authority of the public health Act. Now in the face of the challenge we all face, it is difficult to argue with the logical impulse behind these measures. The available scientific consensus appears to be that the spread of covid 19 is more effectively controlled by limited movement isolating those who might have been exposed to the virus and treating those who test positive. The measures adopted by the state seem to rhyme with the dictates of common sense. However, while the measures outlined above appear sensible they are infact of doubtful legality. If subjected to the strict rest under Article 43(2) of the 1995 constitution. To take but one example the blanket limitation on the operation of constitutional presidential abuses during covid.

Covid 19 which first appeared as a local health crisis with an outbreak in china, quickly become a global pandemic and a multiracial cris. International Organizations including the world Health organization and Africa Union have expressed deep concern about the pandemic because of related health crisis and the multi-raceted negative impacts of the pandemic in terms of civil, political and socio economic rights. Given the prevailing sense of uncertainty some believe that this is going to be a crisis for the long haul.

If the crisis continues for years how can governments, ensure that the emergency related measures taken in all anglephone countries. How can governments ensure that emergency regulations and measures are not going to become ordinary law?

[496] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[497] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

Emergency regulations and measures adopted have been impossible to implement due to the cultural and socio economic specifities of these countries or frequent hand washing because of lack of water.

Emergency regulations and measures have also given extended powers to the executive and as a consequence drastically reduced civil liberties in all targeted countries. The rights that have been affected the most under the current state of emergency measures are freedom of movement, freedom of peaceful association and freedom of belief and worship. In one instance, the lockdown of the population to avoid the spread of the virus caused delays in voter registration which in turn caused a controversy concerning the inclusitivity of all citizens in upcoming elections. The insensitive policing of lockdown measures with military and police deployed to enforce rules that are inconsistent with the rights enshrined in the applicable constitutions has been questioned by citizens and human rights defenders. respect for citizens right to privacy including protection of personal data) has become an issue in several countries in particular in light of governments potential use of private data to fight the pandemic. These reasons aggravated the deficit of public trust in governments and were the grounds for protests in Uganda.

In terms of constitutional frameworks, Uganda found it difficult to clearly express in her constitution what may or may not constitute an emergency. Firstly, the terminology itself may be confusing with various terms used such as state or emergency state of siege, emergency which do not entail any difference in practice and therefore can be used interchangeably. The term state of emergency may be used in all these situations. If a country's constitution provides a definition of emergencies that is too broad, this will leave room for abuse that politicians can easily exploit.

Private vehicles presumably based on the fact that some individuals were operating these on a commercial basis. Can this be said to be acceptable and especially demonstrably justifiable? One of these ways in which a measure can fail this high test is if it can be shown that the legitimate objective can be achieved through and alternative method which is less restrictive to human rights. In this regard, there are a range of less restrictive means to achieve this objective including through impounding cars found to be carrying occupants who have no clear relation to the driver or owner of the vehicle in question. Therefore, a number of the current measures instituted thus far while evidently sensible are actually of doubtful constitutionality.

CORONA VIRUS AS A CASE STUDY.

The corona virus was first discovered in 2007 when scientists warned that there was an extensive reservoir of SARS-Cov-like viruses in horseshoe bats. They emphasized that it was a threat and that there was a possibility SARS would re-emerge and other new viruses, which should not be ignored.[498]The first outbreak of SARS was in 2002 but it died down.[499]After all this time, COVID-19 has sprung up as the most dangerous respiratory disease pandemic since 1918, when the "Spanish" influenza pandemic killed close to 50 million people.[500]

In 2003, the China was infected with a virus causing Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS) in the province of Guangdong.This virus was confirmed as a member of the Beta corona virus sub group and was named SARS-CoV.[501] The infected patients showed pneumonia symptoms with a lung injury, leading to acute respiratory distress syndrome (ARDS).SARS emerged in Guangdong province, China and then spread quickly around the globe with more than 8000 infected persons and 776 deceased.[502]

In the year of 2012, a few Saudi Arabian nationals were diagnosed with another coronavirus. The detected virus was confirmed as corona viruses thus the name Middle East Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus(MERS-Cov). The World health organization reported that MERS corona virus infected more than 2,428 individuals and 838 deaths.[503] MERS-CoV is a member beta-coronavirus subgroup and phylogenetically diverse from other human-CoV. The infection of MERS-CoV starts from a mild upper respiratory injury, while progression leads to severe respiratory disease. Like SARS corona virus, patients infected with MERS-coronavirus suffer from pneumonia, followed by ARDS and renal failure.[504]

Nearing to the end of 2019, the government of China was informed about many cases of pneumonia due to an unfamiliar aetiology. The outbreak emanated from a sea food market in Wuhan city of China and rapidly infected more than 50 people.[505] The animals are frequently sold

---

[498] Cheng VCC, et al 2007. Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus as an Agent of Emerging and Re-emerging Infection. ClinMicrobiol Rev.20: 660-694

[499] David MM, et al 2020. The Origin Of Covid-19 And Why It Matters, The American Journal of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene, 103(3), 2020, pp. 955-959

[500] Taubenberger JK, et. al. 2019. The 1918 influenza pandemic: 100 years of questions answered and unanswered, Sci Transl Med 11:eeaau5485

[501] Peiris J, et al 2004. Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome, Nat Med; 10(12): S88-97; see also Pyrc K. et al 2007. Identification of New Human Coronaviruses, Expert Review of Anti-infective Therapy; 5(2): 245-53

[502] Muhammad AS. et al 2020. Covid-19 Infection: Origin, Transmission and Characteristics of Human Coronaviruses, Journal of Advanced Research, 24 (2020) 91-98

[503] Rahman A & Sarkar A. 2019. Risk Factors For Fatal Middle East Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus Infections In Saudi Arabia: Analysis Of The WHO Line List, 2013-2018, American Journal of Public Health, 109(9): 1288-93

[504]Memish ZA, et al. 2013. Family Cluster of Middle East Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus Infections, New England Journal of Medicine, 368(26): 2487-94

[505] Supra note 5

at the Hunan sea food market, such as bats, frogs, snakes, birds, marmots and rabbits.[506]

On 12 January 2020, the Chinese National Health Commission released further details about the epidemic which suggested viral pneumonia.[507] From the analysis based on sequence of isolating the patients from others, the virus was classified as coronavirus. Moreover, the genetic sequence was also provided for the diagnosis of viral infection.[508] Originally, it was proposed that the people who had contracted the novel coronavirus induced pneumonia in China might have visited the seafood market where live animals were sold or may have used infected animals or birds for food. However, further investigations showed that some people got the virus even with no history of having visited the seafood market.[509] These observations showed a human to the human spreading tendency of this virus, which was subsequently reported in more than 100 countries globally.[510] The human-to-human spreading of the virus happens because of close contact with a person who is infected, exposed to the coughing, sneezing, respiratory droplets or aerosols. These aerosols can penetrate the human lungs through inhalation through the nose or mouth.[511]

On 31st December 2019, China alerted the World Health Organisation that it had registered 44 cases of pneumonia with an unknown cause between December 31 and 3 January. Although there had been many cases of pneumonia in December and possibly November in Wuhan, this was the moment that the world's attention was drawn to the mysterious illness.[512] On January 9th, 2020, the virus claimed its first life, as China reported two days later. In the next thirteen days, Wuhan province was placed under lockdown. World Health Organisation noted that there was increasing evidence for human-to-human transmission. By the end of January, 9,927 cases and 213 deaths had been reported, and the United Kingdom reported its first case then. The infection was subsequently named Covid-19, and in mid-February, cases were recorded in Africa, and France registered its first death. On March 11, there were 125,875 cases and 4,615 deaths. The World Health Organisation declared the disease a pandemic. By April 2, there were over one million confirmed cases worldwide, with over 75,000 recorded deaths.[513]

---

[506] Wang C, et al. 2020. A novel coronavirus outbreak of global health concern, The Lancet.
[507] Ibid.
[508]Riou J, et al. 2020. Pattern of early human-to-human transmission of Wuhan 2019 novel coronavirus (2019-nCov), Eurosurveillance; 25 (4)
[509] Parry J, 2020. China Coronavirus: Cases surge as Official Admits Human-to-Human Transmission, British Medical Journal Publishing Group.
[510] Li Q, Guan X, et al. 2020. Early transmission dynamics in Wuhan, China, of novel coronavirus-infected pneumonia, New England Journal of Medicine.
[511] Phan LT, et al. 2020. Importation and Human-to-Human transmission of a novel coronavirus in Vietnam, New England Journal of Medicine.
[512] Clarke S, Antonio V, et al. 2020. How Coronavirus spread across the globe-visualised, The Guardian; April 09, 2020, available at; https://www.theguardian.com/world/ng-interactive/2020/apr/09/how-coronavirus-spread-across-the-globe-visualised (accessed on May 17, 2021)
[513] Ibid.

In Uganda, the Minister of Health, Dr Jane Ruth Aceng, confirmed that Uganda registered her first case of COVID-19 on Saturday 21st March 2020. The confirmed case was a 36- year old Ugandan male who traveled from Dubai on Saturday 21st March 2020 at 2:00 am using Ethiopian Airlines. As of April 02, 2020, the country had registered 44 confirmed cases of Covid-19. The significant number of the cases were travellers returning from United Arab Emirates (14), United Kingdom (14) and other countries. At this time, some districts like Makasa (3), Hoima (2), Adjumani (1), and Iganga (1) had also registered cases, and it was not clear if these were secondary to the on-going active transmissions.[514]As of May 17th 2021, the cases grew, and Uganda had confirmed 42,779 cases and recorded 347 deaths.

Therefore, the rampant growth of the virus had a significant impact on the different sectors of governments worldwide. Countries were tasked to adopt new measures in order to cope with the pandemic. Most countries went into lockdown, and a return to normalcy is still a dream. It can also be said that the pandemic has created a new normal, which might be around for longer than anticipated.

Against this rash development, many laws and policies were overridden, overhauled, modified or blatantly violated to cope with the new normal. Therefore, this paper examines the extent of this impact and whether it has been good or bad in both the short and long run.

The President announced Uganda's COVID-19 control legal measures, and then they were published as legal instruments by the Health Minister pursuant to the Public Health Act in the following days. This declaration was contrary to the known procedure of making law in Uganda, and as such, it distorts the separation of powers as we know them to the extent that the executive could make pronouncements that would later be codified for implementation. Consequentially, many extreme measures were promulgated and implemented to respond to the crisis. All institutions of learning were closed; incoming and outgoing passenger flights prohibited; most persons within the country were restricted, and most businesses were stopped from operating. Most of these measures were taken under the authority of the Public Health Act.

The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995, as amended under Chapter 6, 7 & 8, clearly defines the roles of the three arms of government. The import of this separation ensures a separation of powers and makes the rule of law more achievable by defining what one arm of government can do and what it cannot. As postulated by great philosophers like Professor AV Dicey, establishing these boundaries is a long-standing principle in law.[515]This principle ought to be respected no matter the situation. The only exception that the Constitution provides is when a state of emergency has been declared under Article 46. Even then, the Constitution qualifies the emergency by allowing Parliament to pass laws that authorise the taking of reasonably justifiable measures for dealing with it.

[514] Dr. Jane Ruth Aceng, April 02, 2020. Update on the Covid-19 response in Uganda, Ministry of Health Press Release, available on; https://www.health.go.ug/covid/2020/04/02/update-on-the-covid-19-response-in-uganda/ (accessed on May 17, 2021)

[515] Harvey, WB, 1961. "The Rule of Law in Historical Perspective," Articles by Maurer Faculty, Paper 1168 available

Article 110 of the Constitution provides that the president may, in consultation with the cabinet, by proclamation, declare that a state of emergency exists in Uganda if the president is satisfied that circumstances exist in Uganda which render necessary the taking of measures which are required for securing the public safety, the defence of Uganda and the maintenance of public order and supplies and services essential to the life of the community. It further provides that this state of emergency only remains in existence for not more than 90days. This proclamation is laid before parliament for approval ordinarily not more than 14 days after it is issued.

It must be noted, however, that the presidential directives did achieve positive results. The best scientific evidence available at that time showed that the spread of the virus could be minimised by stopping movement and gathering people, covering one's mouth and nose using face masks, and constantly washing hands with soap or using a hand sanitizer. Most of the president's directives aimed at fulfilling this and, in extension, curtailed the spread of the virus.

With this being achieved, it would seem naïve to question the legality of the directives that ultimately slowed the spread of the virus down. Prof. Kabumba makes two arguments as to why it still makes sense to raise such arguments. That the State should not open itself up to legal challenges which could have been easily avoided by more careful and considered action; and (2) that it is critical at such a moment for the law to be respected lest, in solving one crisis, we create another.[516]The first argument speaks to the interests of the State; the second the interests of the citizen. In light of this confluence of interests, we can deduce a need for responses to the national crises (or international crises) based on scrupulous adherence to the Constitution.

This chapter aims to examine the legality of the response of the government of Uganda to Covid-19 and or other plausible pandemics. This chapter will analyse how the different arms of government heeded to the law and to what extent the separation of powers and the rule of law was followed in responding to the threat of a global pandemic. Additionally, this chapter will assess the impact of the illegalities on the daily lives of the citizens and the certainty of the law in the long run.

Therefore, this chapter will aim to patch the loopholes created in the response regarding respect for the rule of law, even in times of eminence, and suggest a solution to the aftermath impacts on human rights and certainty of the law.

---

at, http://www.repository.law.indiana.edu/facpub/1168 (accessed May 17th, 2021)

[516] Ibid

The spirit of the ground norm of Uganda, the 1995 Constitution, is enshrined in its preamble. It recalls Uganda's history, characterised by political and constitutional instability, recognises the struggles against forces of tyranny, oppression and exploitation, and is committed to building a better future by establishing a socioeconomic and political order through a popular and durable national Constitution based on principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and progress. This spirit ought to be seen in operation under any circumstance. The operations of the government in the wake of the pandemic present a threat to the Ugandan spirit; identity and existence at large might be in jeopardy.

The last global pandemic was in 1918 when there was little literacy and, therefore, little documentation on how the pandemic affected the different sectors of economies and States. The situation has since significantly changed for the better, and therefore, this study will create an account of the impact of Covid-19 on Uganda's legal system and add to the existing literature. If another pandemic should strike the globe, the generations from now will learn from our accounts not to make the same mistakes that the State has made in responding to the pandemic.

The chapter will entail an analysis of the presidential directive that was issued in the wake of the global pandemic. It will focus on establishing if these directives were legal and how their legality or illegality has affected the rule of law, separation of powers, human rights and the citizens' daily lives, and the certainty of the law. The chapter will also compare the response of the Ugandan government to other common law jurisdictions and evaluate if Uganda performed well or not.

In International Humanitarian Legal Studies, 2020. "International Law in a Time of Pandemic", Journal of International Humanitarian Legal Studies 11(2020) 187-191.

The editors postulate that the pandemic broke out in a time of great scepticism in science, a collapse of good governance and a growth of authoritarianism, a uprise of big–power rivalry, and waning multilateralism, which consequentially made the response to Covid-19 a political plaything both domestically and internationally and put severe strains on existing frameworks of global governance.[517]

The editors explore the broad range of obligations that States have in the context of a pandemic such as Covid-19, the right to international solidarity, with its three pillars of preventative solidarity, reactive solidarity, and international cooperation. They postulate that the principle of solidarity requires states and other institutions to offer their assistance to the developing and less-developed States affected by the virus. They also explore the measures taken to manage the outbreak of Covid-19 (including lockdowns, quarantine, testing and the rationing of some medical interventions) from an international human rights perspective. They explain how states must balance rights to health and life against limitations that public health measures contain the virus on other human rights. [518]

[517] Gian L Burci, 2020. The Legal Response to Pandemics: The Strengths and Weaknesses of the International Health Regulations, Journal of International Humanitarian Legal Studies 11 (2020) 204-217

See p. 187

Gian L Burci, 2020. The Legal Response to Pandemics: The Strengths and Weaknesses of the International Health Regulations, Journal of International Humanitarian Legal Studies 11 (2020) 204-217

The author analyses how the legal and institutional regime to prevent and control the international spread of the pandemic, based on the WHO and the International Health Regulations, has been severely tested. He argues that critics have challenged the World Health Organisation's apparent politics and the ineffectiveness of the International Health Regulations(IHR) of 2005 as a mechanism to coordinate the international response to Covid-19. That the IHR have codified the mode of operation of the WHO Secretariat during their revision, but the presumption about WHO's epistemic power and the will of states parties to conform to WHO's leadership have proven overly optimistic. Furthermore, the author believes that addressing some of the significant flaws of the IHR 2005 could give them renewed energy and spur states towards a better coordinated and effective response to epidemics.

The author denotes that the WHO spread with so much speed, insidiousness and ferocity that it stressed many international political, institutional and legal regimes, from trade and human rights to regional integration in Europe and civil aviation. Consequently, the legal and institutional system of surveillance, alert and coordination against the international spread of disease centred on the WHO has been a casualty.

WHO informed member states at the start of 2020 after receiving a notification from China as prescribed under Article 6 of the IHR 2005 about the local outbreak in Wuhan of a typical pneumonia. After about a month of event assessment and apparent hesitations that had been the object of pointed criticism, the Director-General declared the outbreak as a 'public health emergency of international concern' (PHEIC) under Article 12 of the Regulations issued temporary recommendations of urgent measures.[519] After that eventful step and until the end of April, the IHR 2005 majorly vanished from WHO's communications as well as from the media. WHO instead placed itself outside the scope of IHR 2005 but within its general emergency importance as the central organisational hub of the response. It has provided guidance, research and scientific help through its interconnection of regional and domestic offices. The Director-General classified the outbreak as a pandemic on 11 March 2020, but that statement was not according to the IHR2005.

[518] Gian L Burci, 2020. The Legal Response to Pandemics: The Strengths and Weaknesses of the International Health Regulations, Journal of International Humanitarian Legal Studies 11 (2020) 204-217

[519] WHO, 2020. "The World Health Organisation and Pandemic Politics", available at; www.who.int/detail/30-01-2020-statement-on-the-second-meeting-of-the-international-health-regulations-(2005)-emergency-committee-regarding-the-outbreak-of-novel-coronavirus-(2019-ncov) accessed on 24th May, 2021.

Ultimately, the author recognises that the IHR 2005 were not meant to guide international response to a pandemic of Covid-19's size and complexity. They were meant to prevent events of this magnitude and reduce the risk of uncontrolled spread with the related collapse of multilateral governance. The Director-General could have utilized the Regulations more appropriately, gathered the Emergency Committee more often and issued guidance on the basis of temporary recommendations. While this would have yielded more legal and political backing to those recommendations and energised the Regulations as the primary legal mechanism for guidance, the pace of the pandemic could have made the formal framework of the IHR 2005 too rigid.[520] Finally, while this narrative is idealistic, it may be another factor to tackle to make the IHR 2005 relevant and important in responding to unpredictable and unprecedented epidemics.

J.N. Hays, 2005. Epidemics and Pandemics: Their Impacts on Human History, ABC-CLIO. Inc., Santa Barbara, California 93116-1911

The author gives an accurate and up-to-date historical account of about fifty significant epidemics and pandemics. He presents information about the time, place, and scale of the epidemic, its significance, the background against which it occurred, how contemporaries understood and responded to it, and issues that remained unresolved about it then or have remained so since. He analyses the illustration of the vital phenomenon of virgin soil infection when a disease reaches a society with no previous exposure to it, like the Measles epidemic in 1875 Fiji.

Still, other epidemics have had literary or metaphoric importance, or referencesto them have entered into popular culture and everyday speech. The Plague of Thucydides has lived on in theworld of classical studies. References to consumption dominated literary andcultural discussions in (and about) the nineteenth century, as much because ofwho suffered from it as how many did. Furthermore, Typhoid Mary found here, whose "epidemic" may have only resulted in three deaths, but whose name hasbecome a metaphor for a transmitter of any trouble.

At the time of his writing, the author projects an impending pandemic, i.e. SARS and various influenzas derived from (for example) East Asian domestic fowl, which regularly seize headlines and generate worldwide fears. While this bookprimarily concerns the past, it concludes with some suggestions and questionsabout such present and future epidemics.

One of the most prominent measures of the significance of epidemics, in his opinion, has been

[520] See p. 216

totalmortality. For epidemics before the mid-nineteenth century, this has been hard to gauge, but some of the epidemics and pandemics in his book have taken millions of lives. By that standard, the new pandemics ofmalaria, tuberculosis, and AIDS have been and remain significant events. While not such great killers, other epidemics have disrupted societies and individuallives significantly; the recent mad cow outbreak illustrates such effects.

Many epidemic stories of the recent past and present have either not metthose standards of significance, or their effects remain uncertain. More perspectivemay be needed. In November 2002, a new disease, SARS, appeared in southernChina. In the following eight to nine months, about 8,100 people becameinfected with the disease, and 774 died. In late July 2003, however, theWorld Health Organization declared that the epidemic was over. In terms ofmortality, therefore, SARS was not a pandemic remotely on the scale of others. It seriously disrupted travel plans for some months, primarily to, from, andwithin East Asia.

Much of the fear generated by experiences such as the SARS episode of 2003, or the recurring worries about avian flu from Asia, is based on the precedent ofthe pandemic of 1918–1919. Therefore, it may be essential to considerhow the world of the early twenty-first century differs from the world of 1918, especially in its ability to resist or turn back a pandemic disease.

The author believed that, in many ways, biomedical science and the world's political systems arebetter equipped to confront an epidemic now than they were in 1918. In the twentieth century, people understood the nature of viruses and were able to isolate them successfully. With that knowledge came the ability to prepare vaccines that might prevent disease. The empiricaldevelopment of vaccines that had begun with Jenner and smallpox in the lateeighteenth century now had a theoretical basis and could be extended to manyother ailments, including poliomyelitis and the varieties of influenza.

Furthermore, when writing this book, the author recognizes that international political cooperation to resist epidemics has advanced, although many obstacles remain as one of the United Nations' most successful agencies, the WHO has undertakenand published mortality statistics, drafted international conventionson such responses as quarantines and upheld cooperative international attacks on AIDS. Many domestc governments have vibrant departmentsand offices to promote public health and the control of diseases. For example, in the United States, the Centres for Disease Control andPrevention, wield influence, power, and public money.

In addition, populations in the world share another advantage: bythe early twenty-first century, many of them (more or less) have been medicalized. Recent opinion has adopted the notion that diseases call for reactionsfrom the sector of biomedicine; when a cold strikes, one consults a physician. When manypeople have accepted medicalization, they will more likely have recourse to thevaccines and antibiotics offered by modern biomedicine. Epidemics, especiallythose that move by contagion (as most do) from one person to another, mayrun out of susceptible victims.

Generally, the author believes that the information available to the world by 2005 is ample to help it adapt to any pandemic or epidemic, or better still, expunge it in a shorter time than the previous times.

Christian W. McMillen, 2016.Pandemics: A Very Short Introduction, Oxford University Press, New York.

The author provides a rich history of pandemic and epidemic disease and suggests that much of the world confronts such things now has been shaped by the past. History is often forgotten or rediscovered when we confront contemporary epidemics and pandemics, and therefore patterns from the past are repeated thoughtlessly.

The author gives an insight into the meanings of epidemics and pandemics. An epidemic is generally considered to be an unexpected, widespread rise in disease incidence at a given time. A pandemic is best thought of as a vast epidemic. Ebola in 2014 was by any measure an epidemic-perhaps even a pandemic. Pandemic Influenza killed fifty million people around the world in 1918 (pandemic). He postulates that pandemics should only be looked at as events, i.e. that they come and go because then we ignore others like HIV/AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. Pandemics can either be discrete events or persistent. Tuberculosis, malaria and HIV/AIDS, which affect enormous swaths of the globe and kill millions and millions each year, are persistent pandemics.

The author analyses the different themes that have grown over time regarding pandemics and epidemics. He notes that one of the fundamental themes was the laboratory revolution in the late nineteenth century. The finding of bacteria as the cause of diseases such as tuberculosis meant that centuries-old explanations for disease aetiology vanished. This discovery enabled medicine to develop effective therapies, as well as understand how to prevent infections. However, the laboratory revolution also cultivated an undue amount of confidence in the power of biomedicine to rid the world of infectious diseases. It fostered the belief that the way to do so was far more dependent on attacking germs than attacking the social conditions that gave rise to disease in the first place.

The other theme is the relationship between poverty and disease and the geography of epidemics and pandemics. All of the diseases that the author writes about, while controlled by modern medicine, are affected by social conditions. That is, there is a reason why cholera disappeared from the USA more than a century ago but is still present in much of the developing world, or that HIV/AIDS disproportionately affects sub-Saharan Africa, or that the plague was worse among the poor than the rich during Marseille's 1720 epidemic. Some places have been able to transcend the conditions that allow infectious diseases to flourish, while others have not.

Pandemics and epidemics over the years have also helped the modern state to grow. As early as the fifteenth century, Italian city-states formed state-sponsored health boards in response to the plague. The cholera pandemic of the nineteenth century caused nationwide efforts at quarantineefforts that the central state could only carry off. Measures such as compulsory vaccination also demonstrate this growth.

The author also notes, and significantly so, that epidemics and pandemics cannot exist without a dense and mobile population. None of these diseases emerged in pandemic form until humans had settled down to the farm and begun trading with one another. Infectious diseases need to be transmitted fromhost to host to survive; that host must be susceptible. Smallpoxremained such a killer among American Indians because it wasable, over centuries, to find non-immune populations; once thosepopulations diminished, the disease naturally declined. Trade andtravel were well developed by the fourteenth century; the plaguetook advantage of this. TB exploded when conditions allowed it: the densely packed cities and workplaces of industrializing Europe in the eighteenth century. AIDS has relied on humanmobility to move around the globe. When pandemic influenza spread around most of the planet in a matter of months in 1918, it could only have done so because of the newly built transportation and trade networks and the high mobility brought on byWorld War I. Human, animal, and insect movement are critical inthe spread of epidemics and pandemics.

The author acknowledges that people—eyewitnesses, novelists, poets, memoirists, government bureaucrats, journalists, historians, anthropologists, epidemiologists, kings, queens, and presidents—have been writingabout epidemics and pandemics for centuries, reflecting on what causes them, what might stop them, and how people have reacted to them. The world has, collectively, accumulated an untold amount of source material of value not only to historians. We have accumulated a record of successes and failures that should aid those working on epidemics and pandemics now.

However, despite all this information, the author notes that the world is still relearning upon things history already taught. For example, in spring 2015, theWHO released a statement admitting its lacklustre response tothe Ebola pandemic and calling attention to several “lessonslearned.” It was striking that in 2015among the lessons learned were such things as the “lessons ofcommunity and culture.” That it took Ebola to show the value oflocal people and their knowledge is surprising. The WHO “learned the importance of capacity”—which means the WHO learned thatthe world could not handle epidemics. TheWHO was “reminded that market-based systems do not deliver commodities for neglected diseases.” Why did it take Ebola to relearn that vital fact? The WHO also learned that gains in malaria control or women surviving child birth could be reversed when "built on fragile health systems." Is it trulypossible that this lesson had not been learned before 2015? These lessons are not new; the history of epidemics and pandemics has been teaching them for centuries.

The author believes that pandemics are not about to stop happening. He predicts that a pandemic might come from an old and familiar foe such as influenza or might emerge from a new source—perhaps a zoonosis that has made its way into humans. How will the world confrontpandemics in the future? Patterns established long ago will likely re-emerge. However, how will new challenges, like global climate change, affect future pandemics and our ability torespond? One thing is clear: in the face of a severe pandemic, much of the developing world's public health infrastructure will be woefullyoverburdened. One sure way to ease the suffering that will beencountered in any future pandemic is to invest in building a robust public health infrastructure anywhere one is lacking. The effects of pandemic and epidemic diseases have been and will be far worse in the least able to respond. Althoughthis might seem to be simple common sense, it is clear from the "lessons learned" by the WHO in the wake of the Ebola epidemicthat it is still routinely forgotten.

Fareed Zakaria, 2020. Ten Lessons for a Post-Pandemic World, W.W. Norton & Company

The author analyzes the world's ill preparation. He notes that governments spend trillions of dollars on building vast militaries, tracking the movement of combatants across theglobe, andpractice war tactics against potential enemies. The United States, for example, devotesalmost three-quarters of a trillion dollars to its defence budget every year. However, the world wasnot prepared to fight against a tiny microbe. It may eventually turn out that this viral microbe will cause the most significant economic, social, and political damage to human kind since World War II.

The writer does not jot about the pandemic but rather its aftermath and, more importantly, the world's response to it. Any significant shock can have diverse effects, depending on the stateof the world and how human beings react. In the case of coronavirus, the impact is being built bythe fact that the world is immensely interconnected; that numerous countries wereambushed by the pandemic and that in its wake, many of themshut down their societies and economies in a manner like never before in human history.

The justification for writing about the post-pandemic world is not because the Coronavirus is behind us but because the world has crossed a crucial threshold. Most of the world's population now knows how a pandemic operates. We have seen the difficulties and costs of countering it. The Covid-19 virus could persist, but even if it isdefeated, new outbreaks of other sickensses are bound to happen in thefuture. With what we have learned from this entire experience, we now live in a new era: post-pandemic.

The author suggests three possible consequences of the pandemic; that it will prove to be the hinge event of modern history, a moment that foreveralters its course. Alternatively, that after the vaccine, we will quickly return tobusiness as usual. Alternatively, still that the pandemic will not reshape history somuch as accelerate it. As Lenin once said, the author reckons that there are decades when nothing happens, and then there are weeks when decades happen; the post-pandemic world is going to be, in many aspects, a sped-up version of the world we knew. However, when you put lifeon fast-forward, events no longer proceed naturally, and the consequences canbe disruptive, even deadly. In the 1930s, many developing countries were modernizing rapidly, moving people from agriculture to industry. TheSoviet Union decided to accelerate that process brutally. This decision, thecollectivization of agriculture, led to famine, the "liquidation" of millions offarmers, a hardening of dictatorship, and the deformation of Soviet society. Aworld on steroids can suffer unpredictable side effects.

The author asserts that the coronavirus may be novel, but plagues are not. He explains all the plagues that this world has faced before and the impact each one of them has had on the lives of people, societies and nations at large. He, therefore, argues that the world ought to have known. In more recent times, outbreaks of SARS, avian flu, swine flu, andEbola spread swiftly and widely, causing many experts to alert the world that it wasprobably going to face a massive global epidemic soon. The public listened, too. In 1994, Richard Preston in his book, The Hot Zone, gives an account the origins of theEbola virus. Additionally, the 2011 film Contagion, based upon the SARS epidemic of 2002–3 and the swine flu pandemic of 2009, envisioned a virus that claimed 26 millionlives worldwide. In 2015, Bill Gates gave a TED Talk warning that "ifanything kills over 10 million people in the next few decades, it is most likely tobe a highly infectious virus." In 2017, he sounded an even louder alarm, predicting inhis speech at the Munich Security Conference that there was a high likelihood that such anoutbreak would happen in the following ten to fifteen years. By then, it did not attract much attention to imagine a pandemic and to pressfor investing more time, resources, and energy toward preventing or eradicating it.

The author notes that history has taught us that things start very small and ultimately bring the world to its knees. He makes an example out of the 9/11 bombings, which brought to centre stage the anger of radical Islam, the fights in the MiddleEast, and the West's complicated friendship with both. The 2008 global crisis was set rolling by good times, leading to asset prices shooting up, which spurred speculation, then birthed bubbles, and finally, yielded collapse; and now, the coronavirus began as a health concern in China and soon became a global pandemic.

The author describes the world that is being ushered in as a consequenceof the Covid-19 pandemic. He, however, notes that people canchoose which direction they want to push themselves, their societies, and theirworld. We have greater leeway now. In most times, history follows along aset path and makes change complex. However, coronavirus has upsetsociety. Things are already transforming, and in that setting, further change becomes more achievable than ever.

John M. Barry, 2005. The Great Influenza: The Story of the Deadliest Pandemic in History, Penguin Group (USA) Inc., 375 Hudson Street, New York.

The author narrates the ordeal of the upspring of and explosive spread of the Influenza virus of 1918. He writes about the nature of the disease, its spread, and how it affected the world. Nevertheless, his story of the 1918 influenza virus is not simply one of havoc, death, and desolation of a society, fighting a war against nature superimposedon a war against another human society. It is also a story of science, discovery, how one thinks, and how one transforms the way one thinks, of how amidst near-utter confusion, a fewmen sought the calmness of contemplation, the utter cool that precedes not philosophizing but grim, determined action.

This is because the influenza pandemic that broke out in 1918 was the first great interaction between nature and modern science. It was the first great interaction between a natural force and a society that included individuals whorefused to submit to that force orcall upon divine intervention to save themselves from it. These individuals instead were determined to confront this force directly, with developing technology and with their minds.

The writer does explore the 1918 Pandemic itself and several questions that do not involve influenzaper se. One involves how the bigger society reacted to a serious challenge. Another provokes anyone making a decision: What criterion do you follow to gather information that most likely brings a good one? Inshort, how do you find outthat you have found out? More narrowly, he also explores how an investigator should do science, even under the most stressful conditions.

He reckons that one cannot depart from this subject without answering other questions: the increased chance of danger of another influenza pandemic, whatwe can take away from the one of 1918–1919, and how we can utilise those lessonsto the growth of a new pathogen, whether that microbe is aweapon of terror or a new natural catastrophe—such as Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome, SARS, the illness which spread from animals to human beingsin 2003 and almost became a major pandemic.

The response to the first querry is not reassuring. The author believesevery expert oninfluenza agrees that the ability of the influenza virus to reassert genesmeans that another pandemic cannot only happen. It almost certainlywill happen. The author interestingly asserts that SARS, although more lethal than the 1918 influenza virus, is less dangerous for several reasons; first, SARS requires reasonably close contact to spread, while influenza is among the most contagious diseases. Also, in SARS, the virus reaches the climax in the upper respiratory tract, where sneezesand coughs are likely to spread the virus a week or even longer aftersigns and symptoms develop. This offers public health officials time to identify, find, and seclude cases. By contrast, the influenza virus could spread from person to person before any signs develop for a victim to know that he or sheis sick.

The writer also notes that given the immense increase in population since 1918, the spread of any pathogen is bound to be more reaching because of the increased mobility of people and the population increase. This may, in effect, frustrate the efforts to find a cure or vaccine in the time since the disease would ordinarily have savaged more people than it had in 1918.

The author makes a critical argument that the final lesson, a basic one yet one most difficult to carry out, isthat those who are in positions of authority must reduce the panic thatcan grip all society. Society cannot operate if it is selfish. Those in authority must keep the public's trust. The formula to do thatis to destroy nothing, to put the best reputation on nothing, to try to manipulateno one. Lincoln said that first, and best, "Leadership must make whatever horror exists concrete. Only thenwill people be able to break it apart."[521]

John Finch, 2020. Legal Aspects of Covid-19 Pandemic Management for Community Nurses.

The author sets out to investigate how things have developed concerning the law on professional responsibility. He reckons that the legal obligations change in the face of national emergencies in some respects, while others do not. This is because the nature of a pandemic can easily be related to that of a war. One cannot declarea fight on a potentially deadly virus any more than one can declare war on terror. War may involve declarations of martial lawgovernment by armiesand it may well include the requisitioning of private premises by legal decree. Those stages are still far off with the spread of COVID-19, and hopefully they never will. The author wonders that if the war-footing is not the way to go in the COVID-19 crisis, what is? The many approaches addressedby the numerous countries now affected appear to resolvethemselves into a straight choice: voluntarism or legal rules.

The writer explains the extent of the old rule of duty of care and how this duty extends in times of a global pandemic. The law relating to care duties, be it owed by practitioners to their patients or owed byemployers and managers to their staff, is predicated on reasonableness. What is reasonable is directly influenced by resource availability, including, principally, staffand equipment.

Regarding staffing levels sufficient to meet patients'needs, several factors need to be consideredin weighing what is reasonable in fulfilling the legalduty of care. One of the most significant issues expressedby Governments and the media is patient carecaused by practitioners contracting the virus. Ear, nose, throat and respiratory doctors whohave contracted the virus tend to make headlines, although there havebeen few reports of the effect of little or no forwork of the much larger practitioner body of nurses. Sadly, time is almost sure to tell.

521

The author recognises that in any event, if a mistake is made and harm occurs, the law imposes liability only and only if there is a sufficient causallink between the mistake and the ensuing result. So, a practitioner can make all the (misjudgement) callsthey like, but if harm is not caused, there is no legal liability. He adds that policies on the deployment of workers and the allocationof patient treatment may have to be reviewed or, at least, carefully examinedand that a policy unsupported by critically argued principle may be positivelydangerous. Pursuing a policy for its own sake could leadto the imposition of legal responsibility, both civil and criminal, on the part of those who persist. New circumstances may require a thorough change of community nursing care policies basingon the demographics of a certain locality as well aspractical logistics.

On the aspect of patient confidentiality, the author notes that the general rule is that it is legally permissible to share information about a patient so far as appears necessary to reduce or eliminate the danger. Contrary to widespread belief across thehealth professions, no tort or civil wrong committedby breaking a patient's confidence. If persuasion fails, adeparture from patient confidentiality may be the only feasible option available to the practitioner.

David P. Fidler, 2020. "To fight a New Coronavirus: The COVID-19 Pandemic, Political Herd Immunity, and Global Health Jurisprudence, Oxford University Press

The author writes that in global health, germs do not recognise borders. However, in a world where borders define the exercise of political power, international cooperation is critical to combating pathogenic threats. Practical cooperation, including international law, can produce political herd community-resistance within and between states to political behaviour that disrupts measures needed to protect nations and individuals from infectious diseases.

He observed that the spread of the pandemic had been exacerbated by the underlying power instabilities that take attention away from the pathogen. The ideological conflicts between nations and within countries have undermined effective strategies for pandemic control.U.S. criticisms of China's handling of COVID-19 attacked theCommunist Party, emphasized the authoritarian nature of the Chinesegovernment, and highlighted the nationalism stoked by China's media andpandemic diplomacy. Advocates of liberal democracy expressed concerns that authoritarian governments and politicians worldwide were exploiting the pandemic to increase their authority at the expense of self-government and human rights. COVID-19 did not create the growing conflict between liberalismand authoritarianism, but the pandemic exacerbated interstate relations' increasingly prominent ideological components.

The U.S. abandonment of global leadership during the pandemic owedmuch to hyper-partisan domestic politics. The Trump administration increased on its "America First" attitude by blaming China for the outbreak, deciding to withdraw from WHO, and not participating in achievingequitable vaccine access. President Trump continued to divide the Americanpublic by ignoring science, denigrating expertise, attacking opponents, and refusing to take responsibility for his administration's response. Such divisiveness fuelled disinformation that intensified the war of political ideas tearing atthe nation's fabric.

The fraying of cooperation and the loss of political herd immunity contributedto problems that the international community encountered with internationallaw during the pandemic. Controversies arose with the IHR (2005). The search for a vaccine exposed how states have not crafted an internationallegal framework for critical aspects of pandemic response—sharing pathogen samples and the need for equitable access to pharmaceutical interventions. The pandemic also created concerns for international humanrights law.

WHO member states built the IHR (2005) to require countries to preparefor and respond to disease events in ways informed by science, public health strategies, and WHO guidance. Earlier outbreaks, such as the West African Ebola epidemic in 2014, revealed problems with the regulations.[522]However, the COVID-19 pandemic has delivered the most severe blow tothe IHR (2005) by generating disputes about fundamental aspects ofthe regulations.

How the pandemic exposed controversies and gaps ininternational law suggests that global health governance lacks an effective law system. In a world distorted by geopolitics and riven with ideological hostility, shared interests and values are evaporating, leaving international law bereft of the political conditions needed for international cooperation to protect population health against dangerous pathogens.

International Development Law Organisation, 2020. The Vital Role of Law in the COVID-19 Response,

Contrary to much literature reviewed. The author in this writing gives the lessons of maintaining the rule of law in times of a global pandemic. She lists that the rule of law offers an overarching framework to ensure health, justice and inclusiveness, even during a pandemic like COVID-19. Respecting to the rule of law means that law-making processes focused on public health emergencies and controlling infectious diseases need to be transparent. Laws should be publicly disseminated and enforced fairly, and when required, independently adjudicated throughcourts and tribunals that ensure the administration of law and its substantive content is consistent with international human rights standards.

[522] Lawrence O Gostin and Rebecca Katz, 2016. The International Health Regulations: The Governing Framework for Global Health Security, 54(2) Milbank Q, 264-313.

Secondly, solid legal and policy frameworks are vital to prevent and mitigate the consequences of public health emergencies. It does this in two ways; it establishes the institutional structures and formal processes through which governments respond to disease outbreaks; it sets limits for coercive power over individuals and businesses to mitigate the risk of disease spread.

Also, the rule of law is vital to control the transmission of infectious diseases and ensure respect for fundamental human rights. When public health laws authorize interferences with rights such as freedom of movement or the right tocontrol one's health and body, privacy rights, and property rights, they should balance these private rights with the public health interest ethically and transparently. Public health powers should be built on theethical principles of public health necessity, reasonable and adequate means, proportionality, distributivejustice, and transparency. Openness and accountability are needed to generate public trust and are also likely to improve public health decision-making. Without public trust and voluntary cooperation, governments will find it harder toachieve their goals and act in the public interest.

Furthermore, the rule of law and good governance are indispensable to realise the right to health during COVID-19 and beyond. The right to health is a fundamental human right and isindispensable for human well-being, well-functioning societies and economies, and for theability toexercise all other human rights. Realizing the right to health is a legal obligation enshrined in the United Nations International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and other international and regionaltreaties and the constitutions and statutes of many States.

Cameron Stewart, et al. 2020. COVID-19: Restrictive practices and the law during a global pandemic – an Australian perspective, International Journal of Mental Health Nursing (2020) 29, 753–755

The writers approach the pandemic from theperspective of people who have had to deal with restriction because of the nature of their lives: for example, the elderly, mentally disturbed people and prisoners. They postulate that further restrictions to their already existing enigma increase the sensitivity to such seclusion.

The already existing laws about restrictions on mental health in Australia are not uniform. However, they usuallyfall under each jurisdiction's regulation of compulsorytreatment orders, emphasising them being seen as 'last resort', pursuant to the notion of being the least restrictive alternative of caring for the person and regularly reviewing reports submitted.

COVID-19 has added another perspective to this picturethrough the introduction of the public health law. Australian health authorities can invokepublic health orders that allow for an extensiverange of orders, including dictating the person's conduct, forcible detention, testing, and treating any person reasonably suspected of beingCOVID-19 positive.

The utilisation of restrictive practices in public health ordersraises several challenges for mental health practitioners.[523] Firstly, public healthorders lack tight regulation of restrictive practices that exist in mental health and guardianshiplaw, especially in how they lack theaspect of the 'leastrestrictive means'.

Secondly, mental health teams are not bound to have a working knowledge of public health law but may nevertheless be asked to act following it.[524] Poor information of regulation may lead healthcare practitioners to authorize the restrictive practice illegally.[525]Thirdly, some health practitioners have previously been uncomfortable and slow to enforce public health orders due to a bewildering sense of feeling like a 'jailer'.[526] Any such reluctance needs to be considered concerning the protection of others[527] and, of course, protecting oneself.

The literature concerning global pandemics is vast, much of the work written is scientific, and therefore it leaves a gap on the legal connotations of the same. With the world entangled in understanding the origin and cause of the pandemic, little has been discussed on the legality of this process of adapting to it.

THE CHALLENGE POSED BY THE PANDEMIC TO THE LAW-MAKING PROCEDURE IN UGANDA

As seen earlier, the law-making process takes quite some time to bring the law into enactment. The justification for this period can be attributed to the need to uphold democracy, transparency, and community involvement. If laws were passed any earlier, any of these would stand threatened and, in the long run, would affect the good governance of the country and the social contract of the same.

However, the nature of pandemics is that it has no respect for timelines. They tend to spread at unprecedented speeds and causing effects more profound than any law, however well crafted, could ever atone. This, therefore, poses the greatest threat to the law-making process because the parliament will under normal circumstances not be able to pass a law in time to manage the mode of operation during times of the pandemic.[528]

[523] Arnold, A., Bickler, G. & Harrison, T. S. 2019. The first 5 years of Part 2A Orders: the use of powers from court applications to protect public health in England 2010–15, Journal of Public Health, 41, 27–35.
[524] Power, T., Baker, A. & Jackson, D. 2020. Only ever as a last resort': Mental health nurses' experiences of restrictive practices, International Journal of Mental Health Nursing, 29, 674–684.
[525] Lamont, S., Stewart, C. &Chiarella, M. 2019. Capacity and consent: knowledge and practice of legal and healthcare standards, Nursing Ethics, 26, 71–83.
[526] Kerridge, I., Lowe, M. & Stewart, C. 2013. Ethics and Law for the Health Professions, 4th edn. Sydney: Federation Press.
[527]Coker, R. J. 2003. Public health impact of detention of individuals with tuberculosis: systematic literature review. Public Health, 117, 281–287.
[528] Steiner, J., Woods, L. and Twigg-Flesner, C. (2003) Textbook on EC Law, Oxford, Oxford University Press, pp. 57-

Therefore, the challenge was that the government had to take drastic measures to slow down the speed at which the virus was spreading out, and this was to be done while respecting the law. At that time, several far-reaching measures were promulgated, and implemented, to respond to the crisis: all institutions of learning were closed, international borders closed, movements of many people within the country restricted and the majority of business stopped from operating.[529]

To the extent that this was done on mere directives, without regard to any known law-making procedures, it made the directives doubtful on their constitutionality and, therefore, on whether they should be allowed to operate. This, in effect, caused a ripple of violations to other substantive laws since the directives were not constitutionally backed.

Effects of the difficulties encountered by the government in global pandemics

The failure by the government to follow the ordinary law-making process has, in turn, affected the observation of other substantial laws. Central to this is the Human rights violation. Most of the directives issued by the president were to do with movement, assembly, health, to mention but a few. To a certain extent, these rights were limited for purposes of curtailing the spread of the virus. As much as the move was for good intention, the mode of doing the same was not backed up by law and amounted to a violation.

Article 43 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda provides that in the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms prescribed in this Chapter, no person shall prejudice the fundamental or other human rights and freedoms of others or the public interest. The provision further describes public interest that public interest under this Article shall not permit, among other things, any limitation of the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms prescribed by this Chapter beyond what is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society what is provided in this Constitution. Dr Busingye breaks down the meaning of this provision that the formulation of Article 43(2) was deliberate, and each phrase as used in that provision has particular importance. The effect of this provision was to set a high bar for the limitation of human rights.[530]

The courts interpreted Article 43 in Charles Onyango Obbo and anor v Attorney General, Constitutional Petition No. 15 of 1997, which the Supreme Court upheld. The court elaborately stated thus;

-62.

[529]Busingye K., 2020. The 1995 Constitution and Covid-19 by Dr. BusingYEKKAbumba, [online], available at; https://observer.ug/viewpoint/64295-constitution-and-covid-19-are-presidential-directives-unconstitutional (accessed on 27th May, 2021)

[530] Ibid

"FREE AND DEMOCRATIC SOCIETY

This phrase now appears in the human rights provisions of many constitutions of the countries of the Commonwealth; Canada, Papua, New Guinea, Namibia, Zimbabwe, Nigeria and Zambia, to mention but a few. The phrase is not defined in any of the Constitutions, but the Courts of those Countries have developed and assigned definite meanings to the phrase. The meaning assigned to it is remarkably similar despite differences in social, cultural and political systems prevailing in each of the jurisdictions I have mentioned above. The most prominent authority on the meaning of the phrase "Free and democratic society" can be found in the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Regina Vs Oakes (supra), which many commonwealth jurisdictions have followed with similar Constitutional provisions as Canada. In the Canadian Constitution, the phrase "free and democratic society" is used in section 1, which is almost similar to our Article 43 (2), where the same phrase is used. The Supreme Court of Canada stated: -

"A second contextual element of interpretation of S.1 is provided by the words "free and democratic society." Inclusion of these words as the final standard of justification for limits of the rights and freedoms refers the Court to the purpose for which the Charter was originally entrenched in the Constitution. Canadian Society is to be free and democratic. The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society, which I believe embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for culture and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society. The underlying values and principles of a free and democratic society are the genesis of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter and the ultimate standard against which a limit on a right or freedom must be shown, despite its effect, to be reasonable and demonstrably justified."

ACCEPTABLE AND DEMONSTRABLY JUSTIFIABLE

This is the phrase used in Article 43 (2) of our Constitution. In the Canadian Constitution, they use "reasonable and demonstrably justified." In my view, there is no significant difference between the two phrases. In the Canadian case of Regina Vs Oakes (supra),the phrase was given meaning as follows:-

"To establish that a limit (to rights and freedoms) is reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society, two central criteria must be satisfied. First, the objective that the measures responsible for the limit on a Charter right or freedom are designed to serve must be of sufficient importance to warrant overriding a

Constitutionally protected right or freedom

The standard must be high in order to ensure that objectives that are trivial or discordant with the principles integral to a free and democratic society do not gain (Our Article 43 (2)) protection. It is necessary, at a minimum, that an objective related to concerns that are pressing and substantial in a free and democratic society before it can be characterised as sufficiently necessary.

Secondly, once a sufficiently significant objective is recognised, then the party invoking s.l must show that the means chosen are reasonably and demonstrably justified. This involves a form of PROPORTIONALITY TEST... Although the nature of the proportionality test will vary depending on the circumstances, the Court will be required to balance the interest of society with those of individuals and groups in each case. There are, in my view, three essential components of the proportionality test. First, the measures adopted must be carefully designed to achieve the objective in question. They must not be arbitrary, unfair or based on irrational considerations. In short they must be rationally connected to the objective. Secondly, the means, even if rationally connected to the objective in the first sense, should impair "as little as possible" the right or freedom in question: R Vs Big M Drug Mart Ltd Supra. Thirdly, there must be proportionality between the effects of the measures which are responsible for limiting the charter right or freedom and the objective which has been identified as of "sufficient importance."

It can be argued, and successfully, that the government failed to meet this threshold laid down by the constitutional court twenty years before the current pandemic. The government set in the wake of the pandemic fell short of the threshold that is well prescribed in the law. One of the way show a measure can fall short of this high test is if it can be proven that the objective (the protection of public health in this instance) can be achieved through another alternative method that is less restrictive to human rights .[531] It can be said that the declaration of a state of emergency by the president would have allowed for directives that would be passed following the provisions of the Constitution.

THE LAW VIS A VIZ THE REALITY ON STATE OF EMERGENCY AMIDST PANDEMICS IN UGANDA

The COVID-19 pandemic is a public health concern which affected almost the whole globe; the Pandemic has negatively affected the world leading many states to declare a state of emergency.

Due to the various states obligation to protect the health and lives of their citizens, some states like the United States of America and Ethiopia declared a state of emergency while other states like The legislative body of Uganda enacted emergency laws like The Public Health (Control of COVID-19) Rules, 2020 to respond to the pandemic which resulted to various consequences on the other human rights of the citizens. The most appropriate measure to be taken is declaring a state of emergency because the state is clothed with the responsibility of balancing both the health rights and other human rights of its citizens.

[531] Ibid

The novel Corona virus/ COVID-19 Pandemic remained a myth to Africa and specifically Uganda upon its first attack in Wuhan, China until Saturday 21st March 2020 when the country woke up to the saddening news of the first corona virus case of 36-year-old Ugandan male who arrived from Dubai.

The attack of the COVID-19 Pandemic on various states awakened various obligations of states to its citizens and birthed many impacts on the state's economy. Many states declared lockdowns with locking of schools, places of worship, restaurants, among others. Uganda, in addition to the preventive measures she put in place like sanitizing and washing hands, Uganda also adopted the same strategy of the partial lockdown with schools, bars, places of worship being closed, curfew of 7pm to 6:30am imposed, movement being restricted inter alia.

Uganda based this partial lockdown actions on emergency laws like the Public Health Act Cap 281 whose main aim is to preserve public health, then various statutory Instruments which were promulgated like the public health (control of COVID-19) Rules 2020 and public health (control of COVID-19) (Amendment)Rules 2020 inclusive of other amendments as the situation changes.

Some states, the basis of their partial lockdowns was declaring a state of emergency so as to curb the pandemic. International treaties and national constitutions of such countries legalize declaring a state of emergency and also provide for a procedure to declare a state of emergency so as to curb such a national and global threat.

The strategy adopted by states like Uganda of using Emergency laws to respond to the COVID-19 Pandemic is tied to many consequences like infringement of constitutional human rights since use of emergency laws to respond to the pandemic the state is to respect all human rights as its curbing the pandemic as compared to a situation where a state of emergency is declared and a state is permitted to breach certain rights to curb such a pandemic. The human rights that are breached in use of emergency laws include the right to freedom of movement due to the curfews imposed, freedom of association due to banishing of public gatherings which is vital to democracy, freedom of torture due to deployment of LDU's among others.

Most states might prefer using emergency laws due to fears of accountability to international Human rights organizations which monitor implementation of the international treaties like the international Covenant on civil and political rights because upon declaration of a state of emergency many demarcations are made. However, declaration of a state of emergency enables checks of power which helps in intercepting illegal tendencies like breach of human rights and corruption.

The emergency laws or declaring of a state of emergency, what is the most appropriate means of responding to the COVID-19 pandemic crisis?

This Article is examining the declaration of state of emergency amidst the COVID-19 Pandemic as a strategy to curbing the pandemic is a viz use of emergency laws and the likely legal, economic and social consequences.

The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995, as amended.

The constitution is the highest law of the land, and any other law which contravenes the constitution is null and void to the extent of its inconsistency.[532]Therefore, the powers that allow anybody to make law are enshrined in this constitution. Chapter six of the Constitution provides for the Legislature and its roles, making laws.

Article 79(1) of the Constitution states that subject to the Constitution's provisions; Parliament shall have the power to make laws on any matter for the peace, order, development and good governance of Uganda. Therefore, this provision gives the parliament the power to make any law that governs the daily workings in the jurisdiction of Uganda.

Article 79(2) further provides that except as provided in the Constitution, no person or body other than Parliament shall have the power to make provisions having the force of law in Uganda except under authority conferred by an Act of Parliament. This provision bars any other body or person from making any other law for governing the country except as provided by the law.

The two provisions vest all the law-making power into the parliament, and the parliament has overtime devised a procedure of making the laws, which is peculiar to their work and has over time brought forth the laws that manage the country.

It is important to note that the Constitution envisages other times when laws can be made without following the provisions of Chapter six strictly. Indeed, Article 99(5) of the Constitution provides that the signature of a Minister may authenticate a statutory instrument or other instrument issued by the President or any person authorised by the President; and the validity of any instrument so authenticated shall not be called in question on the ground that it is not made, issued or executed by the President.

This provision of the law seems to give the president the power to make statutory instruments that the minister can pass as law upon signature by the minister. Recently, the president of Uganda made declarations which were later codified by the Minister of Health and signed for operation as guidelines during the subsistence of the law. However, these laws were made according to the powers given to the minister for secondary legislation, as discussed in the subsequent writings.

[532] Article 2 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995, as amended

Statutory law

The Acts of parliament lay out quite elaborately how the law-making process flows right from when the Cabinet Minister proposes the bill up to its publication in the gazette. The process began when the Ministry concerned Cabinet through a Cabinet Memorandum with a proposal for Cabinet to approve the principles for the bill's drafting. Cabinet approval is required before drafting the subject legislation.[533]Paragraph 2(b) of Section (Q-b)[534], however, permits a 'Bill to be drafted by the First Parliamentary Counsel if the Attorney General or Solicitor General authorizes the bill's drafting without reference to Cabinet.' According to the paragraph, this authority is granted only in exceptional circumstances. The request for the authority is made through the responsible Minister.

Cabinet then appraises the proposals as contained in the Cabinet Memorandum of the Ministry concerned and approves the principles based on which a Bill is to be drafted. When Cabinet approves the principles for drafting a Bill, it authorizes the responsible Minister to direct the First Parliamentary Counsel/Attorney General to draft the necessary legislation.[535]

The Ministry concerned would then request the First Parliamentary Counsel through the Attorney General to draft the legislation based on the approved principles as found in a Cabinet Minute. Where the instructions are ambiguous, the First Parliamentary Counsel will inquire from the relevant Ministry for more instructions and, where necessary, request that Ministry to identify an officer in the Ministry to cooperate with the office of First Parliamentary Counsel in the drafting of the Bill. In making the legislation, the office of the First Parliamentary Counsel will work with the relevant Ministry to make an agreed draft. The relevant Ministry may again consult relevant bodies and individuals as to what contents should be in the Bill.[536]

The relevant Ministry will have to submit the Bill to Cabinet for approval and a Cabinet Memorandum and any comments of the stakeholders. No Bill without exception is published unless it has been sent to the Cabinet for approval.[537] In drafting the bill, the draftsperson must understand the need to keep the Law Officers informed, like the Attorney General and the Solicitor General.[538]

When the Bill is being sent to Cabinet for approval, the Cabinet memorandum of the Ministry will have to be accompanied by:

> (a) a certificate of compliance issued by the Office of the First Parliamentary Counsel acknowledging that the Bill has been made by the Office of the First Parliamentary Counsel

[533] Paragraph 2 of Section (Q-b) of the Uganda Public Service Standing Orders, 2010.
[534] Ibid
[535] Ministry of Justice and Constitutional Affairs, March 2014. Manual On The Legislative Process In Uganda, First Parliamentary Council, available at; https://www.jlos.go.ug/index.php/document-centre/legislation/326-legislative-process-in-uganda/file (accessed on 27th May, 2021)
[536] Ibid
[537] Paragraph 7 of Section (Q-b) of the Uganda Public Service Standing Orders, 2010
[538] paragraph 6 of Section (Q-b), Ibid

following the directions approved in the Cabinet resolve issued for the drafting of the Bill or that the Bill has been drafted based on a waiver of prior Cabinet approval in principle by the Attorney General or the Solicitor General[539]

(b) a certificate of financial implications issued by the Ministry of Finance under section 10 of the Budget Act, 2001 and rule 107 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament, 2012 (the Rules), acknowledging in respect of the Bill in question that the financial implications if any, on revenue and expenditure over not less than two years after it comes into force. Rule 107(2) of the Rules requires the certificate of financial implications to be signed by the finance Minister.

Cabinet may reject or approve the Bill or may approve the Bill subject to amendments. The Office of the First Parliamentary Counsel will then include any amendments approved by Cabinet in the Bill and seek the minister's signature concerned to an explanatory memorandum attached to the Bill.[540] Rule 106(2) of the Rules requires that all Bills shall be accompanied by an explanatory memorandum setting out the policy and principles of the Bill, the defects in the existing law if any, the remedies proposed to deal with those defects and the necessity for the introduction of the Bill. According to rule 106(3), the explanatory memorandum shall be signed by the Minister or by a member introducing the Bill (in the case of a Private Member's Bill).

The First Parliamentary Counsel authorizes the Government Printer, the Uganda Printing and Publishing Corporation (UPPC), to print and publish the Bill in the Uganda Gazette. The Ministry concerned then must issue a Local Purchase Order (LPO) to be issued in favour of the Government Printer (UPPC) to cover the costs of printing and publishing the Bill.

Rule 106(1) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament says that all Bills must be published in the Gazette. After publication, the relevant Ministry supplies about 450 copies of the Bill to the Parliament Clerk for use by parliamentarians. The relevant Ministry must also have to send to Parliament the certificate of financial implications to be tabled in Parliament for the bill's First Reading.[541]

The Bill then goes through the criterion of Parliament necessary for passing a Bill. Rule 114 of the Rules provides that each and every Bill shall be read three times before its being passed. The criteria is prescribed by the Rules from Parts XVIII - XXI –

(a) First Reading, a formality, marks the bill's formal introduction in Parliament, and the Bill is then sent to the relevant Sessional Committee of Parliament for consideration. At this stage, the committee generally invites the relevant Minister to introduce the Bill and invites other stakeholders to say their views on the bill's provisions, and the committee may sometimes have hearings for the purpose;

[539] para. 2(b) of Section (Q-b) of the Uganda Public Service Standing Orders
[540] Supra note 33
[541] Ibid

(b) Submission of Report by the Sessional Committee. The committee submits a report on the Bill to the plenary of Parliament. At the same time, Parliament considers the Bill at Second Reading which is a discussion on the principles of the Bill and not on its details. Pursuant to rule 119(5) of the Rules, the Second Reading of the Bill does not happen earlier than the fourteenth day after publication of the Bill in the Gazette, unless the sub-rule is formally suspended for this purpose;

(c) Committee of the Whole House Stage: At this stage, Parliament deals with the provisions of the Bill, clause by clause and all suggested amendments to the Bill. Part XX of the Rules regulates the Committee Stage.[542]

(d) At Committee Stage, the Speaker of Parliament sits in the House's well as chairperson of the Committee of the Whole House, to consider the amendments to the Bill.[543]

(e) According to rule 123(4) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament, the Committee of the Whole House considers the proposed amendments by the Committee and may consider the suggested amendments, on notice, where the amendments have been presented but rejected by the Committee concerned or where, for sufficient cause, the amendments have not been presented before the relevant Committee.

(f) Report of Committee after Committee Stage: This is where the Committee of the Whole House reports to the plenary on the Bill committed, and amendments are considered.[544]

(g) Re-committal: This is a stage that comes at the conclusion of the Committee Stage where it is felt that there are still some amendments that have to be considered or reconsidered.[545]

(h) Third Reading and passing of the Bill: At this stage, the Bill is not discussed, and it is passed as a step of procedure upon a motion "That the Bill be now read the Third Time and do pass."[546]

Sections 8 - 13 of the Acts of Parliament Act, Cap.2 regulate the compilation and presentation of copies, assent by the President, presentation of a Bill for assent under Article 90(1) of the Constitution, the numbering of Acts, original copies of Acts assented to by the President or becoming law without the assent of the President and publication of Acts in the Gazette. Important to note is section 14 (3)[547], which provides that where an Act gives power to a Minister to enact a statutory instrument to bring an Act into force, such power may be exercised even though the Act

[542] rules 120 - 124
[543] See rule 122(1)
[544] See rule 125.
[545] See Part XXI rule 127
[546] rule 126 of the Rules
[547] Acts of Parliament Act, Cap.2, Laws of Uganda has come into force or not.

However, the Constitution too provides for the bringing of Bills by private members of Parliament. Article 94 (4) provides that the rules of procedure of Parliament must include the following provisions-

(a) a member of Parliament has the right to bring a private member's Bill

(b) the member bringing the private member's Bill shall be accorded reasonable help by the department of Government whose scope of operation is affected by the Bill

(c) the office of the Attorney General shall accord the member bringing the Private Member's Bill professional help in the drafting of the Bill."

Following Constitutional provisions, rule 110 provides for the Private Member's Bill, and rule 111 of the Rules provides for the procedure in respect of a Private Member's Bill thus; a Private Member's Bill must be introduced first by way of a motion to which shall be attached the proposed draft of the Bill. If the motion is upheld, the printing and publication of the Bill in the Gazette is the Clerk's responsibility. Following the Bill's publication in the Gazette, Bill's progress shall be the same as that followed in respect of a Government Bill.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE PROCEDURE USED IN THE PUBLIC HEALTH ACT CAP 281.

The procedures followed in the Public Health Act regarding responding to the COVID-19 Pandemic pose various challenges especially legal challenges because as the minister is putting in place the various rules to regulate the spread of the COVID-19 Pandemic he/she is supposed to balance other laws in place especially the Supreme law of the land the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda which provides for the various rights of the Citizens of the Republic. The rule of law is supposed to be respected as compared to a situation where a state of emergency is declared because with the declaration of state of emergency the government is permitted to carry out Acts that in normal circumstances they would not be allowed to do the same.

THE LEGITIMACY OF THE LIMITATIONS IMPOSED BY THE PRESIDENTIAL DIRECTIVE.

It is important to establish whether the restrictions imposed by the presidential Directives are not in conflict with rights and freedoms as enshrined in the several Articles of the Grand Norm of the land and other related Acts of Parliament.

I find a lot of comfort in the timely writing of Prof.Ben Kiromba Twinomugisha where he states that the constitution is clear, in the enjoyment of his rights and freedoms, no person shall prejudice the fundamental or other human rights and freedoms of others or the public interest. Prof.Ben persists that a person who has tested positive for corona virus wouldn't complain that his or her right to liberty has been violated after being quarantined or put into isolation. That person's rights to liberty and movement may justifiably be restricted for reasons of preventing him of her from infecting others with the deadly virus, failure of which directly results in violation of other right to life. In effect a person can be justifiably disadvantaged of his right to liberty for the reason of stopping the layout of a transmissible disease.

Prof. Ben further asserts that within the provisions of the constitution public interests shall not permit any limitation of the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms that is beyond what is acceptable and demonstrable justifiable in a free and democratic society or what is provided in the constitution. It is clear from the foregoing that the Presidential Directives were legally hazed with the ultimate goal of promoting the welfare of the citizens and protecting the territorial integrity of the country. What remained critical for the agencies which were entrusted to implement the Presidential directives to continue executing their actions within the confines of the law. it is unfortunate that a number of cases involving violations of freedom from torture, cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment by enforcement agencies have been registered.

Therefore, the president of the Republic of Uganda must be commenced for strongly castigating the security personnel especially the Local Defence Unit (LDUs) against misinterpreting his directives on enforcement of the lockdown. Addressing the nation on 8th April 2020 the President in his address wondered why the security personnel were beating people like cows.

THE IMPACT OF EMERGENCY DECLARATIONS AND STATE ACTIONS TO COMBAT EPIDEMICS ON HEALTH CARE.

As the novel corona virus ("COVID-19") outbreak continues, a growing number of state governors have declared states of emergency that allow state agencies to combat the spread of disease and advance access to care, such as through waiver of certain state laws.

State declarations are taking different forms, with some states issuing robust measures that relax the current legal frame work to offer health care providers additional flexibility to provide treatment and promote access to care.

These state declarations, as well as federal orders and regulatory changes, including informal internet-only guidance materials, will continuously impact providers' responses to COVID-19 and operations.

The recent emergency declarations issued in more than 40 states in response to the COVID-19 outbreak have taken varied approaches in addressing the duration, geographic area, and specific health agencies leading response activities, as well as, in some cases, waiving or suspending specific health agencies leading response activities, as well as, in some cases, waiving or suspending specific health care rules and regulations. Some of these declarations address topics of particular interest to health care providers relating to licensure, reimbursement, and operations (e.g., facility visitor policies, telehealth services, emergency transport, and elective procedures.)

In addition, other state declarations, such as in New York and California, allow for flexibility in emergency transport by permitting emergency medical service personnel to transport patients to medical facilities other than hospitals.

On March 13,2020, President Trump declared a national emergency in response to the novel corona virus outbreak. This declaration allows the federal government to increase federal funding for states to respond to the crisis and expand the scope of their emergency actions as the COVID -19 outbreak continues. State actions taken in response to the outbreak are intended to help expand access and eliminate barriers to care by; developing networks of emergency volunteer health care professionals , developing emergency health care centers, creating and requiring use of diagnostic and treatment of patients, expanding who can provide testing for COVID-19, waiving cost sharing related to screening and testing for COVID-19, ensuring access to alternative methods of treatment, such as telemedicine, and determining procedures for isolation and quarantine. To achieve these objectives, many state emergency declarations give authority to state agencies, such as departments of health, to issue emergency regulations.

THE MAJOR CONSEQUENCES ARE IN RELATION TO THE HUMAN RIGHTS OF THE CITIZENS.

The freedom of association, movement are being infringed on which affects democracy. Article 29 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda as amended, provides that every person shall have a right to freedom to assemble to demonstrate, to assemble and to associate with others. Every Ugandan shall have a right to move throughout Uganda and to enter in and out of Uganda.

The Freedom from torture and inhumane and degrading treatment as provided for in Article 24 of the constitution of Uganda 1995 as amended is being infringed with deployment of (Local Defence Unit) LDU personnel in the streets to enforce the curfews specifically. The brutality by LDUs is not a new thing as it has existed since 1987 when LDUs were introduced to keep law and order in rural areas.[548]Since 1987 LDUs remain operating extra legally in our communities despite not having a

[548] Brighten Abaho.LDUs another form of insecurity. July 7,2020
https://www.pmldaily,co/oped/2020/07/brighten-abaho-ldus-another-form-of-insecurity.html viewed on 7/30/2020 at 5:45pm law providing for their existence.[549]

The LDUs personnel are first and foremost not provided for in the law .In a petition filed before the civil division of the High Court in Kampala, the lawyer Mabirizi says that it is illegal for the UPDF under president Museveni's command and guidance from cabinet to recruit, train and maintain LDUs as they are not provided for in the UPDF, Uganda police and Uganda prisons service.[550]

It is evident with the various cases where LDU personnel have been dragged to court for brutality in the guise of implementing the president's orders of the COVID-19. For example recently at least seven LDU personnel have been sentenced to two months in military prison for brutality, which is a clear indication that people's rights are being infringed on in implementing the emergency laws thus questioning the legality of these enforcement agencies.[551]

Another recent infringement on the right to freedom of torture was the one connected to the death of a Makerere student by the names of Tegu Emmanuel which the law students at Makerere University under their umbrella body expressed that "the violence and impunity with which these acts were executed shows the extent to which the respect of the rule of law and confidence in state action has declined. Such behaviour goes against the dictates of the constitution of Uganda, particularly under Article 24 which guarantees freedom of every Ugandan citizen from torture cruel and in humane or degrading treatment."[552]

These illegalities lead to the loss of confidence on the state or government by the citizens and brings about insecurities in the nation and breach of the constitution and international instruments as there is no respect of the rule of law which is expected of countries like Uganda that are responding to the COVID-19 crisis by use of these emergency laws other than declaring a state of emergency.

The concentration of powers in the hands of the Executive with little to no judicial or Parliamentary oversight, combined with the lack of clarity of the status and content of measures. These include excessive use of force by security forces, including Local Defense Units, in enforcing the lockdown measures, as well as harassment of journalists and human rights defenders in a worrisome trend of shrinking civic space in Uganda. These will be further explored in future explored in future posts

[549] Ibid

[550] Kenneth Kazibwe. Lawyer drags government to court over existence,recruitment of LDUS.August 13,2019 at 9:07am https://nilepost.co.ug/2019/08/13/lawyer-drags-government-to-court-over-existence-recruitment-of-ldus/Visited on 7/30/2020 at 5:56pm

[551] Seven LDUs convicted over brutality. The independent April 15 2020 http://www.independent.co.ug/seven-LDUs-convicted-over-brutalityVisited on 30/7/2020 at 5:25pm

[552] Edwin Sabiiti.Makerere Law student demand for justice for killed university student.July 6, 2020. https://the legalreports.com/2020/07/06/Makerere-law-students-demand-justice-for-killed-university-student/ viewed on 7/30/2020 at 5:36pm

on both the impact of mobility restrictions on Ugandan's rights and freedoms and judicial administration.

Additionally, the handling of COVID 19 patients has also raised serious human rights concerns. Many have complained about being in isolation centers or taken to health facilities where they have received inadequate medical attention and poor nutrition, and have been treated in an inhumane or degrading fashion.

Health care workers themselves at the frontline of the fight, have also complained about not getting the appropriate equipment to do their jobs. When they wanted to protest, the state of emergency regime prevented them from doing so.

The extended powers given to security forces in some countries go beyond restricting the movement of people. In most cases in Africa, only a state of emergency or national disaster gives governments, in this case the executive branch, immediate and extended powers to make such decisions legal and enforceable. Depending on the country, declaring a state of emergency or of national disaster follows distinct processes and confers different powers on the executive. In most cases, a state of emergency gives more extensive powers to the executive and, as consequence, drastically reduces civil liberties.

The involvement and control of other branches of government is typically limited at first and then eventually becomes necessary to extend the state of emergency, for instance court challenges; in some countries, such as the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) and Malawi, these measures were challenged in court. In the first case, before the state of emergency was declared on 24 March and a lockdown of parts of the capital city – province Kinshasa was imposed, President Felix Tshisekedi had announced, on 18 March, measures to restrict the movement of people, including banning public gatherings, closing schools, restricting travel and closing public establishments such as bars and restaurants.

Many believed that instituting those measures before declaring the state of emergency was unconstitutional. Some also argued that Tshisekedi was supposed to consult with and get approval from both Parliament and the senate before declaring the state of emergency. The constitutional court, however, ruled that Tshisekedi's state of emergency declaration was in fact based on the law.

What has transpired in the DRC is also linked to the political climate before the outbreak of COVID-19, tumultuous political arrangement with former president Joseph Kabila's Front Commun pour le Congo (FCC), which holds a majority in Parliament and the senate.

Due to the abuses seen during the COVID-19 lockdowns around the world. UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Michelle Bachelet recently warned that "the public health emergency risks becoming a human rights disaster.

There has been a tendency towards what can be described as the misuse of the state of emergency for repressive or purely political purposes. “But emergency powers should not be used as a weapon to quash dissent, control the population and even perpetuate their time in power. Exceptional measures should be used to cope with the pandemic, nothing more, nothing less,” says Bachelet.

The current environment makes it even more difficult for civil society and human rights defenders to oppose this shift. The fear is that the pandemic will persist over time and that his decline in human rights will continue even beyond this crisis.

In fact, as a state of emergency cannot be a permanent regime, some countries are in the process of passing or have passed laws that allow the maintenance of the restrictions imposed in the fight against COVID-19. This legalizes, de facto, a kind of “regime of exceptions, “which in many cases can hardly pass constitutional muster. In addition, the current environment makes it even more difficult for civil society and human rights defenders to oppose this shift.

What is at stake is not a philosophical or ideological debate about democracy or human rights, but rather the very lives of the people for whom these measures are being taken.

POLITICS AND COVID-19

The corona virus was first discovered in 2007 when scientists warned that there was an extensive reservoir of SARS-Cov-like viruses in horseshoe bats. They emphasized that it was a threat and that there was a possibility SARS would re-emerge and other new viruses, which should not be ignored.[553] The first outbreak of SARS was in 2002 but it died down.[554] After all this time, COVID-19 has sprung up as the most dangerous respiratory disease pandemic since 1918, when the “Spanish” influenza pandemic killed close to 50 million people.[555]

In 2003, the China was infected with a virus causing Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS) in the province of Guangdong. The virus was confirmed as a member of the Betacoronavirus subgroup and was named SARS-CoV.[556] The infected patients showed pneumonia symptoms with a lung injury, leading to acute respiratory distress syndrome (ARDS). SARS emerged in Guangdong province, China and then spread quickly around the globe with more than 8000 infected persons and 776 deceased.[557]

[553] Cheng VCC, et al 2007. Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus as an Agent of Emerging and Re-emerging Infection. ClinMicrobiol Rev.20: 660-694

[554] David MM, et al 2020. The Origin Of Covid-19 And Why It Matters, The American Journal of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene, 103(3), 2020, pp. 955-959

[555] Taubenberger JK, et. al. 2019. The 1918 influenza pandemic: 100 years of questions answered and unanswered, Sci Transl Med 11:eeaau5485

[556] Peiris J, et al 2004. Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome, Nat Med; 10(12): S88-97; see also Pyrc K. et al 2007. Identification of New Human Coronaviruses, Expert Review of Anti-infective Therapy; 5(2): 245-53

[557] Muhammad AS. et al 2020. Covid-19 Infection: Origin, Transmission and Characteristics of Human Coronaviruses,

In the year of 2012, a few Saudi Arabian nationals were diagnosed with another coronavirus. The detected virus was confirmed as coronaviruses thus the name Middle East Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus (MERS-Cov). The World health organization reported that MERS coronavirus infected more than 2,428 individuals and 838 deaths.[558] MERS-CoV is a member beta-coronavirus subgroup and phylogenetically diverse from other human-CoV. The infection of MERS-CoV starts from a mild upper respiratory injury, while progression leads to severe respiratory disease. Like SARS coronavirus, patients infected with MERS-coronavirus suffer from pneumonia, followed by ARDS and renal failure.[559]

Nearing to the end of 2019, the government of China was informed about many cases of pneumonia due to an unfamiliar aetiology. The outbreak emanated from a seafood market in Wuhan city of China and rapidly infected more than 50 people. The live animals are frequently sold at the Hunan seafood market, such as bats, frogs, snakes, birds, marmots and rabbits.[560]

On 12 January 2020, the National Health Commission of China released further details about the epidemic which suggested viral pneumonia.[561] From the sequence-based analysis of isolates from the patients, the virus was identified as a novel coronavirus. Moreover, the genetic sequence was also provided for the diagnosis of viral infection.[562] Initially, it was suggested that the patients who had contracted the novel coronavirus induced pneumonia in China might have visited the seafood market where live animals were sold or may have used infected animals or birds for food. However, further investigations showed that some people got the virus even with no history of visiting the seafood market.[563] These observations indicated a human to the human spreading capability of this virus, which was subsequently reported in more than 100 countries globally.[564] The human-to-human spreading of the virus occurs due to close contact with an infected person, exposed to coughing, sneezing, respiratory droplets or aerosols. These aerosols can penetrate the human body (lungs) via inhalation through the nose or mouth.[565]

Journal of Advanced Research, 24 (2020) 91-98

[558] Rahman A & Sarkar A. 2019. Risk Factors For Fatal Middle East Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus Infections In Saudi Arabia: Analysis Of The WHO Line List, 2013-2018, American Journal of Public Health, 109(9): 1288-93

[559] Memish ZA, et al. 2013. Family Cluster of Middle East Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus Infections, New England Journal of Medicine, 368(26): 2487-94

[560] Wang C, et al. 2020. A novel coronavirus outbreak of global health concern, The Lancet.

[561] Ibid.

[562] Riou J, et al. 2020. Pattern of early human-to-human transmission of Wuhan 2019 novel coronavirus (2019-nCov), Eurosurveillance; 25 (4)

[563] Parry J, 2020. China Coronavirus: Cases surge as Official Admits Human-to-Human Transmission, British Medical Journal Publishing Group.

[564] Li Q, Guan X, et al. 2020. Early transmission dynamics in Wuhan, China, of novel coronavirus-infected pneumonia, New England Journal of Medicine.

[565] Phan LT, et al. 2020. Importation and Human-to-Human transmission of a novel coronavirus in Vietnam, New England Journal of Medicine.

On 31st December 2019, China alerted the World Health Organisation that it had regsitered 44 cases of pneumonia with an unknown cause between December 31 and 3 January. Although there had been several cases of pneumonia in December and possibly November in Wuhan, this was the moment that the world's attention was drawn to the mysterious illness.[566] On January 9th, 2020, the virus claimed its first life, as China reported two days later. In the next thirteen days, Wuhan province was placed under lockdown. World Health Organisation noted that there was increasing evidence for human-to-human transmission. By the end of January, 9,927 cases and 213 deaths had been reported, and the United Kingdom reported its first case then. The infection was subsequently named Covid-19, and in mid-February, cases were recorded in Africa, and France registered its first death. On March 11, there were 125,875 cases and 4,615 deaths. The World Health Organisation declared the disease a pandemic. By April 2, there were over one million confirmed cases worldwide, with over 75,000 recorded deaths.[567]

In Uganda, the Minister of Health, Dr Jane Ruth Aceng, confirmed that Uganda registered her first case of COVID-19 on Saturday 21st March 2020. The confirmed case was a 36- year old Ugandan male who arrived from Dubai on Saturday 21st March 2020 at 2:00 am aboard the Ethiopian Airlines. As of April 02, 2020, the country had registered 44 confirmed cases of Covid-19. The majority of the cases were travellers returning from United Arab Emirates (14), United Kingdom (14) and other countries. At this time, some districts like Makasa (3), Hoima (2), Adjumani (1), and Iganga (1) had also registered cases, and it was not clear if these were secondary to the on-going active transmissions.[568]As of May 17th 2021, the cases grew, and Uganda had confirmed 42,779 cases and recorded 347 deaths.

Therefore, the rampant growth of the virus had a significant impact on the different sectors of governments worldwide. Countries were tasked to adopt new measures in order to cope with the pandemic. Most countries went into lockdown, and a return to normalcy is still a dream. It can even be argued that the pandemic has created a new normal, which might be around for longer than anticipated.

Uganda's COVID-19 control legal measures were announced by the President, and the Minister of Health published them as legal instruments under the Public Health Act a few days later. This declaration went against Uganda's established legal procedure, and as a result, it distorts the separation of powers as we know it, allowing the executive to make pronouncements that would later be codified for implementation. As a result, various far-reaching initiatives to respond to the situation were declared and implemented. All schools and educational institutions were closed; incoming and outgoing passenger planes were barred; most people were confined within the country; and most companies were prohibited from operating. The majority, if not all, of these actions were conducted in accordance with the Public Health Act.

[566] Clarke S, Antonio V, et al. 2020. How Coronavirus spread across the globe-visualised, The Guardian; April 09, 2020, available at; https://www.theguardian.com/world/ng-interactive/2020/apr/09/how-coronavirus-spread-across-the-globe-visualised (accessed on July 28, 2021)
[567] Ibid.
[568] Dr. Jane Ruth Aceng, April 02, 2020. Update on the Covid-19 response in Uganda, Ministry of Health Press Release, available on; https://www.health.go.ug/covid/2020/04/02/update-on-the-covid-19-response-in-uganda/ (accessed on May 17, 2021)

The presidential election in Uganda was place on January 14, 2021. Weeks of violence preceded it, including the arrest of opposition candidates, the kidnapping of party and campaign staff held at undisclosed military locations, and the killing of at least 54 protestors and bystanders by the 2 military between November 18-20, 2020, as well as the wounding and mutilation of hundreds. The arrest and incarceration of lawyers working for opposition candidates accompanied the violence. The military spread out across Uganda's towns and cities two days before the election, creating an atmosphere of dread and compulsion that caused many, if not all, voters to stay home.

The Electoral Commission banned campaigning in much of Kampala and other municipalities a week before the poll. The prohibition was imposed only to urban strongholds of opposition candidates, with the pretence of preventing gatherings due to COVID-19. The election was held under a repressive and coercive environment. Beginning the day before the election, military and police forces fanned out across Uganda. Armed personnel carriers and other military vehicles made their way through Kampala and other cities.

As a result of these events, there were far reaching impacts on the economy and human rights of citizens of Uganda. The roles and powers of the legislature as we know them were significantly altered by the pandemic.

The constitution is the supreme law of the land, and any other law which contravenes the constitution is null and void to the extent of its inconsistency.[569] Therefore, the powers that allow anybody to make law are enshrined in this constitution. Chapter six of the Constitution provides for the Legislature and its roles, making laws.

Article 79(1) of the Constitution provides that subject to the Constitution's provisions; Parliament shall have the power to make laws on any matter for the peace, order, development and good governance of Uganda. Therefore, this provision gives the parliament the power to make any law that governs the daily workings in the jurisdiction of Uganda.

Article 79(2) further provides that except as provided in the Constitution, no person or body other than Parliament shall have the power to make provisions having the force of law in Uganda except under authority conferred by an Act of Parliament. This provision bars any other body or person from making any other law for governing the country except as provided by the law.

[569] Article 2 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995, as amended

The two provisions vest all the law-making power into the parliament, and the parliament has over time devised a procedure of making the laws, which is peculiar to their work and has over time brought forth the laws that manage the country.

It is important to note that the Constitution envisages other times when laws can be made without following the provisions of Chapter six strictly. Indeed, Article 99(5) of the Constitution provides that the signature of a Minister may authenticate a statutory instrument or other instrument issued by the President or any person authorised by the President; and the validity of any instrument so authenticated shall not be called in question on the ground that it is not made, issued or executed by the President.

This provision of the law seems to give the president the power to make statutory instruments that the minister can pass as law upon signature by the minister. Recently, the president of Uganda made declarations which were later codified by the Minister of Health and signed for operation as guidelines during the subsistence of the law. However, these laws were made according to the powers given to the minister for secondary legislation, as discussed in the subsequent writings.

Article 110 of the Constitution provides that the President may, in consultation with the Cabinet, by proclamation, declare that a state of emergency exists in Uganda or any part of Uganda.

If the President is satisfied that circumstances exist in Uganda or in that part of Uganda in which Uganda or that part of it is threatened by war or external aggression; in which the security or the economic life of the country or that part is threatened by internal insurgency or natural disaster; or which render necessary the taking of measures which are required for securing the public safety, the defence of Uganda and the maintenance of public order and supplies and services essential to the life of the community.

This state of emergency only subsists for ninety days and then expires, except where Parliament extends the days for a period not exceeding ninety days at a time. Such a declaration by the president must be laid before Parliament for approval as soon as practicable and in any case not later than fourteen days after it was issued.[570]

It is important to note that subject to the Constitution's provisions; Parliament must enact such laws as may be necessary for enabling effective measures to be taken for dealing with any state of emergency that may be declared under this article.[571] This means that after the declaration, any orders made by the president must be codified by parliament.

[570] Article 110 (1) (2) (3) (4) of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995, as amended
[571] Article 110 (7), Ibid

The law-making process takes quite some time to bring the law into enactment. The justification for this period can be attributed to the need to uphold democracy, transparency, and community involvement. If laws were passed any earlier, any of these would stand threatened and, in the long run, would affect the good governance of the country and the social contract of the same.

However, the nature of pandemics is that it has no respect for timelines. They tend to spread at unprecedented speeds and causing effects more profound than any law, however well crafted, could ever atone. This, therefore, poses the greatest threat to the law-making process because the parliament will under normal circumstances not be able to pass a law in time to manage the mode of operation during times of the pandemic.[572]

Therefore, the challenge was that the government had to take drastic measures to slow down the rate at which the virus was spreading, and this was to be done while respecting the law. At that time, several far-reaching measures were announced, and effected, to respond to the crisis: all schools and educational institutions were closed, incoming and outgoing passenger flights prohibited, movements of most persons within the country restricted and the majority of business restricted from operating.[573]

To the extent that this was done on mere directives, without regard to any known law-making procedures, it made the directives doubtful on their constitutionality and, therefore, on whether they should be allowed to operate. This, in effect, caused a ripple of violations to other substantive laws since the directives were not constitutionally backed.

The failure by the government to follow the ordinary law-making process has, in turn, affected the observation of other substantial laws. Central to this is the Human rights violation. Most of the directives issued by the president were to do with movement, assembly, health, to mention but a few. To a certain extent, these rights were limited for purposes of curtailing the spread of the virus. As much as the move was for good intention, the mode of doing the same was not backed up by law and amounted to a violation.

Article 43 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda provides that in the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms prescribed in this Chapter, no person shall prejudice the fundamental or other human rights and freedoms of others or the public interest. The provision further describes public interest that public interest under this article shall not permit, among other things, any limitation of the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms prescribed by this Chapter beyond what is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society what is provided in this Constitution. Dr Busingye breaks down the meaning of this provision that the formulation of Article 43(2) was deliberate, and each word as employed in that provision has particular significance. The effect of this provision was to set a high bar for the limitation of human rights.[574]

[572] Steiner, J., Woods, L. and Twigg-Flesner, C. (2003) Textbook on EC Law, Oxford, Oxford University Press, pp. 57--62.

[573] Busingye K., 2020. The 1995 Constitution and Covid-19 by Dr. Busingye Kabumba, [online], available at; https://observer.ug/viewpoint/64295-constitution-and-covid-19-are-presidential-directives-unconstitutional (accessed on 28th July, 2021)

The courts interpreted Article 43 in Charles Onyango Obbo and anor v Attorney General, Constitutional Petition No. 15 of 1997, which the Supreme Court upheld. The court elaborately stated thus;

"FREE AND DEMOCRATIC SOCIETY

This phrase now appears in the human rights provisions of many constitutions of the countries of the Commonwealth; Canada, Papua, New Guinea, Namibia, Zimbabwe, Nigeria and Zambia, to mention but a few. The phrase is not defined in any of the Constitutions, but the Courts of those Countries have developed and assigned definite meanings to the phrase. The meaning assigned to it is remarkably similar despite differences in social, cultural and political systems prevailing in each of the jurisdictions I have mentioned above. The most prominent authority on the meaning of the phrase "Free and democratic society" can be found in the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Regina Vs Oakes (supra), which many commonwealth jurisdictions have followed with similar Constitutional provisions as Canada. In the Canadian Constitution, the phrase "free and democratic society" is used in section 1, which is almost similar to our article 43 (2), where the same phrase is used. The Supreme Court of Canada stated:-

"A second contextual element of interpretation of S.1 is provided by the words "free and democratic society." Inclusion of these words as the final standard of justification for limits of the rights and freedoms refers the Court to the purpose for which the Charter was originally entrenched in the Constitution. Canadian Society is to be free and democratic. The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society, which I believe embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for culture and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society. The underlying values and principles of a free and democratic society are the genesis of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter and the ultimate standard against which a limit on a right or freedom must be shown, despite its effect, to be reasonable and demonstrably justified."

[574] Ibid

ACCEPTABLE AND DEMONSTRABLY JUSTIFIABLE

This is the phrase used in article 43 (2) of our Constitution. In the Canadian Constitution, they use "reasonable and demonstrably justified." In my view, there is no significant difference between the two phrases. In the Canadian case of Regina Vs Oakes (supra), the phrase was given meaning as follows:-

"To establish that a limit (to rights and freedoms) is reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society, two central criteria must be satisfied. First, the objective that the measures responsible for the limit on a Charter right or freedom are designed to serve must be of sufficient importance to warrant overriding a

Constitutionally protected right or freedom

The standard must be high in order to ensure that objectives that are trivial or discordant with the principles integral to a free and democratic society do not gain s.l (Our article 43 (2)) protection. It is necessary, at a minimum, that an objective related to concerns that are pressing and substantial in a free and democratic society before it can be characterised as sufficiently necessary. Secondly, once a sufficiently significant objective is recognised, then the party invoking s.l must show that the means chosen are reasonably and demonstrably justified. This involves a form of PROPORTIONALITY TEST... Although the nature of the proportionality test will vary depending on the circumstances, the Court will be required to balance the interest of society with those of individuals and groups in each case. There are, in my view, three essential components of the proportionality test. First, the measures adopted must be carefully designed to achieve the objective in question. They must not be arbitrary, unfair or based on irrational considerations. In short they must be rationally connected to the objective. Secondly, the means, even if rationally connected to the objective in the first sense, should impair "as little as possible" the right or freedom in question: R Vs Big M Drug Mart Ltd Supra. Thirdly, there must be proportionality between the effects of the measures which are responsible for limiting the charter right or freedom and the objective which has been identified as of "sufficient importance."

It can be argued, and successfully so that the government failed to meet this threshold laid down by the constitutional court twenty years before the current pandemic. The government set in the wake of the pandemic fell short of the threshold that is well prescribed in the law. One of how a measure can fail this high test is if it can be shown that the legitimate objective (the protection of public health in this instance) can be achieved through an alternative method that is less restrictive to human rights (in this case, the right to movement).[575] It can be said that the declaration of a state of emergency by the president would have allowed for directives that would be passed following the provisions of the Constitution.

[575] Ibid

COMPULSORY VACCINATION AND ITS PREDICAMENTS ON FUNDAMENTAL HUMAN RIGHTS IS IT AN EXECUTIVE UNFETTERED MANDATE?

Introduction:

When the case of Vavricka V Czech Republic was brought before the European Committee Court for Human Rights in 2015, the significance of the court's assessment of the case could not have been foreseen. Parents in the Czech Republic had refused to have their children vaccinated for various reasons, including their religious reservations, and were punished with either fines or exclusion from Kindergarten. Today, more than five years later, Covid-19 has a firm grip on Europe and the world. Even before breakthroughs in vaccine development were achieved, there were discussions about whether would or should be made compulsory. Opponents of (compulsory) vaccination often cite 'fundamental rights' as the basis for their stance. But what do fundamental rights or rather what does the European Court on Human Rights as the final European authority on the common European body of fundamental rights have to say about compulsory vaccination? This question thus, calls for a brief survey of the court's case law with regard to compulsory vaccinations, including the most recent decision, Vavricka V Czech Republic, and thus, attempts to serve as a guide when it comes to predicting how the court might rule on (possible) future cases.

WHAT IS COMPULSORY VACCINATION

Unsurprisingly, a vaccination system in which the enforcement of a duty to vaccinate ultimately ensured by the compulsory administration of the vaccine constitutes 'compulsory vaccination'. However, in most cases, states opt for rather indirect, relative forms of enforcement, which impliedly negative consequences in the case of the refusal to vaccinate but do not include compulsory administration. Such indirect means maybe fines or the linking of one's vaccination status to the enjoyment of certain (non- essential) services, like preschool, or situations, e.g., attending a concert. Considering that medical interventions are only to be carried out with the free and informed consent of the person concerned, it seems appropriate to define every vaccination system that mandates any negative consequence as a result of refusing to carry out vaccination as 'compulsory vaccination' subject to justification, as these consequences can and are intended to influence one's decision to get vaccinated. This seems to be in line with the definition of compulsory vaccination underlying the court's recent decision in Vavricka V Czech Republic, the court speaks of 'compulsory vaccination', although the duty can't be directly imposed, the highest fine for not vaccinating one's child is EUR400, which can only be imposed once, and the exclusion from educational institutions only concerns preschool, which is not part of the Czech Republic's mandatory education. In the court's opinion, the consequences of non-compliance borne by the applicants cannot be meaningfully dissociated from the underlying duty. On the contrary, they flow immediately and directly from the applicant's attitude towards it and are therefore intrinsically connected to it. Hence, even if a vaccination is never forcefully administered, the negative effects, arising as a direct consequence of non-vaccination may limit the ability to exercise fundamental rights and constitute an inference. However, certain legal consequences interfere more intensely with fundamental rights than others, which is why the choice of these consequences subsequently has an influence on the assessment of proportionality of compulsory vaccination.

Vaccines are one of the most effective tools for protecting people against COVID-19. Consequently, with COVID-19 vaccination under way or on the horizon in many countries, some may be considering whether to make COVID-19 vaccination mandatory in order to increase vaccination rates and achieve public health goals and, if so, under what conditions, for whom and in what contexts. It is not uncommon for governments and institutions to mandate certain actions or types of behavior in order to protect the wellbeing of individuals or communities. Such policies can be ethically justified, as they may be crucial to protect the health and wellbeing of the public. Nevertheless, because policies that mandate an action or behavior interfere with individual liberty and autonomy, they should seek to balance communal well-being with individual liberties. While interfering with individual liberty does not in itself make a policy intervention unjustified, such policies raise a number of ethical considerations and concerns and should be justified by advancing another valuable social goal, like protecting public health. This document does not provide a position that endorses or opposes mandatory COVID-19 vaccination. Rather, it identifies important legal & ethical considerations and caveats that should be explicitly evaluated and discussed through ethical analysis by governments and or institutional policy-makers who may be considering mandates for COVID-19 vaccination.

THE CONCEPT OF COMPLUSORY VACCINATION

In 1976, British physician Edward Jenner developed the first vaccination, which employed the cow pox virus [vaccinia] to protect humans against small pox and similar viruses. Prior to that, Asian physicians used the notion of vaccination to protect infants from smallpox by giving them dried crusts from the lesions of adults who had the disease. Some people developed immunity, while others contracted the sickness. Jenner's contribution was the use of a chemical that was similar to smallpox but was safer. As a result, he took advantage of the rather uncommon condition in which immunization to one virus offers protection against another virus.

Injecting sheep with a preparation containing attenuated versions of the bacillus that causes anthrax established immunization against the disease in 1881, and four years later he discovered a protective solution against rabies.

Following Pasteur's death, a widespread and rigorous search for new vaccines was undertaken, with vaccinations against bacteria and viruses, as well as venoms and other toxins, being developed. By 1980, small pox had been eradicated globally thanks to vaccination, and polio occurrences had dropped by 99 percent.

Mumps, measles, typhoid fever, cholera, plague, tuberculosis, tularemia, pneumococcal infection, tetanus, influenza, yellow fever, Hepatitis A, and Hepatitis B are among the diseases for which vaccines have been developed. Some forms of encephalitis and typhus have vaccines, however some of them aren't 100 percent effective or are only used in high-risk populations. Vaccines against viruses are especially important for immune protection, as viral infections do not respond to antibiotics like bacterial infections do.

The difficulty in vaccine development is to create a vaccination that is effective enough to prevent infection without making the person sick. To that end, scientists have developed a variety of vaccines. Weakened or attenuated vaccinations are made up of microorganisms that have lost their potential to cause significant sickness but still promote immunity. They can cause a subclinical or mild type of disease. Measles, mumps, polio, and tuberculosis vaccinations are among those that have been attenuated.

Vaccinations that contain organisms that have been destroyed or inactivated using heat or chemicals are known as activated vaccines. Immune responses are elicited by inactivated vaccinations, but they are often less complete than those elicited by attenuated vaccines.

Advances in laboratory technology allowed vaccine development approaches to be developed in the late twentieth century. Medical researchers could figure out which genes in a pathogen encode proteins that trigger the immune response to that organism. Immune-stimulating proteins [antigens] might then be mass-produced and employed in vaccinations. It also enabled pathogens to be genetically modified and weakened viral strains to be created. In this technique, pathogens' toxic proteins can be removed or changed, resulting in a safer and more effective means of producing attenuated vaccines.

THE LEGALITY OF COMPLUSORY VACCINATION

Literally, vaccination is defined as an act of introducing a vaccine into the body to produce immunity to a specific disease.

Medically, vaccination is defined as the suspension of attenuated or killed microorganisms that is viruses, bacteria, or rickettsia are administered for prevention, amelioration or treatment of an infectious disease. For example, anthrax vaccine a cell fee protein extract of cultures of Bacillus anthracis used for immunization against Anthrax.

According to the American Heritage Medical Dictionary 2007 ,2004, A vaccine is a preparation of weakened or killed pathogen such as a bacterium or virus or of a portion of the pathogen structure that upon administration to an individual stimulates antibody production or cellular immunity against the pathogen but is incapable of causing severe infection.

According to the Legal Dictionary Thesaurus. Vaccine is any preparation used to render an organism immune to some disease by inducing or increasing the natural immunity mechanism

In an Article written by Emily K Brunson, Contributor to SAGE Publications Encyclopedia of Epidemiology [2008] whose work for that Encyclopedia formed the basis of her contributions to Britannica. She defined a vaccine as a suspension of weakened, killed or fragmented microorganisms or toxins or of antibodies or lymphocytes that is administered primarily to prevent disease. Vaccines are usually administered by injection but some are orally or even nasally in case of a flu vaccine.

The Genesis of Vaccination

The first vaccine was introduced by British Physician Edward Jenner who in 1976 used the cow pox virus [vaccinia] to confer protection against small pox, related virus in humans. Prior to that use, however the principle of vaccination was applied by Asian Physicians who gave children dried crusts from the lesions of people suffering smallpox to protect against the disease. While some developed immunity, others developed the disease. Jenner's contribution was to use a substance similar to, but safer than small pox to convey immunity. He thus exploited the relatively rare situation in which immunity to one virus confers protection against another viral disease.

In 1881 French microbiologist Louis Pasteur demonstrated immunization against anthrax by injecting sheep with a preparation containing attenuated forms of bacillus that causes the disease, four years later he developed a protective suspension against rabies

After Pasteur'stime, a widespread and intensive search for new vaccines was conducted and vaccines against bacteria and viruses were produced as well as vaccines against venoms and other toxins. Through vaccination, small pox was eradicated worldwide by 1980, and polio cases declined 99 percent

Other diseases for which vaccines have been developed include mumps, measles, typhoid fever, cholera, plague, tuberculosis, tularemia, pneumococcal infection, tetanus, influenza, yellow fever, Hepatitis A, Hepatitis B. Some types of encephalitis and typhus although some of those vaccines are less than 100 percent effective or are used only in populations of high risk. Vaccines against viruses provide especially important immune protection, since unlike bacterial infections, viral infections do not respond to antibiotics.

THE VACCINE TYPES

The challenge in vaccine development consists of devising a vaccine strong enough to ward off infection without making the individual seriously ill. To that end, researchers have devised different types of vaccines. Weakened or attenuated vaccines consist of microorganisms that have lost the ability to cause serious illness but retain the ability to stimulate immunity. They may produce a mild or subclinical form of disease. Attenuated vaccines include those of measles, mumps, polio and tuberculosis

In activated vaccines are those that contain organisms that have been killed or inactivated with heat or chemicals. Inactivated vaccines elicit an immune response, but the response often is less complete than with the attenuated vaccine

In the late 20thcentury, advances in laboratory techniques allowed approaches to vaccine development to be refined. Medical researchers could identify the genes of a pathogen that encode then protein or proteins that stimulate the immune response to that organism. That allowed the immunity stimulating proteins [antigens] to be mass produced and used in vaccines. It also made it possible to alter pathogens genetically and produce weakened strains of viruses. In that way harmful proteins from pathogens can be deleted or modified, thus providing a safer and more effective method which to manufacture attenuated vaccines.

The outbreaks that warranted the vaccines

There have been five in the last 140 years with the 1918 flu pandemic in being the most severe, this pandemic being the most severe, is estimated to have been responsible for the deaths of 50 to 100 million people. The most recent, the 2009 Swine flu pandemic, resulted in under a million deaths and considered relatively mild.

The Historical medical library of the college of physicians of philaphedia

Influenza is an infectious disease commonly characterized by fever, muscled aches, sore throat, headache and fatigue. It is generally caused by two types of influenza, influenza A and influenza B, influenza C causes upper respiratory tract infections in young people but is not as common as other two types. Most people infected with influenza feel ill for several days and then recover.

People's protection from viruses depends on having been exposed to the virus before through infection. In either case, the immune system remembers the virus creates virus specific antibodies that will neutralize the virus when it next enters the body. But influenza viruses mutate or change, rapidly, every few year's influenza viruses mutate or change enough to result in a new strain. This process is known as antigenic drift. People who have been exposed to a related strain of throat virus will likely have some preexisting immunity to it in the form antibodies and the illness that results may be mild

Spanish influenza 1918-19

No other epidemic has claimed as many lives as the Spanish influenza epidemic in 1918-19. Worldwide as many as 40 million people died as this virulent illness swept through city after city [some estimates put total deaths closer to 70 million. Stories of people dying within hours of first feeling ill, the morality rate was highest among adults under 50, who were for unknown reasons particularly vulnerable to serious disease resulting from this strain of influenza

The first cases of influenza speared in Kansas in early spring 1918. Later that spring, officials reported large numbers of cases from Europe, through this flu seemed no more dangerous than the usual variety. However, in late summer, the virus became more deadly soon waves of infection moved through nations, towns and continents overwhelming hospitals and medical personnel. The Spanish Influenza came from the devastating effects of the flue in the autumn 1918.

In 1918 influenza had neither treatment nor an effective vaccine. Indeed, most exports at the time thought that a bacterium caused influenza rather than a virus. And though vaccines existed for several other diseases and a few useless and possibly harmful antifoul vaccines were concocted, an effective influenza vaccine was decades away

Later in the 1919 saw the last of the Spanish Influenza, the virus drifted into relative harmlessness through the 1920s and continued to circulate for several decades. Scientists have been able to classify the various responsible for the 1918 -19 pandemic H1N1 influenza.

Asian influenza 1957-58

Influenza remained a yearly occurrence after the 1918 occurrence after 1918 pandemic, but no new virulent influenza type emerged until early 1957. In February of that year, evidence began to surface about a serious wave of flue cutting a path through China

Maurice Hilleman, a microbiologist at Walter Reed Army Medical Centre, noticed news reports about in Asia. The number of cases led him to think that a new type of influenza was emerging and that a pandemic threatened. Hilleman and his team obtained a sample of the virus from a US serviceman, they soon determined that most people lacked antibody protection from the New influenza virus, which was an H2N2 type. Only certain older people who had survived an influenza pandemic of 1889 -1890 showed antibody response to the new virus.

Worldwide from 1957-1958, about 2 million people died from Asian flu with about 70,000 deaths in the United States.

Hong Kong Flue 1968-69

As in the pandemic just ten years earlier, the first signs of a new influenza. A strain emerged in Asia, the virus H3N2 reached the United States in September 1968 and peaked in the winter months. A vaccine became available but was not produced early enough to provide significant protection. About 34000 people died in the United States during this pandemic, some scientists think that a similarity with 1957-58 Asian flu may have helped protect people from more serious disease.

Asian flu threat 1997 –Present

The next significant threat to emerge influenza came again from Asia, where an avian influenza [H5N1] infected birds and the spread to humans, a number of humans became ill and died from the virus The outbreaks were particularly severe in 2003-2004 when tens of millions of poultry and water fowl died from the flue. The virus however did not spread from person to person but only among birds and then to humans.

The most recent pandemic is the corona virus pandemic also known as the covid 19 pandemic which has ravished the entire world and killed millions of people, it has been surrounded by several controversies as to whether it was actually naturally caused or it was scientifically made.

The origin of the corona virus,

According to the Oxford dictionary, Virus is defined as an agent that typically consists of a nucleic acid molecule in a protein coat and is too small to be seen by light microscopy and is able to multiply only within the living cells of a host.

According to the National Human Genome Research Institute, a virus is a collection of genetic code, either DNA or RNA surrounded by a protein coat

On December 30th, 2019, cases of an unknown pneumonia were reported and soon associated to the exposure to the Wuhan sea food market. On January 26th2020, 33 of the 585 environmental samples from the Wuhan seafood market were found to contain the novel coronavirus nucleic acid suggesting the virus originated from wild animals sold on the market. At this point Wuhan seafood market being the suspected source of the epidemic became an official conclusion

However, an Article in The Lacent paper stated that the first patient was recorded on the 1st of December 2019 and had any relation with the Wuhan sea food market and no epidemiological link between the first patient and the latter cases. On December 10th 2019, there were more 3 cases and 2 cases of the 3 had no relation to the Wuhan seafood market and no one sells bats in the sea food market

On the 29th of January 2020, Jinjatar hospital reported 99 cases and 50 of them had no history of exposure this was reported in the New England journal

Daniel Lucey says that if the new data are accurate the first human infections must have occurred in November 2019, if not because its incubation time between the infection and the symptoms surfacing,

The questions as to the origin of the virus and the cause started rising and the number pf cases arose, on January 18th2020, question about why they included seafood criteria yet there were number of patients were not in any relation to sea food started to point out a cover up.

Discoveries about Shi Zhengli from her published 4papers about the SARS outbreak 2003 and research on how the coronavirus can be transmittable to humans, on January 27th the virus exploded and on the 3rd of February the Wuhan virus was inconsistent with the bat coronavirus. After Sars, the virology Centre was established by France and china agreed after SARS The Wuhan institute went ahead to patent the treatment from USA whistle blowers stated that Shi Zhengli might have led to the virus escaping from the level 4 laboratory.

Furthermore, Nobel Prize winner 2018 Japanese physician, scientist and immunologist, Dry Tasuku Honjo stated that coronavirus is not natural, if it were natural it will not have affected the whole world due to the difference in temperatures in different countries precisely countries with the same temperature as China. He says having worked in the Wuhan laboratory for 4 years the virus must have been manufactured and therefore based on his research and acknowledges he concurs 100 percent that corona is not natural.

Several suits have been filed against the communist party and the Chinese government

On 24th March 2021, in the United States; Texas Layer Larry filed a complaint in the Texas Federal court seeking at least 20 million dollars from the Chinese government

On the 4th of April, 2021, in the United Kingdom, the British think tank, Henry Jackson society advocated for compensation of 351 billion pounds from the communist party to the UK

On the 4th April 2021, the All India Bar Association filed a complaint to the United Nations Human Rights council seeking unspecified amount.

Kennedy suit

With the disputes about how the coronavirus came up many are relating it to conspiracy theories of the one world order, one world economy and one world religion and 5G network and the negligence of the communist party by it covering up the outbreak and information about the cause of the corona virus and its existence which has cost many countries lives. Data has become like oil as many countries are in need of it, they cause war themselves on the social media and people embark on these wars

With the rise of the super power countries most of them are greedy for power and will stop at nothing to see that the world is ruled by them and everything in it or around it. China, United States is the most powerful countries having an economic war

With the rising cases of the coronavirus and some of the countries being under the lockdown and restrictions being made on the movement in and out of the country the question arises as to whether we as a world are not headed for a world where vaccination against coronavirus shall become a pre requisite for travelling hence compulsory vaccination. Different countries have different laws that govern their medical personnel as to how such incidents are to be handled and here we question the legality using Uganda as the case in point checking its laws in relation to curbing spread of infectious diseases.

Section 19[576],it provides that public health allows restrictions on some rights so as to achieve overriding goals.

Article 16 [2] of the African charter on human and people's rights [577], it states that parties to this charter shall take necessary measures to protect the health of their people and ensure that they receive medical attention when they are sick.

Article 43,[578]it provides for enjoyment of rights and freedoms, no person shall prejudice fundamental or other human rights and freedoms of others or the public interest.

In conclusion, we can go ahead and question the legality of the compulsory vaccination as per the rights of the people but we have to agree that the state has the mandate to ensure protection of its citizens and take all necessary measures. The theories and questions about vaccines have been in existence and pandemics will continue to test our human capacity on how ready we are to stop them.

It's worth noting that the European court of Human Rights (ECHR) ruled that mandatory vaccination is necessary in democratic society, and even suggested that penalty against parents who refuse to vaccinate their children would be upheld[579].

LEGAL CONSIDERATIONS AND THE INTERFERENCES WITH FUNDAMENTAL HUMAN RIGHTS.

In this section I focus on the constitutional issues concerning compulsory vaccination laws. My position is that every state requires compulsory vaccination of all children, unless there is a medical reason why the child should not be vaccinated. In other words, there should be no exception to the compulsory vaccination requirement on account of the parents' religion, philosophy, or conscience or for any reason other than medical necessity. Simply put, the government's interest in protecting children and the preventing the spread of communicable disease justifies mandatory vaccinations for all children. However, certain legal consequences interfere more intensely with fundamental rights than others, which is why the choice of these consequences subsequently has an influence on the assessment of proportionality of compulsory vaccination. Arguments in this section raised

[576] The public Health Act Cap 281
[577] African charter on Human and Peoples rights
[578] 1995 constitution of the Republic of Uganda
[579] Look at Vavricka and others versus Czech Republic where the it was dicussed whether the impact of Covid 19 impact would likely impact vaccine policy against compulsory vaccinations will be examined with regard to their coverage in the fundamental rights to which they refer. The analysis will focus on the right to life as enshrined in Article 2 of the European Commission of Human Rights & Article 22 of the 1995 Ugandan constitution as amended, the right to respect of privacy and family as envisaged within Article8 & Article 26 of the 1995 Ugandan Constitution as amended respectively and the freedom of thought, conscience and religion. Since the court and the European Commission of Human Rights have dealt with alleged interferences with the said rights by vaccination in previous cases first, the argument that the risk of death associated with vaccination is high as voiced in Boffa & 13ors Vs San Marino is hereby assessed in light of the right to life. Thus, diseases are part of life some of course, as the current Covid 19 pandemic shows, affect our daily lives more severely than others. Some again, have lost their terrifying nature mainly because of vaccines. The World Health Organization estimates that vaccinations against diphtheria, tetanus, pertussis, influenza and measles save the lives of up to 3million people each year. But vaccination s doesn't offer absolute protection and side effects as well as vaccine associated deaths however, rare they can occur. its therefore reasonable to consider whether, and if so how, the right to life addresses such situations. The effective functioning of this protection of this right to life is to be ensured by implementing appropriate legal frameworks as well as enforcement or control mechanisms, and by conducting effective investigations into deaths, even if states are not responsible themselves. These principles also apply to the sphere of public health but if all necessary measures are to be taken, appropriate regulations are in place and an effective investigation was conducted, the states cannot be accountable. However, the court doesn't define which particular measures are to be taken as this fall within the state's 'margin of appreciation' therefore a variety of measures can fulfil the imposed positive obligations.

For vaccines which interfere with an individual's bodily integrity, this means that the right to life is only affected when potentially life-threatening circumstances arise in the individual case. Such a threat posed by the vaccination is conceivable, for example, in the case of allergies or other contraindications on the part of the person concerned. Vaccine-associated deaths, on the other hand, clearly do fall within the scope of protection. Since the primary aim of vaccination programs is to protect the individual concerning as well as the population as a whole, these are technically to be regarded as unintentional killings, for which the state is additionally required to have breached its obligation to take 'appropriate steps to safeguard life' to be liable. In this regard the decision rendered by the European Commission on Human Rights in Association of Parents Vs the United Kingdom explicitly states that if a state maintains a control and monitoring system that aims to minimize vaccine associated side effects, isolated fatalities don't constitute an interference with right of life. This of course can only be true for isolated fatalities that were unforeseeable.

Therefore, a prerequisite for the states to ensure compliance with the positive obligation to protect lives is, that an individual examination has been made to rule out the existence of contraindications. This, consequently implies the obligation to provide for exceptions to the duty to vaccinate when medically indicated.

Compulsory vaccination is therefore not per se an interference with the right to life in its manifestation as a prohibition of intentional killings as long as sufficient precautionary measures are in place not even if isolated life-threatening events or deaths occur. But could Article2 of European Human Rights Commission & Article22 of the 1995 Ugandan Constitution as amended, on the other hand, oblige the state to introduce compulsory vaccination through its positive obligations? The state's duty to protect its population from foreseeable or typical threats to life, does also include requirements for the sphere of health care. In order to prevent threats, the sates must enact protective regulations including such dealing with infectious diseases, as the uncontrolled spread of infectious diseases can pose a threat to the population.

However, an infection with a disease is generally not to be qualified as a direct threat to life, which means that Artile2 and Article22 of the European Human Rights Commission & the constitution of Uganda as amended is again only affected I situations in which a life-threatening factor enters into the equation. It is conceivable that life is endangered by infection, for example people belonging to a high-risk group who cannot be immunized or vaccinated. This applies to people without a fully working immune system e.g., because they suffer from chronic illness or severe allergies, undergo chemotherapy or are simply too young or too old to be vaccinated. These people are more dependent on 'herd immunity', which describes the condition that the disease can no longer spread as easily because a large part of the population has been vaccinated and therefore immune. Non-vaccinated people endanger herd immunity, and by that endanger those dependent on herd immunity, as they do not contribute to it through their own immunity and additionally contract and spread infectious diseases more easily. The existence of this danger to life is known to the states, as the existence of regulations tackling the problem of infectious diseases demonstrate, which is why a failure to act, at least in the case of epidemics or pandemics, where the abstract danger becomes concrete, would qualify as an interference.

Since there are no specifications as to which measures need to be taken in order to comply with the duty to protect life, different approaches may be permissible in the organization of health care systems. Moreover, there is no agreement among the convention states on how to deal with infectious diseases, which generally enlarges the margin of appreciation left to the states. The states therefore have a great deal of discretion in their choice of means. Thus, although there is an obligation to take measures to immunize the population in general, this obligation can be met both through compulsory vaccination and through voluntary vaccination plans. But the absence of an obligation to introduce compulsory vaccination doesn't in turn constitute a prohibition to introduce such a comparatively strict measure as in the words of the court, matters of health care policy, in particular as regards general preventive measures are in principle within the margin of appreciation of the domestic authorities who are best placed to assess priorities, use of resources and social needs. Finally, the obligation to conduct an effective investigation also applies to vaccine associated deaths, as a link between vaccination and death can only be established through appropriate investigations. This is due to the fact that death can shortly after the administration of a vaccine may be coincidental and not causal as e.g., it is possible that the cause of death may be completely unrelated to the vaccination or death was caused by inappropriate handling, contamination or other medical errors, but not by the vaccine itself. If the investigations were insufficient or completely omitted, this would constitute an interference.

Secondly, the notion of 'private life' essentially safeguards the right to make decisions over one's own body and body and life. The vigilance in this, is a creature of Objective XX under the National Objectives and Directive Principles of state Policy, as stipulated in the 1995 Constitution enjoins the state to take all practical measures to ensure the provision of basic medical services to the population. This consequently includes health related decisions as well. Medical treatment typically interferes with one's physical (also possibly one's psychological or even moral) integrity and any generally only be carried out with the consent of the person concerned. The case law of the erstwhile commission and the court considers every medical intervention against the will of the individual an interference with Article8 of the European Commission for Human Rights a clear reflection of Article 26 of the 1995 Ugandan constitution as amended. As compulsory vaccination in its absolute form is by definition carried regardless of whether one has consented or not, the lack of consent as well as the intrusion of the person's physical integrity undoubtedly interfere with the afore mentioned Articles. In Vavricka Vs Czeck Republic, however, the court went one step further and held that the duty to get vaccinated and the consequences attached to it cannot be dissociated. Thus, even if no vaccination was actually administrated against one's will, the direct negative consequences arising from the non-compliance with the duty to get vaccinated constitute an interference with then right to respect for private life, thereby also subjecting relative, indirect forms of compulsory vaccination to the scrutiny of the court.

Another way the freedom of choice, as the essence of the right to privacy manifests is in the ability to decide whether certain personal information data should remain secret. This particularly applies to health data. Therefore, the collection, storage and use of data by the state, if no consent was given is an interference requiring justification. Also, states must enact legal frameworks capable of preventing abuse or arbitrary use of personal information. Data protection is relevant for compulsory vaccination as its effective monitoring would most likely require an overview of the vaccination status of the population i.e., the collection, storage and processing of this information. This would thus constitute a further interference with the right to privacy if the individuals didn't agree or the legal framework was deemed insufficient or wasn't enacted at all. At least for member states of the EU, however a sufficient legal framework should be in place through the General Data Protection Regulation. However, an obligation to introduce compulsory vaccinations cannot be derived from the fundamental human rights either. Thus, the state must under certain circumstances provide for measures to eradicate diseases, but the court doesn't specify which means are to be implemented to do so. The fact that there is no obligation does, once again, not in turn constitute a prohibition to introduce compulsory vaccination as choice of means.

HOW TO INTRODUCE COMPULSORY VACCINATION

As far as court's examination of justification is concerned, the focus is clearly on whether the interference is 'necessary in a domestical society'. The issue of whether the interference is 'prescribed by law' and if it pursues a legitimate aim was treated as more of a formality in previous cases dealing with compulsory vaccination. This shows, for example in Solomakhin Vs Ukraine, where the court answered these questions in one sentence only: the court further notes that such reference was clearly provided by law and pursued the legitimate aim of the protection of health. Admittedly. The court dealt with these two conditions at greater length in Vavricka Vs Czeck Republic than in solomakhin Vs Ukraine however, this wasn't due to any particular problems arising but probably rather to the particular relevance of the case, of which the court was seemingly aware as indicated by some strikingly detailed elaborations within the judgment.

To be considered 'prescribed by law' there must be an act attributed to the state introduces the measure but there is no restriction to written laws. Further, this act must meet formal and substantive requirements. Formally, it has must be enacted in accordance with national legal order i.e., by the competent organ and following prescribed procedure. There is no limitation to primary legislation, legal acts and law. Also, the content of this act must be clear, foreseeable and adequately accessible being subject to mechanisms that preclude misuse.

The 'legitimate aims' at least one of which a measure must further in order for it to be potentially justified are listed in the respective paragraphs 2 of Articles 8& 9 of the European Commission of Human Rights. Both Articles 8 & 9 of the European Commission for Human Rights and similarly Article43 of the 1995 Ugandan Constitution allow interferences in the interest of 'public safety', the 'protection of health or morals' and 'protection of the rights and freedoms of others' this can include national security, the economic wellbeing of the country and the prevention of disorder or crime. In order to justify compulsory vaccination, several of the legitimate aims could be considered applicable. In addition to the 'protection of the human rights and freedoms of others, the protection of health is, unsurprisingly, particularly relevant. Since vaccinations against diseases which are transmissible from one person to another, protect the individual, but also society, the protection of health is affected in both its individual & societal dimensions. In the context of the above Articles, the legitimate aim of prevention of disorder or crime would also be conceivable, if the intentional and or negligent endangerment of others by communicable diseases is forbidden by law in the jurisdiction concerned.

ETHICAL CONSIDERATIONS AND CAVEATS REGARDING MANDATORY PANDEMIC VACCINATION.

The following considerations and caveats should all be explicitly evaluated and discussed through an ethical analysis by governments and/or institutional policy-makers who may be considering mandates for COVID-19 vaccination. They should be considered alongside other relevant scientific, medical, legal, and practical considerations not described in this document.

Necessity and proportionality.

Mandatory vaccination should be considered only if it is necessary for, and proportionate to, the achievement of an important public health goal (including socioeconomic goals) identified by a legitimate public health authority. If such a public health goal (e.g., herd immunity, protecting the most vulnerable, protecting the capacity of the acute health care system) can be achieved with less coercive or intrusive policy interventions (e.g., public education), a mandate would not be ethically justified, as achieving public health goals with less restriction of individual liberty and autonomy yields a more favorable risk-benefit ratio. As mandates represent a policy option that interferes with individual liberty and autonomy, they should be considered only if they would increase the prevention of significant risks of morbidity and mortality and or promote significant and unequivocal public health benefits. If important public health objectives cannot be achieved without a mandate for instance, if a substantial portion of individuals are able but unwilling to be vaccinated and this is likely to result in significant risks of harm their concerns should be addressed, proactively if possible. If addressing such concerns is ineffective and those concerns remain a barrier to achievement of public health objectives and or if low vaccination rates in the absence of a mandate put others at significant risk of serious harm, a mandate may be considered "necessary" to achieve public health objectives. In this case, those proposing the mandate should communicate the reasons for the mandate to the affected communities through effective channels and find ways to implement the mandate such that it accommodates the reasonable concerns of communities. Individual liberties should not be challenged for longer than necessary. Policy-makers should therefore frequently re-evaluate the mandate to ensure it remains necessary and proportionate to achieve public health goals. In addition, the necessity of a mandate to achieve public health goals should be evaluated in the context of the possibility that repeated vaccinations may be required as the virus evolves, as this may challenge the possibility of a mandate to realistically achieve intended public health objectives.

Sufficient evidence of vaccine safety

Data should be available that demonstrate the vaccine being mandated has been found to be safe in the populations for whom the vaccine liberties should not be challenged for longer than necessary. Policy-makers should therefore frequently re-evaluate the mandate to ensure it remains necessary and proportionate to achieve public health goals. In addition, the necessity of a mandate to achieve public health goals should be evaluated in the context of the possibility that repeated vaccinations may be required as the virus evolves, as this may challenge the possibility of a mandate to realistically achieve intended public health. Furthermore, coercive exposure of populations to a potentially harmful product would violate the ethical obligation to protect the public from unnecessary harm when the harm the product might cause outweighs the degree of harm that might exist without the product. Even when the vaccine is considered sufficiently safe, mandatory vaccination should be implemented with no-fault compensation schemes to address any vaccine-related harm that might occur. This is important, as it would be unfair to require people who experience vaccine-related harm to seek legal remedy from harm resulting from a mandatory intervention Such compensation would depend on countries' health systems, including the extent of universal health coverage and how they address harm from vaccines that are not fully licensed (e.g., vaccines authorized for emergency or conditional use)

Data on efficacy and effectiveness should be available that show the vaccine is efficacious in the population for whom vaccination is to be mandated and that the vaccine is an effective means of achieving an important public health goal. For instance, if mandatory vaccination is considered necessary to interrupt transmission chains and prevent harm to others, there should be sufficient evidence that the vaccine is efficacious in preventing serious infection and/or transmission. Alternatively, if a mandate is considered necessary to prevent hospitalization and protect the capacity of the acute health care system, there should be sufficient evidence that the vaccine is efficacious in reducing hospitalization. Policy-makers should carefully consider whether vaccines authorized for emergency or conditional use meet evidentiary thresholds for efficacy and effectiveness sufficient for a mandate

Sufficient supply

In order for a mandate to be considered, supply of the authorized vaccine should be sufficient and reliable, with reasonable, free access for those for whom it is to be made mandatory (i.e., there should be few barriers that make it difficult for populations affected by the mandate to access the vaccine). The absence of a sufficient supply and reasonable, free access would not only render a mandate ineffective in achieving vaccine uptake, but would create an unduly burdensome, unfair demand on those who are required to be vaccinated but are unable to access the vaccine. Such a mandate would threaten to exacerbate social inequity in access to health care

Public trust

Policy-makers have a duty to carefully consider the effect that mandating vaccination could have on public confidence and public trust, and particularly on confidence in the scientific community and public trust in vaccination generally. If such a policy threatens to undermine confidence and public trust, it might affect both vaccine uptake and adherence to other important public health measures, which can have an enduring effect. In particular, the coercive power that governments or institutions display in a program that undermines voluntariness could have unintended negative consequences for vulnerable or marginalized populations. High priority should therefore be given to threats to public trust and confidence amongst historically disadvantaged minority populations, ensuring that cultural considerations are taken into account. Vaccine hesitancy may be stronger in such populations and may not be restricted to concerns of safety and efficacy as mistrust in authorities may be rooted in histories of unethical medical and public health policies and practices as well as structural inequity. Such populations may regard mandatory vaccination as another form of inequity or oppression, making it more difficult for them to access jobs and essential services. The extent to which mandatory vaccination policies accommodate conscientious objection may also affect public trust. There should, however, be strict scientific and prudential limits to appeals for accommodation or "conscientious objection", especially when such accommodation might be used by individuals to 'free ride' the public health good of herd immunity or if they threaten public health and others' right not to be infected with a virulent infectious disease

Ethical processes of decision-making

Transparency and stepwise decision-making by legitimate public health authorities should be fundamental elements of ethical analysis and decision-making about mandatory vaccination. Reasonable effort should be made to engage affected parties and relevant stakeholders, and particularly those who are vulnerable or marginalized, to elicit and understand their perspectives. Steps should be taken in good faith to respect human rights obligations not to discriminate or disproportionately disadvantage vulnerable populations. Legitimate public health authorities that are contemplating mandatory vaccination policies should use transparent, deliberative procedures to consider the ethical issues outlined in this document in an explicit ethical analysis, including the threshold of evidence necessary for vaccine safety and efficacy to justify a mandate. As in other contexts, mechanisms should be in place to monitor evidence constantly and to revise such decisions periodically.

Conclusion.

Vaccines are effective for protecting people from COVID-19. Governments and or institutional policy-makers should use arguments to encourage voluntary vaccination against COVID-19 before contemplating mandatory vaccination. Efforts should be made to demonstrate the benefit and safety of vaccines for the greatest possible acceptance of vaccination. Stricter regulatory measures should be considered only if these means are not successful. A number of ethical considerations and caveats should be explicitly discussed and addressed through ethical analysis when considering whether mandatory COVID-19 vaccination is an ethically justifiable policy option. Similar to other public health policies, decisions about mandatory vaccination should be supported by the best available evidence and should be made by legitimate public health authorities in a manner that is transparent, fair, nondiscriminatory, and involves the input of affected parties.

PROJECTED CONSEQUENCES IN RESPECT TO COMPULSORY MEDICATION

Normally, when the world is faced with disease, there is always an effort to invent a cure. While this is desirable to return the world to normalcy, it often creates competition among states and opposition towards medicines developed for the sake of curbing the disease.

For example, vaccination against Covid-19 is seen as a way back to normality, an opportunity to run away from the current restrictions which do not allow shaking hands, hugging or traveling freely. For some people, vaccination promises freedom from the fear that the virus may strike them, a relative or a friend, hope of reinvigorating a moribund livelihood or resuming a child's disrupted education.[580]

The controversy over vaccines is not novel. When Edward Jenner invented the first vaccination against smallpox in 1796, it was at first seen as miraculous solution to an illness which was killing millions of people worldwide. But it did not take long before his vaccination began to create opponents and when smallpox vaccination was made mandatory in the UK by the Vaccination Act of 1853, the legislation increased resistance.[581]

[580]Anne McMillan, Friday 19 March 2021. "Mandatory vaccination: legal, justified, effective?" International Bar Association, [online] available at; https://www.ibanet.org/Article/70E1F93E-A23B-4F1A-A596-AEEF84750241 (accessed on May 28th, 2021)
[581]Ibid

In the late 19th century there was immense anti-vaccination sentiment in many parts of Britain. Anti-vaccination fora were formed and large numbers of people took to the streets to demonstrate against what they thought of as an invasive practice. Objections included religious or health issues, along with the recurring narrative of the trampling of individual rights, which reflect in the cries of modern day vaccine objectors. The scale of anger caused the legislation to be amended in 1898 to allow for conscientious objection to receiving a vaccine.[582]

With the Covid-19 pandemic, the concern has gained popularity and not just in Britain. Around the world the conflicting ideology over vaccines seems as strong today as it was when Jenner first discovered his vaccine to smallpox. Two centuries later, familiar objections are being raised by vaccine opponents, some of which beg a hearing. There is a need to recognise that past general vaccine sceptics and/or those simply buying into the latest narrative expressed on social media, many people may have genuine fears and anxieties about vaccination in general.[583]

One characteristic of vaccination is that its preventative rather than curative nature and so is generally given out on a widespread scale, thus enlarging any potential risk. As the European Commission President, Ursula von der Leyen who is a qualified physician, said when justifying the long time, it took for the European Union to pass early Covid vaccines safe: 'A vaccine is the injection of an active biological substance into a healthy body. We are talking about mass vaccination here, it is a gigantic responsibility.'[584]

The problem of how to overcome vaccine fear is compounded by obscure areas in scientific and medical research. There may have been great advances in research since the 19th century, but even so, results are not always clear or complete. This can lead to genuine concerns about possible ill effects and the waters are further muddied by extremist pseudo-scientific or sometimes demonstrably fake claims (such as that the Covid vaccines are being used to implant microchips in people's bodies).[585]

Such concerns are undoubtedly exacerbated when insufficient information is given by governments regarding the potentially, if comparatively rare, adverse effects of vaccines. Robert Krakow, a US attorney who has represented many clients claiming injury by vaccines, suggests that extremist claims gain more traction precisely because governments are not fully transparent and thus lose public trust. 'The government effort to hide the existence of vaccine risk (by choosing to not

[582]Ibid
[583]Ibid
[584]Speech by President von der Leyen at the State of the Union conference of the European University Institute, 6th May, 2021, [online] available at; https://ec.europa.eu/commission/presscorner/detail/en/SPEECH_21_2284 (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

[585]Supra note 51

acknowledge vaccine injuries) only sows greater distrust than if the government were more honest about the risks,' he says. 'I do think the rise in the number of people willing to believe in such theories and act on them is directly attributable to the government's duplicity, engendering extreme distrust.'[586]

One fear is that providing full disclosure of all known risks (including rare ones) may in itself provoke resistance to vaccines. Likewise, admitting areas where information is lacking, such as that the long-term effects of Covid vaccines are unknown, may have the same effect. Nevertheless, states should, generally, provide information transparently, as opposed to patronising their citizens through decision-making in a black box. From a political perspective, such an approach might simply feed conspiracy theorists and results in reduced compliance with governmental measures. From a legal perspective, there may even be an obligation resulting from the duty to protect the right to life and bodily integrity.[587]

Notably, there has been immense resistance to Covid-19 vaccination by influential people. Social media users are still actively sharing the video[588] uploaded by TV host Madona Koidze on August 14, 2020, in which Robert F. Kennedy Jr., an American anti-vaccine advocate and environmental lawyer, who is the nephew of former U.S. president John F. Kennedy, speaks about vaccines during an American talk show JONI Table Talk.[589] Kennedy recollects failed attempts of creating vaccines against SARS-Cov, respiratory syncytial (sin-SISH-uhl) viruses and dengue fever, saying that vaccines against these diseases had caused "enhanced immune response." He claims that the novel coronavirus vaccines may pose the same threat, noting that such doubts are further strengthened by the fact that Anthony Fauci, director of the U.S. National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, allowed vaccine manufacturers to skip animal trials and to go directly to human trials.

Thus, the challenge for governments and legislators is immense: how to devise an effective response to an ever-evolving threat which is taking the lives of citizens and undermining the economic and social fabric of nations. A vaccine offers the obvious solution, but should it be mandatory?[590]

The legal position on mandating vaccination for certain activities, both public and private, varies widely between countries. A study published last year in Vaccine, entitled 'Global assessment of national mandatory vaccination policies and consequences of non-compliance', examined this issue in 193 countries. The study found that over 100 countries have some kind of nationwide mandatory

[586] Brian Shilhavy, 2019. https://www.cga.ct.gov/2020/phdata/tmy/2020HB-05044-R000219-Wrinn,%20Chris%208-TMY.PDF
[587] Supra note 51
[588] https://www.facebook.com/madona.koidze17/posts/3502923619740672
[589] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=HuMbRBTZhCY
[590] Supra note 58

vaccination policy. Of those, 62 states impose one or more penalties for non-compliance, mostly financial or educational (such as refusing school enrolment).[591]

Several countries have vaccination policies which could viewed as ‘mandatory’ to the extent that children without certain vaccines cannot attend school and/or their parents face fines or even imprisonment. But the principle of informed consent to medical procedures (sometimes required to be in writing) comes under severe strain when parents are ‘encouraged’ to vaccinate children under threat of such measures.[592]

Officially the Australian government has said that it will not make Covid-19 vaccination mandatory, but Alison Choy Flannigan, Publication and Newsletter Editor of the IBA’s Healthcare and Life Sciences Law Committee, says it is likely that ‘the vaccine will be made a condition of access to some government services’. Australia has taken a strong line in the past with its ‘no jab, no pay’ policies, blocking the right to certain tax reliefs for parents who refuse to vaccinate their children.

In Brazil, the Supreme Court has already ruled that it is legal for local governments to make Covid vaccination mandatory, while specifying citizens cannot be physically forced to have the vaccine. However, certain restrictions of the rights of vaccine refusers are envisaged, such as being disallowed a state benefit or refused school enrolment, not to mention being denied access to public transport or restaurants.

In the UK, the current policy is against any form of coercion. Yet, at the time of writing, one third of care home staff have declined a Covid vaccination. Thus, arises the difficult question of whether the right to bodily integrity can, or should, continue to prevail despite the risks to others, in this case the clinically vulnerable elderly? Could alternatives to vaccination, like frequent testing and the wearing of protective clothing, fill the gap? Is it only a matter of time before we see legal action if someone dies as a result of contracting Covid-19 from an unvaccinated staff member or official?

From just these few examples, it is apparent that national laws are inconsistent, with governments still grappling with complex, competing issues. And, as Connolly points out, punitive measures may do little to ‘overcome the crucial issue’. ‘How do you ensure enforcement? If the message is vaccination saves lives, including potentially your own or those of loved ones, there are perhaps better ways of getting that message across and ensuring take up.’ As the situation evolves, measures by countries restricting the rights of the unvaccinated seem likely to continue and it is perhaps inevitable that some of these will be challenged in the courts.

The effects of the president's directives on human rights and the regular operation of the rule of law are far-reaching as far as the certainty of the law is concerned. Certainty of the law creates stability, and this stability ensures the development of a state.[593] In the preceding, there must be a sustainable way of employing the law in every circumstance, even in a global pandemic.

[591]Ibid
[592]Ibid

The 2019 novel coronavirus pandemic has challenged legislatures around the world. Questions have arisen about parliaments' operation during the pandemic, their role in combating covid-19, and their relationship with the executive and other state actors. This chapter will make an effort to analyse how other commonwealth countries have responded to global pandemics. This analysis will then be compared to the response of Uganda to the same. This will help establish if the Ugandan government's failures were not peculiar to her or not and, if not, to what extent did the state fail.

United States of America

The United States has responded to the COVID-19 pandemic at all levels of government. Congress has enacted legislation, and the President and the executive agencies have promulgated rules and regulations and taken other action to implement responses to COVID-19 to alleviate economic and societal impacts. State governments have acted in similar ways, enacting legislation and relying on their state agencies to respond to the pandemic, often targeting specific situations that impact their populations. Although local governments have narrower jurisdictional authority than state or federal governments, they have been on the front lines, supporting first responders and municipally-funded programs. Examples of local government responses range from creating mask mandates and policies to administrating funding received from state and federal governments for pandemic response.[594]

The coronavirus pandemic has prompted a comprehensive government response from the federal, state, and local governments. The federal government has enacted legislation to stimulate the economy and promote a robust public health response. It has also implemented policies through agency regulations and temporary rules to utilize the funding provided by Congress. State governments have approached the situation in a more varied way, targeting their specific populations with public health policy and economic responses. Local governments have responded within the framework of power delegated to them by their state governments, focusing their emergency powers on policies to protect their citizens and support their municipal economies.[595]

Under the US Constitution, Congress has the sole power to authorize funding out of tax revenue

[593] Corley, P., &Wedeking, J. 2014. The (Dis)Advantage of Certainty: The Importance of Certainty in Language. Law & Society Review, 48(1), 35-62. Available at; https://www.jstor.org/stable/pdf/43670375.pdf?refreqid=excelsior%3Aa0d4f9115320544cb232279f5f88fad9 (accessed on 27 May, 2021)

[594] The Library of Congress, 2020. "Responses to COVID-19 in the United States", [online] available at; https://www.loc.gov/law/help/covid-19-responses/us.php accessed on 27th May, 2021

[595] Ibid

and may do so for those purposes enumerated in the Constitution, including providing funding for the general welfare of the United States.[596] Within Congress's ambit is the power to respond to disasters and public health emergencies; however, during times of crisis, such as the coronavirus pandemic, many emergency powers have been delegated by Congress to the President, with direction from Congress on how to administer and distribute monetary relief through federal agencies.[597] The Constitution also provides that Congress must pass a law, referred to as an appropriation, to draw upon money in the Treasury.[598]Funding for public health and disaster response is provided under emergency spending, and generally, supplemental appropriations made due to a national emergency are exempt from other budgetary constraints.[599]

During the pandemic, Congress has enacted several public laws providing funding to help government agencies, states, localities, businesses, and individuals respond to the coronavirus. This funding has been designed to provide government intervention for public health resources (such as creating testing infrastructure) and stimulate the economy (in grants for businesses and direct payments to citizens). Congress has passed several critical pieces of legislation in response to the pandemic, including the Coronavirus Aid, Relief, and Economic Security (CARES) Act (Pub. L. No. 116-136), the Families First Coronavirus Response Act (FFCRA) (Pub. L. No. 116-127), and the Coronavirus Preparedness and Response Supplemental Appropriations Act (Pub. L. No. 116-123). In many instances, these laws direct federal agencies to use the funding provided to implement temporary rules in response to the pandemic.[600]

It can be concluded that the USA's laws envisaged such situations, and therefore, the legal response was predetermined. This means that their approach to the pandemic was eased by the fact that whatever was done was in the ambits of the law, and as such, no consequences were left to face.

Australia

Australia has a federal system of government with powers divided under the Constitution between the Commonwealth government and the country's six states and two mainland self-governing territories.[601] The matters over which the Commonwealth Parliament has legislative powers are

[596] Article 1 and 8(1) of the US Constitution

[597] See Jennifer K. Elsea et al., Cong. Res. Serv., R46379, Emergency Authorities under the National Emergencies Act, Stafford Act, and Public Health Service Act 1-2, [online] available at; https://perma.cc/XLU5-55UN (accessed on 27th May, 2021)

[598] Article 1 and 9(7) of the US Constitution.

[599] See James V. Saturno, Bill Heniff Jr., & Megan S. Lynch, Cong. Res. Serv., R42388, The Congressional Appropriations Process: An Introduction 19, [online] available at; https://perma.cc/2K5A-JNPT (accessed on 27th May, 2021)

[600] Supra note 53

[601] Kelly Buchanan, 2015. Australia: Legal Responses to Health Emergencies, [online] available at; https://www.loc.gov/law/help/health-emergencies/australia.php#_ftn1 (accessed on 27thMay, 2021)

listed in sections 51 and 52 of the Constitution.[602] Most of these legislative powers are concurrent, meaning that they are shared with state and territory parliaments. There is a conflict between state and federal laws, and the federal law will override the state law to the extent of the inconsistency.[603]

Section 96 of the Constitution provides the Commonwealth Parliament with the power to grant financial assistance to any state "on such terms and conditions as the Parliament thinks fit." In practice, this may include tying grants to the implementation of specific policies by the states.[604] Often such policies are the subject of agreements between the state and federal governments, such as through the mechanisms of the Council of Australian Governments (COAG). In addition, state and territory parliaments may refer matters within their legislative powers to the Commonwealth Parliament.[605]

Section 51(ix) of the Constitution provides that the federal government has legislative powers concerning quarantine. In addition, the commerce and trade powers under section 51 are interpreted broadly, enabling the Commonwealth Parliament to make laws in a range of health-related areas.[606]However, all other matters related to human health fall within the states' residual powers.

Public hospitals are owned and operated by state and territory governments, which also fund and deliver various health programs and services. However, due to long-term funding and policy arrangements, the federal government partially funds public hospitals and "is primarily responsible for health service funding; regulation of health products, services and workforce; and national health policy leadership."[607] Various national agreements impact funding, policy, and implementation arrangements within the health sector.

Under Australia's federal system, states and territories have primary responsibility for health care and emergency management matters. The federal government provides various funding, policy leadership, and coordination assistance in national responses to public health emergencies. It also has quarantine powers and powers related to border management that can be utilized to epidemic or threaten an epidemic. National agreements, as well as the National Health Security Act 2007, establish structures and processes for preventing and responding to national health emergencies, with different entities providing oversight and coordination at the national level and states and territories applying their laws, jurisdictional responses, and coordination processes. This includes a

[602] Section 51 and 52 of the Australian Constitution.
[603] Section 109, Ibid.
[604] Christopher Reynolds, 2011. Public and Environmental Health Law, the Foundation Press, Alexandria, Australia, p.44–45.
[605] section 51(xxxvii) of the Australian Constitution,
[606] Supra note 63, at p. 40–41.
[607] Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2012. Health Care Delivery and Financing, in 1301.0, Year Book Australia.

national notification and surveillance system under which state and territory authorities report certain diseases to a central authority, making information available for analysis and discussion. In the event of a public health threat, state and territory public health laws provide a range of powers to enable action to be taken by authorities. This can include ordering medical examinations, treatment, and detention of individuals.[608]

Along with state and territory governments, the Australian government has taken a range of actions in response to the 2014 Ebola virus disease (EVD) epidemic in West Africa. This includes an enhanced screening of passengers at airports, stopping the processing of visa applications from citizens of affected countries, issuing national guidance to public health units and laboratories, and developing detailed state and territory response plans. As of October 2014, around twenty people who arrived in Australia from EVD-affected countries had been placed on home quarantine.[609]

Australia's response to the pandemic received much criticism as one that violated human rights[610]; however, the same legal system was well endowed for emergencies like the one presented by the pandemic. This made it easier to curb the spread without any illegal actions by the government.

People's Republic of China

The global pandemic of the novel coronavirus broke out in China in late 2019. This means that China was the first country worldwide to be affected by the virus, and the measures were taken were rushed and immediate. The lockdown measures put in place by the Chinese government were so severe and strict that they were described by the World Health Organization's country representative to China, Dr Gauden Galee, as 'new to science' and 'not […] tried before as a public health measure'.[611]

Indeed, on 23 January 2020, the Wuhan Command Centre on the Prevention and Control of the Novel Coronavirus Pneumonia Epidemic (Wuhan Command Centre) issued its Public Notice No 1[612], which shut down all public transport, including outbound trains and flights[613], effectively cutting off Wuhan from the rest of China. On 10 February 2020, Public Notice 12 was issued by the Wuhan Command Centre. This Notice imposed the immediate close-off of all residential blocks in

[608] Supra note 60
[609] Ibid
[610] Bevan Shields, November 12, 2020. 'A serious breach': Geoffrey Robertson says flight cap violates human rights, The Sydney Morning Herald, [online] available at; https://www.smh.com.au/world/europe/australia-s-covid-19-flight-caps-breach-human-rights-geoffrey-robertson-20201107-p56cc8.html (accessed May 27th, 2021)
[611] China Media Project, 2020. The truth about "Dramatic Action", [online] available at; https://chinamediaproject.org/2020/01/27/dramatic-actions/ (accessed on May 27th, 2021)
[612] Announcement of the City Headquarters for the Prevention and Control of Pneumonia Epidemic Caused by New Coronavirus Infection (No. 1), [online] available at; http://www.wh.gov.cn/zwgk/tzgg/202003/t20200316_972434.shtml (accessed on May 27th, 2021)
[613] Dr. June Wang, 2020. China's legal response to Covid-19, [online] available at, https://lexatlas-c19.org/chinas-legal-response-to-covid-19/ (accessed on May 27th, 2021)

Wuhan and ordered those diagnosed with or suspected of being infected by Covid-19 to stay inside their apartments. Two days later, the Wuhan Command Centre issued another notice, elaborating the meaning of 'closed-off management'. According to the Notice[614], only one entry/exit point, staffed with inspection personnel all hour round, was allowed for each residential block and the actual implementation of such measures were to be undertaken by district governments. In practice, this effectively locked up some 11 million residents in their apartments without any mobility allowed.

China also began to encourage using a health QR code system, a mechanism first introduced in Hangzhou in early February 2020, when the Notice on the Prevention and Control of Novel Coronavirus Pneumonia Epidemic with Scientific Precision[615] was issued on 24 February 2020. An early study suggests that the health QR code has helped control the spread of Covid-19 in China[616], but, as it was effectively compulsory for everyone, the health QR code raised concerns about privacy as it relied on 'troves of data the authorities have collected from individuals — including their personal information, location, travel history, recent contacts and health status.'[617] Many worried that their personal information might be leaked and that their information security could not be ensured.[618]

Finally, while most public notices on restrictions did not mention sanctions on the violation, Chinese laws have always imposed civil sanctions, such as fines, to violate social order. For instance, Article 50 of the Law of the PRC on Administrative Penalties for Social Order Administration[619] imposed a fine of up to 500 Yuan RMB (in addition to detention between five and ten days) in the case of non-compliance with government orders or decisions issued in times of emergency. For more severe cases, criminal sanctions are always available to the law enforcement authorities.[620]

In light of these strict draconian lockdown measures imposed in many cities in China, it has been puzzling to many that no state of emergency, either for a specified area or for a province or even

[614] https://www.sohu.com/a/373152524_100199096

[615] Notice on the prevention and control of the new crown pneumonia epidemic in accordance with the law, scientifically and accurately, [online[available at; http://www.gov.cn/xinwen/2020-02/25/content_5483024.htm (accessed on May 27th, 2021)

[616] M.V. Beusekom, April 28th, 2020. Study: Contact tracing slowed COVID-19 spread in China, Centre for Infectious Diseases Research and Policy, [online] available at; https://www.cidrap.umn.edu/news-perspective/2020/04/study-contact-tracing-slowed-covid-19-spread-china (accessed on May 27th, 2021)

[617] Nectar Gan and David Culver, April 16th, 2020. China is fighting the coronavirus with a digital QR code. Here's how it works, CNN Business, [online] available at; https://edition.cnn.com/2020/04/15/asia/china-coronavirus-qr-code-intl-hnk/index.html (accessed on May 27th, 2021)

[618] Helen Davidson, April 1st, 2020. China's coronavirus health code apps raise concerns over privacy, The Guardian, [online] available at; https://www.theguardian.com/world/2020/apr/01/chinas-coronavirus-health-code-apps-raise-concerns-over-privacy (accessed on May 27th, 2021)

[619] Law of the People's Republic of China on Public Security Administration Penalties, Article 50

[620] Supra note 72

nationwide (as indeed most cities in China were partially locked down), was ever declared.[621]In contrast to many other countries where such an emergency was promptly declared to allow the application of restrictive and emergency measures, the failure to declare such an emergency is extraordinary in light of the 2004 constitutional revision[622]. The original 1982 Constitution provided the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress to declare martial law to be implemented throughout the country or province.[623] The State Council was also granted the power to do the same in parts of a province. During the 2004 revision of the Constitution, it was decided to replace the power to impose martial law to declare a state of emergency[624] to cover natural disasters such as the 2003 outbreak of SARS. A law on emergency was proposed but until this day not enacted. This means that there has been a lack of detailed procedures for declaring an emergency, but at the same time, it is clear that an emergency can be declared by either the SCNPC or the State Council, depending on the scope of application of the declaration. In the absence of a state of emergency declaration, the Constitution and all laws and regulations protecting fundamental rights should have, theoretically, continued their regular operation. Failure to do so cast a shadow over the legitimacy and legality of many lockdown measures imposed in China.[625]

In conclusion, whereas China had the necessary laws to accommodate the global pandemic, she still went ahead to pass notices which raised eyebrows on their legality and, therefore, their efficacy. As much as it can be argued that China had the least time to react to the pandemic, it cannot be argued that the operation trend followed was constitutionally necessary.

India

Like many other countries, India was not prepared enough to tackle the pandemic with its legal machinery. The Indian Government requested all state governments to invoke the Epidemic Disease Act (EDA) of 1897 to address the COVID-19 emergency. The Central Government also used the powers provided in the Disaster Management Act (DMA) of 2005. As the country was facing its first significant health emergency since independence, the existing legislative measures to deal with a COVID-19situation were lacking and required certain amendments to address such situations in the future.[626]

The Indian Constitution is the longest in the world, including a preamble and 448 Articles. The

[621] Ibid

[622] Amendments to the Constitution of the People's Republic of China (2004), [online] available at; http://www.npc.gov.cn/wxzl/wxzl/2004-04/19/content_334620.htm (accessed May 28th, 2021)

[623] Constitution of the People's Republic of China (1982)

[624] Articles 67 (21), 80, and 89 (16) of the Constitution of the People's Republic of China (1982)

[625] Supra note 72

[626] Kiran K.G., Donthagani V., and Veeraiahgari R.R., February 28th, 2021. COVID-19 and the legislative response in India: The need for acomprehensive health care law, [online] available at; https://onlinelibrary.wiley.com/doi/epdf/10.1002/pa.2669 (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Constitution is divided into12 schedules and 22 parts. India is declared a "sovereign, socialist, secular, democratic republic" and secures all its citizens "justice, liberty, equality, and fraternity." Considering these broader principles, legislations are drafted, discussed, and passed in Parliament and state legislatures and executed. In this context, it is a fundamental responsibility of the state to protect the lives of its citizens in unforeseen situations and calamities.[627]

The Indian Constitution ensures the Righto Health for all without any discrimination.[628]Article 21 in the Indian Constitution provides for the citizen's fundamental right to life and personal liberty, which can be argued, was violated as the country enacted a complete nationwide lockdown. Provisions related to health are mentioned in Part IV of the Constitution in terms of the Directive Principles of State Policy. Article 39(a) lays out the State's responsibility to provide security to citizens by ensuring the Right to adequate means of Livelihood. Article 39(e) provides that it is State's responsibility to ensure that the "health and strength of workers, men, and women and the tender age of children are not abused." Article 41 imposes a duty on the State to "provide public assistance in cases of unemployment, old age, sickness, and disablement." Article 42 makes provision to "protect the health of the infant and mother by maternity benefit." Article 47 is about "raising the level of nutrition and the standard of living of people and improving public health.

The Right to Health is not explicitly mentioned in the Indian Constitution, as is the Right to Education, but various judgments[629]included the Right to Health as part of Article 21 of the Indian Constitution. Hence, the role of government is crucial in providing health care to all citizens.

However, "health emergency" is not part of the emergency provisions of the Indian Constitution. The Indian Constitution empowers the President of India to declare three kinds of emergencies: national emergency, state emergency, and financial emergency. A national emergency is imposed if the country's security is threatened on the grounds of war, external aggression, or armed rebellion. The imposition of a lockdown and strict measures to contain the spread of disease impacted citizens' fundamental rights; therefore, there Isa need to explore various constitutional methods to include health emergencies in the emergency provisions with proper consultations with various stakeholders.[630]

The EDA, which was enacted during the British colonial era, was promulgated to tackle the bubonic plague in the Bombay State (now Maharashtra State). The Act is 125 years old, with only

[627] Ibid
[628] Kumar, R., 2015. Right to health: Challenges and opportunities. Indian Journal of Community Medicine, 40(4), 218–222
[629] See Consumer Education and Resource Centre v Union of India(1995), State of Punjab and others v Mohinder Singh Chawala(1997) and Paschim Banga Khet Mazdoor Samity v State of WestBengal (1996)
[630] Supra note 85

four sections. The law was described as "extraordinary" but "necessary"[631] and emphasized that people must "trust the discretion of the executive in the grave and critical circumstances".[632] Hence, any action taken on the grounds of epidemics must consider all grave and critical circumstances. The general public may not oppose such decisions for the "greater good" for all. The law was vital in containing other outbreaks in the country like Cholera (1910), Spanish Flu (1918–20), Smallpox (1974), Swine flu (2014), and the Nipah Virus (2018). The EDA is the only act that provides legal interventions in a national or sub-national epidemic.[633]

The DMA was enacted in 2005 with the objective "to provide for the effective management of disasters and for matters connected in addition to that or incidental to that." The act consists of 79 sections and covers a wide range of issues like the establishment of the National Disaster Management Authority (NDMA), State Disaster Management Authority(SDMA), and District Disaster Management Authority (DDMA), measures to be taken by the Governments during the disaster, penalties, and offences of the violators. The NDMA was established under the act, and the Prime Minister is the ex-officio Chairperson and nine other members. Subsequently, a guideline on the Management of Biological Disaster 2008 was passed and currently, the NDMA deals extensively with biological disasters and health emergencies.

Section 62 of the DMA gives powers to the Central Government to issue directions to all ministries or departments of the Government of India and state/UT governments. On11 April 2020, the Central Government invoked section 69 of theme, which delegated the Home Secretary's powers to the Secretary, Ministry of Health and Family Welfare for coordinating various activities among ministries and states/UTs. Unlike the other laws, this act "provides for an exhaustive administration set up for disaster preparedness." Violators are punishable for up to 1 year in jail or a fine, or both.[634] The law describes the offence as obstructing any officer or employee from performing their duty or refusing to comply with directions.[635]Forth better execution of the national lockdown, numerous states like-wise summoned section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

One major issue with the DMA is whether an epidemic or pandemic can be considered a "disaster" as per its definition. Section 2(d) of the DMA States that: "Disaster means a catastrophe, mishap, calamity or grave occurrence in any area, arising from natural or manmade causes, or by accident

[631] by John Woodburn, the Council Member of the Governor-General of India in Calcutta during the discussion on the bill introduced in 1897

[632] Rai, K. S., April 2, 2020. How the epidemic diseases act of 1897 came to be. The Wire, [online] available at; https://thewire.in/history/colonialism-epidemic-diseases-act (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

[633]Patro, K. B., Tripathy, J. P., & Kashyap, R., 2013. Epidemic diseases act1897, India: Whether sufficient to address the current challenges? Journal of Mahatma Gandhi Institute of Medical Sciences, 18(2), 109–11

[634] under Sections 51 to 60 of the Act

[635] RSTV Bureau, 2020. Epidemic Act and Disaster Management Act enforced to combat COVID-19, [online] available at; https://rstv.nic.in/epidemic-act-disaster-management-act-enforced-combat-covid-19.html (accessed May 28th, 2021)

or negligence which results in substantial loss of life or human suffering or damage to, and destruction of, property, or damage to, or degradation of, environment, and is of such a nature or magnitude as to be beyond the coping capacity of the community of the affected area." One can interpret that a health emergency of the kind created by the COVID-19 pandemic falls under "grave concerns," but such interpretation will not serve any purpose in effectively managing the epidemic. There are intricacies and technicalities associated with the health emergency that is not covered by this legislation.[636]

England

The public health crisis system in England is based on broadly drafted modernized legislation and regulations. It operates on a local level with primary health care providers using national guidelines to draft emergency plans. Designated agencies or departments are responsible for coordinating local efforts if the crisis becomes national or spills over into more than one local area. Multiagency groups help to coordinate the response. Cooperation and coordination are emphasized as essential to manage public health crises. The legislation regarding infectious diseases has recently been amended to take into account modern-day challenges and scientific knowledge.[637]

The Secretary of State has a legal duty to protect public health in England from disease and other dangers.[638] The Secretary has established several bodies and programs to meet this duty. The National Resilience Capabilities Programme (NRCP) is the core framework through which the government prepares for emergencies across all parts of the United Kingdom.[639] This program aims to ensure that the UK has a well-prepared infrastructure that can address rapidly and effectively a wide range of emergencies. The program is divided into several different groups, one of which includes infectious diseases in humans.[640] The Department of Health is the lead organization in planning for this type of emergency.

The Department of Health, the National Health Service (NHS), Public Health England, and local government authorities[641] are the leading organizations responsible for addressing public health crises and, under the NRCP, infectious diseases. These organizations are responsible for different

[636] Supra note 85

[637] Clare Feikert-Ahalt, February 2015. England: Legal Responses to Health Emergencies, Library of Congress, [online] available at; https://www.loc.gov/law/help/health-emergencies/england.php (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

[638] Health and Social Care Act 2012, clause 7 and 11, Laws of England

[639] HM Government, Emergency Response and Recovery: Non Statutory Guidance Accompanying the Civil Contingencies Act 2004, Oct. 2013, para. 3.4.2, [online] available at; https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/253488/Emergency_Response_and_Recovery_5th_edition_October_2013.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

[640] Ibid

[641] "Local Authority" is defined in section 1 of the Public Health (Control of Disease) Act 1984, c. 22, as district councils, county councils, county borough councils in Wales, the Common Council of the City of London, the Sub-Treasurer of the Inner Temple and the Under-Treasurer of the Middle Temple, and the Council of the Isles of Scilly; see also UK Resilience, Pandemic Flu, Cabinet Office (Apr. 2008), aspects of planning for public health crises.[642] Public Health England, an Executive Agency of the Department of Health, is the national public health agency responsible for fulfilling "the Secretary of State's duty to protect the public's health from infectious diseases and other public health hazards."[643]

The Department of Health is involved on an organizational level to prevent and control infectious diseases by developing policies and setting standards. It is the lead government department involved in planning for a human influenza pandemic.[644] Responsibility for the functions of the Department of Health rests with the Chief Medical Officer, the government's principal medical advisor.

Several bodies advise the Department of Health and the NHS on the control and prevention of infectious disease. One of these is Public Health England, an executive agency of the Department of Health. Public Health England's role is to "protect and improve the nation's health and wellbeing, and reduce health inequalities",[645] and its general duty is to fulfil the Secretary of State's statutory duty to protect public health.[646] It works in several areas to discharge these functions, such as providing the government, the NHS, public health professionals, and the public with scientific advice; supporting the local government with advice on how to protect the health, and ensuring that practical local and national arrangements are in place to respond to health protection concerns and emergencies.[647]

Public Health England is responsible for the Secretary of State's duties under the Health and Social Care Act 2012. It replaced the Health Protection Agency as a "category 1" responder[648] under the Civil Contingencies Act 2004 regarding health hazards and emergencies caused by infectious diseases, chemicals, poisons, and radiation.[649] Public Health England operates in several ways to

---

[642] Public Health England, Pandemic Influenza Response Plan 2014, paras. 1, 2, 2.3, 3.1, [online] available at; https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/344695/PI_Response_Plan_13_Aug.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

[643] Ibid

[644] Ibid. see also Cabinet Office, Departments Responsibilities for Planning, Response, and Recovery from Emergencies, 2011, at 6, [online] available at; https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/61028/Emergency_Preparedness_chapter5_amends_21112011.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

[645]Dep't of Health and Public Health England, November 2013. Framework Agreement Between the Department of Health and Public Health England, , at p.1, [online] available at; https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/677457/Framework_agreement_between_DHSC_and_PHE_2018.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

[646] Ibid, para. 2.1

[647] Ibid, para. 2.2

[648] Category 1 responders are designated by the Civil Contingencies Act; they are "likely to be at the core of the response to most emergencies [and] are subject to the full range of civil protection duties in the Act." They currently include the police, fire and rescue, health bodies, the Maritime and Coastguard Agency, local authorities and the Environment Agency. HM Government, Emergency Response and Recovery: Non Statutory Guidance Accompanying the Civil Contingencies Act 2004, 2013, para. 3.2 & Glossary at 217,

[649] Ibid. para. 3.2.22.

both respond to and help prevent health emergencies, such as by providing advice to the public on how to remain healthy and avoid hazards, conducting surveillance to detect any threats, and preparing plans to ready the nation for any future threats to its health. Its functions are described as combining "public health and scientific knowledge, research and emergency planning within one organization."

The National Health Service (NHS) is responsible for diagnosing and treating individuals with infectious diseases and improving and protecting the population's health.[650] Regarding the latter two functions, the NHS has a broad array of responsibilities to prevent and control infectious diseases that include implementing health programs, preventing the spread of the disease, surveying the local community, and monitoring any emergence or transmission of infectious disease.

Under the Civil Contingencies Act, the NHS must demonstrate the ability to respond to an emergency, including infectious disease outbreaks, effectively.[651] This type of preparation in England is emergency preparedness, resilience, and response (EPRR).[652] To manage its EPRR responsibilities, the NHS has established commissioning boards and clinical commissioning groups.[653] It has also established local health resilience partnerships to coordinate the work and planning for EPRR across all health bodies.[654]

Argentina

The National Constitution established Argentina's political organization[655], like the Federal Republic consisting of twenty-three provinces and the autonomous city of Buenos Aires. The federal-state is headed by a President, who appoints a cabinet and holds the country's executive power. The legislative power is exercised by a bicameral Congress with a Lower Chamber(Cámara de Diputados) and an Upper Chamber (Cámara de Senadores).[656]

Under the National Constitution, each province has its provincial constitution, legislation, and resolutions. However, provincial legislation may not violate any of the individual rightsprotected under the National Constitution. The provinces have delegated to the federal legislature the power

[650] National Health Services Act 2006, clause 41, 1 and 7, Laws of England
[651] Civil Contingencies Act 2004, clause 36, 2 and schedule 1, Laws of England
[652] NHS England, July 2014. NHS England Core Standards for Emergency Preparedness, Resilience and Response (EPRR), [online] available at; https://www.england.nhs.uk/wp-content/uploads/2015/11/eprr-framework.pdf (accessed on May28th, 2021)
[653] NHS Commissioning Board, NHS Commissioning Board Emergency Preparedness Framework 2013, para. 1.4, [online] available at; https://www.wyccn.org/uploads/6/5/1/9/65199375/nhs_commissioning_board_eprr_framework_march_2013.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)
[654] Supra note 111
[655]Constitución De La Nación Argentina, Dec 15, 1994
[656] The Law Library of Congress, February 2015. Legal Responses to Health Emergencies, Global Legal Research Center, [online] available at; https://www.loc.gov/law/help/health-emergencies/health-emergencies.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021) to enact laws of national scope governing civil, commercial, and other matters.[657]

Although not stated explicitly, the National Constitution guarantees the right to health as a derivative of the right to life.[658] Several provisions also guarantee the right to health, including the right to a healthy environment,[659] the right of consumers to protect their health, and the right to protect collective rights in a broader sense.[660] The constitutional guarantee of health protection may be defined as the right of all individuals to be protected by the state concerning the prevention and treatment of diseases and health maintenance.[661]

The health system has a decentralized structure where many responsibilities have been transferred to the provinces. The Law on Ministries of 1999,[662] as amended by Decree 355/2002,[663]restructured the Ministry of Health (MH), creating two new subdivisions: the Secretariat for Health and Care and the Secretariat for Health Policy and Regulation. The Secretariat for Health and Care has an Undersecretary of Prevention and Promotion Programs office, which comprises the National Directorate of Health Programs and the Directorate of Epidemiology (DE).

Under the Law on Ministries, the MH is assigned the responsibility of assisting the President in all health matters, among other things; intervening in the assignment and control of subsidies to solve health emergencies, either unforeseen or not covered by the system in place; epidemic control and surveillance, including the management of the disease notification system and; planning national vaccination and immunization programs.[664]

In summary, the strengthening of Argentina's Epidemic Surveillance System has been a government priority for the last fifteen years and, although the public health in the country at large has improved, many more resources need to be devoted to reach a higher level of health, especially regarding epidemic prevention and control. In 2002 the declaration of a health emergency required urgent measures to ensure the supply of medicines tithe population. Following the outbreak of swine flu in Mexico in April 2009, the government declared a health emergency, taking immediate action to ensure the supply of medicines to the population. The current alert on the Ebola virus outbreak is under strict surveillance by health authorities in the country, following the World Health Organization's international epidemiology protocols.[665]

---

[657] Supra note 114, Article 121-129

[658] Daniel Sabsay& Pablo Manili, 2009. *Constitución de la Nación Argentina y NormasComplementaria, Análisis*Doctrinal y Jurisprudencial 1234

[659]Constitución de la Nación Argentina Article 41, para. 1.

[660] Ibid. Article 43, para. 2.

[661] Supra note 117, at p. 1235.

[662] Law 25233, Law of Ministries, December 10, 1999

[663] Decree 355/2002, amending Law 25,233, Law of Ministries, February 21, 2002

[664] Article 23 Ibid.

[665] Supra note 115

Canada

All levels of government in Canada share legislative competence in public health matters.[666] The Constitution Act, 1867,[667] which defines much of the structure and operations of the Government of Canada, "does not explicitly include 'health' as a legislative power assigned either to Parliament (in section 91) or to the provincial legislatures (in section 92)."[668]

In the 1982 case of Schneider v. The Queen, the Supreme Court of Canada stated that "health" is not a matter which is subject to specific constitutional assignment but instead is an amorphous topic that can be addressed by valid federal or provincial legislation, depending on the circumstances of each case on the nature or scope of the health problem in question.[669]

Under Section 91 of Canada's Constitution Act, the federal government derives its jurisdiction to directly or indirectly regulate on public health-related issues principally from its powers to legislate on quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals; criminal matters; public debt and property; taxing powers; power to pass laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada; and census and statistics matters.[670]

Section 92 of the Act assigns responsibility to the provinces and territories for establishing, maintaining, and managing hospitals, asylums, charities, and charitable institutions; matters in their province of a local or private nature; and municipal institutions.[671]

As stated by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science, and Technology, "duet this lack of clarity in the constitutional division of powers concerning health and public health, both levels of government may legislate in these areas."[672]

Canada's public health emergency management system has been described as a "bottom-up system,"[673] where the "initial and ongoing responsibility for investigation and response to public health events, including infectious disease outbreaks, occurs at the local/municipal level."[674]Therefore, "depending on the severity, complexity, extent and nature of the public health issue, provincial, territorial and federal systems may be engaged to provide assistance and

[666] Background, Public Health Agency Of Canada (PHAC), [online] available at; https://www.canada.ca/en/public-health/corporate/mandate/about-agency/background.html (accessed on May 28th, 2021)
[667] Constitution Act, 1867, 30 & 31 Victoria, clause 3 (U.K.), §§ 91, 92, [668] Martha Butler & Marlisa Tiedemann, Sept. 2011; revised Sept. 2013. Library of Parliament, Legal and Social Affairs Division, The Federal Role in Health and Health Care § 1, Pub. No. 2011-91-E)
[669] Schneider v. The Queen, (1982) 2 S.C.R. 112, p. 142.
[670] Constitution Act, 1867, § 91.
[671] Ibid. § 92
[672] Standing Senate Committee On Social Affairs, Science, And Technology, Canada's Response To The 2009 H1n1 Influenza Pandemic (Dec. 2010), [online] available at; https://sencanada.ca/content/sen/Committee/403/soci/rep/rep15dec10-e.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)
[673]Responding to an Infectious Disease Outbreak: Progress Between SARS and Pandemic Influenza H1N1, PHAC, [online] available at; https://www.phac-aspc.gc.ca/cpip-pclcpi/assets/pdf/report-rapport-2015-eng.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021) resources as requested and required by local authorities and facilities managing the situation."[675] All levels of government have various forms of legislation to protect and manage public health in a time of crisis.
[674] Ibid

In summary, emergency measures and emergency management at the federal level in Canada are regulated by the Emergency Act and the Emergency Management Act. However, there is a relatively high trigger for the federal government to take the lead in a health emergency. Therefore, most health emergencies or crises are dealt with at the municipal and provincial level in coordination with the federal government. Most provinces and territories have passed various "health acts" that govern the powers and duties of health officials during health emergency.[676]

Kenya

Kenyan officials enjoy the broad legal authority to impose various forms of restrictions during public health crises. The Constitution authorizes the head of state to declare a state of emergency and put in place wide-ranging public security preservation measures, including restrictions on movement and assembly, appropriation of private property and labour, and restrictions on entry into the country. However, for actions under this authority to remain in place for an extended period, they need legislative approval.[677]

Similarly, the Public Health Act (PHA), the primary legislation applicable to matters of public health crises, authorizes public health authorities, particularly the Minister of Health, to take various actions during public health crises, including declaring an infectious disease a "notifiable infectious disease" or a "formidable epidemic, endemic or infectious disease," and taking the necessary prevention and suppression measures to fight the disease. Specific powers accorded to health authorities to prevent and suppress an infectious disease include search, seizure, and detention powers; the power to designate any place as a quarantine area, including ships and aircraft; and restrict or ban immigration into the country.[678]

Kenyan and international laws impose specific transparency requirements on the country's government. Chief among these is the PHA requirement to periodically publish information regarding infectious diseases in Kenya, neighbouring countries, and worldwide, and the obligation is to report any public health emergency to the World Health Organization (WHO).[679]

The emergency measures adopted by the Kenyan government in the wake of Covid 19 are pretty similar to the directives issued by Uganda. Immediately after confirmation of the first case of

[675] Ibid
[676] Supra note 125
[677] Ibid
[678] Ibid
[679] Ibid

COVID-19, the Government of Kenya put in place social distancing measures that included the indefinite suspension of all public gatherings, such as weddings, funerals, and church and mosque congregational meetings. All schools, universities and educational institutes were ordered to close indefinitely, and a nationwide curfew was put in place from 7 p.m. to 5 a.m. daily, effective from 27 March. All international flights were suspended, apart from cargo planes and those arriving to evacuate foreign nationals. The Government of Kenya has also suspended passenger ferries from Tanzania and Somalia, effectively closing its international borders with these countries. Only cargo vehicles are permitted to enter, on condition that drivers submit to mandatory COVID-19 testing and subsequently test negative.[680]

The government has put a Senior Citizens Program to provide aid to the elderly and direct cash grants to vulnerable households. These interventions have also included the provision of food aid. In addition, on 25 April, the President announced measures to cushion citizens against the loss of income as a result of COVID-19. These include reduced income tax for those in formal employment and a reduction in corporate taxes. The government also introduced the National Hygiene Programme, which targets youths and vulnerable households in informal and vulnerable settlements. It aims to raise awareness of COVID-19and facilitate local production of face masks, which have become mandatory in the fight against the virus.[681]

The National Council on Administration of Justice (the judiciary, the police and the Office of the Public Prosecutor), headed by the Chief Justice, released a statement on 15 March on the measures being taken to address the COVID-19 outbreak. All court sittings were suspended except for urgent matters and all foreign travel for justice institution staff and all conferences, workshops, training, or colloquia until further notice. Bringing prisoners to court for remand hearings was also suspended. The Chief Justice directed all courthouses to close to the public and instructed each court station to operate with three members of the judiciary (a judge/magistrate, a court administrator and a court assistant to serve as a customer care service desk contact). The judiciary is increasing its use of ICT to enable judges and magistrates to deal with cases, including e-filing of judgments, video conference remand hearings for prisoners in custody, and the delivery of court judgments through video conferencing and Skype.[682]

Madagascar

In the last five years, the country experienced two major epidemics in two successive years; pneumonic plague in 2017 and measles in 2018. The loss of human life was enormous, reaching

[680] IDLO, July 30, 2020. Rule Of Law In The Time Of Covid-19: Kenya, [online] available at; https://www.idlo.int/news/notes-from-the-field/rule-law-time-covid-19-kenya (accessed on May 28th, 2021)
[681] Ibid
[682] Ibid

around 1,400 deaths. The plague outbreak affected the country's economy, especially the tourism and transport sectors. While the country has been able to draw lessons learned and many good practices from the response to these outbreaks, the arrival of the COVID-19 pandemic posed a number of major challenges, as this was not a usual outbreak endemic to the country, but rather a virus imported from abroad.[683]

As soon as the existence of the coronavirus was announced in China, preparations were initiated at country-level, including through: the revision of the national contingency plan; the strengthening of control at all international entry points; and the routing of necessary drugs and supplies to these points. Flights to and from China were suspended starting 10 February 2020, although this was a very difficult decision to take given the importance of trade relations between the two countries. As a result, even though the country had not yet experienced COVID-19 cases, socio-economic consequences were felt since then.[684]

Within a few weeks, all neighbouring countries were affected by the coronavirus, and Madagascar confirmed its first case on 20 March, 2020. Unfortunately, given the structural fragility of the country's health system and the existence of aggravating factors such as very precarious water, hygiene and sanitation conditions, COVID-19 was able to spread rapidly. As of 25 May, 542 COVID-19 cases, including two deaths, have been reported, most of them in Toamasina and Antananarivo cities.

Madagascar has a history of not fancying vaccines and indeed, in 2018 was among the last four countries in the world registering polio cases from its stance on vaccines. Following the outbreak of the pandemic, Madagascar affirmed its decision not to participate in the Covax global initiative for the access to Covid-19 vaccine once they had been approved and licensed. The government spokesperson confirmed that the island would resort to its traditions concoction that its own scientist discovered earlier that year to stem out the virus. He further said that they would wait to see the effectiveness of the vaccine first in the countries that will first use tithe tonic, based on the plant Artemisia annua which has anti-malarial properties, was not proven by the World Health Organization but Madagascar put it on sale to several African countries.

Tanzania

Upon the outbreak of the global pandemic, the then president of Tanzania, John Magufuli, declared that the east African country had no Covid-19. Authorities last released data on Covid-19 almost a year ago with data then showing that Tanzania only had 509 cases. For this, the former president

[683] Emergency Appeal for Covid-19: Madagascar, [online] available at; https://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/MDG_COVID-19_Emergency_Appeal_2020_EN.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

[684] Ibid

received a lot of criticism.[685]

Since June 2020, when the late President John Magufuli declared the country "Covid-19 free", he, along with other top government officials, mocked the efficacy of masks, doubted if testing works, and teased neighbouring countries which had imposed health measures to curb the virus. Mr. Magufuli has also warned; without providing any evidence - that Covid-19 vaccines could be harmful and instead urged Tanzanians to use steam inhalation and herbal medicines, neither of which have been approved by the World Health Organization (WHO) as treatments. It is unclear why the president expressed such scepticism about the vaccines but he is noted on record to have said that Tanzanians should not be used as "guinea pigs".[686]

Magufuli, who holds a Ph.D. in chemistry, ignored scientific reason; championing religious devotion and natural remedies as cures for the virus. He has urged citizens to attend churches and mosques, reasoning Covid-19 is “satanic” and “cannot live in the body of Christ; it will burn instantly.” He announced three days of national prayer against Covid-19 on April 16. Magufuli also recommended steam inhalation as a “scientific treatment,” claimed his own son overcame the virus by drinking a lemon and ginger tincture, and diverted government funding to the importation of botanical remedies from Madagascar.[687]

This kind of response to the global pandemic has had vast effects on the Republic of Tanzania. There were increased losses of lives of people and a shaking of the international relations. The lack of transparency in the wake of the pandemic put Tanzania in its own class and was looked at as a big risk to other countries in as far as the pandemic was concerned.

The global pandemic has been uniform in its manner of spread, and the different countries have had different mechanisms on how to respond to health emergencies, including global pandemics. Developed countries seem to have better laws that enable easy management of health emergencies than developing countries that seem to have entered turmoil upon the inception of the pandemic.

PLAUSIBLE ADVOCACY

I have noted before that all power belongs to the people according to Article 2 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda. This ideally means that every law or decision made by the government must be derived from the state's citizens and well-being. I have realised that it has been taken that having one of the two is sufficient to warrant decision making. I beg to differ. The state must have

[685]Anthony Wesaka, Tuesday March 30 2021. EA lawyers urge new Tanzania regime to contain Covid-19, Daily Monitor, [online] available at https://www.monitor.co.ug/uganda/news/national/ea-lawyers-urge-new-tanzania-regime-to-contain-covid-19-3341840 (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

[686]BBC News, February 2021. Coronavirus in Tanzania: The country that's rejecting the vaccine, [online] available at; https://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa-55900680 (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

[687]Judd D. & Marielle H.,May 26, 2020. Implications of Tanzania’s Bungled Response to Covid-19, Center for Strategic and International Studies, [online] available at; https://www.csis.org/analysis/implications-tanzanias-bungled-response-covid-19 (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

both ingredients before a decision concerning the citizens is made. This is regardless of whether it is a time of emergency or otherwise.

Secondly, the Constitution spells out the body vested with the power to make laws and how the laws ought to be enacted, the different Acts of Parliament further elaborate on how the process should be followed. Exceptional circumstances like health emergencies are also envisaged under Article 110 of the Constitution, and therefore anything done under the same can be argued to be lawful.

However, if and when the state decides to deviate from the known procedure of making the law without necessarily fulfilling the requirements of Article 110, then their actions must be justified under Article 43 of the Constitution. In my research, I have been able to deduce that it is almost impossible for the state to do so without raising questions of constitutionality, given that alternatives to be empowered are usually numerous, and it is hard to choose the most efficient yet least stringent in the shortest time possible given the imminence of the emergency.

Further, the fact that there is sufficient law to warrant specific actions by the government during public emergencies creates little room to justify why such laws have been ignored in taming the emergency. The state should follow the law, especially when fortunate enough to have laws that envisage public health emergencies.

While comparing the response of the Ugandan government to the response of other countries, I discovered that the world's reaction to pandemics is subjective to the prevailing circumstances. For example, even when China had ample laws to legally handle the pandemic, it broke out within its jurisdiction and its urgency overrode the need to follow the law.

The United States of America, which has reasonable laws that envisage health emergencies, received the pandemic at a time when a controversial man was president. Donald Trump believed that the pandemic was a hoax set up by China in their economic war of supremacy. This therefore affected the operation by the law since the fountain of honour was not willing to respect some of these guidelines.

The same can be said for the United Kingdom. Their response was strengthened only after the Prime Minister suffered from the virus and was admitted in dire condition. If this had not occurred, maybe both Donald Trump and Boris Johnson would have burdened the willingness of the two countries.

Other countries in Africa like Madagascar and Tanzania protested the recommendations by the World Health Organisation. This could be attributed to the desire to feel independent from developed countries and this killed the will to fight the pandemic which in turn gave it a footstool to rule the lives of people. Countries like India had done well at first, but as the fight against the pandemic was near victory, they let down their guard to allow for it to flourish again and the consequences are yet to be healed from.

There are countries that have however been diligent and have tried to follow their laws to keep the pandemic in check. Australia stands out as one of these countries that have been able to fight a good fight thus far. This can be attributed to good governance and the observance of the rule of law.

The international organisations tasked with such responsibilities have also not been left standing. The World Health Organisation has been criticized for making recommendations outside the ambit of the International Health Regulations passed in 2005. Most if the responses issued by the organisation lack legal backing and therefore created laxity in the different member states' reaction to the same.

Uganda has, over the years, been praised for its resilience in curbing and overcoming health crises. She has been successful in curbing HIV/AIDS, the Ebola outbreak, Cholera, Malaria, Polio, Marburg, to mention but a few; however, in as much as the state has received praise for this resilience, little has been said of the legal consequences that come with dealing with these emergencies. This question has been silent until the spread of Covid 19, which called for the most stringent measures to curb the spread.

But also, the entire world can yet learn another lesson from the current pandemic. The pandemic knows no race, no economic standing, and no age. It attacks indiscriminately and as such, can only be combated if such differences are not considered in our fight. The different countries must learn to cooperate through the existing mechanisms like the World Health Organisation to help each other to overcome this battle. The developed countries should help the developing countries to cope because they are more susceptible to suffer than the developed countries.

Long term legislation

Uganda already has a legal framework that would have easily worked in the wake of this pandemic and not attract legal attention. However, this legislation is not elaborate enough. Whereas the constitution provides for a state of emergency, there are no subsidiary laws that elaborate Article 110. Therefore, the state should enact laws specifically to govern health emergencies that can be readily available to the citizens, now that the country realizes the need for such laws.

This will create certainty of the mode of operation should any other pandemic occur and create certainty for the country. Citizens will be more willing to accept the law if it is in place than directives developed to fit the situation. Now that Uganda has experienced the need to have these laws, they should be promulgated with immediate effect.

Transparency and capacity building

One of the significant hit areas of the state has been its health sector and its ability to accommodate the overwhelming numbers of patients. The state should be able to, by law, establish enough funding to develop the health sector. The process should begin with expressly providing for the right to health which is currently just reflected in Article 45 of the Constitution. This inclusion will speed up progressively realising the right to health and create justification for the government to limit certain other rights to promote the public health of its citizens.

When the law has been passed, and the citizens have been made aware of it, the citizens will better comply. This is because the law will be prescribed with its sanctions, if any. This makes implementation easy for the executive and judiciary as well.

The law will also create certainty among the citizens of the state. The ability to know what is expected of each citizen in such health circumstances will encourage a stronger sense of patriotism. It will restore and improve the citizens' confidence in their government, and this will, in the long run, spur faster development and more effective ways of alleviating health emergencies.

International cooperation

In the foregoing, the world must learn to unite for issues that sustain not only the economies of the different countries, but also the very existence of human life. Global health emergencies are capable of wiping the human race off the face of the earth if there is no cooperation, trust and transparency among the countries. The differences that the different countries held against each other in the wake of the pandemic contributed significantly to the spread of the pandemic. This does not have to be the case; the next time the world has to alleviate a pandemic.

The global pandemic that the world faces today is not the first one, and neither is it the last. One thing remains certain; that another pandemic will come. However, the good news is that the level of data collection, storage, and technology that the world 100 years ago has since immensely developed, and therefore we can learn from our past to be ready for the future. I hope that this study can contribute to better prepare for what is bound to return.

CHAPTER SEVEN

EVALUATION OF THE EXECUTIVE IN AS FAR AS EXERCISING THE RULE OF LAW IN UGANDA

This chapter looks at the role of the executive in as far as rule of law in Uganda. It is not only concerned with the requirements of national legislations but also its function as a branch of government requiring independence of the judiciary observance of the doctrine of separation of powers other than it being a myth that uphold the rule of law in line with the various principles of both formal and procedural character.

This chapter is premised on the rule of law in as far as the executive in Uganda. Rule of law refers to restriction of the arbitrary use or exercise of power by subordinating it to a well- defined and established laws. The rule of law is more than a well drafted constitution. There is need for that constitution to be observed accordingly in relation to its sui generis nature. It therefore follows that there are different principles that curtail the exercise of the rule of law. Adherence to the principles of supremacy of law, equality before the law, accountability to the law, separation of powers, participation in decision-making, legal certainty, avoidance of arbitrariness and procedural and legal transparency.

The question remains whether Uganda's rule of law can put the much required democracy in jeopardy as well sustainable development or any other lasting effects.

The form of governance in Uganda that existed was not administrative rather governance and administration originated from customs. Colonialism to modern day today obligations is still vivid that is the overrunning of our societies by European states and the imposition of political institutions from Europe has shaped our modern reality.[688]Until 1894, the sovereign state we now know as Uganda was in Constitutional terms .That year Uganda as an administrative unit was born when The British government declared her a protectorate.

The Magna Carta of 1215 saw to the institutionalism of the rule of law which enshrines the principle that the king was not above the law.[689] The Bill of Rights[690] stated that law could not be made, repealed or suspended without the will of Parliament. The crown could not manipulate the court system, and subjects were now able to bring an action against the Monarch.[691]

[688] GW, Kanyeihamba, Constitutional and political History of Uganda (2nd edition law Africa publishing Ltd 2010) Pg.249
[689]In Probitions del Roy (1607, published 1656 (1572-1616 12 Co Rep 63)
[690] 1689

Thus administrative law which is a body of general principles that governs the exercise of powers and duties by public authority.[692] This has been at the forefront of the country's governance or management of this country. Chiefly, administrative law is encompassed by a constitutional frame work which guides the management of this country

Throughout the 20th century, the rule of law has become a term of widespread academic debate, court judgments and parliamentary debates. Lord Bingham in 'The rule of Law'[693] argued that;

"The core of the existing principle is.... that all persons and authorities within the state, whether public or private, should be bound by and entitled to the benefit of laws publicly and prospectively promulgated and publicly administered in the courts."

The Constitution is pervaded by rule of law, since general principles of Constitution are the results of judicial decisions which determine the rights of private citizens.

The rule of law in Uganda is an identified fundamental and operational principle that every democratic state undertakes to observe while attempting to achieve a conducive social, economic and political environment in the county.

The most important impetus for discussing the reality of this doctrine within Ugandan jurisdiction is that though the executive is governed by constitutional frame work and other laws, the president and his cabinet enjoy unnecessary privileges such as exemptions from ordinary laws which reflect a loophole as to the various principles of rule of law. Basing on the various grounds the rule of law in Uganda is vividly provided under Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitutional frame work. The present situation in Uganda being the preventative arrests of individuals of not only the members of the political opposition but also the citizens portrays how far off the paper the rule of law is.

The rule of law is differently discussed in a number of ways, thus there are different meanings and corollaries. The primary meaning being, everything must be done in accordance to the law. The rule of law is a theory that every person must be subject to the laws within the jurisdiction.

G.W Kanyeihamba in his book [694] comments majorly, that the rule of law is not a rule but a collection of ideas and principles within free-societies to guide law makers, administrators, judges and law-enforcement agencies. Overall, that this, theory is binding to the rulers and those being ruled of which this results to justice which in essence is good governance or democracy. Where by the rule of law precludes arbitrary action on the part of those who run and control the government.

---

[691] John Griffiths (1918-2010) 'The political Constitution' (1979) 42 Modern Law Review, 1, 15

[692] H.W.R Wade and Christopher Forsyth, Administrative law ,9th edition Oxford University Press 2004 Pg.4.

[693] (2007) 66 CLI 67, 79

[694] G.W Kanyeihamba, TheConstitutional and political history of Uganda, 2nd edition, Law Africa Publishing (U) ltd YEAR pages 265 to 273

A.V. Dicey[695] in, wrote that the supremacy of the rule of law has three distinct though related conceptions that is;

No man is punishable or can lawfully be made to suffer in body or in goods except for a distinct breach of the law established in the ordinary legal manner before the ordinary courts of the land.

Every man, whatever is his rank or condition, is subject to the ordinary law of the realm, amenable to the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals.

He echoes that the general principles of the (British) constitution are the result of judicial decisions determining rights of private persons in matters brought before court.

Dicey contrasted the rule of law with systems of government based on the exercise by those in authority of wide or arbitrary powers of constraints such as power of detention without trial. It was noted that actions of the state officials such a s ministers which impact on individual should have a clear foundation as noted by Bradley and Ewing that this is a principle of legality.[696]

Thus the exercise of executive powers has to be suppressed or determined by rule of law over rule by law as a yard stick to eliminate the extreme use of power to realize democracy and sustainable development. Thus the need to observe the constitutional mandate by the three arms of government specifically the executive and ordinary citizens.

While rule of law may not be preserve of any given country, it is likely to thrive in a society that allows its citizens to enjoy their right to participate fully in the political affairs of the state, including electing representatives and standing for elections. A country that disenfranchises its citizens because they are suspected to belong to the opposition falls short of the requirements of a proper rule of law.

As Cora Hoexter argues, the principle of legality, which forms part of the rule of law, is "a wonderfully useful and flexible device …….in a sense that it acts as a kind of safety net, catching exercises of public power that do not qualify as administrative functions".[697] Thus the doctrine of rule of law is a sense is exercise of public power that must comply with standards such as lawfulness, reasonableness and fairness.

Rule of law in Uganda clearly and expressly shows loopholes, not only is it absent in practice, the only semblance of any administration of the country there is, is rule by law which is an abuse to political and social sphere of society hence harming the economy that is suitable development in Uganda.

[695] AV Dicey, Introduction to the Study of Law of the Constitution (1885; 10th edition, Macmillan & Co, 1959), pages.187-195

[696] A.W Bradley and K. D Ewing Constitutional and administrative law (15the edition Pearson Edition Ltd 20011) page 92

[697] Cora Hoexter, The Principle of Legality in South African Administrative law, 4 MACQUARIE L.J. 165 (2004)

Noble Marara in his book Behind the presidential curtain echoes that Kagame labeled his colleagues killers or unaccountable people just to get rid of them. For instance Rusesabagina capture by Kagame's government without following proper extradition process when he was forcefully abducted leading to his enforced disappearance.[698] The same is vivid through press in Uganda through several analogies relating to Museveni's government.

Bingham.T.(2001). The Rule of law, Penguin Books, London describes the rule of law as a phrase much used but little examined. The idea of rule of law as the foundation of modern states and civilizations has recently become even more talismanic than that of democracy, but what does it actually consist of? In this book, Bingham examines what the idea actually means. He makes clear that the rule of law is not an arid legal doctrine but is the foundation of a fair and just society, is a guarantee of responsible government, is important contribution to economic growth and offers the best means yet derived for securing peace and co-operation. He briefly examines the historical origins of the rule of law and the advances eight conditions which capture its essence as understood in western democracies today.

Grace Tumwine Mukubwa in "founding of the constitution of Uganda" pages 6-7, writes about the perception of the 1967 constitution, the presidents in Uganda have been vested with dictatorial powers, the is not the case that is through a comparison between the American constitution and the Ugandan constitution proves this as false.

In Uganda, the president wields wide-ranging but unregulated powers practically. These immense powers include appointment of ministers' judges, head of the electoral commission among others. Thus the exercise of these powers is not usually circumscribed, has often been abused to the detriment of judicial independence, fair election. These institutions are confronted with this prowess and maybe inclined to do the bidding of the executive. Unsurprising, may quake in the presence of the president.

The executive functions is carried out by the government administrators of which these carry out the functions, powers and duties stipulated in different legislations thus the executive carries out and implements the laws.[699]

Literature available on executive in as far as rule of law is concerned shows that the executive is not entirely at fault but the legislature is also attributed to its actions. However, there is no balance struck between these two arms of government in order to establish a position at which rule of law is realized.

[698] https;//www.hrw.org/news/2020/09/10/Rwanda-rusesabagina-was-forcibly-disappeared

[699] Mark R and Steve Foster, Unlocking constitutional and administrative law .3rd edition.(Routledge-Publishers).pages 71 to 72,

The existing literature points to the centrality of the existence of the rule of law both within the domestic and international level however, there is no distinction of how the rule of can be regarded in the light of a constitutional government. Yet no rule is without substance. Many writers on the rule of law distinguish between “thin” (concerned with the form of law and equal application), and “thick” (fair or just substantive content) rule of law. [700]This is the distinct feature of this research paper, to strike a balance between the parallel rule of law on paper and in practice within the domestic laws since there is need for a tremendous revision of executive exercise of power in terms of rule of law with the need to revive the country's economy. The lack of which is consequential in such a way that it causes severe problems such as brain drain and political instability among others which rob the country of stable development.

The democratic progress of Uganda depends on governance by rule of law rather than individuals. In this proposal it is my argument that observance of rule of law through unconventional means is a crisis which amplifies demands on, and exposes the deficiencies of, our ailing regulatory institutions. As a result, there is inability to halt the type of human behavior that is causing uproar or turmoil in economy due to riots which pushes away investors.

SEPARATION OF POWERS

The term "triaspolitica" or "separation of powers" was coined by Charles-Louis de Secondat, baron de La Brède et de Montesquieu, an 18th century French social and political philosopher. His publication, Spirit of the Laws, is considered one of the great works in the history of political theory and jurisprudence, and it inspired the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Constitution of the United States. Under his model, the political authority of the state is divided into legislative, executive and judicial powers. He asserted that, to most effectively promote liberty, these three powers must be separate and acting independently.

Separation of powers, therefore, refers to the division of government responsibilities into distinct branches to limit any one branch from exercising the core functions of another. The intent is to prevent the concentration of power and provide for checks and balances.

The traditional characterizations of the powers of the branches of American government are:

- The legislative branch is responsible for enacting the laws of the state and appropriating the money necessary to operate the government.
- The executive branch is responsible for implementing and administering the public policy enacted and funded by the legislative branch.

[700]Trebilcock, M.J. and Daniels, R.J., 2008. Rule of law reform and development: charting the fragile path of progress. Northampton: Edward Elgar.

- The judicial branch is responsible for interpreting the constitution and laws and applying their interpretations to controversies brought before it.

This old principle of governance is one of the most fundamental aspects to consider for a stable and democratic government. However, many a times, the arms of the government have overstepped their mandate in disregard of this principle. The principle of the political question doctrine has on many occasions if not all, acted as a formidable scapegoat to the executive when brought before the judiciary.

The executive has on various occasions assumed the role of the parliament and the recent act has been the passing of presidential declarations for the country in the wake of the pandemic.

The positions in the legislature have also been predetermined by the ruling party and the voting process has proven to be ceremonial. With a Speaker of parliament pre-appointed, and a Chief justice who has acted for the head of executive in his earlier days, it is impossible to claim that the notion of separation of powers is existent in the country.

RULE OF LAW

Rule of law can be understood as the mechanism, process, institution, practice, or norm that supports the equality of all citizens before the law, secures a non-arbitrary form of government, and more generally prevents the arbitrary use of power. Arbitrariness is typical of various forms of despotism, absolutism, authoritarianism, and totalitarianism. Despotic governments include even highly institutionalized forms of rule in which the entity at the apex of the power structure (such as a king, a junta, or a party committee) is capable of acting without the constraint of law when it wishes to do so.[701]

In general, the rule of law implies that the creation of laws, their enforcement, and the relationships among legal rules are themselves legally regulated, so that no one; including the most highly placed official, is above the law. The legal constraint on rulers means that the government is subject to existing laws as much as its citizens are. Thus, a closely related notion is the idea of equality before the law, which holds that no "legal" person shall enjoy privileges that are not extended to all and that no person shall be immune from legal sanctions. In addition, the application and adjudication of legal rules by various governing officials are to be impartial and consistent across equivalent cases, made blindly without taking into consideration the class, status, or relative power among disputants. In order for those ideas to have any real purchase, moreover, there should be in place some legal apparatus for compelling officials to submit to the law.

[701]Naomi Choi, 2010. Rule of Law: Political Philosophy, SAGE Publications' Encyclopaedia of Political TheoryUniversity of Houston, [online] available at; https://www.britannica.com/topic/rule-of-lawaccessed on 1st July, 2021)

Uganda has recently been recorded as the worst country in the East African Region in respecting the rule of law and dispensing justice. A report by the World Justice Project Rule of Law Index carried out in 2020ranks Uganda at number 117 globally out of 128 countries. The Ugandan government has over the years committed atrocities to justify this position.

The Uganda Law Society has recently developed a mechanism of documenting all the disobediences recently committed by the government and in its first quarterly report of 2020, they note that meetings organized by the people power movement led by Hon. Robert Kyagulanyi (a.k.a Bobi Wine) in Gulu, Wakiso and Lira Districts were blocked by the Uganda Police Force despite getting approval to consult from the Electoral Commission ahead of the 2021 elections. Of particular note was the heavy deployment of the army and police officers at the Da Covenant in Gulu on January 7, 2020; to block the People Power movement from making consultations.[702]

Another consultation meeting was blocked in Lira and two journalists were arrested for taking pictures at the Pacific Grand Hotel where the meeting was going to take place. A consultation meeting was blocked at our lady of Good Counsel Church in Gayaza, Wakiso District and Hon. Kyagulanyi was arrested and taken to Naggalama Police Station. In a similar but separate incident, police blocked the Forum for Democratic Change 15th anniversary celebrations in several districts across the country.

Two police officers, a one Ben Ojiong and one Corporal Alex Opito got into a heated argument on whether to enter a case in the station diary as criminal or civil. As a result of failure to disagree, Ojiong picked his gun and shot Opio several times killing him instantly and then shot himself as well. Two LDU's tried to intervene and one was injured in the process which led to his death bringing the total number of the dead to three.

In another incident a Local Defense Unit (LDU) officer shot and injured a one Saleh Kinaalwa who was working at a butcher located at Matale trading center in Buikwe District. It is alleged that Kinaalwa was suspected of assaulting Richard Ssekitooleko, a fellow vendor on December 31, 2019.

Also, an unidentified civilian in Moyo District grabbed a gun from a police officer and shot him dead. This happened when the police officer was trying to rescue someone who was accused of poisoning two of his farm workers and was being lynched by an angry mob.

In another incident, Lt. Col. Juma Seiko was detained at Kawempe station for allegedly shooting at three people causing bodily injuries. It is stated that he caused an accident and when the two drivers came out to ascertain the incident, a fight ensued; and shots were fired from a gun belonging to Col. Seiko leading to the injury of a one Ali Juuko, Kasirye Zimula, and Joseph Lule.

[702]Jimmy Komakech, "People Power blocked from consulting in Gulu," Eagle Line, January 7, 2020.

And all this is just from one quarterly report! The atrocities are even more and properly spread out over the past years. Government still continues to neglect its mandate to respect the law and adhere to the same which leaves many wondering if Uganda is really a democracy if they do not have regard for rule of law.

RULE OF LAW, ITS DYNAMICS AND THE ASSOCIATED CHALLENGES

The United Nations declaration on 24th September 2012 reaffirmed that rule of law and democracy, are inter-related at the national level and international level. This is associated with democratic principles as well as institutions streamlining with processes to do with equality and accountability. The rule of law is not an instrument rather a rule that requires ordinary individuals plus the government to adhere to it, as fundamental advancement of democracy and sustainable development.

RULE OF LAW AND THE EXECUTIVE

The executive powers are that it implements the laws enacted by the legislature and enforces the will of the state. This is favorably exercised through observance of the rule of law. The administrative organs a case in point the executive is a branch headed by the president deputized by the vice president where need arises of which the prime minister and cabinet minister are members. The executive is the body in the state which is entrusted with the administrative functions of government in accordance with the constitution and laws of the state.

There are three theories of presidential power which includes legalistic, stewardship and prerogative. With legalistic theory the president can only do what is authorised by law or constitution. Stewardship theory the president is the representative or advocate for the people and should do anything to protect the people. Prerogative theory that if necessary in times of crisis the president bends or breaks the law.[703]

The East African court defined the rule of law in Katabazi and 21 others v Secretay General of the East African community and another[704] that rule of law entails that no one is above the law as its basic form. It follows that truth and law is based upon fundamental principles which can be discovered but cannot be created through an act of will.

The rule of law is visible in to two different spheres that is, its formulation towards procedural approach which aims at the formulation and application while the other addresses the protection of rights and how they are framed.[705]

[703] https://quizlet.com/186592643/three-theories-of-presidential-power-flash-cards/
[704] [2007] EA CJ 3

It is difficult to discuss the rule of law without some normative assumptions or implications about the law's legitimate authority and the law's validity hence the need to revisit this, from where it all started that is the Magna Carta. Economists have also increasingly come to realize the importance of political and legal institutions, especially the presence of the rule of law, in providing the freedom and prosperity in developing countries such as Uganda.

When President Milton Obote justified Uganda's continuing drift towards a one-party system by labeling it a uniquely "African form of democracy. Benedicto Kiwanuka Mugumba scoffed at this claim. Uganda's political system was not the embodiment of some kind of uniquely in cultured, 'African' democracy.[706]

By its nature the rule of law cuts across several policy fields and comprises political, constitutional, legal and human rights issues of which the executive has a direct hand. The executive must as one of its mandates under the constitution, abide, uphold and safeguard the constitution and other laws of Uganda. This means that it should observe all the democratic principles provided for under the constitution and other laws to ensure democracy[707].

Unlike the current constitution, the then independence Constitution was designed to cater for a historical Uganda where power was placed in the hands of the privileged few rather than the will of the people. Of which Kanyeihamba argues that this portrayed a lack of political legitimacy until 1966.

Much as Article *1 of the 1967 constitution proclaimed that it was the supreme law, the 1995 constitution went on several steps further. A provision in the instrument directly related to the impact of the doctrine reflected in the decision in Ex Parte Matovu case[708]. On September 27, 1995, the Constituent Assembly adopted the new constitution. The 1995 constitution, establishes a quasi-parliamentary system of government, consisting of a President, Prime Minster, Cabinet, Parliament, Supreme Court and Constitutional Court. The preamble states that the constitution shall be based on the "principles of unity, peace, quality, democracy, social justice and progress."

The supremacy of the law as fundamental principle of any democratic system, which seeks to foster and promote rights, where civil, political or economic, social and cultural. Therefore, there is recourse enabling citizens to defend their rights as well as shaping the structure of the state and the [705] Paul Craig Administrative law pp. 18 to 20, 17th edition, Sweet and Maxwell.

[706] Earle, J and Carney,J.(2021). Catholic Uganda, and the Gospel of Democracy. In Contesting Catholics: BenedictoKiwanuka and the Birth of Postcolonial Uganda (pp.23-58); Woodbridge, Suffolk (GB);Rochesteer NY (US): Boydell& Brewer. Doi:2307/j.ctv136bwk1.9
[707] Article 99 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 as amended.
[708] Uganda v. Commissioner of Prisons, Ex Parte Matovu,[1966] 1 EA 514

prerogatives of various powers, with a view of placing limitation on their power[709].

The substantive part of the constitution specifically Article 1 place all powers in the exercise of the sovereignty in the hands of the people. Article 2 of the same not only declares the constitution to be supreme but also have binding force on all authorities and the persons throughout Uganda. This binds all institutions whether the executive or ordinary individuals.[710]

Article 98, the President of the Republic of Uganda is the Head of State, the Head of Government and Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. Article 98 (2) the president is the fountain of honour who takes precedent overall Ugandans per state Hierarchy.

According to Article 99 (1) the executive authority in Uganda is vested in the president, and shall be exercised within the ambits of the constitution.

Article 99[711] provides for the executive authority which is vested in the president and exercised in accordance with the constitution and any other legislation.

The President has precedence over all other persons in Uganda and is obliged to safeguard the constitution as well as "execute and maintain the Constitution and all laws". He has the power to appoint a Vice President after having obtained the approval of the legislature. The vice president is also part can assume the presidency should the need arise.[712] Article 108 establishes the office of the vice president.

The vice president is appointed by president and approved by a simple majority of parliament. Article 102 stipulates that the vice must have the same qualifications as the president, with a primary responsibility to deputize the president.

The prime minister under the executive was initially not provided for under the 1995 constitution rather it's a creature of the 2005 amendment thus provided for under Article 108 A of the constitution amendment.

The prime minister is appointed by the president with approval of parliament per Article 108 A (1) with approval of parliament by simple majority.

Article 108A (2) (a) and (b) provides for the roles of the prime minister to include leadership of government business in parliament and be responsible for the coordination and implementation of government policies across ministries, departments and any other institutions. Perform any other such functions as may be assigned to him by the president or confined to him by the constitution or

[709] Conflict Prevention Network, Peace-building and Conflict Prevention in Developing Countries: A Practical Guide (Berlin 2001).

[710] David Hubert in his book Attenuated Democracy quoted Benjamin Page and Martin Gilens that; "the essence of democracy is not just having reasonably satisfactory policies: the essence of democracy is popular control of government, with each citizen having an equal voice"

[711] The constitution of the republic of Uganda, 1995 as amended.

[712]OlokaOnyango: Judicial Power and Constitutionalism in Uganda.

law.

Article 99 (4) is to the effect that some functions of the president are only restricted to him or her.

Article 103 of the constitution provides that the president is elected to the office by the people of Uganda through adult suffrage.

Contrary to Article 107 of the constitution, the president can be removed from office through, an action for "abuse of office" or certain "misconduct or misbehavior" may be enforced by one third of all the members of parliament. After a special tribunal has investigated the case, a majority of two thirds of the members of parliament has then the power to confirm the decision on the removal of the President.

As expounded in Brigadier Henry Tumukunde V. Attorney General and Electoral Commission[713], the majority of four to one, held that the actions of the president of Uganda can be challenged in a court of law though while holding office , the president has immunity from any court proceedings.

The cabinet is a center point that directs the instrument of government, in legislation as well as in administration. Thus, this coordinates the administrative actions of the executive. Article 111(1) provides for the cabinet and that this shall consist of the president, vice president, prime minister and the ministers.

The ministers are individually appointed by the president with approval of the president and these are individually accountable to the president.

The executive through its officials should provide enough funds to put into political leadership as well as institutions to allow proper conduction of necessary programmes for effective democratic governance in Uganda. The officials that make up the executive branch through their leadership can open opportunities to improve rule of law for instance minister of justice that towards the use of the police force as to political purposes, finance ministry which has interest in gaining control over resources.

The rule of requires legislations or any other bureaucratic regulations affecting any aspects such commercial operation like taxes to be simple, transparent and applied equally to all state actors not withstanding their stature as ministers same applies to anti-corruption regulations

THE RULE OF LAW AND ITS RELATIONSHIP TO CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

The person known as the father of the rule of law is Professor All Dicey reflected in his book the Law of the Constitution which he wrote in 1885 and which was built on the basis and views of natural law scholars e.g. Montesquieu and his basic point was to attempt to remove government from the control of power hungry men and women and to instead impose a rule of principles or a rule of law where people were governed on well-known principles of law. According to Dicey 3 main element make up the rule of law.

[713]Constitutional Appeal No.2 of 2006; [2008] UGCC 14

First, was the absolute supremacy and dominancy of regular law as opposed to the arbitrary exercise of individual power. The presumption underlying this view is that law possesses an objective quality and that it operates without fear or favour of any individual or authority. In this way, law is opposed to arbitrary power.

Secondly, was the element of equality that is the notion that all people are equal before the law. Natural differentiations such as colour, race, religion and sex should not lead to the differential treatment of people. Before the law all people are equal. Accompanying this is the principle of non-discrimation. The law should not be influenced by race, wealth or ethnicity.

Thirdly, the law must be the instrument of a just government of the rule of law that is a government not built on justice is a clear violation of the rule of law.

These basic principles have always formed the basis of the rule of law for the last 2 centuries and modifications have been made to suit changing circumstances. In 1959, the International Coalition for Jurists [1CJ] met in Geneva and formulated certain general principles for determining circumstances in which the rule of law can be said to be in existence.

i) The first principle according to the 1CJ is the existence of a strong government and this is strong not in the sense of dictatorship but in sense of effectiveness and one in which the obedience of the people is given without necessarily forcing people.
ii) All government actions i.e. actions of the executive, legislative or Judiciary must be backed and conditioned by the law. This means that the law stands above all these. It also means that the government is a trustee or custodian of the law and political power and the role of government is to exercise power to the benefit of the public. The presumption here is that all laws which have been enacted by the Legislature and executive have been done so in the best interests of the people and should these 2 organs fail to meet the interests of the people, then the Judiciary should interfere to ameliorate the situation
iii) Equality of law: There must be a consistency of application of the law to all people.
iv) The Judiciary must be independent and in this way, the Judiciary must not be subject of control of any other arm of government. Secondly it also means that the 2 other arms of government must respect and enforce decisions made by the judicial arm of the state.

How best can independence of the Judiciary be secured?

a) The nature and appointment of judges must be as transparent as possible in order to ensure that you have a process that is easily sustainable and defendable. The basis of appointment has to be transparent, and based on merit and capacity of the judges.

b) There should be an independent body that sieves potential appointees an
c) There must be security of tenure i.e. judges should not be easily removable and should have resources and facilitation necessary to their life and office.

v) The fifth principle of the 1CJ is that when we talk about human rights we mean both civil and political rights. Civil rights include freedom of association, speech, rights of an economic socio character e.g. right to food, shelter etc. Similarly, apart from simply declaring human rights and having them written in national Constitutions, there should also be an effective machinery of enforcement.

vi) There must be representative government. This means that people should have a way of participating in state affairs either directly or indirectly through their duly elected representatives and the power of election is accompanied by the power of removal. This means the government is based in the people.

vii) There must be a fair process of judicial adjudication and the principles of natural justice should be applied in a fair, consistent and impartial manner [Refer to Article 28 (3) of the 1995 Constitution].

viii) There must be a fair and effective system of administrative law (i.e. law that governs operations of administrative officers). This means that public officers should exercise their duties with diligence and effectiveness and with legal certainty of their actual extent.

ix) There must be respect for international law or the Law of Nations because all countries relate to one another and no one country lives in a vacuum or an island.

x) The state should promote and enhance the social and economic well being of the people. There should not be adverse discrimination in society. The rich should not be allowed to grow unusually richer while the poor grow poorer. The rule of law has a social justice element written therein.

CHALLENGES ASSOCIATED WITH THE RULE OF LAW

Unquestionably, the executive must respect and uphold the rule of law as a way of ensuring democratic governance. The executive arm of government must not at any time interfere with the affairs of the other arms and this is affected by the doctrine of separation of powers which is an essential element of rule of law.

This involves the distribution of tasks among the three arms of government that is the executive the legislature and the judiciary in order to carry out checks and balances so as to promote democracy and contribute to the rule of law.

Kanyeihamba relying on John Locke, an English philosopher classified the doctrine of separation of powers as to the primary functions of the three arms of government as follows;

- The legislature charged with the formation of laws on which man's rights are judged.
- The executive mandated with the enforcement of laws
- The judiciary charged with the interpretation of the laws

The executive arm of government is supposed to complement the others without in any way, compromising their respective roles in order to achieve the broader objective of the community. It is also worth to note that any active relationship or corporation is bound to face turmoil that is disagreements or disputes and in this instance the rule by law might be the only root cause to lack of sustainable development in Uganda.

In practice, the doctrine of separation of powers has never been envisaged and the same applies to the judicial independence. In March 1st, 2007, Uganda was faced with up veal and looked like the old ghosts had not seceded to leave the country. On this day there was a high court invasion by security personnel contrary to the preamble and provisions of the constitution. This invasion was ordered by persons who hold public offices established under the constitution and parliament enacted laws and thus nothing seems to have changed from time memorial. This clearly portrays absence of rule of law as well as lack of the much needed democracy which can only be exercised in relation to statutory provisions.

Judicial power is where judges administer justice through resolving disputes independently an exercising impartiality. In anticipation of this, judicial organs were created as a forum where any person aggrieved by the act or decision of another within the corporation framework can have recourse hence being the basic institution in this regard though it decision can be questioned if influenced by external factors.

Article 2[714] provides that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land. This is not recognized since some of the ministers are above it, through rule by law. Individuals are detained in-communicado coupled with arbitrary arrests.

Referring to the learned Justice Ogoola[715]who typified the feeling of most Ugandans, against the military assault on the High court building by the Black mamba. No apology was made by the executive despite the siege where the executive appointed itself a judge, a threat to the rule of law.

The reviewing of Executive decision or certain actions such as policies is restrained by the political question doctrine hence a vividly defined inter-relationship between the rule of law and it's abuse

[714] The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda 1995 as amended.

[715] J ogoola, "the rape of the temple'' from songs of paradise: a harvest of poetry and verse (2009)

by encroaching on judicialism. Directives issued by the executive that prohibit or restrict fundamental rights violate the rule of law. If respect of presidential term is taken as an indicator of adherence to the rule of law, then it follows that the constitutional rules are increasingly taken more seriously

The Ugandan case law on the political question doctrine is expounded by Justice Kanyeihamba in Attorney General v. David Tinyefunza where he states that;

"the rule appears to be that courts have no jurisdiction over matters which arise within the constitution and legal powers of the legislature or the executive. Even in cases, where courts feel obliged to intervene and review legislative measures of the legislature and administrative decisions of the executive when challenged on the grounds that the rights or freedoms of the individuals are clearly infringed or threatened, they do so sparingly and with the greatest reluctance."

Kanyeihamba reference to the possession of political powers of a sovereign government, the determination of which is based on parliament and the president, whose decisions are conclusive on the courts.

Kasozi echoes that the rule of law emanates from the jurisprudence of the superior courts. He cites the case of General David Tinyefunza v Attorney General[716], where they stated and used the words just and symbolizing the impartiality and independence of the judiciary as noted by Kanyeihamba (JSC).Kasozi notes that not only jurisprudence of courts is where direction is given rule of law but rather the acts or inactions of the other two arms f government specifically the executive and legislature that is referred to as the administration are crucial.[717]

In a system characterisised by rule of law an independent judiciary is critical to the effective functioning of the justice in a state. There has to be legal guarantee and protection of fundamental rights and civil and political liberties, such as freedom of expression, speech, information, or, to assemble peacefully, are essential for rule of law to prevail.

The independence of the judiciary takes three ingredients which include security of tenure of judicial officers, financial security and proper institutional funds allocation to the judiciary and institutional independence where the judicial officers are free to function without any interference or fear to ensure impartiality.

The then chief justice Benjamin Odoki[718] once stated;

"Independence of the judiciary is an indispensible preliquisite for a free society under the rule of law which implies freedom from interference by the executive or legislature, with the exercise of judicial function, but this does not mean that the judge is entitled to act in an arbitrary manner. Provision should be made for adequate remuneration of the judiciary."

[716] Constitutional Petition No.1 of 1997

[717] George W.K.L Kasozi; The concept of Rule of law and Protection of Human rights: The Ugandan Experience: 1986 to the Present. The Living Law journal, law reform Commission, June 2008. Vol.6, No.1

[718] Speech to the bar course students LDC ON 25th July 2007, titled strengthening the independence of the judiciary in Uganda.

The Chief Justice Bart Katurebe commented on the remuneration in his speech at the 18th Annual Judges Conference page 5 and sated that;

"The funding for remuneration of judges and their salaries is not adequate. The salaries of the lower bench need to be attended to and raised so as to financially secure the judicial officers."

Section 6 of the Judicature Act provides for the protection of the judicial officers from civil or criminal action in the process of performing their duties but this is not upheld as more often the police at the command of higher authority is seen to act contrary in defiance of court orders to this while it is supposed to offer support in terms of protection.

In Uganda, there is presence of admirable provisions in the laws as to judicial independence from appointment of judicial officers to their removal however this remains a myth as it is far off the paper with the executive undermining the judicial independence by appointing those ready to act in its favor to the bench.

Problems arise when the executive thwarts the efforts of other institution of the state, prevent those institutions from being adequately resourced in accordance with rule of law. This is because heads of state set the tone and ethical standards for those institutions. Where the executive choses to subvert the electoral process, or engage the armed forces in political activities in order to retain their political position portrays a precedent acceptable whereas if these would condone such and take responsible political discourse the norms and practice of rule of law is reinforced.[719]

Legislative power refers to the task of passing of laws as well as supervising their implementation and this power is derived from the will of the people as provided under Article 1 that all power belongs to the people of which this is expressed through periodic elections. The parliament is required to exercise control over the executive where the latter is to justify itself to parliament in respect of its actions or decisions. However, this can only be possible if the parliament is independent in carrying out, its functions.

The external interference with the Ugandan parliament can be traced way back in 1996 undermining its performance. From the famous handshake that involved the five million dollar Uganda shillings that was a pay out to members of parliament to lift the presidential term limits in 2005 to the most recent occasions which clearly illustrate the unfavorable change of parliament by the ruling party.

[719]Hallward-Driemeier, M., Khun-Jush, G. and Pritchett, L., 2010. "Deals versus Rules: Policy Implementation Uncertainty and Why Firms Hate It", NBER Working Paper No. 16001

The presence of the SFC in Parliament to bully the members of parliament vividly shows a threat to the doctrine of separation of powers that is parliament having no control over the government affairs but rather the executive having it in a tight grip to abide unwillingly to its commands hence the executive overreach.

The press is ever awash with stories of Members of parliament passing laws in favour of the government other than the interest of their constituencies in expectation of awards from the president for instance minister positions on the cabinet which are left vacant in a promise to be filled by those that fulfill his bid such as The Public Order Management Act[720] illustrates a twisted justification of the law, the ever changing term limits for the presidency in the constitution.

In Uganda, the NRM seems to use uncouth means in its political path that is it does not operate freely, fairly and democratically. The CEC that is the central executive committee which put Kadaga under pressure to quit the race in honour of alleged tacit agreement made five years prior to the 2021 speakership parliamentary elections for her rival.[721]

The president is seen to have encroached on the legislative exercises take that is for the speakership position in the parliament which should be an epitome of independence of which the parliament in actual sense, is required to censor the actions of the executive but with the president playing a big part its designs that is the election bit renders the process tainted with question marks.

It is considered chess by the master to continue controlling an arm of the state turned-a-regime organ with the president threatening to retaliate negatively where the parliament or any other arm of government, does not answer at the click of his fingers through a referendum.[722]Contrary to the Process referred to under Article 260 of the constitution.

The constitution grants powers to parliament such as approving all executive appointments, making and reviewing laws, a definition of independence to perform its responsibilities. It should therefore, not conform to any party caucusing which undermines its position.

Directive 8 of the national objectives and directive principles of state policy provides that the state and individuals should ensure proper distribution of powers as well as maintaining checks and balances to the various organs.

The collection of essays on local level politics in East African countries such as Uganda, Kenya among others illustrates that these countries were from 1918 until independence bound together by common colonial master and broadly share the same political structure and for a certain period comprised of a political federation.

[720] 2013
[721] https://www.independent.co.ug/Museveni-succession-plot-in-Oulanyah-Kadaga-battle/
[722] https://www.monitor.co.ug/uganda/oped/commentary/of-monolithic-nrm-and-the-deceptive-race-for-speaker-3411242

Towards the end of the 1960s the state of political and ideological orientations began to sharply diverge and the late 1970s saw them embroiled in serious disputes and the case of Uganda and Tanzania, outright war. However, their reform of state structure moved in a fairly different direction. All not only became single-party or non-party regime but continued to allocate an extremely limited role to representative institutions, to remain a four tier system of government dominated by strong central and provincial authorities, separate representative bodies in the lower tiers from any meaningful revenue base.[723]

In more recent years along with many other African counties Uganda, Kenya, Tanzania further shared the experience of central contraction, or rather of central state withdrawal from what were earlier depicted as some of its key responsibilities. The phenomenon of state contraction was vivid in Uganda where government even withdrew from the basic function of providing minimal physical security, but was also evident in Tanzania and to a lesser extent Kenya with regard to provision and maintenance of infrastructure and basic social services[724].

In 1994, Uganda officially remained a non-party state, although political parties including a state party maintain some form of public existence there including publishing their own newspapers. Kenya meanwhile was a multiparty democracy and Tanzania than they were in Uganda. A more significant difference was that Uganda after years of chaos and or civil war had clearly entered a period of comparative political tranquility. This followed in the wake of the victory of a popularly supported guerilla army in the first in Africa to acquire power from an incumbent local regime. Kenya by contrast had been driven into a situation of apparently irreparable ethno-regional division, while Tanzania's traditional unity and stability was threatened by a growing wave of religious antagonism and by separatist trends of various kinds on both Zanzibar and the mainland.[725]

In Kenya, the nullification of the presidential election illustrated the independence of the judiciary much as, the executive targeted the four Supreme Court judges who authored the majority judgment in the 2017 Raila decision in an attempt to induce fear in the rest of the judicial ranks. Thus the nastiness and brutishness of the executive assault towards the judiciary amounts to abuse of rule of law case in point, Uganda, where the executive is ever shunning the decisions of the executive mostly termed as the executive bullying.

In Tanzania both the president and his vice president run on the same ticket at the election. At death of the president there was a smooth succession female president as successor to avoid constitutional vacuum and uncertainty.

[723]KauitiKayinga, Andrew S.Z Kiondo, The new Local Level Politics in East Africa (Studies on Uganda, Tanzania and Kenya) research report.No.95 pp.10.
[724] Ibid .10
[725]KauitiKayinga, Andrew S.Z Kiondo, The new Local Level Politics in East Africa (Studies on Uganda, Tanzania and Kenya) research Report No.95 pp.11.

Ugandan's constitution is continuously a ball on the playing field of which the executive can have changes made to it whenever it pleases without regard to the appropriate process such as a constitutional review process or referendum. Therefore, it is argued that the constitutional mandate of the president be reduced just like in Kenya's new constitution that allows more people participation and inclusion.

Noble Marara in his book Behind the presidential curtain echoes that Kagame labeled his colleagues killers or unaccountable people just to get rid of them. For instance Rusesabagina capture by Kagame's government without following proper extradition process when he was forcefully abducted leading to his enforced disappearance.[726] The same is vivid through press in Uganda through several analogies relating to Museveni's government.

The immense presidential powers by the president are a defining characteristic. This is argued to have attributed to the weeding out of the president's contemporaries and likely opponents. It is further noted that Museveni's government has caused mobilization of military conflicts such Kony's war in Northern Uganda to protect the legitimacy of the NRM government crystallizes presidential power in Uganda to see to the continuity of Museveni's rule.

The questioning of presidential decisions is tantamount to a crime which has seen to the gradual weeding out of the old guard from NRM whose loyalty had become questionable by the president with suspicions of aspiring to take him out his presidential position hence bringing an end to the suspected succession plan within NRM.[727]

The rule of law in international context finds expression in the European convention on human rights. The European Union makes reference to it, in 1997 Treaty of Amsterdam when it states that the European Union is founded on respect for democratic principles, human rights and the rule of law. The preamble of the UDHR also confirms respect for rule of law. The rule of law being the implementation mechanism for human rights, turning them from a principle into reality. From the third clause of the preamble the rule is noted that;

"whereas it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected"

In the United Kingdom, the queen is a ceremonial figure with most of the powers being yielded by the parliament and the executive. There is no written constitution in the UK of which these rely on conventions and in the 17th century the parliament acquired supremacy over the executive and this was known as the rule of law.

[726] https;//www.hrw.org/news/2020/09/10/Rwanda-rusesabagina-was-forcibly-disappeared
[727] https://africasacountry.com/2018/11/presidential-power-and-the-museveni-state-in-uganda

Article 2 of the United States constitution creates the executive branch which consists of the president, vice president and other executive officers chosen by the president. This Article expressly provides the unitary executive theory which is the power possessed by the president to control the executive branch. Same applies to the command of the United states army in essence the constitution confers these powers and the US congress checks on these powers such a controlling appropriation for military expenditures.[728]

The United States, the Supreme Court's decision in Bush v Gore has triggered renewed interest in the nature of the rule of law in the Anglo-American tradition. After decades of neglect interest in the nature and consequences as to how the rule of law has survived in recent years.

In the US conduct of foreign affairs, the court facilitates growth of presidential powers in foreign affairs in three not so different ways that is adhering to the sole-organ doctrine. Secondly, invoking the political question doctrine and other non-judicial grounds. Thirdly, inferring congressional approval of presidential action by virtue of congressional inaction or silence. Thus the author argues that this doing, is an act by the judiciary is an illustration of executive overreach.[729]

The rule of law in even states with well-developed institutions, political motives still affect performance of these institutions such as judicial process which erodes impartiality through overreaching their mandate to acquire short-time gains to political actors or power brokers.

The America democratic system is not entirely based on the majority rule for instance the bill of rights was passed because some matters were deemed important, barring the constitutional amendment, not even majority should change it. It is argued that the rule of law were all persons and institutions are accountable to laws that are publicly promulgated, equally enforced, independently adjudicated and consistent with international human rights principles of which the courts play an integral role as was illustrated in Plyer v Doe[730]where the issue was whether denying undocumented children of illegal immigrants the right to attend public school constitutes based on alienage that violates the Equal Protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment? The court by a ratio of five to four held that the Texas legislation violated the clause reasoning that the state's exclusion of undocumented children from acquiring education was unlikely to improve the overall quality of education in Texas.

In a dissenting opinion Burger C. J opinioned that any issues concerning whether or not to admit children of undocumented immigrants in to public schools should be dealt with the legislature as opposed to the judiciary because it is a policy issue inappropriate for court to undertake hence recognizing legislative powers.[731]

[728] https://courses.lumenlearning.com/boundless-politicalscience/chapter/the -powers-of-the-presidency/
[729] David G. Adler, The judicaiary and Presidential Power in Foreign Affairs: A Critique, 1 RICH.J.L & PUB.INT.1 (1996) https://scholarship.richmond.edu.jolpi/vol1/iss1/3c
[730] 457 U.S.202 (1982)

United States constitution has the presidential duties and abilities directly listed and these are referred to as formal powers under Article 2 of the constitution and this includes power to make treaties, command the military and veto legislation.

Executive orders are different from those passed by the congress in such a way that they can only change policies within the executive branch. For instance trump's announced plans to end the constitutional guarantee of birth right citizenship by executive order but could not do so due to limit of presidential powers is a valid example of a democratic state of which his anti-democratic sentiments could not be dismissed.[732]

The informal power that the president has to influence foreign policy is through executive agreements where the president negotiates with foreign leaders in fulfilling his duties as president.

A government of US vests all executive powers are in the hands of one leader and this is termed as single executive by the president.

There is room for growth of presidential powers these powers are subject to limitation in the US the constitution stipulates that the president cannot become overall powerful as was the incidence of George Bush in 2006 where he planned to use military tribunals to prosecute enemy combatants, court found his decision as a violation to the Constitution.[733]

Trump's public statements attacking judges as well as his questioning of judicial authority due to rulings delivered against the Trump administration such as the issuance of green cards.[734] Trumps impeach on basis of abuse of power and obstruction of congress following the first attempted impeachment Trump's phone call to Ukraine president in 2019 for a face-face meeting on condition he investigate the energy company of which Biden's son worked for. The second impeachment in 2021 due to him threatening national security, democracy and the US constitution.

In The United States of America, Presidential decision making is subject to legal constraint, as illustrated in March 2011, the Obama Administration initiated military operations against Libya without congressional authorization, and then continued them past the statutory sixty-day limit set forth in the War Powers Resolution. Critics treated this episode as evidence that the executive branch did not take seriously constitutional and statutory limits on the use of military force.

Different countries have adopted the rule of law and these failures and success stories. These are helpful in finding ways to remedy the loopholes in other jurisdictions. Despite various principles of

[731] https://www.uscourts.gov/eductaional-resources/educational -activities/overview-rule-of-law
[732] https://www.history.com/topics/us-government/executive-order
[733] https://governmentexecutive branch.weebly.com/the-growth-of-presidential-power.html
[734] Justice Sotomayer's dissenting opinion in Wolf v Cook County , No.19-3169 (7th Cir.2020)

the rule of in various jurisdictions, Uganda is short of some principles such accountability among others which are helpful in any democratic society.

Uganda still has a long way to go to achieve rule of. However, doing so requires a collective effort. This involves boosting of political parties, effective social and economic development planning, recognition and acceptance where recommendations are made as well as institutional creation for cooperative promotion of rule of law which this can be best achieved with acknowledgment of the cause.

The inequities and injustices are systematic structural problem. The system to some extent is broken but it can heal. It is up to the people to work for the change, create the change and adopt the change. Not let the arms of government play ball with the system yet what they should be doing is uphold it.

People need people and the law needs people for it is created for the people. In other words, laws are made for the people otherwise, they would exist.

It is also necessary to educate the executive as to their roles and duties under law and of the public as to their rights vis a vis the administration.[735]

Poor and self-centered social, political and economic planning is one of the biggest democratic challenges we have not only in Uganda but also in the entire Africa. Leaders with political powers only give first priority to short-term strategies that would help keep them in political power other than looking at long term development aspects. Therefore, if some aspects of democratic constraints are to be solved, there has to be some kind of strategic planning and separation of powers. Thus the rule of law requires that all state and non-state actors to act and take decisions according to their legally defined responsibilities.

The point is, there should be respect of institutions in order to uphold the rule of law and its limits or the checks and balances in place to better mediate the nation or communities is the only way in which humankind, acting as principal global agents of care, will be able to ensure a sustainable future for human and non- human constituents of the nation. Correspondingly, the economy streamlining with health, security, infrastructural development among others must also come to reflect those imperatives.

Carry out thorough investigations over suspected incidences or allegations over state officials.

Refrain from punishing those that voice or express their opinions such as political ideologies. Through involving its self in judicial decisions.

[735]Corder , supra note 106, at 108

Establish a tribunal or commission to inquire into the systematic threat to the rule of law since there is likelihood that this is structural problem among institutions and entities.

Have both the executive order and legislation subject to an independent judiciary for review to check on their validity constitutionally.

Alexander Hamilton noted that wherever, two or more persons are engaged in any common enterprise or pursuit, there is always danger of difference of opinion, and there is personal emulation or animosity and it matters not, whether the officers involved bear the equal dignity and authority. The writer argues that in presence of such, there is always a likelihood loss of respectability, weakened authority hence frustrate the measures of government critical in emergencies of a state.

He further argues that this can cause divisionism in the state and in not at all peaceful factions thus such a state is subject to pending doom such as violate demonstration from protestors as was the case in during Trump's prudential term in USA.[736]

Though the governance in each country may differ to a small or large extent both in contextual or procedural format or on any other basis thus it is difficult to compare success stories from one state to another in order to derive a favorable conclusion as implementation of one policy from one state to work favorably if implemented in another state as to mechanisms and the rule of law principles. However, this is no excuse for the failure to observe the rule of on basis of the legislations in order to create a workable environment between the governed and the officials in Uganda.

The rule of law does exist in Uganda though its abuse by the executive is more pronounced drawing from the absence of separation of powers which is highly recommended among the three arms of government that is the executive, legislature and the judiciary in order to salvage the performance of these institutions and promote the rule of law in Uganda.

Judicial parties should adopt internal democratic structures.

Provide proportional system on the basis of merit for contenders to ensure candidates will be elected including through such mechanisms such as zippard lists and voluntary quotas

In majority systems establish voluntary targets or quotas to ensure a specified minimum number of citizens or nationals put forward as candidates.

Provide support and resources for the daily running of services

Government actors should ensure political party laws and any other legislations relating to elections. Do not indirectly disadvantage the nationals.

[736] https://www.khanacademy.org/humanities/ap-us-governmnet-and-politics/resurces-and-exam-preparation/required-documents-and-cases/a/fedralist-no-70

CHAPTER EIGHT

' All power corrupts. Total power corrupts absolutely '. And the trouble about it is that an official who is the possessor of power often does not realise when he is abusing it. Its influence is so insidious that he may believe that he is acting for the public good when, in truth, all he is doing is to assert his own brief authority. The Jack-in-office never realises that he is being a little tyrant.

Lord Denning[737]

EXECUTIVE OVERREACHES.

Properly exercised the new powers of the executive lead to the Welfare State: but abused they lead to the totalitarian State. None such must ever be allowed in this country. We have in our time to deal with changes which are of equal constitutional significance to those which took place years ago. Let us prove ourselves equal to the challenge.

ABUSE AND STANDARD OF PRESIDENTIAL POWERS

In my opinion, abuse of presidential power and the standard of presidential power, the latter illuminates the pathway for the former. That the standard of presidential power is a very determinant factor in the abuse of the same power. This follows mode of acquisition of these powers, limits attached to them and the assumed attachment or popularly, entitlement to the power. Except for president Muteesa II, who by the way had more attachment to the presidency being of the caliber of the Kabaka and whose station had been fronted since the inception of governance in Uganda, didn't cling or arbitrarily enforce his entitlement. The rear of the next presidents in their chronological order held (griped) Uganda in full embrace as their born child 'omwana we ntumbwe', also known as paternal politics: owing to whatever he is and that which he is to become as a personal chattel. They embraced presidency not the benefit of Ugandans but to a specific interest upheld by a specific faction. Presidential power in other words, was and still is like a pyramid which has only spot for one person (that is) taking precedence over all below, but the dramatic beauty of the Ugandan pyramid, is whoever gets there, holds a long electric stick tipping off from a distance whoever tries to get nearer this power. By this use of direct force presidential power in its very essence has a staleness / stagnation in its exercise. To an extent that whatever is drown from it is either illegal or unreasonable. By virtue of enforcing personal interests at the extent of the whole. With that William Faulkner rightly stated that "the past is never dead it is not even past" [738] . and it moves with our shadow.

[737] Freedom Under The Law, Stevens & Sons Limited, p. 100

The unrestrained power can be a concern and potential threat to the liberty of the people. "the reigns of good princes have been always most dangerous to the liberties of their people. For when their successors managing the government with different thoughts, would draw the actions of these good rulers into precedent and make from them the standard of their prerogative, as if what had been done only for the good of the people was a right in them to do, for the harm of the people if they so pleased. It has occasioned context and sometimes public disorders before the people would recover their original rights and got that to be declared not to be prerogative which truly was never so" [739]Thus meaning that the mandate of a president should not be enjoyed at the expense of the people. And even when there is a presidential prerogative, it should be in line with the law.

Enhancing the argument that the foundation of Ugandans political structure and the inked material of the Uganda art piece of the colonial master is strongly erected and to some degree permanently drawn. It also commonly goes that the apple doesn't fall away from the tree. The arbitrariness and entitlement that played out in the 1900s shares table with these 2000s era. Politics and history are a single subject of study, the present-day political life of a nation, its ideology, institutions, social relationships, leadership and uses of power is direct product of its historical experience.[740]

The standard of power in the colonial period was by a superior hand delegated to another superior hand. It was to the whims and discretion of his majesty the king of England. It was based on the bible expression of 'let there be' and there was. Being a king equated to the supreme capacity, the Establishment of powers were determinant by the king's person. The 1900 BA, the king gave himself all economic and no administrative Powers in Buganda, controlled the economy through Articles 2, 4, 6, 12 and 15. Which in essence granted him power over Buganda's taxes pooled to the protectorate government, having direct control over the activities of the Kabaka of Buganda and controlling land which was an economic tool. [741]So the nature of these powers, their standards which had no limitation per se, one wouldn't be surprised at the nature of their abuse. Under the agreement of Buganda 1900 "…on the death of a Kabaka, his successor shall be elected by a majority of voters in the Lukiiko or native council." [742] later in the 1950s when the Kabaka refused to comply with the desire of sir Andrew Cohen formation of a unitary state and or, confederation of east Africa. Though Kabaka

[738] William Cuthbert Faulkner 'requiem for a nun'
[739] John Locke, second treatise on government chapter 14-15: of prerogative and of paternal political, and despotical (treated together)
[740] Stephen F Cohen in his book rethinking the soviet experience, politics and history, 1917.
[741] Art 6 and 15 of the Buganda Agreement 1900
[742] Art 6 Buganda Agreement 1900

not dead, the colonial government moved to replace him. Further still under the same Article, since the Kabaka lived at the mercy of the British government, his powers were stripped away and exiled for not following the British directive leading to the 1953 to 1955 Kabaka crisis in Uganda. With all purposes and intents, the nature and standard of powers in all agreements 1900 and 1955 Buganda Agreements, 1901, 1900, 1933 Ankole, Toro and Bunyoro agreements, 1902 and 1920 OIC enforced and maintained control by his majesty and with this, implicitly, these powers could be abused or simply sidelined to advance colonial rule.

PRESIDENTIAL ABUSES UNDER THE 1962 CONSTITUTION

Section 30(1) of the Constitution of 1962 granted power to the President by proclamation to declare a state of public emergency subject to the approval and extension of Parliament under Subsections 2 and 3 of the same provision. The seizure of Presidential power by the then Prime Minister Apollo Milton Obote as discussed before meant that this discretion naturally fell to him and it was a discretion he exercised so liberally considering the fact that he essentially controlled Parliament as well noting that the Uganda People's Congress held the majority seats in the House and these Members of Parliament were so beholden to him that Uganda was ruled by, in Prof. Kanyeihamba's words, "a de facto rather than a de jure government."[743]

Following the suspension of the Constitution of 1962 on the 24th of February 1966, and the enactment of the "new" Constitution, the Constitution of 1966 on the 15th of April 1966 the Obote Government evoked this prerogative and declared a state of emergency in Buganda and with this came the enactment of The Emergency Powers Regulations, 1966 that were premised on the Emergency Powers Act, 1963 which essentially broke the limits of executive power with the broad discretion it granted to the President which he then utilized to the very utmost to curtail dissent and establish compliance.

I wish to break off here and discuss in general the province of the emergency powers of the President in republics. Alexander Hamilton, one of the Founding Fathers of the United States of America and principal drafters of the American Constitution, 1787 logically set out the underpinnings of the principally overly broad discretionary emergency powers of the President in Issue No. XXIII of the Federalist Papers: he remarked, "This power… is one of those truths, which, to a correct and unprejudiced mind, carries its own evidence along with it; and may be obscured, but cannot be made plainer by argument or reasoning. It rests upon axioms, as simple as they are universal-the means ought to be proportioned to the end; the persons from whose agency the attainment of any end is expected, ought to possess the means by which it is to be attained."[744] Hamilton in this case was speaking of exceptional circumstances when it would be necessary though undesirable to unshackle the executive branch and permit it to act against an existential threat whether it is that the threat is external or internal. In this respect I the words of Hamilton apply, "The principal purposes to be answered by union, are these: The common defence of the members; the preservation of the public peace, as well against internal convulsions as external attacks…"[745] and considering that the President embodies the will of the people and that it is his or her responsibility to ensure the wellbeing of his people by the preservation of national security with the guidance of national interests.

[743] Ibid

Counter arguments might be raised against this notion of a loosely bound executive and in the circumstances they might be right if he narrows our gaze to the potentially pugnacious effect such broad discretion could have on the rights and liberties the individual. To respond to these claims shrouded in skepticism we must look closely at how these circumstances come about. It is to Rousseau that we must look to for an answer. Rousseau, in his great work, The Social Contract, pointed out with fair emphasis that men cannot be said to be ruled unless they themselves give themselves to the king (ruler)[746]; if we speak in contemporary terms, this giving up of oneself and one's will can best be referenced in terms of elections. To Rousseau, before we consider any giving of rights, we must consider the formation of the people first. In any civil cause, what brings men together is an arrangement or agreement of some sort; a contract so to speak and social matters the case does not differ. The general clause of this "social contract" by which all men of the society are bound reads, "Each of us puts his person and all his power in common under the supreme direction of the general will, and, in our corporate capacity, we receive each member as an indivisible part of the whole"[747] and the reason they enter such a contract is that they may be able to overcome those obstacles that exist in nature and impede the existence of men in nature. Upon coming together, the collective body of men ceases to be individual on a personal basis but rather becomes a body politic of the people, a Sovereign; a State. This Sovereign has as its solemn duty to preserve the freedom of the individuals that constitute it and ensure his wellbeing in the state of nature. Should we then presume that men inherently possess herd-like mentality so as to sheepishly follow the will of the Sovereign without reservation? Naturally, we respond in the negative and proceed in Rousseau's words, "In fact, each individual, as a man, may have a particular will contrary or

[744] A. Hamilton, J. Jay & J. Madison, The Federalist: A Commentary on the Constitution of the United States (The Independent Journal, 1787) 196
[745] Ibid at pg. 195
[746] J.J. Rousseau, The Social Contract (.M. Dent and Sons, 1923) 10
[747] Ibid at pg. 11

dissimilar to the general will which he has as a citizen. His particular interest may speak to him quite differently from the common interest…In order then that the social compact may not be an empty formula, it tacitly includes the undertaking, which alone can give force to the rest, that whoever refuses to obey the general will shall be compelled to do so by the whole body. This means nothing less than that he will be forced to be free; for this is the condition which, by giving each citizen to his country, secures him against all personal dependence."[748]

The subjection of personal impulses, opinions, inclinations, purposes and beliefs of the individual by the State, by the community to which he belongs is something of a fact of life and just as he has rights against the State, he, in equal measure has duties not just to the State. If he consents to give his liberties and rights to a Sovereign, just as all other men have done then the will of the individual must serve the general will of the people and the State knows nothing but that which exists in the contract between men. As I have mentioned before, the purpose of the emergency powers of the President is grant him such power and discretion as would be necessary in the circumstances to deal with an existential threat that would imperil the general welfare of the people. In such a case, where the executive acts in favor of the whole, he must not be unduly hindered by judicial review or congressional authority.[749]

Having justified, at least philosophically, the necessity of holding a constitutional principle that both in intent and in practice has an adverse effect our fundamental rights and liberties I suggest that we return to the key question holding us here. We might be tempted to think why it is that we give the executive such extraordinary power in the first place such that law falls into the realm of the whims and fancies of essentially a single person without setting in place an entity to whom government is effectively accountable.[750] Hamilton replies in response to this in the following terms, "Whether there ought to be a federal government entrusted with the care of the common defence, is a question, in the first instance, open to discussion; but the moment it is decided in the affirmative, it will follow, that, that government ought to be clothed with all the powers requisite to the complete execution of its trust."[751]

---

[748] Ibid at pages. 13-14

[749] J.L. Friedman, Emergency Powers of the Executive: The President's Authority When All Hell Breaks Loose (2009) Journal of Law and Health, Vol. 25:265, 268

[750] If we go by the provisions of the Constitution of 1962, Parliament role in the event that a state of emergency was declared was limited to approving (under Section 30(2)), extending (under Section 30(3)) and revoking the state of emergency (under Section 30(4)); in no place or instance did Parliament have power to inquire into how these executive went about its discretion during the existence of the state of emergency. To a reader considering these provisions within the conditions of the modern times, these powers might seem sufficient enough to enable the National Assembly contain the executive during the time the state of emergency subsists. Such thinking would be erroneous because at the time the ruling Uganda People's Congress held the majority in Parliament so essentially the government was not accountable to anyone whatsoever

[751] Supra [no.19] (196)

Besides, "Who so likely to make suitable provisions for the public defence, as that body to which the guardianship of the public safety is confided? Which, as the centre of information, will best understand the extent and urgency of the dangers that threaten; as the representative of the WHOLE, will feel itself most deeply interested in the preservation of every part; which, from the responsibility implied in the duty assigned to it, will be most sensibly impressed with the necessity of proper exertions; and which, by the extension of its authority throughout the states, can alone establish uniformity and concert in the plans and measures, by which the common safety is to be secured?"[752]

This mentioned, I wish to state here and now that when we are consider setting limits to the emergency powers of the President then two circumstances must be borne in mind; the President will not legitimately be entitled to the ordinarily broad discretionary power that he customarily possesses during a state of emergency if the present risk or threat can be reduced into determined in definite terms or a definite scale so as to render the grant of absolutely discretionary powers unnecessary in the circumstances. Such determination can naturally solely be made by the Parliament after, as it can be reasonably presumed, the state of emergency is declared by the President.

That mentioned, pray to return to my discussion on the essence of emergency powers. When we speak of emergency powers we can safely conclude, from my discussion on the same above, that this is an expansion of the powers of the executive. But under what circumstances are the powers of the executive expanded legitimately, the constitutional law scholar asks, if we are speaking in terms of a republic? I respond to this query by making reference to the dictum of Justice Felix Frankfurter in Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v Sawyer.[753] In that case, the Justice impliedly laid out a three pronged test to determine the legitimacy of the expansion of executive power: he dictated that the exercise of this unique executive power must be, "a systematic, unbroken, executive practice, long pursued to the knowledge of the Congress and never before questioned, engaged in by Presidents...may be treated as a gloss on executive power vested in the President."[754] If we break this down into its relevant components relevant to my discussion we will come up with a division no clearer than that given by Joshua L. Friedman; he mentioned, that "First, the Executive's practice must be systematic, unbroken, and long pursued. Second, Congress must knowingly acquiesce to the practice. Third, the Executive may not violate any unambiguous constitutional commands or statutes."[755] It is this test that will assiduously follow in my discussion here; at least in as far as Uganda is concerned

[752] Supra [no.19] (198)
[753]343 U.S. 579 (1952)
[754]Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v Sawyer343 U.S. 579 (1952)
[755] Supra [no.21] at pg. 279

THE CREATION OF KARAMOJA AND THE KARAMOJA EXTRADITION LAW: BASIS TO EXILE UNDESIRABLES BY THE EXECUTIVE. (THE FRONTIER OF STATE LAW'S EMPIRE)

Shortly after leaving the Nile's source at Lake Victoria, Speke ran headlong into a war raging across the river. He made a long detour westward before meeting up with the river further downstream. Had he gone far to the east instead, Speke might have come to the edge of a dry savannah stretching towards the Great Rift Valley. Instead, his map shows a large empty space east of the "Asua" (Achwa) river with the “Galla tribes" beyond. Later British explorers would name this empty space on map Karamoja, after its most populous people, the Karamojong.[756]The only hints of other outsiders were muskets traded with Arabs for ivory and hides.[757]

In "tribal" regions outside the four kingdoms, the British ruled indirectly through Tamukedde was more concerned about soldiers from neighbouring Zaire who raided across the western border in violation of "Uganda territorial integrity." These soldiers, however, were chasing Bakonzo relations rebelling against President Mobutu's regime far to the west. Tamukedde and Mobutu's soldiers were both chasing the rebels that lived in the Ruwenzori range bifurcated by the Uganda-Zaire international border.

European administrative officers supervising a native court that applied customary law.[758] But Karamojong was an exception to even this decentralized system of governance. Uganda's first Governor, Sir Hesketh Bell, described the Karamojong in 1910 as, "so 'primitive' that they would provide more interest to the anthropologist than to the administrator"[759] and another official feared he could "do little to stop [their] Ancient Customs".[760] And indeed the British largely ignored the desiccated lands northeast of Kampala until they set up a bare-bones military administration in 1911. The District Commissioner's main duty was to protect the Karamojong from raids by neighbouring Turkana and Ethiopians, and prevent internal fighting. To accomplish this, he had a small detachment of King's African Rifles and a few European officers. The Commissioner appointed chiefs among the various groups he happened across in Karamoja. Chiefs were given limited tasks, mainly collecting firearms and maintaining a ready pool of labour for government [756]The"Karamojong"inactuallyacatch-all for the various communities living in the Karamoja plains. While this brief analysis treats them as a single people, theyarein factaconstantly adapting collective: see Ben Knighton, The Vitality of Karamojong Religion:Dying TraditionorLivingFaith?(Burlington:Ashgate,2005) at25.

[757] Ben Knighton,"The State as Raider among the Karamojong: 'Where There AreNo Guns,They Use the Threat of Guns'"(2003)73Africa: J.Int'lAfr.Institute427.

[758].F. Morris,"TwoEarlySurveysofNativeCourtsinUganda"(1967)11J.Afr.L.159.

[759]Cited in Sathya murthy, supra at270.

[760]Cited in Sathya murthy, supra at270.

projects like road or fort building.[761]

When the colonial government introduced the Buganda model, the Karamojong resisted by ignoring it and ostracizing its co-opted chiefs. This model failed completely in 1918 and three years later the British decided to reintroduce a civilian administration in Karamoja. Chiefs now had expanded powers to collect taxes, keep public records, hold regular meetings, arrest offenders and impose punishments in new native courts, and control cattle movements.[762] These new chiefly powers, however, rested not on any pre- existing Karamojong social relations, "but on the strength of the alien government".[763] This foreign system backed by force would prove a most unstable compound.

At the onset of the dry season in 1923, the elders of a Karamojong settlement decided that it was time to move the cattle herds to dry season pastures. [764] This decision directly contradicted a government order that no more than half the men may leave at any time-thus ensuring a year-round labour pool. Achia, a local chief, heard people were driving their cattle out onto the plain and rushed to intervene. He and his policemen intercepted some herds and drove them back to his compound. At least two elders then called for his death so that "everyone can herd his stock where he likes."[765]

Shortly after this meeting, Achia ran headlong into an armed group gathered to recapture their cattle and was speared to death by young men.

The government quickly captured and executed three alleged murderers and also seized cattle from their settlement as a collective punishment. But the lesson was not lost on Sir Geoffrey Archer, then Governor, who decided to leave the Karamojong "to their own customs, as far as possible, and under their own chiefs." And so an uneasy status quo developed with the government-appointed chiefs limited to collecting firearms and arresting murder suspects for trial in native (and later magistrates and High) courts. In all other matters, the Karamojong governed themselves.[766]

Karamoja is the only district in Uganda where the hierarchical Buganda model failed completely. This is due to two interrelated reasons: the acephalous nature of Karamojong society, and widespread, deliberate illiteracy. In the 1920s elders buried pens and paper in a ceremonial rejection of colonial and missionary education.[767] By the late 1950s, a paltry three per cent of

[761] Knighton2003, supra.
[762] James Barber, Imperial Frontier: A Stutfy of&lations Between the British and the Pastoral Tribes of North East Uganda (Nairobi: East African Publishing House, 1968) at 143-45.
[763] Id.
[764] Id.
[765] Id
[766] Sathyamurthy, supra at 345.
[767] MustafaMirzeler&CrawfordYoung,"Pastoral Politics in the North east Periphery in Uganda: AK-47as Agent of Change"(2000)38]. Modern Afr.Studies407at414.

children attended school because elders "continued to fear and loath" an education that threatened their society's continuity and security.[768] Only 1 of 281 students at Makerere University in 1959-60 was Karamoja.[769] Those few who completed their studies were invariably employed as chiefs, clerks or police for the government. The mission educated were spoken of as "no longer Karamojong" and generally distrusted. While they retained some grazing rights, they chose to enforce those rights in native courts rather than have elders hear the dispute. [770]Literacy entailed exclusion from the politics, if not the benefits, of Karamojong society. By so insulating themselves against written commands, their orality was able to deflect (total) penetration by the literary bureaucratic state".[771]

Karamojong society was patriarchal, but not hierarchical like other groups discussed above. Instead there were age-groups to which each male member belonged (or potentially belonged) and which dominated social relations.[772] Senior age-groups initiated boys into an age-group with their peers in an elaborate ceremony that, among other things, reinforced their subordinate position to the elder age-groups. As each new age-group was created every five or seven years, the older age-groups retired or died off. The eldest age-group retained certain privileges and directed their community's policies. It was the younger age-groups who implemented the elders' decisions against individual Karamojong or outsiders like Achia's spearing. Thus Karamojong society was not "tribal" in the sense of a blood-related, or genetically closed, group. Age-group names were common to all Karamojong. So when strangers met up on their long wanderings in search of fresh pasture, their age-group membership provided a ready-made set of social relations to prevent disputes. In such nomadic groups, the members of the eldest age- group present had unquestioned authority to organize relative strangers for a common purpose, like raiding a nearby foreigner for cattle.

This authority was created and recreated in the performance of prayer led by elder age-group members. In the akiriket, a politico-religious assembly, elders in the senior age-group often led a series of call-and-answer prayers for rains to water the dusty plains.[773]Elders also cursed enemies - both within and without- who threatened them or, more importantly, their cattle. Thus members of senior age-groups might settle disputes and uphold rights, but only if the parties chose to make it a public dispute (ebura).[774] But elders had no "traditional" right to settle disputes similar to those of a Baganda chiefs like Tamukedde.

---

[768] Sathyamurthy, *supra*at487-88.
[769]Mirzeler&Crawford, *supra at*414.
[770]Mirzeler&Crawford, supra at414.
[771] Neville Dyson-Hudson, Karimojong Politics (Oxford:ClarendonPress,1966)at208.
[772]Knighton 2003, supra at149.
[773] For anextendedexpositionofthiscomplexage-based system, seeDyson-Hudson, *supra at*155-206.
[774] Dyson-Hudson, *supra*at217.

If an ebura came forward, the guilty party beseeched elders in a stylized act in front of the akiriket. Instead of relying on written legal texts, mnemonic devices captured just relations and sanctions for their violation.[775] He offered beer or a slaughtered animal to an individual elder or sacrificed an ox for many elders to amend for more serious offences.[776] In the ebura, all males listened to the disputants and anyone else who wished to ask questions or offer an opinion.[777] But it was the elders' job to "cut the matter" and decide the punishment. If this decision was ignored, the elders may ask some young men to gather up the requisite cattle from, or even beat, the offender. Unlike with the Ruwenzururu, it is (male) elders, not (male and female) children, whose oral performance maintains their society's norms. For the Karamojong, orality is an exoskeleton of performance that both forms a unified society of individuals and protects them from outside incursions of violence or written laws.

Despite their Laissez faire approach, the British government made sure native courts tried all serious criminal offences, especially homicide. Magistrates' courts had taken over this burden by the late 1950s, although not much changed in practice.[778] Government-appointed chiefs arrested suspects in violent crimes for trial in the courts and punished guilty men with jail or hanging. Before government interventions, a blood (not age-group) relative of the deceased often either killed the supposed murderer or seized his cattle as compensation. [779] Wherever and whenever chiefs could be avoided, Karamojong continued this practice. Elders in the senior age-groups again played an important role in deciding how much cattle was enough to satisfy the original wrong.

Colonial criminal law banned cattle payment determined by elders as compensation for murder, and thus attacked the elders' central role in arbitrating disputes. This slowly eroded the elders' hold over the younger age-groups and hardened their resolve to resist it and other corrosive influences, like a missionary education. [780] Indeed, unlike elsewhere in Uganda, the Protestant and Catholic missionaries had made little headway into Karamojong by 1960s.[781] The resilient bonds of orality held Karamojong society together despite colonial attempts to "settle" these cattle-loving people.

From the perspective of Kampala in the 1960s, the Karamoja plain was still the frontier of state law's empire. Two reports from 1961 captured the perspectives of the departing British and arriving

[775]Walter J. Ong, *Orality and Literary: The Technologing of the Word,*2nded. (New York: Routledge,2002) at 34.
[776] Dyson-Hudson, *supra*at182-3.
[777]Id.
[778]Id
[779]Cattle as compensation does not reflecton the worth of human life, as many British administrators thought. Tamukede, for example, found"men had no respect for human own tribes or clans."This is not quite accurate, however, since it fails to recognize the centrality of cattlein*everything.* As one Karimojong put it,"[a]Karimojongloveshis cattle above all other things, and forthese cattle he will give his life."SeeTamukedde, *supraat*65; Dyson-Hudson, supra at102.
[780]Knighton2006, *supra at*149.
[781] Sathya murthy, supra at487

Ugandan elite. Lord Munster chaired a commission that found "[t]here can be no more vivid contrast in Uganda than that between the lives of ... people in Karamoja and those ... in the rest of the country." Karamoja, it concluded, "has still to be pacified.[782]

The Bataringaya Commission, composed exclusively of Africans, came to the even harsher conclusion that the new Ugandan government should make, a general 'showing of the flag' in order to recover the lost prestige of the Government ... The aim should be to strike a 'holy terror' among the people and show them that the Government has enough 'warriors' to combat with their own and that they can reach any part of the district if and when the need arises.

A Karamojong is a warrior and respects only a warrior of equal or superior prowess.[783] A half-century after Britain's failed military rule over Karamoja, the Bataringaya Commission recommended a return to "a miniature governor and commander-in-chief" to enforce law through violence. The Karamojong's resilient orality was again taken for sullen savagery by the state.

Invoking "holy terror" was a sign of the weakened laws radiating from Obote's capital in Kampala. His government responded with the Administration (Karamoja) Act, 1963, which created the military administrator recommended in the Bataringaya report.[784]Tamukedde, the gombolola chief, was appointed and immediately set out to control what he saw as a "most backward area.[785] First, he applied his newly acquired sociological and anthropological training from the East African Institute of Social Research at Makerere University in Kampala. Responsible for 10,000 square miles of "semi-desert full of wild animals," Tamukedde meticulously considered "the traditions and customs of the people concerned, the approach to implement the new policies and the reactions of the people.[786] Like the co-opted Karamojong chiefs before him, he found it "very difficult, if not impossible" to convict murderers despite their celebratory scarifications. Even when he had a special act passed suspending cumbersome English criminal procedure, he could not convict since "no-one ever gave evidence against his tribesmen." Tamukedde overcame his procedural dilemmas by waging a charm offensive against elders and withholding food that some Karamojong had come to rely on during the dry season. While the government did build schools, hospitals, water supplies and better roads, the threat of withheld food and armed force were the ever-present shadow of his policies.

Tamukedde's position as military administrator imposed alien written rules on a resistant people

---

[782]Uganda Government, Report of the Uganda Relationship (Munster)Commission (Entebbe: Government Press, 1961) at157, cited in Barber, supra at 214 & 218.

[783]Uganda Government, fu port of the Karamoja(Bataringqya) Commission (Entebbe: Government Press,1961)at16,cited in Barber,supra at 220 united in orality. Karamojong oral laws were incorruptibly egocentric and proved more resistant than any other laws surveyed above to the bureaucratic and often violent spread of state law from Kampala. For the Karamojong, written rules were literally alien. They even called government servants arisen (meaning "people to avoid") because wherever they appeared cattle were destroyed.[787]Government servants were thus those people who "eat cattle" since they did not grasp, nor had sympathy for, their cattle-centric pastoral society. Even Tamukedde, despite a methodical study of his charges, insisted on imposing a Buganda-style system relying on a hierarchy of chiefs that failed so dramatically when tried for a second time in 1923.[788] Yet his actions exacerbated a bloody maelstrom of raid, counter-raid and army punitive raid in Karamoja: in 1966 alone there were 740 raids![789]In Karamoja, state law had again become no more than a commissioner's command, backed by the King's African Rifles, uttered into the desert.

[784]No.17of1963.

[785]Tamukedde, supra.

[786]Id.

The writ of law emanating from Kampala failed to penetrate the Karamojong orality so unlike any other law analysed above. This extreme pitted the "deeply interiorised literacy" of Kampalan administrators and the "oral states of consciousness" of the Karamojong. [790] In a geocentric projection, the vast dry lands northeast of the capital were lawless and invited rules and ordering by the state. But switching the map to an egocentric projection revealed a thick orality weaving its many communities together as a coherent collective. The Karamojong were the best example of how mutual incomprehensibility in rule-following behaviour bubbles up from the bedrock of forms of life. It seemed that understanding was only reached between the cattle-loving people and the state at the spear-point or rifle muzzle.

THE KARAMOJA QUESTION

After his coup an ebullient Amin decided to literally clothe the Karamojong in modesty and decreed that all Karamojong must wear clothes in public. To press home his point, he gathered together people near Moroto, an eastern district capital, and divided them into two groups-clothed and unclothed. He then ordered his soldiers to gun down the naked. Amin's arbitrary massacre was a horrific, if not altogether new, reaction by the government to Karamojong stubbornness. Yet neither Bataringaya's plan to dispense "holy terror," nor Amin's actual terror had a lasting impact on these people. As Amin's regime deteriorated into a civil war, the government in distant Kampala forgot Karamoja.

While the government's gaze was distracted, major changes overtook orality in Karamojong

[787]SeeDyson-Hudson, supra at 228&236.
[788]Tamukedde, supra at 67
[789] Dyson-Hudson, supra at 434.
[790] Dyson-Hudson, supra at 434.

communities. Since the late 1980s, guns flooded the Great Lakes. When Museveni's NRA defeated the UPDA in 1986-7, Karamojong raided the latter's abandoned outposts for weapons. Yet more guns came on the black market as Mengistu's regime collapsed in Ethiopia, the Sudanese government started arming the Lord's Resistance Army, and chaos engulfed the region during the Rwandan and Congolese wars in the mid-1990s. By 1998 the Ugandan government estimated the Karamajong had between 30- and 40,000 AK-47s for less than a million people. This deluge of cheap, deadly firearms succeeded where the government had failed in undermining the Karamojong's oral society.

With the NRM firmly in place in Kampala, Museveni turned his attention to Karamoja in 1994. A first, the government tried to make up for the region's "underdevelopment" after a long period of neglect. Government administrators introduced new crops and paid people a yearly reward for licensing their firearms. They also tried to curb cattle grazing to avoid the periodic droughts exacerbated by overgrazing. But drought did come and the Karamojong responded, as in the past, by raiding their neighbours for cattle. Their favourite target was their neighbours, the Acholi, who saw their cattle herds reduced from 300,000 in 1985 to 5,000 in 1997.359 In response, the government began a twin campaign to rebuild its governance infrastructure and disarm a people flush with guns.

The central government based their development plan on the five-level local government system (re)introduced in the 1997 Local Governments Act. But like their predecessors, the LCs only had a "phantomal presence" in Karamoja. Government agriculture and cattle schemes have also had little success. Moreover, there was barely any judicial infrastructure in the region. Karamoja has no High Court, and some district UPDF claims that this is not a problem since the Karamojong had lost faith in civilian, courts and prefer military tribunals. Given the persistent resistance to the army, this claim is dubious. But the LCs failure was hardly surprising given the history of imported governance structures in Karamoja. If the government's failed governance was predictable, so was its violent response.

In 2001 and again in 2004, the UPDF staged major disarmament campaigns to dredge Karamoja of AK-47s. The projects worked well initially, as people exchanged guns for plows, rice and a certificate of thanks. But in 2001 when only 10,000 guns were collected, the army turned to more aggressive search-and-seizures. A Human Rights Watch report cited evidence of extra-judicial killings, torture, rape, pillage and arbitrary arrest by the UPDF. The Uganda Human Rights Commission also reported on serious atrocities by soldiers searching for guns. By 2007, the UPDF were the "major perpetrator of violence among the Karamojong."364 The violence reached such a pitch that one small group, the Jie, emigrated across the border into Kenya to escape Museveni's troops.

The UPDF in Karamoja, like in Acholi land, was limited only by the provisions of the UPDF Act. Yet these legal limits on the army's power were ephemeral. In a letter in the government newspaper, he admitted that many "cattle rustlers" were killed by the army, but warned the "days of playing with the UPDF and the security of the country are over. Bring back the guns and live a peaceful life; otherwise, you will go to jail or, even, die." 366 This was not an appeal to law and order by an elected leader, but a direct command of a sovereign backed by the threat of violence.

In the past, the Karamojong have weathered intrusions by the colonial and later Ugandan governments by an outward shell of illiteracy protecting their communities'

Their appeal to tradition revealed how far their authority had eroded. Karamojong had never had qualms about using muskets and rifles, but the elders seemed to reinvent the spear as an ideal weapon of old when confronted with the raw power available to young men with the countless AK-47s.

A few defeated elders resigned themselves to the new order and dug up the pens and paper buried decades past. In the 1990s, the first generation of children were sent to school to read and write. Cattle, the ultimate Karamojong prize, were now bartered for AK-47s. Even the institution of bride-price was not immune. Instead of cattle, money or beer, it became not uncommon to pay a girl's father in guns! The social repercussions were devastating. Beer, once the privilege of elders, was drunk by all, often, including children. Some have abandoned cattle-herding and settled in slums around administrative towns. And the violence continued unabated by young men and the UPDF.

Karamojong orality proved resilient however. By 2006 only 10 of the 22 per cent of Karamojong children enrolled in primary school would finish the year-Old taboos against writing still dominate. Boys in school were branded "cowards who were being "indoctrinated" against Karamojong orality. Girls attending school were also seen as tainted and commanded a lower bride price. The collapse of the Karamojong predicted by recent government and nongovernmental organizations seems premature. since the King's African Rifles marched in and set up a small fort in 1911, the government in Kampala has oscillated between imposing a hierarchical chieftainship under central control and outright violent repression. Over the last century neither succeeded. It is not surprising that no Karamojong challenged these alleged violations in court. The High Court does not stop here on its circuit and there is only a single magistrates' court for the entire region. Even if the courts were accessible, no Karamojong could develop the literary skills required without forsaking membership in orality. While the central government dismisses the Karamojong's practices as backwards savagery, their orality represents the ultimate challenge to the positivist writ emanating from the capital in Kampala.

THE RAPE OF THE TEMPLE OF JUSTICE

The first case to reach the High Court was a bail application by 14 of the PRA suspects on 16 November 2005. Justice Lugayizi declared before an open court that bail was a constitutional right and judges only had discretion over its conditions. At this point, heavily armed soldiers of the secret Joint Anti-Terrorism Team (a.k.a. "Black Mambas Urban Hit Squad") surrounded the court house to arrest the suspects if they were released on bail. After a tense standoff, the accused were sent back to the infamous Luzira prison. The next morning, they were charged with treason under the UPDF Act and transferred to the General Court Martial Justice Lugayizi then withdrew from the case, refusing to give any reasons for doing so. Judges, the Uganda Law Society, the Inspector General of Government and the Human Rights Commission all protested the storming of the court. That same day the Law Society immediately lodged a petition with the Constitutional Court on the constitutionality of the General Court Martial

On 23 November, the scheduled day of his bail hearing, Besigye was transferred to the General Court Martial on terrorism and weapons charges. Justice Ogoola granted him "interim bail" the next day in the High Court pending the Law Society's Constitutional Court petition. Prison officials refused to release Besigye, though, so his lawyers filled another Constitutional Court petition requesting bail from the GCM. On 2 December Justice Kasule ordered the Court Martial to stop hearing Besigye's case and then referred the matter to the Constitutional Court, but did not go so far as to order his release. Prison authorities also refused to let Besigye sign nomination papers until Dr. Rugunda, the Minister of Internal Affairs, intervened directly a few days before the deadline.

That same day Justice Kasule again declined to release Besigye on bail to campaign for the elections. But a week later the judge ordered the Commissioner General of Prisoners to appear to answer why Besigye had not been released on bail from the GCM. Besigye was finally released on bail on 2 January after an exasperated Justice Katutsi ordered his release yet again, saying he had been "in illegal detention [by the GCM). If sanity is to be regained the applicant must be given his freedom to be on bail". He then challenged the military court by writing "that the continued detention of the applicant at Luzira is illegal and unlawful. In the meantime, his co-accused, the PRA suspects went on trial at the High Court.

The Constitutional Court finally decided the Law Society's petition against the Black Mambas' court siege and the General Court Martial on 31 January 2006.350 In a three-to-two split ruling, the majority upheld the petitioners' central claim that trying the PRA suspects under civilian and military laws was unconstitutional. However, the Court did not agree that the military tribunals were themselves unconstitutional, nor was trying civilians in them necessarily a violation of their rights. Thus, although the majority ordered an end to the court martial case, it did not challenge the parallel military legal order in principle.

The decision infuriated Museveni, who replied that, "[t]he ruling of the Constitutional Court that the army can't try civilians with guns is something we can't agree with. He managed to stall the petitioners' appeal to the Supreme Court on other issues, as well as appeals from Tumushabe and other political cases by refusing to appoint new justices to the court that lacked a quorum since one justice died and another retired Besigye was free on bail, but early the next year the PRA suspects' trial started again at the General Court Martial. In March 2007 a judge ordered their release on bail and, in an exact repeat of the raid in November 2005, militiamen stormed the court. This time all judges and lawyers went on strike in protest. Museveni eventually apologized[791] and the judges went back to work, but the PRA suspects languish on in Luzira prison.[792]

Since Museveni came to power in 1986, the army has ruled much of northern Uganda. The NRA and then UPDF policed, arrested and tried civilians under the General Court Martial. In fact, constitutional challenges to this regime only began when it crept back from the peripheral northern districts to the capital in Kampala. As pressure for multiparty elections grew too strong, the NRM government tried to neutralize Besigye and the Forum for Democratic Change by branding them terrorists. This move was similar to Obote's arrest of Matovu and his Ganda chiefs under colonial laws originally established to quell budding Ugandan nationalists. Some judges, however, resisted the encroachment of a parallel military court structure by reinterpreting the constitutional right to bail. The continued ideology that defers to the executive explains part of the judges' reluctance to contradict the government.

The entire Besigye saga took place within the Kampala city limits and it was not until he challenged Museveni's hold on power that the courts looked at the constitutionality of the General Court Martial. For northerners in Acholi land and beyond, military rule continues as it hardens into a parallel state legal system outside the most basic human rights codified in the 1995 Constitutions. During the High Court's annual circuit to hear appeals throughout the country, it stops in seven cities: Maraca, Fort Portal, Masaka, Jinja, Mbale, Gulu and Nakawa. Half of these cities are in Buganda and all but one is in southern Uganda. Even if the court could overcome its ideological baggage and challenge the military courts trying civilians in a parallel legal system, its effective reach is limited to the capital and occasional forays into the southern hinterland. The relative strength opposition parties can muster against the government in the capital, Kampala, simply do not exist in the impoverished north under military rule. By not stepping beyond the black ink on the Uganda People's Defence Forces Act, the judiciary is complicit in legitimising a military dictatorship over half the Ugandan territory.

[791]'judges on Strike Over Court Siege "The Monitor (4March2007),online:allAfrica.com <http://allafrica.com/stories/200703040027.html>

[792]judgesAgreetoRe-openCourts–Museveni"TheMonitor(6March2007),online:allAfrica.com <http://allafrica.com/stories/200703060264.html>

RAPE OF THE TEMPLE (A POEM BY PRINCIPAL JUDGE JAMES OGOOLA)

I. From thin air they came, bedecked chameleon in black camouflage. Like a swarm of angry wasps, the Praetorian Guard descended on holy ground. Their ferocious gangs unfurled, their vicious sting darting-ready to strike warlike, they came: wearing the bellicose face of terror, the malevolent mask of horror.

Wild like, they charged: wielding awesome weapons of war: AK-17s cocked, ready to discharge the crackling cartridge: Uzi guns waving ominously in the air, ready to vomit their lethal venom.

II. With wrath and fury they came: their hapless prey to snatch. They laid siege to the fortress of justice. Like warmongers, they darted here and they darted there; their prey to seized and abduct. They turned the temple of serenity into a theatre of war.

They transformed the shrine of refuge, into a treacherous den of vipers! The prisoner on trial Seeking justice from the temple, they sought to pick and pluck from the very arms of the goddess of the temple.

III. The goddess, blindfolded and balancing the scales of justices in her hands stood still, holding her breath: stunned, horrified.

Gripped in grief and disbelief at the invaders' heretical effrontery.

The goddess is heard to lament in torment:

"It is abominable! This is sacrilege! To strip me this before my own family, To expose my nakedness before my own family;

To expose my nakedness before my own flock!

IV Like mystic monks in mourning, dressed in black gowns,

The temples scribes stand, distressed.

Their heads, begarted in grey wigs, they shake in anguish. From their numbed lips, a gasp of moaning issues forth;

Bewailing the disgrace! Bemoaning the debauchery!

Be crying the desecration!

V In the after math of the vile defilement of the goddess, the voice of one, a sage and a knight brave, from high priesthood of the temple, broke froth, shattering the still silence, in anguished rumination, in righteous rage, the shrill voice rang out; "The rape of the temple! What a day! a fateful day of woe! A day of infamy"!

VI Abruptly, the prophetic voice of poetic knight stirred up a torrent of popular protest, Fellow knights, the temple scribes, the zealots, the Pharisees, and the elders all from the learned fraternity and all kindred souls at home and abroad: joined and swelled the public protest.

They rose as one. As one they spoke in unity and in solidarity.

They demanded: Independence for temple, and for the shrine: Virginity the true bedrock and lynchpin of the divine trinity on which rests the vulnerable virtue of:

The reign of justice: the rule of justice: the rule of reason: and under the law, Equality.

VII Oblivious to the sanctity of the temple, Blind to the congregation's reverence for the purity of the temple, the serpentine reptiles plunge into a frenzied rampage. Obstinate, the swaggering warlords trample unholy boots on holy ground. With guns ready to rumble, they go on the Rambo.

VIII Straight for goddess they dash, into the inner sanctum of the shine, discarding all discretion to the four winds, they charge: menacingly, disgracefully they strip her like a harlot in a harem; Un shamefacedly, unfeelingly, they prostrate her like a common prostitute

IX There, in broad day light: there under the wide open skies with high heaven looking on the Black Mambas commit abominable iniquity, with abnormal impunity. There, in spite of the congregation of august assembly of visiting Ambassadors: learned Advocates; the accused: their Accomplices: the temple's own administrator; and the elect Members of the tribe's supreme council of meditation there, under the very eye of the high priest himself, duly seated on the Judgment seat, the black Mambas commit the vile deed: the abomination of desolation!

X Such unutterable trespass, such unrequited transgression had not been seen before not since the sacrilegious execution of the chief priest, Kiwanuka. He was snatched, hauled and carted away from this very shrine. Like a common thief, the infidels of the military ilk dragged him from the sanctum of the shrine, to the place of the skull, they led him. There, in the slaughter house, in the hall of the holocaust, they butchered and quartered him: A martyr for judicial independence!

XI In no other shrine: anywhere anytime was ever so callous a calamity committed? Not on this side of the equator; nor on the other. Not in the times: nor in earlier ones indeed, not since the Age of Enlightment the more the pity, to see horrifichistory repeated!

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIARY TESTED

The relationship between the Judiciary and the Executive was put to a litmus test in the case of Uganda V. Kiiza Besigye and others, in which a key opposition politician and a presidential candidate95 and others were charged inter alia with treason and misprision of treason. On 16th November, 2005 during the bail application and consideration of the suspects, the Executive deployed heavily armed military personnel at the High Court in anticipation of the release of the suspects on bail by the High Court. This was intended to re-arrest the suspects in the event of being lawfully released on bail, apparently in order to charge the same suspects in the General Court Martial.

This act of besieging the High Court did not augur well with the Judiciary. The chief Justice Benjamin Odoki and the Principal Judge James Ogoola condemned the act on separate occasion. The Principal Judge James Ogoola, called the act a "naked rape" defilement", desecration" and a horrendous on slaughter" on the Judiciary constituting "the most naked grotesque violation of the twin doctrines of the Rule of Law and the Independence of the Judiciary. He rightly construed that without doubt the "Rape of the Temple of Justice" is one such event in the judicial history of this country. To put it briefly, it is human to remember, purchase to block a repetition. In that regard Principal Judge composed some verses-poetry-to put on record the terrible events that befell the judiciary on that inauspicious day of November 16, 2005 and to commemorate the said Tragedy99. The "Poem" summarizes the events of the tragedy and the embarrassment and pain inflicted on the judiciary. It further indicates that such a tragedy has never occurred at any given time anywhere in the world since the Age of Enlighten and that was a total thunder to the concept of the rule of law.

The judges of the Supreme Court, the Court of Appeal and the High Court of Uganda held an extra-ordinary meeting on 16th December, 2005, under the chairmanship of His Lordship the Honorable Mr. Justice Benjamin Odoki, the Chief Justice of Uganda, during which they reviewed a number of events that threatened to undermine the independence of the judiciary and the Rule of Law in this Country. In particular, the judges considered circumstances and the impact of the 16th November, 2005, military siege of the High Court.

In their deliberations, the judges perceived the siege of the High Court to be the fiercest act of intimidation to the Ugandan judiciary since 1972, when the then Chief Justice Benedict Kiwanuka was abducted by armed men from his chambers at the High Court and satisfaction, the prompt and public statements that their Lordships, the Chief Justice of Uganda and the Principle Judge, made condemning the siege. They (Judges) unanimously endorsed and supported both statements and reiterated that the Rule of Law and Judicial Independence, which violation had a chilling impact on the administration of justice and ought to be unreservedly condemned by all.

The judges viewed the events in the context of the constitutional mandate of the Judiciary which is described in Article 126(1) of 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda and the doctrine of separation of powers of the Executive, Legislative and Judicial arms of Government which is enshrined in the Constitution, and the principle of Judicial Independence entrenched under Article 128 of the Further, the judges, recalled that the Ugandan Judiciary has at all time faithfully executed its constitutional mandate to uphold the said principle without fear or favor, despite intermittent acts of interference and intimidation particularly from the Executive arm of Government. Those acts of interference and intimidation have intensified since 2001, so the judge's perceived the 16th November siege of the High Court not as an isolated incident but as a culmination of a trend that threatened to whittle away judicial independence unless every effort was made to arrest the trend and uphold the concept of the rule of law.

In that connection the judges appreciated and commended the reactions of the Uganda Law Society, the East Africa Law Society, the Ugandan Judicial Offices Association, the Uganda Christian Joint Council, the International Commission of Jurists, and the other diverse organizations and institutions in Uganda, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, and above all the many individuals, all of whom has spoken out firmly in defense of Judicial Independence and condemned intimidation against the judiciary, and all forms of interference by the Executive arm and its organs and agencies in the administration of justice.

In conclusion, the judges resolved: -

To strongly condemn the deployment of military and other security personnel within court premises for interfering with judicial process and to resist all past present acts and conduct calculated to intimidate the Courts or otherwise to interfere with the proper administration of justice.

To call upon the Executive arm of Government to abide by its Constitutional obligation to uphold and promote principles of the Rule of Law and judicial independence and to accord to the Judiciary the assistance required for ensuring the effectiveness of the Courts and to restrain its organs and agencies. Interference with judicial process and harassment against the Court and perceiving the concept.

1) To urge Ugandan public to cherish and vigilantly defend the Independence of the judiciary, recognizing that it is a fundamental element of the Rule of Law and that the principle is not a privilege to or for the benefit of judicial personnel, but rather the guarantee of the people's right to have an impartial judiciary that ensures equality of all before the law and protects the human rights and fundamental freedoms enshrined in the Constitution.
2) To assure the Ugandan public that notwithstanding the past and present interference and intimidation, the judges will individually and collectively continue to adhere to and collectively continue to adhere to and uphold the principle of Judicial Independence and to administer justice impartially without fear or favor in accordance with the judicial oath and uphold the rule of law.

The statement by the Judiciary highlighted hereinabove drove the Executive into a paroxysm of rage, to the extent of accusing judges of supporting the opposition politician Dr. Kizzy Besigye and taking an antagonistic action against the Executive. This clearly manifested itself in the words of the Government Spokesman Dr. James Nsaba Buturo during a press briefing at president's office Nakasero.

"By supporting the position and actions of the Law societies the Judiciary is upholding its legal position on the case. These organizations have expressed political support for Dr. Besigye against the government ... The statement of the Judiciary is unprecedented. There is a case between government and the Uganda Law Society before the Courts of Law. The public advertisement is an antagonistic action. It is a commentary that reveals the Judiciary has taken ideas... In this case who will make a judgment?

It should be noted that earlier, the 800- strong Uganda Law Society (ULS) members had on the 28th November 2007 held a demonstration outside the High Court protesting against what they called the "deterioration of the Rule of Law" in the country and in condemnation of the 16th November Military siege of the High Court.

The Uganda Law Society petitioned the Constitutional Court, challenging inter alia, the invasion of the High Court military personnel. The petitioners, contended that the acts of the Anti-Terrorism Task Force (the infamous Black Mambas) were calculated to intimidate and inculcate fear in the minds of the judges and other judicial officers to induce them to be partial in their judgment and to feel dependent on the state (Executive) for their positions and as a warning that if they did not enter into judgment in their favor, they would be in danger and that the acts, were to compromise the Independence of the Judiciary in contravention of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda. Wherefore, the petitioners prayed to Court to make a declaration which will in effect restrain any further occurrence of these acts.

The constitutional Court held that the invasion of the High Court was illegal Justice Byamugisha J. A, held:

"It was in my view a threatening scenario that interfered with the normal operation of Court .... The military had no right whatsoever to interfere with the Independence of the Judiciary."

DCJ Leticia-Kikonyongo held that "…the execution of the surprise' deployment was not the best method. It appears it fostered fear and anxiety especially as the security personnel even went beyond their security intentioned limits and they entered the criminal registry and cells where it's alleged they interrupted the course of the court's normal duty of processing bail of the accused persons ... I find that on the 16th November 2005, the acts of the security agents at the High Court premises constituted, acts of security interference that contravened Articles 23(1) (2) and (3) of Constitution. This glaringly points to the political interference by the state in the exercise of the discretion by courts and thereby undermines their functions and this instituted a residue in the trend and passage for the concept of the rule of law to thrive in the pearl of Africa.

It follows therefore that the PRA suspects who were being detained then were being held illegally in contravention of their constitutional right to bail as granted by the court which went to depict the continued failure of the state to heed to the judiciary's sobriety on constitution and in promoting judicial independence in Uganda.

According to Justice Engwawu J.A in the same case, "the manner of invasion was deplorable and prejudicial to the independence of the judiciary"

In the same vein, the Constitutional Court declared the trial of Dr. Kiiza Besigye and 22 others before the Military General Court Martial unconstitutional and therefore illegal. It held thus:

" The General Court martial was established by an act of Parliament as a disciplinary organ to deal with the Uganda Peoples Defence Forces (UPDF) but not civilians103 who have committed offences of terrorism and illegal possession of fire arms".

Nevertheless, the military general court marital defied the constitutional court ruling and continued with the trail of the civilian's suspects. This came in the wake outburst by army general against the judiciary in reference to the ruling of the constitutional court. The coordinators of security services, General David Tinyefuza accused the judge of siding with wrong does instead of helping the state get rid of terrorism.

'why don't they want to help the state; why don't they see the problem of terrorism. Why are they always siding with offenders?

General Tinyefuza who is also a senior presidential advisor was on Wednesday, February 1st 2006 appearing on a live Radio talk show tonight with Andrew Mwenda live on 93.3 KFM, to discuss the implication of the constitution court ruling. The general who kept on referring to judge angrily as these fellows said the army respect the ruling of the court but that judge have no power to order the army. That the army will not accept "this business of being ordered by the judges". He further dismissed claims by the Principal judge, Justice James Ogoola that the army raped and defiled the Temple of Justice, calling it rubbish.

The defiance of the constitutional court by the General Court Martial prompted the media. "the Fourth Arm of the state" - to implore the Chief Justice to act swiftly to salvage the tattered image of the Judiciary that "was being continually pierced by an impudent Army Court at the behest of a belligerent Executive" Indeed, Justice John Bosco Katutsi withdrew from hearing the case of Uganda V Col (Rtd) Dr. Kiiza (supra), citing pressure and irresponsible talk' that he was favoring the FDC president. His lordship stated, it is my sincere wish that I step down from this case. The withdrawal came ten days after the coordinator of security agencies; General David Tinyefuza accused the judiciary of siding with 'terrorists' instead of helping the state to fight terror.

Before justice Katutsi's withdrawal, Justice Edmond Ssempa Lugayizi had withdrawn from the trial of the rape and treason cases involving Dr. Kiiza Besigye following the siege of the High Court by the 'Black mambasl06. This shows not only interference with the exercise and performance of judicial functions as well as judicial independence, but also entails an attempt by the security organ (of course under the control and direction of the executive) to direct how the judiciary should perform its functions. That is, they should heed to their whims and when they reach different conclusions, it means that they are not promoting justice.

This is an unfortunate state of affairs and greatly undermines the very purpose of having he judicial arm of government and its independence and this a total prophecy of doom in regard to concept of the rule of law in Uganda.

The interference of the executive in the affairs of the judiciary through the Military resurfaced on march, 20, 2007 when the High Court was in the process of ruling on the bail application of the suspects in the case of IGIZA Besigye and Others (supra). "Police" developed heavily at the High Court long before Eldad Mwangusha ruled on the matter. With ambiguity looming large and policemen getting on the ready outside Court, the state was set for scenes that almost replicated the events of November 16, 2005 High Court siege by a shadow Para-military group, the "Black Mambas" when 14 PRA suspects were granted bail only to be returned to prison because the siege made it impossible for them to walk to freedom.

This time round the Court ordered the release of the suspects on bail 1n accordance with the Court's earlier order of November, 16, 2005 and m obedience to the Constitutional Court decision ordering the release of the suspects on bail. As the Registrar was processing the documents, security personnel surrounded the Criminal Registry insisting that they had orders to return the suspects to prisons under any circumstances. Fights ensued between the security personnel and members of the public and in the process doors and other Court property were damaged.

Eventually six out of the nine suspects fulfilled bail conditions while three did not and were surrendered to prison authority by their counsel. However, the six were prevented from leaving on account of the heavy military deployment in the High court premises. In meantime, the Acting Chief Justice, Honorable Lady Justice Leticia Mukasa Kikonyogo, convened the top managers in the Judiciary in a crisis meeting, which was also attended by the DPP, the Regional Police Commander and Prisons personnel, to consider the developments. The meeting was informed by the officer in charge of eh Prisons that they had been directed by the Commissioner General of Prisons to take back the suspects.

As the situation deteriorated the Judiciary directed the security officer to remove all security personnel including their dogs from the Court premises. This directive was disobeyed and instead reinforcement was intensified with the apparent intention of storming the Registry to arrest the suspects. Violence escalated to the extent that a defense counsel was assaulted and sustained an open wound in the face.

The protracted negotiations continued with the Judiciary, security personnel and defense counsel with the agreement that security personnel and the public evacuate the High Court premises to enable the peaceful release of the suspects. Later at around 8:30pm (at night!!!) The suspects were finally handed over to their respective counsel in the middle of precincts of the High Court and counsel received them, threw them on the back of a police pick up and drove them while they yelled to unknown destination.

These extra-ordinary events prompted the Judiciary to convene an extra ordinary session of all judges of all courts of Judicature to consider the matter and resolved. To issue a comprehensive statement on this atrocious incident and unprecedented event; The executive gives assurances of the non-repetition of these repeated incidents of affront to the integrity and independence of the Judiciary. That all judicial offices of the rank of Chief Magistrates and above be convened at the High Court, Kampala to chart the way forward. It was further resolved that the above actions taken had nothing to do with the re-arrest or re-charging of the PRA suspects but because of the following: -

1) The repeated violation of the sanctity of the Court premise.
2) Disobedience of Court orders with impunity (by the Executive)
3) The constant threats and attacks on the safety and independence of the judiciary and judicial officers.
4) The savage violence exhibited by security personnel within the Court premises.
5) The total failure by all organs and agencies of the state to accord to Court assistance as required to ensure effectiveness of Courts under Article 128(3) of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda; The recognition that judicial power is derived from the people, to be exercised by the Courts on behalf of the people in conformity with the law, the values, norms and aspirations of the people of Uganda.

Subsequently for the first time in 44 years since Uganda's attainment of independence, the Judiciary laid down its tools over gross infringement on its independence by the Executive. During the course of the Judicial strike, the Honorable Justice Benjamin Odoki, the Deputy Chief Justice. The Honorable Lady Justice Leticia Kikonyogo and the Principle Judge the Honorable Justice James Ogoola met President Museveni on March, 6, 2007 in an attempt to resolve the standoff.

The Chief Justice also wrote a letter to the President dated 2, March, 2007 forwarding to him a copy of the resolutions of the Courts of Judicature. On 6th March, 2007, the Minister of Internal Affairs and the Attorney General regarding the matter 109. It was indicated that it was not the intention of the government (the Executive) to disrespect or defy the Court orders. Wherefore the government regretted the incident that occurred at the High Court on March, 1, 2007/

Further the government promised to carry out more investigations of the events to determine if there were any breaches of the law or procedure and to take appropriate action. The statement also added that the leadership of the three arms of government have met and agreed on what to do to prevent the recurrence of similar incidents in future.

Global human rights organizations also condemned the March, 1, 2007, armed siege of the High Court, saying the act was a blatant interference with the independence of the administration of the Judiciary. In a statement issued on 6th March by the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, it was pointed out that the government has a responsibility to fully respect and observe the independence of the Judiciary and to respect its obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) to which Uganda is a state party.

"The office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights unequivocally condemns the interference by armed security forces with the independence of the Judiciary contrary to the Constitution and International. Human Rights Principles which undermines the rule of law and administration of Justice in Uganda", the statement said.

In a related development, the US based Human Rights Watch (HRW) also called upon the government to stop intimidating the civilian courts saying the siege was a blatant violation of Article 128 of the 1995 Ugandan Constitution that provides for the independence of judiciary, Georgette Gagan, Deputy Director of Human Rights Watch (HRW) is reported to have said

"The Museveni government's attempt to intimidate the Courts shows its profound lack of respect of the law"

In the same vein, the International Commission of Jurists (ICJ) issued a statement on March 4th 2007 in which it called upon Ugandan authorities to respect the independence of judiciary by ceasing the intimidation of judges and Lawyers. The ICJ expressed deep concerns over the military deployment at the High Court, saying that this episode seriously undermines the rule of law and Constitutional Independence of the Judiciary.

It re-stated the ICCPR which obliges state parties to ensure that criminal trial is fair and to take place before independent and impartial courts, and that the UN Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary affirm this principle by emphasizing that there shall be no inappropriate interference with a Court Legal authority by the Executive branch and that judgments of Courts are not subject to revision by the Executive. Similarly, the Uganda Journalists Safety committee (UJSC) expressed concern over the High Court siege saying that what Uganda faced then was a breakdown of Constitutional order against state institutions which are supposed to safe guard the observance of human rights and people's freedom. The USJC supported the decision of the Judiciary to suspend judicial business, saying that it was in the right direction to fight for its independence as provided for in the Constitution of Uganda.

The Judiciary ended their week-long suspension of Court business (strike) on 9, March, 2007, after getting firm assurance from President Yoweri Museveni that the institution would remain independent. The decision was taken at a meeting attended by all judges, Registrars and Chief Magistrates at the High Court at Kampala. This followed a letter 115 written by the President to the Chief Justice of Uganda which was read out at the meeting. The letter was in response to the concerns expressed in the resolutions by the Judiciary. In that letter the President reiterated that' the Government was concerned and regretted the unfortunate events, which took place on 1st March 2007, the government assured that no repetition of such incident will take place.

The government re-affirmed its adherence to the safety and Independence of the Judiciary as an institution and of individual judicial officers, and to uphold the rule of law all organs and agencies of state will always accord the Courts such assistance as may be required to ensure the effectiveness of the Court as provided by Article 128 (3) of the Constitution; the legal and transparent modus operandi for re-arresting suspects released by Courts will be formulated and agreed on by the agencies involved in the administration of justice.

After calling off the "judicial strike" the Acting Chief Registrar issued the Judiciary's statement dated 9th March, 2007, in which it was categorically stated that the action of the strike was not intended to be a confrontational but a statement to reaffirm the values the judiciary stands for, that is, the independence of the Judiciary and the rule of law, and that the Judiciary's action was not concerned with the unchallenged rights of the Executive to arrest or charge any accused person, rather the concern was with non-compliance and violation of accepted procedures for re-arresting accused persons for any offence.

Finally, the Judiciary apologized to the public for the inconvenience caused by the suspension of judicial business and regretted the negative impact that this action might have caused to the public.

However, the judiciary had to act as it did not protect the Independence of the Judiciary, which is the foundation for the public's enjoyment of their fundamental rights, and further to remind the state agencies to accord the Judiciary the necessary assistance as provided in Article 128(3) of the Constitution.

The Judiciary strike was followed by a three-day strike by the legal fraternity organized by the Uganda Law Society following their emergency meeting of March, 6, 2007 that condemned the Court siege calling it government interference on judicial independence. The Lawyer's strike was perceived as a "symbolic way by the Lawyers to condemn the interference with the independence of Courts.

The lawyers strike was marked with a "cleansing ceremony" of the High Court which was held by the lawyers who were clad in their professional black gowns, some to them in wigs marched around the High Court to symbolically cleanse it of the government raid. The lawyers made defiant speeches vowing to defend the independence of the Judiciary. The Honorable Chief Justice Benjamin Odoki who addressed the gathering commended the Uganda Law society for their struggle to defend the independence of the Judiciary

Moreover, there is a misconception by the executive to be above the law and cannot be found guilty by the courts. This was outrightly manifested in 2007, where a magistrate in the judiciary was threatened with administrative investigation by a motley band of government Ministers for having dared find a Minister guilty of embarrassing criminal charge and giving passed sentence in the behalf, inter alia, the payment of fine. This is a clear manifest of interfering with the judicial independence and violates not only the principle of judicial independence by the executive but also the Constitutional provisions.

While the principle of judicial independence has been encapsulated in the Constitution, which is the supreme law of the country, there has been great interference by the executive arm of government in the independence of the judiciary directly and indirectly. This has partially affected the performance of the judiciary directly and indirectly. This has partially affected the performance of the judiciary in performance of its functions especially dispensing justice and therefore a bottleneck and a constraint to the concept of the Rule of Law in Uganda.

CHAPTER NINE

THE ARMY AT THE CENTRE OF THE EXECUTIVE

Amin's lasting legacy was placing the army at the centre of Ugandan politics. After a Tanzanian army chased him into exile in 1979, a series of men claimed the Presidency for a few weeks or months until they were in turn deposed. In 1980 Milton Obote returned and was sworn in as President for a stormy five years. He too was deposed in yet another military coup after a contested election that sparked the "bush war" between Obote's Uganda National Liberation Army (UNLA), dominated by soldiers from the north, and Museveni's guerrilla forces, the National Resistance Army (NRA). Museveni's victory in 1986 shattered the UNLA and scattered its soldiers back to their northern homelands.

As the NRA moved north into Acholi land on the Sudanese border, one UNLA splinter group, the Uganda People's Democratic Army (UPDA), crossed the international border and began to fight back against the NRA. The UNLA was immensely popular with fellow Acholis under NRA occupation, yet months of guerrilla raids led to nothing but escalating brutality against the population. Into this dire situation was born the Holy Spirit Movement, a chiliastic rebel splinter from the UPDA Its spirit-channelling leader, Alice Auma, led them south in several pitched battles against the NRA until they were decisively crushed in the summer of 1987.

Among the survivors was Joseph Kony, a former alter boy and Alice-inspired spirit medium, who reformed a small group that he would later rename the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA). The last two decades of LRA and NRA brutality in Acholi land have followed a path similar to that of the earlier Ruwenzururu rebellion. In 1998, Museveni made Betty Bigombe the "Minister of State for Pacification of Northern Uganda" with similar mandate and powers to crush the LRA as those Tamukedde had to end the Ruwenzururu rebellion in the 1960s. The NRA fulfilled its "pacification" role by deploying brute force against the LRA in their aptly named "Operation North" of 1991 and "Operation Iron Fist" of 2002.

Amazingly, in between these two assaults, the Ugandan Constitutional Commission managed to visit every parish in Acholi land to solicit input for the draft Constitution. Article 208(2) of the 1995 Constitution created a Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces (UPDF) that is "non-partisan, national in character, patriotic, professional, disciplined, productive and subordinate to the civilian authority as established in the Constitution." This provision was seen as crucial to prevent past national armies dominated by soldiers from a particular region. The Constitution also provided for military tribunals "subordinate" to the appellate courts.

The Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces Act of 2005 clarified the murky goings-on of military tribunals first documented in late 2002 by creating the General Court Martial with jurisdiction over crimes by members of the military. However, the tribunals also claimed jurisdiction in "treason cases and over "every person found in unlawful possession of arms, ammunition or equipment ordinarily being the monopoly of the [UPDF]". This law was used to legitimise the UPDF's de facto role as police and judge in occupied Acholi land, where hundreds of civilians were reportedly arrested and prosecuted in the General Court Martial. As violence rose in Acholi land to meet the millennium, the army had effectively isolated the north under military law.

The military courts outside the capital largely escaped the scrutiny of the appellate courts until 25 UPDF members petitioned the High Court in 2004 to declare the General Court Martial's bail practices unconstitutional. In Tumushabe v. Attorney General the Constitutional Court heard their appeal and held that bail "is a fundamental right guaranteed under Article 23(6)" of the Constitution "since a person is presumed innocent and has a right to a speedy trial in an independent and impartial court created by law." The Court then went on to decide whether the GCM was a court of the judicature according to Articles 129 and of the 1995 Constitution. A majority agreed, despite its concurrent jurisdiction with the High Court. But the military tribunals were "subordinate courts", and Justice Twinomujuni thus concluded that "the accused persons were entitled to be released on bail after 120 days from the date they were remanded in court by the General Court Martial. By keeping them jailed, the government acted unconstitutionally. The Court's decision placed the military tribunals firmly under appellate review and so extended at least some civil rights in the 1995 Constitution to those soldiers and civilians prosecuted under this formerly opaque court system.

For Ugandans outside the occupied north, a more worrying trend developed when the National Resistance Movement (NRM) government started using the General Court Martial to harass its political opponents in the capital. Museveni had personally intervened to have the military prosecute Tumushabe, not for any military misconduct, but for his vocal denunciation of NRM policies. The prosecution of political enemies was a similar tactic to the detention order against Matovu and earlier deportations by the colonial government. This situation came to a head in a series of court cases and orders leading up to the 2006 presidential elections. Dr. Kizza Besigye, the Forum for Democratic Change candidate, returned from self-exile in South Africa in October 2005, two months before the registration deadline. The government promptly arrested him for an alleged 1997 rape, as well as treason charges with 22 others ("PRA suspects") for membership in the mysterious People's Redemption Army supposedly linked to the FDC. If the Tumushabe precedent was followed, Besigye could be held for 180 days and would miss the presidential elections.

MILITARIZATION OF GOVERNMENT

The scope of abuses has taken root from periods of his military inception. He is invested heavily in the Army to an extent of personalizing in contrary to Art 208(1) & (2) which is to the effect that the UPDF shall be non-partisan in nature. This however proves nothing more than the fact that the militarization of activities in Uganda, suppresses the general will of the people and the law[793] to be a separate entity from the army but the new normal dictates for militarization of the police. The president has continuously appointed army personnel to top police positions, the IGP, AIGP and others where he can easily control activities of opposition polices

In the time leading up the 1996 election, Museveni promised a complete reform to civilian rule (just like many do) by swapping the other combat for a Kanzu. But as time elapses, he rather is consolidating the army in by state affairs and therefore in years leading up to the 2021 general elections, Uganda has militarized rather than civilized its state affairs and the army is officers in charge. The interpretation of Art 209 of the 1995 that spells out the Army's mandate.

The army now has overt and covert presence in various ministries, departments and agencies of government where they do more than fester harmony are either in charge or keep a different sector, including command, intelligence and operation. The police have been under army control since the appointment of Gen Katumba Wamala in 2001

In state affairs, at least 35 senior cabinet ministers have served in the military including Katumba Wamala, Elly Tumwiine, Gen Moses Ali (Deputy Prime minister) General Jeje Odongo (Internal Affairs) Maj Gen Kahinda Otafiire (Justice & Constitutional Affairs) Col. Tom Butiime (Local.G) Capt. Janat Balunzi Mukwaya (Labour, Genda& Social Development) Capt. Abdul Nadduli (Minister without Portfolio)

Lientenant General Proscivia Nalweyiso as the highest security military officer (female) has been working closely with Museveni and openly in engages in partisan activities.

To the high-ranking police posts Museveni sends senior army officials. Dept IGP Maj Gen Muzeyi for example looks at the strategic appointment of Col. Serunjoji Ddamulira who has been director counter terrorism under military intelligence as new director of police crime intelligence. Brig Geofrey Golloba, who has been in Moscow as military attaché, is the new police director of human resource development and training

Kayihura is out and free after even being charged with aiding and abetting of kidnapping and repatriation of Rwanda soldiers in 2012 and 2016. Former police crime intelligence boss, Col. Atwooki Ndahura is also out after being charged of interference with the process of law contrary to

[793] Act 211-14

S-166 of UPDF Act 2005. The president has also recently appointed army officials to the department of citizenships and Immigration. It fair the appointment of Brig. Gowa Kasiita as Director Immigration and Citizenship. Col Geofrey Kambare as the Commissioner of immigration with Col. Johnson Namanya as commissioner for citizenship and passport control

Soldiers, are in control of operation wealth creation which is an initiative designed to enhance household incomes. They are in same manner attached to the URA to curb smuggling. All this is followed by attempts by parliament to which directed though in vain that police officers replace soldiers in these agencies, they are actively involved in National Enterprise corporation which takes them straight into Kira motors corporation (KMC)

The ISO formerly of Kaka Bagyenda and (ESO) of Joseph Okello Ocwet are by and large staffed and run by military. These have born fruitful results because the army given the power in possession are enshrouding on people's rights. It continues to try civilians in military courts despite condemnation from local and international Human Rights agencies[794]. To this a report from the Uganda Human Rights commission (UHRC) and the UN office of the High commission for Human Rights (OHCHR) questioned traits in military courts as "Fraught with substantial and procedural irregulates that render the attainment of a free and fair trail structures and procedurally unachievable"

The administration of justice in court martials is subject of great debate and discussion. Most recently the LDUs ability to relate with civilian has come under scrutiny and sharp focus. The deployment of military police to quell civilian unrest is over deployment which I guess serves to intimidate the general public of what awaits and how ready it they dare misbehave.[795]

The man handling was employed to quell strikes from medical workers which paralyzed health service. The same excessive force was applied in 2016 during tensions between government and Rwenzururu kingdom which saw over 100 people die

Dr. Kabumba, constitution law expert at Makerere university said there is need to look past the military resolving Uganda's governance issues. He says "As we point out in our 2017 book, this thread is historically being rooted in the very foundation of the colonial Ugandan state. Unfortunately, Uganda's independent leaders have been unable to look beyond military solution for resolution of critical governance question… and the deep tensions they engender will remain pending and potentially explosive".

I would not agree any better on the ultimate result of the militarization of Uganda. But my worry is to what extent will this go? Museveni defies the purpose of the creation of the state house Anti-corruption unity which is also infested with military personnel, that too handled by the army.[796]

[794]Bobi wines case of 2017 and Kiiza Besigye case 2005/ 2006
[795] Period prior 2021 election

There is no sleeping on this and a legal framework is needed to restrict, reliance on the army for strictly law enforcement tasks. we need to redefine the relationship between police and military during the law enforcement.
JR. Thackrah, a scholar of joint police and military operation in counter terrorism notes, "an army may kill in the execution of its normal function, but the function of the police is fulfilled by apprehending and bringing to account" which is to this end, unfortunate of Uganda because the distinction is not always apparent. The army, if it is to be used must first be in accordance with the law and second, be oriented through training, from enemy combat roles to peace time roles. This all however is a tincture to cement Musevenism in the country.

POLITICIZATION OF THE FORCES.

The genesis of the troubling times, started with the politicization of the army which made it a clear and present danger to democracy. The military and police involvement in politics remained the first and sole cause of the change in the fulcrum of security. Perhaps the police and army forgot their role in democracy.
After President Yoweri Museveni's re-election, the seventh parliament voted to maintain the provision for the ten nominated army members of parliament, entrenching the military further in Uganda's political psyche.[797] This made it more risky and many questions arose as to why the army would indulge in politics to such an extent. This was not different from the turbulent history of Uganda that saw soldiers interviewing to disrupt civilian rule in 1971 when Idi Amin overthrew Obote. The issue was not dealt with and its impacts were to be reaped soon by innocent citizens.
In 2017, during the age limit debate, the presidential guard (SFC) combined with police attacked Parliament during session to arrest the opposition leaders that opposed the age limit. This move paralleled to the 11966-67 crisis when the executive prime minister, Apollo Milton Obote ordered an army siege of Parliament and stampeded MPs into passing the Pigeon-hole Constitution.[798]
This exposed how the army was deeply entrenched in politics. The result of this has been the rise in insecurity and human rights violations by security forces in the bid to protect their interests in politics. Guidance can be sought form the February 2021 beating of journalists by the military officers which saw many of them getting fatal injuries. These were covering the delivery of a petition about human rights violation by Museveni's strong political opponent Kyagulanyi Robert Ssentamu Aka Bobi wine. [799]

[796] Army officers take over key state affairs standard July 06 2019. (monitor). Co.ug
[797] Casper Henderson, "Ugandas hidden war." Feb 2004.
[798] The Observer. Chaos, SFC mar age limit debate. Dec 20th 2017. By Joseph KImbowa.

Besides some army and top police officials have been hard making political statements or going political but surprisingly no action has been taken against them.

Brig Deus Sande, the commander of the UPDF Mechanized Brigade in Masaka while speaking at a function organized by the ruling NRM party mobilisers in Masaka city stated that the army was not to hand over power if elections went against president Museveni. In a mixture of Luganda and English, he remarked that;

"as long as we are still existing, we are not here to give out power…. I have heard the other on telling you that don't say this, but if you say this, we are not ready to give out power to people who are ideologically bankrupt…. Do you think we are planning a handover? We are not planning a handover, actually we are consolidating…. Where Uganda is today is not where it was years back. It's up to you to decide if Uganda is to become Somalia, which is in anarchy, or not."[800]

This was before the 2021 general elections and perhaps its results were the brutality and shooting of civilians by security forces in November strikes following the arrest of top opposition leader Robert Kyagulanyi Ssentamu when police together with the army fired tear gas and bullets to the demonstrating youth killing many and others getting grievously hurt.[801]

AGE LIMIT BILL

Being cheer led by the successful elimination of presidential term limits 2005 the age limit bill was also fabricated to courts where the age of 75 limit for, president in Uganda was strapped off. Passed on Dec 27th 2017 resolution to eliminate this aspect of Uganda democracy. The age and term limits were the two values acting in the interests of the people of Uganda. But their dismissal has seen an over flaw as our democratic being bleeds.

It should be noted that there is always need to consolidate the democratic principles and democratic governance, but when leaders trip off the trail after an eminent effort in the. Installation of democracy, what does it have to speak of the seed long watered? However, "this law will remain largely inconsequential because it was passed against the wishes of majority of Ugandans" Crispy Kaheru of CCEDU

In the case of male Mabirizi and other V Attorney general (constitutional Appeal No 2 of 2018) Justice Kenneth Kakuru commented, that

[799] Daily Monitor. "Uganda Security personel beat journalists covering petition on rights abuses." Elias Biryabarema.
[800] Daily Monitor, "Army on the spot again over partisan politics." Oct 31st 2020. Derrick Kiyonga.
[801] Abdi Latif Dahir. The New York Times. Deadly Protests Erupt in Uganda After Arrest of Opposition Leader. Nov 19th 2020.

"There is always danger that if the constitution is not strictly complied with our harder earned democracy shall degenerate into authoritarianism which leads to totalitarianism and dictatorship"

He continued bravely, that "the entire constitutional amendment Act…… is unconstitutional and therefore null and void, and all its provisions ought to be expunged from the constitution of Uganda"

Kenneth Kakuru in his argument enforced that the aspect of consultation of the citizens was left out. To which Attorney general said that the views of Ugandans were represented by their respective members of parliament. The lack of public participation by law invalidates the amendment. Moreover, at the inception of the bill speaker Kadaga raised caution[802] when Raphael Magezi first tabled a motion before sending it to legal and parliamentary affairs committee for scrutiny, on the need to seek public views.

In her words;

"Honorable members, the bill is sent to the legal and parliamentary affairs. However, I would like to remind you honorable members that this matter touches Art 1 & 2 of the constitution, people must be involved in this deliberation"

In his continued blame to parliament, he said they carried out consultations for only two months which was a short period to take account of the 15 million registered voters (then) of 290 constituencies, 1112 districts, 1403 545 counties and 57842 villages in the country. The list of stake holders that were able to be consulted were, 22 individuals and 8 government ministries, commission or agencies including RT Hon Prime minister in official capacity. The rest were obscure groups of FRONASA Veterans, Uganda Association of uneducated persons et al

Kenneth observed,

"With due respect to the members of the committee, for them to suggest that the above persons in groups are the stakeholders representing the whole group of Uganda, as envisaged in Art 1 of the constitution, in view of our past history, is unfortunate to say the least...."

He stretched that the 22 people consulted meant 0.0001375 percent of the registered voters who were to be consulted.

With the arguments of majority justices as not recognizing term and age limit as core constitutional values[803] underlines the legal identity crisis today.

[802] Oct, 3rd 2018

[803] Kiwanuka Legacy. Dr Busingye Kabumba 3rd Benedicts Kiwanuka Memorial lecturer

MILITARIZATION OF THE POLICE

Democratic accountable policing is one of the hallmarks of democracy. In a healthy democracy, a police service exists to protect and support the rights of its community not to repress or curtail freedom and ensure power for the governing regime. Holding the police to account for their plan, actions and decisions provides the necessary balance to the exercise of professional discretion by police officers. Accountability also provides a means by which the relationship between the police and the state can be kept under scrutiny a way of providing insulation against internal and external interference with the proper function of the police.

Uganda does not have a democratic, accountable police service, instead it has a heavily militarized colonial style regime police force that is firmly under the control of the ruling government. The police and army are separate bodies with separate mandates, cultures and hierarchies. In Uganda the lines are blurred. Successive army appointees have held the most senior police post while joint operations, auxiliary forces and army involvement in police work have militarized the police. This has led the police being undermined, violent and brutal policing taking place without the benefit of police accountability measures the erosion of police jurisdiction and guilt by association. It has also furthered the culture of impunity within the police by allowing actions done under the guise of special joint operations to go unchallenged where they would not be permissible under the civilian policing regime.

Army involvement in the police starts at the top with appointments of army men to senior police posts. Maj General Katumba Wamala was appointed as Inspector General of the police in April 2001.The president is the head of the Army and as a result the army is under his direct control. Wamala's appointment followed the scathing indictment of the police and is senior hierarchy by the Sebutinde Commission. Considering the context in which the appointment was made, it went virtually unquestioned. Following an army reshuffle, Wamala was replaced by another army man, Maj General Kayihura in October 2005. Beyond the concerns of continued militarisation of the police, the argument that only an outsider can solve the problems faced by the police has serious implications for the morale and independent functioning of the police.

JOINT OPERATIONS

The police are clearly mandated with directing and preventing crime in Uganda. (Article 212 (2) constitution of the Republic of Uganda) and (Section 5(1) (e) of the Police Act) However, Article 212(d)(iv) also requires the police to co-operate with the civilian authority and other security organs established under this constitution and with the population generally. This clause allows the government to deploy the army or other special units on law and under duties blurring the line between the police, the military and security agencies.

A basic requirement for domestic policing is that the military and the police remain separate as they go about their work. In Uganda during joint operations, the line between the military and the police is not clear, leaving the police marginalized and compromised. A police force subject to military involvement in policing loses its authority to deal with mothers that fall within its jurisdiction. This marginalization has accrued because the army has always received a high level of support and patronage from the Government. The Government has consistently neglected the police and promoted the army. Museveni has openly expressed his contempt for the police.

The Uganda police Force (UPF) under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of internal Affairs is the main security force responsible for law enforcement in Uganda. According to the world encyclopedia of police forces and correctional systems in addition to regular police work the UPF is also involved in carrying out paramilitary functions providing security for visiting dignitaries and assisting public prosecutors during criminal proceedings.

The UPDF is headed by the Inspector General of Police of Uganda and world Encyclopedia of police forces and correctional systems,2006,920) The IGP is appointed by the President on the Public service commission recommendation and reports directly to the president and to the minister of Internal Affairs. A deputy Inspector General of Police reports to the IGP.

According to the UPF website the police force is divided into five directorates .Administration, operations criminal investigations, special Branch and local administration police (LAP).The administration directorate is responsible for finances, resources(including human resources) and police medical services the operations ,directorate works in the area of crime prevention, safety assurances and incident responses the criminal investigations directorate is responsible for detecting preventing and investigating crime, compiling information on criminals and gathering evidence for use in criminal prosecutions ,the special branch collects ,analyses and disseminates information on security and the local administration police (LAP) composed of locally recruited officers who have knowledge of local languages and customs is responsible for the enforcement of local bylaws and ordinances. Each of the five directorates is commanded by an assistant inspector General of Government (AIGP) who reports to the DGIP.

Between 2006 and 2007, the Uganda Police Force reportedly expanded from approximately 27,000 to 48,000 police officers. According to official figures the ratio of police officers to population in Uganda us approximately one officer per 1,880 in habitants. However, there are significant variations in the ratio of police officers to population by district which according to one source, ranges from one (1) office per 100 inhabitants in the Capital city of Kampala to one (1) officer per

8000 inhabitants in certain outlying districts (world Encyclopedia of police forces and correctional systems 2006,920)

In 2007, Uganda was reportedly undergoing a restructuring of its police force. However, information on what structural changes have been implemented could not be found among the sources consulted by the Research Directorate within the time constraints of this response. Several sources consulted by the research Directorate indicate that there has been a trend towards increased miltarisation at the Uganda Police Force as shown by the appointment of military officers to senior positions including the Inspector General of Government. The UPDF has also created such militaristic units as the Rapid response unit (formerly known as the violent crimes crack units, the Black Mamba, the Joint Anti Terrorist Task force, members of the Kalangala Action Plan and the Presidential Protection Unit. Several sources describe for instance at a public function, he stated that the police is rotten. He also remarked that the police hated him and would rather vote for a cow than him. Statements like these coming from the highest offices in the land weakened police morale and reinforce the negative image that the public have of their police force.

The army often justifies its interference in Police work on the basis that suspects possess military hardware. Under the National Resistance Army act, the army is empowered to detain or arrest a civilian who is in possession of military equipment. This same law was used to give soldiers arrest powers as part of their JATF duties or during operation Wembley and to run court martial duties. For example, on 23rd August 2002, the Government used the Act to run an army tribunal to try 450 suspects as part of operation wembley. Charges included terrorism, aggravated robbery and desertion. Detainees challenged the legality of the tribunal but the Director of public Prosecutions rules that the Act legitimized the process.

The involvement of the army in police work and use of police work and use of police powers by the military caused concern to the Sebutinde Commission during its inquiry into policing. Many police officers testified before the commission that the army and other security agencies arrested suspects without consulting the police and then dumped them in police cells. The police were afraid to release such detainees for fear of the army or security agency reaction. This meant that detainees were held in custody for long periods without being charged.

The army and police have different functions and the training they receive is geared toward these different mandates and rides. The two have different command structures, dissimilar codes of conduct and are subject to distinct obligations and procedures for example unlike police, the military are not subject to the rules regarding to arrest, detention and other constraints of working within the criminal justice system. The military are also not subject to the same external complain mechanisms and are not readily liable to civil action, leaving them unaccountable to the public even when they are involved in civilian policing matters. One result of launching combined operations was that the lines of responsibility and eventual accountability for wrong doing were blurred. Police army and other security forces all operated in the same jurisdiction under different leadership and without clearly drawn mandate when violations and abuses occurred none of the agencies were held responsible.

JOINT ANTI TERRORIST TASK FORCE

The Joint Anti Terrorist Task force was created by the Anti Terrorism Act 2002.The main focus of the JAFF is the eradication of the Lord's Resistance Army, a rebel group that operates in Northern Uganda. JAFT is formed from a mixture of army, police and auxiliary force members. The chieftancy of military intelligence, an army intelligence unit leads JAFT. Along with the CMI, JAFT has drawn international criticism following claims of Torture and illegal detention. For example, in August 2003, Human Rights watch reported that JATF officers executed four men suspected of links with a rebel group. Human rights watch also reported that a further ten men had been detained in a secret location without charge.

The Director of CMI explained the involvement of the army in JAFT by saying that terrorism present a new challenge to the country's which existing laws institutions and procedures could not address. He argued that JATF's mandate was beyond the capability of the police.

The distinction between Military and the civilian police force as blurred. This militarization of the police force has led to allegations of brutal police tactics and Human Rights violations. According to Human Rights Watch in August 2007, the Rapid Response Unit detained forty-one individuals in overcrowded cells and reportedly tortured at least three of them. The militarization of the police force has reportedly enabled police misconduct to go encountered by police accountability mechanisms.

In addition, by appointing Army officers to head police directorates, President Museveni is encouraging militarization of the police as the army leaders in the police force have focused their energies on suppressing the opposition than adequately fulfilling the mandate of the police which in turn could be disastrous for the country.

ABUSE OF HUMAN RIGHTS BY MILITARISED POLICE

Human rights are the basic rights and freedoms that belong to every person in the world. The international human rights system in the twenty-first century has, however, been confronted with challenges that tend to offset its achievements. In spite of the remarkable normative and institutional developments since its inception, the world remains mired in widespread violations of human rights and freedoms such as freedom of expression and association. While democratic governance has been on the rise in Africa over the last five decades, civil liberties for millions of people still seem to be constrained[804] most critical, is militarization of states and use of state militaries to violate human rights of people in many Africa states. Meanwhile, little research has been done on effects of shifting civil–military dynamics in African which call for further studies which gap this study seeks to fill. [805]

The militaries' increasing role in state affairs and the violence it tends to unleash against civilians to suppress opposing political views and to assert itself in power has rapidly grown in many African countries. Government of Uganda (GoU) under the National Resistance Movement (NRM) government has equally been accused of increased involvement of her military in the roles of the Police force. This coupled with the numerous paramilitary outfits in policing the state seems to account for gross human rights violations in Uganda (US Department of State (USDS), 2017; Oba, 2005). This could amount to militarization of the Police force which this study seeks to examine in relation to Uganda's Human rights record.

Historically, Uganda has been considered one of the biggest human rights violators on the African continent. This viewed arose from the human rights perspective where by security operatives of oppressive regimes carried out arbitrary arrests, detentions and torture as instruments of political repression some of which led to deaths (Oba, 2005). These were experienced under repressive governments of Milton Obote (1963-71 and 1980-85) and military dictator Idi Amin (1971-79) (Amnesty International, 2004). In 1986 the current President Yoweri Museveni, assumed power through a military coup. In 1995, a democratic Constitution was promulgated under which Museveni became the elected President in 1996; He was re-elected in 2001 in a controversial election. In 2004, he retired from the army but remained President. He was initially commended for improvement of human rights situation in Uganda but his regime soon came under criticisms for human rights abuses which worsened after the 2001 elections. The increased role of the military in the institution of Police force and civil duties and operation of various para-military groups in the name of security has drawn criticisms on account of human rights abuses.[806]

Social Conflict theory asserts that a privileged segments of society tends to disproportionately benefit from established social and economic arrangements[807] This could lead to employment of a state's coercive force to deter opposition in order to maintain the inequality. The theory links to this study in that militarization of the Police force and the violence it wrecks on political groups

[804] (Donoho, 2006)
[805] (Scott, 2018; Chuter&Gaub, 2016)
[806] (Kabumba, 2018).
[807] (Chevigny 1995; Randall, 1975).

opposed to the status quo could be viewed as a means that privileged societal elites use to suppress and control any potential or perceived threats to their hegemony. The theory has however been criticized for its failure to explain how consensus has been imposed on societies, and why they have been generally accepted sometimes for long periods while conflict in a large modern society is rarely bipolarized as assumed.[808] Nonetheless, it is still useful in explaining conflicts between social groupings and will thus be adopted in this study.

Conceptually, human rights are the basic rights and freedoms that belong to every person in the world, from birth until death. They can never be taken away, although they can sometimes be restricted, for example if a person breaks the law, or in the interests of national security. These basic rights are based on shared values like dignity, fairness, equality, respect and independence which values are defined and protected by the Constitution.[809] Militarization is considered a step-by-step process by which a person or a thing gradually comes to be controlled by the military or depends for its well-being on militaristic ideas.[810] It is a practice where problem solving approaches, institutions, or ideologies are infused with or depend on militaristic ideas, ideals or military's institution. It is the degree to which a society's institutions, policies, behaviors, thoughts and values are devoted to military power and an attempt to establish hegemony through promotion of military values and fear when in practice it is not entirely successful [811]

In the Ugandan context, the seemingly appalling human rights situation does not appear to arise from want of human rights legislation but from constitutional limitations placed on rights and to the disrespect for law by security agencies. The 1995 Ugandan Constitution provides for protection of human rights.[812]The increased role of the military however seems to suggest that the country has adopted an approach towards militarization of its key public institutions like the Police force while the leadership in the country content that military needed to be engaged in order to fast-track the country's ambitious development goals which other institutions has failed to deliver[813]

The increased role of the military in state institutions in Uganda has been prioritized as the best way to resolve most of the country's challenges.[814] This suggests that the military is superior and better equipped than other institutions to deliver public services. This is perhaps manifested in

[808] (Wieviorka, 2013)
[809]Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995, Chapter four.
[810] (Enloe, 2000).
[811] (Bickford, 2011).
[812]Chapter four of the Constitution provides for protection of human rights. Art. 44 (a) gives special some rights: "…Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, there shall be no derogation from enjoyment of the following rights and freedoms: (a) freedom from torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment; (b) freedom from slavery or servitude; (c) the right to fair hearing; (d) the right to an order of habeas corpus…"
[813] (Nampewo, 2018).
[814] (Kabumba, 2018)

appointment of high ranking serving military officers to head the Uganda Police Force.[815]Such continuous appointments tend to suggest militarization of the force which could have serious impacts on Uganda's human rights record. Uganda Police Force was, for example, rated top violator of human rights in 2018.[816] This is perhaps the reason Uganda fell in "not free category" in Freedom House Ranking in 2016 (Jobbins et al, 2017). The apparent militarization of the Police Force and continuous appointment of military officers to serve in top positions in the force, involvement of para-military in police roles and police-military joint interventions and its likely effect on freedom of assembly and association under multiparty politics in Uganda has motivated this study.

The purpose of this chapter is to examine militarization of the Police Force and Uganda's human rights record taking the case of freedom of political assembly and association.

In doing so I examine the effect of service of military officers in top positions in Police force on freedom of assembly and association in Uganda? I also analyze the effect of involvement of para-military outfits in the roles of Police force on the freedom of assembly and association in Uganda? And I examine the effect of police-military joint interventions on freedom of political assembly and association in Uganda?

Some of the issues that the reader would like to address would be to find out the effect of service of military officers in top positions in Police force on freedom of assembly and association in Uganda? What is the effect of involvement of para-military outfits in the roles of Police force on the freedom of assembly and association in Uganda? And how does police - military joint interventions affect freedom of assembly and association in Uganda?

I will highlight the extent of militarization of the Ugandan Police Force. It will also conceptualize militarization of Ugandan police and its effects on human rights observance in Uganda particularly freedom of assembly and association under multi-party political dispensation, to militarization of the Ugandan Police Force (in terms of military officers serving in top positions in the police force, para-military involved in police roles and joint police-military interventions) on freedom of assembly and association under multi-party political dispensation in Uganda, from 2005 when multi-party political system succeeded the movement system of governance in Uganda up to present.

Police militarization is defined by scholars as the process whereby civilian police increasingly draw from and pattern themselves around, the tenets of militarism and the military model. This process tangibly occurs when a civilian police force adopts the equipment, operational tactics, mindsets, or culture of the military.

[815]Maj. Generals KatumbaWamala and Kale Kayihura as Inspector General of Police (IGP) in 2001 and 2005 respectively and recently, Brigadier SabiitiMuzeyi in 2018 as Deputy IGP.

[816] (Uganda Human Rights Commission Report, 2019).

It is law enforcement's role to guard the public against criminal wrong doers and restore order, but officers should avoid the use of excessive force, ensure individual due process protections, and respect the moral dignity of every person. In recent years, law enforcement agencies across the country have increasingly adopted tactics, equipment and culture that is more akin to those seen in the branches of our military. This current trend has resulted in a clear decrease in legitimacy and trust between communities and law enforcement. When a community does not trust those tasked with protecting their public safety, this negatively impacts law enforcement's ability to achieve its goals. Proper policing practices require that law enforcement build positive relationships with their community, respect civil liberties, and avoid tactics which encourage the use of excessive force against citizens.

MILITARIZATION OF THE POLICE

The Uganda police Force (UPF) under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of internal Affairs is the main security force responsible for law enforcement in Uganda. According to the world encyclopedia of police forces and correctional systems in addition to regular police work the UPF is also involved in carrying out paramilitary functions providing security for visiting dignitaries and assisting public prosecutors during criminal proceedings.

The UPDF is headed by the Inspector General of Police of Uganda and world Encyclopedia of police forces and correctional systems,2006,920) The IGP is appointed by the President on the Public service commission recommendation and reports directly to the president and to the minister of Internal Affairs. A deputy Inspector General of Police reports to the IGP.

According to the UPF website the police force is divided into five directorates .Administration, operations criminal investigations, special Branch and local administration police (LAP).The administration directorate is responsible for finances, resources(including human resources) and police medical services the operations ,directorate works in the area of crime prevention, safety assurances and incident responses the criminal investigations directorate is responsible for detecting preventing and investigating crime, compiling information on criminals and gathering evidence for use in criminal prosecutions ,the special branch collects ,analyses and disseminates information on security and the local administration police (LAP) composed of locally recruited officers who have knowledge of local languages and customs is responsible for the enforcement of local bylaws and ordinances. Each of the five directorates is commanded by an assistant inspector General of Government (AIGP) who reports to the DGIP.

Between 2006 and 2007, the Uganda Police Force reportedly expanded from approximately 27,000 to 48,000 police officers. According to official figures the ratio of police officers to population in Uganda us approximately one officer per 1,880 in habitants. However, there are significant variations in the ratio of police officers to population by district which according to one source, ranges from one (1) office per 100 inhabitants in the Capital city of Kampala to one (1) officer per 8000 inhabitants in certain outlying districts (world Encyclopedia of police forces and correctional systems 2006,920)

In 2007, Uganda was reportedly undergoing a restructuring of its police force. However, information on what structural changes have been implemented could not be found among the sources consulted by the Research Directorate within the time constraints of this response.

Several sources consulted by the research Directorate indicate that there has been a trend towards increased miltarisation at the Uganda Police Force as shown by the appointment of military officers to senior positions including the Inspector General of Government. The UPDF has also created such militaristic units as the Rapid response unit (formerly known as the violent crimes crack units, the Black Mamba, the Joint Anti Terrorist Task force, members of the Kalangala Action Plan and the Presidential Protection Unit. Several sources describe for instance at a public function, he stated that the police are rotten. He also remarked that the police hated him and would rather vote for a cow than him. Statements like these coming from the highest offices in the land weakened police morale and reinforce the negative image that the public have of their police force.

The army often justifies its interference in Police work on the basis that suspects possess military hardware. Under the National Resistance Army act, the army is empowered to detain or arrest a civilian who is in possession of military equipment. This same law was used to give soldiers arrest powers as part of their JATF duties or during operation Wembley and to run court martial duties. For example, on 23rd August 2002, the Government used the Act to run an army tribunal to try 450 suspects as part of operation wembley. Charges included terrorism, aggravated robbery and desertion. Detainees challenged the legality of the tribunal but the Director of public Prosecutions rules that the Act legitimized the process.

The involvement of the army in police work and use of police work and use of police powers by the military caused concern to the Sebutinde Commission during its inquiry into policing. Many police officers testified before the commission that the army and other security agencies arrested suspects without consulting the police and then dumped them in police cells. The police were afraid to release such detainees for fear of the army or security agency reaction. This meant that detainees were held in custody for long periods without being charged.

The army and police have different functions and the training they receive is geared toward these different mandates and rides. The two have different command structures, dissimilar codes of conduct and are subject to distinct obligations and procedures for example unlike police, the military are not subject to the rules regarding to arrest, detention and other constraints of working within the criminal justice system. The military are also not subject to the same external complain mechanisms and are not readily liable to civil action, leaving them unaccountable to the public even when they are involved in civilian policing matters. One result of launching combined operations was that the lines of responsibility and eventual accountability for wrong doing were blurred. Police army and other security forces all operated in the same jurisdiction under different leadership and without clearly drawn mandate when violations and abuses occurred none of the agencies were held responsible.

A number of joint operations are outlined below

a) Joint Anti Terrorist Task force

The Joint Anti-Terrorist Task force was created by the Anti-Terrorism Act 2002.The main focus of the JAFF is the eradication of the Lord's Resistance Army, a rebel group that operates in Northern Uganda. JAFT is formed from a mixture of army, police and auxiliary force members. The chieftaincy of military intelligence, an army intelligence unit leads JAFT. Along with the CMI, JAFT has drawn international criticism following claims of Torture and illegal detention. For example, in August 2003, Human Rights watch reported that JATF officers executed four men suspected of links with a rebel group. Human rights watch also reported that a further ten men had been detained in a secret location without charge.

The Director of CMI explained the involvement of the army in JAFT by saying that terrorism present a new challenge to the country's which existing laws institutions and procedures could not address. He argued that JATF's mandate was beyond the capability of the police.

The distinction between Military and the civilian police force as blurred. This militarization of the police force has led to allegations of brutal police tactics and Human Rights violations. According to Human Rights Watch in August 2007, the Rapid Response Unit detained forty-one individuals in overcrowded cells and reportedly tortured at least three of them. The militarization of the police force has reportedly enabled police misconduct to go encountered by police accountability mechanisms.

In addition, by appointing Army officers to head police directorates, President Museveni is encouraging militarization of the police as the army leaders in the police force have focused their energies on suppressing the opposition than adequately fulfilling the mandate of the police which in turn could be disastrous for the country.

On Wednesday 13th January 2021, the eve of Uganda's General elections, Uganda's communications regulator UCC ordered telecoms operators and internet service providers in the country to suspend all internet gateways until further notice. According to Reuters Ugandans reported difficulties accessing the internet via mobile devices and wireless connections on Wednesday evening and internet monitor Netblocks said on twitter that the country was experiencing a nationwide blackout from 7:00pm (1600GMT).

The presidents Justification for the Internet shutdown was in retaliation for face book taking down some pro government accounts which is really frivolous and vexatious. Any internet shutdown should be grounded in the international human Rights principles of proportionality, necessity and legality internet shutdowns should not be used as an emotional retaliation tool.42% of Ugandans are internet users and 2.5million Ugandans are active on social media via mobile tool devices.

Necessity means that only restriction of internet access must be limited to members that are strictly and demonstrably necessary to achieve a legitimate aim. It should be demonstrated that no other measure would achieve similar effects with more efficiency and less collateral damages.

Necessity also implies an assessment of the proportionality of the measures. Any restriction of internet access must also be proportional. A proportionality assessment should ensure that the restriction is the least intrusive instrument amongst those which might achieve the desired results. The limitation must target a specific objective and not unduly intrude upon other rights of targeted persons.

The internet has been ingrained into the tasks that Ugandans perform each day and the internet shutdown has caused detrimental effects to Uganda's economy and livelihoods at large. According to Net blocks an internet freedom monitor such a blackout could have already cost the Ugandan economy around USD 10million.

On 12th January, UMEME Uganda’s main electricity distribution company posted notice on its Twitter page asking its clients to purchase adequate amounts of electricity units as its service was being interrupted by the internet speed. During the five-day lockdown while the internet was fully shutdown, MEME customers were not able to access the prepaid service because the network was not available. The other services that were not available because of the shutdown were the Uganda Revenue Authority, National Social Security fund, banking services, medical emergency services like Rocket Health and E-commerce services in the form online transport services like Safeboda, Uber and Jumia.

If internet shutdowns are used as a blunt force means of blocking access locally to a specific service or application, access to other unrelated services may also be impacted as collateral damages. For example, shutting down the internet also directly disrupted access to internet based ride sharing and taxi hailing applications, likely creating a major disruption for transportation services.

Uganda has got a cumulative figure of over 39,000 cases of covid 19 and from the start of the pandemic, the internet has been a safe space offering the best platform that doubled as a social distance tool without the internet Ugandans who have been transacting online and communicating online had to switch and get things done physically. An example is the seven App that simplifies health care by bridging a gap between a patient and a doctor virtually in the comfort of one's home or office. With the internet shutdown one had to walk to the hospital physically. During the prevailing COVID 19 pandemic, Ugandan need the internet space more than ever before.

Mobile money services come to a standstill on 14th January2021, Election Day as a result of lack of internet availability and poor network conditions. Media companies that facilitate journalists while in the field rely on mobile money. Journalists that were already in the field to cover the 14-16th January elections couldn't be facilitated so they resorted to borrowing money from friends within the areas designated to them. Mobile money is a service used by almost every mobile phone user in Uganda. Uganda has about 26million active mobile subscriptions that resonate with mobile money usage.

People routinely depend on the internet to stay in touch with family and friends, create local communities of interest, report public information, hold institutions accountable and access and share knowledge. To that end, it can be argued that internet access cannot be distinguished from the exercise of freedom of expression and opinion.

When a complete internet shutdown occurs in a given country, the technical impact can extend beyond the country's borders to the rest of the global internet. Being part of an interconnected network means having a responsibility towards the network as a whole and shutdowns hold the potential to generate systemic risks. An internet shutdown has a ripple effect on the country's economy and persists beyond the days on which the shutdown occurs.

THE UNSUBSTANTIATED ARGUMENT FOR POLICE MILITARIZATION

Proponents of police militarization typically argue that the rise of gangs and cartels has resulted in the use of more sophisticated and deadly weapons by criminals, necessitating more heavily armed forces. While research clearly shows that gang membership and activity have both increased, the evidence does not support the assertion that more dangerous weapons are being used during criminal activity.

Almost 75 percent of homicides that occurred in in 2016 involved either a hand gun or a non-firearm weapon other than explosives. The FBIs uniform crime reporting program shows that the number of homicides committed with a firearm between 1994 and 2016 decreased by more than 32 percent. The number of robberies and aggravated assaults involving a firearm, declined by more than 40 percent over the same time period, Assault weapons or semi- automatic weapons with military style features are used in only a few crimes. One study from 2017 found that they account for as little as 2 percent of the guns used in a crime. While we all want our law enforcement officers to come home safely each night, it is not the case that those committing crimes are using more dangerous weapons during the commission of those criminal acts

POTENTIAL DANGERS OF POLICE MILITARIZATION

The increased militarization of police has occurred alongside a significant decline in public trust for law enforcement agencies. While the public continues to respect their own community's law enforcement agencies, public confidence and trust in law enforcement as an institution have decreased since the early 2000s. In a national survey from 2016, a majority of Americans stated that they believe the use of military equipment by police is "going too far". This same study also found that most Americans believe that police should be required to receive a warrant before conducting a search of homes and vehicles or monitoring phone calls. This erosion of public confidence in law enforcement and low support for militarization impedes law enforcement's ability to effectively secure public safety.

POSSE COMITATUS DOCTRINE

The Posse Comitatus principle is derived from a long tradition of antimilitarism in English common law, represents the tradition and strong resistance of Americans to any military intrusion into civilian affairs.

The term posse comitatus translates to power of the country derived from the Roman practice of allowing an entourage of citizens to escort proconsult as they travelled to their places of duty. (Major H.W.C furnman, Restrictions upon use of the Army imposed by the Posse Comitatus Act, 7 MiL.L REV 85, 87 (1960). In the Anglo American Legal tradition this principle stretches back to the thirteenth century English antimilitary sentiment. At the time, sherriffs and Magistrates uphold the civil peace with the assistance of the Jurata ad arma, a pool of free men on whom they relied upon for help.

Founded in the twelfth century under the Assize of Arms the jurata ad arma composed of every able bodied male over the age of fifteen and served primarily as a civilian military reserve until the fourteenth century. The transition of its role from military to law enforcement came as a response to the increasing reliance of English monarchs to enforce the law by force under a declaration of martial law under such a declaration, the King would assert his authority on the grounds of necessary and suspend civil authority while employing the military to maintain order.

Under Kings James 1 and Charles I, troops were quartered in private homes courts staged summary trials and brutal military force suppressed civil unrest. In 1628, Parliament's Petition of right protested the use of military tribunals to my civilians by the Tudar and Sturat monarchs, arguing it was improper under the Magna Carto's provision that no man would be taken, imprisoned or killed except by the law of the land. The Crown's continued use of martial law, however sparked the English civil war in 1642.The military tyranny of the cromwell regime further ingrained upon the English public the dangers of a standing army.

By the Restoration, the public feared the military so much that no standing army became the watchword of all parties. In Response, the parliament drafted the bill of rights in 1689 declaring that the raising or keeping a standing army within the Kingdom in times of peace, unless it be with the consent of parliament, is against law. The Bill echoed the terms of the Magna Carta and petition of Right, stating that the use of the Military to enforce order is not due process of law. It also struck new ground by placing the army under the strict control of the legislative.

The Riot Act's passage in 1714 further blastered these safeguards against military intervention. The Riot Act required the sheriff to order a crowd to disperse before employing force against it. Only after this requirement was satisfied could the sheriff call the posse comitatus consisting of all is Majesty's subject of age and ability to restore the peace. (John D. Gares, Dont call out the Marines: An Assessment of the Posse Comitatus Act, 13 Tex: TECH L.REV 1467, 1470(1982). In contrast, the Riot Act strictly forbade employing the army in this same role as the military force was solely reserved for suppressing open rebellion.

The military is currently prohibited by federal statute from participating in domestic law enforcement. The Posse Comitatus Act of 1878 establishes criminal penalties for people who willingly use members of the Army or the Air force to execute the laws. Although a product of the Reconstruction Era, this law reflects a strong American tradition against the domestic use of the military that stretches back before the founding of the nation.

Over the last several decades, however there has been a growing trend to increase the role of the military in traditional law enforcement. Civilian law enforcement officials however have continued to adopt military tactics to carry out their mission with potentially significant consequences. Although the carts consider the impact that domestic military involvement has on individual liberty what often goes unnoticed are the subtle changes in the methods and priorities of civilian law enforcement authorities that flow from military or law enforcement cooperation. The training and equipment shared through joint task forces, critics argue have caused police departments to become increasingly authoritarian, centralized and autonomous bureaucracies that are isolated from the public. The result is the spawning of a culture of paramilitarism in Uganda police departments.

The increased cooperation between the police and the military has blurred the line between the two traditionally distinct organizations whereas soldiers must attack and defeat an enemy, police officers are charged with not only protecting the community from law breakers but also protecting the constitutional rights of these alleged law breakers that they arrest. Whereas soldiers are trained to inflict maximum damage to use minimum force, and only when reasonably justified in accomplishing their mission.

Ultimately by allowing so much training and equipment interchange between the police and military, the military cooperation has created a dangerous exception to the PCA forcing the military involvement into a law enforcement role makes me less like soldiers but not quite police officers and conversely using police officers in a paramilitary role make them resemble soldiers in appearance and actions. As the line between the police and military becomes blurred there are bound to be negative long term effects on the military civilian police organisations and the population as a whole.
Although presidents have used troops domestically, Congress passed the Posse Comitatus Act to bar federal troops from participating in domestic law enforcement activities absent an express authorization by the congress.
The Constitution permits Parliament to authorize the use of the militia to execute the laws of the country, suppress insurrections and repel invasions. And it guarantees the states protection against invasion on unsurpation that their republican form of Government and upon the request of the state legislature against domestic violence.
The posse comitatus theory has its origins in Chapter 263.It outlaws the willful use of any part of Army or Air force to execute the law unless expressly authorized by the constitution or an Act of parliament .History supplies the grist for an agreement that the constitution prohibits military involvement in civilian affairs subject to only limited alterations by congress or the President but the courts do not appear to have ever accepted the argument unless violation of more explicit constitutional command could also be shown. The express statutory exceptions include the legislation that allows the president to use military force to suppress insurrection or to enforce federal authority.
Case law indicates that execution of the law in violation of the Posse Comitatus Act occur when the Armed forces perform tasks assigned to an organ of civil government or when the Armed forces perform tasks assigned to them solely for purposes of civilian government .Questions concerning the acts application arise most often in the context, the courts have held that ,absent a recognized exception ,the Posse Comitatus Act is violated when civilian law enforcement officials make directive active use of military investigators or the use of the military pervades the activities of the civilian officials or the military is used so as to subject citizens to the exercise of military power which was regularly prescriptive or compulsory in nature. The act is not violated when the Armed forces conduct activities for a military purpose.

With the groundswell of public support for the war against terrorism the decay of posse comitatus has accelerated dramatically. Some politicians and media sources now suggest that Parliament amend or even repeal the PCA to allow a degree of domestic military involvement that would have been unthinkable. Although there is undoubtedly certain pragmatism in levying the immense resources of the Uganda Military against the threat of domestic terrorism.This strategy ignores the consequences of using soldiers as a substitute for civilian law enforcement. The military is not a police force. It is trained to engage and destroy the enemy not to protect constitutional rights. The founding fathers feared the involvement of the Army in the nation's affairs for good reason. History has demonstrated that employing soldiers to enforce the law is inherently dangerous to the rights of the people.

POSSE COMITATUS ADVOCACY FOR UGANDA'S JURISPRUDENCE

Over the last several decades, however there has been a growing trend to increase the role of the military in traditional law enforcement. Civilian law enforcement officials however have continued to adopt military tactics to carry out their mission with potentially significant consequences. Although the carts consider the impact that domestic military involvement has on individual liberty what often goes unnoticed are the subtle changes in the methods and priorities of civilian law enforcement authorities that flow from military or law enforcement coperation. The training and equipment shared through joint task forces, critics argue have caused police departments to become increasingly authoritarian, centralized and autonomous bureaucracies that are isolated from the public. The result is the spawning of a culture of paramilitarism in Uganda police departments.

The increased cooperation between the police and the military has blurred the line between the two traditionally distinct organizations whereas soldiers must attack and defeat an enemy, police officers are charged with not only protecting the community from law breakers but also protecting the constitutional rights of these alleged law breakers that they arrest. Whereas soldiers are trained to inflict maximum damage to use minimum force, and only when reasonably justified in accomplishing their mission.

Ultimately by allowing so much training and equipment interchange between the police and military, the military cooperation has created a dangerous exception to the PCA forcing the military involvement into a law enforcement role makes me less like soldiers but not quite police officers and conversely using police officers in a paramilitary role make them resemble soldiers in appearance and actions. As the line between the police and military becomes blurred there are bound to be negative long term effects on the military civilian police organisations and the population as a whole.

Although presidents have used troops domestically, Congress passed the Posse Comitatus Act to bar federal troops from participating in domestic law enforcement activities absent an express authorization by the congress.

The Constitution permits Parliament to authorize the use of the militia to execute the laws of the country, suppress insurrections and repel invasions. And it guarantees the states protection against invasion on unsurpation that their republican form of Government and upon the request of the state legislature against domestic violence.

The posse comitatus theory has its origins in Chapter 263. It outlaws the willful use of any part of Army or Air force to execute the law unless expressly authorized by the constitution or an Act of parliament. History supplies the grist for an agreement that the constitution prohibits military involvement in civilian affairs subject to only limited alterations by congress or the President but the courts do not appear to have ever accepted the argument unless violation of more explicit constitutional command could also be shown. The express statutory exceptions include the legislation that allows the president to use military force to suppress insurrection or to enforce federal authority.

Case law indicates that execution of the law in violation of the Posse Comitatus Act occur when the Armed forces perform tasks assigned to an organ of civil government or when the Armed forces perform tasks assigned to them solely for purposes of civilian government .Questions concerning the acts application arise most often in the context, the courts have held that ,absent a recognized exception ,the Posse Comitatus Act is violated when civilian law enforcement officials make directive active use of military investigators or the use of the military pervades the activities of the civilian officials or the military is used so as to subject citizens to the exercise of military power which was regularly prescriptive or compulsory in nature. The act is not violated when the Armed forces conduct activities for a military purpose.

With the groundswell of public support for the war against terrorism the decay of posse comitatus has accelerated dramatically. Some politicians and media sources now suggest that Parliament amend or even repeal the PCA to allow a degree of domestic military involvement that would have been unthinkable. Although there is undoubtedly certain pragmatism in levying the immense resources of the Uganda Military against the threat of domestic terrorism, this strategy ignores the consequences of using soldiers as a substitute for civilian law enforcement. The military is not a police force. It is trained to engage and destroy the enemy not to protect constitutional rights. The founding fathers feared the involvement of the Army in the nation's affairs for good reason. History has demonstrated that employing soldiers to enforce the law is inherently dangerous to the rights of the people.

PROSECUTION OF CIVILIANS IN MILITARY COURT

Since 2002, military courts in Uganda have prosecuted well over 1000 civilians for offenses under the criminal code, such as murder and armed robbery.[817] In 2006, Uganda's Constitutional Court ruled that military prosecutions of civilians were unlawful.[818]In 2005, the Ugandan Law Society, a professional association of lawyers, challenged the exercise of military jurisdiction over civilians for common criminal offenses. The Constitutional Court ruled that such prosecutions of civilians were unconstitutional. The court's finding was in keeping with Uganda's obligations under international law, which prohibits the peacetime prosecution of civilians before military courts.[819] This ruling, upheld on appeal by the Supreme Court in January 2009, was consistent with international law, which unambiguously holds that military tribunals are not competent courts to try civilians accused of peacetime criminal offenses. Despite this, Uganda's military courts continue to prosecute civilians. Military and police officials have disregarded the Constitutional Court's ruling since it was issued.

WHAT DOES THE KABAZIGURUKA V ATTORNEY GENERAL[820] CASE MEAN?

BACKGROUND

In 2016, Michael Kabaziguruka, a civilian, and then member of Parliament of Nakawa was arrested and detained on treachery charges and arraigned before the General Court Martial. Kabaziguruka petitioned court challenging the jurisdiction of the army court to try him. The High Court judge Patricia Wasswa Basaza ruled that Michael Kabaziguruka is subject to military law and should be tried by the General Court Martial for offences relating to security and treachery. The judge based her ruling on Section 119 of the UPDF Act, which gives unlimited jurisdiction and powers to the Army Court to try civilians such as MP Kabaziguruka. Judge Wasswa found that unless repealed or [817] Especially during disarmament operations that the Ugandan military has conducted in the Karamoja region of northeastern Uganda. The second is arrest by an ad-hoc law enforcement unit, established by presidential directive in 2002, first known as "Operation Wembley," then as the Violent Crime Crack Unit. It is currently named the Rapid Response Unit (RRU).

[818]Uganda Law Society v Attorney General of the Republic of Uganda (Constitutional Petition-2005/18)
[819]Ibid
[820] Constitutional Petition No. 45 of 2016

invalidated by the Constitutional Court, the Act makes civilian suspects subject to military law over charges of aiding and abetting serving UPDF officers to commit service offences. Mr. Kabaziguruka petitioned the Constitutional Court objecting the jurisdiction of the General Court Martial trying him as he was a civilian.

H O L D I N G S O F C O U R T

1. The General Court Martial established under the Section 197 of the UPDF Act is a competent quasi-judicial military Court established under the UPDF Act whose jurisdiction is limited to the enforcement of military discipline.
2. The General Court Martial's jurisdiction is only limited to trying service 15 offences specified under the UPDF Act, only in respect of persons subject to military law.
3. Military law under the UPDF Act must be construed to exclude laws that are the preserve of Civil Courts of judicature established under Chapter Eight of the Constitution.
4. Persons subject to military law under UPDF Act must exclude all those persons who have not voluntarily placed themselves under the jurisdiction of that Act excerpt as provided for under Section 119(1)(g).
5. Section 119(1)(h) and 179(1)(a) of the UPDF Act are unconstitutional as they are inconsistent with Article 28(1) of the Constitution.
6. Section 119(1) (g) of the UPDF Act is not unconstitutional. Provided the person not otherwise subject to military law is tried as an accomplice together with a person who is subject to military law as the principle offender on the same charge sheet.
7. The petitioner is not a person subject to military law and his trial under the UPDF Act is unconstitutional. The charges brought against him under the UPDF Act are unconstitutional null and void and of no effect.
8. Section 197 of UPDF Act is NOT unconstitutional.

O R D E R S

1. All those persons not subjected to military law and are currently being tried before any military Court, we order that their cases be transferred to Civil Courts under the direction of the Director of Public Prosecutions within 14 (fourteen) days from date hereof.
2. All those persons not subject to military law who are currently serving sentences imposed by the authority of military Courts contrary to the Constitution as set out in this Judgment, should have their case files transferred to the High Court Criminal Division for re-trial or to be dealt with as that Court may direct within 14 (fourteen) days of this Judgment.

ANALYSIS OF UGANDAS MILITARY COURT STRUCTURE

Justice Kakuru in his ruling held that the Court Martial clearly is not part of the Judiciary but rather part of the executive arm of government. He further stated that the General Court Martial is a specialised Court, setup by Parliament for the purpose of dealing with military discipline within the UPDF. Accordingly, it lacks all the tenets of an ordinary Court of law established under Chapter Eight of the Constitution. They are established under Chapter Twelve of the Constitution which provides for the County's Defence and National Security.

According to Article 126 (1) of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, "...judicial power is derived from the people and shall be exercised by the courts established under this Constitution in the name of the people and in conformity with law and with the values, norms and aspirations of the people." In Article 129 (1)[821], the Constitution further provides that the judicial power shall be exercised by the courts of judicature which shall consist of: The Supreme Court of Uganda; the Court of Appeal of Uganda; the High Court of Uganda; and such subordinate courts as Parliament may by law establish. It is further provided that "...the Supreme Court, the Court of Appeal and the High Court of Uganda shall be superior courts of record and shall each have all the powers of such a court."

The military court is established pursuant to Article 210 of the Constitution. Article 210 of the Constitution mandates Parliament to make laws regulating the UPDF. Pursuant to this provision; Parliament enacted the UPDF Act as the major legal framework governing the UPDF. Part VIII of the UPDF Act deals with the establishment and operation of military courts in Uganda. From the structural point of view, military courts in Uganda comprise of the Summary Trial Authority, Unit Disciplinary Committees and Courts Martial. Under "Courts Martial", the UPDF Act provides for a four tier military court system i.e., Field Courts Martial; Division Courts Martial; the General Court Martial; and the Court Martial Appeal Court.

To this extent, Justice Kakuru held that the General Court Martial is not an independent impartial court as envisaged under Article 28 of the Constitution. Article 28[822] requires that in 'the determination of any criminal charge' an accused 'shall be entitled to a fair, speedy and public hearing before an independent and impartial court or tribunal established by law.

In Lt. Ambrose Ogwang v Uganda,[823] The Court of Appeal observed and held as follows; "No doubt the Division Court Martial is established by law, the Uganda People Defence Forces Act, 2005. The question is whether it is independent. Independent in the above Article 28 (1) can only be understood in the general constitutional architecture of separation of powers."

[821]The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[822]The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[823]Court of Appeal Criminal Appeal No. 107 of 2013 delivered on 8th November 2018.

Article 128 (1)[824] of the Constitution provides that in the exercise of judicial power, the courts shall be independent and shall not be subject to the control or direction of any person or authority. This requires that a court must be independent of the authority that brings the charges or trial. The judges of an independent court cannot be under the administrative control of the authority that brings the charges. In order to secure the independence of the courts the courts are placed under a different arm of the state known as the Judiciary with security of tenure and insulation from control of the Executive which originate criminal charges with the exception of private prosecutions which are brought by private individuals.

THE PURPOSE OF MILITARY LAW AND MILITARY COURTS

Military law can be described as that specialised area of law that governs military personnel and other persons subject to military law. The major objective of military law is to ensure discipline in the armed forces which acceptably is considered to be key in ensuring military effectiveness.[825]In Attorney General v Major General David Tinyefuza,[826] Justice Mulenga stressed that military law is "a special package of laws designed to ensure proper command and administration of, and discipline in the army..."[827]In the Uganda Law Society v The Attorney General of the Republic of Uganda,[828]Justice Mukasa-Kikonyogo expressed the view that one of the major purposes of military law is to ensure peace and security. This is the end result of the military effectiveness which is largely achieved by ensuring discipline in the army.

Military courts/courts martial are the main mechanism for enforcement of military law. In Joseph Tumushabe case V Attorney General,[829] Court while interpreting Article 126 (1)[830] of the Constitution in the context of the relationship between military courts and civil courts, Justice Mulenga who delivered the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court emphasised that "...court martial are a specialised system to administer justice in accordance with military law..." An important question to pose here is: Why should the military have a specialised kind of law and enforcement mechanism. In Joseph Tumushabe case (supra) the Constitutional Court adeptly summarised the justification for existence of military courts alongside civil courts. In the words of Justice Twinomujuni, "The only justification for the creation of special tribunals is that our

[824]The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[825]Attorney General v Major General David Tinyefuza Const. Appeal No. 1 of 1997 (SC) at 39
[826]Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 1997
[827] Ibid
[828]Constitutional Petition No. 18 of 2005 (CC)
[829]Const. Petition No. 6 of 2004.
[830]The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

ordinary Courts of Law tend to be very slow and are not suitable for certain category of professions and occupations." He stressed that "Courts Martial are justified by the fact that they are more suited to try military service offences than ordinary courts but more importantly they are expected to dispose of cases expeditiously."

In summary, the major purpose of military law and military courts as discerned from the jurisprudence of Uganda's civil courts is to ensure proper command and discipline in the army to guarantee its efficiency in maintaining national peace and security. Ensuring proper command and discipline in the army requires military courts to expeditiously handle and dispose of cases involving infraction of military law.

JURISDICTION OF THE COURT MARTIAL TO TRY CIVILIANS

It is trite law that any competent tribunal must have jurisdiction over both the subject matter (jurisdiction ratione materiae) and the person(s) it tries (jurisdiction ratione personae). Jurisdiction of a tribunal is a matter determined by law. Justice Mukasa-Kikonyongo in the case of Uganda law Society V Attorney General[831]rightly emphasised that a court be it civil or military, can only try the accused for an offence where it is seized with jurisdiction. In principle, the jurisdiction of military courts should be limited to serving military personnel accused of committing military offence. Justice Kakuru in the Kabaziguruka case held that The General Court Martial's jurisdiction is only limited to trying service offences specified under the UPDF Act, only in respect of persons subject to military law. He defined the term Service offence to relate only to those offences that are "purely military in nature" or offences under military law which are not offences under ordinary criminal law. Ordinarily members of the military in this Country are tried by civilian Courts for non-service offences. Assumption of risk by an individual in the military is only limited to military discipline under military law.

The jurisdiction of military courts over civilians is supposed to be exceptional. Uganda's military law gives the military courts jurisdiction over many categories of civilians. According to Section 119 of the UPDF Act, persons subject to military law/ jurisdiction of military courts include: civilians who serve in the position of an officer or militant in any force raised and maintained outside Uganda and commanded by an officer of the defence forces;[832]civilians who voluntarily accompany any unit or other element of the defence forces which is on service in any place;[833]and civilians who serve in the defence forces under engagements by which they agree to be subject to military law.[834]Civilians who aid or abet a person subject to military law in commission of a service offence and civilians found in unlawful possession of arms, ammunitions or equipment ordinarily being the monopoly of the defence forces or other classified stores as prescribed, are also subjected to the jurisdiction of military courts.[835]

[831]Constitutional Petition No. 18 of 2005
[832]S 119 (1) (d), The Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces Act, 2005.
[833]Section 119 (1) (e), The Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces Act, 2005.

In the Uganda Law Society Constitutional petition of 2005,Justice Mukasa-Kikonyogo in addressing the issue whether sections 119 (1) (g) and (h) of the UPDF Act which subject certain categories of civilians to military law were inconsistent with particular provisions of the Constitution, she stressed that "...it is a tenable argument that the inclusion of the provisions above [in the UPDF Act] were intended to safeguard national security where such civilians find themselves in conflict with the military law."43"This is well intentioned for purposes of the wider realm of the State's constitutional mandate to control the nation's defence and national security", she further argued.

Justice Kakuru in the case of Hon.Michael Kabaziguruka v Attorney General[836]held that persons subject to military law under UPDF Act must exclude all those persons who have not voluntarily placed themselves under the jurisdiction of that Act excerpt as provided for under Section 119(1)(g) of the UPDF Act. He reasoned that all persons recruited into the Armed forces do so voluntarily. Each individual voluntarily seeks to enlist, it must be presumed, is well aware of the risks such enlistment entails. He or she contracts to voluntary limit some of his or her fundamental rights and freedoms to the extent that he/she is exposed to the risk of being a member of the Armed forces. Persons who have not voluntarily subjected themselves to military law cannot be tried by the General Court Martial.

Section 119(1) (g)[837] stipulates that every person, not otherwise subject to military law, who aids or abets a person subject to military law in the commission of a service offence is subject to the Military court jurisdiction. Justice Obura JCC in Hon.Michael Kabaziguruka v Attorney General[838]held that, for such person to be tried by General Court Martial there must be a principle offender who is subject to military law named in the charge sheet as such. The civilian can only be charged as an accomplice together with the principle offender. This was the same position that had earlier been taken in the Uganda Law Society v Attorney General,[839] where the Constitutional Court also clarified that to validly charge someone under section 119 (1) (g) of the UPDF Act, there must be a principal offender to aid or abet who must be subject to military law.

[834] Sec 119 (1) (f), The Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces Act, 2005.
[835]Section 119 (1) (g) & (h) of the Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces Act, 2005 respectively.
[836] Constitutional Petition No.45 of 2016
[837]The Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces Act, 2005.
[838]Constitutional Petition No.45 of 2016
[839]Constitutional Petition No.18 of 2005

Justice Kakuru further held that Section 119(1)(h) which provides civilians found in unlawful possession of arms, ammunitions or equipment ordinarily being the monopoly of the defence forces or other classified stores as prescribed, are also subjected to the jurisdiction of military courts is unconstitutional as they are inconsistent with Article 28(1) of the Constitution. He reasoned that the provisions extend the jurisdiction of the General Court Martial to include power to try persons who have not voluntarily brought themselves under the ambit of military law.

Similarly, the majority of the Constitutional Court in the Kabaziguruka case held that Section 179(1)(a)[840] of the UPDF Act which gives military court jurisdiction to try civilians who does or omits to do an act in Uganda, which constitutes an offence under the Penal Code Act or any other enactment are unconstitutional as they are inconsistent with Article 28(1) of the Constitution. Military law under the UPDF Act must be construed to exclude laws that are the preserve of Civil Courts of judicature established under Chapter Eight of the Constitution.[841] This was in tandem with the holding of the Supreme Court in Attorney General v Uganda Law Society[842], where Court addressed the issue of the competency of military courts to try civilians charged with offences under legislation other than the UPDF Act. Justice Mulenga approved the Constitutional Court's decision where it was held by a majority of four to one that the General Court Martial did not have jurisdiction over this offence because section 6 of the Anti-Terrorism Act conferred exclusive jurisdiction over it in the High Court. He pointed out that there can be no trial at all where the court is not competent. He emphasised that a trial by an incompetent court is by that fact alone a nullity ab initio."[843]

Uganda is responsible for the unlawful prosecution and detention of all civilians currently in custody as the result of the exercise of the military jurisdiction, which includes those who have been convicted or are undergoing trials before military court martial. The Constitutional Court has clearly held the exercise of military jurisdiction over civilians to be unlawful. As indicated above, since no military court had the competency to try a civilian, as a matter of domestic and international law all convictions and detentions based on the wrongful exercise of jurisdiction are a violation of the right to a fair trial and a violation of the prohibition on arbitrary detention. The state therefore has a duty to identify all cases of civilians prosecuted or facing prosecution before court martial cases be transferred to Civil Courts under the direction of the Director of Public Prosecutions. The decision to proceed with any retrial would need to take into account time that an accused has already spent in detention, and whether a retrial would further violate the rights of an

[840]The Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces Act, 2005.
[841] Justice Kakuru ruling.
[842]Constitutional Appeal No. 1/2006 (SC).
[843] Attorney General v Uganda Law Society at 9

accused to a fair hearing.

They were set after continues abuse of rights like military persons, however, they are also obliged to adhere to the rule of law and uphold the fundamental rights and freedoms of persons. Abide by the contrail standards of administering justice. However, the extent of adherence is the subject of this extension

After loving the 2001 election, Besigye was trailed whenever he went and that led to some fear that his life was in danger. He filled the matter with the Uganda Human Rights commission (UHRC) alleging the danger in which his life was.[844]

The government later alleged that Besigye was associated with rebels of the (PRA) peoples Redemption Army. He was arrested and jointly charged of treason and misprision under the penal code Act.[845] He was then a caused separately with the offence of rape allegedly committed in 1997 well as 14 of the accused were granted bail, through the hearing proceedings security personnel in Black raided the court premises and surrounded the holding cells where bail applicants awaited release. Therefore, the bail papers could not be processed. The 'Black mamba' as dubbed by the media interrupted the process of bail and the accused were returned to prison

Because of these acts, Justice Edward Legalize resigned from gearing the case and justice Bosco Katutsi who also after hearing the rape charges to which he acquitted Besigye, declined to hear the treason and misprision changes. In the condemnation of this attack, Justice James Ogoola[846] Coined the famous expression that a naked rape, defilement and desecration of the temple of justice, he confirmed that not since the abduction of CJ Ben Kiwanuka from the premises of court in the diabolical time of Amin had court been subjected to such a horrendous sight. This undermined the principles of judicial independence

Major Felix Kulaigye in the aftermath, in justification of this action said Black mamba was there to rearrests the suspects for other charges brought by the GCM.[847]It also undermined the provision in Article 28 of the constitution granting of bail as a right. Besigye and other were committed to the GCM in Makindye as tried for the same case facts as treason and misprision however under the guise of terrorism and possession of fire arms.[848]Until the high court application for an order of stay the proceeding of the military court, the constitutional court decision on legality of the trial which led to the subsequent suit of the ULS V AG Constitutional Petition No.1 2006 for a declaration of whether the GCM had jurisdiction to try Besigye.

[844] See UHRC. 177/2001, Rtd.Col. Kiza Besigye V.AG (Chieftaincy of military Intelligence)
[845] Cap 120, Vol V laws of Uganda 2000
[846] Principle judge of high court
[847] See G Sseruyange, Black Mamba intended to rearrests PRA suspects. Daily monitor, thru Nov 17 2005
[848] See. Fire arms Act cap 299. Vol XII laws of Ug. 2000

The heart-breaking part was when the chairperson of GCM Elly Tumwine asserted that the military courts were independent from the jurisdiction of the high court.[849]None the less Elly Tumwiine continues with the trial even when the high court has pronounced its self that the GCM did not have jurisdiction pursuance of which contravened Arts 22(1), 28(1), 20(1), 3 b a c, 126(1) and 210 of the constitution. The action hence went down to Museveni's vows to fight the constitutional court ruling legally and politically.[850]This defined the extent the president would go to protect his sit and his government

INSECURITY AND ASSASINATIONS THE GUN WIELDED MEN AND THE BLOOD STAINED HANDS"

Any individual, any group or person who threatens the security of our people must be smashed without mercy. The people of Uganda should only die from natural causes which are not under our control but not from fellow human beings."[851]

Security was a second substantive issue in the ten point's programme of the National Resistance Army. This was much emphasized since insecurity was on increase in the various parts of Uganda. This could be solved through instituting a professional army and police to protect the nation, people and their property.

To prove their word, when the 1995 Constitution was promulgated, the National Resistance Army's identity was changed to Uganda Peoples Defence Forces (UPDF). Article 208(1) provided that; there shall be armed forces to be known as the Uganda Peoples Defence Forces.[852] The army was to be nonpartisan, national in character, patriotic, professional, disciplined, productive and subordinate to the civilian authority.

The army was born in a challenging period. There was an insurgency in northern Uganda with the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) and less than a year later, a new rebel group, the Allied Democratic Forces (ADF) attacked parts of Kasese and Bundibugyo in western Uganda.

Another rebel group, the National Democratic Army (NDA) led by Herbert Itongwa also surfaced in the central region. Meanwhile, the South Sudan question was also yet to be solved. According to the situation by then, defeating such all such rebel groups was a big achievement of the army young at the moment. It was a promising army in terms of security to the nation.

After its formation out of NRA, steps were taken to turn it into a professional army. The Defence Review Commission was set up and in early 2000, a white paper done set in motion the progression

[849] S Mruita& S. Lubwama, court now defined high court. The daily monitor wed Jan 18th 2006
[850] See. H Mukasa, museveniraprculing on court martials. The New vision, Tue Feb 7th 2001
[851] President Yoweri Museveni during his speech on the steps of Parliament 1986.
[852] The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.

of the Uganda army from a mere regular force to a professional army. This saw a professionalization phase inform of professional recruitment, training, capacity and modernization of the force equipment has been key.

The army spokesperson once remarked that, "if one looks at the army that walked into Kampala in 1986 and at the UPDF today there are improvements and re-alignments that have made it a better force."[853] He further remarked that, we are not just a professional force but a people's army too."

Indeed, no one could under estimate the role of the army and Uganda police Force in maintaining security and promoting human rights during the first decade of their legal institution.

MOTORBIKE KILLINGS (THE GUN WIELDED MEN)

The theorem of such killings has never been known by the natives of the land. No reports have ever been brought to people's attention about such deaths. These continued execution style killings without any arrests led the public to conclude that the police force and other security apparatus in general are incompetent and riddled with corruption.[854]

When such killings escalated, many others Ugandans diverted to another ideology of the conspiracy theory by those in government and others politicized the matter. The assailants always use giant and first moving bikes, dressed in black and loaded with guns ready to complete their mission.

Since 2012, a total of about 10 Muslim clerics have been fatally shot by these assailants. In its investigations, the police always blamed this to the Allied Democratic Forces (ADF).[855]

On April 20, 2012, Sheikh Abdul Karim Ssentamu a prominent Muslim scholar was gunned down on William Street, Kampala shortly after prayers when he had just left the mosque. Investigations commenced but still no report was released for such death. As the community was still aggrieved, another senior Muslim Abubaker Kiweewa was shot dead on June 22 the same year. The assailants took his life at about 9pm on Friday within the premises of prime supermarket in Kyanja a city suburb.

The country was shocked and many heads were still puzzled about such deaths when the weakness in security that the president boosted about was again manifested in two years' time.

On December 28th 2014, Sheikh Mustafa Bahiga who was at Bwebajja mosque on Entebbe road was shot five times. Three bullets were shot on his left limb, one on the head and the other in the stomach as he was going for Ishae prayers. One year later in March 2015, the situation changed this time round, a senior government prosecutor who was the prosecutor in the 2010 bombing of Lugogo was shot dead. Joan Kagezi was gunned down by assailants riding a motorcycle in [853] Felix .Kulayigye former army spokesperson during an interview with New Vision.

[854] The Independent. Unsolved Killings by Motorcycle hitmen. June 6th 2021.
[855] Daily Monitor. Muslim Clerics who have been killed. Nov 26th 2016.

Kiwatule Najjera when she had stopped to purchase fruits.

Two months later, Sheikh Abdulrashid Wafula, the Imam of Bilal mosque in Mbale town also topped the list. He was gunned down at around 9pm at the gate of his home in Kireka village in Mbale district. Surprisingly, with all these shootings, the security had nothing to tell. In all those deaths, security had no one in its cells. Insecurity increased leaving many Muslims and the nation at large in thoughts about the intention for these killings.

A month later, the country was to face another shock. Sheik Ibrahim Hassan Kirya was shot dead by unknown assailants on a boda motorcycle in Bweyogerere. Sheikh Ibrahim was on his way home and had crossed to buy some passion fruits when the incident happened.

On 26th November 2016, the attackers would escalate, this time targeting a sheikh who also was a serving military officer. These assailants on a motorbike attacked in a diplomatic format and shot dead Major Mohammed Kigundu and his driver/bodyguard. Sergeant Steven Mukasa.[856]His death was linked by security operatives to ADF having been a commander in the past and having survived two previous assassinations.

On the 17th March 2017 the country was to be left in shock for another time. AIGP Andrew Felix Kaweesi was gunned down a few meters from his home alongside his body guard sergeant Kenneth Erau and driver constable Godfrey Wambewo.[857] Otin says this particular killing would perplex investigations even more. Kaweesi vehicle seemed to have come to a controlled stop on the road and did not present any indications of aversive driving.[858]

The assailants parked their bike in the road claiming it to be broken. When Kaweesi and his colleagues drew close to it, they reduced speed unknown to them other assailants were moving from behind and completed their lives. The killing occurred towards the anniversary of Jamil Mukulu's arrest. A report from Uganda police showed that those assailants after finishing their mission left the scene in motorbikes without license plates.[859]

Following a similar sequence and pattern, other killings commenced in which the former MP for Arua and staunch NRM carder Ibrahim Muhammad Abiriga was shot dead along with his brother Saidi Kongo.[860] The two were heading home at around 7pm. The brother had just returned from Somalia and was at a time working as his body guard. Next would be a District Police Commander and Assistant Superintendent of Police for Buyende Muhammad Kirumira.

Muhammad Kirumira was killed alongside a female friend in his private vehicle as he drove close

[856] Daily Monitor 2016. Also see Andrew Otine. Unsolved: Killings by Motorcycle Hitmen and serial murder of women in Uganda. 20 Nov 2018
[857] New Vision 2017.
[858] Supra.
[859] Uganda Police Report 2017, p.6.
[860] Obbo. 2018; The Observer: 2018.

to his home. The assailants had the same modus operendi, spraying bullets into a vehicle, confirming the death and then leave the scene.[861] The police through its spokesperson Fred Enanga informed the nation that the prime suspect Abdul Kateregga was shot dead by the chieftaincy of military intelligence (CMI) before releasing details of the gun that was used to end Kirumira.[862]

The death of Kirumira left many people aggrieved, most of them asserting that he had been eliminated by those in police following his continuous release of information about the top weevils in police and their criminal conduct at the pinnacle Gen Kayihura's time leadership in Uganda police force and amidst subjugation of civil rights, Kirumira criticized brutality, corruption and abuse of power.

Kirumira confronted his rogue colleagues head-on and never minced his words knowing that he was risking his life once said, ""I am Muhammad Kirumira mwoyo gwa gwanga…. I am around until God says dont be around… Iam around and my virtues and values havent changed.""[863]

Kirumira in a short video clip declared that "expose the mafia to save the state. When you speak you die. When you keep quiet you die. Better speak and die when the message has reached people." After his death, it became evident that the officer had been assassinated by the big fish in police something that they covered up to date.

The president continued to say that police was full of Mafias that he was to eliminate and promised Ugandans that they will be safe. On June 1st 2021, the gunmen attacked and wounded Ugandas transport minister and former army commander Gen Katumba Wamala killing his daughter and driver.[864]

After this attack, it seemed the promise by the president of security was a shame. For all the previous killings, no official public report and no assailants had been caught. The president blamed the insecurity on police and continued to promise the arrest of the assailants. This time round he termed them as pigs. It's not clear as to the intentions of these bloods stained men but seems the killings were to continue until the truth is brought to light.

THE MOTORBIKE ASSASSINS AND MURDER OF WOMEN ENTEBBE AND NANSANA"

The wave of unexplained and puzzling killings opened its gates in 2012 when the Hollywood execution style ride by shootings and serial murders of high profile personnel and Muslim sheikhs made headline in Uganda. This left part of the population in fear and speculation as to the reasons [861] New Vision. Muhammad Kirumira shot dead near his home. Sept 8th, 2018.

[862] The Independent. Suspect in Kirumira murder died before releasing killer gun. Sept 10, 2019.
[863] The Standard. The fearless Uganda Police man who fore saw his death. Japheth Ogira. Sept 10th 2018.
[864] Katumba Wamala shooting: Uganda ministers daughter killed. BBC NEWS. June 1st 2021 for such acts as well as the individuals behind them.

These shootings targeted a section of Muslim leaders in the initial stages though later the lens changed from 2015 when the attacks escalated to senior government officials.[865]

THE MURDER OF WOMEN IN ENTEBBE AND NANSANA

In 2017, a separate type of killing commenced in Uganda. This fashion mainly focused and targeted women between the ages of 18- 36 years in the areas of Kasenyi, Katabi town council, Impala and Nansana municipality.[866]The killed commenced on 3rd May to 4th September 2017 and a total of about 21 women were killed. All the bodies according to postmortem reports had signs of strangulation which depicts the murders to be the same.

The bodies recovered in Nansana seemed to be a bit different. Most of them were found having sticks inserted in their genitals. This was a shocking period and a state of blood to many young and teenage girls. According to Uganda Human Rights, at least two bodies had missing parts namely a face, a leg and breast. [867]

The whole thing was filled with kidnaps that would be followed by murder. A one Suzan Magara was kidnapped and a ransom of 700 million UGX was demanded from the relatives. This dragged the president into investigations and nearly the country's entire intelligence and security community but nothing was to avail. The kidnappers would exhibit a high level of operational sophistication, using up to 17 different simcards to elude tracking for 20 days to collect the ransom, kill the captive and drop or dump their bodies.[868] The murders had a striking resemblance with the bodies bearing signs of manual strangulation while others having sticks inserted in the private parts.

In Nansana municipality, a total of 9 women were killed. On 3rd May 2017, a body of unidentified female adult was found in Nansana West zone. On 28th day of the same month, another identified as Nampijja Juliet alias Natabazi was found behind Kenjoy supermarket. On the same date, unidentified female adult was found in Nansana East 1 Zone. Two others were found dumped near Kenjoy supermarket in Nansana West 1.

The killings continued in Nansana and on 5th July 2017, Birungi Maria was found dead at Nansana East Zone II with signs of manual strangulation. In a few days another body of Nakacwa Teddy, Kyandali Juliet and the other unidentified body were discovered.

In Katabi town council, a sum of 10 was killed in a similar tandem by the murderers. These included Nansubuga Gorreti, Komugisha Faith, Dona Zakanya, Norah Wanyama, Rose Nakimuli, [865] Andrew Otine. Unsolved: Killings by Motorcycle Hitmen and Serial Murder of Women in Uganda. 20th Nov, 2018.

[866] Uganda Human Rights Commission, 2017 p 48.
[867] Uganda Human Rights Commission 2017, pp48-49.
[868] Daily Monitor 2018.

Nakajjo Sarah, Nakasinde Aisha, Nalule Jalia, Nabilanda Mary and the other was unidentified. The other killings took place in Bulaga town and Bwaise where Zawedde Regina and Namuwonge Jennifer were murdered in cold blood. [869]

While talking to parliament about the matter, the Minister for Internal Affairs, Jeje Odong said the deaths were ritualistic, blaming it on the illuminant.[870]

The absence of convincing explanations, by matter creating a public perception that the police force and the security apparatus in general are inept at their duties

The public concern drove the president into anger and unleashed a vehement tirade on the police force, publicly dressing them down as incompetent and infiltrated by "bean weevils" or wrong elements. His words were later followed by changes in police but seem the changes were a mere change of guards and not a fundamental change.

HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS

The wide spread atrocities that were committed during Obotes regime and Idi Amin represented traumatic past which the leaders of NRM and Uganda at large wished to avoid repeating which influenced the government to adopt Institutional reforms that were majorly fostered towards the observance of human rights. In May 1986 after he had taken an oath of allegiance, the NRM government established a commission of inquiry into human rights violations that was charged with investigating the human rights record of all governments that it had replaced since independence until the seizure of power by NRM government.

The commission was to make recommendations on the clear observance of human rights. Although it lacked adequate funding, it was able to carry out extensive hearings throughout Uganda and increased on the rate of human right rights awareness in Uganda. Among its recommendations was the appropriate punishments for human rights violators, the inclusion of human rights culture and education in the general curriculum and the training of army and security forces as well as the establishment of permanent human rights commission.[871]

Following it recommendations, the Uganda Human rights Commission was to be established. Its establishment was amplified by Odoki Constitutional

Commission that defined the proposed functions and powers in significant detail,[872] its recommendations were later adopted in the 1995 Constitution of Uganda and implemented through [869] The Observer. Women murders: Government releases list of 21 victims. September 7th 2017.

[870] Adude, 2017; Lacobini de Fazio 2017
[871] Commission of inquiry into violation of Human Rights Final Report. Entebbe UPPC. 1993.
[872] Uganda Constitutional Commission. Report of the Uganda Constitutional Commission (Entebbe: UPPC, 1993. PP185-188)

the Uganda Human Rights Act of 1997.[873] The next question was on the appropriate administration the Commission. This question was answered by the NRM government through its chairman and president Yoweri Kaguta who appointed Margret Ssekagya and seven members to chair and head as well as overseeing the effective observance of Human rights in Uganda to break away from the previous government as a gear towards achieving the fundamental change a promise by the incumbent to the citizens.

Unknown to many. This was to be overturned by the regime it's self in trying to pursue its interests. Indeed, the Human rights were observed in the initial administration of NRM government.

No one can easily understand what went wrong with NRM administration but perhaps emphasis can be placed on the increased interests by Museveni and his men to lead the country.

The pivotal role played by the unconditional observance of the rule of law and respect to fundamental human rights and freedoms has been the fulcrum in Uganda. A lot of human rights violations, wanton killings, partisan policing, and freezing of accounts of several NGOs emerged in rule of law initiatives, incommunicado detention of human rights defenders and political opponents, trumped up criminal charges against advocates of rule of law.[874]

Uganda is part of the East African community which means it has an obligation under the Constitution of Uganda and the Treaty establishing the East African Community to adhere to good governance standards, rule of law, human rights to all and democratic governance. These are also under Article 7 of the statute of the International criminal court.

The human rights were a point of observance to the framers in the Constitution and hence put under chapter 4. This was to check on the violation of human rights by the regime following recommendations made by the Commission of inquiry in human rights violation.

But despite their provision in the supreme law, the violation of these human rights has been on increase in Uganda. The freedoms of speech, assembly, movement and economic rights all have undermined by the military regime.

In 2019, the government undermined the freedom of expression by imposing new regulations on bloggers and websites by introducing new regulations requiring online operators to apply for authorization to host blogs and websites or risk being shut down. The government continued to censure media outlets and detained outspoken critics of the president.

On top of that, the government continued through UCC to direct 13 radio and television stations to suspend their staff accusing them of airing programs that were unbalanced, sensational and often gave undue prominence to specific individuals. Freedom of speech was silenced by government to cover the president from all the atrocities committed by his government.[875]

[873] The 1995 Constitution , Articles 51-88. See also Uganda Human Rights Commission Act 1997.
[874] Public Statement on the State of The Rule of Law and Human Rights in the Republic of Uganda. Dec 31, 2020

On February 2021, Ugandan military and police officers beat and seriously injured journalists that were covering the delivery of a petition about human rights violation by Musevenis strong opponent Robert Kyagulanyi alias Bobi Wine. This saw over 20 journalists hurt in the attack with at least four sustaining deep cuts on the head that bled profusely. [876]Ideally no one can clearly tell when the human rights violation shall end.

Recently, during the trial of the Peoples Redemption Army suspects in 2005 in the High Court, a group of men dressed in black T shirts known as the Black Mambas attacked the court in Kampala. This was a total failure of the court system and a violation of the right to fair hearing. The principle judge described it as an undespicable act and rape of the High Court and compared it to Amins rule.[877]

Arrest and torture of citizens has also been on a spot light in this regime. Yasin Kawoya was brutarilly tortured by gun wielded men and butted. He was then taken to unknown destination. Although the police denied connection to these men, many people including the human rights lawyer Nicholas Opiyo point to the security forces to be behind all such atrocities. But important to note is that though the human rights violation has always been blamed on the security forces, its roots are fixed in the highest echelons of government.

WHAT WENT WRONG IN THE FORCES

The insecurity that commenced in few years can be greatly attributed to politicization of the security forces and the increased appointment of soldiers in the police force. Important to note is that this insecurity was internal.

ARMY APPOINTMENTS IN POLICE.

This can as well be attributed to appointment of soldiers in the police force following the many soldiers that don police uniforms. This has rised concern among many people but no answers are given. It saw the civil society, the Uganda Law Society and opposition figures alleging that such appointments of the army officers to positions in the police amounts to militarization of the police force.

Mr. Musevenis sentiments against the police became more pronounced in 2001, after he performed poorly in that years hotly contested election at most polling stations in police barracks. The president complained that he would lose if he stood against a cow at a police barracks. This was followed by his appointment of Maj Gen Katumba Wamala as the Inspector General of Police. Katumba was replaced later by Gen Kale Kayihura in 2015.[878] Others like Maj Sabiti Muzeeyi and Paul Lockech a veteran of Somalia were to be deployed in the police force.

[875] Report from the Human Rights Watch in 2019.
[876] Elias Biryabarema. Uganda Security personnel beat journalists covering petition on rights abuses. Retrieved 16th, Jun 2021.
[877] Strike Halts Ugandan High Court. BBC NEWS. 28TH Nov 2005.

Uganda was to reap the fruits of such a mistake in form of murders of women in Kampala, Nansana and Entebbe. The ruthless groups of boda boda 2010, the gross violation of human rights by security, assassinations by gun wielded men, kidnaps and others as shall be analysed later.

BODA BODA 2010 (ABDULLAH KITATTA-POLICE AND NRM)

The vigilant-cum-militia outfit commissioned by the Inspector General of Police in 2010 became to be known as the Boda Boda 2010 under the leadership of NRM chairperson for Lubaga Abdullah Kitatta.

THE BIRTH OF BODA BODA 2020

The alleged persecution, crime and intolerance in the motorcycle transport business is believed to have provided the environment for Boda boda 2010 to emerge. This group was to emerge for barely 7 years. It all started from May 2006, when the commissioner of Police Community Affairs, Mr. Assan Kasingye commissioned hundreds of traffic wardens under the Kampala Union Boda Boda Cyclists Association (Kuboca) led by Mr. Abdu Masokoyi. These were tasked to fight crime and also regulate traffic among boda boda cyclists.[879]

Long after its institution, the Kuboca wardens who were not earning a salary turned to soliciting bribes and making illegal arrests to earn a living which mad it unpopular among riders. This left many of them disgruntled and unsatisfied with the groups conduct.

The harassment of these Kuboca wardens, forced the late Tom Julungu (a former Forum for Democratic Change supporter who was shot dead by the police on June 6th, 2009) with his colleagues to block President Musevenis Convoy asking him to intervene and halt the work of Kuboca due to harassment. They accused the Kuboca of connivance with police and the KCC (Kampala City Council) to collect illegal fines that the officers of the two institutions would alternatively share.

In his move to inquire about this, the president immediately summoned Kale Kayihura who eventually denied the allegations of harassment of cyclists in the bid to obtain funds. As usual the

[878] Jonathan Kamoga. More military men don police uniforms as Uganda polls loom. The East African. July 14th 2019
[879] Daily Monitor. How Boda 2010 emerged. January 21st , 2018.

Inspector General denied the allegations and this marked the end of the Kuboca warden's operations.

In March 7th, 2010, the Inspector General of Police called for a meeting with the cyclists basically to discuss boda boda management in Kampala and the surrounding areas. It seems this was hidden in the move to obtain NRM support in Kampala. It's really challenging how NRM wanted to use police to suppress opposition in Kampala.

After the meeting, the then Town Clerk for Kampala City Council Ms. Ruth Kijjambu announced the election of new leaders for cyclists in Kampala. These were to be conducted on 28th May 2010. But important to note is that all former leaders of boda boda groups were arrested by police on that day.

Mr. Kitatta was elected as the patron and Mr. Antansi Kafeero the chairperson of Kampala central. This marked the beginning and emergency of Boda Boda 2010 that paid allegiance to police and NRM.

THE COMMENCEMENT OF ATROCITIES

The patron of the group Abdullah Kitatta became untouchable. He began to venture into crime while being protected by the authorities because they openly subscribed to the ruling NRM party. They mainly ventured in opposition rallies, hound and beat up opposition supporters to create breathing space for the ruling party. The group acquired guns from the police force to enforce his actions. These guns were used by them to enrich themselves despite the continued allegations nothing was done.

In its activities, while being backed up by the ruling party, the group banned cyclists from showing support to opposition leaders lest they lose their slots at the stages. That's how the atrocities of the group commenced in Kampala und eth direction of police and the ruling party. Many questioned about this group that was threatening civilians in Kampala and where it derived its mandate.

On one fateful day, the group under the ruling party chairperson for Rubaga, Abdullah Kitatta, attacked the bus belonging to Winter land primary School, Kyebando beat up 27 pupils, two teachers and ten security guards including plain clothes police personnel accompanying them.

The children dressed in red, black and yellow national colours were ironically going to perform at celebrations marking the annual police week held at Nkumba University. The bus was stopped and the pupils asked to change from red to any other colour so that they are not mistaken for opposition politicians who have adopted the colour red as a symbol of their fight against lifting a presidential age limit. This happened after the group had vowed to fight whoever challenged the lifting of the presidential age limit.[880]

Ideally, no one could understand the legality of the group working for police and NRM. "This is why Kayihura didn't want them registered under KCCA to know their designated areas. He deploys them to do political work which is too dangerous. So, instead of police fighting these criminals, they fear them, and they continue torturing people which increases crime."[881]

On September 3rd, 2017, Byamukama Desderio a boda boda rider lost his arm in an incident where he was nearly killed by element of the rogue group. He was attacked by 3 members of Boda Boda 2010 who stopped him, sought information about his work station and later attempted to kill him. "I was stopped by 3 people who asked for my card. While I was still on my motorcycle, one of them hit me with a machete on the head. On second attempt, I instead raised my arm which was cut off and then I fell down as though I was dead and the gang took off with my motorcycle.""[882]

Surprisingly, those that reported to police could not obtain justice simply because Kitatta had connections with the senior police officers and at most times files could go missing. "Kitatta intimidates our police officers that are why our files have been disappearing. Sometimes, they would tell us that a certain file had been picked at the police by Kitatta himself and we wonder who Kitatta is." [883] That is how Ugandans were suffering at the hands of reckless people with the support of the police.

Many of the youth lost their lives to the group and others lost their motorcycles which perhaps served as their source of income and these were left helpless. The group was masterminding murders, espionage, robberies and women murders in Wakiso and Entebbe. The group was behind the murder of Case Hospital accountant, Francis Ekalungar.

Francis Ekalungar was reported missing and his body was later discovered burnt beyond recognition and dumped in Kajjansi. It's not clear up to now why Kitatta and his men decided to murder Ekalungar. Kitatta was picked up and arrested by operatives of the chieftaincy of military intelligence from Wakaliga where he was hiding in a lodge for the gruesome murder of Ekalungar Francis.

Surprisingly, after being arrested and sentenced to ten years, the court martial chaired by Turyamubona reduced Kitatta and Ngobis punishment to three years and later were released without spending 2 years in prison despite the many atrocities they committed.[884] Many people were left pondering of how such a group could be formed and operate in the heart of Kampala without reasonable steps being taken especially that up to date no clear information and report is out about this group.

[880] The Observer. Police disown Boda 2010 gang. 6th Oct, 2017
[881] Muwanga Kivumbi shadow Minister for Internal Affairs at Parliament during a press interview. Oct 2017.
[882] Byamukama Desderio during an interview with the Uganda Human Rights Commission.
[883] Siraje a former boda cyclist while talking to Uganda Human Rights Commission and the press.
[884] The Observer. Boda 2010s Kitatta, body guard released from prison Aug 8th, 2020

CHAPTER TEN

PROPER PRESIDENTIAL MANDATE DOS AND DONTS

This chapter involves a requirement for the president to keep balance of his mandate, in other words, to refrain from arbitrariness and excessive in line with the powers of the presidential office. It can also be interpreted as a president exercising his mandate in accordance with the principles of rule of law. In the first instance, respect Article 1 and 2 of the 1995 constitution. That the power and authority belonging to the people. The instances of strangling the democratic principle of independence of the electoral commission must be foregone for proper exercise of proper presidential mandate.

Secondly, the principle of separation of powers, the tendencies of infringing on the independence of the judiciary as has been the unfathomable norm should be constitutionally tightened to secure the integrity of the different arms of government. When there are no loose ends in regards to all branches exercising uninterrupted functions except for the entrance of checks and balances, that then is proper practice of presidential mandate.

Presidents most especially, through annexation of the law tend to misuse it against the citizens under a concept of the "rule by law" the Ugandan president has been commonly marked by this tendency most especially when there is presumed threat on his presidency, the opposition force. It should also be accepted that suffocation of the opposition faction is a dated tactic of ancient regimes, and to rather adopt political intellectualism as a modern tool of proper governance. Which also serves to halt repression against forces of change in a country.

Under Article 99(2)[885] the president is required by law to maintain the constitution and all laws made under. To be the head of state and fountain of honor as stipulated in Article 98 (1)[886] of the Constitution. In line with his mandate to appoint, the president mode of appointment shouldn't be one motivated by personal dealings and partisan politics. The president shouldn't also appoint and dismiss at will as the case of Opolot v attorney General[887]. Since except for parliament, the president's powers of appointment are to be found in all administrative and judicial positions (113, 119 and 119A, 122,142, 146), stretching to government agencies, corporations, and institutions.

Even though the president has appointing powers in the electoral commission of Uganda (60), it is unconstitutional for him to puppet the commission because art, 62 like Article 128 of the constitution promote the independence of the commission. The reality of this notion however has been a subject of debate since the creation of Uganda.

[885] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[886] Ibid
[887] [1969]1 EA 631

The contentions powers of the presidency in times of war and state of emergency (art 110, 1) are the most misused since state of emergency literally denotes the suspension of law and rights and the acquisition of special powers. In this corona era, leaders around the world have passed decrees and legislation expanding their reach during the pandemic. For Uganda's case, the pandemic was untimely in a sense that it struck at the time when general elections where ripe. There has been intrusive surveillance of citizens, encroachment on fundamental human rights and the president declaring it a heavy offence of murder if one is found holding a gathering. Restrictions on movement were also severe and unreasonable because there could be alternative measures for regulated movements. In Hungary the prime minister ruled by decree, in Britain powers of detention were over served, the prime minister of Israel shut down courts and in Chile military rule lingers while Bolivia postponed its election.[888] Therefore under these circumstances the president should refrain from over reaches in the exercise of presidential mandate. Or possible still, parliament should provide a degree for which the emergency powers maybe used. Hence the most important concept in the exercise of presidential powers should be respectful consideration of the rule of law and democracy.

INTERNATIONAL PERSPECTIVE

The fact that most African leaders usurp powers of other organs of the government, such as judiciary and legislature has made it difficult for such leaders even when they commit crimes to be prosecuted before the local courts. But since most of the countries subscribe to international treaties, laws have been put in place to check on their conduct during the tenure of office. These laws are directed to put them on pressure so as to perform and conduct proper while still in office.

Generally, international customary law accords serving presidents absolute immunity from any civil or criminal liability for public or private acts done while they are in office.[889] Where a president has committed an international crime like crime against humanity or war crimes, they may be tried in an international tribunal if the treaty establishing this tribunal so pronounces or may be tried in a foreign domestic court if it has quasi universal jurisdiction over such international crimes making it unlikely that claim to absolute immunity will surface. Examples of these statutes include the Rome Statute that created the International Criminal Court in 2002. This statute does not recognize presidential immunity. Article 27(1) provides that this statute shall apply to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity in particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, a member of Government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this statute nor shall it in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence.

[888] (NYT,march 30, 2020 selamgebrekidan)

[889] Democratic Republic of Congo V Belgium (February, 15, 2002)4ILM 536 (2002).

Article 27 (2) of the Rome Statute provides that immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person whether under national or international law shall not bar the court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person. This is enough to prove that the immunities of African leaders shall not accord them defense before the international criminal court once crimes of international nature are brought against them.

The major obstacle to this court is that it does not have independent powers to arrest and therefore. It generally relies to sister or member states to have this affected. ICC issued an arrest warrant of the president of Sudan. It only had to await the affection of this by designed to supplement domestic prosecution and in that sense it will not take jurisdiction where a given country is willing to do the prosecution. In Africa, this has been natured by the misunderstandings between the African union and the international criminal court. In 2011, upon launching of an arrest warrant for Omar Al Bashir, the African union encouraged African states to defy and ignore the arrest warrant of Bashir and Gaddaffi.[890] This saw many countries denying the order. Majority of them were referred to the Security Council for ignoring this matter. Countries like Kenya, Chad, Malawi, saw this as a joking matter which still makes the idea of a toothless backing dog.[891]

As others defy it, some countries have complied to it since it is there mandate to protect and promote it and in some countries the constitutional immunity is of no consequence. Countries like Kenya and Uganda have adhered to the Rome Statute by enacting Acts like the International Crimes Court Act 2008 of Kenya under section 27 and section 25 (1) of the Uganda International Criminal Court Act of 2010 which provide that such constitutional immunity of the president shall be of no consequence. The Rome Statute has continued in its move to achieve the purpose to mandate national courts with power to arrest serving leaders who are alleged to have committed international crimes.[892] But even where it has expressly provided for such its implementation is law reason being that majority of the African leaders control every agency and organ of the government.

[890] CC Jalloh Regionalising International Criminal Law? Int. Crim. L. Rev 445 (2009).
[891] International Criminal Court Refers African Countries to UN.
[892] International Criminal Court Act of Uganda SS 17 and 18

GOVERNORS' POWERS AND AUTHORITY

Governors, all of whom are popularly elected, serve as the chief executive officers of the fifty states and five commonwealths and territories. As state managers, governors are responsible for implementing state laws and overseeing the operation of the state executive branch. As state leaders, governors advance and pursue new and revised policies and programs using a variety of tools, among them executive orders, executive budgets, and legislative proposals and vetoes.

Governors carry out their management and leadership responsibilities and objectives with the support and assistance of department and agency heads, many of whom they are empowered to appoint. A majority of governors have the authority to appoint state court judges as well, in most cases from a list of names submitted by a nominations committee.

Although governors have many roles and responsibilities in common, the scope of gubernatorial power varies from state to state in accordance with state constitutions, legislation, and tradition, and governors often are ranked by political historians and other observers of state politics according to the number and extent of their powers.

Ranking factors may include the following.

- Qualifications and tenure
- Legislative-including budget and veto- authority
- Appointment sovereignty

Although not necessarily a ranking factor, the power to issue executive orders and take emergency actions is a significant gubernatorial responsibility that varies from state to state.

AFRICAN UNION PERSPECTIVE

This body was adopted to replace the defunct organization of African unity that was formed in 1963 which body was referred to by many scholars as a toothless backing dog. The body mainly worked towards achieving complete independence of African countries. Its chatter did not provide it with the powers to intervene and have civil wars continued and dictatorial leaders continued violating human rights without intervention. This was to be checked upon by the African Union. Its Constitution Act Article 4h) permits it to intervene in member states in respect of grave circumstances especially defined as amounting to war crimes. Article 4(10) rejects impurity, and paragraph (h) states that it condemns and rejects unconstitutional changes of governments, but because the African Union as a body is subscribed to by African countries, the African presidents have always weakened its activities making it hard to achieve its objectives and so the leaders continue with their nasty administration.

PRESIDENTIAL POWERS OF APPOINTMENT

Most of the African countries subscribe to democracy but although it is physically manifested; it is being insidely infected by the desires of most of the African leaders to stay in power. This is backed up by the appointment powers and select their relations, friends, and mostly tribesmate who can fulfill their interests. It is not indispute that indeed, these appointments are the foundations for mal administration in countries. Indeed, it's a trick for all leaders that wish to prolong their administration. In Uganda Gen. Idi Amin appointed his fellow Kakwa tribemates in the army policies and other important offices, assassinated Langi Military officials suspecting them of being Staunch Obote supporters.[893] In Democratic Republic of Congo, history has it that Mobuko Seseko had filled his government with mostly the relatives, friends and tribemates. Generally, this had become a trend in and around Africa.

In order to remedy this, most of the African countries have adopted appointment provisions in their constitutions but it is worth nothing that the powers of appointments vary from country to country and their purpose is achieved basing on their nature and scope.

NATURE AND SCOPE OF PRESIDENTIAL POWERS OF APPOINTMENT

The nature and scope of presidential appointment powers as already noted varies from country to country. Presidents are accorded with powers to appoint and disappoint so long as their actions are justified by the law.[894] The powers of appointment are normally expressly provided for in the constitution and the national for this is to enable the president realize people that shall enable him or her to fulfill his agenda. Basically it is the biggest way the president influences the departments and agencies of the executives.

In South Africa, Article 84 (2) (e) of the Constitution provides that it includes the powers to make any appointments that the constitution or legislature requires the president to make other than as head of the national executive.[895] Just like other countries once the president has conducted the appointment, he cannot remove any person from office except where their conduct falls short of Article 194 which is to the effect that a member of a commission may be removed on any ground of misconduct, incapacity or incompetence finding to that effect by a committee of National Assembly and the adoption by the Assembly of a resolution calling for that person's removal from office. In Zanzibar, the situation is almost the same. Section 110 (2) d of their Constitution empowers the president to make appointments which the constitution or legislature requires the president to make. But this being the case, removal from office of members of the independent commissions is dealt with under section 237 which applies to the removal of judges in office.[896] Once the president has affected an appointment he can only discuss the person in situations where they fell short of certain provisions of the constitution that provide for ceasing of office.

[893] Henry Kyemba. A State of Blood
[894] Shaban Opolot V Attorney General (1969) E.A 631
[895] President of the Republic of South Africa V South African Rugby Football Union [1999]2 ACC 11.

But this is not the situation in other countries. In Namibia, the president has mandate to remove the person he has appointed. This is justified under Article 32(1) and (4) which provides that the president has power to appoint specified persons including other persons or person who are required by other provisions of the constitution or any other law to be appointed by the president. Further Article 32 (6) also supplements on this and provides that subject to the provisions of this constitution or any other law, any person appointed by the President pursuant to the powers vested in him or her by this constitution or any other law may be removed by the president by the same process through which such person was appointed. This stands to be the same situation in Kenya where the president has mandate to appoint and dismiss. Article 132 (2) (f) provides that the president shall nominate and appoint and may dismiss any other state or public officer whom the constitution requires or empowers the president to appoint or dismiss.

In countries like Ghana, this power is so broad. The constitution sets out the list of office leaders who are to be appointed by the president. Article 297 adopts a very broad definition of powers to appoint. It provides that the power to appoint a person to hold or to act in office in the public office in the public services includes the power to confirm appointments to exercise disciplinary control over persons holding or acting in any such office and to remove the person from office.

In the United States of America, the power is not absolute as the president's powers of appointment are confirmed by the senate and these are filled through civil service processes not appointments.[897] The power to appoint is conferred to the president under Article 11 (2) which provides that the president shall nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the United States senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the supreme court and all others of the United States, whose appointments are note here in otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law. But the congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the president alone, in the courts of law or in the Heads of Departments. The President nominates and the senate advises.[898]

In Uganda, just like in other countries, the power of appointment is vested in the present. He dispenses this duty basing on the advice of various commissions like the public service [896] Section 187 of the Constitution of State of Zanzibar as amended.

[897] United States Senate must confirm appointments.
[898] Mc Ginnis, John O. Essays on Article 11: Appointment clauses Heritage Guide to the Constitution. The heritage foundation retrieved Feb, 10, 2018 commission. The judicial service commission advises him on the appointment of judicial offers but their approval is done by parliament. Article 142 (1) provides that the Chief Justice, the Deputy Chief Justice, the Principal Judge, a Justice of the Supreme Court, a Justice of Appeal and a Judge of the High Court shall be appointed by the president acting on the advice of the judicial service commission and with the approval of parliament.[899]

The appointment powers of president in Africa are subject to limitations. This is aimed at reducing excessive use of power and avoiding the usurpation of powers of other organs. As already noted majority of the presidents tend to use this constitutional right to lob for themselves persons that can aid them to fulfill their personal interests. It is this rationale that derives the desire of masses in various jurisdictions to have the appointment powers of incumbents limited as a possible way of achieving a national goal and objective.

LIMITATIONS ON THE POWERS OF PRESIDENTIAL APPOINTMENT

Although the president is mandated to make appointment, there powers are limited and this perhaps is necessary to check on the exercise and misuse of these powers. These powers vary basing on the jurisdiction and the aspirations of the people expressed in the preamble of the constitution. The art of these limitations is in the various forms through which they exist such as requirements for parliamentary approval, membership requirements and limitations on the term of appointment.[900]

CONSULTATION REQUIREMENTS

In some jurisdictions basing in Africa, the president is required by the constitution to consult before appointments are made. In Ghana, Article 70 of the Constitution provides that the president shall in consultation with the Council of State, appoint certain specified persons. Further Article 91 mandates the Council of State to advice the president where appointment is needed. It is worth nothing that even these members of the council are appointed by the president on consultation of Parliament.

MEMBERSHIP REQUIREMENTS

Almost in all jurisdictions around the world, constitutions do express requirements for one to be appointed by the president if they are to assume a particular office. Still the Constitution of Ghana is laud on this under Article 44 (1) that the person cannot be qualified to be appointed as a member of the Electoral Commission unless he qualifies to be a Member of Parliament. In South Africa, the [899] The 1995 Constitution of Republic of Uganda as amended.

[900] Report of the Sierra Leone Constitution Review Committee concerning Executive appointments and Commissions, September, 2014 University of Oxford, Oxford Pro Bruno Publico.

situation is the same. Section 193 of South African Constitution provides that members of any commission of South African must be men and women who are citizens of South Africa. A non citizen cannot be appointed to take up the above mentioned office in East Africa, Article 250 (3) of Kenya's Constitution applies to all the independent commissions established under chapter 15 which requires that to be appointed, a person shall have the specific qualifications required by this constitution or national legislation. On further clarity, Article 250 (1) provides that each commission shall consist of at least three but not more than nine members. Namibia holds the same position. Article 112, which public service commission provides that the commission shall consist of a chairperson and no fewer than 3 and not more than six persons.[901]

LIMITATIONS ON THE TERM OF APPOINTMENT

It is not in dispute that all constitutions provide for a limit on the term for which appointment may be effected. Uganda's constitution requires under Article 144 that a judicial officer may retire at any time after attaining the age of sixty years and shall vacate his or her office (a) in the case of Chief Justice, the Deputy Chief Justice, a Justice of the Supreme Court and Justice of Appeal, an attaining the age of seventy years.[902]

Further Article 250 (6) of Kenya provides that a member of a commission or holder of an independent office shall be appointed for a single term of six years and shall not be eligible for the reappointment. But this has a limitation under Article 171 (4) it provides that members of the Judicial Service Commission apart from the Chief Justice and Attorney General provided they remain qualified, hold office for a term of 5 years and are eligible to be nominated for one further term of five years.

REQUIREMENTS FOR PARLIAMENTARY APPROVAL

This is a general provision in almost all constitutions in Africa. In Uganda, parliamentary approval is a must requirement where the president has appointed a person. Parliament has discretionary powers to approve the appointment on to disapprove. The approval must be done by two thirds of members of parliament. In South Africa, the situation is the same the president is given mandate to appoint members of the South African Human Rights Commission for Gender Equality and the electoral Commission on the recommendations of the National Assembly.[903] Generally Parliamentary approval is a requirement that is guided jealously for its affords checks and balances [901] No appointments can be made without compliance to the constitutional requirements and in failure to comply, the appointments can be challenged in a court of law or may not be approved by Parliament.

[902] The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.
[903] Section 193 (4) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa; 1996 to the exercise of powers vested in the president as the head of the executive arm.

PRESIDENTIAL CORRECTION

A president like any other public servant is entitled to the same rights as do other citizens, may resign from office. Through the principle of checks and balances, the president's powers of hiring and firing plus appointments of public officers are restricted at least, with the approval of Parliament or any commission the president appoints public officials like the justices of c court, civil servants et all. Although the hiring and firing laws were perhaps uncertain among the previous regime as evidently discussed in the 1969 case of Opolot v Attorney General. The court upheld the dismissal of the applicant as commander in the army on grounds that the president enjoyed the prerogative powers of the dismissal of civil servants and public officers without cause.in the proceeding arguments, prior to independence the British crown had the power to dismiss at will for civil and military officers in its service.

Section 44 of the constitution of Uganda (first amendment) act 1963 the prerogative powers of the crown passed to the president and by October 1966, the prerogative powers were, by section 131of the 1966 constitution vested in the president of Uganda on that date. Therefore, the president (Milton Obote) had the right to dismiss at will.

The Opolot ghost seem to be institutionalized in Article 108A (4)(a), but that is corrected by Article 28 and 44 of the constitution. On this case, justice Kanyeihamba through the case of Attorney general v Major General Tinyefuza echoed, that in this age of modernity, democracy and entitlement to human rights and freedoms, Opolot's case can no-longer be treated as good law. Article 132 (4) clearly and emphatically provides for the removal from office of public servants.

PRESIDENTIAL IMPEACHMENT

With great power, comes great responsibility ~ Peter Parker; Spider-man.

Ordinarily, anything done by the president out of the confines of the Constitution and the laws subordinate is tantamount to abuse of the presidential powers. The constitution also envisages this likelihood and provides for ways through which this abuse can be rectified. Article 107 of the Constitution provides thus;

1. The President may be removed from office in accordance with this Article on any of the following grounds

a. abuse of office or willful violation of the oath of allegiance and the presidential oath or any provision of this Constitution;
b. misconduct or misbehaviour-

i. that he or she has conducted himself or herself in a manner which brings or is likely to bring the office of President into hatred, ridicule, contempt or disrepute; or
ii. that he or she has dishonestly done any act or omission which is prejudicial or inimical to the economy or security of Uganda; or

c. physical or mental incapacity, namely that he or she is incapable of performing the functions of his or her office by reason of physical or mental incapacity.

The provision provides for situations when the president can be removed and further provisions on the procedure to be followed. However, never in the history of the Constitution has this provision ever been invoked and yet it can never be said that the president has never abused the power granted by the Constitution. Therefore, it begs the question of which abuses have been made that warrant invoking this provision and why have they gone unpunished?

Impeachment concerns the process by which a legislature or any other legally constituted tribunal initiates charges against a public official for misconduct.[904] Since a president has immunity (As discussed in Chapter 5) against any civil and criminal proceedings while still in office due to the sole executive powers vested in him backed up by other reasons as already explained, the president can be removed from office while still serving through invoking the impeachment provisions of a given jurisdiction. The grounds for institution of these impeachment changes perhaps vary from country to country but the affection of such provisions has been rare despite the increasing breach of such provisions by incumbents especially in Africa.

In Africa, though the conduct of most African leader is nasty and negative, impeachment is and has remained rare. This is due to the fact that most of them rule by or lead by the force of military and therefore they tend to frustrate such motives. Indeed, the impeachment proceedings are a variety in the African context but as noted above it is not surprising given the history of dictatorial regimes, one powerful party system and subservient media. I dearly in Uganda, impeachment has not been witnessed yet and even where Members of Parliament have tried to take such moves, many of their plans have always been ending up on ground crash. Impeachment of a president from office is on grounds of abuse of office or willful violation of the oath of allegiance and the presidential oath. Misconduct or misbehavior that he or she has conducted himself or herself in a manner which brings or is likely to bring the office of president into hatred, ridicule, contempt or disrepute or that he or she has dishonestly done any act or omission which is prejudicial or initial to the economy or security of the country.

[904] Landau, Sidney. Funk and Wagnalls (1996) edition. Standard Desk Dictionary, United States Harper and Row Publishers.

Secondly, due to physical or mental incapacity, [905]Just like in Uganda, even other jurisdictions do adopt impeachment provisions in their constitutions and these are basically done by the Legislative body or organ of government. In Nigeria, impeachment as a form of accountability was first tried by the Legislature in 1985 against Nwabweze Awotokun in 1998 and later Idang in 2002.[906] The impeachment in South Africa is provided for under section 89 of the Constitution and it lays down the procedure for impeachment. The impeachment provisions are able to achieve the purpose basing on their nature and scope.

DEFINITION OF IMPEACHEMENT

The word impeachment is an equivalent of indictment in criminal law. The word impeach is derived from the Middle English "empechen" meaning to impede or accuse, and the Latin impedicare" which means to entangle or put in fetters.[907]

Many scholars have tried to enrich the world with definitions and explanations about impeachment in the basic simplest understanding. Thomas Jefferson explains impeachment to mean a scarecrow of the Constitution.[908] In his broad understanding, Alan Hirsch defines it as the process by which charges are brought against a government official which can result in his removal from office.[909] It can as well be explained to mean a constitutional remedy addressed to serious offences against the system of government. It is the first step in a remedial process of removal from public office and possible disqualification from holding further executive offices.

Therefore, in its broad sense, impeachment is designed as a mechanism for punishing abuse of office under the various Constitutions around the world. It is a form of accountability for crimes committed in office by presidents and other leaders in public offices. It is both constitutional and political arrangements to remove erring public officers from office for gross misconduct or grave violations of the Constitution.

In that sense, an executive officer leaves office not only at the end of his tenure in office or his death or incapacitation as it is the ideal but also upon impeachment. The purpose of impeachment is not personal punishment rather its function is primarily to maintain constitutional governance.[910] In other words, impeachment is not such to punish as to secure the state against its officials misdemeanor.

---

[905] Article 107, Clause 1 of the 1995 Constitution of Republic of Uganda as amended.
[906] Charles Manga and Enyinna. Nwauche. African Journal of Legal Studies 5 (2012) 91-118 on Africa's Imperial Presidents. Immunity; impurity and Accountability. Martinus NIJHOFF Publishers.
[907]JideOgunsakin: Evaluation of impeachment Proceedings under the Constitution of Federal Republic of Nigeria 1999. Journal of Law, Policy and Globalisation [2015] (34) p.132.
[908] Jefferson. T. Political and Government in the United States 2nd Edtn. (Brace and world Inc.1968. p.36.
[909] Alan Hirsch: A Citezens Guide to Impeachment. https://essential-book.org/books/impeach/>accessed 25th June 2021.
[910] See Descher. Ch 14 App.pp 726-728.

THE HISTORY OF IMPEACHMENT

In the old history of man, there were rulers of mankind known as kings during the strong ages. These kings could access power as at birth. These had excess powers and always did as pleased in their eyes. They always had little or no concern of how their governance affected the populace that was governed. As society evolved, there was advancement in man's conscious and raised need to depose those authorities of their untouchable powers which saw the devolution of powers from these strong monarchs to the people.

The needs to check on the authority of the leaders put in places of authority led to the evolution of checks and balances where in arms of government were employed to check on their authority. When checks and balances were observed to be ineffective, there was need for a weapon to check the ultimate decision maker whenever he begins to error and thus impeachment was developed in many democratic societies of the world.[911]

The impeachment process practice dates as far as the 14th Century in the British Parliament. In 1376 Lord Latimer was impeached by the British Parliament; "The Good Parliament."[912]Mitong notes that impeachment developed because certain officers of government were for various reasons placed beyond the reach or ordinary courts. High judicial and Executive officers were not subject to complaints of private individuals in the ordinary courts.[913]

He further remarks that private persons aggrieved by the actions of such officers, turned to Parliament for redress. The House of Commons became the accuser and the House of Lords the body that tried cases of impeachment.

From the year of 1376 when impeachment was first tested in Britain, the practice developed and was adopted gradually in various democracies across the world.

ORIGIN OF IMPEACHMENT

The impeachment ideology was adopted from Britain by the framers of the 1776 American Constitution. They went ahead to make a proper employment of the principle of separation of powers that is through creating a legislative, executive and judiciary.[914] Their history is characterized by only three successful presidential impeachments but no sitting president, however has ever been removed from office.

President Andrew Johnson was the first successfully impeached president of the USA. He came to

[911]MitongDapal. The Concept and Procedures of impeachment.A comparison between Nigeria and the United States of America. Munich, GRIN Verlag. https://www.grin.com/document/512624 [912]Peter Woll, America Government Readings and Cases. (5th Edtn, Little, Brown and Company Canada Ltd. P.102-103.
[913] Ibid
[914]Articles; I, II, III of the Constitution of the United States of America.

power in 1865 and in 1867; the Tenure of Office Act, the violation of which was the legal basis for his impeachment was passed by Congress over Johnsons veto. This act was forbidding the president from dismissing any civil officers appointed with the consent of the Senate without the approval of the Senate. President Johnson removed the Secretary of war Edwin Stanton. This led to his impeachment by Congress and acquitted Senate trials.

The other was President Richard Nixon in 1974, President William S.J Clinton and President Donald Trump. President Richard Nixon resigned office before his impeachment inquiry could be completed in 1974 while J. Clinton and Donald Trump were fully impeached by Congress but as well acquitted at Senate trials.[915] President Trump was impeached for abuse of power and obstruction of Congress making him the third president in history to be charged with committing high crimes and misdemeanors and face removal by the Senate.[916]

IMPEACHMENT IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Removing a sitting president in the United States through impeachment is described as "the most powerful weapon in the political armory short of a civil war."[917] Indeed, there is a wealth of scholarship on the mechanism of impeachment in the United States Constitution.[918]

Its excellence starts from the framers design and then reasons from that design to present applications. As a result, it explores a relatively narrow area within the space of possible constitutional design. For example, it presents an ambiguous term "high crimes and misdemeanors" to define a threshold for presidential removal but interestingly, it fails to specify a standard of proof either for impeachment or conviction as well as failing to specify clearly whether a sitting president can be indicted prior to the completion of impeachment proceedings.[919]

In the US jurisprudence, impeachment may be brought against the president, vice president and all civil officers of the United States. It is instituted through a written accusation document known as Articles of Impeachment" which states the offense charged; in the same way, it serves the same purpose as an indictment in an ordinary criminal proceeding.

This impeachment is expressed by the statement: "the Congress's ultimate weapon against the president is known as impeachment. Most people think this means removal from office but impeachment is only the first step in the process by which Congress can remove a president from

[915] Daniel H. Erskine. The Trial of Queen Caroline and the Impeachment of President Clinton: Law As a weapon for Political Reforms; 7 Wash. U. Global Stud. L. Rev. 1 (2008)
[916]The New York Times. Nicholas Fundos. Dec 18, 2019.
[917]T.F.T.Pluncknett, Presidential Address,3 TRANS, ROYAL.HISTORICAL.145 (1953)
[918]See CASS SUNSTEIN, IMPEACHMENT: A CITIZENS GUIDE (2017).
[919] See U.S Dep't Just: Office of Legal Counsel, A sitting Presidents Amenability to indictment and criminal Prosecution (2000), available at https://www.justice.gov/file/19351/download.

office. Impeachment means the formal bringing of charges against the president. It is the rough equivalent of an indictment in an ordinary criminal case. The Constitution gives the sole mandate of impeachment to the House of Representatives. If the House decides there is sufficient evidence against a president it impeaches, that is, it brings charges against him. The president must then stand trial, with the Senate acting as a judge. If two thirds of the Senate find the president guilty, he is convicted and removed from office." [920]

GROUNDS FOR IMPEACHMENT

The early iterations of the impeachment mechanism considered by 1787 Constitutional Convention limited impeachment only to cases of treason or bribery but George Mason of Virginia opposed this on the basis of insufficiency to remove a president who committed no crime but was inclined towards tyranny.[921] Mason proposed for treason, bribery and mal administration but his mal administration was objected by James Madson. When it was denied attention, Mason put forward treason, bribery or other "high crimes and misdemeanors." It's this that was ultimately adopted in the US Constitution.

From this basis, the grounds for impeachment and conviction were adopted under Article II, section 4 of the US Constitution to include treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors. Another provision of the Constitution that has been construed is one that provides that judges of the Supreme Court and other inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior.

Presidents could only be impeached when the opposition controlled the congress and then only for committing indictable crimes or at least significant violations of the law. However, the debates on impeachment of Clinton and Trump have changed and deepened this conflation between serious crimes and impeachment. These modern impeachments appear to be tied to identification of bad actors.

Importantly to note is that for a president to be impeached and removed from office, their law is designed in a format that two processes are supposed to be complied with. The first concerns impeachment by the House of Representatives and second is the trial by the Senate which is presided over by the Chief Justice of the United States of America.

When the House determines that the grounds for impeachment exist and they are adopted, these are presented to the Senate in Articles of Impeachment for trial which may decide either to acquit or convict them by a two third majority of the members.[922]

[920] Krasner, M.A.Et al; American Government Structure and Process (Macmillan Publishing Co.Inc. New York 1977. P.57-58.
[921] JOHN. R. LABOVITZ; PRESIDENTIAL IMPEACHMENT 2 (1978)
[922]Jeffersons Manual states that: By the usage of Parliament, in impeachment for writing or speaking, the particular

Therefore, impeachment is not removal of any misconducting public officer from office but rather is only a first step in the process by which the Congress removes a president from office; which forms part of the crucial process of removing the president from office before his tenure.

IMPEACHMENT IN AFRICA

In Africa, impeachment proceedings largely depend on the Constitutional design and the nature and scope of crimes covered and the manner in which the proceedings are conducted. Unlike the US where impeachment takes an ambiguous and narrow format, Most African impeachment provisions are more elaborate.

Under most Francophone African Constitutions, the only ground for impeaching the president is treason.[923] Others are more elaborate for example Article 138 of the Constitution of Burkina Faso includes any violation of the Constitution and misappropriation whilst Article 173 of the Chadian Constitution includes threats, grave and systematic violation of human rights, misappropriation of public funds, corruption, drug trafficking, introduction of toxic waste and disposing or storing this on national territory.

The impeachment proceedings are always forwarded conducted and upheld before either a court of impeachment or a High Court of Justice composed of members of Parliament and Judges of the Supreme Court.[924]

In Anglophone Africa, most of the Anglophone Constitutions impeachment provisions are more elaborate and the impeachment crimes include;

a) Crimes of treason and espionage.
b) Willful violation of the Constitution, abuse of office, willful violation of the oath of allegiance.
c) Heinous crimes.
d) Fraudulent conversion of public funds and any other dishonest acts prejudicial or inimical to the economy.
e) Acts that bring or are likely to bring ridicule to the office of president or contempt and disrespect.

In Kenya, Article 1143(1) mandates the impeachment of the president where he has committed crimes under the international law. Further under their jurisprudence, Article 45(A) (2) (a) and (b) remarks that the president can be impeached for violation of laws concerning ethics of public words need not be specified in the accusation. House Rules and manual (Jeffersons manual s.609 (1973)

[923] Article 53of the Constitution of Cameroon and Article 78 of the Constitution of Gabon.

[924] Charles Manga Fombad. Africas Imperial Presidents, Immunity, Impunity and Accountability.

leaders or contravene the conditions concerning the registration of political parties.[925]

In Tanzania, Article 46(A) (5) of the Constitution requires the president to step aside or vacate his office when allegations are made against him and the impeachment proceedings commence against him. A special committee is instituted by Parliament to investigate the allegations and make recommendations to Parliament. The president is impeached by a majority vote of two thirds. In Uganda, impeachment is under Article 107[926] which provides crimes such as unlawful violation of oath of allegiance, misconduct or misbehavior, physical or mental incapacity of the president.

Surprisingly, nothing has yet been done to the president despite the massive embezzlement, frequent violation of the Constitution including the change of the term limits after bribing members of Parliament in 2005.[927]

In Africa, impeachment incidents remain rare and perhaps nonexistent. The Challenge is that most of the elaborate impeachment provisions have been manipulated by the African leaders making them dead ab initio.

The important factor to consider is that impeachment in Africa is more political than being a legal process. It is dependent on the weight of Parliamentary majorities which is difficult to see how it can effectively operate or pose a veritable threat to the abuse of office by African imperial presidents which is way different from that of the state.

THE NATURE, SCOPE AND EFFECT OF IMPEACHMENT PROVISIONS

Impeachment is one of the most affordable and appropriate way of punishing abuse of office under the comment system of administration throughout the world. This however depends on the nature and scope of crimes covered and the manner in which the proceedings are conducted. It as well the only genuine way of accountability for crimes committed while in office by the presidents it is basically provided in most of the constitutions worldwide. As emphasized its adoption is to restrain leaders from poor conduct that may destroy or tarnish the dignity of the office of the president and the country's image.

In most of the Francophone countries, the only ground for impeachment is treason.[928] But this is way different from Anglophone countries for example Article 138 of Constitution of Burkina Faso provides that it may occur in case of violation of the constitution and misappropriation. This is not different with Chad. In its constitution, Article 173 provides that this may include threats, grave and systematic violations of human rights, misappropriation of public funds, corruption, drug [925]Supra.

[926]The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.
[927] See. " Corruption Endemic in Uganda," https://www.guardian.co.uk/katine/2009/mar/13/corruption.endemic-in-uganda.
[928] Article 53 of the Cameroon Constitution and Article 78 of the Constitution of the Republic of Gabon trafficking introduction of toxic waste and disposing or storing this on natural territory. But proceedings are also strict and conducted before court of Justice of Members of Parliament and judges of the Supreme Court.

In Anglo phone countries, the provisions of impeachment are so broad that they tend to include crimes of treason and espionage, willful violation of the constitution, heinous crimes any conduct that is likely to bring ridicule of the office. This is the case in Kenya, Article 143 (s) provides for the impeachment of the president where there are serious reasons for believing that he has committed a crime under international law. Further Article 46 (a) and (b) makes it an impeachment crime president to violate any law concerning the ethics of public leaders or contravene the conditions concerning registration of political parties. In Tanzania's constitution, impeachment is as well provided for and this particularly is under Article 46 (A) (5) and Article 175 of the Chadian the president is required to vacate office immediately when allegations are made against him and the impeachment proceedings commence. It is challenging that even when provisions do provide that the president be impeached, nothing is done to affect them reason being they tend to look at the laws to be lower than them. We should actually say that the impeachment provisions have done nothing towards checking on bad governance in Africa.

In the United States of America impeachment is as well recognized by their constitution. It's not way different from that of Africans. The constitution permits Congress to remove presidents before their term is up if enough law makers vote to say that they committed treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors. In the American history, impeachment has been tested. This has been through the two presidents they were impeached. The first was President Andrew Johnson in 1868 and Bill Clinton in 1988 and both were ultimately acquitted and completed their terms in office. The power of impeachment is given to the House of representations under Article 1 and clause 5, Article 1, 2 classes gives the senate the sole power to try all impeachments. The house of representations shall have the sole power of impeachment and the senate shall house the sole power to try all impeachments but no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two thirds of the members present[929]. It should be noted that actually all civil officers of the United States are subject to impeachment. This justices Alexander Hamilton's writing that impeachment is a method of national inquest into the conduct of public men accused of violating trust.[930]

Primarily, impeachment's practicability has been justified in developed countries where democracy forms the basis of national governance and its failure in some regions like Africa it has been due to political legal darkness created by the power thirsty men in the region.

[929] Article 11 clause 3 of the American Constitution
[930] The Federalist No. 65

CAN WE SPEAK OF IMPEACHMENT?

Impeachment is the process by which a legislative body or other legally constituted tribunal initiates charges against a public official for misconduct.[931] Impeachment may be understood as a unique process involving both political and legal elements.[932]

In Europe and Latin America impeachment tends to be confined to ministerial officials[933] as the unique nature of their positions may place the minister beyond the reach of the law to prosecute, or their misconduct is not codified into law as an offense except through the unique expectations of their high office. Both "peers and commoners" have been subject to the process however.[934] From 1990 to 2020 there have been at least 272 impeachment charges against 132 different heads of state in 63 countries.[935] Most democracies (with the notable exception of the United States) involve the courts (often a national constitutional court) in some way.[936]

In Latin America, which includes almost 40% of the world's presidential systems, ten presidents from six countries were removed from office by their national legislatures via impeachments or declarations of incapacity between 1978 and 2019.[937]

Even the greatest leaders of the greatest democracies have faced impeachment for being found incompetent or portraying misconduct. The impeachment of Bill Clinton occurred when Bill Clinton, the 42nd president of the United States, was impeached by the United States House of Representatives of the 105th United States Congress on December 19, 1998 for "high crimes and misdemeanours". The House adopted two Articles of impeachment against Clinton, with the specific charges against Clinton were lying under oath and obstruction of justice. Two other Articles had been considered, but rejected by House vote.

---

[931]Landau, Sidney; Brantley, Sheila; Davis, Samuel; Koenigsberg, Ruth, eds. (1996). Funk & Wagnall's Standard Desk Dictionary. 1 (1996 ed.). United States: Harper & Row, Publishers, Inc. p. 322. ISBN 978-0-308-10353-5. 1. To charge (a high public official) before a legally constituted tribunal with crime or misdemeanor in office. 2. To bring discredit upon the honesty or validity of.

[932]Michael J. Gerhardt (2019). The Federal Impeachment Process: A Constitutional and Historical Analysis (3d ed.). University of Chicago Press. pp. 106–07. The ratification debates support the conclusion that 'other high Crimes and Misdemeanors' were not limited to indictable offenses but rather included great offenses against the federal government. ... Justices James Wilson and Joseph Story expressed agreement with Hamilton's understanding of impeachment as a political proceeding and impeachable offenses as political crimes.

[933]Davidson, Roger (2005). "Impeachment". World Book Encyclopedia. I 10 (2005 ed.). Chicago. p. 92. ISBN 0-7166-0105-2.

[934]"Impeachment". UK Parliament Glossary. Retrieved 5 February 2021. Impeachment is when a peer or commoner is accused of 'high crimes and misdemeanours, beyond the reach of the law or which no other authority in the state will prosecute.'

[935]Lawler, David. "What impeaching leaders looks like around the world". Axios.

[936]Huq, Aziz; Ginsburg, Tom; Landau, David. "Designing Better Impeachments: How other countries' constitutions protect against political free-for-alls". Boston Review. Retrieved 8 February 2021. Constitutions in 9 democracies give a court—often the country's constitutional court—the power to begin an impeachment; another 61 constitutions place the court at the end of the process.

[937]Ignacio Arana Araya, To Impeach or Not to Impeach: Lessons from Latin America, Georgetown Journal of International Affairs (December 13, 2019).

Clinton's impeachment came after a formal House inquiry, which had been launched on October 8, 1998. The charges for which Clinton was impeached stemmed from a sexual harassment lawsuit filed against Clinton by Paula Jones and from Clinton's testimony denying that he had engaged in a sexual relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. The catalyst for the president's impeachment was the Starr Report, a September 1998 report prepared by Independent Counsel Ken Starr for the House Judiciary Committee.[938]

Clinton was the second American president to be impeached (the first being Andrew Johnson, who was impeached in 1868)

The approved Articles of impeachment would be submitted to the United States Senate on January 7, 1999. A trial in the Senate then began, with Chief Justice William Rehnquist presiding. On February 12, Clinton was acquitted on both counts as neither received the necessary two-thirds majority vote of the senators present for conviction and removal from office—in this instance 67. On Article One, 45 senators voted to convict while 55 voted for acquittal. On Article Two, 50 senators voted to convict while 50 voted for acquittal.[939] Clinton remained in office for the remainder of his second term.[940]

In the same country, much more recently, there has been an attempt to impeach Donald Trump. Twice!

The second impeachment trial of Donald Trump, the 45th president of the United States, began on February 9, 2021, and concluded with his acquittal on February 13. Trump had been impeached for the second time by the House of Representatives on January 13, 2021. The House adopted one Article of impeachment against Trump: incitement of insurrection. He is the only U.S. President and only federal official to be impeached twice.[941] The Article of impeachment addressed Trump's attempts to overturn the 2020 presidential election results (including his false claims of election fraud and his efforts to pressure election officials in Georgia) and stated that Trump incited the storming of the Capitol in Washington, D.C., while Congress was convened to count the electoral votes and certify the victory of Joe Biden and Kamala Harris.[942]

At the beginning of the trial, Senator Rand Paul forced a vote to dismiss the impeachment charge on the basis that it was unconstitutional to try a former president because the sole remedy for impeachment and conviction is removal from office and Trump was no longer holding the office.

[938]Glass, Andrew (October 8, 2017). "House votes to impeach Clinton, Oct. 8, 1998". Politico

[939]Baker, Peter (February 13, 1999). "The Senate Acquits President Clinton". The Washington Post. The Washington Post Co.

[940]Riley, Russell L. "Bill Clinton: Domestic Affairs". millercenter.org. Charlottesville, Virginia: The Miller Center, University of Virginia

[941]Fandos, Nicholas (January 8, 2021). "How to Impeach a President in 12 Days: Here's What It Would Take". New York Times.

[942]Fandos, Nicholas (January 13, 2021). "Trump Impeached for Inciting Insurrection". New York Times.

The motion was defeated in a 55–45 vote, with all Democrats, both independents, and five Republicans (Susan Collins of Maine, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, Mitt Romney of Utah, Ben Sasse of Nebraska, and Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania) voting against the motion.[943] This was the first time that a former president had been tried. Jamie Raskin was the lead impeachment manager and the primary author; along with Representative David Cicilline and Representative Ted Lieu – of the impeachment Article, which charged Trump with inciting an insurrection by sparking the storming of the Capitol. Joaquin Castro, Eric Swalwell, Madeleine Dean, and Stacey Plaskett also assisted in delivering the oral arguments for conviction.

Trump's defense was led by Michael van der Veen, a personal injury lawyer from Philadelphia, along with David Schoen and Bruce Castor. Van der Veen's style and substance during the trial drew criticism from many, with gasps and laughter in the Senate when he stated that he would seek to depose at least 100 people at his Philadelphia office, including Nancy Pelosi and Vice President Kamala Harris. Trump had originally hired Butch Bowers and Deborah Barbier to represent him, but they quit along with three other lawyers after "the former president wanted the lawyers representing him to focus on his allegations of mass election fraud and that the election was stolen from him."[944]

At the conclusion of the trial, the Senate voted 57–43 to convict Trump of inciting insurrection, falling 10 votes short of the two-thirds majority required by the Constitution, and Trump was therefore acquitted. Seven Republican senators joined all Democratic and independent senators in voting to convict Trump, the largest bipartisan vote for an impeachment conviction of a U.S. president.[945]

Africa has over time proven to have a rather more interesting way of showing their disinterest in the leadership of a president deemed incompetent of misconducting oneself.

The most recent situation was in Sudan, 11 April 2019. Omar al-Bashir, who had been in power for 30 years, was ejected by the army and placed in detention — following four months of civil protests. Consequently, a Transitional Military Council was established.[946]

That same month, only a few days earlier, 2 April 2019, Abdelaziz Bouteflika — who was in power for 20 years in Algeria, resigned after a month of unprecedented protests against his run for a fifth term. Many Algerians, frustrated with the political system, continued to raise their voices for over a

[943]Hughes, Siobhan; Wise, Lindsay (January 26, 2021). "Most Republican Senators Reject Constitutionality of Trump Impeachment". Wall Street Journal.
[944]O'Connell, Oliver. "Trump impeachment lawyers quit after he 'demanded they repeat election fraud claims'". The Independent [945]Fandos, Nicholas (February 13, 2021). "Trump Acquitted of Inciting Insurrection, Even as Bipartisan Majority Votes 'Guilty'". New York Times.
[946]https://www.africanews.com/2020/08/20/a-brief-look-at-african-leaders-ousted-out-of-power// year until the arrival of the Covid-19 pandemic halted their activism.

South Africa's first Zulu president, Jacob Zuma who was sworn in May 2009 and made to resign, 14 February 2018 — under the threat of impeachment and pressure from his political party, the African National Congress (ANC). The party was eager to close the chapter on Zuma's corruption scandals. Current president Cyril Ramaphosa succeeded him.

In Zimbabwe Robert Mugabe, abandoned by his supporters and the army after 37 years in office resigned 21 November 2017. This was amidst debates at the National Assembly over his dismissal. His former vice-president Emmerson Mnangagwa, who himself had been sacked two weeks earlier, later assumed the position as president.

Blaise Compaoré, in Burkina Faso who was in power for 27 years, resigned 31 October 2014, due to public pressure before then eventually going into exile.

In the Central African Republic, Michel Djotodia, who proclaimed himself President of the Republic on 24 March 2013 after the then-president, François Bozizé was overthrown by the Seléka rebels and fled the country — only for Djotodia to be ousted himself out of power, 10 January 2014.

In Egypt, Mohamed Morsi, the successor to Hosni Mubarak and the first head of state to emerge from a democratic election, was overthrown, 3 July 2013, by General Abdel Fattah al-Sissi. Still in Egypt years before, Hosni Mubarak was ousted after an 18-day revolt and the army took over leadership of the country.

A putsch led by the vice-chief of staff, General Mamadu Ture Kuruma, overthrew interim President Raimundo Pereira and Prime Minister Carlos Gomes Júnior, 12 April 2012, in Guinea-Bissau amidst a presidential election dispute.

Libyan head of state, Muammar Gaddafi, was assassinated, 20 October 2011, in Sirte — facing an uprising that turned into armed conflict.

And to bring it all back around, Mali has already seen a military coup in March 2012 when soldiers overthrew Amadou Toumani Touré's regime. They cited "incompetence" in the fight against Islamist groups and the Tuareg rebellion in the North as their reasons. The now-removed Ibrahim Boubacar Keïta came into power months later in 2013.

Impeachment has only been used as a threat in Africa to force a resignation. Many other rough and far-reaching measures have been used instead. This is not particularly desirable to the peace and development of these countries because many were still struggling in development.

However, many countries have done this before. Either by invoking their impeachment clause or use other rudimentary methods. Therefore, it can be agreed that should the Ugandans make up their mind, something can be done to check the presidential powers.

I need to stress once again that the whole reason why our fore fathers fought tirelessly to topple the colonial government was so that we could live a life governed with serenity and compassion. This dream was the soil and roof for the different countries that were built. For those who built on a strong dream, they have since realised their fruits. For those who built on feeble dreams, or who did not guard theirs jealously, continue to burn in the fire they started.

A COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND AFRICA.

Many scholars have documented literature concerning impeachment and its law levels of success for removal of presidents and other public officials but none of them has drawn attention or systematically examined the design dimensions of presidential impeachment systems from a comparative perspective or analysis. The design for removal of chief executives is a matter of reflection on the Constitutional design of impeachment provisions which implicates a number of questions that are fundamental to a democracy and yet remain relatively unexplained. [947]

This paper therefore analyses the impeachment of leaders in a comparative analysis or perspective in the United States of America visa-vi African context. It presents a comparative analysis of how the question of impeachment is addressed in USA and how it differs or relates with the African constitutional design in terms of impeachments for executives. It starts by defining impeachment, its purpose, history and proceeds to give a clue as to what legal and political factors matter in practice.

Indeed, impeachment is an important power in every political system to the extent that even traditional monarchies have some procedures for removing such kings who are incapacitated or incompetent.[948] However, my descriptive findings and normative suggestions focus on fixed term executives mainly presidents and parliamentarians which are mainly in an array of political systems and basically presidential and Parliamentary systems.

UNITED STATES CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS OF THE DOCTRINE OF PRESIDENCY

Article two of the United States Constitution establishes the executive branch of the federal government, which carries out and enforces federal laws. Article Two vests the power of the executive branch in the office of the president of the United States, lays out the procedures for electing and removing the president, and establishes the president's powers and responsibilities.

[947]Tom Ginsburg and Alberto Simpsor. Introduction in CONSTITUTION IN AUTHORITARIAN REGIMES 1,6 (Tom Ginsburg and Alberto Simpser, eds, 2013.

[948] Indeed between 1327 and 1485, five English monarchs were deposed following the question of monarchical removal during the middle ages. See William Huse Dunham and Charles T. Wood. The Right to Rule in England: Deposition and the Kingdoms Authority, 1327-1485, 81 AM.HIST.REV,738-9 (1976).

Section 1 of Article Two establishes the positions of the president and the vice president, and sets the term of both offices at four years. Section 1's Vesting Clause declares that the executive power of the federal government is vested in the president and, along with the Vesting Clauses of Article One and Article Three, establishes the separation of powers among the three branches of government. Section 1 also establishes the Electoral College, the body charged with electing the president and vice president.

Section 1 provides that each state chooses members of the Electoral College in a manner directed by each state's respective legislature, with the states granted electors equal to their combined representation in both houses of congress. Section 1 lays out the procedures of the Electoral College and requires the House of Representatives to hold a contingent election to select the president if no individual wins a majority of the electoral vote. Section 1 also sets forth the eligibility requirements for the office of the president, provides procedures in case of a presidential vacancy, and requires the president to take an oath of office.

Section 2 of Article Two lays out the powers of the presidency, establishing that the president serves as the commander-in-chief of the military, among many other roles. This section gives the president the power to grant pardons.

Section 2 also requires the "principal officer" of any executive department to tender advice.

Though not required by Article Two, President George Washington organized the principal officers of the executive departments into the cabinet, a practice that subsequent presidents have followed. The treaty clause grants the president the power to enter into treaties with the approval of two-thirds of the senate. The Appointments Clause grants the president the power to appoint judges and public officials subject to the advice and consent of the senate, which in practice has meant that presidential appointees must be confirmed by a majority vote in the senate. The Appointments Clause also establishes that congress can, by law, allow the president, the courts, or the heads of departments to appoint "inferior officers" without requiring the advice and consent of the senate. The final clause of section 2 grants the president the power to make recess appointments to fill vacancies that occur when the senate is in recess.

Section 3 of Article Two lays out responsibilities of the president, granting the president the power to convene both houses of congress, receive foreign representatives, and commission all federal officers. Section 3 requires the president to inform congress of the "state of union"; since 1913 this has taken the form of a speech referred to as the state of the union. The recommendation clause requires the president to recommend measures s/he deems "necessary and expedient" the Take Care Clause requires the president to obey and enforce all laws, though the president retains some discretion in interpreting the laws and determining how to enforce them.

Section 4 of Article two establishes that the president and other officers can be removed from office through the impeachment process, which is further described in Article one;

Section 1: President and vice president

The executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the Term of four years, and, together with the vice president, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows:

Section one begins with a vesting clause that confers federal executive power upon the president. Similar clauses are found in Article I and Article III; the former bestows federal legislative power exclusively to congress, and the latter grants judicial power solely to the Supreme Court, and other federal courts established by law. These three Articles together secure a separation of powers among the three branches of the federal government, and individually, each one entrenches checks and balances on the operation and power of the other two branches.

Article one grant certain powers to congress, and the Vesting Clause does not reassign those powers to the president. In fact, because those actions require legislation passed by congress which must be signed by the president to take effect, those powers are not strictly executive powers granted to or retained by congress per se. nor were they retained by the US congress as leftovers from the Articles of confederation. The Articles of confederation, continental congress and its powers were abolished at the time the new U.S. Congress was seated and the new federal government formally and officially replaced its interim predecessor. And although the president is implicitly denied the power to unilaterally declare war, a declaration of war is not in and of itself a vehicle of executive power since it is literally just a public declaration that the U.S government considers itself "at war" with a foreign political entity.

Regardless of the inability to declare war, the president does have the power to unilaterally order military action in defense of the United States pursuant to "a national emergency created by attack upon the United States, its territories or possessions, or its armed forces."

By U.S law, this power is limited in that he must notify congress within 48 hours after the beginning of military operations, explaining the source of his authority for the action. Once proper legal notification is given to the required members of congress, military action can continue for upto90 days if the president "determines and certifies to the congress in writing that unavoidable military necessity respecting the safety of united states Armed forces requires the continued use of such armed forces in the course of bringing about a prompt removal of such forces."

As treaties are by U.S law official agreements with foreign governments recognized as such only after senate ratification, the president obviously cannot make treaties unilaterally.

However, the president does determine and decide U.S foreign policy, and can enter into non-binding discussions and give conditional approval to agreements reached with foreign governments subject to senate ratification at a future date.

Additionally, since official treaties are specifically created under and by constitutional U.S law, and are entered into both government and the people as a whole, in their capacity as head of state and as the single individual representative of the United States and its citizens, the president does have co authority and constitutional duty to unilaterally withdraw the united states from treaties if he or she determines the best interests and wellbeing of the U.S and its citizens are benefitted by doing so.

As far as presidential appointments, as with treaties a person is not officially and legally appointed to a position until their appointment is approved by the senate. Prior to senate approval and publication of that approval along with an official date and time for their swearing-in and assumption of duties and responsibilities, they are nominees rather than appointees. And again, the president nominates people for specific positions at their pleasure and can do so without or in spite of senate advice. Senate consent occurs when a majority of senators votes to approve and therefore appoint a nominee.

The head of the executive branch is the president. Although also named in this first clause, the vice president is not constitutionally vested with any executive power. Nonetheless, the constitution dictates that the president and the vice president are to be elected at the same time, for the same term, and by the same constituency. The framers' intent was to preserve the independence of the executive branch should the person who was vice president succeed to the duties of the presidency.

Section 2: presidential powers

In the landmark decision Nixon v General Services Administration (1977), Justice William Rehnquist, afterwards the Chief Justice, declared in his dissent "it would require far more of a disclosure than could profitably be included in an opinion such as this to fully describe the preeminent position that the president of the united states occupies with respect to our republic. Suffice it to say that the president is made the sole repository of the executive powers of the united states, and the powers entrusted to him as well as the duties imposed upon him are awesome indeed."

Unlike the modern constitutions of many other countries, which specify when and how a state of emergency maybe declared and which rights may be suspended, the U.S constitution itself includes no comprehensive separate regime for emergencies. Some legal scholars according to the Atlantic believe however that the constitution gives the president inherent emergency powers by making him commander in chief of the armed forces, or by vesting in him a broad, undefined "executive power".

Congress has delegated at least 136 distinct statutory emergency powers to the president, each available upon the declaration of an emergency. Only 13 of these require a declaration from congress; the remaining 123 are assumed by an executive declaration with no further congressional input.

Congressionally-authorized emergency presidential powers are sweeping and dramatic and range from seizing control of the internet to declaring martial law. This led the magazine The Atlantic to observe that "the misuse of emergency powers is a standard gambit among leaders attempting to consolidate power", because, in the words of Justice Robert H Jackson's dissent in Korematsu v United States (1944), the decision that upheld the internment of Japanese Americans, each emergency power "lies about like a loaded weapon, ready for the hand of any authority that can bring forward a plausible claim of an urgent need."

Section 3: presidential responsibilities

He shall from time to time give to the congress information of the state of the union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extra ordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of Disagreement between them, with respect to the time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the united states.

Section 4: Impeachment

The president, vice president and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on Impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

The constitution allows for involuntary removal from office of the president, vice president, cabinet secretaries, and other executive officers, as well as judges, who may be impeached by the House of Representatives and tried in the senate.

Any official convicted by the senate is immediately removed from office, and to prevent the president's Article II appointment power from being used as a de-facto pardon the senate may also vote by a simple majority, that the removed official be forever disqualified from holding any future office under the United States. Constitutional law expert senator Matthew Carpenter reported that without the permanent disqualification clause impeachment would have no effect, because the president could simply reinstate his impeached officers "the next morning."

While no other punishments may be inflicted pursuant to the impeachment proceeding, the convicted party remains liable to trial and punishment in the courts for civil and criminal charges.

WESTERN CUSTOMS ON PRESIDENTIAL POWERS.

Article 2 of the US constitution creates the executive branch of the government consisting of the president, the vice president and other executive officers chosen by the president. Perhaps the most important of all presidential powers is command of the US States Armed Forces as commander- in-chief. While the power to declare war is constitutionally vested in Congress, the president commands and directs the military and is responsible for planning military strategy.

Along with the armed forces, the president also directs U.S foreign policy. Through the department of state and the Department of Defense, the president is responsible for the protection of Americans abroad and of foreign nationals in the US.

The president decides whether to recognize new nations and new governments and negotiations treaties with other nations, which become binding on the United States when approved by two-thirds vote of the Senate.

The president also has the power to nominate federal judges, including members of the US courts of appeals and the supreme court of the US.

The constitution's ineligibility clause prevents the president from simultaneously being a member of Congress. Therefore, the president cannot directly introduce legislative proposals for consideration in Congress.

WESTERN LIMITATIONS ON PRESIDENTIAL POWERS

INELIGIBILITY CLAUSE.

The constitution's ineligibility clause prevents the president from simultaneously being a member of Congress. Therefore, the president can not directly introduce legislative proposals for consideration in Congress.

Twenty third amendment under the Twenty Third Amendment, the District of Columbia may choose no more electors than the state with the lowest number of electoral votes. No senators, representatives or federal officers may become electors.

War powers Resolution: The War Powers Resolution of 1973 (50.U.S.C 1541-1548 L1) is a federal law intended to check the president's power to commit the U.S to an armed conflict without the consent of the Congress. The resolution was adopted in the form of a US congress joint resolution, this provides that the president can send US armed forces into action abroad only by authorization of congress or in case of "a national emergency created to attack upon the US, its territories or possessions, or its armed forces".

SENATORIAL COURTESY.

A written political custom (or constitutional convention) in the US whereby the president consults the Senior US Senator of his political party of a given state before nominating any person to a federal vacancy within that Senator's state.

The expressed powers of the president are those expressed in the constitution of the US. Article 2 of the US constitution creates the executive branch of the government consisting of the president, the vice president and other executive officers chosen by the president.

Clause 1 states "that the executive power shall be vested in a president of the US of America. He shall be"

CRITIQUE IN RELATION TO THE LIMITATIONS ON THE SAME.

Recent weeks have seen increased global media attention to Uganda following the incidents surrounding the arrest of popular musician and legislator, Bobi wine; emblematic events that have marked the shrinking democratic space in Uganda and the growing popular struggles for political change in the country.

The spotlight is also informed by wider trends across the continent over the past few years- particularly the unanticipated fall of veteran autocrats Muammar Gaddafi in Libya, Hosni Mubarak in Egypt, Yaya Jammeh in Gambia, and most recently Robert Mugabe in Zimbabwe- which led to speculation about whether Yoweri Museveni, in power in Uganda since 1986, might be the next to exist this shrinking club of Africa's strongmen.

Yet the Museveni state, and the immense presidential power that is its defining characteristics, has received far less attention, thus obscuring some of the issues at hand. Comprehending its dynamics requires paying attention to at least three turning points in the National Resistance Movement's history, which resulted in a gradual weeding-out of Museveni's contemporaries and potential opponents from the NRM, then the mobilization of military conflict to shore up regime legitimacy, and the policing of urban spaces to contain the increasingly frequent signals of potential revolution. Together, these dynamics crystallized presidential power in Uganda, run down key state institutions, and set the stage for the recent tensions and likely many more to come.

UGANDA AS A COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS

The constitution of the Republic of Uganda 1995 (as amended) provides that;

Article 98,

(1) There shall be a president of Uganda who shall be the Head of State, Head of Government and commander-in-chief of the Uganda People's Defense Forces and the fountain of honor.

(2) The president shall take precedence over all persons in Uganda, and in descending order, the Vice President, the Speaker, and the Chief Justice shall take precedence over all other persons in Uganda.

(3) Before assuming the duties of the office of president, a person elected President shall take and subscribe the oath of allegiance and the presidential oath specified in the fourth schedule to this constitution.

(4) While holding office, the president shall not be liable to proceedings in any court.

(5) Civil or criminal proceedings maybe instituted against a person after ceasing to be president, in respect of anything done or omitted to be done in his or her personal capacity before or during the term of office of that person; and any period of limitation in respect of any such proceedings shall not be taken to run during the period while that person was president.

Article 99, executive authority of Uganda;

(1) The executive authority of Uganda is vested in the president and shall be exercised in accordance with this constitution and the laws of Uganda.

(2) The president shall execute and maintain this constitution and all laws made under or continued in force by this constitution.

(3) It shall be the duty of the president to abide by, uphold and safeguard this constitution and the laws of Uganda and to promote the welfare of the citizens and protect the territorial integrity of Uganda.

(4) Subject to the provisions of this constitution, the functions conferred on the president by clause (1) of this Article may be exercised by the president either directly or through officers subordinate to the president.

(5) A statutory instrument or other instrument issued by the president or any person authorized by the president maybe authenticated by the signature of a Minister; and the validity of any instrument so authenticated shall not be called in question on the ground that it is not made, issued or executed by the president.

Article 100, notification of the absence of the President from Uganda.

The President shall, whenever leaving Uganda, notify in writing the Vice President, the Speaker and the Chief Justice.

Article 101, Presidential addresses;

(1) The President shall, at the beginning of each session of Parliament, deliver to Parliament an address on the state of the nation.

(2) The president may, also, in consultation with the Speaker, address Parliament from time to time, on any matter of national importance.

Article 102, Qualifications of the president;

A person is not qualified for election as president unless that person is-

(a) A citizen of Uganda by birth

(b) Not less

(c) than thirty five years and not more than seventy-five years of age; and

(d) A person qualified to be a Member of Parliament.

Article 103, election of the president;

(1) The election of the president shall be universal adult suffrage through a secret ballot.

(2) A person shall be a candidate in a presidential election unless-

(a) that person submits to the Electoral Commission on or before the day appointed as nomination day in relation to the election, a document which is signed by that person nominating him or her as a candidate; and

(b) The nomination is supported by one hundred voters in each of at least two-thirds of all districts in Uganda.

(3) Apart from the election required to be held by clause (2) of Article 61 of this constitution, election of the president shall also be held in the following circumstances-

(a) An election held under clause (6) of Article 104 of this constitution;

(b) An election held under clause (3) of Article 105 of this constitution

(c) An election held under clause (2) of Article 109 of this constitution; and

(d) An election necessitated by the fact that a normal presidential election could not be held as a result of the existence of a state of war or a state of emergency, in which case, the election shall be held within such period as Parliament may, by law, prescribe.

(4) A candidate shall not be declared elected as president unless the number of votes cast in favor of that candidate at the presidential election is more than 50 percent of valid votes cast at the election.

(5) Where at a presidential election no candidate obtains the percentage of votes specified in clause (4) of this Article, a second election shall be held within thirty days after the declaration of the results in which election the two candidates who obtained the highest number of votes shall be only candidates.

(6) The candidate who obtains the highest number of votes in an election under clause (5) of this Article shall be declared elected president.

(6a) notwithstanding the provisions of clauses (4) and (6) of this Article, where, in a presidential election only one candidate is nominated, after the close of nominations, the Electoral Commission shall declare that candidate elected unopposed.

(7) The Electoral Commission shall ascertain, publish and declare in writing under its seal, the results of the presidential election within forty-eight hours from the close of polling.

(8) A person elected President during the term of a president shall assume office within twenty four hours after the expiration of the term of the predecessor and in any other case, within twenty-four hours after being declared elected as President.

(9) Subject to the provisions of this constitution, Parliament shall by law prescribe the procedure for the election and assumption of office by a president.

Article 104, challenging a presidential election

(1) Subject to the provisions of this Article, any aggrieved candidate may petition the Supreme Court for an order that a candidate declared by the Electoral Commission elected as President was not validly elected.

(2) A petition under clause (1) of this Article shall be lodged in the Supreme Court registry within ten days after the declaration of the election results.

(3) The Supreme Court shall inquire into and determine the petition expeditiously and shall declare its findings not later than thirty days from the date the petition is filed.

(4) Where no petition is filed within the time prescribed under clause (2) of this Article, or where a petition having been filed, is dismissed by the Supreme Court, the candidate declared elected shall conclusively be taken to have been duly elected as President.

(5) After due inquiry under clause (3) of this Article, the Supreme court may-

(a) Dismiss the petition;

(b) Declare which candidate was validly elected, or

(c) Annul the election.

(6) Where an election is annulled, a fresh election shall be held within twenty days from the date of the annulment.

(7) If after a fresh election held under clause (6) of this Article there is another petition which succeeds, then the presidential election shall be postponed; and upon the expiry of the term of the incumbent president, the speaker shall perform the functions of the office of president until a new president is elected and assumes office.

(8) For the purposes of this Article, Article 98(4) of this constitution shall not apply.

(9) Parliament shall make such laws as may be necessary for the purposes of this Article, including laws for grounds of annulment and rules of procedure.

Article 105. Tenure of office of the president

(1) A person elected president under this constitution shall, subject to clause (3) of this Article, hold office for a term of five years.

(2) A person may be elected under this constitution to hold office as President for one or more terms as prescribed by this Article.

(3) The office of the president shall become vacant-

(a) On the expiration of the period specified in this Article; or

(b) If the incumbent dies or resigns or ceases to hold office under Article 107 of this constitution.

(4) The president may, by writing assigned by him or her, and addressed to the chief Justice, resign from office as President.

(5) The resignation of the president shall take effect when it is received by the chief justice.

(6) The chief justice shall, immediately upon receiving the resignation of the president and the electoral commission of the resignation.

Article 106. Terms and conditions of service of the president.

(1) The president shall be paid a salary and allowances and afforded such other benefits as Parliament shall by law provide.

(2) Parliament shall, by law, make provision for the grant of benefits for a president who ceases to hold office otherwise than by being removed under Article 107(1) (a) or (b) of this constitution.

(3) The salary, allowances and other benefits granted to a President under this Article shall be charged on the Consolidated Fund.

(4) The President is exempted from direct personal taxation on allowances and other benefits except on the official salary.

(5) The president shall not hold any other public office other than those conferred by this constitution or any office of profit or emolument likely to compromise the office of the president.

(6) The salary, allowances and other benefits granted to the president under this Article shall not be varied to the disadvantage of the president while he or she holds office.

(7) The retirement benefits granted to a president under this Article shall not be varied to the disadvantage of the president.

Article 107. Removal of the president.

(1) the presidency may be removed from office in accordance with this Article on any of the following grounds-

(a) abuse of office or willful violation of the oath of allegiance and the presidential oath or any provision of this constitution;

(b) misconduct or misbehavior-

(i) that he or she has conducted himself or herself in a manner which brings or is likely to bring the office of president into hatred, ridicule, contempt or disrepute; or

(ii) that he or she has dishonestly done any act or omission which is prejudicial or inimical to the economy or security of Uganda, or

(2) for the purpose of removal of the president under clause (1)(a) or (b) of this Article, a notice in writing signed by not less than one-third of all the members of Parliament shall be submitted to the speaker-

(a) stating that they intend to move a motion for a resolution in Parliament for the removal of the president on the charge that the president has-

(i) wilfully abused his or her office or wilfully violated the oath of allegiance and the presidential oath or any other provision of this constitution in terms of clause (1)(a) of this Article; or

(ii) misconduct himself or herself or misbehaved in terms of clause (1)(b) of this Article; and

(b) Setting out the particulars of the charge supported by the necessary documents on which it is claimed that the conduct of the president be investigated for the purposes of his or her removal.

(3) The speaker shall, within twenty-four hours after receipt of the notice referred to in clause (2) of this Article, cause a copy to be transmitted to the president and the chief justice.

(4) The chief Justice shall, within seven days after receipt of the notice transmitted under clause (3) of this Article, constitute a tribunal comprising three justices of the Supreme Court to investigate the allegation in the notice and to report its findings to parliament stating whether or not there is a prima facie case for the removal of the president.

(5) The president is entitled to appear at the proceedings of the tribunal and to be represented there by a lawyer or other expert or person of his or her choice.

(6) If the tribunal determines that there is a prima facie case for the removal of the president under clause (1)(a) or (b) of this Article, then if Parliament passes the resolution passed by the votes of not less than two-thirds of all members of Parliament, the president shall cease to hold office.

(7) For the purposes of the removal of the president on grounds of physical or mental incapacity under clause (1)(c) of this Article, there shall be submitted to the speaker a notice in writing signed by not less than one-third of all members of Parliament-

(a) Stating that they intend to move a motion for a resolution in Parliament for the removal of the president from office on grounds of physical or mental incapacity; and

(b) Giving particulars of the alleged incapacity.

(8) The speaker shall, within twenty-four hours after receipt of a notice under clause (7) of this Article, cause a copy to be transmitted to the president and the chief justice.

(9) The chief justice shall, within seven days after receipt of the notice transmitted under clause (8) of this Article and in consultation with the professional head of the medical services in Uganda, constitute a medical board comprising five qualified and eminent medical specialists to examine the president in respect of the alleged incapacity and to report its findings to parliament.

(10) The chief justice shall, within twenty-four hours after constituting the medical board, inform the president accordingly, and the president shall submit himself or herself to the medical board for examination within seven days.

(11) If the medical board determines that the president is by reason of physical or mental incapacity unable to perform its functions of the office of president, and parliament passes the resolution for the removal of the president supported by the votes of not less than two-thirds of all the members of parliament, the president shall cease to hold office.

(12) If the medical board, after the expiration of the period of seven days referred to in clause (10) of this Article, reports that the president has failed or refused to submit to the medical board in accordance with that clause, and Parliament passes the resolution for the removal of the president supported by the votes of not less than two-thirds of all the members of parliament, the president shall cease to hold office.

(13) The motion for a resolution for the removal of the president shall be moved in Parliament within fourteen days after the receipt by the speaker of the report of the tribunal or the medical board.

(14) The president is entitled to appear in person and be heard and to be assisted or represented by a lawyer or other expert or person of his or her choice during the proceedings of parliament relating to the motion for a resolution under this Article.

CRITIQUE IN RELATION TO THE LIMITATIONS ON THE SAME.

Recent weeks have seen increased global media attention to Uganda following the incidents surrounding the arrest of popular musician and legislator, Bobi wine; emblematic events that have marked the shrinking democratic space in Uganda and the growing popular struggles for political change in the country.

The spotlight is also informed by wider trends across the continent over the past few years- particularly the unanticipated fall of veteran autocrats Muammar Gaddafi in Libya, Hosni Mubarak in Egypt, Yaya Jammeh in Gambia, and most recently Robert Mugabe in Zimbabwe- which led to speculation about whether Yoweri Museveni, in power in Uganda since 1986, might be the next to exist this shrinking club of Africa's strongmen.

Yet the Museveni state, and the immense presidential power that is its defining characteristics, has received far less attention, thus obscuring some of the issues at hand. Comprehending its dynamics requires paying attention to at least three turning points in the National Resistance Movement's history, which resulted in a gradual weeding-out of Museveni's contemporaries and potential opponents from the NRM, then the mobilization of military conflict to shore up regime legitimacy, and the policing of urban spaces to contain the increasingly frequent signals of potential revolution. Together, these dynamics crystallized presidential power in Uganda, run down key state institutions, and set the stage for the recent tensions and likely many more to come.

THE PURGE

From the late 1990's, there has been a gradual weeding out the old guard in the NRM, which through an informal "succession queue, "had posed an internal challenge to the continuity of Museveni's rule. It all started amidst the heated debates in the late 1990s over the reform of the then decaying Movement system; debates that pitted a younger club of reformists against an older group. The resultant split led to the exit of many critical voices from the NRM's ranks, and began to bolster Museveni's grip on power in a manner that was unprecedented. It also opened the lid on official corruption and the abuse of public offices.

Over the years, the purge also got rid of many political and military elites – the so-called "historical"- many of whom shared Museveni's sense of entitlement to political office rooted in their contribution to the 1980-1985 liberation war, and some of whom probably had an eye on his seat.

By 2005 the purge was at its peak; that year the constitutional amendment that removed presidential term limits passed after a bribe to every legislator saw almost all insiders that were opposed to it, summarily dismissed. As many of them joined the ranks of opposition, Museveni's inner circle was left with mainly sycophants whose loyalty was more hinged on patronage than anything else. Questioning the president or harboring presidential ambitions within the NRM had become tantamount to a crime.

By 2011 the process was almost complete, with the dismissal of Vice President Gilbert Bukenya, whose growing popularity among rural farmers was interpreted as a nascent presidential bid, resulting in his firing.

One man remained standing, Museveni's long-time friend Amama Mbabazi. His friendship with Museveni had long fueled rumors that he would succeed "the big man "at some point. In 2015, however, his attempt to run against Museveni in the ruling party primaries also earned him an expulsion from both the secretary general position of the ruling party as well as the prime ministerial office.

The departure of Mbabazi marked the end of any pretensions to a succession plan within the NRM. He was unpopular, with a record tainted by corruption scandals and complicity in Museveni's authoritarianism, but his status as a "president- in- waiting" had given the NRM at least the semblance of an institution that could survive beyond Museveni's tenure, which is firing effectively ended.

What is left now is perhaps the "Muhoozi project", a supposed plan by Museveni to have his son Muhoozi Kainerugaba succeed him.

Lately it has been given credence by the son's rapid rise to commanding positions in elite sections of the Ugandan military. But with an increasingly insecure Museveni heavily reliant on familial relationships and patronage networks, even the Muhoozi project appears very unlikely. What is clear, though, is that the overtime, the presidency has essentially become Museveni's property.

THE EXTENT.

Fundamental to Museveni's personalization of power also has been the role of military conflict, both local and regional. First was the rebellion by Joseph Kony's Lord's Resistance Army in northern Uganda, which over its two-decade span enabled a continuation of the military ethos of the NRM. The war's dynamics were indeed complex, and rooted in a longer history that predated even the NRM government, but undoubtedly it provided a ready excuse for the various shades of authoritarianism that came to define Museveni's rule.

With war ongoing in the north, any challenge to Museveni's rule was easily constructed as a threat to the peace already secured in the rest of the country, providing an absurd logic for clamping down on political opposition. More importantly, the emergency state born of it, frequently provided a justification for the president to side step democratic institutions and processes, while at the same time rationalizing the governments misappropriate expenditure on the military. It also fed into Museveni's self-perception as a "freedom fighter" buttressed the personality cult around him, and empowered him to further undermine any checks on his power.

By the late 2000s the LRA war was coming to an end – but another war had taken over its function just in time. From the early 2000s, Uganda's participation in a regional security project in the context of the war on Terror, particularly in the Somali conflict, rehabilitated the regime's international image and provided cover for the narrowing political space at home, as well as facilitating a further entrenchment of Museveni's rule.

As post-9/11 western foreign policy began to prioritize stability over political reform, Museveni increasingly postured as the regional peacemaker, endearing himself to donors while further sweeping the calls for democratic change at home under the carpet- and earning big from it.

It is easy to overlook the impact of these military engagements, but the point is that together they accentuated the role of the military in Ugandan politics and further entrenched Museveni's power to degrees that perhaps even the NRM's own roots in a guerilla movement could never have reached. The expulsion of powerful elites from the ruling circles and the politicization of military conflict had just started to cement Musevenism, when a new threat emerged on the horizon. It involved not the usual antagonists –gun-toting rebels or ruling party elites –but ordinary protesters. And they were challenging the NRM on an unfamiliar battleground –not in the jungles, but on the streets: the 2011" walk –to -work" protests, rejecting the rising fuel and food prices, were unprecedented.

But there's another reason the protests constituted a new threat. For long the NRM had mastered the art of winning elections. The majority constituencies in one hand and the electoral commission itself was largely answerable to Museveni. With rural constituencies in one hand and the electoral body in the other, the NRM could safely ignore the minority opposition- dominated urban constituencies. Electoral defeat thus never constituted a threat to the NRM, at least at parliamentary and presidential levels.

But now the protesters had turned the tables, and were challenging the regime immediately after one of its landslide victories. The streets could not be rigged. In a moment, they had shifted the locus of Ugandan politics from the rural to the urban, and from institutional to informal spaces. And they were picking lessons from a strange source: North America.

There, where Museveni's old friend Gaddafi, among others, was facing a sudden exit under pressure from similar struggles. Things could quickly get out of hand. A strategic response was urgent.

The regime went into overdrive. The 2011 protests were snuffed out, and from then, the policing of urban spaces became central to the logic and working of the Museveni state.

Draconian laws on public assembly and free speech came into effect, enacted by a rubber-stamp parliament that was already firmly in Museveni's hands. Police partnered with criminal gangs, notably the bodaboda 2010, to curb what was called "public order" –really the official name for peaceful protest. As police's mandate expanded to include the pursuit of regime critics, its budget ballooned, and its chief, General Kale Kayihura, became the most powerful person after Museveni - before his recent dismissal.

For a while, the regime seemed triumphant. Organizing and protest became virtually impossible, as urban areas came under 24/7 surveillance.

Moreover, key state institutions –the parliament, electoral commission, and judiciary, military and now the police were all in the service of the NRM, and all voices of dissent had been effectively silenced. In time, the constitution would be amended again, by the NRM –dominated house, this time to remove the presidential age limit –the last obstacle to Museveni's life presidency –followed by a new tax on social media, to curb "gossip". Museveni was now truly invincible. Or so it seemed.

But the dreams of "walk-to-work" –the nightmare for the Museveni state –had never really disappeared, and behind the tightly –patrolled streets always lay the simmering quest for change. That is how we arrived at the present moment, with a pop star representing the widespread aspiration for better government, and a seemingly all-powerful president suddenly struggling for legitimacy.

Whatever direction the current popular struggles ultimately take, what is certain is that they are learning well from history, and are a harbinger of many more to come.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

THE ROLE OF THE LEGISLATURE IN CHECKING THE EXECUTIVE

SOVEREINGTY OF THE LEGISLATURE

The principle of parliamentary supremacy ironically derives from the doctrine of separation of powers which deals with the mutual relations among the three organs of the government namely; Legislature, Executive and Judiciary. Lord Mustill in R v Home Secretary, Exparte Fine Brigade Union [949]explained the doctrine of separation of powers to mean a feature of separation of pecuniary powers that Parliament, the executive and judiciary have their distinct and largely exclusive domain. Parliament has a legally unchallengeable right to make whatever laws it thinks right. The executive carries on administration of the country in accordance with the powers conferred on it by law. The Judiciary interprets the laws and see that they are complied with and obeyed. It's the specific powers conferred upon these that checks on the usurpation of powers by others through the checks and balances.

Montesquieu tried to give the rationale for this when he remarked that when the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person, or in the same body or magistrate, there can be no liberty. Again, there is no liberty if the judicial power is not separated from the legislative and executive power, the life and liberty of subject would be exposed to arbitrary control for the judge would then be the legislation.

The doctrine is well enshrined in the 1995 Constitution of The Republic of Uganda which goes ahead to underline the powers, functions and roles of each organ of government and each play a unique role and are expected to check on each other. The legislature is under chapter six. This is justified by Article 77(1) [950]which is to the effect that there shall be a Parliament of Uganda and Article 79(1) [951]provides for its primary function which is the effect that Parliament shall have powers to make laws on any matter for peace, order, development and good governance of Uganda. That is the, major function of Parliament. The executive can be traced under chapter seven and is basically Article 98(1) [952]paints the picture of the executive. It is to the effect that there shall be the President of Uganda who shall be the head of state, head of government and commander in chief of

[949] [1995] 2AC 513
[950] The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda as amended.
[951]Supra.
[952] supra

the Uganda Peoples Defense Forces and the fountain of Honor. This is a clear manifestation that the executive organ of government is headed by the president. On the other hand the Judiciary is enshrined under chapter eight and basically Article 126(1) [953]provides that the judicial power is derived from the people and shall be exercised by the courts established under the constitution in the name of the people and in conformity with the law and with the values, norms and aspirations of the people. Though the major provision to consider mostly is Article 128 [954]which provides for the independence of the judiciary, This sis justified by the reason that because there is need to administer justice equally without regard to socio economic and political statues to promote equally before the law.

In this paper, my emphasis is placed on the legislature and specifically its sovereignty in what can be generalized as the legislative supremacy. This discussion shall relate on its supremacy in relation to the other two organs of the government that is the executive and the judiciary. Though in Uganda supremacy of the legislature is not operative, am to present it on the basis of checks and balances by the legislature.

Parliamentary sovereignty in Uganda is in few areas though critical in nature in terms of clear governance to achieve the national objectives and principle of state policy. Its sovereignty is rooted in its mandate to make laws without hindrances, mandate to amend the constitution, approval of presidential appointees, state of emergencies and others. Unlike the judiciary that essentially deals or checks on the two organs from the perspective of legality that is whether their activities and conduct falls within the confines of the law, the legislature has mandate to check on the policies of the executive and question the executive activities.

It is worth noting that for Parliament to achieve its sovereignty in terms of operativeness, the members of the house must be afforded security. It's this rationale that Parliament Powers and immunities Act Cap 258 was put in place to afford security to all members of the house in everything that they put forward before the House.

Parliamentary immunity started from way back in 1642 during the reign of King Charles I when he entered the House of Commons sat in the speaker's chair to demand for the Members of the House that had passed the law restricting him from doing mining. The speaker by then William Lenthall of the House of Commons in the Long Parliament had this to say.

"May it please your majesty, I have neither eyes to see nor tongue to speak in this place but as this house is pleased to direct me whose servant I am here: and humbly beg your majesty's Pardon that

[953] The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda as amended.
[954]Supra.

I cannot give any other answer than this to what your majesty is pleased to demand of me"[955]

This has remained the stand up to date in that legislators are afforded immunity majorly to give life to the doctrine of separation of powers. In Uganda Parliamentary immunity is a great concern which the framers of the 1995 Constitution could not undermine. It's a point of concern under Article 97(1) [956]which states that, the speaker, the deputy speaker, members of parliament and any other person participating or assisting in or acting in connection with or reporting the proceedings of parliament or any of its committees shall be entitles to such immunities and privileges as parliament shall by law prescribe.

In order to see this in operative , Parliament while exercising its mandate under Article79(1) enacted the Parliamentary Powers and Privileges Act Cap 258 which states that " An Act to declare and define powers, privileges and immunities of parliament, and of the members of parliament, to secure freedom of speech in Parliament , to regulate admittance to the precincts of parliament, to give protection to the persons employed in the publication of the reports and other papers of parliament and for purposes incidental to or connected with the matters aforesaid" .

Further section 2[957] of the Act provides that no civil or criminal proceedings may be instituted against any member for words spoken before or written in a report to Parliament or to a committee, or by reason of any matter or thing brought by the member in Parliament or a committee by petition, bill, and motion or otherwise.

The rationale for this is that permits members to speak freely in the chambers during the sitting or in committees during meetings while enjoying complete immunity from prosecution for any comment they might make[958]. The freedom of speech is essential for the effective working of the house as members are able to make statements or allegations about outside bodies or persons which they may hesitate to make without the protection privilege[959]. According to center for public interest law, the rationale behind the immunities and privileges is the constitutional principle of separation of powers to enable Parliament to carry out its duties effectively; they must be given some privileges and immunities to avoid external influence or threats from the other arms of government. The most questions are on its effectiveness in Uganda which I shall not discuss being not party of this discussion.

Before I leave or detach from this parameter, important to note is that the immunities and privileges can be waived by obtaining special leave of parliament to allow the proceedings or information laid

[955] House of Commons Journal Volume 2:4 January 1642. Page 376-368.
[956]The 1995 constitution of the Republic Of Uganda.
[957] The Parliament Powers and Immunities Act Ca.p 258
[958]Maigont, 2nd Edition, pp-33, for a discussion on freedom of speech and criminal law.
[959]Stockdale v Hansard [1839] 9 AD & E 11; 112.

before Parliament to be used in court or in any other proceedings outside Parliament itself. The person responsible for granting this leave is the speaker of parliament or in absence or incapacity of the speaker or the clerk of parliament during the dissolution of Parliament[960].

Having critically analyzed the parliamentary powers and immunities as a necessity to achieve Parliamentary sovereignty and the rationale for separation of powers, it's prudent that I shall now look at the sovereignty of legislature in Uganda putting emphasis on the various provisions of the Constitution from which it derives mandate.

POWER TO MAKE LAWS

The critical point for consideration is that Parliament is the Supreme law maker of the land. Its sovereignty is rooted in the common law practice. It is too powerful that it can do anything under the sun[961].Its mandate to make laws for the effective governance of Uganda is provided for under Article 79(1)[962] which is to the effect that subject to the provisions of this constitution, Parliament shall have power to make laws on any matter for the peace, order, development and good governance of Uganda.

In exercising that mandate, Parliament must comply to the necessary procedure required. Article 91(1) is to the effect that the power of parliament to make laws shall be exercised through bills passed by parliament and assented to by the president. This is a clear manifestation that Parliament cannot make any law without use of a bill. These bills are in two forms that is the private members bill and the government bill.

In his wisdom, Justice George Kanyeihamba as he then was in Paul Ssemwogerere Zachary Olum and Anor v Attorney General [963] observed that such laws made by parliament remain uncertain until court has pronounced its self on the matter. Therefore, being the fact that no other organ f the government has mandate to make laws, the Judiciary shall always intervene to question the legality of the laws made by the legislature as well as the legality of the procedure. In Muwanga Kivumbi v Attorney General Court declared the anti-homosexuality bill null on ground that parliament had not complied to the quorum required. In line with this, these laws are supposed to be in line with the constitution. Therefore, while making laws, Parliament must ensure that the laws and are in line with Constitution and where they contravene, the constitutional court has mandate under Article 137(1) to strike the law out. Example can be traced from the constitutional court [960] This information can be found on www. Cepiluganda.org.

[961]YasinMugerwa. Daily monitor. Saturday September 3rd , 2016 .
[962]The 1995 Constitution of Republic of Uganda.
[963]Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No 1 of 2002.

nullification section 32[964]of the police Act for being in contravention of Article 29 of the Constitution.

However, its mandate to make to make laws is also limited. The limitation is under Article 92 which restricts retrospective legislation. The provision is to the effect that parliament shall not pass any law to alter the decision or judgment of any court as between the parties to the decision or judgment. Therefore, it is unconstitutional for parliament to use its powers to enact legislation which has been prohibited by the judiciary. This was emphasized and explained by Justice Cheborion in the case of Human Rights Network Uganda and 4 others v Attorney General[965]. This case concerned the fact that court had declared section 32 of the Police Act null and void therefore the petitioner's argument was that section 8 of the Public Order Management Act was passed in regulation of section 32 of the police Act. Court held that section 8 of the Public Order Management Act was void due to its inconsistence with the constitution.

Its therefore eminent that the sole function and primary responsibility of the legislature is to make laws but emphasis should be placed on the procedure and the constitutionality of the laws passed by the legislature. Even though the law may be inconsistent with the constitution, court shall not intervene unless it is moved by the citizens for court does not move its self into the matter. In every law made by parliament, such law cannot be passed unless it has been taken to the president for approval. The exception is under Article 94(6) which is to the effect that if the president refuses to assent to the Bill three times then the speaker shall cause a copy of the Bill to be laid before Parliament and the bill shall become law without assent of the president.

Parliament has mandate under Article 79(2) to delegate some of its law making powers. This is justified by the fact that the House Has a lot to consider during its tenure and therefore cannot handle every matter. Therefore it is proper for parliament to delegate some of its powers. These powers are delegated at times through statutes made by the legislature such as the Local Government Act Cap 243.Section 38 and section39 of the Act allows the local governments to make laws such as the ordinances under section 38 and the byelaws made under section 39 of the same Act. But these are not termed as statutes but rather statutory instruments.

THE AUTONOMY OF THE LEGISLATURE IN THE FACE OF MODERN-DAY CHALLENGES.

In the twenty-first century, there is a greater global interest than ever before in concerns of democracy and good governance. This reflects a growing recognition that democracy and good governance are not optional but essential for long-term growth. Parliament, as one of the most important state institutions of a democratic government, plays a fundamental role in supporting democracy and good governance. Members of parliament have the noble job of ensuring administration by and for the people as democratically elected representatives of the people. Parliaments can actively participate in the formulation and implementation of laws, policies, and practices that promote democracy and good governance as part of their key legislative, representation, and oversight roles.

[964] Uganda Police Act, Cap 312
[965] Constitutional Petition No 56 of 2013

As an integral arm of the state, the parliament plays a critical role in promoting and defending democracy and good governance by setting not just the necessary checks and balances, but also norms and standards for democratic and governance institutions. In light of the core ideas and assumptions associated with parliamentary democracy, the role and tasks of parliament in promoting democracy and good governance have become increasingly important. A parliamentary democratic system recognizes that parliament gets its powers directly from the consent of the people, which is expressed through periodic elections, and that parliament's role includes, among other things, implementing the people's will. The 1995 Ugandan constitution affirms this, stating, "All power belongs to the people..."

Parliaments do not function in a vacuum; their operation and efficacy are heavily influenced by the context of the country, particularly the political situation. From post-independence political history to the modern multi-party system, the parliament has had an impact on how it functions.

It is vital to remember that the parliament must be shielded from all forms of influence, particularly from the administration, in order to efficiently accomplish its tasks. To protect people' liberty and prevent tyranny, the separation of powers doctrine requires that the state's three main institutions—executive, legislature, and judiciary—be properly divided. There can be no liberty when the legislative and executive functions are combined in the same person or body of magistrates. There is no liberty if judicial powers are not separated from legislative and administrative powers; everything would come to a stop if those three functions were exercised by the same man or body.

CHECKING ON THE EXECUTIVE POLICIES

It’s a constitutional mandate for the legislature to check on the policies of the executive. This is through assessing and evaluating activities of the executive and other bodies of the government, approval of presidential appointments as well as state of emergencies declared by the executive.

ASSESSING AND EVALUATING GOVERNMENT ACTIVITIES

This is by the legislature through the creation of committees such as the sessional committee, standing committee and the select committee. The sessional committees are created to monitor the ministers on how they exercise their powers in performance of their activities. The Standing committee is responsible for accountability and the select committees are created by the speaker to inquire into certain matters of the ministry or any minister. In order to strengthen the exercise of this role, opposition members of parliament chair the accountability committees.

These committees may conduct investigations, hold public hearings, acquire reports from the executive as such evaluation findings would greatly benefit the work of accountability. These accountability committees include the public accounts, local government's accounts, commissions, statutory authorities and state enterprises and government assurances.[966]In addition, one of the rules developed by Parliament requires ministers to answer questions from legislators about policy and thus in response to ministerial policy statements, individual legislators would find results of evaluations of great use in demanding accountability. The office of the Auditor General receives and examines audited accounts showing the appropriation of the sums granted by parliament to meet the public expenditure of government and provides its reports to parliament for use by the accountability committees.[967]

Ministerial accountability developed around the 19th century and entry 20th century as government departments and the role of ministers, separate from civil servants became more distinct. This means that they are supposed to provide and answer parliament and provide information. But this depends on what has gone wrong.[968]Therefore legislature checks on the activities of the executive and its policies through such committees.

APPROVAL OF APPOINTMENTS AND STATE OF EMERGENCIES

The mandate for approval of executive appointments and state of emergencies is a preserve of the legislature. These appointments are in various categories but mainly appointments by the president for public offices for example ministers, judges, ambassadors and other positions specifies in the constitution.[969]Example to this is Article 108(A) which provides for the appointment of the prime minister with the approval of Parliament.

[966] Find this in the National Policy on Public Sector Monitoring and Evaluation 2013
[967] This an be obtained from www. Library.health.go.ug.
[968]Bronmen Maddox; 27 August 2020 ministerial accountability. See also www.institute for govt. org.uk.
[969]Parliament of Uganda at www.parliament.go.ug.

CHAPTER TWELVE

THE JUDICIARY

The Judiciary is often seen as the 3rd arm of government. In regard to the principle of separation of powers, the concern is the judicial independence of the courts which in terms of the idea of checks and balances, the Courts are considered to have the duty to uphold and protect the Constitution and to be the chief arbitrators over all disputes in the country. With specific regards to disputes between individuals and the other two organs of government i.e. the executive and legislative the courts are seen as a check on the arbitrary and excessive use of powers.

THE DOCTRINE OF SEPARATION OF POWERS

This doctrine basically says that there must necessarily be a differentiation between the functions of government as well as the separation, conceptual and factional between the bodies that exercise power.

According to Montesquieu in his book The Spirit of the Laws [1748], there must be 3 separate organs of govt. There must be the organ that makes law i.e. the legislature, there must be the organ that executes Law I.e. Executive and lastly there must be a body to interpret the Law and to mediate disputes over the Law I.e. Judiciary.

To Montesquieu therefore, separation of powers meant 3 basic things.

i) Each organ of the state should be operated by different people i.e. it should not be one individual running all the 3 organs so that at no time should a Judge make the Law nor should he be involved in an executive function.

ii) That each of the state organs should be independent of one another i.e. there should be an absence of control, influence or direction by one organ of state over another i.e. there should be autonomous operation. No one organ of state should control activities of the other.

iii) No one organ of the state should take over the powers of the other.

The doctrine was exemplified in the case of Major General David Tinyefuza V Attorney General[970] wherein Kanyeihamba JSC noted that 'the principle of non-interference by the Judiciary in legislative and executive matters should prevail save for exceptional circumstances involving the deprivation of the liberty of a citizen. The reluctance of the courts to enter into the arena reserved by the Constitution for the other arms of government reaches its zenith when it comes to the exercise and control of powers relating to the armed forces, their structure, organization, deployment and operations. The accepted principle is that courts will not substitute their own views of what is public interest in these matters especially when the other coordinate powers of government are acting within the authority granted to them by the Constitution and the law. As military matters are within the exclusive jurisdiction of both the Executive and Parliament, it is not for the courts to consider whether the discretion of the executive has been properly, if at all.

[970] CONST. APP. NO.1 OF 1997

It is Parliament which has the authority to bring the executive to account in these military matters. In the English case of Chandler V DPP[971], Lord Devlin underscored this point when at p. 810 he said "the court will not review the proper exercise of discretionary power but they will only intervene to correct excess or abuse"…The Constitution provides that the Constitutional platform is to be shared between the three institutional organs of government whose functions and powers, I have already described. The Uganda Constitution recognized these organs as the parliament, the executive and the Judiciary. It was not by accident either that it created, described and empowered them in that order of enumeration. Each of them has its own field of operation with different characteristics and exclusivity and meant by the Constitution to exercise its powers independently. The doctrine of separation of powers demands and ought to require that unless there is the clearest of cases calling for intervention for the purposes of determining Constitutionality and legality of action or the protection of the liberty of the individual which is presently denied or imminently threatened, the courts must refrain from entering arenas not assigned to them either by the Constitution or laws of Uganda. It can not be overemphasized that it is necessary in a democracy that courts refrain from entering into areas of disputes best suited for resolution by other government agents. The courts should only intervene when those agents have exceeded their powers or acted unjustly causing injury thereby…the makers of the 1995 Constitution took away a lot of the powers which had hitherto been exercised by the executive and assigned them either to parliament or the Judiciary or the local governments. To whittle away the powers which are left in the executive by judicial engineering would in my opinion weaken the Executive further and be contrary to good and balanced governance in Uganda'.

All Constitutions in the world pay homage to this basic doctrine of separation of powers. And they tend also to separate the personalities. But even as they do so, there are limits at which you must separate power so the pure doctrine of separation of power no longer works like Montesquieu envisaged and instead scholars have chosen to use the phrase checks and balances as a way of dealing with the need to ensure that …. Is some separation and at the same time recognizing that there is an overlap of these organs of state? Therefore, the doctrine of checks and balances is taken to mean that the organs of the state exist in a situation of mutual independence and interdependence so that if there is overstepping of the like by one of these organs, there is an ability to check that excessive action.

[971] (1964) AC 763

Through the doctrine of checks and balances, an effort is made to ensure that no one organ becomes more powerful than the others. The organs of government are like is 3 stones under a pot and each of them functions to ensure that the foods in the pot is effectively cooked and also that the pot does not fall over. So this doctrine of checks and balances is designed also to promote efficiency and for the individuals to operate these organs and develop an expertise

In the final analysis, a system which has checks and balances which may not function very effectively is far better than a situation in which you have excessive powers vested in a single organ which is uncontrolled.

THE PHENOMENON OF JUDICIAL POWER JURISDICTION OF COURTS

The exercise of judicial power is provided for in Chapter 8 of the 1995 Constitution i.e. Articles 126-The Phenomenon of judicial power essentially embraces a number of elements.

i) The structure and hierarchy of courts and their jurisdictional competence[972]
ii) Guiding principles in the exercise of judicial power[973]
iii) Participation of peoples in the administration of justice[974]
iv) Independence of the Judiciary in the exercise of judicial power[975]

THE STRUCTURE AND HIERARCHY OF COURTS AND THEIR JURISDICTIONAL COMPETENCE.

The structure of the Judiciary is governed by Article 129 which sets out the Courts of judicature which shall exercise judicial power in Uganda and these include the Supreme Court described in Articles 130-132, the Court of Appeal provided for under Articles 134 and 136. The Court of appeal is also constituted as the Constitutional Court under Article 137. The High Court of Uganda which is provided for under Article 138 to 139 and other subordinate courts as established by parliament which include the Qadhi Court.

Under Article 129(3), parliament is to make provision for the jurisdiction and procedures of the Courts and as a result of this, the Judicature Act 1996 was enacted which essentially provides for the various courts of judicature, the applicable law for the courts as well as prerogative orders that

[972] Articles 129, 139, 137, Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[973] Articles 126, Ibid
[974] Article 127, Ibid
[975] Article 128, Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

may be issued including habeas corpus, mandamus, certiorari.

The jurisdictional competence of the Courts is provided for by the Constitution although in the case of the subordinate courts such as the magistrate courts, their jurisdictional competence will be found in the MCA (as amended).

The Supreme Court and the Court of Appeal as such, are essentially appellate courts although the Supreme Court is the final court of appeal by virtue of Article 132(1) yet on the other hand it acts as a court of original jurisdiction with regards to petitions on presidential elections by virtue of Article 104.

The Court of Appeal while acting as the Constitutional Court is by virtue of Article 137 enjoined with determining issues of the interpretation of the Constitution. The jurisdiction of the Constitutional competence is strictly limited to interpretation of the Constitution.

Reference can be made to the following cases, Ismail Serugo V KCC Const. Appeal 2/1998, Rwanyarare & Anor Vs AG Const. Petition 11/1997, U'da journalists safety committee V AG const. Petition 6/97 and 7/97, Abuki V AG Const. Case 2/97, In the matter of Sheikh Abdul Sentamu Const. Reference 7/98, Dr. James Rwanyarare & Anor V AG const. Petition 11/1997

The High Court possesses unlimited original jurisdiction in all matters as provided under Article 139(1). In Myers & Anor V Akira Ranch Ltd[976] In this case, the argument was presented that section 64 of the civil procedure Act allowing Court to summarily award compensation not exceeding 2000 Shs would be in derogation of the unlimited jurisdiction of the High Court and so was unconstitutional. The Judge held that the fact that the High Court is a court of unlimited jurisdiction does not mean that the legislature cannot limit the relief to which a person is entitled or even deprive him of relief altogether. In conclusion the judge noted that section 64 of the civil procedure Act does not in any sense suggest that it applied only to subordinate courts and in the opinion of the judge, it also applied equally to the High court.

GUIDING PRINCIPLES IN THE EXERCISE OF JUDICIAL POWER.

These are contained in Article 126 which starts off by stipulating that judicial power is derived from the people and exercise of that judicial power by the conformity with the law and the people and by conformity with the law and the values and aspirations of the people (Article 126(1).

In terms of Article 126 there are 5 guiding and motivating principles in the exercise of judicial powers by the courts.

a) The dispensation of justice to all persons equally irrespective of social or economic status. This is expounded by Article 21(1) which makes all people equal under the law [Refer to 126(2)(a)].

[976] (No.2) [1972] EA 347

b) The dispensation of justice shall be undertaken without undue delay [Read 126(b)]. This principle is corroborated by Article 28(1) that gives a right to a fair hearing.
c) Victims of wrongs (civil and criminal) shall be awarded adequate compensation. (Article 23(7), 26(2), 50(1), 126(2)(c))
d) The promotion of reconciliation between parties (Article 126(2) (d)).
e) The dispensation and administering of substantive justice without undue regard to technicalities. (Article 126 (2) (e))

NB. All the above principles are subject to the law.

ARTICLE 137

The jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal while sitting as the Constitutional court is by virtue of Article 137 taken to concern with questions on interpretation of the Constitution. The jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court and to an extent the Supreme Court since 1995 has tended towards a restrictive interpretation of the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court such that where a petition submitted to the Constitutional Court has not involved interpretation of the Constitution, it has said to be outside the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court and therefore incompetent.

The first instance where the issue of the jurisdiction of the Constitutional court was raised was in the case of Attorney General V Tinyefuza[977] before the Supreme Court. On appeal, the then Chief Justice Wambuzi posed the issue of whether the Constitutional Court should have had jurisdiction over Tinyefuza's petition in the first place. In answering this issue, the Chief Justice considered what the cause of action is Tinyefuza's petition was and determined that this was a purported violation of right to freedom from forced labour under Article 25(2)[978] and was brought under Article 50(1) Wambuzi CJ concluded that the petition was one essentially for the enforcement of human rights and not the interpretation of the Constitution and was in his view not within the jurisdictional competence of the Constitutional Court.

Kanyeihamba JSC on his part referred to the marginal note to Article 137 and concluded that jurisdiction of the Constitutional Courts is strictly limited to the interpretation of the Constitution and therefore does not extend to enforcement of human rights.

The Late Oder JSC on his part employed the contextual interpretation in determining the jurisdictional competence of the Constitutional Court. Contextual interpretation requires the interpretation of legislation or provisions of legislation in a context and therefore that provisions, should not be looked at in isolation. Oder JSC looks at:

[977] Const. Appeal 1/97
[978] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

a) The provision on the right to petition under Article 50(1). It states that anybody who is aggrieved as to his rights may petition to a "Competent court".
b) Provision on jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court i.e. Article 137(1) and 3(a) & (b).
c) Procedural laws for instituting petitions for human rights violations. He comes with 2 laws.
d) Constitutional Court (Petition for declaration under art 137) Direction LN4/1996.
e) Fundamental Right & Freedoms (Enforcement Procedure) Rules SI 26/1992.

In the final analysis, Oder JSC came to the considered opinion that petitions for the enforcement of Human rights under the Chapter 4 and brought under Article 50(1)[979] may of necessity involve questions of interpretation of the Constitution. This view of Oder JSC was subsequently upheld in particular by Justice Mulenga and CJ Wambuzi in the case of Ismail Serugo V KCC[980]. Justice Mulenga in particular stressed that the jurisdiction of the Constitution Court is primarily that of the interpretation of the Constitution but it also extends to petitions for the enforcement of human rights which entail the interpretation of the Constitution.

The courts however were more active in dismissing those petitions which only concerned enforcement of human rights under Article 50 and did not at the same time involve issues requiring constitutional interpretation. These included: Rwanyarare & Anor V AG[981]

In this case, the petitioners challenged the constitutionality of several provisions of the Constitution including Article 269 as being in violation of their freedom of assembly and association under Article 29(1)(d) and (e). The Constitutional court considered the petition as brought under Article 50(1) as essentially concerning with the enforcement of human rights and dismissed it.

Uganda Journalist Safety Committee & Anor V AG CP 6/1997.

In this case the petitioners challenged the Constitutionality of sections 42 and 60 of the Penal Code on sedition and publishing false news as being in violation of their rights to freedom of speech and expression under Article 29(1)(a). The petition was also dismissed.

UJSC & 2 Others V AG CP 7/1997.

The petitioners in this case were challenging the Constitutionality of the Press and Journalists Statute 1995 as being in violation of their rights to freedom of the press under Article 29(1)(a) and right to conduct a lawful profession under Article 40(2). This petition was also thrown out.

In Onyango Obbo & Anor V AG[982], The Petitioners were challenging provisions as sedition and publishing false news under the PC as violating their right under 29(1)(a) and in any event these penal provisions were seen as a restriction to their rights under Article 43, they were not justifiable

[979] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[980] Civil Appeal 198(sc)
[981] Constitutional Petition 11/1997.
[982] Constitutional Petition 15/97.

in a free and democratic society.

Reference can also be made to the following cases, In Re Sheik Abdul Sentamu & Anor CR 7/98, Salvation Abuki & Anor V AG CC 2/97, Uganda V Kyamanywa (Crim. App. /98(SC), Zackary Olum & Anor V AG CC 6/99.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDICIARY AS AN ELEMENT OF THE EXERCISE OF JUDICIAL POWER AND A CHECK ON THE EXECUTIVE

It has been opined by many legal writers that one of the most obvious ways to determine whether or not a particular country enjoys a high degree of democracy and justice is by looking at how independent its judiciary is. The doctrine of independence of the judiciary and its importance was underscored in the well known case of Masalu Musene & 3 Ors V AG[983] wherein Mpagi Bahigeine JA noted that judicial officers are charged with safeguarding the fundamental rights and freedoms of the citizenry. In the performance of their duties they are entrusted with checking the excesses of the Executive and the Legislature. These duties require insulation from any influence direct or indirect that may warp their judgment or cause them to play into the hands of corrupt elements. An independent judicial officer is indispensable to the administration of impartial justice and the rule of law. It was also noted that judicial independence must be upheld because of all the 3 arms of government, the judiciary is viewed as the weakest and the most vulnerable. The court cited the United States Supreme Court in Evans V Gore[984] where it was remarked that the judiciary is beyond comparison the weakest of the 3 arms and that all possible care must be taken to ensure that it defends itself against the attacks of the other two arms. It was noted that the Executive dispenses the honours and equally holds the sword of the community yet the Legislature commands the purse and prescribes the rules by which duties and rights of citizens are regulated. Yet in contrast, the Judiciary neither has the influence over either the sword or the purse.

The doctrine/principle of independence of the Judiciary is contained in Article 128 of the Constitution. The necessity of an independent Court which is also impartial is also an attribute to the right of a fair trial under Article 28.

Although Article 128 does not address this particular aspect the independence of the Judiciary requires that decisions of the Court be respected and upheld by the other organs of government otherwise this would render the entire judicial function illusory.

[983] Constitutional Petition No. 5 of 2004
[984] 253 US 245 (1920)

FACETS OF THE DOCTRINE OF JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE AND THE SAFEGUARDS UNDER THE 1995 CONSTITUTION

These appear in the 1995 Constitution and include the following:

i) Constitutional disposition of judicial power in the people of Uganda.

Article 126(1)[985] provides that judicial power is derived from the people (and not the State or government in power) and shall be exercised by the courts in the name of the people and in conformity with law and with the values, norms and aspirations of the people. Similarly, Article 127[986] prescribes and enjoins Parliament to make laws providing for the participation of the people in the administration of justice.

Accordingly, judicial power does not any more flow from the Crown as it did in the Colonial days or from the President as it apparently did before the enactment of the 1995 Constitution. It can no longer be dispensed at the whims of the ruling government or any person or authority. This provision is meant to ensure that courts act in line with the aspirations and mandate of the people. Moreover, Article 1(1)[987] places all power in the Ugandan people. This power must now be taken to include judicial power.

The autonomy of the Judiciary is further sought to be re-enforced under clauses 5 and 6 in regard to the remuneration of judicial officers and financing of the Judiciary. All this money comes from a consolidated fund.

ii) Constitutional provisions for the independence of the judiciary

Article 128 (1)[988] provides that in the exercise of judicial power, the courts shall be independent and shall not be subject to the control or direction of any person or authority. It then sets out 7 principles upon which this very fundamental doctrine rests. In MASALU's case, Twinomujuni JA noted that the 8 pillars in Article 128 are a single package and are about independence of the judiciary. One can not therefore remove any one of them without adversely affecting the others.

THE PILLARS

a) Article 128 (2) is to the effect that no person or authority shall interfere with the courts or judicial officers in the exercise of their judicial functions and under Article 128 (3) all organs and agencies of the State shall accord to the courts such assistance as may be required to ensure the effectiveness of the courts. In Masalu Musene case, Mpagi Bahigeine JA noted that the maintenance of judicial independence as enshrined in Article

[985] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[986] Ibid
[987] Ibid
[988] Ibid

> 128 depends upon public support for the judicial process to run effectively and independently. It is the public respect for that principle that sustains it. By public is meant the government to reinforce and facilitate the effectiveness of the independence.

Twinomujuni JA on his part reiterated that for the Judiciary to be effective, it needs assistance from all but especially from the Executive and Legislature. He thus regretted the so called chastisement of the Judiciary apparently for no other reason other than it doing a job vested in it by the Constitution. He cited examples where after passing a judgment, it is followed by threats to 'fix'' or 'sort out' the biased judges or to investigate corrupt judges. Clearly these two provisions form the bedrock of the doctrine.

However, the assistance must not only be necessary, but it must not be such that it instead violates the independence of the Judiciary. In The Uganda Law Society V Attorney General[989], the doctrine was held to have been blatantly violated. The back ground to it was that Rt. Colonel Kiiza Besigye, a leader of the political party known as the FDC and 22 others (the accused) were jointly charged with treason and misprision of treason under the Penal Code Act. The indictment was then read to them. The 1st accused, Dr. Besigye was separately charged with rape. They were later committed to the High Court for trial. On 16, November, 2005, the accused were taken to the High Court for a bail application before Lugayizi J. 14 of the accused satisfied the conditions for grant of bail and were granted the same. However, because of certain acts of the security personnel at the High Court premises, the bail papers could not be processed. The security men were dressed in dark clothes and heavily armed. They entered into some of the Court offices and interrupted the court's normal duties. The accused in consequence thereof had to be taken back to prison. A petition was accordingly brought challenging these acts of the army. In his judgment Engwau JA noted that 'under Article 128 (3)[990] of the Constitution, all organs and agencies of the state are required to accord to the courts such assistance as may be required to ensure the effectiveness of the courts. What those military personnel did that day was not an assistance envisaged in Article 128 (3) of the Constitution'

b) Under Article 128 (4), a person exercising judicial power shall not be liable to any action or suit for any act or omission by that person in the exercise of judicial power. This protection is further buttressed in the Judicature Act Section 46 (1) which is to the effect that a judge, commission or other person acting judicially shall not be liable to be sued in any civil court for ant act done or ordered to be done by that person in the discharge of his or her judicial functions whether or not within the limits of his or its jurisdiction.

[989] CONSTITUTIONAL PETITION NO. 18 OF 2005
[990] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

The essence of this is that judges must not decide cases with a premeditated fear of civil or criminal actions against them. In EVANS V GORE, the US Supreme Court cited John Marshall, a famous 19th Century lawyer as intimating that it is to the last degree important that a judicial officer should be rendered perfectly and completely independent with nothing to influence or control him but God and his conscience. To him one of the worst things that can exist is an ignorant, corrupt and dependent judiciary.

c) Article 128 (5) It is to the effect that the administrative expenses of the Judiciary including all salaries, allowance, gratuities and pensions payable to persons serving in the judiciary shall be charged on the Consolidated Fund and under Article 128 (6), the Judiciary shall be self accounting and may deal with the Ministry responsible for Finance in relation to its finances. These two provisions are meant to ensure that there is a reasonable degree of self accounting and control over judicial funds such that the welfare of judicial officers is not placed at the whims and mercy of the Executive or Legislature. It is not in doubt that you can not separate financial matters from the broad question of judicial independence.

d) Article 128 (7) is to the effect that the salary, allowances, privileges and retirement benefits and other conditions of service of a judicial officer or other person exercising judicial power shall not be varied to his or her disadvantage. In MASALU MUSENE's case, the Petition went to the core of this requirement. The 4 Petitioners all of whom are judicial officers sought a declaration under Article 137 that the application of Section 4 (1) of the Income Tax Act Cap 340 which sought to tax their salaries was inconsistent with Article 128 (7). The majority of the Court of Appeal sitting as the Constitutional Court did not hesitate to rule that Section 4 (1) was in violation of Article 128 (7). Mpagi Bahigeine JA on her part stated that since by the nature of their work, judicial officers can not engage on other business so as to bridge the financial vacuum besetting them, corruption will be nurtured by a system that fails to pay its judicial officers well. That without undiminishable or untaxable remuneration or compensation, the principle of the independence of the judiciary will have become nugatory and a mere mockery as lawyers will be less willing to join the Bench in preference of their lucrative chambers.

e) Article 128 (8)[991] states that the office of a Chief Justice, Deputy Chief Justice, Justice of the Supreme Court, Justice of Appeal or Judge of the High Court shall not be abolished when there is a substantive holder of that office. This provision is made stronger by Article 144 (1) which adds to the strength of this security of tenure. The retirement age of the Chief Justice, Deputy Chief Justice, Justice of the Supreme Court, Justice of Appeal is 75 years whereas 65 years are stated for the Principal Judge or a Judge of the High Court.

[991] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

Moreover, under Article 144 (2), a judicial officer may be removed from office only for i) inability to perform the functions of his office arising from infirmity of body or mind ii) misbehaviour or misconduct and iii0 incompetence. The word 'only' means that apart from those grounds, no other ground can be used to remove a judicial officer from office.

Even then, the removal must strictly comply with the procedure provided in Article 144 (4) – (7). Under Article 144 (4), the question of removal of a judicial officer should be investigated and referred to the President by either the Judicial Service Commission or Parliament. And under Article 144 (4) (a) in the case of a CJ, DCJ or PJ, the tribunal appointed by the President to consider the matter must consist of 5 people who are or have been Justices of the Supreme Court or are or have been judges of a court having similar jurisdiction or who are advocates of at least 20 years standing. In the case of a Justice of the Supreme Court or Justice of Appeal, under Article 144 (4) (b), it must consist of 3 persons who are or have been Justices of the Supreme Court or who are or have been judges of a court of similar jurisdiction or who are advocates of at least 15 years standing. In the case of a Judge of the High Court, 3 persons who are or have held offices as Judges of a court having unlimited jurisdiction in civil and criminal matters or a court having jurisdiction in appeals from such a court or who are advocates of at least 10 years standing. The net effect of all these requirements is that the security of tenure of judicial officers should not be under threat.

f) Judicial appointments

Under Article 147 (1) (a), it is the Judicial Service Commission which advises the President in the appointment of top judicial officers and the JSC under Article 147 (2), is independent and shall not be subject to the direction or control of any other person or authority. The mode of appointment seeks to discourage judicial officers from seeing themselves as the beneficiaries of presidential prerogatives so that they can at all times administer justice without fear that he who appointed will without assigning any reason disappoint when he deems fit.

g) Amendment of Article 128 (1) must be the subject of a referendum

Under Article 259 (2) (g), Article 128 (1) i.e. the 8 pillars above, on the independence of the Judiciary shall not be amended unless (a) it is supported at the 2nd and 3rd readings in Parliament by not less than two thirds of all members of parliament and (b) has been referred to a decision of the people and approved by them in a referendum.

While commenting on this requirement in Masalu Musene's case, Twinomujuni JA noted that its justification was that the Constituent Assembly who framed the Constitution were apprehensive that the other 2 strong arms of government might one day seek to destroy the 8 pillars of an independent judiciary. That all the 8 pillars require a referendum since to amend or remove any one of them would be to amend Article 128 (1) by infection. To him, Article 259 (2) (g) goes to show how far the CA in their wisdom were prepared to go in order to establish and ensure retention of an independent judiciary.

h) The Judicial Code of Conduct, 2003

The Code has 6 principles which encourage self determination of the Judiciary. They include independence, impartiality, integrity, propriety, equality and competence and diligence. The Principle of independence which is more pertinent requires that a judicial officer shall not be influenced by any direct or indirect extraneous influence, inducements, pressures, threats or interference from any quarter or for any reason and he or she shall reject any attempt arising from outside the roper judicial process to influence his decision. The Code also gives independence at an individual level and adds that the officer must base his decisions on the basis of his or her assessment of the facts and in accordance with conscientious understanding of the law.

This is in addition to the protection and requirements of the judicial oath in Article 149 which requires every judicial officer to take an oath in the 4th Schedule to the Constitution before assuming office. This Oath enjoins the officers to exercise judicial functions entrusted to them and to do right to all manner of people in accordance with the Constitution and to dispense justice without fear or favour or affection or ill-will.

Independence of the Judiciary requires transparency of the process of appointment of judicial officers. This is to ensure that persons of good repute and moral conduct are appointed to the courts as well as to shelter judicial appointment from political and sectarian tendencies.

The JSC has been seen as an impartial body which allows for the appointment of Judges based on merit rather than political inclination. But not everybody has shared this view unanimously. There have been questions raised about certain appointments or the timing of the appointment with allegations of political patronage. This was particularly the case with the appointment of Professor Kanyeihamba as Justice of the Supreme Court just shortly before the hearing of the appeal by the government in the case of Attorney General Vs Maj. Gen Tinyenfuza Const. Appeal No. 1/97. Godfrey Lule, Counsel for Gen Tinyefunza made an appeal to the Supreme Court for Justice Kanyeihamba to disqualify himself from hearing the appeal on grounds of likelihood of bias since prior to his appointment he had been Presidential Advisor. Kanyeihamba refused to disqualify himself. Another victim has been Court of Appeal Justice, Steven Kavuma whom many see as a political appointee to the Bench to pacify and neutralize the Court of Appeal especially so because it also doubles as the Constitutional Court. Similarly, the appointment of Bart Katureebe a former Attorney General to the Supreme Court Coram was attended to with similar attacks.

Independence of the Judiciary requires that judicial officers are immune from any action or suit for acts or omissions by the officer in exercise of judicial power as stipulated under Article 128(4). The purpose if this provision is to ensure that the judicial officer is not destructed from carrying out his or her functions in order to deal with pending actions or suits as well as to ensure that he exercise justice freely without fear that one of the parties may institute a civil suit in respect of the decision read out by the judicial officer.

Refer to John Arutu V AG. Const. Petition No. 4/97 and Egbe V Adefarasim & Anor (1986) LRC (Const) 596.

The untamed president in the politics of Uganda seeks to manifest the hangover of the colonial era where all power was beginning from and returning to the colonial Governor, the exhibit of colonial power and whose presence meant that he was acting as the Chief administrator, Chief legislator, Chief Judge, Chief Police Officer and Chief Executioner. This colonial legacy seems to have been systematically inherited by post independence regimes.

As early as independence, the 1962 Constitution reflected this hangover. Plus, being the Commander-in Chief of the Armed forces, the President was empowered to appoint and dismiss chairmen and officers of the Public Service Commission and the Judicial Service Commission. Similarly, the same applied to the Chief Justice and the DPP. Courts were thus effectively prevented from inquiring into whether or not the President had acted upon the advice of anyone or indeed whether he had acted rightly.

The 1967 Constitution eroded other arms of government even more. Concerning courts, the most effective fetter on the Judiciary was the presidential power over the appointment of the Chief Justice and although concealed, the power to dismiss.

Independence of the judiciary was tested in recent times and it appears that the government failed miserably to stand up to the test. In The Uganda Law Society V AG[992], the doctrine was held to have been blatantly violated. The back ground to it was that Rt. Colonel Kiiza Besigye, a leader of the political party known as the FDC and 22 others (the accused) were jointly charged with treason and misprision of treason under the Penal Code Act. The indictment was then read to them. The 1st accused, Dr. Besigye was separately charged with rape. They were later committed to the High Court for trial. On 16, November, 2005, the accused were taken to the High Court for a bail application before Lugayizi J. 14 of the accused satisfied the conditions for grant of bail and were granted the same. However, because of certain acts of the security personnel at the High Court premises, the bail papers could not be processed. The security men were dressed in dark clothes and heavily armed. They entered into some of the Court offices and interrupted the court's normal duties. The accused in consequence thereof had to be taken back to prison. The petition therefore sought among other declarations a declaration that the acts of the Anti Terrorism Task Force Urban Hit Squad at the High court on 16th November, 2005 contravened Articles 23(1) & (6) and 128 (1) and (2) of the Constitution. The court held that the said acts contravened the independence of the judiciary. That there were enough police personnel at the High Court premises and accordingly, the deployment of the Anti Terrorism Task Force was completely unnecessary. In his judgment Engwau JA noted that 'under Article 128 (3) of the Constitution, all organgs and agencies of the state are required to accord to the courts such assistance as may be required to ensure the effectiveness of the courts. What those military personnel did that day was not an assistance envisaged in Article 128 (3) of the Constitution.

[992] CONSTITUTIONAL PETITION NO. 18 OF 2005

In her judgment Byamugisha JA concluded that 'the acts of the military did interfere with the normal operation of the court and its independence in that the accused persons who had been granted bail were unable to process their bail documentation because of interference by the military. It was in my view a threatening scenario and it contravened the provisions of Article 128 of the Constitution which guarantees the independence of the judiciary…'

The after math of this clear abuse of the independence of the judiciary forced the Principal Judge Justice Ogoola James to write a poem about the events at the High Court which he described as 'the most naked and grotesque violation of the twin doctrines of the rule of law and the independence of the judiciary'. To him, this amounted to the defilement and desecration of our temple of justice. He equated the act to the heinous days of Idi Amin when Chief Justice Ben Kiwanuka was abducted from the premises of Court never to be seen alive again.

Shortly thereafter, the Uganda Law Society also issued a statement criticizing the acts. The Uganda Judicial Officers Association also followed suit. Members of the Uganda Law Society fully robed later protested in front of the High Court protesting the deterioration of the rule of law and the immediate resignation of the Attorney General, Khiddu Makubuya. They also issued a statement to the effect that they will no longer recognize the Attorney General. The East Africa Law Society also issued a statement challenging the said violations. Similarly, the International Commission of Jurists showed its own fears and immediately sent a Commissioner to oversee the Besigye trial.

As if these events were not enough to show that the independence of the judiciary had already been violated, on November 18th,2005 Lugayizi J withdrew from the treason case. He did not give any reasons for doing so but many believe that it was intimidation from the State. The Principal Judge then took over the Besigye hearing.

In this heat, on November 19th, 2005 there was an NRM National Delegates Conference which returned Y.K. Museveni as the unopposed party Chairman and presidential candidate. He in an unprecedented speech threatened the judiciary by stating openly that he would not hesitate to fire judges who unjustly issue eviction orders. He said 'The government will not tolerate the eviction of tenants caused by the rulings of corrupt judges and magistrates. I will suspend any judicial officer and constitute a judicial commission of inquiry into his or her activities, if there is any evidence of any violation of the Land Act…'

The events of 16th November, 2005 created a new error of disrespect for the judiciary. Never had so clear a statement about threatening the judiciary ever been made by an executive leader.

On November 18th 2005, the drama continued. Dr. Besigye's co-accused were charged with terrorism before the General Court Martial (GCM). Terrorism charges must be tried by the High Court under S 6 of the Terrorism Act No. 14 of 2002 but the UPDF Act gives the GCM jurisdiction over any crime if the suspect is an ex-military or a civilian found to have aided or abated in unlawful military operations or to be in possession of arms, ammunition or equipment ordinarily being the monopoly of the Defence Forces. 5 of the accused then petitioned the Constitutional Court challenging the constitutionality of the provisions of the UPDF Act. They as well challenged the parallel jurisdiction of the GCM and the High Court arguing that this would expose them to double jeopardy. The Uganda Law Society also independently lodged its own petition.

On November 24th 2005 when Besigye's bail application was scheduled to be heard by the High Court, he was instead committed to the GCM on charges of terrorism and illegal possession of fire arms. During the hearing, the Chairman of the GCM General Elly Tumwine ordered the arrest of two f Besigye's lawyers, Caleb Alaka and Erias Lukwago who were released thereafter. The following day. The Principal Judge granted what he termed s interim bail to Besigye. He acknowledged the pending reference of constitutional matters to the Constitutional Court. Another big blow to the independence of the judiciary was again witnessed. Despite the bail ruling, prison authorities refused to release Besigye. Their reason was that he was still on remand in respect of the GCM. This was not made any better by rumours that the Defence Minister Amama Mbabazi and the DPP had visited the Chambers of the Principal Judge.

On November 29th 2005, Besigye's lawyers filed a bail application at the High Court in respect of the GCM charges arguing that since the High Court was superior to the GCM, it has unlimited jurisdiction to grant bail to Besigye. They also concurrently lodged Constitutional Petition No. 17 of 2005 challenging the jurisdiction of the GCM arguing that the offences Besigye was charged with were based on the same facts as those over which he was being charged in the High Court which amounted to double jeopardy.

On November 2nd 2005, Justice Remmy Kasule ordered the GCM to stop hearing the case against Dr. Besigye. He also granted leave for him to challenge the authority of the GCM. He however refused to order his release.

On December 12th 2005, Justice Kasule refused to order Besigye's release ahead of his nomination to run as a presidential candidate. His reasons were that the bail application which also challenged Besigye's trial in the GCM could not be heard until the Constitutional Court pronounced itself on those very important matters referred to it. Nonetheless, he ruled that the GCM was subordinate to the High Court until the Constitutional Court rules otherwise. Accordingly, he further restrained the GCM from proceeding with the case hearing.

On December 15th 2005 the Constitutional Court started hearing Constitutional Petition No. 16 of 2005 by Besigye and 5 others. On December 19th 2005 the treason trial of Dr. Besigye started. At the same time, Besigye's lawyers filed a fresh application challenging his continued illegal detention. Katutsi J on 22nd December ordered the Commissioner General of Prisons to appear before him to explain why Besigye continued to be in detention even after the grant of bail by the Principal Judge. He also ordered the immediate stay of the GCM proceedings.

On January 2nd 2006, the rape case against Besigye started at the High Court. Katutsi J found the extension of Besigye's remand warrant and his continued detention illegal. He ordered his immediate release upon which he was released. The independence of the judiciary was also later tested when Kagaba J who was hearing the treason case stood down.

More recently, the judiciary had displayed its anger towards the increased interference of the executive in judicial matters. On March 1st 2007, the PRA suspects being charged together with Besigye were produced at court for the hearing of an application filed by the Solicitor General. It was adjourned to March 7th 2007 at the request of the Solicitor General. Court in the interim ordered the release of the suspects on bail in accordance with its earlier order of 16th November, 2005 which had not been obeyed even at the time. As the Registrar of the High Court was processing the bail documents, security men surrounded the Criminal Registry and insisted on taking back the suspects to prison. A scuffle ensued at the court premises. 6 out of the 9 suspects satisfied the conditions for bail and the 3 who did not were handed back to the prisons authorities. The 6 however could not leave court premises because of a heavy deployment by the army. As the chaos continued, the army was directed by high ranking judicial officers at the court to vacate the court premises. They disobeyed and instead brought more reinforcement with a more aggressive intention of re-arresting the PRA Suspects. In the process, Mr. Kiyimba Mutale, counsel defending the suspects was badly beaten up and left soaked in blood. He was rushed to the chambers of the Deputy Chief Justice. At about 8:30 pm, the 6 suspects were released and handed over to their advocates but the military personnel using their high-handedness re-arrested them and whisked them to an unknown destination.

On 2nd March 2007, the judiciary met in an impromptu meeting and resolved to begin a sit-down strike because of these violations. In a press-statement read by the Deputy Chief Justice, they demanded an apology from the Executive for the events and re-assurances of non-repetition of the events which were an affront to the independence of the judiciary. Accordingly, they resolved to suspend all judicial business with effect from March 5th 2007.

In her statement, the Deputy Chief Justice notable cited the following reasons for the strike:

a) Disobedience of court orders with impunity
b) The constant threats and attacks on the safety and independence of the judiciary and judicial officers
c) The savage violence exhibited by security personnel within the court premises
d) The total failure by all organs and agencies of the State to accord to the courts assistance as required to ensure effectiveness of the courts under Article 128 of the Constitution
e) The recognition that judicial power is derived from the people, to be exercised by the courts on behalf of the people in conformity with the law, the values, norms and aspiration of the people of Uganda.

Shortly thereafter, the Uganda Law Society in an emergency meeting held on 6th March 2007 resolved to suspend the Attorney General and the DPP together with the Inspector General of Police from the Law Society and to go on a sit down strike after the Judges had resumed work. A meeting of the Judges and other judicial officers held on 7th March 2007 resolved to continue with the strike instead of requests from the President and other high ranking officers to resume duty. All this was said to be in retaliation of the gross violations of independence of the judiciary. Shortly thereafter, the Judges agreed to resume their duties effective 12th March 2007 yet the advocates on the same day effectively began their 3 day sit down strike. This has been seen by many as the climax of the abuse of the doctrine of judicial independence in Uganda. The State has failed to show its commitment to respect one of the 3 arms of government and the future of judicial independence remains very much in doubt.

But apart from this, there have been other events were the executive has displayed public willingness to disrespect courts of law and their decisions. In 2006, State Minister for information and communication technology, Alintuma Nsambu was convicted by Masaka Grade One Magistrate Godfrey Kaweesa for issuing a bounced cheque to a Rakai- district based women's group. He was sentenced to one year in prison or a fine of 3.2 million which he paid. Shortly thereafter, the then Minister for Ethics and Integrity, Dr. Nsaba Buturo disclosed that the matter had been discussed by government i.e. Cabinet which found that the magistrate had mishandled the case. He said that the magistrate was to be probed and that he had not considered all facts as he should have and that the decision involved some politics. He added that he had advised him against appealing and that 'we shall handle the matter administratively'. It remains to be doubted what exactly these administrative measures meant. The Principal Judge in the days that followed undertook to stand up to the rights of the magistrate and to ensure that he would not be intimidated.

THE POST-1995 ERA AND JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE

The courts during this time have tried to exercise their independence but amidst a lot of pressure on them from the other two arms. In the Movement Poster man case May 2000, an individual in Lugazi during the referendum period tore a movement poster and was brought before the magistrate. The magistrate saw no wrong with what he had done on the basis that he had been exercising his freedom of conscience under Article 29(1)(b).

THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDICIARY IN CONTEMPORARY UGANDA

I have elucidated earlier on how the powers of the Kingdom of Buganda had an effect on the local courts. I have also drawn comparison from the origins of the court system in England and how the King had great influence in its promulgation. Today is not any different! Most offices in the judiciary today are by law constituted by appointment by the president. Can we therefore say that such a system can ever allow for the judiciary to be truly independent of the executive?

The Constitution of 1995 clearly provides for the independence of the judiciary. Judicial independence refers to the ability of courts and judges to carry out their responsibilities without being influenced or controlled by other actors, whether public or private. In a normative sense, the phrase also refers to the level of independence that courts and judges should have.

This ambiguity in the meaning of the word judicial independence has exacerbated already-existing debates and misunderstandings about its appropriate definition, prompting some scholars to wonder if the idea serves any analytical function at all. In general, there are two origins of disagreement. The first is philosophical, in the sense that there is a lack of clarity about the kind of independence that courts and judges can have. The second is normative, in the form of debate about the appropriate level of judicial independence.

In practice, independence from other governmental actors is commonly regarded as both the most crucial and the most difficult to attain sort of judicial independence. On the one hand, those who believe that courts have a specific obligation to ensure that individuals and minorities do not endure illegal or unjust treatment at the hands of the government or a tyrannical majority greatly respect judicial independence. On the other hand, that type is thought to be particularly difficult to attain because the other arms of government usually have the capacity to disregard or impede judicial decisions, if not also to retaliate against the courts for decisions they disagree with. The judiciary, according to Alexander Hamilton's famous definition, is the "least dangerous" institution, as it has "no control over either the sword or the money," and hence is least capable of protecting itself against the other branches.

Judicial independence from government control has been formalized since at least 1701, when England's Act of Settlement offered judges legal protection from unilateral dismissal by the crown as part of a greater shift of power toward Parliament and the courts. Even states that do not implement judicial independence are likely to profess a commitment to it. The majority of the world's existing written constitutions include some type of express protection for the judiciary's independence, and the proportion of such texts has been steadily increasing over time. Judicial independence has also been explicitly acknowledged at the international level, as evidenced by the United Nations General Assembly's adoption of the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary in 1985. However, empirical evidence reveals that the existence of nominal constitutional protections of judicial independence is unrelated to actual judicial independence respect in practice.

Several problems must be addressed in any thorough and consistent understanding of judicial independence. “Independence for whom?”, “Independence from whom?”, and “Independence from what?” are the first three questions. However, in order to provide satisfying answers to such concerns, it is vital to analyze why judicial independence is important and what it is designed to achieve. In other words, it is vital to answer the question, "What is the aim of independence?"

Individual judges might be defined as having judicial independence, or the judiciary as a whole can be defined as having judicial independence. In terms of practicality, neither viewpoint is clearly superior than the other.

On the one hand, if judicial independence is protected at the institutional level but not at the individual level, individual judges may be constrained to follow the preferences of the judiciary's leadership, resulting in a less-than-complete application of the rule of law. The extent to which the judiciary as an institution compels obedience and conformity from its members, for example, has been criticised for producing timid judges who are unwilling or unable to rule against the government in Chile and Japan.

Individual judges, on the other hand, will be free to pursue their personal inclinations if judicial independence is secured at the individual level. Such unchecked authority not only encourages abuse, but it also increases the likelihood that judges would make contradictory decisions, thus jeopardizing the law's predictability and stability.

Only when a court settles a case involving the interests of some actor or organization with potential or real power over the court does the existence and sufficiency of judicial independence become practical concerns. In general, the more powerful the actor whose interests are at issue, the more important it is to maintain the court's independence from that actor. However, if both parties in a disagreement are powerful, the symmetry of power may give some or all of the protection required.

Disputes between private actors, disputes between government actors, and disputes between private actors and government actors are the three scenarios that a court may meet. In the first scenario, the court must seek to maintain its independence from the parties, who may attempt to undermine it by bribery or intimidation, among other methods. In that case, the government is a supporter of judicial independence, and it can be expected to defend the court's independence from the parties' efforts.
In the second scenario, judicial independence has a good chance of being restored. The court is urged to select sides between two powerful actors in an unbiased manner rather than confronting a powerful actor on behalf of a weak one. Regardless of which side the court chooses, the consequence will be a two-against-one dynamic that should safeguard the court from vengeance. Because it is at war with itself, the government does not constitute a significant danger to judicial independence in such circumstances.
In the third scenario, the government does pose a serious threat to judicial independence, but the people can either mitigate or exacerbate the harm. For example, if a ruler seeks to illegally extend his or her own term of office, the court's independence from the government is threatened, but its ability to withstand that threat is greatly enhanced if it can count on public support if it rules against the government. The independence of the court is protected as long as it is in a position to side with either the government or the people. Either should be capable of supplying the court with the necessary support to survive the other's attacks. In other cases, such as illegal government discrimination against an unpopular minority, the court may be requested to take a position that is hostile to both the government and the public. The chances for judicial independence are at an all-time low: the judiciary is expected to display independence from both the government and the public, but it lacks a powerful friend to assist it withstand the pressures it faces.
In the long run, however, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to establish a totally independent judiciary free of all political and popular influence. Even a very independent court, such as the United States Supreme Court, is likely to be transformed by political forces over time and to fit the demands of a persistent political majority, according to the Supreme Court's comparatively long history. It is naive to believe that a small group of judges, who lack the power of the purse or the sword, could constantly disobey more powerful actors and organizations without suffering any consequences, regardless of what statutory protections they may have. There are limits to what may be accomplished simply by altering the judiciary's institutional characteristics or enacting solemn affirmations concerning judicial independence's inviolability. Finally, even moderate degrees of judicial independence are likely to be contingent on political and historical factors that are external to the court and may be out of reach, such as the maintenance of a stable, competitive multiparty democracy.

Not all forms of judicial decision-making influence pose a threat to judicial independence. While some behaviours aimed at influencing courts, such as bribery and intimidation, may be prohibited by any reasonable definition of judicial independence, others can only be judged on the basis of debatable normative judgments. For example, in the instance of public protests in front of courthouses, one viewpoint would be that such protests should be valued as a form of political expression, and that judges in a democracy are allowed, if not required, to consider public opinion. Alternatively, one could argue that judges, like jurors, should be insulated from such manifestations of public opinion to ensure that their judgments are not affected by considerations that should be irrelevant. Similarly, a public campaign to deny a judge re-election because he has ruled in controversial ways might be viewed as either a positive expression of democracy or a threat to judicial independence.

By fiat, it is impossible to determine if such efforts to influence court decision-making are compatible with judicial independence. In such cases, defining the requirements of judicial independence necessitates a normative theory of what courts are supposed to consider when making decisions, what judicial independence is supposed to achieve, and how judicial independence can and should be balanced against other goals and considerations.

Judicial independence is sometimes viewed as a means to an end rather than a goal in and of itself. The ultimate goal, most people would agree, might be stated as the fair and unbiased adjudication of conflicts in conformity with the law. If that is the goal, however, the pursuit of judicial independence faces a number of challenges.

One argument is that the objective is unrealistic because it is founded on a misunderstanding of the nature of law and adjudication. Legal theorists often hold the belief that the law is frequently uncertain, making it impossible for judges to resolve disputes solely by applying past law. Rather, the act of adjudication, it is claimed, requires judges to create the very law that they appear to administer. However, if adjudication necessitates law making, judicial independence protects judges' ability to decide disputes in accordance with the law, rather than allowing them to make and impose whatever laws they see fit, a prospect that many see as incompatible with either the proper role of judges in a democracy or the concept of separation of powers.

Another argument is that judicial independence is neither required nor sufficient to provide unbiased adjudication in conformity with the law, and that if left unchecked, it may even harm that purpose. On the one hand, a judge facing reprisal may nevertheless be able to decide cases impartially. Giving judges the flexibility to determine matters as they see fit, on the other hand, does not guarantee that they will choose to do so fairly and in line with the law. Even if it were feasible to create a judiciary that is fully independent of both popular and political influence, what would prevent judges from making decisions based on personal bias or self-interest? Many people believe it is critical to strike a balance between judicial independence and judicial accountability, as well as to discern between appropriate and inappropriate kinds of judicial influence. Any process designed to prevent or punish judicial abuse of authority, on the other hand, is likely to be vulnerable to abuse. The ensuing question of how to oversee the judges who oversee the government—quis custodiet ipsos custodes (Latin: "Who watches the watchers?")—has long perplexed constitutional and political scholars and admits no simple solution.

THE SHADOW OVER UGANDAS JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE.

Since the 1960s, Ugandan courts have explored and applied the political question theory. The political question doctrine is a result of the separation of powers doctrine, and it states that certain constitutional concerns are constitutionally entrusted to the elected branches of government to resolve. As a result, such questions are non-justiciable, and the court must refrain from ruling on them if doing so would interfere with the elected branches of government's powers. The overarching idea is that such issues must be resolved through the political process. The development and application of the political question concept in Uganda, like Ghana and Nigeria, has been inspired by legal developments in the United States. The development of case law and tendencies in the application of the political question doctrine subject in Ugandan jurisprudence are examined in this article. The history of Uganda's political question philosophy is discussed in this article. This article also examines the case law developments and trends around the doctrine's application in Uganda, arguing that the theory is unquestionably part of Ugandan constitutional law.

In Uganda v Commissioner of Prisons Ex Parte Matovu[993], the Uganda High Court, sitting as a Constitutional Court, considered and accepted the political question theory. The applicant, Michael Matovu, was arrested on May 22, 1966, under the Deportation Act, and then released and held again on July 16, 1966, under the Emergency Powers Act and the Emergency Powers (Detention) Regulations 1966, which had come into effect after his initial detention. A number of events occurred between February 22 and April 15, 1966, including the imposition of a state of emergency in the Buganda region. Following these events, then-Prime Minister Milton Obote unilaterally suspended the 1962 Constitution, which established a federal form of governance between the Kingdom of Buganda and the Republic of Uganda. Through the imposition of a new Constitution in 1966, Obote effectively took over all powers of the government of Uganda by depriving the ceremonial President and Vice-President of Uganda of their offices, in violation of the 1962 Constitution, and vesting their authorities in the Prime Minister and the Cabinet. The pigeon hole Constitution, which was forced on Uganda when Parliament ratified it on April 15, 1966, is referred to some commentators as the pigeon hole Constitution because members of Parliament are reported to have found copies of the Constitution in their pigeonholes for them to approve. The Commission of Inquiry into Human Rights Violations summarizes the events of 1966 as follows:

[993] Uganda v. Commissioner of Prisons Ex Parte Matovu, [1966] EALR 514.

The Prime Minister suspended the 1962 Constitution in February 1966. This was a unilateral decision made without consulting Parliament or the Ugandan people. Uganda was effectively administered without a constitution for a few months. Members of Parliament were stuffed into pigeonholes and asked to endorse the 1966 Constitution even before reading it, which they did. To put it another way, this Parliament unexpectedly and without consulting anyone formed a Constituent Assembly. They passed and promulgated a Constitution about which they had no idea.

The applicant in Matovu was seeking an order for his release. The Matovu Court had to decide whether the Emergency Powers Act 1963 and the Emergency Powers (Detention) Regulations 1966 were utra vires the Constitution to the extent that they allowed the President to take actions that were not justifiable for the purpose of dealing with the situation that existed during the state of emergency. Because there were two constitutions before the Matovu Court, the 1962 Constitution and the 1966 Constitution, the Court raised the issue of the legitimacy of the 1966 Constitution on its own. When questioned by the Matovu Court, counsel for the applicant stated that he had some reservations about the Constitution of 1966's legal legitimacy. The administration, on the other hand, claimed that the Matovu Court lacked jurisdiction to investigate the Constitution's legality because, among other things, the creation of a Constitution is a political act that falls outside the Court's purview.

According to the government's argument, because there are three branches of government, it was the legislature's and executive's responsibility to decide the Constitution's validity, as the issue was a political one; the Court's responsibility was to accept that decision and simply interpret the Constitution as it was presented to it. The administration further argued that members of the legislature who voted to pass the Constitution did so as representatives of their constituents, to whom they must account. Furthermore, the Matovu Court would be usurping the functions of the legislature if it undertook to enquire into and pronounce on the constitutional validity or otherwise of the Constitution of 1966, because judges are not elected but appointed and represent no specific constituencies to whom they must account for their stewardship. The government cited the United States Supreme Court cases of Luther[994], Marbury v. Madison[995], and Baker v Carr[996] in support of this argument, as well as the concept of the political question as explored in these instances.

The Matovu Court acknowledged that "the government's exposition of political question doctrine as established in Luther cannot be criticized" in its response to the government's submissions. Commentators regard Luther as a famous example of the first application of the political question doctrine, which was formulated in Marbury.

The Supreme Court of the United States had to decide whether it had the authority to legalize the popular breakup of an entrenched state government in Luther. Martin Luther, the plaintiff, was jailed after martial law was declared but before the Rhode Island Constitution was enacted in 1843. Martial law troops detained the plaintiff when they broke into his home, ruined his possessions, and tormented his elderly mother. The complainant eventually filed a trespass lawsuit against the martial law troops. The defendants attempted to justify their actions by claiming that they were agents of the established lawful government of Rhode Island, which was then under martial law to defend itself against active insurgency; that the plaintiff was a participant in that insurgency; and that they entered his premises under orders to arrest the plaintiff.

The issue arose from the political divisions that enraged Rhode Islanders between 1841 and 1842, resulting in a scenario in which two organizations made rival claims to recognition as the lawful government. Plaintiff's claim against the military hinged on whether government was in power in Rhode Island at the time of his arrest: the royal charter government or the People's Constitution government. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the lower court's failure to hear arguments on the matter, its charge to the jury that the earlier established or "charter" government was legal, and the defendants' verdict were all upheld.

The majority judgment in Luther was written by Chief Justice Taney, who framed the question in institutional terms and concentrated his reasoning on the practical consequences of determining which sovereign was legitimate. He noted that if the Supreme Court rules that the charter government is unconstitutional, it might throw Rhode Island's legal system into disarray, including the invalidation of taxes and laws, as well as the nullification of court judgements. “When the decision of this court may result in such results,” Chief Justice Taney reasoned, “it becomes its duty to scrutinize very carefully its own powers before it undertakes to exercise jurisdiction.” The ability to judge whether constitution or government was legal belonged to state leaders, Congress, and the [994] Luther v Borden, 48 U.S. 1 (1849) (held that controversies arising under the Guarantee clause of article four of the United States Constitution were political questions outside the purview of the court).

[995]Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803)
[996] Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962

President, not the federal courts, according to Chief Justice Taney.[997] Furthermore, he reasoned that Congress' decision to recognize a state government or its representatives under Article IV of the United States Constitution is obligatory on all other departments of government and cannot be challenged in court.' Professor Barkow is correct in her assessment of the case, arguing that Chief Justice Taney reiterated the classical theory of the political question doctrine and concluded that:

"This tribunal, therefore, should be the last to overstep the boundaries which limit its own jurisdiction. And while it should always be ready to meet any question confided to it by the Constitution, it is equally its duty not to pass beyond its appropriate sphere of action, and to take care not to involve itself in discussions which properly belong to other forums. No one, we believe, has ever doubted this proposition."

The Matovu Court based its judgement on Luther's work. According to the Court, Luther's political question concept "is a valid doctrine," but it was not appropriate to the Matovu circumstances. 'However useful and instructive the observations of the United States Supreme Court in the several matters discussed in that case may be, the Ugandan government erred in relying on it as supporting the proposition that the validity of the Constitution of 1966 was a non-justiciable political question,' it concluded. On the facts of Matovu, the Court also determined Luther to be immaterial and distinct.

To begin with, the Matovu Court observed that Luther was a contest between two rival groups for control of Rhode Island's government. It claimed that there was no such competition in Uganda, and that the Ugandan government is well-established and without a competitor. Unlike Luther, the Court stated that the question before it was the validity of the Constitution, not the legality of the government. While it is true that Luther primarily dealt with the question of which government was legitimate, it is false to say that he did not examine the Constitution's legality. The legality of the Constitution, on the other hand, was one of the issues before the Luther Court. Professor Amar noted in his analysis of the Dorr Rebellion, which led to the Luther case, that the charterists (one of the rival groups claiming to have established a lawful government) submitted a Constitution that received less than one third of adult males' votes, or less than half of the registered vote.[998] Despite this, the People's Constitution, which had been submitted by the opposing side, did not become the Constitution of the State of Rhode Island. According to Professor Amar, the legal Constitution earned 7,000 votes, while the People's Constitution received approximately 14,000 votes.

Chief Justice Taney assessed whether the People's Constitution, as opposed to the charterists' Constitution, which became the Rhode Island Constitution, was legal, and concluded that state officials, the president, and Congress had the authority to decide which Constitution was valid. On this point, Savitzky claims that Chief Justice Taney dismissed the vote cast on the People's Constitution as proof of its legal adoption, declaring:

[997] R. Barkow, 'More Supreme than Court? The Fall of the political Question Doctrine and the Rise of Judicial Supremacy', 102 Columbia Law Review (2002), 237–336

[998] A. Amar, 'The Central Meaning of Republican Government: Popular Sovereignty, Majority Rule, and The Denominator Problem' 65 University of Colorado Law Review (1994) 749–786, at 775.

"Certainly it is no part of the judicial functions of any court of the United States to prescribe the qualification of voters in a State nor has it the right to determine what political privileges the citizens of a State are entitled to, unless there is an established constitution or law to govern its decision."

The lack of established law or a Constitution enabling popular action, as Savitzky claimed, was at the heart of Chief Justice Taney's application of the political question concept. He pointed out that, according to Taney, there was no rule that a court could use to evaluate the qualification of voters upon the ratification of the proposed Constitution unless there was some prior state law to guide it.

Second, the Matovu Court noted that Luther brought up a slew of political issues, including the right to vote and the criteria for such voters. In Luther, unlike in Matovu, two opposing governors were selected, and the antagonism between them resulted in a situation that was akin to civil war. The Court found that insurgency had occurred in Rhode Island, and that the state had been declared a war zone. It was also highlighted that Luther raised the issue of whether the government was republican or not, which is a political subject reserved for Congress under Article IV of the US Constitution. These circumstances were not present in Matovu, according to the Court.

While the Matovu Court noted that Luther dealt with political issues such as the ability to vote, it fails to acknowledge that this political issue was weighed in the context of deciding the legality of Rhode Island's two competing constitutions. Furthermore, while the political instability in Rhode Island at the time of Luther's decision may not be comparable to that in Uganda at the time of Matovu, the Matovu Court's portrayal of the political environment in Uganda at the time is inaccurate. The fact is that Matovu and surrounding political events caused a great deal of political instability in Uganda, which finally culminated to the coup d'état of 1971, which brought General Idi Amin to power.

Despite finding Luther to be distinct from Matovu, the Court came at a judgment that is consistent with Chief Justice Taney's principal considerations in ruling on Luther. The Court held that any judicial judgement on the government's legality may have far-reaching, devastating, and incorrect consequences because the issue was a political one that should be handled by the administration and legislature, which were accountable to the constituencies. Unlike Luther, however, the Matovu Court decided that a judgement on the Constitution's legality was within the Court's jurisdiction. The 1966 Constitution was ruled to be legitimate for a variety of reasons, including the fact that it was accepted by Ugandans and the international community, and that it had been firmly established and enforced throughout the country without opposition. As a result, the Court concluded that it couldn't change the political situation. Another practical issue that may have prompted the Court to legitimize the 1966 Constitution is the risk of exposing all previous acts and taxes to legal dispute, including the validity of the judges appointed by Prime Minister Obote under the contested Constitution.

Matovu can be chastised for misinterpreting and misapplying Luther. I believe Luther was in control of Matovu because it teaches that constitutional creation is solely the province of the people as popular sovereignty. “Our power begins after theirs end,” wrote Justice Woodbury in his concurring decision in Luther. In this aspect, Uganda's government made the right decision in relying on Luther. While some observers have questioned Matovu, it is nevertheless good legislation in Uganda and has been cited by judges in Uganda and beyond. Since Matovu, the Uganda Court of Appeal has considered and applied the political question doctrine in Andrew Kayira v Edward Rugumayo & Others[999], where the Court, relying on Matovu, ruled that Professor Lule's removal from the office of President of Uganda was a political question not reviewable in the courts of law but reserved to the state's political organs. The Supreme Court of Uganda in Attorney General v Major General David Tinyefuza was perhaps the most important use of the political question theory under the post-1995 Constitution of Uganda.

THE NEED TO REDUCE SECURITY AGENCIES INTERFERENCE IN JUDICIAL WORK.

The security agencies ought to protect the human rights accruing to the citizens of Uganda but when the High court of Uganda in the case of Re Kyagulanyi Sentamu Robert & Barbra Kyagulanyi Itungo v AG, CDF & IGP[1000] ordered the security agencies to vacate the home of Mr. Kyagulanyi, the spokesperson of the UPDF said that, ‘’We are a law-abiding and do respect the High Court ruling but we shall not be vacating immediately because we have intelligence of an outbreak of planned violence’’[1001] yet it must be noted that the High Court in Namibia in the Hamutenyav Hamutenya[1002] that ‘’ judgments, orders, are but what the Courts are all about. The effectiveness of a Court lies in execution of its judgments and order. A rule of Law is a cornerstone of the existence of any democratic government and should be proudly guarded’’. This reaffirms that the courts of judicature are part of the institutions in place set to ensure that the rights are observed.

PERSISTENT "EXECUTIVE-MINDEDNESS" DOMINATES JUDICIAL IDEOLOGY

[999]Andrew Kayira v Edward Rugumayo & Others, Constitutional Case no 1 (1979)
[1000]HC Civil Division Misc. Cause No. 16 of 2021
[1001]https://www.trtwolrd.com
[1002] (PA-2004/195) [2005] NAHC1

In the two decades after Obote's 1966 coup, no less than five Chief Justices were removed by executive fiat: Sir Udo Udoma (shortly after legitimising Obote's 1966 coup), Dermont Sheridan, Samson Wambuzi, George Masika, Peter Allan and, of course, Benedicta Kiwanuka. [1003]with rare, brave exceptions like Chief Justice Kiwanuka, a persistent "executive-mindedness" dominated judicial ideology since Matovu.[1004] To be fair, judges in Kampala had to adopt this attitude or risk Kiwanuka's fate. But Chapter 3 mapped how the judiciary was willing to identify executive decree with valid law well before Amin militarised government. If anything, the constitutional interregnum up to 1986 further entrenched a judicial ideology that was "more statist than the executive".[1005]

OMNIPOTENCE OF EXECUTIVE POWER,[THAT] HAS LED TO A CONTINUAL ADDICTION TO THE NOTION OF JUDICIAL RESTRAINT.

In January 1986, Yoweri Museveni and his National Resistance Army captured Kampala from the remnants of the Obote government's Uganda People's Democratic Army. A few days later, with marked symbolism, Peter Allen, the British-born Chief Justice, swore in Museveni as President. Museveni became the first African leader to seize power with a rebel army; all previous coups across the continent had been confined to a few individuals in the capital.[1006] To consolidate his military gains in the Kampala hinterland, Museveni established Resistance Councils (RCs) in each village he captured from Obote's regime in Kampala. But they were fragile structures in a countryside ravaged by decades of centralized pillaging by a succession of despots.[1007]

The RCs were remarkably similar to the Ruwenzururu village councils. All adults were members of their village council, the RC-I 296 They elected a nine-person committee to decide local issues and in turn elected a nine-person RC-II committee at the parish level. Higher level RCs were elected indirectly, including reserved positions for women. Unlike the Ruwenzururu, however, there was not a parallel executive of appointed chiefs. While chiefs were ex Officio members of RCs, they may not vote. RC-IIIs and RC-Vs elected representatives to the National Resistance Council, which in turn appointed a District Administrator to oversee each district. The RC reforms

[1003]Mamdani &Oloka-Onyango, *supra*at504.

[1004] A few brave High Court judgesdid grant writs of habeas corpus. By the time Obote returned to power in 1980, however, military governments had "lost even the last vestiges of embarrassment".

[1005]Id.

[1006]Herbst, supra at254

[1007]AsJ.M.S. Ochola, then Minister for Regional Administrations, said in 1967:"all sectional interestsmust givewaybe for ethenational will, and that one structure of Government, interlocking from thePresidency down to the miruka [the basic unit of Ganda society], must guide and order all our efforts.": cited in Sathyamurthy, *supra*at443-44.

did infuse a degree of democracy and gender equality into local governance structures, but reproduced some elements of the colonial administrative hierarchy-notably a centrally-appointed District Administrator for saza chief of the 1902 Buganda paradigm.

In 1987, RCs were given judicial powers over minor civil (debts, contracts, assault and battery, property damage and trespass) and customary land, marital status of women, paternity of children, identifying heirs, impregnation of minors and bail) matters. [1008] A person could appeal an RC-I decision to the RC-II, then the RC-III and finally the chief magistrate in the formal court hierarchy. The rationale for decentralizing justice was to provide speedy, inexpensive and informal justice in a less foreign setting than magistrates' courts. Women were to benefit the most since the alternative state magistrates' courts demanded prohibitively high fees and some literacy to navigate its written laws.[1009]For the next few years RCs were important dispute settlement forums "in a period when state courts were unable to project themselves effectively in many rural areas".[1010]

In 1995, a Constituent Assembly adopted Uganda's fourth constitution since independence.[1011] Chapter 11[1012] of the Constitution entrenched local government in Uganda as distinct level of government with powers delegated by the national legislature. Details of the reformed LCs were set out in the Local Governments Act. LCs were supposed to build on the RCs's success and entrench local, democratic justice at the village level for all Ugandans.

Yet by 1997 the number of cases before Local Councils had dropped notably. Especially by women [1013]For women in particular, old patriarchal relations lurked beneath the new, democratic local courts. The colonial authority had created the chief as patriarchal despot ruling his tribal village through "customary law" By bifurcating the state legal system into civil (urban) and customary (rural) laws, the judiciary was cordoned off from the countryside. The LC reforms did not completely succeed in overcoming this legacy. Men still dominated the LC committees and its law judges were often relatively "educated, wealthier, and older men who have little knowledge of [civil] law or legal process."303 Moreover, a village's leading men often formed a tightly knit clique. As one woman in south-western Kabale district put it: "local councils stand up for each other because they all drink together".[1014]When women brought cases against men relating to land [1008]Democracy: The Case of Resistance Councils in Uganda"in Mamdani&Oloka-Onyango, *supra at*365.

[1009]&sistance Committees(JudicialPowers)Statute, no. 1of 1988[RC Judicial Powers Statute]
[1010]Lynn S. Khadiagala,"The Failure of Popular Justice in Uganda: Local Councils and Women's Property Rights"(2001)32Development&Change55at56.
[1011]Jennifer Widner,"Courts and Democracy in Post Conflict Transitions: A Social Scientist's Perspective on the African Case"(2001) 95American JInt'lL.64at65.
On the making of the Constitution, see Benjamin J. Odoki, The Search for a National Consensus: The Making of the 1995Uganda Constitution (Kampala: Fountain Publishers,2005); see also Coel Kirkby,"LinkingPopularParticipationand DemocraticRepresentationinConstitution-Making.
[1012] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[1013] Khadiagala, supra at65.
[1014] Khadiagala, supra at 64.

or marriage, they often faced an unsympathetic court packed with the man's beer- drinking peers. Men also saw a marriage dispute as women misbehaving, rather than having their legal rights violated. The LC would dismiss their complaints and admonish them to "behave 'like women'.[1015] In short, the reforms did not succeed in extracting the patriarchal elements of local justice.

Village courts were also ridden with casual corruption. A woman in Kabale district complained that all the LC court "want is money. LCs are chasing money for nothing. If you have no money, you get no justice."[1016]While a litigant must pay a small filing fee, the court may demand more money or its equivalent in beer. This practice is nothing new: Tamukedde admitted to accepting payments (though never bribes) by litigants in his gombolola court during the 1940s. Corruption especially hurt women who often had less money for gifts. The three levels of LC appeals also increased the cost and time in resolving disputes. In practice LC courts proved more expensive than magistrates' courts, which belied their original goal of cheap, local and informal justice.

Another reason for introducing LC courts was to let communities develop indigenous solutions to local problems. This echoed Hone's logic for leaving native courts alone to progress towards the ideal of English law. In a study of the first few years of RC courts, Oloka-Onyango found that they adapted their laws to new realities after 20 years of military rule.[1017]Unfortunately, this experiment with popular justice led to some abuse contrary to the statutory framework, including overbroad jurisdiction, marginalizing rape and defilement, inventing excessive punishments, and creating new offences.[1018] Later reforms would try to recapture the initial popularity, but are still too recent to evaluate.[1019]

In 1997, the Constitutional Court, an appellate court created by the 1995 Constitution with original jurisdiction over constitutional cases, dealt with its first reported customary law case in Adekur v. Opaja [1020] Maliam Adekur married her husband in 1973, but five years later separated from him until his death in 1988. In the meantime, her husband had made Joshua Opaja his heir, and thus heir to Adekur's estate according to Iteso customary law. Adekur remarried after her husband's death, but was arrested by Opaja and the sub-county chief on charges of elopement. The newlyweds pleaded guilty and then filed a petition against the Attorney-General of Uganda (as well as Opaja, though it was later dropped) for the chief magistrate's failure to prevent their arrest by the LC.

The Constitutional Court struck out the petition since the district magistrate, though under the Attorney-General's control, was not liable for any act or omission whilst exercising judicial power.

[1015]Id

[1016]Id

Mamdani&Oloka-Onyango,*supra*at511[1017]

[1018]Resistance Councils and Committees (JudicialPowers) Statute, No.1of 1988;

[1019]Local Governments(Amendment)Act, No.27 of 2006; Local Council Courts Act, No.13 of 2006.

1020, Const'l Petition No.1of1997(C.C.).

The plaintiff should have sued the district council, the Court observed. Adekur's case highlights ordinary people's confusion on who had what powers over them. LCs's could arrest or otherwise intimidate "misbehaving" women with little fear of repercussions from the formal courts. The hard fought women's rights in Article 33 of the 1995 Constitution would have to wait another five years. Many people turned away from LC courts dominated by prominent local men.

Instead they appealed to the supposedly "impartial" chief magistrate. The shift has been so drastic that magistrates' courts in rural areas are now overwhelmed with land and Marriage disputes despite their impartial reputation, however were not sympathetic to the new constitutional promise. In divorce cases, for instance, most magistrates were reluctant to remedy clear gender bias in old laws. In Yia v. Yia, a typical early case, a woman petitioned the magistrates' court for a divorce. She had to prove both adultery and cruelty (a man had only to prove the former) pursuant to the Divorce Act,[1021] but she argued that the extra burden on women seeking divorce contradicted ss. 31(1) and 33(6) of the 1995 Constitution. In his judgment, the magistrate said he believed her counsel had only made this constitutional argument because the lawyer "was not sure of sufficient evidence" to prove both grounds. His prejudice was similar to the LC men who dismissed women raising marital or land cases as trouble- makers. The magistrate then applied the law as "that of England in 1923", the year the Divorce Act was copied whole by the colonial government, stating: where the words of a statute are in themselves precise and unambiguous, those words should be taken as declaring the intention of the legislature. If the legislature intended to avail the wife the ground of adultery alone as provided ... I wonder why the Constituent Assembly did not say so in clear and ambiguous (sic) terms. I think counsel has not properly interpreted the provisions of the Constitution vis-a-vis the Divorce Act.[1022]

This analysis illustrates "the weight of history and precedent, as well as the omnipotence of executive power, [that] has led to a continual addiction to the notion of judicial restraint."[1023] Yet the Yia decision was still the norm in divorce cases in magistrates' courts well after 1995.[1024] It offered little hope to women seeking to escape oppressive LCs and without money to reach the more sympathetic appellate courts.

As in Tamukedde's time as gombolola in the 1930s, women were the greatest challenge to LC courts' interpretation of customary law. Urban women's groups have recently tried to reach out to women in rural areas, and thus challenge civil and customary laws that have limited their equal [1021] Yiav.Yia(1997), Mengo Divorce Cause No.4of1997(M.C.),cited in HenryOnoria,"Review of Major Decisionson Fundamental Rights and Freedoms in Uganda in 2004"(2005)11E.Afr.].Peace&H.R.at340.

[1022] Id.
[1023] Mamdani&Oloka-Onyango, supra at 504.
[1024] Onoria cites a number of magistrate court decisionstoshow that *Yiav.*Yia was a typical holding: Onoria, supra at 340.

rights in land and marriage. Their challenge was formulated in a rights-based discourse by Kampala's elite, educated women,[1025] but translated into an argument persuas1ve for local women.[1026] After years watching Parliament procrastinate over a comprehensive Domestic Relations Bill, various women's groups and individuals petitioned the courts to strike down the most discriminatory provisions from colonial-era marriage and succession laws[1027]

In 2002 the Constitutional Court finally and decisively overturned the dominant Yia interpretation of the Divorce Act. In Association of Women Lawyers V. Attorney-General, the unanimous Court found the second "cruelty" ground for women seeking divorce was unconstitutional. [1028] Justice Mpagi-Bahigeine described the law as “archaic” and “a colonial relic". She also recognized that while “old ideas and patterns exist”, marriage was now seen as an “equal partnership between husband and wife". "Legal rules" must "be made gender neutral". The Court thus struck out the offending provisions and in so doing gutted the Divorce Act. Justice Okello remedied this by making either of the two grounds for divorce, adultery or cruelty, available and applicable to both men and women. This appeared to be the first time a Ugandan court “read in" provisions to a statute to make it conform to the Constitution. Justice Okella added that the "[a]pplication of this order is likely to meet some difficulties," so responsible authorities should remedy the gap quickly. In other words, the Court would start modifying unconstitutional legislation, albeit reluctantly, if Parliament continued to dilly-dally.

Women's groups next targeted unequal penalties for adultery and rights to inherit. In Law Advocacy for Women in Uganda v Attorney-General, the Kampala-based nongovernmental organization targeted offensive provisions in the Penal Code and Succession Act.[1029] The Attorney General argued that striking out punishments for adultery "would encourage immorality and promiscuity" among Ugandan women. This "moral degeneration" argument, of course, was identical to those employed by Baganda chiefs to justify customary laws that limited women's newfound freedoms in the cities of the 1940- SOs. In oral arguments the government conceded the Penal Code sections in question were unconstitutional. The Court accepted this and struck out the offending provision. However, it refused to follow the government’s request to read in a similar adultery.

The most successful translation was the "sweat argument", which argued women have a right to co-[1025]One petitioner, Dr. Sylvia Tamale, was the first female Dean of the Facultyof Law at Makerere University.

[1026]Themostsuccessfultranslationwasthe"sweat argument”, which argued women have a right to co-own land with their husbands because of their labour at home andin the fields: AiliMari Tripp,"Women's Movements, Customary Law, and Land Rights in Africa-The Case of Uganda"(2004) 7Afr.StudiesQ.1at11-2.
[1027]2003,online:Kituo ChaKatiba<http://www.kituochakatiba.co.ug/dorebil.htm>[DomesticRelationsBill.
[1028] (2002), Const’l PetitionNo.2of2002(C.C.) [WomenLauyers].
1029, Const'l Petition Nos.13 of 2005&5of2006(C.C.).

- own land with their husbands because of their labour at home and in the fields: Aili Mari Tripp, "Women's Movements, Customary Law, and Land Rights in Africa-The Case of Uganda" (2004) 7 Afr. The Court replied that Article 137(3)[1030] only required a declaration of nullity and did "not seem to give this Court a mandate to modify a law which it has found to be inconsistent or in contravention with the provisions of the Constitution." The Court thus rejected the minority position of Justices Okello and Twinomujuni in Women Lawyers in this case since it was reluctant to read in a penal provision to "create a sentence that the courts can impose on adulterous spouses."

The Women Lawyers and Law Advocacy cases succeeded in pruning colonial-era laws of offensive provisions. In practice, however, these decisions had limited influence. By 2007 magistrates still did not receive copies of appellate court decisions.[1031] There was no case reporting system and magistrates only heard of cases like Law Advocacy when enterprising lawyers passed them dog-eared photocopies in person.[1032] Moreover, poor record-keeping by LC and magistrates' courts often led to a single plaintiff filing numerous claims for a strange wrong [1033] This perpuated the colonial era bifurcated system where magistrates looked to English precedent rather than Uganda's own appellate decisions. But if Justice Mpagi-Bahegeine was right that "no area of law impacts on women with greater force than the domestic law", then the actual impact of these two Constitutional Court decisions was even more disappointing since most women still lived in rural areas and were married under customary laws.[1034]

Museveni's innovative RC reforms, modelled after the Ruwenzururu experiments, introduced some measure of democratic local governance to people after decades of anarchic violence. The RC courts relieved the reformed magistrates' and appellate courts of overwhelming litigation.

The reforms could not break the tyranny of patriarchy though. And the Women Lawyers and Law Advocacy cases had little practical influence in villages separated by a reproduced bifurcation between customary/ rural/RC laws and civil/urban/ constitutional rights. Some women's groups have begun to break down this colonial cordon by translating common struggles against patriarchy across the rural-urban divide. While the judiciary has proven open to rights-based arguments to quash "It was not sufficient merely to plead the defence of res judicata, without evidence to

[1030] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[1031]Widner 2001, supra at 74.
[1032] Onoria, *supra*at352-3.
[1033]Azizv.Maroku(11April2001), Civil Appeal No.4of2002(S.C) [Odoki C.J.held,"Itwasnot sufficientmerelytoplead thedefenceof resjudicata, without evidence to substantiateit.The proceedings or judgments of the Local Council Courts should have been produced to establish the parties,and the subject matter of the dispute before them and the decisions of the Courts. The oral evidence adduced inCourt was insufficient to establish the plea."Of course, this ignores the underlying problem: LCs either kept poor record sornone at all! Chief JusticeOdoki'sstrict application of the resjudicata doctrine makes little sense given the realities of LCs in the last decade.].
[1034]Women Lawyers, supra

substantiate it. The proceedings or judgments of the Local Council Courts should have been produced to establish the parties, and the subject matter of the dispute before them and the decisions of the Courts. The oral evidence adduced in Court was insufficient to establish the plea." Of course, this ignores the underlying problem: LCs either kept poor records or none at all! Chief Justice Odoki's strict application of the res judicata doctrine makes little sense given the realities of LCs in the last decade.

Women Lawyers, supra note discriminating laws, it was reluctant to actively bridge the hazy frontier between local and magistrates' courts. Yet it is precisely this grey zone that stymies the bubbling-up of democracy of LC courts and the filtering down of a right to equality in the 1995 Constitution. The challenge for the judiciary is to question their ideological disinclination to creatively engage across the imaginary boundaries of state and customary laws.

EXECUTIVE SUPREMACY OVERTAKES PARLIAMENTARY SUPREMACY AS THE MANTRA OF THE JUDICIARY

We must guard against blind and selfish adherence to some precepts of law which we adopted from the colonialists and which we uncritically consider as sacrosanct.[1035]One September afternoon in 1972, Chief Justice Benedicto Kiwanuka disappeared. The last people to see him alive watched as policemen burst into his chambers, handcuffed him and dragged him into a waiting car. Before being shoved in its trunk, he was made to remove his shoes-a morbid attention to detail. Inside a restless courtroom was waited for him to return from a recess of the East African Court of Appeal. A week earlier Kiwanuka had frustrated Idi Amin's military regime by granting a writ of habeas corpus to a jailed opponent. He signed this simple decision and so signed his death warrant.

Kiwanuka's bloody removal was the nadir of state-sanctioned justice in Uganda. Ironically, President Obote and Chief Justice Udo Udoma set in motion their own falls in the fateful 1966 coup. Obote was himself deposed in a 1971 coup by his trusted ally Idi Amin, the officer who crushed Ganda resistance by razing the Kabaka's palace. Amin soon removed Sir Udoma as Chief Justice and sent him packing back to Nigeria.[1036] He continued to dismantle the civil courts and replaced them with numerous military tribunals offering speedy, informal and harsh justice. The judiciary then became little more than a subservient "moneymaking institution" for Amin's allies.[1037] Kiwanuka's death coincided with Amin's expulsion of so-called "Asian foreigners" from [1035]YoweriMuseveni,"President'sAddresstotheJudiciary"(1987), cited in Mamdani&Oloka-Onyango, supra at 493-4,97.

Mahmood Mamdani, Imperialism and FascisminUganda (I'renton,NJ.: Africa World Press,1984) at 44;
Jennifer A. Widner, Building the Rule of Law (NewYork: W.W. Norton&Company,2001) at116.
[1036]Mamdani &Oloka-Onyango, supra at 487.
[1037] Mamdani 1984, supra at 116.

Uganda, despite their longstanding residence as traders before even Speke first visited the country. In 1972, a High Court justice lamented that "[t]here appears to be a widespread but mistaken belief ... that the police, soldiers, and private persons are lawfully entitled to arrest [people] without warrant ... [and] may shoot them in cold blood".[1038] Amin reacted by simply ending judicial review of any government action with the Proceedings Against the Government (Protection) Decree.[1039] He succeeded and no constitutional cases were reported again until after Amin's regime fell in 1979. The judiciary learnt its lesson well. That year even Benjamin Odoki (former Chief Justice) bent under executive pressure in Mugisa v. Uganda.[1040] He rejected a habeas corpus application even though the government had failed to follow its own regulation that required the detention to be gazetted within 30 days. In Uganda, executive supremacy overtook Parliamentary supremacy as the mantra of the judiciary.

[1038]Bukenyav.Attorney-General (1972),(H.C.) [unreported],cited in Mamdani&Oloka-Onyango,supraat489.
[1039]No.8of197
[1040] (1979), H.C.B.271 (H.C).

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

MORE CONSTITUTIONAL MINDED THAN THE EXECUTIVE: WHEN THE COURTS RAISE UP TO THE OCCASION TO DEFEND THE PEOPLE AND ASSERT JUDICAL INDEPENDENCE (SALUS POPULI LEX ESTO)

One of the most important tasks of the courts is to see that the powers of the executive are properly used, that is, used honestly and reasonably for the purposes authorised by Parliament and not for any ulterior motive.

G O S P E L

The word gospel is derived from the Anglo-saxon term god-spell, meaning "good story "a rendering of the latin evangelism and the Greek euangelion, meaning "good news" or "good telling" This chapter considers some of the times dissenting Justices have stood up to the Executive in defending the people.

G O S P E L A C C O R D I N G T O K A K U R U : V E R B E R T I M

Uganda is a constitutional democratic Country, which evolved from a British Protectorate declared in 1894. On Tuesday 9th October 1962 the Country attained its independence from the British and became a sovereign state. Its independence Constitution became the supreme law of the land. That Constitution was amended in 1963 to create the office of a Constitutional President. In April 1966, the Constitution was suspended and later abolished. It was replaced with an interim Constitution in May of that year.

The interim Constitution paved way for the 1967 Republican Constitution on 8th September 1967. The 1967 Constitution, remained in force until 8th October 1995 when the current Constitution was enacted by a Constituent Assembly on behalf of the people of Uganda.

Principles of Constitutional interpretation

They are: -

1) The Constitution is the Supreme law of the land and forms the standard upon which all other laws are judged. Any law that is inconsistent with or in contravention of the Constitution is null and void to the extent of the inconsistency. See: -Article 2(2) of the Constitution. See: - also The Supreme Court decision in Presidential Election Petition

No. 2 of 2006 (Rtd) Dr. Col Kiiza Besigye Vs Y.K. Museveni, Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No.2 of 2006.

2) In determining the constitutionality of a legislation, its purpose and effect must be taken into consideration. Both purpose and effect are relevant in determining constitutionality, of either an unconstitutional purpose or an unconstitutional effect animated by the object the legislation intends to achieve. See: - Attorney General vs. Salvatori Abuki Constitution Appeal No. 1 of 1998. (SCU)

3) The entire Constitution has to be read together as an integral whole and no particular provision destroying the other but each sustaining the other. This is the rule of harmony, the rule of completeness and exhaustiveness. See: -P. K Ssemogerere and Another vs. Attorney General, Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 2002 and The Attorney General of Tanzania vs Rev. Christopher Mtikila [2010.]. EA 13.

4) A constitutional provision containing a fundamental human right is a permanent provision intended to cater for all times to come and therefore should be given a dynamic, progressive, liberal and flexible interpretation, keeping in view the ideals of the people, their socio economic and political cultural values so as to extend the benefit of the same to the maximum possible. See: - Okello John Livingstone and 6 others Vs the Attorney General and another, Constitutional Court Constitutional Petition No. 1 of 2005, Dr. Kiiza Besigye vs Attorney General: Constitutional Court Constitutional Petition No.1 of 2006 and South Dakota vs. South Carolina 192, U.S.A 268, 1940.

5) Where words or phrases are clear and unambiguous, they must be given their primary, plain, ordinary or natural meaning. The language used must be construed in its natural and ordinary sense.

6) Where the language of the statute sought to be interpreted is imprecise or ambiguous, a liberal, generous or purposeful interpretation should be given to it. See: The Attorney General Versus Major General David Tinyefuza, Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 1997.

7) The history of the Country and the legislative history of the Constitution is also relevant and a useful guide in constitutional interpretation. See: Okello Okello John Livingstone and 6 others Versus the Attorney General and Another, Constitutional Court Constitutional Petition No.4 of 2005.

8) The National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy in the Constitution are also a guide in the interpretation of the Constitution.

9) In searching for the purpose of the Act, it is legitimate to seek to identify the mischief sought to be remedied by the legislation. In part, that is why it is helpful, where appropriate, to pay due attention to the social and historical background of the legislation. We are obliged to understand the provisions within the context of the grid, if any, of the related provisions and of the Constitution as a whole, including the underlying values of the Constitution that must be promoted and protected. Although the text is often the starting point of any statutory construction, the meaning it bears must pay due regard to context. This is so even when the ordinary meaning of the provision to be construed is clear and unambiguous. See: - Apollo Mboya Vs Attorney General and others, High Court of Kenya, Constitutional and Human Rights Division Petition No. 472 of 2017.

10) In construing the impugned provisions, we are obliged not only to avoid an interpretation that clashes with the Constitutional values, purposes and principles but also to seek a meaning of the provisions that promotes constitutional purposes, values, principles, and which advances rule of law, human rights and fundamental freedoms in the Bill of Rights. We are obliged to pursue an interpretation that permits development of the law and contributes to good governance. See: - Apollo Mboya Vs Attorney General and others (Supra).

11) It is an elementary rule of constitutional construction that no one provision of the constitution is to be segregated from the others and to be considered alone. All constitutional provisions bearing upon a particular subject are to be brought into view and interpreted as to effectuate the greater purpose of the instrument. See: Smith Dakota Vs North Carolina, 192 US 268(1940).

12) The duty of a court in construing statutes is to seek an interpretation that promotes the objects of the principles and values of the Constitution and to avoid an interpretation that clashes therewith. If any statutory provision, read in its context, can reasonably be construed to have more than one meaning, the court must prefer the meaning that best promotes the spirit and purposes of the Constitution and the values stipulated in Article 8A (1).

See: - Apollo Mboya Vs Attorney General and others, High Court of Kenya, Constitutional and Human Rights Division Petition No. 472 of 2017.

Historical and Constitutional background:

Uganda has had a checkered constitutional history.

On 22nd March 1894, the British Government formally annexed Uganda, and declared it to be a Protectorate. By this declaration Uganda came within the ambit of the Africa Order-in-Council of 1889, which authorised the Local Consul to establish local jurisdiction under which the Consul was to exercise considerable executive, judicial and administrative powers[1041].

The geographical and political boundaries of Uganda were established by European powers at the Berlin Conference of 1884-5. On paper, the people who were placed under British colonial rule had consented to their subjugation through treaties, grants made by their Kings, Chiefs or Rulers. In areas where there was no centralized authority to sign such agreements with the British, their lands were simply incorporated into the protectorate by Orders–In-Council. The protectorate was administered by a Commissioner who had powers to make laws, Rules and Regulations. His legislative power was subject only to general or special instructions of the British Secretary of State. He could by ordinance, order that the laws of the United Kingdom, India or any other colony be applied to Uganda generally or subject to stated modifications. Some British statutes were made applicable to Uganda under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act of 1890.[1042]

Prof. Kanyeihamba, in his book Constitutional History of Uganda, described the period between 1902-1920 as dictatorial and despotic if not in practice, as least in law. In 1920 a new Order-in-Council was made establishing executive and legislative Councils. The members of those bodies were distinguished by His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom.

As late as 1945, no African was sitting on the legislative Council. The people were being ruled without their voices ever being heard. On 23rd October 1945, the British Government approved the appointment of three indigenous Africans to the legislative Council. They were to represent Buganda, Western and Eastern provinces. Kigezi and the North remained unrepresented because "they had not yet advanced to the stage of requiring the creation of centralized native executives." The first African Legislators entered the House on 4th December 1945. By 1950 the unofficial members of the legislative Council had become 16 constituted as follows; 8 Ugandans, 4 Asians, and 4 Europeans.[1043]

The first Ugandan Ministers were appointed in 1955. In 1956, the first African woman legislator entered the House, she was Mrs. Pulma Kisosonkole, a South African married to a Ugandan. In 1957 the Governor constituted a committee to consider and recommend a number of Constitutional reforms, aimed at preparing the Country for self rule and eventual independence. It was headed by

[1041] Kanyeihamba, Constitutional History of Uganda. Page 8
[1042] Ibid
[1043] Ibid

J.V Wild and his report bore his name. It was published in 1959, it recommended as follows: -

> That direct elections be held all over the Country in 1961. A common roll or register be introduced. The elected representatives be 76, 20(twenty) for Buganda, 20(twenty) for Eastern province, 17 (seventeen) for Western province and 4 (four) for Urban areas.

Buganda rejected direct elections to the legislature. The other Kingdoms too objected to direct elections. General elections were held in 1961 and UPC obtained the majority votes. However, Democratic Party (DP) won more seats in Parliament and formed Government because Buganda had opposed the elections.

In 1961, a conference was held in London, United Kingdom, to determine the constitutional dispensation that the independent Uganda would adopt. All delegations from different parts of Uganda were flown to London, the now famous or infamous Lancaster Conference. The delegates wanted a workable Constitution. Many issues remained unresolved notably, Bunyoro's demands for the return of its counties that had been annexed to Buganda by the British colonialists after their defeat of Kabalega the King of Bunyoro famously referred to in our political history as the "lost counties" the status of Buganda and other Kingdoms.

When finally, a comprise was reached, on March 1st 1962, the London agreement was signed, bringing into force a new Constitution. Still many issues remained unresolved, necessitating another conference in London in June 1962 to review and resolve the remaining obstacles, and amend the Constitution and confirm the date of independence.

In August 1962, the British Parliament passed an Act called, the Uganda Independence Act, which provided inter alia as follows: -

> "As from October 9, the territories comprised in the Uganda Protectorate will together form part of Her Majesty's dominions with the, name of Uganda and henceforth Her Majesty's Government will have no responsibility for the government of Uganda, and no Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after that date shall extend to Uganda. The Colonial Laws Validity Act of 1865 will no longer apply to any law made by the Uganda Legislature and no such law can be rendered void on account of repugnance to the law of England." (Sic)

This was the much hyped 1962 Constitution, made almost entirely without the input of the citizens of Uganda. It was made by their Rulers whose interests were considered paramount by the British. It appears to me to have been a pay-off to the Rulers for their corroboration with the British imperialists. No meaningful consultations had been made, at least not with the people. Many constitutional issues remained unresolved. Some of the constitutional issues were embedded in the Constitution itself. These included the status of Buganda, the indirect elections in Buganda, the lost counties of Bunyoro, the legal status of Busoga and its rulers and the land question. Uganda, under the 1962 Constitution, was neither a Republic nor a Monarchy. It was neither a federation of states nor a unitary one. There were a number of other petty but intricate constitutional questions that were embedded in the Constitution, as whether a Muganda commoner Benedicto Kiwanuka, could head the central Government and constitutionally occupy an office higher than that of the Kabaka, the Ruler of Buganda. Later the question arose as to whether the Kabaka or the King of Buganda could assent to a law ceding part of his Kingdom's territory to another kingdom within Uganda, such a law having been passed by the Parliament of Uganda. There was even an issue as to whose photograph was the official portrait of the Head of State and Government, the Kabaka's or that of the Prime Minister, Milton Obote.

There were also issues of revenue collection and sharing between the central government, Buganda and other territories. There were two High Courts. The High Court of Buganda and the High Court of Uganda, both presided over by the same Judges. Each federal state had a cabinet, legislature and judiciary. In this regard Prof. Kanyeihamba has observed: -

> "The Independence Constitution emphasized division rather than unity. It placed regional interests above national interests and exalted regional leaders at the expense of national leaders….."[1044]

The Constitution was designed to cater for a historical Uganda where traditions and economic power which had been placed was in the hands of a few by the British Colonialist were guaranteed. The Constitution can claim to have had legality in the sense that those who intended to protect it were in effective control of the nation's affairs. However, it lacked political legitimacy for it was not an expression of the will of the majority nor did it claim to have the consent of the masses even though it can be claimed that the framers were acting through the elected representatives. Lacking political legitimacy, the Constitution could not withstand the test of political pressure for if it were threatened with abrogation the masses would be reluctant to defend it.[1045]

Although Section 1 of the 1962 Constitution declared it to be the Supreme law of Uganda this Section was subject to Sections 5 and 6. Section 5 dealt with amendment of the Constitution. Under Section 5, Parliament could alter the Constitution except the provisions set under schedule 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. These schedules were: - (1) The Constitution of Buganda, (2) special provisions relating to the Kingdom of Ankole, (3) special provisions relating to Bunyoro, (4) special provisions relating to Toro, (5) special provisions relating to the territory of Busoga. This Constitution was in fact an

[1044] Ibid
[1045] Ibid

Act of Parliament having been enacted as such in Britain and adopted as a law in Uganda upon independence. It contained a Bill of Rights. The Constitution was a delicate balancing act between the Central Government on one hand, the Buganda Kingdom government and the rest of Uganda on the other.

Then again, there was a balancing act between the central government and the semi federal states and territory.

In this regard Sections 73, 74(1), 75(1), 123 and 124 of the Constitution provided as follows: -

> 73.Parliament shall have power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Uganda (other than the Federal States) with respect to any matter.
>
> 74.(1) The Legislature of the Kingdom of Buganda shall have power, to the exclusion of Parliament, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of the Kingdom of Buganda with respect to the matters specified in Part I of Schedule 7 to this Constitution.
>
> 75. (1) The Legislature of a Federal State (other than the Kingdom of Buganda) shall have power, to the exclusion of Parliament, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of the State with respect to the matters specified in Schedule 8 to this Constitution.
>
> 123. The Ruler of a Federal State and the constitutional head of a District shall take precedence over all persons in the State or District other than the President:
>
> Provided that in the case of a traditional ceremony relating only to a particular Federal State or District the Ruler of the State or the constitutional head of the District, as the case may be, shall take precedence over all persons in the State or District.

By looking at the above Sections of the Constitution, it is apparent that there were in it a number of inherent contradictions that would inevitably lead the country to a crisis. The crisis did emerge when in 1964 a referendum was held in the "lost counties" of Buyaga and Bugangaizi. These counties had been transferred from Bunyoro Kingdom to Buganda Kingdom by the British upon the military defeat of the former. In that referendum of the 1964 the population in those counties voted to leave Buganda and return to Bunyoro. An Act of Parliament was passed to that effect. The President who was also the Kabaka (King) of Buganda refused to assent to it, on the ground that he would not transfer part of his Kingdom to another.

The Prime Minister signed the bill into law. Under Section 20 of the Buganda Constitution, which could not be amended by the National Assembly, the Lukiiko (Buganda Parliament) consisted of elected representatives, Kabaka's Ministers and his personal nominees. This Lukiiko indirectly elected the Buganda's representatives to the National Assembly.

With this background a motion of no confidence in the Prime Minister was tabled in the National Assembly by one of the prominent Buganda representatives nominated by the Lukiiko Daudi Ochieng. It was supported by some members of the ruling party and government. It alleged corruption against Prime Minister Obote and Idi Amin the Army Commander. A commission of inquiry was set up to investigate the matter, headed by a High Court Judge from Tanzania.

Amidst accusations of and allegations of treason, on 22nd February 1966 upon the orders of the Prime Minister, five Cabinet Ministers were arrested at a cabinet meeting, together with others, they were detained and deported. Two days later the Prime Minister 'suspended' the Constitution, abolished the post of President, and Vice President and assumed the Power of government. Without doubt this was unconstitutional. Uganda remained without a Constitution, until 15th April 1966, when an interim Constitution was passed by Parliament. There was no consultation, no debate. The Members of Parliament were reportedly asked to enact the Constitution and afterwards pick their copies from their pigeon holes. This is the so called "Pigeon hole" Constitution. It is stated that Parliament was surrounded by the Army during this process.

The 1962 Constitution therefore was abrogated by means other than those set out in the Constitution. The federal nature of the 1962 Constitution, where it applied, was replaced with a unity government. The executive powers of government were vested in the President who now assumed the powers previously held by both the President and Prime Minister. The National Assembly was granted more powers than it enjoyed under the 1962 Constitution. Most importantly for the purpose of this Judgment, the rest of the provisions in the Constitution remained the same.

As expected, Buganda protested accusing the central government of having breached a social contract between the two. The entrenched provisions of the 1962 Constitution had been ignored.

Although no shots were fired on that day, the acts of the Prime Minister and Parliament amounted to a coup d'etat against the established Constitutional Order. The events that surrounded the abolishment of the 1962 Constitution were set out in detail in the Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Uganda vs Commissioner of Prisons Exparte Matovu 1966 EA [P.54]. The Judgment was delivered by Sir Udo Udoma CJ. The other Judges on the Coram were Sheridan and Jeffrey Jones JJ, on February 22, 1967.

I am constrained to reproduce it in extenso. The relevant parts read as follows: -

> "On February 22, 1966, the then Prime Minister of Uganda issued a statement headed "Statement to the Nation by the Prime Minister", annexure A, declaring that in the interests of national stability and public security and tranquility he had taken over all powers of the Government of Uganda. The statement is of great importance and we therefore reproduce it hereunder. It reads:

"In the interest of national stability and public security and tranquility, I have today – February 22, 1966 –taken over all powers of the Government of Uganda.

I shall henceforth be advised by a council whose members I shall name later. I have taken this course of action independently because of the wishes of the people of this country for peace, order and prosperity.

Five former ministers have today been put under detention pending investigations into their activities.

I call upon the judges and magistrates, civil servants – both Uganda and expatriate – members of the security forces and the general public to carry on with their normal duties.

I take this opportunity to assure everybody that the whole situation is under control."

On February 24, 1966 there followed another statement made to the nation by the then Prime Minister, annexure B, in which, among other things, the Prime Minister disclosed that he had been forced to take "certain drastic measures" because of events and "unwelcome activities of certain leading personalities", who had plotted to overthrow the Government; that during his tour of the Northern Region of Uganda early in the month an attempt was made to overthrow the Government by the use of foreign troops; and that certain members of the Government had requested foreign missions for military assistance consisting of foreign troops and arms for the purpose of invading the country and overthrowing the Government of Uganda.

The Prime Minister then declared:

"The Constitution (of Uganda) shall be suspended temporarily with effect from 7 o'clock tonight.

In order however to provide for effective administration for the smooth running of the Government machine and also for the promotion of unity the following subjects contained in the Constitution [said the Prime Minister] shall be preserved:

(a) The Courts, Judges and Magistrates;

(b) The Civil Service;

(c) The Army, Police and Prison Services;

(d) The Rulers of Federal States and Constitutional Heads of Districts;

(e) The District Administration and Urban Authorities;

(f) The Schedules to the Constitution of Uganda; and

(g) The National Assembly."

There was to be established a council composed of ministers including the Attorney-General and certain members of the armed forces and the police. The ministerial portfolios were to function as before and certain vacancies caused by the absence of the ministers under detention were to be filled. The statement ended with an appeal to the people to remain calm and to co-operate with the security forces in the maintenance of law and order.

On February 25, 1966, the statement and declaration contained in annexure B were repeated and more elaborately spelt out in annexure C, which established a security council of which the Prime Minister was chairman. In annexure C however, which was signed by all the ministers then supporting the Prime Minister, item (f) in annexure B was omitted.

On March 2, 1966, annexure D was published. In it the Prime Minister declared that acting with the advice and consent of the cabinet:

"(a) The executive authority of Uganda shall vest in the Prime Minister and shall be exercised by the Prime Minister acting in accordance with the advice and consent of the cabinet; and

(b) The duties, powers and other functions that are performed or are exercisable by the President or Vice-President immediately before February 22, 1966, shall vest in the Prime Minister by and with the advice and consent of the cabinet."

Thus by that declaration both the President and Vice-President of Uganda were not only deprived of their offices, but divested of their authorities. Immediately thereafter the President of Uganda was forcibly ejected from state house, which is the official residence of the President of Uganda.

For the proper appreciation of the state of affairs and the changes purported to have been made by the above mentioned statements and the declaration, we pause here to note that the Constitution referred to in the statement of February 24, 1966, was the Constitution of Uganda promulgated by the authority of the Uganda (Independence) Order-in-Council 1962, which came into force on October 9, 1962, and subsequent amendments thereto. Throughout this judgment therefore that Constitution will hereinafter be referred to as the 1962 Constitution.

In the 1962 Constitution, the offices of President and Vice-President of Uganda were created by arts 34 and 35, the President being therein described as the Supreme Head and Commander in Chief of Uganda. The provision of art 37 was that the Parliament of Uganda should consist of the President and the National Assembly, while arts. 61, 62, 64 and 65 vested the President with the executive authority of Uganda with power to appoint a Prime Minister; and thereafter, acting in accordance with the advice of the Prime Minister, to appoint other Ministers, including the Attorney General; and to assign to such Ministers responsibilities for the business of Government, including the management of Departments.

In art 36 it was provided that the President and the Vice-President might at any time be removed from office by a resolution of the National Assembly, moved either:

> "(a) by the Prime Minister; or
>
> (b) by a member of the Assembly other than the Prime Minister who satisfies the Speaker that not less than one half of all the members of the Assembly have signified in writing the intention to vote in support of the resolution, and which is supported by the votes of not less than two-thirds of all the members of the Assembly."

In other words, by this Article, the President and Vice-President could not be removed from their office except by a resolution passed by the votes of not less than two-thirds of all the members of the National Assembly.

To return to the chronology of events. On March 5, 1966, the Prime Minister issued another statement, annexure E. The statement was in reply to a press report purported to have been published by Sir Edward Mutesa who, until February 22, 1966, when the Prime Minister seized all the power of Government, was the President and Supreme Head and Commander in Chief of Uganda. In his statement, the Prime Minister pointed out that in the press statement made by Sir Edward Mutesa the latter had openly admitted that unknown to him as Prime Minister or any of his Cabinet Ministers, he, Sir Edward, had made request for military assistance from foreign countries as a precautionary measure, because there were then rumours current in the country that troops were being trained somewhere in the country for the purpose of overthrowing the Constitution.

Then on April 15, 1966, at an emergency meeting of the National Assembly, the following resolution, annexure F at p. 20, which was proposed by the Prime Minister was passed:

"Whereas in the interest of national stability, public security and tranquility, the Prime Minister, on February 22, 1966, suspended the then Constitution of Uganda and took over all the powers of the Government as a temporary measure.

And whereas the Government, on February 24, 1966, approved the action taken by the Prime Minister in order to ensure a speedy return to the normality which existed before the occurrence of the events which led to the suspension of the Constitution, and Whereas it is desirable, in order to return to the state of normality that a Constitution should be adopted.

Now, therefore, we the people of Uganda hereby assembled in the name of Uganda do resolve and it is hereby resolved that the Constitution which came into being on October 9, 1962, be abolished, and it is hereby abolished accordingly, and the Constitution now laid before us be adopted this day of April 15, 1966, as the Constitution of Uganda until such time as the Constituent Assembly established by Parliament enacts a Constitution in place of this Constitution."

On the adoption of the Constitution of April 15, 1966 (hereinafter to be referred to as the 1966 Constitution) oaths under the new Constitution were administered to the Prime Minister, who thereupon by virtue of provisions of art 36 (6) of the new Constitution became automatically by operation of law elected President and the Head of State and Commander in Chief of the Sovereign State of Uganda.

Thereafter oaths were administered to members of the National Assembly, both Government supporters and Opposition and other Officials of State. Members of the National Assembly were only able to take their seats in the State Assembly after the taking of the oath under the new Constitution.

On May 22, 1966, the applicant was arrested and detained at Masindi Prison under the Deportation Act (Cap. 308). He was subsequently transferred to Luzira Prison within the Kingdom of Buganda.

On May 23, 1966, by proclamation, Legal Notice No. 4 of 1966, a state of public emergency was declared to exist in Buganda Kingdom; and on May 25, 1966 by a resolution of the National Assembly the proclamation was affirmed and Emergency Powers Act (Cap. 307), and regulations made thereunder including the Emergency Powers (Detention) Regulations 1966, Statutory Instrument No. 65 of 1966were brought into force and in full operation.

On July 16, 1966, the applicant was released and ordered to go. Soon thereafter at about 12.45 p.m. as the applicant stepped out of prison, he was rearrested and detained again in Luzira Prison.

In respect of the validity of the 1966 Constitution the Court concluded as follows at page 539 of the Judgment: -

B. Applying the Kelsenian principles, which incidentally form the basis of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Pakistan in the above case, our deliberate and considered view is that the 1966 Constitution is a legally valid constitution and the supreme law of Uganda; and that the 1962 Constitution having been abolished as a result of a victorious revolution in law does no longer exist nor does it now form part of the Laws of Uganda, it having been deprived of its de facto and de jure validity. The 1966 Constitution, we hold, is a new legal order and has been effective since April 14, 1966, when it first came into force.

F. After a perusal of these affidavits, the contents of which have not been in any way challenged or contradicted, we are satisfied and find as a fact that the new Constitution has been accepted by the people of Uganda and that it has been firmly established throughout the country, the changes introduced therein having been implemented without opposition, as there is not before us any evidence to the contrary."

It is evident from the above cited constitutional case that the Judiciary, the Parliament, the Army, the Police and public servants accepted the new constitutional order as did the most of the people of Uganda. However, the picture was different in Buganda.

The events that followed enactment of the 1966 interim Constitution are narrated by Prof. Kanyeihamba as follows: -

"The new Constitution had required members of the National Assembly to swear allegiance to it, and to the new Uganda. Leadership of the Buganda and members of the Assembly refused to do so. Without consulting their minister, the Buganda leadership summoned a meeting of the Lukiiko to take stock, as it were.

. . . this was an utter rejection of the new Constitution by the Buganda Lukiiko, and a direct challenge to the central authorities, and so the latter regarded it. When Obote heard about the resolution, he is reported to have said: "This is an act of rebellion. Government will study it and deal with all those involved.

In the meantime, having passed the resolution, the committed Buganda county chiefs hurried back to their areas to prepare for battle, and the Central Government began to receive alarming reports that Buganda was planning to secede from the rest of the country, and that weapons and ammunition were being stock-piled in, the Kabaka's palace at Mengo. It was also rumoured that ex- soldiers and other able bodied persons had been summoned to go to the palace to await the Kabaka orders . . .

. . .Three of the more defiant County chiefs were arrested and detained. The beating of war drums in many parts of Buganda followed these arrests. Many unruly elements in the kingdom decided to take the law into their own hands. Roads were blocked or damaged; law and order broke down in many parts of Buganda. As if chaos had been let loose, government property was indiscriminately and wantonly destroyed. Lawlessness was the order of the day. The Government could no longer tolerate this state of affairs. Rebellion had to be quelled. To that end, the Cabinet met and decided to send a small detachment to investigate the existence or otherwise of arms and ammunition at the palace. Unfortunately, however, when the unit arrived at the palace gate, the palace guards opened fire and the former were virtually wiped out in the exchange that followed. Inevitably, the Uganda Army found it necessary to dispatch reinforcements, and after a lengthy spasmodic exchange of fire, the palace was surrounded but miraculously, the Kabaka escaped undetected by jumping over the wall of the palace and, eventually, found his way to the United Kingdom, where he settled and later died a poor and broken man."[1046]

With the capitulation of the Kabaka, the coup d'etat that had overthrown the Constitution of 1962 was now complete both de jure and de facto.

The 1966 Constitution provided under Article 145 that it would continue in force until a constituent assembly was established by the National Assembly for the enactment of a new Constitution.

The general political environment in which the constitutional proposals were to be debated was nothing but conducive in Buganda which was under a state of emergency. The Buganda region did not only contain a large percentage of the national population, but was also the location of the national capital, the seat of the Parliament, the only University, the only Radio and T.V stations were also located there. All major Newspapers, Magazines and Journals were printed and published there. As to whether or not the people of Buganda and the residents of the capital and other towns in the region were able to effectively debate the proposed Constitution remains a question. However, there is no doubt that the political atmosphere in Buganda and in the Country at large had a chilling effect on the population, on the debate in the National Assembly.

Nelson Kafir an academician and accomplished researcher compiled from different sources including newspapers, journals and the Hansard, what transpired in Parliament during the debate preceding the enactment of the 1967 Constitution. I have taken the liberty to repeat some of the excerpts here below: -

"The Transition 33

The Government issued its Constitutional proposals on the 9th of June, 1967 and Parliamentary Debate began on the 22nd of June. The debate was adjourned on the 27th of July. On the 4th of August the Government announced that it would submit new amendments to its own Constitutional proposals when Parliament reconvened. These amendments were published on the 29th of August. Parliament reconvened on the 6th of September to consider the sections of the proposed Constitution one by one. Only the Government proposals, as modified by its own amendments, were accepted and the Constitution was adopted on the 8th of September, 1967."

[1046] Ibid

From the floor of Parliament as reported in the Hansard: -

> Apparently Uganda was making good progress and he had not heard any Minister say he was being held up because he was being hampered by the Constitution. If that was the case, why was it necessary to have a new Constitution? We should not change our Constitutions in the way some men change their shirts. The Constitution should be a document of great sanctity. We should respect it and we should abide by it. ABU MAYANJA (UPC, Kyagwe N.E.) Uganda Argus 6th July.
>
> A Constitution which would suit Uganda should be a flexible one, which would be easy to amend. ABBAS BALINDA (UPC Ankole S.E.) U.A. 13th July.
>
> The President had spoken about a revolution in the country that was still going on. Were they going to have a new Constitution every time there was a revolution?
>
> H. M. LUANDE (Ind. Kampala E) U.E 29th July
>
> Muslims believe that on the day of Judgment an angel would read out an indictment – but that at least the person concerned has a chance to defend himself. Even God did not assume such powers as were envisaged under this Constitution……
>
> We are not here to govern this country like savages. We are not going to reject the standards which have been accepted by the rest of the civilised world. We are part and parcel of the civilised community. We are not going to justify autocracy and the granting of dangerous powers on the grounds that Uganda is backward and cannot have a civilised government. ABU MAYANJA (UPC, Kyagwe N.E)
>
> The system of presidential elections could bring into that important office a person who is not a true representative of the people. As that same person is empowered to nominate up to 27 Members of Parliament, that meant that key Ministries could also go to some of those nominated persons who were not true representatives of the people. The country could then end up by being ruled by those people who were not representatives of the people. A. LATIM (Leader of Opposition) 27th June.
>
> It was not democracy for the President to nominate 30 members of the House. It would be better for him to nominate all the Members of Parliament so that the country would clearly know that it was a dictatorship. If a man was nominated, he was bound to be a 'yes man." This was a clear step back to the dark days. H.M. LUANDE (Ind. Kampala E.) 29th June.

As far as the people nominated by the President were concerned, some people had said they would not be stooges, but what else could they be? They would be the remnants of the politicians who had failed at the polls. If the purpose of bringing these 27 people was to bring stability to the country, then it was better to find some other way. There were only a limited number of people available who could maintain the dignity of the House. A.A. NEKYON (UPC, Lango S.E.) 30th June.

If someone fails at the vote, let him not poke his nose in this noble House, Mr. Obwangor said amid cheers from both sides of the House. C. OBWANGOR (Min. of Planning and Econ. Dev.) 8th July.

One of the most serious indictments against the colonialists was the deprivation of some of the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual. But still there were some rights which the colonialists guaranteed, and added that it was disappointing that even those rights and freedoms which were enjoyed during colonial times were going to be taken away by the present proposals. ABU MAYANJA (UPC, Kyagwe N.E.) 6th July.

What a shame that Members of Parliament should be asked by our President to give him powers to detain us and after he had done so to give him powers not to be taken to a court of law. J. W. KIWANUKA (UPC, Mubende N.) 14th July

In the Kingdoms there had been a ready-made system for providing for peace, order and good government-the three things African governments found it most difficult to obtain. The chiefs were accepted by the people as the representatives of the king. What was needed was not to reject kings, but to rechannel the loyalty to them to wider issues of nation building.

That is how we were elected.

E.M. K. MULIRA (UPC, Mengo N.) 30th June.

I am not in the House as a representative of the people. I was elected by the President on April 15 last year, as had every other member of the House. Since May 6 this year the mandate of every elected member of the House had expired. G.O. B. ODA (DP, W. Nile & Madi W.) 28th June.

Winding up, Mr. Mayanja underlined the fact that democratic government, of which he was unashamedly a supporter, could not be created by writing a Constitution. Ultimately, democracy did not reside in the Constitution, but in the hearts and minds of the people. ABU MAYANJA (UPC, Kyagwe N.E.) 8th July.

Democracy did not work anywhere. Some people confused democracy with general elections. He said that if Uganda decided not to have a general election for a generation it was up to it. He referred to the political situation in many European countries, where there had been no elections or real elections for years. VINCENT RWAMWARO (Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs) 15th July.

Mr. Obonyo said certain individuals could be called bad, but this did not mean that the institution of kingship as such was bad. When the DP wanted to revise anything regarding institutions, they would go back to the people who were wiser than they were and ask their views. J.H. OBONYO (DP, Acholi S.E.) 20th July.

The Democratic Party proposed that before the start of the proposed new Constitution there should be a general election because the term of office of the present Parliament has expired and to prolong the life of the present Parliament is tantamount to taking away the powers of the electors. PAUL SSEMOGERERE (Publicity Secretary D.P.) 4th September.

We on this side of the House are few, but in spite of that we shall do our best and we shall speak without fear.... They had said that the Buganda Emergency should be lifted. They had said that the representatives of the people should be free to talk to the masses of the people they represented. But all this had not been given to them. People were in fear. The people could not express their views freely. A Member of Parliament had been quoted as saying he feared giving an opinion about the new proposals. If he could say that, how many more people outside could say it? This house is fearing to tell the truth. If a Member of Parliament is frightened to comment, how many people in the country are afraid to express their views? A.A. LATIM (Opposition Leader) 24th June.

The mere fact that the Government had brought the Constitutional proposals in this way indicated that the Government also believed that some of the proposals could be rejected and the House should have freedom to say what it wanted about each and every one. Party considerations were one reason why the proposals were difficult to debate. The members should be speaking as representatives of their constituents. If this were the case, they could see what was the right thing to include and what would please some people. If the proposals were being debated on a party basis, then there was only need for two members to speak: one from each party. There could not be 82 members speaking on party matters... I think we should speak as if there were no government now, no parliament now, no president now, and no judiciary now, because the Constitution is meant not only for today's government but for tomorrow's government and the government after that. Another reason why the proposals were difficult to debate was that it appeared that certain members of the House were now under the impression that they were in real danger of being attacked by the security forces at any time because of their views. The sense of fear should be removed if the Constitution was going to be a good guide to the country for the future. A.A. NEKYON (UPC, Lango S.E.) 30th June.

Mr. Okelo said the opposition had not been afraid to speak their minds and would never be afraid to speak, even in the face of threats. They would sooner die. [He said] We will defend this principle against all comers. The ship of freedom is being torpedoed, and Ugandans are waiting to see what we, their elected representatives, are going to do to save the ship. M.A. OKELO (D.P., West Nile & Madi)

He read in full a letter to members of the Government side signed by the Chief Whip. This stated that members absenting themselves from the House without permission would be causing subversion, and no member should oppose or vote against the proposals. The letter stated that as far as he (the Chief Whip) was concerned, opposition had been dealt with at a Parliamentary group meeting, and members who opposed the proposals would be liable to be dealt with severely. We can now see what sort of Parliament we have got. M.A. OKELO (D.P., West Nile and Madi) 1st July.

Dr. Sembeguya criticised Government MP's whose "insulting and threatening" interjections during the past week's debates in the Constituent Assembly suggested that, already having prior knowledge of the proposals, they were intent on seeing that they were bulldozed through the Assembly. DR. F. G. SEMBEGUYA (UPC, Specially Elected) Daily Nation 4th July.

The debate went on and on. What is strikingly important for the purpose Judgment is the similarity in issues and undertones in this 1967 debate and the debate that followed the enactment of the impugned Act in 2017, fifty years later.

The 1967 Constitution was debated and enacted by Parliament which had constituted itself into a Constituent Assembly. The same Parliament extended its term for another five years under the new Constitution. The President was deemed to have been elected under the new Constitution as there were no general elections that year. The term of Parliament of five years had lapsed. The Members of Parliament who had constituted themselves into a Constituent Assembly in 1967 had been elected for a period of 5 years in 1962. Fresh elections were due to have been held in May of 1967. Instead Parliament extended its own term and that of the presidency for another five years.

I have found no reason to dwell on what happened between 1967 and 1971. Suffice it to say, the government remained in power and was accepted by the population especially outside Buganda, however, it lacked popular legitimacy. Both the President and the Parliament had not been elected.

The Constitution, the Supreme Law of the land, had been enacted without the participation of the population. The state of emergency remained in force in Buganda causing wide spread hardship. The government became more and more intolerant of criticism and relied more and more on the Army and the Police to keep down any political dissent or even discussion. There was no space for political opposition, compelling a number of opposition Members of Parliament to cross the floor to the ruling Uganda People's Congress (UPC) party. They followed the leader of the opposition, Mr. Basil Bataringaya, who had crossed earlier and was rewarded with a ministerial post, that of internal affairs.

David Martin in his book General Amin (Faber and Faber Ltd London 1974) Summaries the events that followed the enactment of the 1967 Constitution as follows at page 119:-

> "It was a month after the Kabaka's death, as he was leaving a UPC conference, which had adopted a resolution demanding Uganda should become a one-party state, that Obote was shot. His assailant and the rest of the would-be assassins were all Baganda. Uganda's British Chief Justice five months later sentenced six people to life imprisonment including a defrocked clergyman, the Revd. Erisa Sebalu, while five others received terms of fourteen years for conspiracy. Sebalu said that a plot had begun in June 1969. After the assassination attempt, road blocks were set up in Buganda and the army behaved harshly towards civilians. The government said seven people were killed but it seems probable the figure was higher. Twenty-six people-twenty-one of them Baganda-were arrested including Members of Parliament and a former Vice-President, Sir Wilberforce Nadiope. Opposition parties were banned and Uganda became a de facto one-party state."(Sic)

Not unsurprisingly no elections were held in 1971, as on 25th of January of that year, the Uganda Army overthrew Obote's government and installed Major General Idi Amin as the Military Head of State. The Army gave 18 reasons for the coup d'etat as follows:-

> 1. The unwarranted detention of people without trial;
>
> 2. Prolonged state of emergency, which had been declared in October 1969;
>
> 3. Lack of freedom to air political views;
>
> 4. The frequent loss of life and property through armed robberies;
>
> 5. The proposals for National Service;
>
> 6. Widespread corruption in high places, especially ministers and civil servants;
>
> 7. The failure of political authorities to organise any elections and the proposed three-plus-one electoral method which would only favour the rich;
>
> 8. Economic policies that had caused poverty and unemployment;

9. High taxes;

10. Low prices for crops as opposed to high cost of food and education;

11. Isolating Uganda from East Africa by expulsion of Kenyans and rejecting of Kenya and Tanzania currencies;

12. The creation of a wealthy class of leaders;

13. Failure of the Defence Council to meet under its chairman, the President;

14. Training of a private army with recruits from Akokoro county Obote's home area;

15. The Lango Development Master Plan which was designed to give all key positions in politics; army and commercial/industrial sectors to people of Akokoro in Lango;

16. Dividing the army and giving the Langi top positions;

17. Using the cabinet and officers to divide the army through bribery;

18. All above mentioned were leading to bloodshed.

See:-David Mukholi "A Complete Guide to Uganda's Fourth Constitution, History, Politics and law (Fountain Publisher, 1995).

Following the 25th January 1971 coup d'etat, the Army issued Legal Notice No. 1 of 1971. It stated:

Legal Notice No. 1 of 1971

WHEREAS on the 25th day of January, 1971 the Armed Forces of Uganda, for the reasons given in the statement by them to the Nation on that day, took over the powers of the Government of the Republic of Uganda and vested those powers in me MAJOR-GENERAL IDI AMIN DADA.

Now PURSUANT to such powers I HEREBY PROCLAIM

1. Chapters IV and V of the Constitution are suspended and all appointments and offices excepting public offices held immediately before the 25th day of January, 1971, pursuant to the powers contained in those chapters are hereby terminated with effect from that date.
2. All the titles, privileges, prerogatives, powers, functions and exemptions formerly enjoyed or exercised by the former President of the Republic of Uganda under the Constitution are hereby vested in me with effect from the 25th day of January, 1971, and accordingly the Military Head of State shall be the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces.
3. Parliament is hereby dissolved and all legislative powers referred to in the Constitution are hereby vested in me.

4. All legislative powers shall be exercised by me through the promulgation of decrees evidenced in writing under my hand and sealed with the Public Seal.
5. There shall be a Council of Ministers which shall be appointed by me and which shall advise me in the exercise of my executive and legislative powers.
6. Subject to this Proclamation, all liabilities and obligations incurred by the Government of the Republic of Uganda before the 25th day of January, 1971, shall continue in full force and effect.
7. No action or other legal proceedings whatsoever, whether civil or criminal, shall be instituted in any court for or on account of or in respect of any act, matter or thing done during the continuation of operations consequent upon or incidental to the said take-over of the powers of the Government if done in good faith and done or purported to be done in the execution of his duty or for the defence of Uganda or the public safety or for the enforcement of discipline or law and order or otherwise in the public interest by any other person holding office under or employed by a person holding office under or employed in the public service of Uganda or a member of the Armed Forces of Uganda or by any other person acting under the authority of a person so holding office or so employed.
8. (1) Those provisions of the Constitution, including Articles 1, 3 and 63 thereof, which are inconsistent with this Proclamation shall, to the extent of such inconsistency be void.

   (2) Subject to this Proclamation, the operation of the Constitution and the existing laws shall not be affected by this Proclamation but shall be construed with such modifications, qualifications and adaptations as are necessary to bring them into conformity with this Proclamation.

Made under my hand and the public seal, this 2nd day of February, 1971

MAJOR-GENERAL IDI AMIN DADA

Military Head of State, head of government and commander –in chief of the armed forces.

Date of publication: 2nd February, 1971

From the time this proclamation was made until 11th April 1979 when Legal Notice No.1 of 1979 was issued by the forces that toppled Idi Amin's regime, the 1967 Constitution remained in force subject to Legal Notice No.1 of 1971.

During this whole period of more than 8 (eight) years there were no elections, and therefore, no Parliament. Political party activities were banned. Amin declared himself life President, although he had at the time of the coup promised to stay in power for only five years and hand over government to elected leaders.

What happened to Uganda and its citizens during the 8 years of Idi Amin reign of terror cannot be summarised here. If all were to be written, there would be no space left in any library in this country, to house the literature.

Prof. Kanyeihamba describes Amin's regime in the following words;-

" . . . murdered or ordered the murders of such important people as the Chief Justice of Uganda, the Archbishop of the Church of Uganda, Ministers, public officers including the Vice Chancellor of Makerere University and others, in their thousands. . .

. . . thousands of Ugandans innocent suspected of treason and other offences were arrested and butchered everywhere. Official murders and assassinations became, under Amin, the normal way of, settling disputes, actual or imagined, between government and its citizens. It was again with great sadness and mortal fear that Ugandans recalled Amin's ominous words that he would not take prisoners.

. . .government that had violated the rights of citizens, mismanaged the economy and performed abysmally in running the affairs of the nation.[1047]

Prof. A.B.K. Kasozi in his book The Social Origins of Violence in Uganda under a section of the book headed Government by Terror: In regard to Idi Amin's reign of terror he observes as follows:-

> "The Military police stated under Obote, was expanded. Makindye, its headquarters became notorious as a slaughterhouse in Amin's time. As the economy worsened, another paramilitary unit, the Anti Smuggling Bureau, was created under Bob Astles. It accused successful businessmen of smuggling and hording . . . Thousands of people in Uganda were tortured by Government agents. Detainees might be made to go through humiliating muscular ordeals such as hopping like a frog, while being beaten. The victim's eyes might be gauged out and left hanging out of their sockets. (Sic)
>
> During the wheel- torture, the victim's head was put in a wheel- rim that was repeatedly struck with iron bars. People were beaten with hammers, mallets, or iron bars to break their limbs as well as to kill them. Wires were attached to victim's genitals, nipples, or other sensitive parts of the body and then connected to an electric battery or wall socket. Women were raped or otherwise sexually abused. Prisoners were slashed with knives and bayonets, body organs were mutilated and Limbs cut off. Prisoners might be lined up and every second one would be ordered to hammer the first to death, the second would hammer the third, and so on, until only one was left to tell the tale to other prisoners. Such incidents often happened at Makindye prison. These were by no means the only forms of torture, there were many others ... Important or prominent people were killed like other prisoners. However, their bodies were dismembered and their parts used for ritual purposes ... few victims were given a proper burial. Their bodies were thrown into rivers such as the Nile at Karuma, Jinja and other places in Uganda's many lakes, Victoria, George, Albert, Salisbury, Kioga, Wamala, etc., in mass graves or burnt in their houses or cars." (Sic)

[1047] Ibid Page 159

The reign of terror went on and on until Idi Amin was overthrown in April 1979 by the Tanzanian Army assisted by Ugandan exiles. A government in waiting had been formed under the umbrella of Uganda National Liberation Front (UNLF), its armed faction was Uganda National Liberation Army (UNLA). On 8th May 1979, the following proclamation was issued in Kampala as Legal Notice No. 1 of 1979.

Legal Notice No. 1 of 1979.

Proclamation

WHEREAS from the 23rd day to the 25th day of March, 1979, the Moshi Unity Conference brought together 28 organizations of Ugandans both inside and outside Uganda which united and determined to overthrow the regime of Idi Amin for the good of every Ugandan.

WHEREAS the Uganda National Liberation Front was committed to the achievement of the objectives specified in Article 11 of its draft Constitution.

AND WHEREAS on the 11th day of April, 1979 the objective of overthrowing Idi Amin's regime was effectively achieved, the Uganda National Liberation Front assumed the powers of the Government of the Republic of Uganda headed by me, Y. K Lule.

Now PURSUANT to such powers and with the approval and advice of the National Consultative Council, I HEREBY PROCLAIM:

1. Chapters IV and V of the Constitution are hereby suspended and all appointments and offices excepting public offices held immediately before the 11th day of April, 1979 pursuant to the powers contained in those chapters are hereby terminated with effect from that date.
2. All the titles, privileges, prerogatives, powers, functions and exemptions formerly enjoyed or exercised by the former President of the Republic of Uganda under the Constitution are hereby vested in the President with effect from the 11th day of April, 1979.

3. All legislative powers referred to in the Constitution are hereby vested in the National Consultative Council until such time as a Legislative Assembly is elected.
4. All legislative powers shall be exercised by the National Consultative Council through the passing of statues assented to by the President and published in the Gazette.
5. There shall be a Cabinet of Ministers appointed by the President which shall advise the President in the exercise of his execution functions.
6. No action or other legal proceedings whatsoever whether civil or criminal, shall be instituted in any Court of or on an account of or in respect of any act, matter or thing done during the continuation of operations consequent upon or incidental to the said assumption of the powers of the government if done in good faith and done or purported to be done in the execution of his duty or for the defence of Uganda by a member of the Uganda National Liberation Army of those of our allies.
7. All liabilities and obligations incurred by the. government of the Republic of Uganda before the 11th day of April 1979, shall continue in force and effect but such liabilities and obligations shall be construed with such modifications, exemptions, qualifications arid adaptations as are necessary to bring them into conformity with the policy of the government and the Uganda National Liberation Front.
8. (1) Articles 3 and 63 of the Constitution shall not apply to the passing of a statute under the provisions of this Proclamations

   (2) Subject to this Proclamation, the operation of the Constitution and the existing laws shall not be affected by this proclamation but such existing laws shall be construed with such modifications, qualifications and adaptions as are necessary to bring them into conformity with this proclamation.

9. The Proclamation published under Legal Notice No.1 of 1971, is hereby revoked.
10. This Proclamation shall be deemed to have come into force on the 11th day of April 1979.

Y.K. Lule

President

Date of Publication: 8th May 1979.

What is pertinent here is that once again the 1967 Constitution remained in force. In June 1979, Prof. Lule, the President was removed by the Legislative Council known as the National Consultative Council by a vote of no confidence. He was replaced by Godfrey Binaisa, Obote's former Attorney General.

The constitutionality of President Lule's removal from power was contested in Court in Constitutional Petition No.1 of 1979, Andrew Lutakome Kayira and Paul Kawanga Ssemogerere vs Edward Rugumayo, Fredrick Ssempebwa and the Attorney General. The decision of this Court is summarised below as follows: -

> "Andrew Lutakome Kayira and Another vs. Edward Rugumayo and 2 Others - Court of Appeal Const. Case No. 1 of 1979 - 10/21/1980.
>
> Facts
>
> 1) On or about the 19th day of June, 1979 the National Consultative Council consisting of 30 members sought to approve ministerial appointments made by professor Y.K Lule; the then president of Uganda.
> 2) At the same meeting the council passed a vote of no confidence in Prof. Lule as a result of which he ceased to hold office as the chairman of UNLF and as president.
> 3) It was contended that the council acted unconstitutionally and therefore sought orders that
>
> (a) the Supreme law of Uganda is the constitution.
>
> (b) that the powers to make ministerial appointments to the public service is solely vested in the president and that the consultative council has no valid powers to ratify and approve such appointments.
>
> (c) that the National Consultative Council has no powers to remove the President from his office.
>
> (d) that when deciding upon matters of national interest the National Consultative Council must sit in the legislature and be governed and guided by the constitution of Uganda.
>
> Decision
>
> 1) The Constitution of 1967 is the Supreme law of Uganda. The power to make ministerial appointments vested solely in the President and the National Consultative Council had no and has no valid powers to ratify and approve such appointments.
> 2) Further, the National Consultative Council acting in its capacity as the legislature had and has no powers to remove the President from office.

Order

1) Appeal partially succeeds.
2) The defendant shall jointly and severally pay the costs of the second plaintiff.
3) The A.G will pay the costs from public funds.
4) There will be no order as to costs of the 1st plaintiff Kayira."

In spite of the above decision, the Kelsen theory of pure law was applied and the illegal removal of the President was never reversed. In this case the President, and I may say the government, remained in power 'illegally' and since it had not been elected and it also lacked legitimacy. That notwithstanding, there was a defacto government nationally and internationally recognised and all the arms of government functioned normally including Courts of law.

President Binaisa's government was overthrown by the Army on 10th of May 1980 and power was vested in the Military Commission of UNLF. The President was accused of a number of things, principally, the removal of the powerful Army Chief of Staff without following procedure.

General elections were held in December 1980, under the 1967 Constitution. Four political parties contested the elections, which were held in a tense environment. There were Commonwealth observers who issued a report stating that the elections had irregularities but were generally free and fair. The majority of Ugandans had a different view. The elections did not reflect their will.

A new government came into force on 17th December 1980 amidst widespread allegations of vote rigging and a host of other electoral malpractices including intimidation, harassment, unjust and illegal disqualification of candidates.

On 6th February 1981 Yoweri Kaguta Museveni in protest against a government that had assumed power, through a rigged election, launched an armed resistance to overthrow that government and to have it replaced with a legitimate one that embodied the people's will. He had been one of the leading fighters against Idi Amin since 1971 and had effectively participated in the overthrow of Amin, he was a prominent figure in the post Amin government, Vice Chairman of the military commission of UNLF. In 1980 elections, he was the leader of the Uganda Patriotic Movement, a political party that participated in the disputed elections. He had led an armed faction during the fight against Idi Amin's regime known as the Front for National Salvation (FRONASA). See: - President Yoweri Kaguta Museveni: The Struggle for Freedom and Democracy in Uganda: Sowing the Mustard Seed: Moran (EA) Publishers Ltd 2016.

Between 1980 and 1985, the Country was plunged into a civil war causing untold suffering to the citizens. It is estimated that over 500,000 Ugandans lost their lives. Many more lost their properties and livelihoods.

Obote's second Uganda People's Congress government was overthrown in a military coup on 27th July 1985. That government lasted only 6 months in power.

On 25th of January 1986, Yoweri Kaguta Museveni led the National Resistance Army into Kampala and ceased state power.

His army consisted of intellectuals and a great mass of ordinary peasants, men, women and children. Some bare footed, others in torn clothes, women carrying children on the backs with machine guns and rocket launchers on their shoulders. They were from all walks of life. Many had never been to Kampala. The people themselves had got fed up. They had risen up in a popular revolt against the legal but illegitimate government and had won.

Nowhere in Africa, except perhaps in Chad, had ordinary citizens taken up arms, defeated a national Army and overthrown their own government. In his own words, President Yoweri Kaguta Museveni narrates the events in his book, Sowing the Mustard Seed: (Supra) as follows at page 248:-

> "…Kampala was so quiet that night. Unlike 1979, there was no looting whatsoever; neither by civilians nor by soldiers. Ugandans had never seen such a disciplined army. It was a marvel. As a consequence, the soldiers were "over-appreciated"…
>
> …There was no raping – not even a single one was reported…
>
> The following morning, the 27th of January, 1986, I did three things. I drove through Kampala. It was deserted but not looted. Secondly, I went to Radio Uganda and they, eventually got me somebody that could enable me to announce that the NRA had taken over the governance of the country but details would be given later. Thirdly, I convened a meeting of the High Command, Army Council members who could be spared from the operations and NRC members who were around. That is when I was elected by that body as the new President and that is where legal Notice No. 1 of 1986 was drafted and proclaimed…
>
> …Eventually, I was sworn in, as were a few ministers. That is when I addressed a mammoth crowd at Parliamentary Square. That is when I made the speech of the "Fundamental Change."

As already stated, on the 29th January 1986, at the steps of the Parliamentary buildings, Yoweri Kaguta Museveni, was sworn in by the Chief Justice P.J Allen, as the 9th president of Uganda.

In his maiden speech to the people of Uganda he stated; -

> "NO ONE should think that what is happening today is a mere change of guard: it is a fundamental change in the politics of our country. In Africa, we have seen so many changes that change, as such, is nothing short of mere turmoil. We have had one group getting rid of another one, only for it to turn out to be worse than the group it displaced. Please do not count us in that group of people: The National Resistance Movement is a clear-headed movement with clear objectives and a good membership.

Of course, we may have some bad elements amongst us – this is because we are part and parcel to Ugandan society as it is, and we may, therefore, not be able completely to guard against infiltration by wrong elements.

It is, however, our deliberate policy to ensure that we uplift the quality of politics in our country. We are quite different from the previous people in power who encouraged evil instead of trying to fight it.

You may not be familiar with our programme, since you did not have access to it while we were in the bush so I shall outline a few of its salient points;

The first point in our programme is the restoration of democracy. The people of Africa-the people of Uganda-are entitled to democratic government. It is not a favour from any government: it is the right of the people of Africa to have democratic government. The sovereign power in the land must be the population, not the government. The government should not be the master, but the servant of the people.

In our liberated zones, the first thing we started with was the election of village Resistance Committees. My mother, for instance, cannot go to parliament; but she can, surely, become a member of a committee so that she, too, can make her views heard. We have, therefore, set up village, muluka, gombolola and district committees.

Later we shall set up a national parliament directly elected by the people. This way we shall have both committee and parliamentary democracy. We don't want to elect people who will change sides once they are in parliament. If you want to change sides, you must go back and seek the mandate of the people who elected you.

Democracy

Some of these points are for the future, but right now I want to emphasise that the first point in our political programme is democracy for the people of Uganda. It is a birthright to which all the people of Uganda are entitled.

The committees we have set up in these zones have a lot of power. You cannot, for instance, join the army or the police without being cleared by the village committee.

You must get a recommendation from the people in your village to say that you are not a rogue. Hence, the soldiers who are joining us from other armies will have to be referred back to their villages for recommendation. The same applies to the police.

Another important aspect of the committees is that they should serve as a citizens' intelligence system. If I go to address a rally in Semuto, Kapeka or Nakaseke, I shall first meet the muluka and gombolola committees in the area. They will tell me whether the Muluka chiefs are thieves, or the hospital personnel are selling drugs, or whether there are soldiers in the area who are misbehaving. They are thus able to act as watchdogs for the population and guard against the misuse of power.

The second point in our programme is the security of person and property. Every person in Uganda must be absolutely secure to live wherever he or she wishes. Any individual or any group of persons who threatens the security of our people must be smashed without mercy.

Security

The people of Uganda should only die from natural causes that are beyond our control, but not at the hands of fellow citizens who continue to walk the length and breadth of our land freely. When we were in Nairobi during the peace talks, it was a very painful experience sitting in a room with criminals across the table. I was advised that being a leader, you have to be diplomatic.

Therefore, the security of the people of Uganda is their right and not a favour bestowed by any regime. No regime has a right to kill any citizen of this country, or to beat any citizen at a road block. We make it clear to our soldiers that if they abuse any citizen, the punishment they will receive will teach them a lesson. As for killing people – if you kill a citizen, you yourself will be killed.

People in Bulemezi call me Yoweri or Mzee wa Kazi. Now, these Excellencies, and honourable ministers and high-ranking military personnel, and what have you went to Luwero. Can you imagine what they did? We were told that they had transferred the person who had killed the people in Luwero to another station! Can you imagine? Someone kills 100, 50 or even two people and you say you have transferred him to another area? It was suggested that the solution to some of our problems would be for Kampala to be completely demilitarized.

The third point in our programme is the question of the unity of our country. Past regimes have used sectarianism to divide people along religious and tribal lines. But why should religion be considered a political matter? Religious matters are between you and your god. Politics is about the provision of roads, water, drugs, in hospitals and schools for children.

Case for unity

Take the road from here, Parliament Buildings, to Republic House. This road is so bad that if a pregnant woman travels on it, I am sure she will have a miscarriage! Now, does that road harm only Catholics and spare Protestants? Is it a bad road only for Moslems and not for Christians, or for Acholis and not for Baganda? That road is bad and it is bad for everyone.

All the users of that road should have one common aspiration: to have it repaired. How do you become divided on the basis of religion or tribe if your interests, problems and aspirations are similar? Don't you see that people who divide you are only using you for their own interests not connected with that road? They are simply opportunists who have no programme and all they do is work on cheap platforms of division because they have nothing constructive to offer the people.

Our Movement is strong because it has solved the problem of division: we do not tolerate religious and tribal divisions in our Movement, or divisions along party lines such as UPC, DP, UPM and the like. Everyone is welcome on an equal basis. That is why you find that when our army goes to Buganda, the people there call it "amagye gaffe, "abaanabaffe". When it goes to the West, it is "amahegaitu", "abaanabaitu": which means that wherever the NRA goes, it is called 'our army', 'our children'. Recently, Buloba was captured by our army, and the commander in charge of the group was an officer called Okecho. He comes from Pakwach in West Nile.

Therefore, the so-called division between the north and south is only in people's heads. Those who are still hoping to use it are going to be disappointed. They ought to dig a large grave for such aspirations and bury them. Masindi was captured by our soldiers led by Peter Kerim: he, too, is from West Nile. Dr. Ronald Batta here, who is from Madi, has been our Director of Medical Services for all these years in the bush.

There is, in philosophy, something called obscurantism, a phenomenon where ideas are deliberately obscured so that what is false appears to be true and vice versa. We in the NRM are not interested in the politics of obscurantism: we want to get to the heart of the matter and find out what the problem is. Being a leader is like being a medical doctor. A medical doctor must diagnose his patient's disease before he can prescribe treatment.

Similarly, a political leader must diagnose correctly the ills of society. A doctor who does not diagnose his patient's disease adequately is nothing but a quack.

In politics we have also got quacks – and Uganda has had a lot of political quacks over the past two decades or so. I also want to talk about co-operation with other countries, especially in our region. One of our weaknesses in Africa is a small market because we don't have enough people to consume what we produce.

Regional cooperation

Originally we had an East African market but it was messed up by the Excellencies and Honorable ministers. It will be a cardinal point in our programme to ensure that we encourage co-operation in economic matters, especially in transport and communication within the East African region.

This will enable us to develop this area. We want our people to be able to afford shoes. The Honorable Excellency who is going to the United Nations in executive jets, but has a population at home of 90 per cent walking barefoot, is nothing but a pathetic spectacle. Yet this Excellency may be busy trying to compete with Reagan and Gorbachev to show them that he, too, is an Excellency. These are some of the points in our political programme. As time goes on, we shall expand more on them.

Last appeal

To conclude, I am appealing to those people who are trying to resist us to come and join us because they will be integrated. They should not waste their time trying to fight us because they cannot defeat us.

If they could not defeat us when there were just 27 of us with 27 guns, how can they defeat this army which you saw here? They cannot defeat us, first of all, because we have a correct line in politics which attracts everyone. Secondly, we have a correct line of organisation. Thirdly, our tactics are correct.

We have never made a mistake either in strategy or tactical calculation. I am, therefore, appealing to these people not to spill more blood, especially of the young men who are being misled by older people who should know better." (Emphasis Mine)

Following the swearing in of the President, Legal Notice No.1 of 1986 was issued setting out the new constitutional order. It stated; -

"Legal Notice No.1 of 1986

Proclamation

WHEREAS on the 26th day of January, 1986 , the National Resistance Army, (or the reasons given in the Statement to the Nation by the Chairman of the High Command of the National Resistance Army and the National Resistance Movement on that day, took over the powers of the Government of the Republic of Uganda and vested those powers in the National Resistance Council:

Now pursuant to such powers I HEREBY PROCLAIM

1. Chapters IV save Article 24, V and Articles and 3 of the Constitution arc hereby suspended and all appointments and offices excepting public offices held before the 26th day of January 1986, pursuant to the powers contained in those Chapters are hereby terminated with effect from that date.

2. (i) The National Resistance Council which shall have supreme authority of the Government is hereby established.

(ii) The National Resistance Council shall consist of;-

(a) the Chairman of the National Resistance Movement who shall be the Chairman;

(b) the Vice-Chairman of the National Resistance Movement (c) representatives of the National Resistance Movement

(d) representatives of the National Resistance

(iii)The membership of the Council may from time to time, be increased to include representatives of,

(a) Political forces or groups; and

(b) Districts

and such representatives shall be appointed, nominated. Or elected, as the case may be, in such manner as may be pre-scribed by national Resistance Council.

(iv) The National Resistance Council may establish such Committees and sub-committees as it considers; necessary.

3. The Chairman shall preside at all meetings of the National Resistance Council and in his absence the Vice Chairman shall preside. The Vice-Chairman shall deputize for the Chairman in all his functions and shall exercise such other function as the Chairman may direct.
4. There shall be a Secretary to the National Resistance Council who shall be appointed by the Chairman.
5. The Military Council is hereby dissolved.
6. The President shall be appointed by the National Resistance Council.
7. All legislative powers referred to in the Constitution are hereby vested in the National Resistance Council. These powers shall be exercised by the Council through the promulgation of Decrees evidenced in writing under the hand of the President and the Public Seal.
8. (i) There shall be a Prime Minister who shall be appointed by the President after he has been vetted by the National Resistance Council or its Committee.

(ii) The Prime Minister shall be the leader of Government business, and shall perform such other duties as the President may, from time to time, direct

9. There shall be a Cabinet of Ministers who shall be appointed by the President after they have been vetted by the National Resistance Council or its Committee.

10. (i) For the reasons given hereunder, that is to say, previously an Army Council composed of members of High Command, Directors of Departments , Senior Army Officers and Battalion Commanding Officers together with members of the National Resistance Council who were engaged in the armed struggle played an important role as the policy making body in the liberated areas during the struggle and the said members of the National Resistance Council have now become part of the National Resistance Council established by this Proclamation. An Army Council to be known as the National Resistance Army is hereby established consisting of: -

(a) Members of the High Command

(b) Directors of Departments

(c) Senior Army Officers at the date of this Proclamation and; -

(d) Battalion Commanding Officers of the National Resistance Army

(ii) The National Resistance Council shall seek the views of the National Resistance Army Council on all matters the National Resistance Council considers important

(iii) The National Resistance Army Council may forward its views on any matter it considers important to the National Resistance Council and the National Resistance Council shall take such views into account when making a decision on such matter.

11. Subject to this proclamation all liabilities and legitimate obligations incurred by the Government of the Republic of Uganda before the 26th day of January, 1968 shall continue in full force and effect.

12. No action or other proceedings whatsoever whether civil or criminal shall be instituted in any court for or on account of or in respect of any act, matter or thing done during the continuation of operations consequent upon or incidental to the said assumption of powers of the Government if done in the execution of his duty or for the defence of Uganda by a member of the National Resistance Army as defined by the Code of Conduct of the National Resistance Army, set out in the Schedule to his Proclamation.

13. (i) Those provisions of the Constitution including Article 64 thereof, which are inconsistent with this Proclamation shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be void.

(ii) Subject to this Proclamation the operations of the Constitution and the existing Laws shall not be affected by this Proclamation, but shall be construed with such modifications, qualifications and adaptations as are necessary to bring them in conformity with this Proclamation,

14. The National Resistance Movement Government shall be an interim Government and shall hold office for a period not exceeding four years from the date of this Proclamation.

15. (i) Legal Notices Nos, 4 and 5 of 1985 arc hereby revoked.

(ii) This Proclamation shall be deemed to have come into force on the 26th day of January, 1986.

Following the assumption of power by the National Resistance Movement in 1986, the Government expanded the legislative Council by including therein directly elected members. They were originally elected for two years, in 1989. Their term was extended to allow a Constitutional making process to begin. The government then proposed that a new Constitution be enacted, one that would embody the views, aspirations and will of all the people of Uganda. In this regard a Constitutional Commission was established in 1988. It was to be headed by a prominent jurist and Justice of the Supreme Court, Benjamin Odoki, who later become the Chief Justice of Uganda. It is now referred to as the 'ODOKI Commission' and its report bears his name. The terms of reference of the commission as set out in the law that established it may be summarized as follows; -

"…to develop a draft Constitution based on the consensus views… to ensure the widest possible popular consultation. Consultations, ought to educate the people about Constitution and constitutionalism, elicit views from all sections of the people and reconcile opposing positions with a view to developing a consensus and ensure that the people generally both understoodthe constitutional issues and were committed to the views they submitted to the Commission.

The Commission for a period of four years, 1988 to 1992 traversed Uganda and sought views from all the people of Uganda who were able to give them. Individuals, groups, political parties, academicians, traditions leaders, and all others.

The commission produced a report on 31st December 1992 with analysis and recommendations. Part of that report is listed as No. 11 on the petitioner's list of authorities in Petition No.3, Uganda law Society Vs Attorney General.

I have no intention of reproducing that report here. It is 800 pages long. I will endeavor to reproduce excerpts therefrom as far as they are relevant to the issues before me. As a way of introduction, the report at pages 55 and 56 states thus: -

2.58. The relative peace and security in most parts of Uganda and the unprecedented freedom of expression and of press have been stressed as offering great hopes for the future. Above all the concrete implementation of the principle of participatory democracy which has given a powerful voice and active participation to the hitherto voiceless and oppressed sections of our society is seen by most people as a tremendous opportunity and new vision for the reconstruction of the nation. Uganda's name abroad has been redeemed. Uganda is no longer the "sick" nation of Africa but rather a country of great promise and opportunities once it succeeds to resolve the fundamental issues of nation-building and democratization

2.59. Lessons from history, both remote and recent, are the sure guide for the present and the future of our nation. All chapters in the Report give summary historical insights to the topic treated. The aim is to recapture the lessons from our past. It is only such an approach that can assist us to avoid the mistakes and pitfalls which have hindered our unity and development, while identifying the values which have, despite problems, brought us where we are today as a nation.

SECTION FOUR: OBSERVATIONS ON THE NATURE OF PAST PROBLEMS AND FUTURE DIRE TIONS

2.60. From this historical background, we can make observations about the nature of our past problems which should be borne in mind in the current constitution-making process:

a) Uganda's political development has been characterised by authoritarianism dating from the pre pre-colonial period and continuing through colonialism and Independence, inspite of attempts to establish democratic structures.

b) There are groups whose political behaviours have been historically determined and these groups tend to look on all political and constitutional developments, including the current, the constitution-making process, as exercises in power sharing or monopolising power.

c) In the absence of viable political institutions which can successfully mediate between them, groups have always tried and in many cases have succeeded in capturing supposedly national institutions such as parties, legislature, and security forces mainly to serve their own interests.

d) Whenever groups are in positions of strength, they tend to ignore the formally established constitutional rules and attempt to dictate terms which inevitably provoke negative reactions, culminating in instability – coups d'etat, civil war and other forms of conflict.

e) Uganda is characterized by conflicting political and cultural traditions ranging from monarchism, authoritarianism and liberalism, but lacks a culture of constitutionalism.

f) Uganda has been adversely affected by ethno-religious conflicts which have usually led to sectarianism and closed communities.

g) There is no consensus over national political values to sustain political institutions.

h) There are perceived "historic injustices" among some groups, "injustices" which may need to be seen to be set right if such groups are to feel committed to any long term constitutional settlement.

2.61 A new Uganda constitutional order should take into account the following observations about future directions based on its historical background:

(a) The Constitution should provide institutional mechanisms for strengthening national unity taking into account the cultural, religious, regional, gender, class, age and physical diversities of Uganda peoples.

(b) While taking into account Uganda's social, cultural and political diversities, the Constitution should transcend interests of narrow groups.

(c) The Constitution should identify those residual Ugandan values which can serve as firm foundations for the new Constitution.

(d) The new Constitution should make institutional provisions for setting perceived historic injustices right.

(e) There should be efforts to provide for such a balance of forces that no one single socio-political force or institutional structure can manipulate such resources as it has to subvert the Constitution and dominate other groups and structures.

(f) A new Constitutional order should ensure that institutional structures are viable, coherent and integrated to promote a culture of constitutionalism and ultimate socio economic and political objectives which guide future development.

(g) There should be institutional mechanisms for ensuring transfer of power by peaceful and democratic means.

(h) Since the NRM assumed power, institutional frameworks have been established and appear to be gaining legitimacy. There should be serious evaluation of these to see the extent to which they may be integrated into the new constitutional order.

(i) The new Constitutional order should positively come to terms with Uganda's past and present and respond to its aspiration for the future. (All Emphasis Mine).

Chapter eleven of the report deals with the analysis and recommendations regarding the legislature. Under Section Three of that chapter the report analyses the view and concerns of the people in respect of their representation in Parliament as follows: -

Section three: Concerns and principles emphasized in the people's views: -

11.27 The experience of the past thirty years has shaped the people's concerns about the legislature and how it should work in future. This experience has also influenced the principles the people have indicated should guide the development of constitutional provisions on the legislature

Concerns of the People

Failure of the legislature to be representative of the people:

11.28 There is concern that the legislature has often not been representative of the people. During much of the time since Independence, appointed - usually self-appointed – individuals or bodies have taken on the powers of the legislature. Even when there have been elected Legislature bodies, the principle of elected representation has been watered down through the addition of numerous appointed members.

Poor quality of representation by members:

11.29 Some elected members of the legislature have been found to be self-seeking and corrupt. Some members have shown little interest in the needs and problems of their electorates once elected. As a result, many people have indicated concern that the principle of recall of members of the legislature be fully established.

Lack of accountability – extension of term of office:

11.30 Our post-independence legislatures have extended their terms in office without reference to the people. To be accountable to the people it represents, the legislature must face regular elections.

Lack of accountability - "crossing the floor":

11.31 The tendency of elected members of the multi-party legislature to ignore the choices made by the electorate in terms of party affiliation has been a matter of grave concern expressed in the people's views

Domination by the military:

11.32 The armed forces have on several occasions ignored the right of the 'people to choose their own representatives and usurped the role of the legislature through coups d'etat. This has marginalised the people- It is in large part as a result of this concern that there is considerable debate about the future role of the armed forces in the legislature.

Manipulation by the executive:

11.33 The executive arm of government has often dominated and manipulated the legislature by undermining opposition groups, dictating the work programme of the legislature and ignoring laws and other decisions made by it.

Lack of acceptance of the role of the opposition

11.34Where the governing party has felt threatened by an opposition group, it has been difficult for the opposition to play a constructive role.

Excessive centralization of legislature power:

11.35 Since the abolition of semi-federal arrangements of the 1962 Constitution, there has been too much centralization of legislative power. The result has been inability of local decision –making bodies to develop to develop laws and other policies reflecting local needs.

The report, following the analysis above made the following recommendations under Chapter Eleven:-

Length of Terms, Summoning Meetings, Number of Sessions and Dissolution

Terms of Parliament

11.110 The people's views expressed great concern about the legislature in Uganda usurping the people's powers by extending its term of office without reference to the voters. It was almost unanimously proposed that Parliament should have a term of five years, with many saying it should not be possible to extend the term under any circumstances. Others accepted the necessity for some provision for unforeseen circumstances where it is not possible to organise general elections at the time required. Although similar provisions in both the 1962 and 1967 Constitutions have been abused, there is some support for the necessity for inclusion of some such provision in the fact that the constitutions of many other countries do so.

11.111. If there is to be such provision, the people's interests must be safeguarded by strict limits on both circumstances where an extension is permitted and its maximum length. So while extensions might be open during a time of war or declared state of emergency, it should only be where it is clear - that elections are not possible. In some situations of war or emergency there may not be major impediments to holding elections. The maximum period of extension should be constitutionally fixed at one year.

11.112 Recommendations

(a) Parliament should have a term of five years.

(b) The normal term may be cut short by a vote of Parliament

(c) The normal term may be extended for a period not exceeding one (1) year, when there exists a state of emergency or a state of war but only when the circumstances are such as to prevent a normal election from taking place.

Dissolution of Parliament

11.117. The people's views expressed reservations about giving the President powers to dissolve Parliament. Such powers are open to abuse in times of political crisis and would tip any balance between the organs of the State too much towards the executive. Most people giving views on the issue indicated that Parliament should never be dissolved except at the expiry of its term.

11.118 Recommendation

Parliament should be dissolved only at the expiry of its normal term, with the President taking the formal steps to dissolve it. (Emphasis Mine)

Chapter twenty-eight of the report deals with safe guards and amendments of the new Constitution. This chapter appears to be the one most relevant to the issues before us and I am constrained to reproduce it in extenso.

SAFEGUARDS AND AMENDMENT OF THE NEW CONSTITUTION

28.1 The Independence Constitution of 1962 was suspended in 1966 by the then Prime Minister contrary to its provisions. An interim Constitution was hurriedly put in place within two months without consulting the people. The following year the Constitution of 1967 was promulgated by Parliament without ample consultation of the people. Since then, successive governments have suspended parts of that Constitution and added to it amendments which suited them without reference to the people.

28.2. In their views submitted to us, people have been quick to connect the political instability, social turmoil and violence which have been experienced in Uganda since the 1966 crisis to the manner in which successive regimes have arbitrarily dealt with the national Constitution without consulting the people. To the successive regimes, the Constitution has not enjoyed the respect, significance and a sense of sacredness which are due to it.

28.3 During the Constitutional debate, the vast majority of Ugandans expressed the belief that unless the new Constitution being made is effectively safeguarded both by the political and military leaders and by the people of Uganda generally, there would be little meaning in wasting a lot of resources, both human and financial, to its making. They contributed important proposals on the subject of safeguards and amendments of the new Constitution. The Commission is convinced that the issue of safeguards and amendment of the new Constitution is one of the most important aspects of the new Constitution. It has served as one of the important guiding principles in all the recommendations we have made on every aspect of the new Constitution.

28.4 This chapter is divided into four sections. The first discusses the importance the people attach to the subject. The second section examines the concerns expressed and the principles emphasized in relation to safeguards and amendment of the constitution. The third section assesses people's proposals on a range of safeguards for the new Constitution and gives our recommendations on them. The final section concentrates on the manner suggested for the amendment of the Constitution and offers the Commission's recommendations on it.

SECTION ONE: THE IMPORTANCE OF SAFEGUARDS IN PEOPLE'S VIEWS

Nature and Importance of Safeguards

28.5 A constitution provides the rules and principles by which the people of a country agree to be governed. Its authority comes from the people. It should embody the basic political and social values of the people and the state. It should identify the tasks to be performed by government and formulate principles according to which government functions should be performed. It provides the various organs of state with the necessary powers to enable them fulfill responsibilities effectively and efficiently. It places limits on the exercise of such powers in order to prevent any abuse of power and to protect the individual's rights and freedoms. To command people's respect and support, a national constitution should embodytheir aspirations, values and visions both for the present and a better future.

28.6 Written constitutions become the fundamental law of any nation. A national constitution enjoys a completely special status to any other law and this is normally evident in at least two senses. First, as the source of power and of limits on that power of all government authorities, a national constitution obliges all people to comply with it. Whatever is done by any leader, organ of government or any other person or group should be consistent with the constitution. Anything that is inconsistent with the Constitution should be overruled. The power to overrule such acts or decisions is usually vested in the judiciary and/or any other body set up for that very purpose. The power of the judiciary or the constitutional court to review and strike down laws or decisions which offend the Constitution is of special importance. It obliges all government organs to conform to the Constitution and defends the rights of the individuals and groups against violation by the state organs, other bodies or individuals.

28.7 The second sense in which written constitutions are considered fundamental is in the way they are usually made and the unique manner in which they are amended. In both aspects they essentially differ from other laws.They are often made' using procedures that involve wide consultation of the people or even national referenda or special representatives of the people. They are harder to amend or change because they contain the basic principles of the nation and the basic norms for all governmental institutions.

28.8 Once government authorities and the people as a whole fail to recognise the national constitution as the fundamental and sacred law of the country, that constitution has little value or none at all. A constitution which is overthrown, suspended or amended by government in ways that are contrary to its own provisions quickly becomes a nullity. Such has been the experience in Uganda since the unfortunate precedent of 1966. The issue of safeguards, therefore, concerns the measures which can be taken to ensure the respect, sanctity and protection of the supremacy of the Constitution.

28.9 Safeguards to a national constitution can be considered under three general aspects. First, the manner in which the Constitution is made is important to its safeguard. A constitution which is made with full involvement of the people is more likely to be respected and defended than one made without consulting the people.

28.10Second, the very contents of the Constitution form an essence of its safeguard. The power of judicial review of unconstitutional acts and decisions protects the sanctity of the Constitution. The distribution of power among the organs of state with adequate checks and balances aims at safeguarding the Constitution. The provisions on amendment procedures of the Constitution emphasize the significance of the basic law. The provisions for the defence of the Constitution bring out the special importance of the Constitution. The provision for special constitutional institutions to check the exercise of power and defend the people's human rights is another important way of safeguarding the Constitution.

28.11Third, constitutions are -specially safeguarded by knowledge of respect, and commitment the people have for their constitution. It is through an acquired culture of constitutionalism that the Constitution can enjoy the full respect due to it.

28.12 From the very beginning of the constitutional debate people recognized and emphasized the importance of safeguards for the new Constitution. They advocated for a dramatic change of attitudes among the leaders and among themselves towards the importance of the Constitution.

Different attitudes to safeguards·

28.13We identified three main sets of attitudes on the issue of safeguards in the views submitted to us. The first was a pessimistic view, very much influenced by constitutional history since independence. The basic position was that it was futile to bother with making a new constitution which would inevitably be both violated routinely by those in power and undemocratically overthrown. This was a minority viewpoint expressed mainly at the beginning of the constitutional debate. The vast majority of people were soon convinced that it was possible to have a positive change in the future and contributed constructive ideas on that basis.

28.14The second view was that development of adequate safeguards was the first task, and that only if there were assurances on that subject was there any point in proceeding with making the Constitution itself. Again, this view was expressed mainly in the early stages of the debate, after which most people became convinced that a major part of the answer in developing safeguards involved the proper design of the contents of the new Constitution itself, particularly in the way power was distributed.

28.15The third view, which was expressed by the vast majority who commented on the issue, was that Ugandans are quite capable both of developing adequate safeguards as part of the constitution-making process and of making them effective after the Constitution comes into force. In order to find effective and durable remedies for our past problems, however, many people emphasized the need to reflect critically on our past history in order to identify the factors which have undermined constitutionalism and democracy. We need also to identify factors in societies with more positive experience of safeguarding their constitutions which have contributed to that experience.

SECTION TWO: CONCERNS AND PRINCIPLES

28.24 All the concerns expressed by the people on all constitutional issues aimed at eliminating those factors and aspects in the past which have undermined the Constitution and the culture of constitutionalism. Likewise the principles emphasized on all issues were intended to safeguard the new Constitution. We only single out some of those concerns and principles which are directly related to the specific issue of safeguards and amendment of the Constitution.

Concerns of the People

Instability and lack of National Unity:

28.25Many people were deeply concerned that without adequate safeguards for the new Constitution there would be no assurance of the future stability they yearned for. They were convinced that without stability there could be no development. They noted that other countries have been able to successfully confront great problems in part because of the basic stability fostered by commitment to constitutional order.

28.26There was widespread concern that national unity has been an elusive goal, with many forces at work to encourage people to look to ethnic or religious or other allegiances as more important than the nation. This was seen as a factor in behavior groups which ignore the Constitution in their efforts to get power or hold on to it even that means going against the established constitutional arrangements.

Excessive concentration of power in the executive:
28.27People agreed almost unanimously that the 1967 Constitution had concentrated far too much power in the hands of the executive arm of government, and in particular in lit President. There were no other institutions which could effectively check on executive and presidential power. As a result, those exercising such power had little concern constitutional limits, and tended to feel free to set aside the Constitution or parts of the Constitution which did not suit their interests.

Politicisation of constitutional office
28.28Concentration of power in the executive was accompanied by a reduction in the independence of constitutional offices such as the Auditor-general, the Electoral Commission and the Judicial Services Commission. Even the independence of the judiciary was sometimes threatened in various ways, including the use of violence. Constitutional officeholders could be appointed and removed by the executive with few controls. They were not guaranteed adequate resources or even sufficient freedom from direction and control.

Militarism:

28.29People were concerned about the early reliance of civilian authorities on military power to resolve constitutional and political disputes. The military thereby gained an unwarranted role in government and exercised excessive power. Once civilian authorities came to rely heavily on the military to remain in power, it was a relatively small step for the military to believe it could run things better on its own. Having so decided, the Constitution was seen as a minor issue to be largely ignored.

Lack of sufficient accountability of government officials:

28.30Itwas noted by many that government officials, including members of security forces, have often been able to violate the constitution with impunity. Inparticular, where human rights and freedpl11s of people have been ignored and no action taken against offenders, the standing of the Constitution has been damaged.

Weak civil society:

28.31 Itwas recognized by many people that far too much power and resources were concentrated in the suite and its institutions. The ordinary person remained weak and powerless in comparison. There have not been strong and autonomous civil organisations to act as powerful checks on the state and as guarantors of constitutional stability.

Ease with which constitutions can he changed:

28.32Quite apart from the numerous times constitutions - or parts of them - have been abrogated and suspended without lawful authority, people were concerned that it has been too easy for the government of the day change, the Constitution. As soon as a government happens to have support of two thirds of all the members of Parliament, it is in position to change whatever suits it without regard for minority opinion. Disregard of significant minority opinions was seen as a divisive influence in a country of diverse peoples and interests.

28.33Governments have shown little or no interest in helping the people grow to understand and love their Constitution. Knowing little or nothing-about it, people have had little interest in protecting it.

Principles Emphasized by the People.

Sovereignty of the people, and supremacy of the constitution:

> 28.34 People wanted assurances that in future it would be generally acknowledged that the Constitution and all authority under it derive from the people. The Constitution must therefore recognise that all authority and power in the state derive from the people. Sovereignty of the people is not to be seen as something granted by the Constitution; rather, it is the basis of the Constitution and the Constitution should give due recognition to that fact. In general, power under the Constitution must be exercised in the interests of the people.
>
> 28.35 It follows from the principle of people's sovereignty that the law through which the people authorize the arrangements for their governance should be accorded the highest possible respect. The people in the views submitted to us, have made it clear that they want to be assured that the Constitution is treated as the fundamental law, supreme to all other laws and to all persons. Any law which is contrary to the Constitution must be illegal. This principle should extend to acts by the executive, the legislature and the judiciary, as well as those of other groups and individuals. It will be important that there are mechanisms for enforcing the supremacy of tile Constitution. Action should be provided for to deal with anyone who ignores the people's interests by seeking to abrogate or violate the Constitution.

Distribution of power among institutions which act as checks on one another:

> 28.36The people submitting views on the issue agreed that the national government should be composed of a number of institutions each with clearly delimited power and all of which act as checks on one another. No single institution should have sufficient power to unlawfully and unconstitutionally dominate and silence other institutions.
>
> 28.37The constitutionally recognised institutions of government should extend beyond the three traditionally recognised organs of state (legislature, executive and judiciary) to other specialised and > independent bodies. Anybody carrying out responsibilities which could be politically sensitive should be given constitutional protection so that it cannot be interfered with for political reasons. Such bodies should include the Electoral Commission, the Judicial Services Commission, and many others discussed in other chapters of this Report.

Popular participation transparency and accountability:

28.39Government would be under more pressure to deal with the people in accordance with the Constitution and more accountable for its actions if people were able to participate fully in their own government. Hence people wanted to see local level governments continue to operate to the village level but with increased powers, responsibilities and resources. They also wanted guarantees of regular and affair elections from the village to the national levels.

The people should always be consulted and involved in any major constitutional process.

28.57The third implication is that where the people's representatives in the Constituent Assembly cannot reach a reasonable degree of consensus on matters of controversy in the draft Constitution, the issue should be referred back to the people for a final decision. This can be done through a referendum. In this way, the people can be satisfied that decisions on all major issues concerning the contents of the new Constitution originate with them. We recommended so in the mentioned Interim Report.

28.58The unprecedented degree of involvement of the people in the constitution making process to date has ensured that people generally believe that a democratic constitution can only emerge from themselves. We are convinced that this belief is the strongest safeguard of a national constitution. This belief once sustained and encouraged by proper action should in turn foster people's preparedness to later defend the Constitution.

Sovereignty of the People and Supremacy of the New Constitution

28.59We have already discussed the closely related principles of sovereignty of the people and supremacy of the Constitution. They are the ultimate basis for all safeguards and so should themselves be enshrined in the Constitution.

28.60As to sovereignty of the people, it is necessary that the principle be given due recognition not only by a bare statement but also by provisions that give it full effect. As to the bare statement, it should make it clear that state organs should not take to themselves powers which the Constitution does not clearly vest in them, for the people retain ultimate power. As to provisions which give effect to the principle, the powers of the people to recall elected representatives and the reference of matters of controversy to decisions of the people in referenda are important examples.

28.61Turning to the question of supremacy of the Constitution, it must be clearly provided that the Constitution is superior to all other laws and customs, and that all acts of the executive and other governmental bodies must be consistent with it. As discussed in Chapter Sixteen (Judiciary), the courts, and in particular the High Court, should be given responsibility for ruling on questions as to the interpretation and application of the Constitution. In doing so, the court will be determining whether or not the supremacy of the Constitution has been challenged, intentionally or otherwise. The courts should have clear powers to make rulings on the issues and to make orders preventing continuations of breaches and providing for other remedies where breaches of the Constitution have occurred.

28.62. In carrying out their vitally important roles in relation to the Constitution, the law courts should seek to give full effect both to the spirit and the letter of the Constitution. In so doing, they will find the people's expressed concerns and the principles they have emphasized and contained in our Report particularly useful. This Report together with the documents containing the original submissions of the people should be made use of by the judiciary in aspects which concern it.

> (c) a flexible Constitution usually undermines the growth of a culture of constitutionalism since such a Constitution cannot be usefully studied in schools due to frequent changes;
>
> (d) once people are not assured that the principles under which they have chosen to be governed will remain intact they are likely to lose interest in their Constitution.

28.101 Therefore, it is not surprising that the majority of people proposed that the Constitution should be amended through national referendum. Others proposed that the alterations should be effected by a two thirds majority of Parliament with the approval of two thirds of the District Councils. Some people were satisfied with only two-thirds majority of Parliament. There were also proposals for periodic review of the Constitution after a specified period of between 10 to 25 years. They were virtually no views recommending the extreme positions that the provisions of the Constitution should be unalterable or that they should be amended by a simple majority in Parliament.

28.102 We agree with the views of the people that Parliament should have power to amend the Constitution but that the procedure for amending the Constitution should be rigid. Constitutionalism can better be secured if the procedure for amending the Constitution is made more demanding than for ordinary legislation. Secondly, since the people have participated in making the new Constitution which reflects their values, wishes, interests and aspirations, it should not be changed without consulting them. They should continue to be involved in the evolution, growth and development of the Constitution. Thirdly, there is a need to take the greatest care and serious consideration before amendments to the Constitution are made. They should not be effected merely to meet political expediency. Proposals for amendment should be published and the public given adequate opportunity to debate them.

Amendment by referendum

28.104We accept in principle that the procedure for amending the new Constitution should be rigid in order to promote a culture of constitutionalism, to protect the supremacy of the Constitution, and to safeguard the sovereignty of the people and the stability of the country.

28.105. Amendment by referendum would satisfy the above objectives and it would provide one of the highest forms of rigidity or encroachment. It would ensure that amendments receive the popular approval of the population. However we think that submitting every proposed amendment to a referendum may be too cumbersome and expensive and it may even be too difficult to obtain popular approval of desired constitutional charges. This procedure, therefore, should be restricted to a few most fundamental or controversial provisions of which the people should have the final say. These include provisions on the supremacy of the Constitution and political system. The provisions declaring the supremacy of the Constitution are the foundation of constitutionalism and the entire constitutional order. They are basic to the character and status of the Constitution and shouldnot be altered without the consent of the people.

28.106 The provisions on the political system the basic to the new political order. They have been the most hotly debated and they have serious implications for the democratic governance of the country. The people should have the ultimate power to decide on how they should be governed.

28.107 Recommendation

The following provisions in the Constitution should not be amended unless the proposed amendment has been approved by a national referendum:-

(a) provision on the supremacy of the Constitution;

(b) provisions on referendum on political system;

(c) provisions prohibiting and one-party state.

Amendments Requiring Approval of District Councils

28.108People in their views emphasised another method of involving the people in the amendment of the Constitution by requiring, approval or consent of the District Councils after Parliament has passed the amendments. Through this method the people in the districts being represented by their local leaders share with the national Parliament the responsibility of effecting fundamental changes in the Constitution. It is a procedure which is common in federal constitutions. It promotes national acceptance of amendments and may also protect minorities. We agree with this method which can greatly promote national unity while at the same time adequately catering for our diversity.

28.109 The provisions which should be governed by this method of amendment include those guaranteeing the people their sovereignty, and those providing for the defence of the Constitution. The people should be involved in the alteration of these provisions to prevent the government of the day disregarding the Constitution or the people. The provisions describing the character of the State of Uganda, its form of government, its districts, capital and official language should not be amended without the approval of the districts because they have an interest in these provisions which affect their well-being. Other provisions which should require, approval of districts include those on human rights and freedoms, representation of the people, the executive, the National Council of State, the judiciary, local government, defence and national security, taxation, traditional leaders, and amendment of the Constitution.

28.110. Recommendation

Provisions in the Constitution relating to the following matters should not be amended unless a Bill seeking to amend any of them has been passed by a vote of not less than two thirds majority of all members of parliament and it has been ratified by the District Councils of at least two thirds of the districts of Uganda:

Safeguards and Amendment of the new Constitution (Page 743)

(a) the sovereignty of the people;

(b) the defence of the Constitution;

(c) representation of the people - establishment and independence of the Electoral Commission and the right to vote;

(d) the Republic as the form of government;

(e) the boundaries of districts;

(f) the territorial boundaries;

(g) the Capital of Uganda;

(h) executive authority of Uganda;

(i) election of the President;

(j) term of office of the President;

(k) removal of President;

(1) declaration of war;

(m) emergency powers of the president;

(n) the National Council of State;

(0) human rights;

(p) Local Government system;

(q) authority to raise armed forces;

(r) taxation;

(s) amendment of the Constitution;

Amendment by Absolute Majority

28.111Most of the provisions of the Constitution should be capable of being amended by Parliament alone provided the prescribed majority is realised. There would be provisions which deal mainly with the structural formation of the state institutions and not the foundation, or human social values of the socio-political order. A special majority of two thirds of all members of Parliament should he required to pass a constitutional amendment. Such amendments, however, should not be done in a hurry. People should be informed of any proposed amendment and allowed time to discuss it through the media and offer theirviews to their elected members of Parliament.

Following the Odoki report, a draft Constitution was tabled before the Constitution Assembly on 18th May 1994.

The people of Uganda had elected from amongst themselves, delegates, to represent them in the Constituent Assembly. The National Resistance Council remained as the Country's legislative body and did not debate the draft Constitution

I have not found it necessary to reproduce excerpts of the debate on the draft Constitution, here. I may, however, have to refer to it in the resolution of some of the issues before us.

Suffice it to say, the draft was debated for a period of 29 months. Most of the Articles were passed by consensus. A number of modifications were made to the draft following the debates, but even then, after wide public consultations had been made.

On the 8th of October 1995, the eve of the 42nd anniversary of Uganda's independence, a new Constitution was promulgated, replacing the 1967 one. Since its promulgation, the Constitution has been amended three times as follows:-

- The Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2000, Act No.13 of 2000 which commenced on 15th September, 2000;
- The Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2005, Act No.11 of 2005 which commenced on 30th September 2005; and
- The Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2005, Act No.21 of 2005 which commenced on 30th December 2005.
- The Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2015, Act No.12 of 2015.

The first amendment, the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2000, Act No.13 of 2000 provided for the repeal and replacement of Article 88 of the Constitution; amended Article 89; repealed and replaced Article 90; amended Article 97 and inserted a new Article 257 A. The amendment Act was however successfully challenged in the Supreme Court case of Ssemogerere and Others -vs- Attorney General, Constitutional Appeal No.1 of 2002.The court noted that the creation of Article 257

A in the Constitution, now Article 258 in the 2000 revised edition, was inconsistent with Article 88 of the Constitution, which provides for the quorum of Parliament when voting on any question.

The second amendment is the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2005, Act No. 11of 2005. The objectives of this amendment were to:

- amend the Constitution in accordance with Article 261;
- distinguish Kampala as a capital city of Uganda and to provide for its administration and for the delineation of its boundaries;
- provide for Swahili as a second official national language of Uganda;
- provide for the Leader of the Opposition in Parliament under the multi-party political system;
- remove the limits on the tenure of office of the President;
- create the offices of Prime Minister and Deputy Attorney General;
- provide for the independence of the Auditor General and to provide for procedure for his or her removal;
- provide for the creation of special courts to handle offences relating to corruption;
- establish and prescribe the functions of a Leadership Code Tribunal;
- provide for the control of minerals and petroleum;
- provide for the holding of referenda generally;
- make miscellaneous repeals to the spent provisions; and
- provide transitional provisions having regard to the amendments made to the Constitution,

The third amendment is the Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Act, 2005, Act No.21 of 2005. The objectives of this amendment were to:

- provide for Kampala as the capital city of Uganda;
- provide for the new districts of Uganda;
- provide that subject to the existence of regional governments the system of local government in Uganda shall be based on a district as a unit of administration;
- provide for the creation of regional governments as the highest political authority in the region with political, legislative, executive, administrative and cultural functions and to provide for the composition and functions of the regional governments; provide for grants for districts not forming regional governments; replace the Fifth Schedule to provide for details relating to regional governments; and

- amend Article 189 to recognise the functions and services of regional governments.

The preamble to the Constitution has remained unchanged it states: -

WE THE PEOPLE OF UGANDA:

> RECALLING our history which has been characterised by political and constitutional instability;
>
> RECOGNISING our struggles against the forces of tyranny, oppression and exploitation;
>
> COMMITTED to building a better future by establishing a socio-economic and political order through a popular and durable national Constitution based on the principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and progress;
>
> EXERCISING our sovereign and inalienable right to determine the form of governance for our country, and having fully participated in the Constitution-making process;
>
> NOTING that a Constituent Assembly was established to represent us and to debate the Draft Constitution prepared by the Uganda Constitutional Commission and to adopt and enact a Constitution for Uganda:
>
> > DO HEREBY, in and through this Constituent Assembly solemnly adopt, enact and give to ourselves and our posterity, this Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, this 22nd day of September, in the year 1995.
>
> FOR GOD AND MY COUNTRY.

This preamble sums up all that I have endeavored to narrate above. In this preamble and in the whole Constitution the people of Uganda, emphasized the Country's history, acknowledging sadly that it has been characterized by political and Constitutional instability. Lest we forget. My attempts to recount the Constitutional history was t0 re-echo the people's cry, in the preamble to the Constitution.

We must always recall our history. "Lest we forget". Indeed, lest we forget our people, the brave, who shed blood in battle, who were killed, starved or jailed during the period when we were under colonial rule. Those who struggled for our independence and endeavored to bring us together as a nation state.Those who were killed in the lost counties.Those who were killed at Nakulabye and those that fell during the Battle of Mengo.Those who lost their lives and those who spent long days in prison during the state of emergency.Those who were deported from their homes to distant places because they dared to speak out.Those who lost their lands, properties and livelihoods unjustly to the powerful and greed government officials.Those who were killed during the murderous regime of Idi Amin and the years that followed his rule.Those who lost their lives in a bid to overthrow the regime of Idi Amin and never saw its aftermath. Those who were killed, jailed, tortured simply because of their ethnicity, religion, political beliefs or simply for no reason during the dark days of our history. Those who lost their lives so that we may have peace and stability during the civil war that ended in 1986. This is our history; the history the people of Uganda were recalling in the preamble to their Constitution.

This is what the preamble refers to when it calls us to "recongnise our struggles against the force of tyranny, oppression and exploitation."

In this Constitution, unlike any other, the people are sovereign and affirm their sovereignty and their inalienable right to determine the form of government they want through their Constitution. In this regard, the Constitution itself is not supreme, it simply embodies the supremacy of the people who through an armed struggle captured power from tyrants and dictators and vested it into themselves, and set out their will in the Constitution. They are the ones who gave Parliament the power to make laws, the Judiciary to adjudicate on cases and the Executive to pass and implement policies. The Constitution did not make the people, they made it, themselves.

Each and every provision of the Constitution of this Country ought, by necessity, be understood and interpreted with the knowledge of our history and the spirit set out in its preamble and the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy enshrined therein.

Sovereignty of the constitution.... vox populi, vox dei (latin, the voice of the people is the voice of god) and the doctrine of basic structure (togikwataako)

Articles 1 and 2 provide as follows; -

Sovereignty of the people.

(1) All power belongs to the people who shall exercise their sovereignty in accordance with this Constitution.

(2) Without limiting the effect of clause (1) of this Article, all authority in the State emanates from the people of Uganda; and the people shall be governed through their will and consent.

(3) All power and authority of Government and its organs derive from this Constitution, which in turn derives its authority from the people who consent to be governed in accordance with this Constitution.

(4) The people shall express their will and consent on who shall govern them and how they should be governed, through regular, free and fair elections of their representatives or through referenda.

Supremacy of the Constitution.

(1) This Constitution is the supreme law of Uganda and shall have binding force on all authorities and persons throughout Uganda.

(2) If any other law or any custom is inconsistent with any of the provisions of this Constitution, the Constitution shall prevail, and that other law or custom shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be void.

In this regard, Articles 259 and 260 and 261 provide as follows;

259. Amendment of the Constitution.

(1) Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, Parliament may amend by way of addition, variation or repeal, any provision of this Constitution in accordance with the procedure laid down in this Chapter.

(2) This Constitution shall not be amended except by an Act of Parliament—

(a) the sole purpose of which is to amend this Constitution; and

(b) the Act has been passed in accordance with this Chapter.

260. Amendments requiring a referendum.

(1) A bill for an Act of Parliament seeking to amend any of the provisions specified in clause (2) of this Article shall not be taken as passed unless it is supported at the second and third readings in Parliament by not less than two-thirds of all members of Parliament; and it has been referred to a decision of the people and approved by them in a referendum.

(2) The provisions referred to in clause (1) of this Article are—

this Article;

Chapter One—Articles l and 2;

Chapter Four—Article 44;

Chapter Five—Articles 69, 74 and 75;

Chapter Six—Article 79(2);

Chapter Seven—Article 105(1);

Chapter Eight—Article 128(1); and

(h) Chapter Sixteen.

261. Amendments requiring approval by district councils.

(1) A bill for an Act of Parliament seeking to amend any of the provisions specified in clause (2) of this Article shall not be taken as passed unless—

(a) it is supported at the second and third readings in Parliament by not less than two-thirds of all members of Parliament; and

(b) it has been ratified by at least two-thirds of the members of the district council in each of at least two-thirds of all the districts of Uganda.

(2) The provisions referred to in clause (1) of this Article are—

this Article;

Chapter Two—Article 5(2);

Chapter Nine—Article 152;

Chapter Eleven—Articles 176(1), 178, 189 and 197.

The question is whether or not the above Articles permit the amendment of any of the provisions of the Constitution, and whether Parliament has the authority to amend the Constitution at will.

In Yaniv Roznai entitled "Unconstitutional amendments; A study of the Nature of Constitutional Amendments Power." A thesis submitted to the Department of Law at the London School of Economics for the degrees of Dr of Philosophy, London 2014.

On this subject Roger Sherman, an American Congressman in the 19th Century wrote;

"The Constitution is the act of the people and ought to remain entirely. But the amendments will be the act of state Governments. Again all authority we possess is derived from that instrument, if we mean to destroy the whole and established a new Constitution we destroy the basis on which we mean to build. (Annals of U.S Congress (1789, 735). (Sic)

Another American John Calhoun in his study. "Discourse on the Constitution and Government of the United States, published in 1857 wrote:

"If an amendment is inconsistent with the character of the Constitution and ends for which it was established or the nature of the system or radically changes the character of the Constitution or the nature of the system then the amendment power transcends its limits." (Sic)

But the most appealing argument to me is that of Otto Bachof (1951): -

"Above positive law exists natural law, which limits even constitutional legislation. A constitution is valid only with regard to those Sections within the integrative and positivist legal order that do not exceed the predetermined boarders of a higher law. An amendment that violates "higher law" would contradict both natural law and the constitution and it should be in power of the courts to declare such amendment as unconstitutional and void"

A number of democratic countries have accepted the doctrine of basic structure expressly or by implication. In India, the Supreme Court in Minever vs Union of India (AIR 1980 SC 1759) unanimously held that a law that removed all limitations on Parliament's amendment power, was unconstitutional. The Court explained that;-

"if by constitutional amendment, Parliament were granted unlimited power to amendment, it would cease to be an authority under the constitution but would become supreme over it, because it would have power to alter the entire constitution including the basic structure and even put an end to it by totally changing its identity."

In Bangladesh, the Supreme Court in Anwar Hossain Chowdhury vs Bangladesh 41 DLR 1989 App Div 169 while striking down a Constitutional amendment that abolished the judicial review jurisdiction of the Supreme Court said:-

"Call it by any name, basic structure or whatever, but that is the fabric of the Constitution which cannot be dismantled by an authority created by the Constitution itself namely the Parliament… Because the amending power is power given by the Constitution to Parliament and nevertheless it is a power within and not outside the Constitution".

In the same case, Judge Shehebuddin reasoned that, the power to make a Constitution belongs to the people alone. The power vested in Parliament to amend the Constitution is derived from the Constitution and therefore such power is limited. He named a number of principles that cannot be removed from the Constitution by way of amendment, which include the people's sovereignty, supremacy of the Constitution, democracy, unitary state (in as far as it related to Bangladesh) separation of powers, fundamental rights and judicial independence which he contended are structural pillars of the Constitution, and therefore, beyond the amendment power of Parliament. Where Parliament transgresses its limits, it is in the power of the Court to strike down such an amendment.

In Bangladesh Italian Marble Works Ltd vs. Bangladesh (2006) 14 BLT (Special) (HCD) 1. The Supreme Court while annulling the Constitutional (Fifth Amendment) Act, 1979 which had been enacted to ratify, confirm and validate Martial law proclamations, regulations and orders held that:-

Parliament may amend the Constitution but it cannot abrogate it, suspend it, or change its basic feature or structure… The enabling power to amend cannot swallow the Constitutional fabrics. The fabrics of the Constitution cannot be dismantled even the Parliament, which is a creation of the Constitution itself. While the amendment power is wide it is not that wide to abrogate the Constitution or to transform its democratic republican character into one of dictatorship or monarchy."

In Kenya, the basic structure doctrine was accepted when the Court in Njoya vs Attorney General and Others (2004) LLR 4788(HCK) held that: -

Parliament may amend, repeal and replace as many provisions as it desired provided that the document retains its character as the existing Constitution and that alternation of the Constitution does not involve the substitution thereof a new one or the destruction of the identity or the existence of the Constitution attained." (Sic)

While discussing the doctrine of basic structure Justice Albie Sachs of the South African Constitutional Court in Executive Council of Western Cape Legislature Vs the President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (CCT27/95) [1995] ZACC 8; 1995 (10) BCLR 1289; 1995 (4) SA 877 (22 September 1995) noted as follows: -

There are certain fundamental features of Parliamentary democracy which are not spelt out in the Constitution but which are inherent in its very nature, design and purpose. Thus, the question-has arisen in other countries as to whether there are certain features of the constitutional order so fundamental that even if Parliament followed the necessary amendment procedures, it could not change them. I doubt very much if Parliament could abolish itself, even if it followed all the framework principles mentioned above. Nor, to mention another extreme case could it give itself eternal life - the constant renewal of its membership is fundamental to the whole democratic constitutional order. Similarly, it could neither declare a perpetual holiday nor, to give a far less extreme example, could it in my view, shuffle off the basic legislative responsibilities entrusted to it by the Constitution."(Emphasis mine)

Needless to say, the doctrine of basic structure has not yet attained universal acceptance. It was rejected in Tanzania, when the Court of Appeal reversed the Judgment of the High Court that had upheld it in Attorney General vs Christopher Mtikila (Civil Appeal No. 45 of 2009).

It has not been fully accepted in Pakistan or even in South Africa where it has been alluded to but not adopted.

The Supreme Court of Sri Lanka, also rejected it because the language in its Constitution permitted expressly any amendment or repeal of any Constitutional provision. The doctrine has also been rejected in Malaysia, where the Court granted Parliament an unlimited power to amend the Constitution.

In Belize, a Commonwealth Country in Central America, its Supreme Court in Barry M. Bowen vs Attorney General No. 445 of 2008 BZ 2009 SC, applied the basic structure doctrine. In that case, the Government had come up with the sixth Amendment Bill 2008, which aimed at allowing the government to exploit a recent oil discovery in that country. The bill proposed to exclude petroleum and minerals from the Constitutional protection of property rights. Apparently the Parliament had followed all the required procedures required for the passing of that Constitutional amendment.

The Supreme Court nonetheless held that, compliance with the procedure is not sufficient. The amendment just like any other law must be subject to the Constitution. Any view to the contrary would subject constitutional supremacy to Parliamentary supremacy. Therefore, Parliament's law making powers are limited so that it cannot enact laws which are contrary to the basic structure of the Constitution of Belize which includes the characteristics of Belize as a sovereign and democratic state, the supremacy of the Constitution, the protection of fundamental rights and freedoms that are set out in the Constitution, the limited sovereignty of Parliament, the principle of separation of powers and the rule of law.

The Supreme Court found that, the amendment bill which sought to infringe the citizens' right to property by obstructing their access to Courts of law violated the principles of separation of powers, the rule of law and the protection of the right to property, thus offending the basic structure of the Constitution. "The Sixth Amendment Act" was declared unconstitutional and void, by the Court.

However, the government was not yet done. In response to the decision of the Supreme Court above, the government proposed another amendment to the Constitution which was quickly passed, as "The Eighth Amendment Act of 2011". It stipulated that, Section 2 of the Constitution which provides that, this Constitution is the Supreme law of Belize and if any other law is inconsistent with the Constitution that other law shall to the extent of its inconsistency be void, does not apply to a law to alter provisions of the Constitution. In other words, the judiciary was deprived of its power to question a Constitutional amendment law.

"The Eighth Amendment Act" was itself challenged in British Caribbean Bank Ltd vs Attorney General Belize No. 597 of 2011 (SC). The Supreme Court of Belize held that there are implied, in the Constitution limitations on the National Assembly's amendment power so that it cannot destroy or remove the basic structure of the Constitution. The Court found that "The Eighth Amendment Act" was contrary to basic principles of separation of powers and the basic structure of the Constitution. That amendment, too, was accordingly declared null and void.

From the aforegoing, it appears to me clearly that, whether or not the doctrine of basic structure applies, depends on the constitutional history and the Constitutional structure of each country. Every Constitution is a product of historical events that brought about its existence. The classic example is the American Constitution. But there are a host of others. The American Constitution differs in a fundamental way from that of the United Kingdom because each of the two countries has had a very distinct history.

Uganda's Constitutional history is unique and differs in many aspects from that of Kenya and Tanzania, its neighboring countries.

In that regard therefore, the question as to whether in this Country's Constitution, there are indeed express or implied conditions that limit the amending power of Parliament can only be answered by looking at our unique constitutional history which has already been set out earlier in this Judgment.

I have already set out the Constitutional history of this Country albeit in brief earlier in this Judgment. I will not repeat it here. Suffice it to state, that our constitutional history serves as a guide, as to whether or not the current Constitution incorporates in it the basic structure doctrine.

The 1962 Constitution appears clearly to have been put together by the British colonialist in collusion with traditional Rulers, politicians and administrators. The contract was between the British, on one hand and the traditional rulers and politicians on behalf of the people, on the other.

The views of the people were never sought directly. The constitutional arrangement was more concerned with putting together a Colonial State, sharing of power and resources. It had nothing to do with the people themselves or their interests

In this regard the basic structure of the 1962 Constitution was the relationship between the federal states, semi-federal states, the territories and the districts. The main basic structure of the 1962 Constitution consisted of the following: -

1. The federal and semi-federal structure.
2. The power sharing between the central government and the federal state of Buganda other than kingdoms and districts
3. The limited power of Parliament in respect of the administration of the federal and semi federal states.
4. Direct and indirectly elected members of Parliament
5. The President was ceremonial and unelected.
6. The Prime Minister had executive powers, was not directly elected but was chosen by the party with majority in Parliament.
7. The country was neither a republic nor a monarchy.
8. It was neither unitary nor federal.

This was a constitutional order set up for convenience and appears to have been intended to be an interim measure. Soon it developed cracks, when the President was torn between his Constitutional duty as the President of the country and defending the territorial integrity of his Kingdom of Buganda.

The Constitutional battle between the Prime Minister and the President led to the former abrogating the Constitution in April of 1966 only 4 years after its enactment.

Under the 1962 Constitution, Parliament could not amend or in any way interfere with the Constitutions of the federal states and the territory of Busoga, under its Section 1.

The basic structure of 1962 Constitution could not be changed through a constitutional amendment. Any attempt to do so would have altered the nature of the whole Constitution. In April 1966, the UPC government had a comfortable majority in Parliament sufficient to pass a constitutional amendment, but it did not. The reason, in my view, is that any attempt to change the Constitution by way of amendments that were introduced by the 1966 Constitution would have had the same result as its replacement or abrogation. The amendments would have been so radical as to change the entire nature and character of the Constitution, which power Parliament did not possess. In the result the Prime Minister and his government decided to have the Constitution abrogated and replaced with another one, through an unconstitutional process.

The 1967 Constitution introduced its own basic structure. The Country became a one united republic. The President was chief executive and could appoint the Vice President and cabinet. The federal states were abolished. Members of Parliament were directly elected by the people through a multi-party system.

When Amin took power in January 1971, he suspended the basic structure of the 1967 Constitution, including Parliament, elections of President and distinct councils and practically ruled the Country as a dictator with absolute power. He later declared himself life President and ruled as if there was no Constitution, although most of the constitutional provisions remained in force. Amin's Legal Notice No. 1 of 1971, abrogated the Constitution, when he suspended its basic structures.

Therefore, once the basic structure of the Constitution is removed, suspended or replaced the Constitution ceases to exist even if the rest of the provisions remain operational.

When the NRM government came to power in 1986, it had resolved that the people of Uganda themselves would for the first time fully participate in the making of a new Constitution that is their own. It would have been simpler, cheaper and less time consuming for the Parliament at the time to introduce and pass amendments to the 1967 if it so desired. Again such amendments would have been so radical as to amount to abrogation of the 1967 Constitution.

It was the overwhelming desire of both the Government and the people to enact a new Constitution with its own basic structure, radically different from all the past Constitutions. As far as I can discern, the basic structure of the 1995 Constitution are.

1) The sovereignty of the people of Uganda and their inalienable right to determine the form of governance for the Country.
2) The Supremacy of the Constitution as an embodiment of the sovereign will of the people, through regular free and fair elections at all levels of political leadership.
3) Political order through adherence to a popular and durable Constitution.
4) Political and constitutional stability based on principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and public participation.
5) Arising from 4 above, Rule of law, observance of human rights, regular free and far elections, public participation in decision making at all levels, separation of powers and accountability of the government to the people.
6) Non-derogable rights and freedoms and other rights set out in the extended and expanded Bill of Rights and the recognition of the fact that fundamental Rights and Freedoms are inherent and not granted by the State.
7) Land belongs to the people and not to the government and as such government cannot deprive people of their land without their consent.

8) Natural Resources are held by government in trust for the people and do not belong to government.
9) Duty of every citizen to defend the Constitution from being suspended, overthrown, abrogated or amended contrary to its provisions.
10) Parliament cannot make a law legalizing a one-party state or reversing a decision of a Court of law as to deprive a party.

In this regard, the Odoki Commission recommended as follows (at P.741 28.104 and 28.105);-

> 28.104. We accept in principle that the procedure for amending the new Constitution should be rigid in order to promote a culture of constitutionalism, to protect the supremacy of the Constitution, and to safeguard the sovereignty of the people and the stability of the country.
>
> 28.105 Amendment by referendum would satisfy the above objectives and it would provide one of the highest forms of rigidity or entrenchment. It would ensure that amendments receive the popular approval of the population. However, we think that submitting every proposed amendment to a referendum may be too cumbersome and expensive and it may even be too difficult to obtain popular approval of desired constitutional changes. This procedure, therefore, should be restricted to a few most fundamental or controversial provisions of which the people should have the final say. These include provisions on the supremacy of the Constitution and the political system. The provisions declaring the supremacy of the Constitution are the foundation of constitutionalism and the entire constitutional order. They are basic to the character and status of the Constitution and should not be altered without the consent of the people. (Emphasis mine)

Parliament, in my view, has no power to amend alter or in any way abridge or remove any of the above pillars or structures of the Constitution, as doing so would amount to its abrogation as stipulated under Article 3 (4). This is so, even if Parliament was to follow all the set procedures for amendment of the Constitution as provided.

In this regard therefore, I find that the basic structure doctrine applies to Uganda's Constitutional order having been deliberately enshrined in the Constitution by the people themselves.

The rationale expressed above is fortified by the following provisions of the Constitution.

Articles 1 and 2: These Articles establish the foundation of the Constitution upon which all other Articles are archived therefore in my view cannot be amended, not even by a referendum. Doing so would offend Article 3(4).

Article 3. This Article is really unique, and I have not seen or known of any other Constitution with a similar Article, which effectively renders inapplicable to > Uganda the Kelsen Theory of pure law.

>
> Under Article 3(4) an amendment by Parliament may have the effect of abrogating the Constitution even if such an amendment has been enacted through a flawless procedure.

I say so, because an Act of Parliament amending the Constitution is still subject to Article 2 thereof. It must pass the constitutionality test.

I have already set out the views expressed by the people of Uganda during the Constitutional making process in regard to its basic structures earlier in this Judgment where I set out the views of the people of Uganda in respect of the basic structure of the Constitution.

The people made it clear that, Parliament must not be permitted to usurp the sovereignty of the people by extending its term of office. It was also unanimously expressed that Parliament should have a term of five years, with many saying it should not be possible to extend the term under any circumstances. Reference was made to the 1966 Constitution under which Parliament extended its term of five years without having gone through elections. Further reference was made to the regime of Idi Amin where legislative power was vested in him and there were no elections for the entire 8 years he was in power. This is the said history the people of Uganda were determined not to repeat See: Report of the Constitution Commission 11.110 Term of Parliament (supra).

Therefore, the principle of free and fair election, held regularly every five years forms one of the basic structure of the Constitution and is beyond the power of Parliament to amend. Any attempt to do so would amount to usurping the sovereignty of the people and the supremacy of the Constitution and this would contravene Article 1 of the Constitution.

To hold otherwise, would create an absurdity. It would in theory and practice, mean that, Parliament may every five years or seven years as set out in the impugned Act, extend its term without having to go for elections, perpetually! Even worse, it could abolish elections and declare its current members to be members for life!

This is what Idi Amin did when he declared himself life President, at that time all legislative powers of Parliament were vested in him, he was not just the life President he was also the life Parliament. This is what Justice Sachs of the South African Constitutional Court alluded to when he stated that, unchecked amendment powers of Parliament would in principle enable it to give itself "eternal life". See: Executive Council of Western Cape Legislature Vs The President of The Republic of South Africa (Supra).

Parliament could even abolish the Judiciary and vest judicial powers in itself! It could repeal the whole Bill of Rights from the Constitution, as long as it has a majority to do so. It could even abolish the Republic of Uganda and in its stead create a Monarchy.

Once the principle is set that Parliament has a right to amend any Article of the Constitution, simply by voting "yes" there would be no limit to their demands. Nothing would stop them from amending the Constitution to provide that they would be Members of Parliament for life and upon death, their Parliamentary seats be inherited by their children. They cannot do so because the Constitution put in place this Court to stop them. Its therefore not prudent to stand by and let our Country's democracy and hard-worn values set out in the Constitution wither on the vine.

Members of Parliament have no power on their own to legislate. The power to legislate belongs to the people of Uganda, who every five years delegate it to some amongst themselves under Article 1 of the Constitution. This power therefore delegated as it is very limited in both in time and scope.

Clearly, the notion that, Parliament has unlimited power to amend the Constitution does not appeal to right thinking people. The notion that every Article of the Constitution can be amended has no legal basis in our history and in our current jurisprudence.

THE PUBLIC PARTICIPATION QUESTION (SALUS POPULI SUPREMA LEX ESTO) IN LATIN: THE HEALTH, WELFARE GOOD, SALVATION, FELICITY OF THE PEOPLE IS THE SUPREME LAW

To salvage this deabate i will use as an exampale the constitutional petition 2018 we now determin Whether there was lack of public participation in respect of amendments that introduced Sections 2, 6, 8, and 10 of the impugned Act, if so whether it vitiated the Act.

I now proceed to determine whether or not a number of procedural irregularities were breached and if so whether they vitiated the process of enacting the impugned Act.

In Oloka–Onyango and 9 Others versus Attorney General Constitutional Petition No. 8 of 2014 (unreported), discussed the question as to whether or not Parliament while passing legislation may ignore or waive legal requirements. It was held as follows:-

> "Parliament as a law making body should set standards for compliance with the Constitutional Provisions and with its own Rules. The speaker ignored the law and proceeded with the passing of the Act. We agree with Counsel Opiyo, that the enactment of the law is a process, and if any of the stages therein is flawed, that vitiates the entire process and the law that is enacted as a result of it." (Sic)

I agree with the above proposition of the law, as clearly set out by that Court. Woth noting however is that public participation in the legislative process is not a privilege granted to the people by Parliament. It is a basic constitutional requirement. All the past Constitutions as already set out lacked legitimacy because they failed to allow the people to participate in the constitutional and legislative process. The Uganda Agreement of 1900 and the Order-in-Council of 1902, were illegitimate on that basis alone. Similarly, the 1962 Constitution, lacked popular support. When it was abrogated the people did not rise in its defence as they had no attachment to it. It had been made by and for their rulers. The worst example was the 1966 interim Constitution which was enacted without having been seen even by the members of Parliament who passed it and swore allegations to it.

The 1967 Constitution was debated and passed by Parliament which had constituted itself into a Constituent Assembly. The people's participation was extremely limited as already set out above. .

The 1995 Constitution specifically provided for Public participation in the legislative process and the government. This was one of the fundamental changes President Museveni had promised the people in his maiden speech which I have already reproduced above.

The Odoki report (Supra) sets out the recommendations on this aspect at P. 741 as follows: -

Sovereignty of the people and Supremacy of the New Constitution.

> 28.102. We agree with the views of the people that Parliament should have power to amend the Constitution but that the procedure for amending the Constitution should be rigid. Constitutionalism can better be secured if the procedure for amending the Constitution is made more demanding than for ordinary legislation. Secondly, since the people have participated in making the new Constitution which reflects their values, wishes, interests and aspirations, it should not be changed without consulting them. They should continue to be involved in the evolution, growth and development of the Constitution. Thirdly, there is a need to take the greatest care and serious consideration before amendments to the Constitution are made. They should not be effected merely to meet political expediency. Proposals for amendment should be published and the public given adequate opportunity to debate them. (Emphasis mine)

Counsel for the petitioners submitted that Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the impugned Act were smuggled into the bill. Those provisions extending the term of Parliament and that of the District Local Councils from five to seven years were neither in the original "Magyezi bill" nor did they emanate from the views and demands of the people. The people, petitioners contend, were never consulted on those amendments.

A number of affidavits were presented putting forward the argument that, the Magyezi bill as first presented did not refer to or contain a proposal to extend the term of Parliament and /or that of Local Governments.

For the sake of brevity I will refer only to the affidavit of by Morris Wodamida Ogenga Latigo dated 12th January 2018, sworn in support of Petition No. 3 of 2018,Uganda Law Society versus Attorney General. The paragraphs relevant to this issue are set out in that affidavit as follows:-

1. That I am an adult male Ugandan of sound mind, a Member of Parliament representing Agago North County Constituency in the tenth (10) Parliament and I make and swear this affidavit in support of the above petition in that capacity .
2. THAT on the 27th day of September 2017, I attended the Parliamentary session in which Hon. Raphael Magyezi, Member of Parliament for Igara County West Constituency in Bushenyi District moved a motion seeking leave of Parliament to introduce a Private Member's Bill entitled "The Constitutional (Amendment) Bill 2017".
3. THAT prior to the tabling of the said motion, on the 26th day of September 2017, the Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament in her communication outlined two notices of motion for leave to introduce Private Members Bills and one of the notices of motion was for "a resolution of Parliament urging Government to urgently constitute a constitutional review commission to comprehensively review the Constitution", which notices she said met the test for inclusion in that day's order paper.

18. THAT the memorandum of the Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Bill, 2017 circulated to the members of parliament prior to the first reading laid out the object of the said Bill, and long title of the Bill stated as follows:-

    "Act to amend the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda in accordance with Articles 259 and 262 of the Constitution/ to provide for the time within which to hold presidential, parliamentary and local government council elections: to provide for eligibility requirements for a person to be elected as President or District Chairperson; to increase the number of days within which the Electoral Commission is required to hold a fresh election where a president election is annulled: and for related matters. "

19. THAT when I read the memorandum of the said Bill, I established that the substance of the motion for which leave was granted was premised on Hon. Raphael Magyezi's basing the amendment on "the Supreme Court decision in Amama Mbabazi vs Yoweri Kaguta Museveni, Electoral Commission and The Attorney General in Presidential Election Petition No. 01 of 2016."
20. THAT in justification of a Private Member's Bill, Hon. Raphael Magyezi presented the said Bill with the view of meeting the time lines set by the Supreme Court even though the Bill touched on the minor recommendations of reforming electoral laws as opposed to the actual reforms needed to govern the conduct of a free and fair election in Uganda.

22. THAT the Bill which was circulated to the Members of Parliament after publication in the Gazette captured the prayers of Hon. Raphael Magyezi for which leave was granted by Parliament to bring a Private Member's Bill to amend the Constitution, which Bill did not include provisions on extension of terms of Members of Parliament and the current local government councils, and restoration of terms limits for the President.

25. THAT following the Bill circulated among the Members of Parliament and the Speaker's directive, the consultations by Members of Parliament were not required and neither did they address issues of extension of the term of the current Parliament and local government councils.

27. THAT after the consultations I attended the Parliamentary session of 18th December 2017 in which the Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Bill, 2017 was presented to the House for the second reading.

28. THAT the presentation of the Report of the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs on the Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Bill, 2017 was interrupted by several procedural interventions by Members, among which was the Deputy Attorney General's motion under Rule 16 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament to suspend Rule 201 (2) which requires a report of a Committee on a bill to be debated at least three days after the laying of the report on the Table of Parliament by the Chairperson or Deputy Chairperson, or Member nominated by the committee or by the speaker.

30. THAT in the Parliamentary sitting of Monday 18th December 2017, Hon. Kafeero Robert Sekitoleko, MP for Nakifuma County in Mukono District made an oral notice to the Speaker of his intention to propose amendments to the tenure of Parliament extending it to seven years.

31. THAT I attended the Parliamentary sitting of Tuesday 19th December 2017, and Hon. Monicah Amoding, MP Woman Representative of Kumi and a member of the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs informed the House that the proposal to amend the term of Parliament and the local government councils was never presented or received by the Committee, which information was ignored.

32.THAT I am aware that during the same Parliamentary sitting of Tuesday 19th December 2017, Hon. Violet Akurut, MP Woman Representative of Katakwi informed the House that consultation with the electorate was not done on the issue of extending the term of Parliament, submitting her personal view on the matter as opposed to representing the people.

33. THAT I attended the Parliamentary sitting of Wednesday 20th December 2017, in which Hon. Hellen Kahunde, MP Woman Representative of Kiryandongo prayed to the Speaker to allow the Members go and consult the people on the issue of extending the term of Parliament, which request was ignored.

34. THAT in the same sitting of Wednesday 20th December 2017, Hon. Tusiime Michael, MP for Mbarara Municipality in Mbarara District presented the justifications for the proposed amendment to extend the term of Parliament citing court battles facing Members of Parliaments and the time taken preparing for preliminary elections as the five-year term comes to an end.

38. THAT I read the Report of the Sectoral Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs on the Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Bill 2017, and save for the 'proposal to expand the term of President from 5 to 7 years' (at pages 92 -93), the Committee never received any proposal on the extension of the term of Parliament or the local government councils.

39. THAT I have read the Rules of Procedure of the Parliament of Uganda, 2017 and I am aware that any proposed amendments to a Bill which are not part of the Report of the Committee to which a Bill was referred may only be considered on notice where the following conditions under the Rules (Rule 133 (4)) are met: -

(a) where the amendments were presented but rejected by the relevant committee , or

(b) where for reasonable cause, the amendments were not presented before the relevant committee.(Emphasis on all paragraphs is mine)

The reply to this affidavit is contained in the affidavit of Ms. Jane L. Kibirige the Clerk to Parliament deponed to on 22nd March 2018, and specifically in paragraph 13, 15, 16, 28, 30 53, 54, 57,58, 64 as follows:-

13. THAT in specific response to paragraph 10 and 11 of the affidavit of Morris Wodamida Ogenga Latigo, I know that the Rt. Hon. Speaker addressed her mind to a number of procedural issues raised by Members of Parliament including the leader of opposition and in her opinion found no merit in the issues raised by virtue of her powers as the Speaker of the House.

15. THAT I know that on 27th September 2017, the Hon. Raphael Magyezi a Member of Parliament for Igara County West, Bushenyi tabled in the House of Parliament a motion for leave to introduce a private Members' Bill titled The Constitution (Amendment) (N0.2) Bill of 2017.

16. THAT I know that the object of Bill titled The Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Bill of 2017 was;

" An Act to amend the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda in accordance with Articles 259 and 262 of the Constitution; to provide for the time within which to hold presidential, parliamentary and local government council elections," to provide for the eligibility requirements for a person to be elected as President or District Chairperson)' to increase the number of days within which to file and determine a presidential election petition)' to increase the number of days within which the Electoral Commission is required to hold a fresh election where a presidential election is annulled,' and for related matters."

28.THAT in specific response to paragraph 16 of the affidavit of Morris Wodamida Ogenga Latigo, I know that prior to Hon. Raphael Magyezi, moving the motion for leave to introduce a private Member's Bill, the Rt. Hon, Speaker of Parliament addressed her mind to the protest raised by the leader of opposition and similarly found no merit in the protest as raised.

30.THAT in specific response to paragraphs 19, 20 and 21 of affidavit of Morris Wodamida Ogenga Latigo, I know that the substance of the motion moved by the Hon. Raphael Magyezi was not only premised on the Supreme Court ruling in Amama Mbabazi vs Yoweri Kaguta Museveni Electoral Commission and .Attorney General in Presidential Election Petition No. 1 of 2017 but also other concerns raised which included the eligibility requirement for a person to be elected as President or District Chairperson, being necessary electoral reforms.

53. THAT in specific response to Paragraph 30 of affidavit of Morris Wodamida Ogenga Latigo Morris, I know that the Hon. Kafeero Robert Sekitoleko made an oral notice, in accordance with the Rules of Procedure of Parliament to the Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament of his intention to propose amendments to the term of Parliament.

57.THAT in specific response to paragraph 31, 32, 33,34,35,36,37 and 40 of affidavit of Morris Wodamida Ogenga Latigo, I know that the issues raised by the Hon. Monicah Amoding, MP Woman Representative of Kumi, Hon. Hellen Kahunde, MP Woman Representative of Kiryandongo, Hon. Tusiime Michael, MP for Mbarara Municipality in Mbarara District, Hon Joy Atim, MP Woman Representative of Lira were extensively debated in the House and at the conclusion of the debate, a question was to Members in line with Parliamentary procedure and a decision was taken.

58. THAT in further response to the paragraph 37 of affidavit of Morris Wodamida Ogenga Latigo, I am advised by the Attorneys in the Attorney General's Chambers which information I verily believe to be true that not all amendments in the House of the Parliament should be contained in the Bill and that amendment can be proposed at the time of the debate and later at the Committee stage of the whole House.

64. THAT I know that on 20th December 2017, after another round of lengthy debate on the Report of the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs on the proposed amendments, Members of Parliament were asked by the Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament, in accordance with the Rules of Procedure of Parliament to vote on the second reading of the Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Bill 2017."

The averments reproduced above, were repeated in the submissions of the respondent, in opposition to the Petitions. Refer also to the Hansard, a copy of which was submitted to Court by the petitioners in Petition No.1o Prosper Businge and others vs Attorney General. and the proceedings of Parliament of 21st, 26th, and 27th of September 2017, the proceedings of 3rd, October 2017, 18th December 2017, 19th December and 20th December 2017.

It was not in question that when the Magyezi Bill was first introduced, it did not contain or refer to the extension of the term of Parliament or that of the District Local Councils.

It appears that the above proposal was never presented or received by the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs at any time. The first time this proposal was presented was on Wednesday 20th December 2017 after Members of Parliament had voted on the second reading of the original Magyezi Bill.

These were the proceedings of Parliament as recorded in the Hansard of that date at page 5247, at which Mr. Tusiime Hon. Member of Parliament Mbarara municipality who tabled the proposed amendment and justified it.

Mr. Tusiime: Thank you very much Madam Chairperson. My proposed amendments ofArticle 61, of the Constitution are as follows:

Amendment 1,

By substituting for clause (2), the following "The Electoral Commission shall hold Presidential, general parliamentary and local government council elections within the first 30 days of the last 172 days, before the expiration of the term of the President, Parliament or local Government Council as the case maybe" To amend clause (3) by deleting the word "Presidential" appearing immediately after the word "hold"

Justification

This is intended to separate the tenure of the office of the President as provided for under Article 105(1) from the term of Parliament and Local Government Councils, and the election of the President since the presidential term cannot be amended by Parliament alone.

Amendment 2

This is the amendment of Article 77 of the Constitution. Article 77 of the Constitution is to be amended in clause (3) by substituting for the word "five" appearing immediately before the word "years" with "seven years".

Justification

The proposed amendment of Article 77 (3) of the Constitution is intended to increase the term of Parliament from five years to seven years to give Members of Parliament enough time to accomplish parliamentary business for the development of Uganda since five years have been found to be too short for purposes of development.

Madam Chairperson, this is because during the first two years, Members of Parliament are getting acclimatised to parliamentary procedures, conducts and business. Secondly, the other Members of Parliament in the first two years are still held up in courts of law defending their status. Accordingly, most Members of Parliament settle in the third year to start serious parliamentary business. During the fourth year, Members of Parliament are preparing for primaries within their political parties for another election and the fifth year is all eaten up by the general elections. This means that Parliament has only one year to engage in serious parliamentary business.

Amendment 3

Article 181 is to' be amended in clause (4) by substituting for the word "five" appearing immediately before the word "years" the word "seven".

Justification

The amendment of Article 181 (4) of the Constitution is intended to increase the term of Local Government Councils from five years to seven years to align it with the tenure of the office of the President and the term of Parliament since Government must act as one.

Amendment 4

Replacement of the Article 289 of the Constitution Article 289 of the Constitution should be amended by substituting for Article 289 the following: Article 289. Term of the current Parliament "Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, the term of the parliament in existence at the time of this Article comes in into force, shall expire seven years from its first sitting."

Justification

This provision is intended to replace the current Article 289 of the Constitution since it was introduced in 2005 in the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2005 as a transitional provision and has since served its useful purposes and it is now a spent provision in the Constitution.

In addition, Madam Chairperson, the replacement is intended to provide for the transitional provision to extend the term of the current Parliament from five years to seven years from 2016 to 2023.

Amendment 5

Madam Chairperson, replacement of Article 291 of the Constitution. Article 291 of the Constitution is amended by substituting for Article 291 the following:

Term of the current Local Government Councils

"For the avoidance of doubt, the term of seven years prescribed for Local Government Councils by clause (4) of Article 181 of the Constitution shall apply to the term of the Local Government Councils in existence at the time that clause came into force."

Justification

This provision is intended to substitute for the current Article 291 of the Constitution since it was introduced in 2005 in the Constitution (Amendment) Act of 2005 as a traditional provision and it has since served its purposes and is now a spent provision.

Madam Chairperson, the replacement is, therefore, intended to avoid the transitional provision to extend the term of Local Government Councils from five years to seven years and to be precise, from 2016 to 2023, I beg to move, Madam Chairperson.

The chairperson: Therefore, honourable members, those are the proposals.

Following a heated debate, the sponsor of the Bill, Mr. Raphael Magyezi, gave a report from the committee of the whole House. The proceedings are set out in the Hansard as follows: -

MR RAPHAEL MAGYEZI (NRM, Igara County West, Bushenyi): Madam Speaker, I beg to report that the Committee of the whole House has considered the Bill entitled, "The Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Bill, 2017" and passed the entire Bill with amendments and also introduced and passed new clauses - amending Articles 77, 181, 29, 291, 105 and 260. I beg to report.

8.57. MR RAPHAEL MAGYEZI (NRM, Igara County West, Bushenyi): Madam Speaker, I beg to move that the report of the Committee of the whole House be adopted.

8.58. THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, I put the question that the report of the Committee of the whole House be adopted.

The speaker then wound up the proceedings as follows: -

THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, I put the question that the report of the Committee of the whole House be adopted.

THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, we shall go for the third reading. I will now invite the Clerk to ring the Bell for 15 minutes. Therefore, I will suspend proceedings for 15 minutes. The bell will be rung and we reassemble.

(House suspended at 8.59 p.m, for 15 minutes)

(On resumption at 9:25pm) the speaker presiding

THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, we are going for third reading. I invite all the Members who are able to sit in the Chamber to come in inside so that we can take the vote. I would like to appeal that you do not make preambles. Just vote because the preambles are taking time. They were done on the second reading. You do not need to do preambles on the third reading. Just vote. Vote either Yes, No or Abstain.

From the above proceedings it can be deduced that the amendments to the Magyezi Bill, were introduced by Mr. Tusiime on 20th December 2017. The proposals were debated and passed on the same day. They were incorporated in the bill which was eventually enacted into Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the impugned Act without any input from the public.

The Public participation alluded to by the respondent in the affidavits in support of the answer to the Petition had nothing to do with the enactment of Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the impugned Act, because at the time those consultations took place, the sections mentioned above had not yet become part of the bill. I find that lack of public participation vitiated the impugned Sections of the Act.

There is no question that Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the impugned Act were introduced by Mr. Michael Tusiime's amendments extending the term of Parliament from five to seven years and they were passed on the same day they were introduced. No consultation at all was possible or had been done by Members of Parliament, prior t their introduction.

Reading of the Hansard suggests to me that the majority of the members were unaware of the amendments introduced by Mr. Tusiime and even fewer understood them. This appears to have been a well planned ambush, premeditated and executed by a few backbenchers with the tactical support of the Deputy Attorney General and other front benchers. This is evident from the clandestine way the "Certificate of Financial Implications" was requested for and issued without the knowledge of the Clerk to Parliament days before the proposed amendments were revealed to anyone else in Parliament. They were brought up on the floor to Parliament to appear as if they were as a result of the debate, whereas not. Even the Members of Parliament present at the time the amendments were introduced were not availed time to debate the proposed amendments. I find that, there was no public consultation at all in respect of those amendments to the bill. Mr. Mwesigwa Rukutana, the learned Deputy Attorney General, suggested tongue in cheek from the bar, that the Members of Parliament had been able to consult the people through social and electronic media using their newly acquired "tablets" (computer devices). This was evidence from the bar, which has no value. This statement just helps to confirm the level of unseriousness and cynicism of Members of Parliament and the Executive attached to the constitutional duty to consult the people of Uganda upon whom the supreme authority vests, under Article 1 of the Constitution.

The question now required to determine is whether or not lack of public consultation or public participation would vitiate the process of passing a Constitutional Amendment Act or any other legislation for that matter. The East African Court of Justice in East African Law Society and 5 others vs The Attorney General of the Republic of Kenya and 4 others Reference No.3 of 2010 found that: -

> "lack of people's participation in the impugned amendment process was inconsistent with the spirit and intendment of the Treaty in general, and that in particular, it constituted infringement of principles and provisions in Articles 5(3) (g), and 7(1) (a)."

lack of people's participation in process of amending the Constitution would vitiate the resulting Constitutional Amendment Act, and I find so. In this case it vitiated the enactment of Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the impugned Act

It is common ground that the Constitutional Amendment bill as first presented by Mr. Magyezi, the Hon. Member of Parliament for Igara West constituency, did not include the extension of the term of Parliament and or that of the Local Government councils. Those provisions were introduced at a much later stage during the debate on the floor of Parliament. In this regard, the Certificate of Financial Implications required under Article 93 of the Constitution to accompany a private members bill was only in respect of the bill as first presented.

Therefore, that certificate did not cover the provisions of Sections 2,6,8 and 10 at the time it was issued those provisions had not been introduced. There was an attempt to introduce another Certificate of Financial Compliance, to remedy the situation, but it was flawed. It had not been requested for by the accounting officer of Parliament, but rather by one Hon. Gaster Mugoya, a Hon. Member of Parliament on the Committee of Legal and Parliamentary affairs. The Clerk to Parliament, in her testimony in Court, said it was irregular. The provisions of Article 93 are mandatory. In this case they were not complied with in respect of Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the Act, which were, as already stated, introduced much later.

It appears clearly to me that the framers of Article 93 of the Constitution intended to ensure that a private member's bill did not contain any provision that would impose on government any financial obligations including increment or reduction in taxes or any charge on the consolidated fund. In my view the Certificate of Financial Implications must cover the bill as it appears before it is moved, voted into law or assented to by the President. On that account also l would find that Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the impugned Act are unconstitutional, Parliament having failed to comply with the provisions of Article 93 of the Constitution in the process of their enactment.

Uganda Law Society, the petitioner in Petition No. 03 contends in ground 1 (e) of that Petition as follows:-

> "The act of Parliament in proceeding on a private members bill whose effect is to authorize payments of the 10th Parliament and the current local government councils after expiry of their initial constitutional five-year term is inconsistent with Article 93(b) of the Constitution." (Sic)

While submitting on this ground, Mr. Wandera Ogalo, learned Counsel for the Petitioner in that Petition, argued that the Parliament acted contrary to Article 93 of the Constitution when it passed the impugned private members bill which bill had the effect of imposing a charge on the consolidated fund.

The respondent in the answer to the Petition denied any wrong doing, and sought to prove that indeed a Certificate of Financial Implications for the proposed bill had been issued by the Minister responsible for finance in that respect.

In her affidavit in support of the answer to the Petition the Clerk to the Parliament, Ms. Jane Kibirige deponed thus: -

"That I know that thereafter Hon. Raphael Magyezi, then laid on the table of Parliament the Constitutional (Amendment) (No.2) Bill of 2017 accompanied by a certificate of Financial Implications as required under the provision of Section 76 of the Public Financial Management Act, 2015 and Rules of procedure of Parliament"

The said afore mentioned certificate was annexed to the affidavit. It reads as follows:-

Certificate of Financial Implications

(Made under Section 76 of The Public Finance Management Act 2015),

THIS IS TO CERTIFY that the Bill entitled, THE CONSTITUTION (AMENDMENT) BILL, 2017, has been examined as required under Section 76 of the Public Finance Management Act, 2015 (as Amended). I wish to report as follows:

(a)Background:

In accordance with Articles 259 and 262 of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, on the 27th September, 2017, Parliament granted leave to Hon. Raphael Magyezi (MP) to introduce the Constitution Amendment Bill, 2017.

The amendment of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda is also premised on the Supreme Court decision in Amama Mbabazi Vs Yoweri Kaguta Museveni, Electoral Commission and Attorney General in Presidential Election Petition No. 01 of 2016.

(b) objective of the Bill.

The objective of the Bill is to amend the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda;

- (i) To provide for the time within which to hold presidential, parliamentary and local government council elections under Article 61;
- (ii) To provide for eligibility requirements for a person to be elected as President or District Chairperson under Articles 102(b) and 183(2)(b);
- (iii) To increase the number of days within which to file and determine a presidential election petition under 104(2) and (3) and;
- (iv) To increase the number of days within which the Electoral Commission is required to hold a fresh election where a presidential election is annulled under Article 104(6).

(c) Expected outputs and the Impact of the Bill on the economy.

The proposed amendments to the Constitution will strengthen the Constitution's provision of Article 1 which gives the people of Uganda the absolute right to determine how they should be governed and Articles 21 and 32 which prohibit any form of discrimination on the basis of age and other factors.

As a result, discrimination will be eliminated and this will strengthen the provisions of Equality and Freedom in the Constitution and provide a non-discriminatory environment for all Ugandans in terms of leadership aspirations.

In addition the amendment is expected to provide for the key recommendations of the Supreme Court ruling in Presidential Election hence strengthening the Electoral process and fairness.

(d) Planned Expenditure by major components over the MTEF period:

The planned expenditure will be accommodated within the Medium Term Expenditure Framework for the Ministries, Departments and agencies concerned.

(e) Funding and budgetary implications

There are no additional financial obligations beyond what is in the Medium Term Expenditure Framework and thus the Bill is budget neural.

(f) Expected benefits/ savings and/or revenue to Government:

i) Enhance democracy of Ugandans;

ii) Strengthen the provisions of Equality and Freedom in the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda; and

iii) Strengthen the electoral process in Uganda.

Submitted under my hand this 28th day of September, 2017.

Matia Kasaija (MP)

Minister of Finance, Planning and Economic Development

Received by: Ambanyira Joshua

Date: 29/9/2017

There is nothing in the above Certificate relating to the extension of the term of Parliament. This certificate is dated 28th September 2017. It was received at Parliament on 29th September 2017. It was laid before Parliament on 3rd October 2017. The amendment in respect of extension of the term of Parliament was proposed, debated and passed on 20th December 2017.

Therefore, the Certificate of Financial Implications referred to above did not relate to or cover the amendment introduced by Mr. Tusiime. There was another Certificate of Financial Implications, which was introduced in evidence during the cross examination of Ms. Jane Kibirige, the Clerk to Parliament. It was admitted as exhibit P1. Interestingly or perhaps strangely, this Certificate had not been put in evidence at all earlier by the respondents. It only appeared during cross-examination of the Clerk to Parliament in Court during the hearing.

That Certificate was exhibited together with a letter dated 18th December 2017, written by one Mugoya Kyawa Gaster (MP) and addressed to the Minister responsible for finance. It reads as follows: -

> "18th December, 2017
>
> Our Ref: POU/GEN/2017
>
> The Minister of Finance, Planning and
>
> Economic Development
>
> Kampala
>
> Dear Hon.
>
> RE: REQUEST FOR A CERTIFICATE OF FINANCIAL IMPLICATIONS FOR A CONSTITUTION AMENDEMENT PROPOSAL EXPANDING THE FIVE-YEAR TERM OF PRESIDENT, PARLIAMENT AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT TO SEVEN YEARS.
>
> As you may be aware the legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee of Parliament, while considering the Constitution amendment (NO.2) Bill 2017 (The Magyezi Bill), came up with a number of recommendations among which is that the Parliamentary and Local Council tenure of Office be expanded from the current five years to seven years.
>
> While Parliament has jurisdiction to amend the Parliamentary and Local Government tenure of office, an Amendment for the Presidential term requires a referendum to align the latter tenure with the former
>
> The Purpose of this letter therefore is to request for issuance of a Certificate of financial implications given the above proposal for the extension of the above tenure(s).
>
> Mugoya Kyawa Gaster (MP)
>
> BUKOOLI COUNTY NORTH-BUGIRI
>
> c.c: Attorney General
>
> c.c: Government Chief Whip"

Apparently in response to the said letter, a Certificate of Financial Implications was issued by the Minister responsible for Finance, Mr. Matia Kasaija (Mp) on 19th December 2017. There is no indication as to when the Certificate was received at Parliament and by whom. The spaces for receipt and date are blank. Interestingly, although the letter is dated 18th December 2017 it bears a rubber stamp of the office of the Deputy Secretary to the Treasury, indicating that it was received at his office on 17th December 2017 a day before it was written. I could have dismissed this as a mere discrepancy in dates resulting from an inadvertent error, but I cannot. This is because on the same letter is a hand written insertion marked "(1)" to Acting Permanent Secretary to the Treasury. It reads.

"Ag PS/ST. Please handle urgently. I have to sign before end of today 16/12".

The letter is initiated and not fully signed. I have no doubt in my mind that it was initiated by the Minister responsible for Finance, as that is the person to whom it was addressed and the only one above the Permanent Secretary/Secretary to Treasury who could direct him as he did. This is the only reasonable inference I could make.

the discrepancies apparent on the face of this document were apparent. A letter written on 18th December, was received by the Minister on or about 16th December, and was forwarded to and received by the Deputy Permanent Secretary on 17th December and the request set out therein was prepared and signed by the Minister on 19th December and was laid on the table of Parliament on 20th December in respect of a motion that until then had not been presented. These facts are not just interesting they are disturbing revealing as they do the fallacy of an ill and shabby attempts to conceal the obvious.

The proposals contained in the amendment brought by Mr. Tusiime, to extend the term of Parliament and that of District Local Council were not contained in the Report of the Committee of Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee, otherwise they would have been part of its recommendations.

Ms. Jane Kibirige testified in Court, and stated that as the Accounting Officer of Parliament she is the only one who could have originated a letter requesting for a Certificate of Financial Implications. She did not write the letter in question.

There was nothing in the Hansard, to indicate that before Mr. Tusiime proposed the amendment as he did, similar proposals had earlier been made and adopted as recommendations of the Committee of Legal and Parliamentary Affairs upon which Mr. Gaster Mugoya could have based his letter. The letter did not satisfy the requirements of Section 76 of the Public Finance Management Act and those of Article 93 of the Constitution. The letter requesting for a Certificate of Financial Implications was written by a person without authority to do so a prankster I would call him. The Certificate issued in response to the letter was therefore in my view invalid. It also appears to have been a forgery or an afterthought and a very poor one at that.

Therefore the amendment to the bill, as introduced by Mr. Michael Tusiime, was and remains invalid, null and void, Parliament having proceeded upon it and passed it without having first obtained a valid Certificate of Financial Compliance as required by the law. With no hesitation in finding that, the Tusiime amendment to the bill contravened Article 93 of the Constitution.

The question on Retroactive application of Act 1 of 2018

Whether Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the impugned act are unconstitutional in so far as they were applied retroactively

Hobbes theory of social contract appears to me to have been more suited to a feudal system than a democracy. It is quite evident from the Constitution itself that the people through the Constitution are supreme. The Executive, the Parliament and the Judiciary and other state organs and agencies are not supreme but they are subject to the people through the Constitution. It seems to me that the relationship between the people and the Parliament is that of principal and agent. The people appoint agents through an election process with specific mandate set out in the Constitution. The people retain the power to determine how they are governed. Parliament, therefore, has no absolute power to legislate in any way it desires even if it has an absolute majority because legislative powers remain vested in the people. The majority in Parliament must exercise power within the confines of the Constitution, bearing in mind that they do not legislate for themselves or for the Political Party to which they belong, but for all the people the living and those yet unborn. The individual interests of each Member of Parliament must, therefore, take the back seat in regard to constitutional amendments.

In all Constitutions Uganda has had since independence the people have given Members of Parliament a mandate of only five years. Every five years, the mandate expires and has to be renewed by the principal, through an election.

The last time the people renewed the agency of each and every individual member of the current Parliament was during the 2016 general elections. The agency of the President was also renewed at the same time for the same period. The Constitution provided so. The President, all political party candidates, independent candidates campaigned and sought the mandate of the people for five years on the basis of their respective five years' programmes.

All the manifestos for all political parties presented their five years' programmes to the people prior to the general elections. This was the basis of their campaign upon which they sought from their principal the people of Uganda a fresh five year mandate in Parliament. The same applied to all independent candidates. The NRM manifesto in this regards states: - > "In February 2016, the people of Uganda will participate in yet another important general election. It is now a democratic tradition in Uganda to hold elections every five years so that the people exercise their right to choose their leaders at all levels — Local Government, Parliament and President.

>
> Having been overwhelmingly elected in 2011, the NRM is now seeking the renewal > of the electoral mandate to continue serving the people with diligence and dedication. Therefore, it is presenting itself and her candidates for President, Parliament, Local Government, Youth, Women, People with Disabilities and Older People's Councils — to the people of Uganda.

>
> In this manifesto, the NRM lays out the policies and programmes, which will guide the NRM Government over the next five years following its reelection by the people of Uganda.
> Consolidate the establishment of the rule of law
> Increase people's participation
> Empower women and the youth
> Promote freedom of speech and worship
> Hold regular free and fair elections, and consolidate of equity" (Emphasis mine)

Having been elected on a five-year contract, Members of Parliament could not, and had no power to extend their own term of office for an extra two years, as the mandate given to them in 2016 was for only 5 years. More importantly, neither the members of Parliament nor the President have any political agenda approved by the people for the extra two years.

While determining a similar issue Karokora JSC in Ssemogerere and 4 others vs Attorney General; Constitutional Appeal No.1 of 2002, firmly put is as follows:-

> "It is the people of Uganda who are sovereign and exercise their sovereignty through the Constitution. It is the Constitution, not the Parliament nor Executive nor Judiciary which is supreme. Each of these organs can only exercise the jurisdiction conferred on it by the Constitution. None can confer 0n itself jurisdiction not authorised by the Constitution."
> Under 1995 Constitution, independence of organs of state must go with responsibility and accountability. Each of these organs must be transparent and accountable in their operations. Under Articles 1 and 2 people are sovereign and exercise their sovereignty through the Constitution which is Supreme Law or Uganda and has a binding force on all authorities and persons throughout the country."(Sic)

We are bound by the above decision and I also share the sentiments expressed by the learned Justice of the Supreme Court. This position of law has not changed. I find that Parliament by enacting Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the Constitution Amendment Act 1 of 2018 and providing in that law that they would operate retroactively contravened Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitution.

The question of Reasonableness and justification

Whether Parliament acted reasonably and was justified when it introduced Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the impugned Act.

Parliament having been irrational and as such in total contravention of Articles 1, 2(1) and 2(2) and 8A of the Constitution. Irrational because, the amendment of the Constitution, extending the term of Parliament to 7 (seven) years was brought in bad faith, the justification for the amendment had nothing to do with the principles of national interest, and common good of the people of Uganda. The amendment appears to have been based solely on the self interest of members of Parliament.

The amendment was not proposed by the people. It was not discussed in the select Committee and was not mentioned in that Committee's Report to the House. It did not form part of the original draft bill. It did not form part of the bill that was published in the gazette and presented to Parliament. The justification was stated by Mr. Michael Tusiime to be:-

> "Because during the first two years, members of Parliament are getting acclimatised to parliamentary proceeds, conducts and businesses.
>
> Secondly, other members of Parliament in the first two years are still held up in Courts of law defending their status. Accordingly most members settle in the third year to start serious parliamentary business. During the fourth year, members of Parliament are preparing for primaries within their political parties, for another election and the fifth year is all eaten up by the general elections. This means Parliament has only one year to engage in serious parliamentary business."

This justification for the extension of the term of Parliament has absolutely nothing to do with the will and aspirations of the people of Uganda. It is bluntly in the self interest of the Members of Parliament and as I have already stated, it is irrational. The people of Uganda did not elect Members of Parliament for them to go and learn Parliamentary rules and procedures for two years. That is why the law provides for minimum qualification for Members of Parliament.

Mr. Tusiime appeared to suggest that Members of Parliament are either unknowledgeable or unqualified. I do not accept that our Members of Parliament are unknowledgeable or unqualified. All Members of Parliament are well qualified. The majority have post graduate qualifications. It would not be an exaggeration to state that, Parliament has a concentration of the best brains in this Country, almost in all disciplines. Some Members of Parliament have been in the House for 10 years or more. It cannot therefore be true that the same people require two years to study and understand Parliamentary rules and procedure.

In 1962, Members of Parliament were able to debate intricate issues and pass legislation without precedents. From the reading of the Hansard of 1962-1967 and 1967 to 1971, excerpts of which I have reproduced earlier, the level of debate, the language, the ethics and etiquette was only comparable to that of British House of Commons. I am hesitant to say the same of the current Parliament. Perhaps it was for this very reason that Mr. Tusiime moved the motion that he did. If that be the case, probably a Parliamentary pre-entry aptitude examination would have remedied the mischief. There is no absurdity in supposing that had Parliament passed legislation tightening the qualifications of its members, the Constitution would have in this respect been left intact and the ends of justice would have been met.

There was no reasonable justification as to why Members of Parliament would amend the Constitution to grant themselves two more years on top of their current five years simply to get acclimatised to Parliamentary procedure, conduct and business. Having done so, for the learned Deputy Attorney General to simply insist that, the amendment was the reflection of the will of the people, whom the Members of Parliament had consulted, using 'Ipads'.

The reason why Parliament has to give justification for the passing of a law is the legal requirement that the law must be rational and its enactment must be desirable. In the case of a constitutional amendment law, it must also be in national interest and for the common good of the people as provided for under Article 8A(1) which provides that:-

> "Uganda shall be governed based on principles of national interest and common good enshrined in the national objectives and directive principles of state policy."

Mzolo, Nkosinathi a South African Author, in his essay "The Rule of law, the principle of legality and the test for rationality: a critical analysis of the South African jurisprudence in the light of the separation of power" noted as follows:-

> "…the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa provides that all actions will only be valid if they comply with the rule of law as a constitutional value thereof. However this is not to imply that other values of the constitution like transparency, openness and accountability are less important than the rule of law but most litigation has occurred under rule of law, hence why the focus of this thesis is on the rule of law. Under this legality principle, there are a lot of principles like the principle of authority, but rationality appears to be the most significant and the courts have focused mostly on it. In defining what legality rationality is, our courts have pronounced that it is a legal safety-net applicable to every exercise of public power but more particularly where no constitutionally defined right has been violated, it protects individuals against the abuse of power…"

The amendment introduced into the bill, by Mr. Tusiime was not rational, not justifiable, and was not based on national interest and the common good of the people of Uganda as required by the Constitution.

The framers of our Constitution, in their wisdom, anticipating that such bizarre circumstances may arise in future, granted power to this Court to guard the gates of justice and to defend the Constitution from any such affront. We are now required to do so. With a sword in one hand and scales of justice in the other, this Court stands guard at the gates of justice to declare as I do that: - the extension of the term of Parliament and that of the District Local Councils from 5 to 7 years as provided for retroactively, under Sections 2, 8, 6 and 10 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act (Act 1 of 2018) is null and void abnitio and has no effect.

Question of the Re -introduction of Presidential term limits

Whether or not Section 5 of the impugned Act, which reintroduced into the Constitution, a term limit for the President and entrench the same is constitutional

The Hansard which is annexture 'F' to Petition No. 10 of 2018, Prosper Businge & 3 others vs Attorney General, sets out the proceedings of Parliament on 20th December, 2017 that gave birth to Section 5 of the impugned Act as follows:-

> "MR NANDALA-MAFABI: I want to move an addition of a new clause. Madam Chairperson, since you allowed hon. Michael Tusiime to raise an amendment, I want to bring an amendment to Article 105 of our Constitution to introduce term limits -[Members: Aye] - thank you. I want to say that a person shall not hold office as President for more than two terms. In addition to that, this should take effect from the next Parliament. We do not want to count this Parliament; we want this one to be entrenched as (f) in chapter 5 under amendment - entrench it as chapter 7, Article 105 (I) and (2). I beg to move."

This amendment coming on the same day the bill was passed into law had no input from the public. It was not accompanied with a Certificate of Financial Implications and as such contravened Article 93 of the Constitution.

It is contended by the petitioners that, the amendment also directly amended Article 260 which stipulates as follows:-

> 260. Amendments requiring a referendum.
>
> (1) A bill for an Act of Parliament seeking to amend any of the provisions specified in clause (2) of this Article shall not be taken as passed unless—
>
> (a) it is supported at the second and third readings in Parliament by not less than two-thirds of all members of Parliament; and
>
> (b) it has been referred to a decision of the people and approved by them in a referendum.

(2) The provisions referred to in clause (1) of this Article are—

(a) this Article; (Emphasis mine)

(b) Chapter One—Articles l and 2;

(c) Chapter Four—Article 44;

(d) Chapter Five—Articles 69, 74 and 75;

(e) Chapter Six—Article 79(2);

(f) Chapter Seven—Article 105(1);

(g) Chapter Eight—Article 128(1); and

(h) Chapter Sixteen .

Article 260 being an entrenched Article cannot be amended by Parliament without first being approved by the people in a referendum. Since the words of Article 260 are plain and clear I will not belabour its interpretation.

During the debate the learned Deputy Attorney General warned Members of Parliament that the proposed amendment would require a referendum under Article 260 to no avail. Having been passed and realising that it was unconstitutional a futile attempt was made to present the amendment as a separate clause under Article 105. I say futile because, Section 5 of the impugned Act by implication, attempts to amend Article 260 without the amendment bill first being referred to a decision of the people in a referendum. I accept the submissions of Mr. Mabirizi, that such amendment, also referred to a colorable legislation is unacceptable. This was the holding by the Supreme Court in Ssemogerere & others Attorney vs General Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 2002 in which:-

> "In the instant case the parliament transplanted the nullified provision of section 121 of the Evidence Act see Major General David Tinyefuza Vs Attorney General (supra) and into section 5(2) of the Act 13/2000.
>
> Whereas Parliament had powers under Article 259 of the constitution to amend any provisions of the Constitution, I agree with Mr. Lule (SC)'s submission that the amendment brought about by section 5(2) of the Act 13/2000 had the effect of amending Articles 1, 2(1) (2), 28, 41, 44 (c) and 128 (1) of the Constitution by implication/infection. A number of decided cases from common Law Jurisdiction illustrate amendments by infection."

Further, Karokora JSC went on to state that:-

> "In my view, if it was to be otherwise, Parliament could amend any provisions of the Constitution, including the entrenched provisions without complying with the prescribed procedure in chapter 18 of the Constitution as long as it avoided mentioning them in the amending Act.

Now, the question is whether Act 13/2000 amended Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitution. Article 1 of the Constitution provides:-

"1. All powers belong to the people who shall exercise their sovereignty in accordance with this constitution. Article 2 of the Constitution provides: -

"2 (1) the Constitution is the Supreme Law of Uganda and shall have binding force on all authorities and persons throughout Uganda.

(2) If any other law or any custom is inconsistent with any of the provisions of this constitution, the Constitution shall prevail, and that other law or custom shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be void."

The provisions of these Articles are very clear. It is the people of Uganda who are sovereign and exercise their sovereignty through the Constitution. It is the Constitution, not the Parliament nor executive nor judiciary which is supreme. Each of these organs can only exercise the jurisdiction conferred on it by the Constitution. None can confer on itself jurisdiction not authorised by the Constitution."

In the above cited appeal, the Supreme Court upheld the minority decision of the Constitutional Court and re-echoed with approval of the Judgment of Twinomujuni JA when he stated that:-

"The above amendment section (5) (2) of Act 13/2000) which amended Article 97 of the Constitution can only survive in a jurisdiction where parliament, like in United Kingdom, is supreme... In Uganda today, the amendment amounts to a coup against the sovereignty of the people and the Supremacy of the Constitution. It cannot exist side by side with Articles 1 and 2 in the same constitution. It contravened the two Articles and Parliament alone cannot pass such amendment unless it first consults the people in a referendum in accordance with chapter 18 of the constitution. I would hold that although section 5 (2) of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 13/2000 did not expressly and specifically name Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitution as being amended, yet it had the effect of repealing or varying the Articles and therefore it amended them by necessary implications"

In this particular case, the impugned Section 5 of Act 1 of 2018, did not just amend Article 260 of the Constitution by effect, infection or impliedly. It amended it directly by introducing therein a new clause 105(2). In Ssemogerere and Another vs Attorney General (Supra) on this very point, Order JSC stated as follows:-

"In the instant case the effect of Article 97 (2) and (3) as amended by section 5 of Act 13/2000 is to restrict the citizens' access to information in the hands of Parliament subject to the absolute discretion of Parliament to release or not to release the information. In my view the provisions of section 5, conflict with the right of access to information, guaranteed by Article 41. They are, therefore, null and void.

Act 13/2000 expressly amended Article 41 by the introduction of the new clauses (2) and (3) to Article 97. Part of the appellant's case is that other Articles of the Constitution were amended by implication or infection. These are Articles 1, 2(1) and (2), 28, 44 (c), 128 (1), (2) (3) and 137 (3). The respondent's contention is that these Articles were not amended, just as Article 41 was not amended, because the preamble to Act 13/2000 did not specifically state that they were to be amended.

Amendment of the Constitution is provided for by Article 258 of the Constitution, the provisions of which are to the effect that the Constitution can only be amended if an Act of Parliament is passed for that purpose; the Act has the effect of adding to, varying or repealing any provision of the Constitution; and the Act has been passed in accordance with the provisions of Chapter Eighteen of the Constitution. To me, it follows that if an Act of Parliament has the effect of adding to, varying or repealing any provisions of the Constitution, then the Act must be said to have amended the affected Article of the Constitution. The amendment may be effected expressly, by implication or by infection, as long as the result is to add to, vary, or repeal a provision of the Constitution. It is immaterial whether the amending Act states categorically that the Act is intended to affect a specified provision of the Constitution or not. It is the effect of the amendment which matters."

In the same case Kanyeihamba JSC who delivered the lead Judgment held:-

"In my opinion, the requirements of Chapter Eighteen are mandatory and cannot be waived, not even by Parliament. Consequently, and with the greatest respect, the majority of the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law in holding that those provisions could be waived and that in any event, they were not essential to validating any constitutional amendment. Be that as it may, it is apparent that Parliament failed to comply with the Constitutional provisions when attempting to amend by implication or infection Articles 2(1), 28, 41(1), 44(c), 128(2), (3) and 137(3). Any amendments to Articles 2(1), 44 and 128 need to be referred to a decision of the people for approval by them in a referendum. The amendment of the Articles 28, 41(1) and 137(3) need to be passed by two-thirds majority on each of the second and third readings of the bills. Thereafter, a bill must be accompanied by the certificate of the Speaker to the effect that it has been passed in accordance with the provisions of Chapter Eighteen. Since the respondent has persistently denied that any of these Articles and clauses were amended, the Attorney General was hardly in a position or mood to show that these provisions were properly amended and indeed, in my opinion, he failed to do so.

Regarding the provisions which the respondent admits to have been expressly amended, namely Articles 88, 89, 90 and 97, it is my view that their amendment failed to comply with the provisions of the Constitution in that the bill effecting their amendment should have been accompanied by a certification by the Speaker of Parliament indicating that the bill had complied with the provisions before the Presidential Assent. In my opinion since the respondent failed to prove that the Constitution was complied with, the amendment failed to become an Act of Parliament and consequently, cannot be regarded as part of the Constitution."

Needless to point out that this is a matter that has been determined already by the Supreme Court in the above cited cases. I agree entirely with the above decision, in any event I am bound to follow the decision of the Supreme Court, as provided for Under Article 132 (4) of the Constitution.

I am constrained to go beyond the letter of the impugned legislature, because it is desirable to do so in the circumstances of this case since the process of enacting the impugned Act is being challenged. The impugned Bill as presented by Raphael Magyezi did in fact list Article 260 being one of those that it had directly amended. However, Article 260 did not appear in the final bill that eventually became the law. Instead the Nandala Mafabi amendment was placed under Article 105 of the impugned Act. The Clerk to Parliament during cross- examination, did state that a bill must reflect exactly what is set out in the Hansard and the first Parliamentary Counsel cannot amend or alter that record. At page 5263 *of the Hansard of 20th December 2017.*It is recorded as follows;-

"REPORT FROM THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE HOUSE

8.57

MR RAPHEAL MAGYEZI (NRM, Igara County West, Bushenyi): Madam Speaker, I beg to report that the committee of the whole House has considered the Bill entitled "The Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Bill, 2017" and passed the entire Bill with amendments and also introduced and passed new clauses- amending Articles 77, 181, 29, 291, 105 and 260. I beg to report."

It is apparent for the above excerpt that the Magyezi bill listed Article 260 as one of those that had been amended. Why the same did not eventually appear in the impugned Act, is self evident. It was removed by the Attorney General for the reasons he gave on the floor of Parliament. That remained a hollow and futile attempt to conceal that what is obvious to the legal mind.

There is no doubt, therefore, that Article 260 was amended by the impugned Act either directly or indirectly or both.

Therefore that Section 5 of the impugned Act is unconstitutional as it contravened Article 260 of the Constitution and I hold so.

QUESTION of Whether or not Sections 3 and 7 of the impugned Act which removed the 75 year age limit of the President and lowered age limit of District Chairpersons from 35 to 18 years is unconstitutional.

Although the thrust of the original Magyezi bill, as set out in its preamble, and the justification that followed later, was to amend Articles 102 (b) and 183 (2) b of the Constitution, the constitutionality of those amendments as subsequently set out in Sections 3 and 7 of the impugned Act was only challenged in Petition No. 5 of 2018, Hon. Karuhanga Kafureeka Gerald & 5 Others vs Attorney General and Petition No. 10 of 2018, Prosper Businge & 3 others vs Attorney General.

All the other Petitions challenged the constitutionality of the entire process of enacting the impugned Act they did not directly challenge Sections 3 and 7.

The petitioners contended in Petition No.5 of 2018 paragraph 14(d) thereof as follows:-

> "(b)That Section 3 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2017 in as far as it purports to lift the minimum and maximum age qualification of a person seeking to be elected as President of the Republic of Uganda is inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 79, 90 and 94 of the Constitution.
>
> (d) That Section 7 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2017 in as far as it purports to lift the minimum and maximum age qualification of a person seeking to be elected as a district chairperson is inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 79, 90, 94, and 259 of the Constitution."

In reply therein to the respondent in his answer to the petition replied in paragraph 17(d):-

> "(b) The Respondent denies that Section 3 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 which lifts the minimum and maximum age qualification of a person seeking to be elected as President of the Republic of Uganda is inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1,3, 8A, 79, 90 and 94 of the Constitution of Uganda.
>
> (d) The Respondent denies that Section 7 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 which lifts the minimum and maximum age qualification for a person seeking to be elected as district chairperson in inconsistence with or in contravention of Articles 1,3, 8A, 79, 90, 94 and 259 of the Constitution of Uganda.

I have found nothing to suggest, let alone prove that Parliament cannot, through the established constitutional process, vary the qualifications of the President or that of the District Chairperson. The qualifications of the President and those of Chairpersons District local governments do not in my view form part of the basic structure of the Constitution which I set out earlier in this Judgment. I, therefore, accept the submissions of the Hon. Learned Deputy Attorney General that Sections 3 and 7 of the impugned Act are not inconsistent with or in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 79, 90 and 94 of the Constitution.

The people of Uganda, through their Constitution, should be able to freely, whenever it is absolutely necessary to do so, vary the qualification of their leaders. These qualifications include but are not limited to citizenship, age, and academic qualifications. The same ought to apply to the disqualifications of the same leaders. It may be, for example, found necessary in future to require every Presidential candidate to be computer literate, fluent in both English and Swahili and at least two local languages the list is endless.

The framers of the Constitution did not and for good reason, find it necessary to entrench the provisions that relate to qualifications and disqualifications of the President and /or members of Parliament. I have read the Odoki report excerpts of which I have produced earlier in this Judgment. Nowhere in the report did the people of Uganda, suggest, propose or debate, the age limit of the President. This issue appears for strange reasons to have sprung up during the Constituent Assembly debate.

Be that as it may, it eventually found its way into the Constitution. For that reason alone, I would not regard it one of the basic structures of our Constitution.

The Magyezi bill, as first tabled in Parliament, covered two specific areas in the Constitution. The first was Article 102 and 183 in respect of the age limits for the President and Chairpersons of District Local Councils, the second was in respect of Articles 61, 104 in respect of the recommendations of the Supreme Court in Amama Mbabazi vs Yoweri Kaguta Museveni and Others; Supreme Court Election Petition No. 1 of 2016.

None of the petitioners presented any serious challenge to the constitutionality of the original bill as first presented. I have already found that it was not in- contravention of or inconsistent with Articles 1, 2 and 8A of the Constitution. There was evidence that a Certificate of Financial Implications was properly obtained and was indeed available before the motion to introduce the said bill was proceeded with upon in Parliament. It was suggested by the Petitioners that, the Supreme Court's directions were issued to the Hon. The Attorney General and not to anyone else and as such only him could have initiated a constitutional amendment bill in compliance thereto.

This argument does not appeal to me in the least. If the Hon. The Attorney General was to neglect his duty or simply went to sleep, would the Country grind to a constitutional stand still? I do not think so. That is why in their wisdom, the framers of the Constitution provided for private members bills.

In Greenwatch vs Attorney General & NEMA; High Court Civil Suit No. 140 of 2002 the High Court directed the Attorney General to initiate a law to regulate the importation, manufacture and use of plastics. The Attorney General, to my knowledge, has never brought such law. The impact of plastics on the environment and on the lives of Ugandans is a mess. In my view, nothing would stop any Member of Parliament from sponsoring a private members bill to bring into effect the order and recommendation of the High Court in the above cited case in fact there was an attempt to do so.

The only serious issue raised against the original Magyezi bill is that, it was vitiated by the introduction of the Tusiime and Nandala Mafabi amendments, extending the term of Parliament and that of the District Local Councils, and the reintroduction and entrenchment of the Presidential term limit, which I have already dealt with earlier in this judgment.

Further, that the entire process of conceptualising, consulting, debating and enacting the whole of the impugned Act was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles, 1, 2, 3(2), 8A, 93, 160 and the spirit of the Constitution

I will now proceed to determine whether the impugned Act may be saved by severing therefrom Sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10 and retaining Sections 1, 3, 4 and 7. I have found no reason why the impugned Sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10 cannot be severed from the impugned Act the same having been declared unconstitutional and retain remaining sections. This is possible, because, *Sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9*and 10 were introduced later into bill. It follows therefore that Sections 1, 3, 4 and 7 which constituted the original bill would be able to still stand on their own, after the impugned Sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10 which were introduced later have been removed.

However, I have to consider all the pleadings and submissions in respect of the procedural and substantive issue raised and determine whether or not they vitiated the impugned Act as whole rendering it unconstitutional, the above notwithstanding.

In his affidavit in support of the petition Ssemujju Ibrahim depones as follows: -

15. THAT on the 26th day of September, 2017, the Speaker of Parliament, the Rt. Hon. Rebecca Alitwala Kadaga, contrary to the ruling of Deputy Speaker, amended the order paper to include a motion by Hon. Raphael Magyezi that sought leave of Parliament to introduce a private member's Bill to amend the Constitution to among others amend Article 102(b) of the Constitution to remove the age limit. (See copy of the Hansard dated September 26th 2017 hereto attached as Annexture "E".

16. THATthe decision of the Speaker of Parliament to amend the Order Paper to include a motion by Hon. Raphael Magyezi that sought leave of Parliament to introduce a private member's Bill was inconsistent with and in contravention of Rules 8, 27, 29, 174 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament, Article 94 of the Constitution of Uganda.

17. THATshadow Minister for Constitutional Affairs Hon. Medard Lubega Sseggona asked the Speaker why Hon. Raphael Magyezi's motion that was submitted on September 21st 2017 was being placed on the Order Paper first ahead of Hon. Patrick Nsamba's which was submitted on September 18th and met all the requirements first, something the Speaker ignored. (See copy of the Hansard dated September 26th 2017 hereto attached as Annexture "E").

In reply thereto, Jane Kibirige the Clerk to Parliament stated in her affidavit in support of the answer to the petition as follows: -

11. THATin specific reply to paragraphs 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 28, 29, 30, 31 of the affidavits of Ssemujju Nganda, Munyagwa Mubarak, Odur Jonathan, Gerald Karuhanga and Winfred Kizza I know that under the provisions of Rule 24 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament of Uganda the Speaker of Parliament has the authority to determine the order of business of the House.
12. THAT in further response to paragraph 16 of the affidavit of Hon Ssemujju Nganda, paragraph 12 of the affidavit of Munyagwa I know that the provisions of Rule 165 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament which provides for the functions of the House Business committee are subject to Rule 24.
13. THAT in specific reply to paragraph 17 of the affidavit of Ssemujju Nganda I know that according to the Rules of Procedure of the Parliament of Uganda a motion for introduction of Private Members' Bill takes priority over a motion such as that which the Hon. Patrick Nsamba proposed to move.

What transpired in Parliament is set out clearly in the Hansard, copies of which are annexed to the affidavits of the petitioners in Petition No. 5 of 2018.

"MOTION SEEKING LEAVE OF PARLIAMENT TO INTRODUCE A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT BILL TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION

THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, I indicated earlier that these motions are not for substantive debate; they are just seeking leave.

MR SSEGGONA: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise on two points of procedure. The first -

THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, can you take off your bandanas.

MR. SSEGGONA: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Earlier on, I rose on a point of procedure and you over ruled me – I agree that my procedural point was premature.

Madam Speaker, this is the greatest test in our lives as Members of Parliament. Members of this House petitioned you on various dates, seeking for your indulgence to be placed on the Order Paper, and you clearly read out the order of presentation of these motions and the notices. The notice and motion of Hon. Nsamba was the first in time. Your office received both the notice and the motion accompanying the notice before the notice presented by Hon. Raphael Magyezi.

Madam Speaker, this is a difficult time for us as a Parliament. Earlier, I asked whether it would not be procedurally correct that you deal with the first motion and we deal with the motions in their order of presentation.

The second procedural question, – and maybe for avoidance of doubt – arises out of rule 26 of our Rules of Procedure. Rule 26(1) states thus:

"(1) The Clerk shall send to each Member a copy of the Order Paper for each sitting -

(a) in the case of the first sitting of a meeting, at least two days before that sitting.

(b) in the case of any other sitting, at least three hours before the sitting without fail."

We received the Order Paper without this particular motion and when we appeared here, Madam Speaker, you used your power to amend the Order Paper. My understanding, and this is where I seek your procedural guidance, is that you can only amend and issue an Order Paper a minimum of three hours before the sitting and without fail.

Why am I very insistent on this, Madam Speaker? Apart from my own reputation as a Member of this House and the institution of Parliament, I am more deeply concerned about my Speaker and I insist, my Speaker. You have sailed us so well so far. However, this time, we are concerned that you are being stampeded by Members –(Interjections)- if I am one of them, I apologise – to have their business added onto the Order Paper, contrary to the manner stipulated by the rules. I seek your guidance.

THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, when this matter began, I was out of the country. The Speaker presiding then, on the Floor of this House, informed you that I had received these notices and the motions and that a date would be appointed. That was before I came back. So, you received notice.

MR SSEGGONA:We did not have this motion on the Order Paper, Madam Speaker. Actually, the presiding Speaker was categorical that we would never be ambushed. If we could not be ambushed by anyone else, how about our very own? I think we are moving the wrong way.

MR SSEKIKUBO: Thank you, Madam Speaker. As you are aware, I am a seconder of the motion by Hon. Patrick Nsamba and our motion is for a motion for a resolution of Parliament urging Government to urgently constitute a constitutional review commission. This was moved under rule 47 of our Rules of Procedure.

Our motion and notice were received on 18 September 2017. You are aware that the motion you are giving space now to come before ours was only submitted on 22 September 2017, four days after our motion and notice were submitted to your office and the office of the Clerk.

Madam Speaker, rule 26(3) provides thus, and I would like you to listen to this, Members: "The Clerk shall keep a book to be called Order Book in which he or she shall enter and number in succession all matters intended for discussion at each meeting." If that book can be brought here, it will show how our motion was brought in first, four days before hon. Magyezi brought in his notice and motion.

Madam Speaker, we pray for your fairness. We are all backbenchers in this matter and even our motion is ready for debate. We are not even seeking leave but we are ready for debate. Allow us just a few minutes to move our motion -

THE SPEAKER: Hon. Ssekikubo, you will move your motion. I also want to remind you that under our rules, Bills take priority.

MR SSEKIKUBO: Yes, Madam Speaker. However, at this stage, it is still a motion. There is no Bill yet on the Floor of Parliament. It is a mere motion."

Following this exchange, the Speaker adjourned the house to Wednesday 27th September at 2.00 p.m. The relevant part of the proceedings of Parliament on that day are set out in the Hansard as follows: -

"MOTION SEEKING LEAVE OF PARLIAMENT TO INTRODUCE A PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILL ENTITLED, "THE CONSTITUTIONAL (AMENDMENT) BILL, 2017"

THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, before the motion is moved, I would like to reiterate that what is happening here is only seeking leave. There is no amendment being done today. It is a question of seeking leave to bring a Bill. When the Bill is printed, gazetted, brought here for first reading and sent to the committee, that is when the process will start. For now, this is just seeking leave.

MR RAPHAEL MAGYEZI (NRM, Igara County West, Bushenyi): Thank you. Madam Speaker, I beg to move a motion under rules 47, 110 and 111 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament seeking leave of this House to introduce a private Members' Bill under Article 94(4)(b) of our Constitution for a Bill entitled, "The Constitutional (Amendment) Bill, 2017."

From the above proceedings, it is evident that the Rt. Hon Speaker of Parliament erred when she proceeded with the motion of Mr. Magyezi, on 27th September 2018 instead of proceeding with the motion of Mr. Nsamba which had been received earlier as required by the Rules of Parliament.

She also erred when she amended the order paper to specifically introduce therein and include the motion of Mr. Raphael Magyezi without sending the same to Members of Parliament at least three hours before the sitting. Rule 26(1) clearly stipulates that, this requirement must be fulfilled "at least three hours before the sitting without fail" I find that this mandatory requirement was not complied with.

This Court has held before in Oloka-Onyango & others (supra) and the Supreme Court in Ssemogerere vs Attorney (Supra), that Parliament must comply with its own Rules. This is not without a history which is referred to in the Preamble to the Constitution.

In view of our Constitutional history especially what transpired on 15th April 1966, when Parliament enacted an interim Constitution without having debated it or even seen it, the 1995 Constitution requires Parliament, while conducting its business, especially passing any legislation to comply strictly with all the legal procedures set out in the law and with its Rules that is the ratio decision of the Oloka-Onyango and Others Vs Attorney General (Supra) in which an act of Parliament was declared unconstitutional on account of Parliament having failed to comply with its own Rules and Procedures. See also: Paul Kawanga Ssemogerere and Others Vs Attorney General Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No.1 of 2012 (supra) specifically page 57 of the Judgment of Odoki CJ.

In this case it failed to do so, even when the Rules set out were couched in mandatory terms and the members had brought to the attention of the Speaker the specific Rules that Parliament was required to comply with.

It was submitted for the petitioners and by Mr. Mabirizi as set out in his Petition and on paragraphs 146, 147, 148, 149 and 150 of his affidavit in support of his Petition that Parliament erred when it failed to observe Rule 201(2) of its own Rules, which requires that: -

> "(2) Debate on a report of a Committee on a bill, shall take place at least three days after it has been laid on the Table by the Chairperson or the Deputy Chairperson or a Member nominated by the Committee or by the Speaker."

It was further submitted that, during the debate, the learned Deputy Attorney General, Hon. Mwesigwa Rukutana, moved a motion to suspend that Rule, which motion was not seconded. They asked this Court to find that Parliament, failed to comply with the said Rule of procedure during the enactment of the impugned Act in the result that said Act is a nullity.

I have perused the Hansard, specifically the proceedings of the 18th December 2017. The excerpts relevant to this issue are reproduced below.

> 10.56
>
> THE CHAIRPERSON, COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND PARLIAMENTARY AFFAIRS (Mr .Jacob Oboth): Madam Speaker, I beg to lay on the Table a copy of the main report before I make the presentation, which is accompanied by the minutes of the proceedings of the committee.
>
> THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, take your seats. The practice of Parliament _
>
> MR. OBOTH: Madam Speaker, I also beg to lay on the Table copies of stakeholders , submissions.
>
> Madam Speaker, this is the report on the Constitutional (Amendment) (No.2) Bill, 2017, which was read for the first time, on the 3rd October 2017, and subsequently referred to the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs for scrutiny.
>
> Madam Speaker, by the time this matter was referred to our committee, it was under rule 110 of our old Rules of Procedure, which is now rule 120 of the new Rules of Procedure. The reference made to rule 110 is the same in wording with rule 120.
>
> Madam Speaker, since this report was uploaded on the iPad, could you guide me on whether I should read it verbatim or go to the main observations and recommendations? I seek your guidance.
>
> THE SPEAKER: Just a minute. Hon. Karuhanga, what is your procedural point? The rest of you sit down.

MR KARUHANGA: Thank you, Madam Speaker. My point of procedure is specifically on rule 201(2) of the new Rules of Procedure. Rule 201(2) provides that, "Debate on a report of a committee on a bill, shall take place at least three days after it has been laid on the Table by the Chairperson or the Deputy Chairperson or a Member nominated by the Committee or by the Speaker ."

Madam Speaker, the procedural point I am raising is specifically from rule 201 (2). The chairperson of the committee laid the report a few minutes ago and the rule instructs that once the report of the committee on a Bill is laid on the Table by the chairperson or deputy chairperson or a Member nominated by the committee or by the Speaker, the debate shall ensue three days later.

Madam Speaker, the coining of this particular rule is mandatory in nature. The language here is "shall". I would like to believe that when we were passing these rules, a situation like this had been anticipated and the curing of it was well coined to stop any mob justice of sorts that may ensue.

Therefore, I would like to believe equally that this was intended to allow us, as Members, to deal with all the issues and objections, to analyse, study, assess and consult because we represent the people of Uganda so that when we come here, we speak for Ugandans and not ourselves (Applause)

THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, ever since the Ninth Parliament, we agreed to use less paper and that is why we bought you iPads. Last week, on Thursday, I directed the Clerk to upload all these reports on your iPads so this rule does not apply.

THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Mr Mwesigwa Rukutana): Madam Speaker, I beg to move that for the elaborate reasons you have given, rule 201 of our Rules of Procedure of Parliament be suspended so that we can proceed with the debate - (Interjections)

THE SPEAKER: Order! Please take your seats first.

MR. RUKUTANA: With the establishment of e-communication, when Members of Parliament were availed with iPads, the rule no longer serves any useful purpose. This is because that rule was intended to ensure that Members of Parliament take note of what is coming on the Floor. For that reason, Madam Speaker, I beg to move, under rule 16 of the Rules' of Procedure of Parliament, that rule 201(2) be suspended. (Interjections)

THE SPEAKER: Order! Honourable members, I would like to remind you about rule 88 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament: your conduct in this House.

MR. SSEKIKUBO: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise on a point of procedure. This House is guided by rules and we hold these rules dear because any House without rules is bound to hit trouble.

Madam Speaker, it is for that reason that when we are debating these matters, whichever side of the political divide you are, we should listen to one another. (Applause)

However, you all know that once a Member raises a point of procedure, it is also proper that a Member is listened to. I am raising a critical matter and I raise it in accordance with rule 154(1) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament. The rule provides that, "Except as provided by these rules in respect to the Business Committee, Appointments Committee and the Budget Committee, a Member shall not belong to more than two Committees ...

This goes down to the root of the reports we make before this House, Madam Speaker. In regard to rule 154(1); the first rule on page 149 of the Rules of Procedure. I beg your pardon, Members. Let us reach there together; do not worry, we shall reach there. It is rule I54(1), page 149. It says, "Except as provided by these rules in respect to the Business Committee: Appointments Committee, and the Budget Committee, a Member shall not belong to more than two committees ...

Madam Speaker, I have herewith the report of the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs, chaired by hon. Oboth. However, the Members who signed the report - it is fatal that Members who belong to other committees were imported to this committee. For what reasons - you may have wanted to have the majority on the committee but the moment you endorse a report when you are not a Member of the committee, it is fatal to the report - (Interjection). I am mentioning it here but I would like to agree with Members that once you do that, the findings of the report become fatal.

Madam Speaker, in my hand is the list of Members of the Committee on Defence and Internal Affairs, where the said Members participated in party activities and got stationary from the committee. To our surprise, they appended their signatures to this report. The Members under contention include hon. Lilly Akello and hon. Akampurira Prossy Mbabazi who both sit on the Committee of Defence and Internal Affairs.

> Members here can bear me witness that before they went for a retreat in Entebbe, we were together inspecting Katuna and Mirama Hill and they participated as Members of the committee. To that extent, I would like to request hon. Tumwebaze, who has been vocal, to challenge me on this.
>
> Madam Speaker, with that, how do we proceed with this report that has mercenaries that were brought to append their signatures? These members belong to the Committee of Defence and Internal affairs but appended their signatures to the report.
>
> Madam Speaker, this is the procedural matter I would like you to look at. I beg to lay on the Table the list of members who sit on the Committee on Defence and Internal Affairs. The rule is very clear that you cannot belong to more than one committee. Therefore, this report cannot proceed to be debated. I rest my case."

According to the Hansard, the debate went on without the motion raised by the Deputy Attorney General having been seconded or voted upon. It appears from the record that the Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament had at the time the motion to suspend Rule 201(2) was moved, ruled that, she had already given the notice required under Rule 201(2) to members electronically through their Ipads (hand held computers).

Rule 201(2) has been reproduced above. It is couched in mandatory terms. It requires that Members of Parliament to be given sufficient time to read and internalise a report of a committee on a bill before debating on it. Again we have to go back to our history and remind ourselves that, Parliament ought not to be stampeded into passing any law and more so Constitutional Amendment Bill.

I observe that this rule is not one of those that cannot be suspended. However, this rule was not suspended as the motion which sought to suspend it was not seconded by anyone as required by Rule 59, of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament which stipulates thus; -

> "59. Seconding of motions
>
> (1) In the House, the question upon a motion or amendment shall not be proposed by the Speaker nor shall the debate on the same commence unless the motion or amendment has been seconded.

The Speaker of Parliament with all due respect failed to apply Rule 201(2) which is mandatory. I accept the submission of Counsel in this regard that "laying on the table" means physically presenting the bill on the table of Parliament and does not include sending an electronic copy to members. I note that, Parliament amended and adopted new Rules as recently as October 2017. Had Parliament intended to amend Rule 201 to take into account "electronic notice", or "electronic laying on the table" it would have done so, since according to the Hon. Speaker, the practice was already in place. The fact the Rule remained unchanged following the 2017 amendment means that, there was no intention to adopt a new procedure or turn the existing practice into law. Therefore, the submissions of the Hon. The Deputy Attorney General on the floor Parliament that when the Members of Parliament were availed with Ipads Rule 201 no longer serves any useful purpose has no legal basis.

I therefore, find that, Parliament while passing the impugned Act, failed to comply with Rule 201(2) of its Rules of Procedure, which is mandatory. I find that failure contravened Article 94(1) of the Constitution and as such vitiated the whole process of enactment of Act 1 of 2018.

The petitioners also submitted that, Parliament contravened Rule 154(1) of its Rules of Procedure when it allowed members belonging to other committees of Parliament to sit on its Committee on Legal and Parliamentary affairs and when those members were permitted, signed the report of that committee, regarding the impugned bill now Act 1 of 2018.

Rule 154(1) provides as follows:-

> "(1) The House shall have Standing Committees and Sectoral Committee as provided in this part of Rules."

Rule 154(2) (1) provides as follows: -

> "(1) Except as provided by these rules in respect to the Business Committee, Appointment Committee, and the Budget Committee, a Member shall not belong to more than two Committees."

And Rule 155(2) provides as follows: -

> "(2) Except as provided by these rules in respect of the Business Committee and the Budget Committee, a member may not be a Member of more than one Standing Committee."

What transpired in Parliament during the debate on this issue, is set out in the Hansard, of Wednesday 18th December 2017 as follows: -

> "MR SSEKIKUBO: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise on a point of procedure. This House is guided by rules and we hold these rules dear because any House without rules is bound to hit trouble.
>
> Madam Speaker, it is for that reason that when we are debating these matters, whichever side of the political divide you are, we should listen to one another. (Applause)

However, you all know that once a Member raises a point of procedure, it is also proper that a Member is listened to. I am raising a critical matter and I raise it in accordance with rule 154(1) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament. The rule provides that, "Except as provided by these rules in respect to the Business Committee, Appointments Committee and the Budget Committee, a Member shall not belong to more than two Committees."

This goes down to the root of the reports we make before this House, Madam Speaker. In regard to rule 154(1); the first rule on page 149 of the Rules of Procedure. I beg your pardon, Members. Let us reach there together; do not worry, we shall reach there. It is rule 154(1), page 149. It says, "Except as provided by these rules in respect to the Business Committee, Appointments Committee, and the Budget Committee, a Member shall not belong to more than two committees."

Madam Speaker, I have herewith the report of the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs, chaired by hon. Oboth. However, the Members who signed the report - it is fatal that Members who belong to other committees were imported to this committee. For what reasons - you may have wanted to have the majority on the committee but the moment you endorse a report when you are not a Member of the committee, it is fatal to the report – (Interjection). I am mentioning it here but I would like to agree with Members that once you do that, the findings of the report become fatal.

Madam Speaker, in my hand is the list of Members of the Committee on Defence and Internal Affairs, where the said Members participated in party activities and got stationary from the committee. To our surprise, they appended their signatures to this report. The Members under contention include hon. Lilly Akello and hon. Akampurira Prossy Mbabazi who both sit on the Committee of Defence and Internal Affairs.

Members here can bear me witness that before they went for a retreat in Entebbe, we were together inspecting Katuna and Mirama Hill and they participated as Members of the committee. To that extent, I would like to request hon. Tumwebaze, who has been vocal, to challenge me on this.

Madam Speaker, with that, how do we proceed with this report that has mercenaries that were brought to append their signatures? These Members belong to the Committee of Defence and Internal Affairs but appended their signatures to the report.

Madam Speaker, this is the procedural matter I would like you to look at. I beg to lay on the Table the list of Members who sit on the Committee on Defence and Internal Affairs. The rule is very clear that you cannot belong to more than one committee. Therefore, this report cannot proceed to be debated. I rest my case.

THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, this morning, hon. Ssekikubo objected to the names of two of the Members of the House on grounds that they belong to more than one sessional committee. I have had time to check the records and these are my findings:

On 29 November 2017, on the Floor of this House, the Government Chief Whip designated the following Members to serve on the standing committees and others to sessional committees:

1. Hon. Herbert Kabafunzaki, Rukiga County, ICT sectoral committee
2. Hon. Prossy Akampurira, Rubanda County, Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee
3. Hon. Taban Idi Amin, Kibanda County North, Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee
4. Hon. Rose Lilly Akello, Kaabong, Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee
5. Hon. Suubi Asinde, Iganga, Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee
6. Hon. Caroline Kamusiime, Rukiga County, Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee
7. Hon. Grace Watuwa, Namisindwa, East African Community Affairs
8. Hon. Jane Avur Pachuto, Pakwach, Committee on Foreign Affairs
9. Hon. Robert Kasule, Nansana Municipality, Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee.

On the same day, the Government Chief Whip again nominated the same Members to the following standing committees:

1. Hon. Herbert Kabafunzaki, Committee on HIV/AIDS
2. Hon. Prossy Akampulira, Committee on Rules and Privileges

3. Hon. Rose Lily Akello, Kaabong, Committee on Rules and Privileges
4. Hon. Suubi Asinde, Iganga, Committee on Government Assurances
5. Hon. Caroline Kamusiime, Rukiga, Committee on Government Assurances
6. Hon. Grace Watuwa, Namisindwa, Committee on Local Government Accounts
7. Hon. Jenifer Pachuto, Packwach, standing Committee on Budget
8. Hon. Taban Idi Amin, Kibanda North, standing Committee on Local Government Accounts
9. Hon. Robert Kasule, Nansana Municipality, COSASE.

On the same day, the Opposition Chief Whip, Hon. Ibrahim Ssemujju nominated hon. Robinah Ssentongo of Kyotera to the sessional Committee on Health and to the standing Committee on Local Government Accounts.

Honourable members, the question was put on all these names and was accepted on the Floor of this House. (Applause)

I have inquired as to why the honourable member went out with the Committee on Defence and Internal Affairs and I have been told that she had been facilitated to go for a site meeting with that committee before she was nominated to the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs. Having received the money, she felt obliged to go and fulfill that obligation.

Honourable members, this is an issue of accountability. You have been complaining here that Members receive money and do not go for the trips. By the way, honourable members, those that are saying that she should return the money, remember that Members are free to attend any committee as long as they do not vote.

I know that on the Appointments Committee, I have had several Members coming to sit and listen in. The right of the members to attend cannot be fettered. They cannot vote but they can attend; so she was lawfully on that committee because you accepted it on 29 November, 2017. (Applause)

MR NIWAGABA: Madam Speaker, I move under rule 86 (2) of our Rules of Procedure to give notice to the House that we, on the Opposition side, shall move a substantive motion tomorrow to challenge that decision because of the available matters of evidence in our possession, including attendance sheets and signatures of the Member in issue in respect of committee meetings.

The Hansard shows that when this Member was designated to the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs, she was not formally withdrawn first from the committee, where she was earlier allocated. Therefore, we will move a substantive motion to challenge that decision based on the rules and the evidence we have.

I, therefore beg, Madam Speaker that you allow us space tomorrow at a time to be given by you for us to present that substantive motion.

THE SPEAKER: What is the motion about because you are talking about the decision of the Speaker?

MR NIWAGABA: To review your decision, Madam Speaker -

THE SPEAKER: Which decision?

MR NIWAGABA: Through rule 86(2) of our Rules of Procedure; the ruling you have just made.

THE SPEAKER: I am restating what you did on 29 November 2017. That is what you agreed to in this House.

MR NIWAGABA: Madam Speaker, the evidence we have is contrary to your ruling. We cannot appeal against your decision but your decision can be reviewed by the House when we bring it here

THE SPEAKER: Take it to the Committee on Rules, Privileges and Discipline. On 29 November 2017, this House, in my absence, decided that those Members are moving to those committees; so it cannot be under rule 86.

MR SSEGGONA: Madam Speaker, I think with your permission, you have a duty to guide. In light of Rule 86 (2) of our Rules of Procedure, if I am not satisfied with your decision, where do I go? I am asking the Speaker because I know she knows.

THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, this is a decision of the House not of the Speaker. You sat here on 29 November 2017 and took that decision; so it is not the Speaker's decision. That rule is not applicable.

MR SSEKIKUBO: Madam Speaker, in my possession is a set of evidence and it is not my strong point to put back a matter that you seem to have taken a position on. However, if I could be allowed to draw your attention to particular facts in relation to this matter -

THE SPEAKER: Hon. Ssekikubo, that is an issue for the Committee on Rules, Discipline and Privileges. If she has misconducted herself, take her to that committee."

From the above excerpts, it is very clear that some Members of Parliament who were not originally on the Legal and Parliamentary committee when the impugned bill was sent to it for consideration, later joined it while they were still Members of other committees.

With all due respect, to the Rt. Hon. Speaker, her Ruling that the issue should be treated as simply indiscipline had no legal justification. It is clear from the excerpts above that some members who signed the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee report in respect of the impugned bill which was later enacted into law, were not legally members of that committee. This is a legal matter that has an impact on the validity of the process of enacting legislation. It is not an issue of discipline.

I am, however, unable to find that, in ordinary circumstances failure to comply with Rule 155 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament, would vitiate the proceedings of a Parliamentary committee in view of the provisions of Article 94 (3) of the Constitution which provides that:-

(3) The presence or the participation of a person not entitled to be present or to participate in the proceedings of Parliament shall not, by itself, invalidate those proceedings.

In this particular case however, the said members who were not entitled to seat of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee not only participated but also voted and signed the report. Article 94(3) does not in my view extend to voting as this would go to the root of decision making. In this particular case, the committee's opinion was split in the result that dissenting members had to issue a minority report. Members of the committee had to vote. Only members could do so. See: Rule 193 and 201 of the Rules of Parliament reproduced in the judgment of my sister Elizabeth Musoke JCC.

Invariably a minority report is as a result of numbers. It could as well be that in absence of all persons not entitled to participate, the minority would perhaps have constituted the majority. For this reason alone, I find that non-compliance with Rule 154(1) Parliament vitiated the whole process of enacting the impugned Act.

It was again submitted for the petitioners that Parliament offended Rule 72 of its rules also known as "the Subjudice Rule" when it proceeded to hold a debate on issues that were pending before a Court of law touching on the impugned bill, now Act 1 of 2018.

I have perused the pleadings. I have not found any evidence to prove that there was a pending suit or Court proceeding at any time during the debate in respect of the impugned Act. On the Court record before me I have not been able to find any Court pleadings, proceedings or any other evidence by affidavit or otherwise to support this contention. I would have expected to see an affidavit by the Registrar of the concerned Court confirming that there were indeed civil or criminal proceedings pending before Court at the time, but no such evidence was availed. I am unable to find that the Parliament violated Rule 72 of its Rules.

Mr. Male Mabirizi, the petitioner in Petition No. 49 of 2017 contended in paragraphs 175,176,177 ,178 and 180 of his affidavit in support of the Petition as follows: -

"175. THATit was visible that the 3rd reading of the bill was done contrary to the constitution since the constitution requires separation of the 2nd reading and the third reading with at least 14 sitting days of parliament, which never lapsed.

176. THAT Iknow that the framers of the constitution were sober in making this requirement in the constitutional amendment and the speaker cannot be allowed to circumvent that intention.

177. THAT the intention was to enable members consult more, rethink and conduct further research about the intended amendment.

178.THAT by the speaker conducting the two readings in the same evening, moreover at night, she committed 'rape' against the constitution since most of the members, who were in parliament from 9.00am in the morning were exhausted by the time of the voting on third reading after 11pm in the night.

180. THAT; Iknow that the failure by the speaker of parliament to separate the 2nd reading of The Constitutional Amendment Bill
No.2 of 2017 and the 3rd reading by at least fourteen sitting days of parliament was inconsistent with and in contravention of Article 263 of the Constitution which require Parliament to separate the 2nd and 3rd readings by at least 14 sitting days of Parliament."

It is undisputed and evident from the Hansard of 20th December 2017 that the 2nd and 3rd readings of the impugned Constitution (Amendment) Bill were done on the someday.

In her affidavit in support of the answer to the Petition the Clerk to the Parliament Ms. Jane Kibirige accepts that indeed the 2nd and 3rd readings of the impugned Bill were made on the someday, 20th December 2017. However, she contends in paragraph 39 of the said affidavit that:-

"I have been advised by our legal Counsel in Attorney General's Chambers which advice I verily believe to be true that the statutory period of 14 (fourteen) days between the 2nd and 3rd readings was not applicable to the Constitution (Amendment) No.2 Bill of 2017."

She did not substantiate. The respondent in its address to Court did not provide us with any authorities to back up its advice to Parliament.

This is not surprising, as the respondent's case has always been that the impugned Act did not in any way Amend Article 260, therefore the Provision of Article 263 did not apply. This issue is now moot as I have already found that, Article 260 was amended by the impugned Act, by implication. I have already determined the issues relating to the amendment of Article 105 to which this complaint related. Had I found that the amendment of Article 105 was constitutional, I would have found that the procedure of passing it into law required compliance with Article 263. As l have already stated above that this is all now moot.

The other issue raised by the petitioners is that, Parliament failed to give effect and to comply with the provisions of Article 1, 2 and 8A of the Constitution. It is contended by the petitioners that,

Parliament did not in the entire process of enacting the impugned Act, purposefully and meaningfully consult and involve the people of Uganda. Mr. Ssemuju Nganda a petitioner in Petition N0.5 of 2018, in his affidavit in support of the Petition paragraphs 24 (a), (b) and (c) deponed as follows:-

"24. THAT I am a Member of the Committee on legal and Parliamentary Affairs to which the impugned Constitution (Amendment) Bill was referred to for scrutiny by the Speaker during the sitting of Parliament on October 23rd 2017 with instructions to involve (consult widely) the people of Uganda because in the Speaker's wisdom the matter touched Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitution. (See copy of Hansard dated October 3rd attached hereto and Marked 'J')

That the committee on legal and parliamentary affairs in internal meeting drew a program, and budget for national consultation and divided its members.

That the committee even met the Speaker Rt. Hon Kadaga requesting for funds to carry out consultations and she promised to avail the same.

That I was shocked when the vice chairperson of the committee on legal Hon. Robinah Rwakojo hastily called another internal meeting and proposed that we retreat in Entebbe to write a report on the Bill before consultations were done contrary to the ruling of the Speaker of October 3rd 2017."

In reply to the above Ms. Jane Kibirige the Clerk to Parliament deponed in her affidavit in support of the answer to the Petitions as paragraphs 28, 29, 30 and 31 as follows:-

"28. That I know that Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament then referred the Constitution (Amendment) (N0.2), Bill 2017 to the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs of Parliament and informed Members of the House that owing to the fact that the proposed amendments touched on Articles 1 & 2 of the Constitution, the people were to be consulted on the proposed Bill to see their views.

29. That in specific reply to paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 15(a), 16(a) of the affidavits of Ssemujju Nganda, Munyagwa S. Mubarak, Ssewanyana Allah, Odur Jonathan, Gerald Karuhanga and Winifred Kizza I know that the process leading to the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 was preceded by wide public consultations both by the Committee of Legal and Parliamentary Affairs of Parliament and individual Members of Parliament.

That I know that the consultations were carried out in accordance with the provision of Articles 38 and 90 of the Constitution so that the civic participation of the people is exercised directly by themselves or indirectly by their elected representatives and civil society, interest groups were afforded an opportunity to present their views on the bill.

That I now that under the auspices of Article 90(3) Parliament consulted the public on the proposals made in the Constitution (Amendment)(No2), Bill, 2017 as exemplified by-

(i) the consultations done by the committee on legal and Parliamentary Affairs of Parliament during bill scrutiny which extended invitations to all interested parties to appear before it to give their views on the proposal in the Bill.

(ii) the request by the Clerk to Parliament, who, through both print and electronic media, invited the general public to provide written memoranda on the contents of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2017; and Parliament facilitation of Members of Parliament to consult their constituents on the proposals made in the Bill."

I have already discussed the relevance and importance of public participation in the constitutional process, specifically in respect of a Constitution Amendment. I have already stated that, in my humble view, public participation is one of the basic structures of our Constitution. Public participation, therefore cannot be wished away or taken lightly by Parliament.

Parliament was certainly well aware of this constitutional requirement when, the Speaker, herself on October 3rd 2018, cautioned Members of Parliament to comply with Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitution in the process of enacting the impugned Act. She stated at page 4791 of the Hansard of the Tenth Parliament on Tuesday, 3rd October 2017 as follows: -

"THE SPEAKER: Honourable members, the Bill is sent to the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs. However, I would like to remind you, honourable members, that this matter touches Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitution; people must be involved in this deliberation. Thank you." (Emphasis mine)

The affidavits of Jane Kibirige, Margret Muhanga Mugisha, James Kakooza, Moses Grace Balyeku, Lokeris Samson, Henry Musasizi Ariganyira, Ongalo Obote Clement Kenneth, Tumusiime Rosemary Bikaako and the submissions of Counsel for the respondent in this regard all point to the fact that the respondent considered public participation to be a key constitutional requirement in the passing of the impugned Act. The question this Court is required to determine is whether or not the people of Uganda effectively participated in the entire process of enacting the impugned Act as required or envisaged under Articles 1, 2 and 8A of the Constitution.

On Wednesday 27th September, Mr. Raphael Magyezi, The Hon. Member of Parliament representing Igara County West, Bushenyi District, moved a motion seeking leave of Parliament to introduce a private members bill under Article 94(4) b of the Constitution, entitled "The Constitution (Amendment) Bill, 2017. On Wednesday 20th December 2017, that bill was passed into law by Parliament, and on 27th December 2017, it was assented to by the President.

From the beginning to end, the whole process took 85 days including weekends and public holidays. The bill was before Parliament on the following days 27th September, 3rd October, 18th December, 19th December and 20th December 2017 a total of 5 (five) days. The bill was read out for the first time on 3rd of October 2017. It was then referred to the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs for scrutiny. The report of that committee was received by Parliament on 18th December 2017, debated on that day, and also on the following day 19th December 2017. It was subsequently passed into law on 20th December 2017.

The Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs therefore was able to scrutinize the bill, seek views of the people of Uganda, involve them in the process and write a report including a minority report in 75 (seventy five) days. That is two and half months including weekends and public holidays considering that it may have taken the committee at least 15 (fifteen) days to put together the information and data gathered and to write both reports, then the time spent collecting views for Ugandans could not have been more than 6o (sixty) days taking into account weekends and public holidays. I do not consider, two months to be sufficient time for Parliament to seek views of Uganda taking into account the following facts:-

The information provided by Electoral Commission on its official website indicate that in 2016 General Elections, there were,

Registered voters - 15, 277, 198

Parliamentary Constituencies - 290

Number of Districts - 112

Sub –Counties – 1, 403

Parishes – 7, 431

Villages – 57, 842

In addition to the above, there are a number of Constitutional and statutory bodies, different categories of interest groups, at all levels including, the women, the youth, persons with disabilities, workers, the Armed forces, Political parties including those not represented in Parliament. There are also other established and organised interest groups that include Civil Society Organisations Community Based Organisations, established churches and Moslem faith Council and organsiations, the academia, Ugandans living in the Diaspora, Professional Associations, students and student organizations, among others. The Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee report set out the list of the stake holders it was able to consult at page 4 as follows:-

1. Hon. Raphael Magyezi (MP) Igara West
2. Equal Opportunities Commission
3. Ministry of Justice & Constitutional Affairs

4. The Rt. Hon. Prime Minister of the Republic of Uganda;
5. Uganda Law Reform Commission;
6. The Electoral Commission:
7. The National Resistance Movement Party
8. The Democratic Party;
9. The Conservative Party;
10. Dr. Mwambutsya Ndebesa
11. Justice Forum -JEEMA
12. Professor Tarsis Bazana Kabwegyere
13. Leader of the Opposition (LOP)
14. Uganda Local Government Association (ULGA)
15. Uganda Association of Uneducated persons (TUAUP)
16. Cpt. Ruhinda Maguru Daudi II
17. University School of Psychology
18. Mr. George W. Bakka
19. Mr. Gilbert Mutungi
20. Mr. Moses Mfitumukiza
21. Mr. Egole Lawrence Emmy
22. Fr. Peter Bakka
23. Mr. Langoya Alex
24. Mr. Owachgiu Richard
25. Maj. Gen. Rtd. General Jim Muhwezi
26. FRONASA Veterans
27. Society for Justice and National Unity (SoJNU)
28. Prof. Venansius Baryamureeba
29. Prof. F. E Ssempebwa
30. Mr. Peter Mulira
31. Hon. Amanya Mushega
32. Dr. Tanga Odoi
33. Kick All Age Limits Out of the Constitution (KALOC)
34. Centre for Information Research and Development
35. Hon. Kenneth Lubogo
36. Masindi District Local Government Council
37. Mr. Fred Guweddeko

38. Buganda Region NRM Youth Voluntary & Advocacy Mobilizers (BREVOM)
39. Guild Presidents' Forum on Governance (GPFOG)
40. Mr. Gabula Sadat
41. Kampala Business Community Informal Sector (KBCIS)
42. Kampala Arcades Traders Association (KATA)
43. Wansanso Kibuye Co-operative Saving & Credit Society Ltd
44. Kampala Operational Taxi Stages Association (KOTSA)
45. Kampala Tukolebukozi Timbers Association (KATUTA)
46. Nakivubo Road Old Kampala (Kissekka) Market Vendors Ltd
47. Uganda Mechanics and Engineering Association
48. Urban Community Vector Control Group (UCOVEC)
49. Uganda Markets & Allied Employees Union (UMEU)
50. Hon. Thomas Tayebwa.
51. St. Balikuddembe Market Stalls, Space & Lock Up Shops Owners Association Ltd
52. Uganda Printing and Publishing Corporation
53. Minister of Finance, Planning and Economic Development

These above are the only stakeholders who were able to present their views to that committee. They are 22 individuals and eight Government ministries, commission or agencies including the Rt. Hon Prime Minister in his official capacity, four political parties, the leader of the opposition Parliament and one District Local Government. The rest appear to be a collection of obscure and amorphous groups, that include Fronasa Veterans, Uganda Association of uneducated person, Kick all Age limit out of the Constitution and others.

With all due respect to the members of the committee referred to above, for them to suggest that the above persons and groups are the stake holders representing the whole of the people of Uganda as envisaged under Article 1 of the Constitution, in view of our past history, is unfortunate to say the least. I must state here that I have restrained myself from using a stronger language. I say so because of the Electoral Commission statistics from the 2016 General Election I have reproduced above. Since the number of persons consulted as individuals were only 22, it means that it represents about 0.0001375% of the registered voters. Even if all the 455 Members of Parliament were added to this list of those assuming they were all consulted and debated the motion, which they did not, the percentage of people consulted in relation to registered voters would still be less than one percent. They would be 0.8194 percent to be exact of the voters registered in 2016.

I am alive to the fact that the passing of a bill into law does not require the input of every individual Ugandan, or even every Member of Parliament. However, every bill requires public participation that is purposeful, well intended and meaningful. What happened in this case appears to have been just window dressing, even then a very clumsy one.

The framers of our Constitution, the people of Uganda, were not contended with simply the right to vote in a free and fair election as the only expression of their will. They expressly provided in the Constitution for a wider role in the democratic process by people. In Articles 1, 2 and 8A of the Constitution, the people reserved for themselves a role in the legislative process as had been echoed by President Museveni in his maiden speech on the steps of Parliament on January 29th 1986, which I have reproduced earlier in this Judgment.

The same sentiments were repeated by the people of Uganda during the Constitution making process as set out in the Odoki Report (Supra). This was a complete departure from the past when only Parliament and the President (during Amin's regime) had the unquestionable power to legislate. Parliament having abused that power in 1966, 1967, 1971, and 1979, the people in 1995 Constitution decided to retain that power themselves under Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Constitution and only to delegate part of it to Parliament under Article 79.

Since Uganda and the Republic of South Africa have both gone through a history of tyranny and oppression, it is pertinent that I reiterate the words of Ngcobo J, of the Constitutional Court of South Africa who wrote the lead Judgment in Doctors for life international and other the Speaker of National Assemble and other CCT/12/05 wherein he stated as follows: -

> 115. In the overall scheme of our Constitution, the representative and participatory elements of our democracy should not be seen as being in tension with each other. They must be seen as mutually supportive. General elections, the foundation of representative democracy, would be meaningless without massive participation by the voters. The participation by the public on a continuous basis provides vitality to the functioning of representative democracy. It encourages citizens of the country to be actively involved in public affairs, identify themselves with the institutions of government and become familiar with the laws as they are made. It enhances the civic dignity of those who participate by enabling their voices to be heard and taken account of. It promotes a spirit of democratic and pluralistic accommodation calculated to produce laws that are likely to be widely accepted and effective in practice. It strengthens the legitimacy of legislation in the eyes of the people. Finally, because of its open and public character it acts as a counterweight to secret lobbying and influence peddling. Participatory democracy is of special importance to those who are relatively disempowered in a country like ours where great disparities of wealth and influence exist.

> 116. Therefore our democracy includes as one of its basic and fundamental principles, the principle of participatory democracy. The democratic government that is contemplated is partly representative and partly participatory, is accountable, responsive and transparent and makes provision for public participation in the law-making processes. Parliament must therefore function in accordance with the principles of our participatory democracy. (Emphasis mine)

Neither the Constitution nor any other law prescribes the nature and scope of public participation. Parliament is granted the discretion to determine how best to fulfill this Constitutional requirement. This Court however, under Article 137(3) (b) is clothed with the power to determine whether any act or omission by any person or authority contravened the Constitution. I must emphasize here that the word "omission". It appears to me here that we are dealing with the issue of Parliamentary omission. It is quite evident, in my humble view, that the Constitution may be violated by omission of any person or authority. In this case we are dealing with Parliament as an authority established by this Constitution, having failed to permit, facilitate, ensure and carry out meaningful public participation in the process of amending the Constitution.

We can only use and apply an objective test to determine the above question. Parliament on its part set out its own subjective test and declared that it had complied with the constitutional requirement of public participation when it received presentation from 53 individuals and groups listed above and when it paid money to Members of Parliament to go out and consult the people on the impugned bill. This Court under Article 137 has the final say as to whether or not the Parliament passed the Constitutional public participation test. Left on its own it is apparent Parliament will tend to use a subjective standard as is evidenced by the affidavit of Jane Kibirige in reply to the Petition No. 49 of 2018 Male Mabirizi vs Attorney General, already reproduced above.

What is required is for this Court to determine parameters of an objective standard of public participation in the legislative process without being intrusive or crossing the Constitutional boundary of separation of powers.

The Constitution gives us a guide to the objective test, when in Article 20 it provides that: -

> "20. Fundamental and other human rights and freedoms.
>
> (1) Fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual are inherent and not granted by the State.
>
> (2) The rights and freedoms of the individual and groups enshrined in this Chapter shall be respected, upheld and promoted by all organs and agencies of Government and by all persons."

The rights of citizens to participate in democratic process is a social, economic and political right.

Parliament has a duty to uphold and promote this right. Therefore, in my humble view, there is no limitation to the right to participate in the legislative process except as provided for under Article 43(2) (c) of the Constitution. It provides: -

> "43(2)(c) any limitation of the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms prescribed by this Chapter beyond what is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society, or what is provided in this Constitution."

The only limitation, therefore, that Parliament can impose on the people's right to participation in the legislative process is:

> "What is acceptable and democratically justifiable in a free and democratic society or what is provided in this Constitution."

The Supreme Court discussed in detail the meaning and scope of Article 43(2) in Onyango Obbo & Another vs Attorney, Supreme Court Constitution Appeal No.2 of 2002. I will not endeavor to rephrase all that was stated in that decision but rather I have reproduced what Mulenga JSC stated:-

> "It is common ground that the protection of the right to freedom of expression is subject to Article 43,
>
> The provision in 43 (1) is couched as a prohibition of expressions that "prejudice" rights and freedoms of others and public interest. This translates into a restriction on the enjoyment of one's rights and freedoms in order to protect the enjoyment by "others", of their own rights and freedoms, as well as to protect the public interest. In other words, by virtue of the provision in clause (1), the constitutional protection of one's enjoyment of rights and freedoms does not extend to two scenarios, namely: (a) where the exercise of one's right or freedom "prejudices" the human right of another person; and (b) where such exercise "prejudices" the public interest. It follows, therefore, that subject to clause (2), any law that derogates from any human right in order to prevent prejudice to the rights or freedoms of others or the public interest, is not inconsistent with the Constitution. However, the limitation provided for in clause (1) is qualified by clause (2), which in effect introduces "a limitation upon the limitation". It is apparent from the wording of clause (2) that the framers of the Constitution were concerned about a probable danger of misuse or abuse of the provision in clause (1) under the guise of defence of public interest. For avoidance of that danger, they enacted clause (2), which expressly prohibits the use of political persecution and detention without trial, as means of preventing, or measures to remove, prejudice to the public interest. In addition, they provided > in that clause a yardstick, by which to gauge any limitation imposed on the rights in defence of public interest. The yardstick is that the limitation must be acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society. This is what I have referred to as "a limitation upon the limitation". The limitation on the enjoyment of a protected right in defence of public interest is in turn limited to the measure of that yardstick. In other words, such limitation, however otherwise rationalised, is not valid unless its restriction on a protected right is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society."(Emphasis mine)

The above provides the broad principle. However, in practice Parliament has to apply the well known and established subjective test of research in the process of actualising the people's right to public participation. The process of public participation in my humble view is required to pass the SMART test. That is, it has to be Specific, Measurable, Attainable, Relevant and Time bound. I will now endeavor to apply this test to facts before us.

I now proceed to apply the facts before to ascertain whether or not they pass the objective SMART test.

The respondent in a bid to prove that there was indeed sufficient public participation during the process that led to the enactment of the impugned Act, filed 8 affidavits deponed to by the following persons:-

1. Mugisa Margaret Muhanga
2. Jane Kibirige
3. James Kakooza
4. Moses Grace Balyeku
5. Lokeris Samson
6. Henry Musasizi Ariganyira
7. Ongalo Obote Clement Kenneth
8. Tumusiime Rosemary Bikaako

For clarity and posterity, I am constrained to reproduce the evidence adduced by each of the above witnesses in their endeavor to prove that the people of Uganda participated in the debate that led to the enactment of the impugned Act 1 of 2018.

The relevant parts of the affidavit of Margaret Mugisa Muhanga reads as follows:-

> 9. That in specific response to paragraph 10 of the affidavit of Prosper Businge and related paragraphs 3 & 4 of Herbert Mugisa, 4 and 5 of Thomas Mugara Guma and 3,4& 5 of Pastor Vincent Sande, I went to my constituency and held numerous consultative meetings regarding the proposed constitutional amendments in 15 sub counties in Burahya county with, inter alia, the district councilors youth leaders, sub county Chairpersons and the general population of Burahya County on various dates.

10. That on 5th October, 2017 a consultative meeting was held with youth leaders in Burahya County , Kabarole District, A copy of the minutes of meeting held on 5th October 2017 and pictures of my constituents who attends the meeting are attached hereto and marked as annexture 'A' & 'B'.
11. That on 7th October 2017, I held consultations with sub-county leaders regarding the proposed amendments in the Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Bill of 2017 and it was agreed and resolved that the people of Burahya County would be consulted and sensitized through radio talk shows and their views about the age limit debate popularly termed "Gikwateko, Togikwatako" sought . A copy of the minutes of the meeting held with sub county leaders on 7th October 2017 are attached hereto and marked as Annexture 'C'.
12. That on 2nd November 2017 I held further consultative meetings with LCIII Chairperson of each sub county within my constituency including Karago town council, Busoro, Karambi, Karangura, Kasenda, Kijura town council Bukuku, Ruteete, Kicwamba, Harugongo, Hakibaale, Mugusu and Kabende sub county and among others in Kabarole District. A copy of the minutes of the meeting held on 2nd November 2017 and the attendance list are hereto attached and marked as annexure 'D'.
13. That I know that in all the sub counties that I went to, save for a few opposing voices, the overwhelming majority of my constituents feely, willingly and openly expressed their support for the Constitutional (Amendment) (No.2) Bill of 2017.
14. That I hereby stated that consultations in Burahya county were conducted peacefully with no interference and on 19th of December 2017 when the August House convened and the debate was called, I voted yes in support of the Constitutional amendments with the full mandate of the people of Burahya county, Kabarole District.

The relevant parts of the affidavit of Jane Kibirige the Clerk to Parliament reads as follows:-

32. That I know that on the 18th of December 2017 the August House reconvened after the consultations with the general Public and I also know that Constitutional (Amendment) (No.2) Bill of 2017 was read in Parliament for the second time. A copy of the Hansard depicting the proceedings in parliament date 18th, 19th& 20th December are hereto attached and Marked 'D', 'E' and 'F' respectively.

33. That I know that the Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament then invited the Chairperson on the committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs to respond to queries raised by the August House why the committee considered two issues i.e. the term limits and the issue of adjusting the term of the President and Parliament that were not originally in the Constitutional (Amendment) (No.2) Bill of 2017 presented by Hon. Raphael Magyezi.

34. That I know that the Hon. Jacob Oboth, the Chairperson, of the committee on legal and Parliamentary Affairs then made his presentation to the House and he informed the House that the Committee gathered the views from the consultation process and submissions from their inter alia the Leader of Opposition and her team, the Rt. Hon. Prime Minister, Civil Society.

35. That in specific response to paragraph 26 of the affidavit of Ssemujju Nganda, the Chairperson of the committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs categorically stated on record to the House, that there was nothing in the Report of the committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs that the committee did not get through the process of consultation and consideration of Bill.

36. That in further response to paragraph 26 of the affidavit deposed by Ssemujju Nganda, I know that Chairperson of the committee on Legal and Parliamentary affairs cited an example of the Prof. Fredrick Ssempebwa, who was quoted in both the majority and minority report, having made persuasive submissions before the committee on the presidential term and age limits.

37. That I know that in specific response to paragraph 24 (c) of the affidavit of Hon. Ssemujju Nganda I know that it is not true that the Vice Chairman of the committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs of Parliament acted contrary to the directive of the Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament to carry out national consultations.

James Kakooza on his part deponed as follows:-

3. THAT I know that when the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill 2017 was first tabled and read in Parliament, the Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament granted all Members of Parliament leave to go and consult on the proposed amendments to the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995.
4. THAT I know that Parliament dispatched Ug. Shs. 29,000,000/= (Twenty nine million shillings) to the Bank accounts of each Member of Parliament to facilitate the consultation process.

5. THAT when I received the said facilitation, I proceeded to draw a program for the consultation meetings to be conducted and I proceeded to my constituency, Kabula County, prepared a program and run radio announcements calling upon the people of Kabula County Constituency to attend the consultative meetings.
6. THAT I held consultative meetings in each and every Sub county (Gombolola) within my constituency including Kasagama Sub county, Kaliiro Sub-county among others in Lyantonde District.
7. That in all the Sub-counties that I went to, save for a few negative responses, the overwhelming majority of my constituents freely, willingly and openly expressed their support for the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill 2017.
8. That I conducted the last consultations with the District leadership where the District council even passed a resolution supporting the amendment of the Constitution.
9. That I know that the consultations in Kabula Constituency were conducted peacefully with no interference in the form of beatings arrests and or brutality from officers of the Uganda Police or the Uganda People's Defence forces (UPDF).
10. That on the above basis, when the Bill was presented on the floor of Parliament, I voted YES as advised by my constituents.

Lokeris Samson, sets out the facts relating to this issue in his affidavit as follows:-

3. THAT in the month of October 2017, the Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament dispatched all Members of Parliament leave to go and consult on the proposed amendments to the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995; as contained the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2, Bill, 2017.
4. THAT Iknow that Parliament through the Parliamentary Commission facilitated the consultation process of each Member of Parliament.
5. THATon the 25th October, 2017 I proceeded to my constituency, Dodoth East, where I made a program with my Political Assistant with the object of how to consult the Community in my Constituency by way of physical contact with the Public of consultative meetings, rallies at sub counties and at the kraals.
6. THAT Ithen proceeded to conduct several consultative meetings.
7. THAT I first held meetings with the Elders and clan leaders, these were at Oyoro, Lotem, Kathile south and Kalapate sub counties.

8. THAT Ilater proceeded to Morulem, Moruita and Lolelia kraals, that at each of these meetings I explained to the People in my Constituency the matter of Constitution Amendment.
9. THAT I made the Electorate and all the Public understand the proposed amendments to the age limit presidential terms, how the amendment was being initiated and undertaken through the guidance of the Constitution.
10. THAT Imet the NRM structures comprising of officials from the village level to the constituency level, I explained to them the details of the proposed amendments to the Constitution and I also carefully listened to their views
11. THAT Icarefully explained to them the purpose of the consultations a majority of them advised that I should support the Constitutional (Amendment) Bill No.2 of 2017.
12. THATat each of these meetings I let them vote on their views the majority of them agreed that we should proceed and amend or 'Touch it.
13. THAT Ialso met the elected leaders in the Constituency including Councilors at all levels such as LC 1 Chairpersons and all Local Councils Executives up to the District level including the LCV and as I had done before with the other groups, I took them through the proposed amendments and yet again, they with an overwhelming majority advised me to second and vote for the proposed amendments.
14. THAT in reply to the allegations of alleged beating, torturing of people, using tear gas and firing of live bullets in an attempt to disperse people as stated in the Affidavit of Hon Winfred Kizza at Paragraph13(x) and (y), I know that the consultations in Dodoth East were conducted peacefully with no interference in the form of beatings, arrests and or brutality from officers of the Uganda Police or the Uganda People's Defence Forces (UPDF).
15. THAT I further know, in these consultations I had held two meetings with Hon Akello Rose Lilly the Kaabong Woman Member of Parliament where nobody was beaten tortured and or arrested as alleged.
16. THATwhen we returned to Parliament against the overwhelming recommendations of my people I voted YES as advised by them.

Moses Grace Balyeku, deponed as follows on this issue of public consultations.

3. That on 3rd October 2017, the Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament granted all members of Parliament leave to go and consult on the proposed amendments to the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 as contained the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill, 2017.

4. That I know that Parliament dispatched Ug. Shs. 29,000,000/= (Twenty nine million shillings) to the Bank accounts of each Member of Parliament to facilitate the consultation process.

5. That on the 17th October, 2017 I proceeded to my constituency, Jinja Municipality West, I prepared a program and run radio announcements calling upon the people of Jinja Municipality West constituency to attuned the consultative meetings.

6. That I then proceeded to conduct several consultative meeting as follows:-

a) THAT Ifirst met the youth groups in Jinja Municipality West on 18th October, 2017 at Bax Conference Hall and I carefully explained to them the purpose of the consultations and by show of hands, majority of them advised that I should support the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill 2017.

b) THAT the next day on 19th October, 2017 I met the NRM structures comprising of officials from the village level to the constituency level (District level), I explained to them the details of the proposed amendments to the Constitution and I also carefully listened to their views and eventually, by show of hands, majority of them agreed that we should proceed and amend or 'Touch it' as it was commonly referred to.

c) THATthe next day, I met 'bodaboda' cyclists and taxi drivers in my constituency at Nalufenya and yet again, I took them through the interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Constitution and the proposals in the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill, 2017 and although a few of them said no, the majority of them agreed to the proposed amendment.

d) THAT on the following day, 21st October, 2017, I met another group of youths from Jinja West at Main Street Road Open area and I thoroughly explained to them the purpose of the consultations and they all agreed and thanked me for taking their views and they also told me to support the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill, 2017.

e) That on the following day, 21nd October, 2017, I met the elected leaders in the Constituency including Councilors at all levels such as L.C.1 Chairpersons and all Local Councils Executives upto the District level including the LCV and as I had done before with the other groups, I took them through the proposed amendments and yet again, the overwhelming majority advised me to the proposed amendments.

f) The next day on 23rd October, 2017, I met elders and members of the markets within my constituency including Jinja Central market, Amber court market, Mpumude market and Rubaga market and I still explained to them the purpose of the consultations and the proposed amendments to the Constitution especially on Art. 102(b) and save for a few exceptions, the bigger number told me that I should go ahead and support the proposed amendments.

7. THATon 24th October, 2017, I held a press conference with all my agents and media groups and disclosed to them how my consultations had been peaceful and informed them that the people of Jinja Municipality West had fully endorsed the proposals in the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill, 2017.
8. THAT I know that the consultations in my Constituency Jinja Municipality West were conducted peacefully with no interference in the form of beatings, arrests and or brutality from officers of the Uganda Police or the Uganda People's Defence Forces (UPDF).
9. That the above basis, when the Bill was presented on the floor of Parliament, I voted YES as advised by my Constitutes.

Henry Musasizi Ariganyira, filed an affidavit in which he deponed as follows: -

5. That I know that following the Right Honourable Speaker's directive, I with other Political mobilisers conducted consultative meetings in my Constituency about the Constitutional (Amendment) (No.2) Bill of 2017.
6. That I know that our consultative methodology involved public meetings in the four sub counties of Rubanda East and Nineteen parishes and four wards.
7. That I know that all meetings were conducted peacefully without any interference from the public or security forces.
8. That I know that people were given chance to express their views about the proposed amendments and they overwhelmingly supported the amendment.
9. That I know that these consultations were made between 30th October, 2017 and 6th November 2017.
10. That I know that radio announcements were run on voice of Kigezi, Kabale from 20th of October , 2017 as a tool of mobilization inviting people for consultative meeting.

Ongalo Obote Clement Kenneth, on his part deponed as follows:-

6. That I know that following the Right Honourable Speaker's directive, I with other Political mobilisers conducted consultative meetings in my Constituency about the Constitutional (Amendment) (No.2) Bill of 2017.
7. That I know that on the 2nd November 2017, I received UGX 29,000,000/= as facilitation and proceeded to my Constituency to consult the electorate.

8. That I know that after meeting with relevant stakeholders i.e. RDC, DPC, DISO, LCV Chairperson, District Councilors LCIII Chairpersons and various party leaders, it was agreed that consultations be done at sub county level and be open to the general public.
9. *That I immediately placed announcements on three Radio stations that serve Kaberamaido i.e Delta FM, Soroti Radio, Dwanwa, Kaberamaido and Dokolo FM informing the public about the consultation program which were aired from 4th*to 7th November, 2017.
10. That I know that my team and I carried out consultations between 5th November , 2017 and 10th November , 2017 in the six sub counties that form Kalaki constituency and received overwhelming support in favour of the amendment of the Constitution.
11. That I know that all meetings were conducted peacefully without any interference from public or security forces
12. That I know that people were given a chance to express their views about the proposed amendments and they overwhelmingly supported the amendment.

Tumusiime Rosemary Bikaako, stated as follows in his affidavit.

1. That I know that the Rt. Hon Speaker issued a directive to all Members of Parliament to consult in their respective constituencies and the Parliamentary Commission facilitate every Member of Parliament with finances to carry out consultations within their respective constituents.
2. That my consultation approach involved first, meeting with the smaller groups of people and thereafter I organsied and held a bigger meeting involving the entire population of Entebbe Municipality.
3. That I then proceeded to conduct several consultative meetings as follows:-
    a) That I met with the people with disabilities at Kiwafu ward in Entebbe Municipality and carefully explained to them the purpose of the consultations and by show of hands, majority of them advised that I should support the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill 2017.
    b) That I met the youth leaders at Kiwafu ward in Entebbe Municipality West and I carefully explained to them the purpose of the consultations and although a few of them said no, the majority of them advised that I should support the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill 2017.

c) That I met the Local Council I and II Chairperson as well as the NRM councilors at central ward in Entebbe Municipality and I explained to them the details of the proposed amendments to the Constitution and I also carefully listened to their views and eventually, by show hands, majority of them agreed that we should proceed and amend.

d) That I met the elderly people at Katabi ward in Entebbe Municipality and I carefully explained to them the purpose of the consultations and by show of hands, majority of them advised that I should support the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill 2017.

e) That I met with religious leaders at central ward in Entebbe Municipality West and I carefully explained to them the purpose of the consultations and by show of hands, majority of them advised that I should support the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill 2017.

4. That after meeting with the above mentioned groups, I together with the party leadership and other agents organised and held another meeting at the Children's park in Entebbe Municipality to get views and consensus of the people in Entebbe Municipality
5. That I know in all the meetings conducted, save for a few opposing voices, the overwhelming majority of my constituents freely, willingly and openly expressed their support for the Constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Bill 2017.
6. That I know that all consultative meetings were conducted peaceful and without any interference from the public or security forces and on 19th of December 2017 when the August House convened and the above debate was called, I voted yes in support of the Constitutional Amendments) with the full mandate of the of Entebbe Municipality in Wakiso District.

The above is the total sum of the evidence adduced to rebut the evidence of the petitioners that there was no sufficient public participation envisaged under Articles 1, 2 and 8A of the Constitution. I have carefully studied the evidence and I have applied to it a quantitative test. I find that the nature, extent and depth of consultation is unascertainable. It cannot even be ascertained whether or not these consultations took place at all except for Hon. Margret Muhanga who attempted to attach photographs unauthenticated as they were and some minutes of a meeting. The rest simply were stories that would not pass as sufficient evidence in a Court of law. Even if the averments were true, they related to very few people in relation to country's population and demography.

Applying the qualitative test, I find that only 7 out of 455 Members of Parliament who were on the Roll call, when the bill was passed were proved to have consulted the people in some way.

The number of constituencies in which consultations were made appears to have been only 7 out of 290 constituents representing 2.41% of the total.

- Obote stated that he consulted in six Sub-counties
- Tumusiime consulted only in Entebbe Municipality
- Muhanga on her part consulted in 15 sub-counties
- Lokeris he consulted in only one constituency and does not mention the number of sub-counties.

Out of total of 1,403 sub-counties, consultations were carried out in 25 of them representing 1.8% of the total sub-counties.

In terms of demography it was Moses Balyeku and Margret Muhanga who stated that they had consulted the youth in his constituencies. Lokeris showed he consulted some elders. Kakooza consulted in 3 sub-counties in Kabura constituency. Moses Balyeku stated he consulted Jinja Municipality according to his affidavit.

Out of the 290 Constituencies in the Country, with a voting population of 15,277,198, I find that the percentage of the people consulted, was so negligible almost meaningless as to amount to the public participation envisaged under the Constitution.

Perhaps I should apply the facts before me to another test, that was first expounded upon by Lord Diplock in Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] All ER Rep 1. That of a reasonable man. It has since evolved into that of a 'reasonable person.' The test is: - Can a reasonable person presented with the facts before me conclude that, the people of Uganda participated in the process of enacting the Constitution (Amendment) Act, Act 1 of 2018?

The concept of a reasonable person can be traced way back to the Roman law, the figure of bonus Paterfamilias, used by Romans jurists to define a legal standard. It belonged to a family of hypothetical figures in law that include "the right thinking member of society, the officious by-stander, a fair minded and informed observer, among others. The learned author Percy Henry Winfred while discussing the consent of a reasonable man observed that: - > "He has not the courage of Achilles, the wisdom of Ulysses or the strength of Hercules, nor has he the prophetic vision of a clairvoyant. He will not anticipate folly in all its forms but he never puts out of consideration the teachings of experience. . ."

In the context of this Country an ordinary reasonable person, is probably, one who has a national identification card, a mobile phone, listens regularly to radio, attends LCI meetings, has a job or tends to his/her garden or businesses, rides on a boda to town, and takes his /her children to school.

The question I ask myself again is whether any ordinary reasonable Ugandan with attributes set out above can positively state that the public reasonably and adequately participated in the legislative process that resulted in the enactment of Act 1 of 2018. In determination of this question, I am persuaded by the decision of South African Constitutional Court in Doctors for Life (Supra) in which Ngcobo J, while discussing a similar concept stated: -

> "In determining whether Parliament has complied with its duty to facilitate public participation in any particular case, the Court will consider what Parliament has done in that case. The question will be whether what Parliament has done is reasonable in all the circumstances. And factors relevant to determining reasonableness would include rules, if any, adopted by Parliament to facilitate public participation, the nature of the legislation under consideration, and whether the legislation needed to be enacted urgently. Ultimately, what Parliament must determine in each case is what methods of facilitating public participation would be appropriate. In determining whether what Parliament has done is reasonable, this Court will pay respect to what Parliament has assessed as being the appropriate method. In determining the appropriate level of scrutiny of Parliament's duty to facilitate public involvement, the Court must balance, on the one hand, the need to respect parliamentary institutional autonomy, and on the other, the right of the public to participate in public affairs. In my view, this balance is best struck by this Court considering whether what Parliament does in each case is reasonable." (Emphasis mine)

Taking all the above into account, I am unable to find that an ordinary reasonable person in Uganda, would consider that the people of this Country were availed sufficient opportunity, time, information and resources to meaningfully participate in the process that led to the enactment of the impugned Act.

I find further that Parliament did not act reasonably and diligently to ensure that the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy are attained, specially the democratic principle 11 (i) which stipulates as follows: -

> "(i)The State shall be based on democratic principles which empower and encourage the active participation of all citizens at all levels in their own governance."

This principle is part of the provisions of the Constitution under Article 8A already reproduced above. I cannot explain the principle of active/actual public participation in better words than those used by Ngcobo J, in Doctors for Life (Supra) when he stated that:-

> "Public participation in the law-making process is one of the means of ensuring that legislation is both informed and responsive. If legislation is infused with a degree of > openness and participation, this will minimise dangers of arbitrariness and irrationality in the formulation of legislation. The objective in involving the public in the law-making process is to ensure that the legislators are aware of the concerns of the public. And if legislators are aware of those concerns, this will promote the legitimacy, and thus the acceptance, of the legislation. This not only improves the quality of the law-making process, but it also serves as an important principle that government should be open, accessible, accountable and responsive. And this enhances our democracy."

Applying the above principle and the tests set out above I can only find that, Parliament failed to ensure and encourage active participation of all citizens of Uganda at all levels in the process that led to the enactment of the impugned Act, contravened *Article 8*A of the Constitution.

This Court has a right and duty under Article 137 of the Constitution, to ensure that the law making process is observed and adhered to by Parliament as the Constitution prescribes. Where Parliament, by omission, fails to meet the conditions required by the Constitution for the law making process, this Court has a duty to say so and to declare the resulting law invalid.

I find that Parliament failed to encourage, empower and facilitate active public participation of all citizens in the process of enacting the impugned Act in contravention of Articles 1, 2 and 8A of the Constitution and this omission vitiated the whole of the impugned Act.

Question on Whether the Police and Army intervention vitiated the whole process in the passing the impugned Act

The others issues for me to determine are 5, 6(a), 6(d) and 6(f). These issues have already been reproduced above.

Broadly, they seek an answer to the question whether during the process of enacting the impugned statute the Members of Parliament and public were subjected to violence, intimidation and restrictions, inside and outside Parliament by the Uganda Police Force and the Army in contravention of the Constitution. Further, whether the said violence, intimidation and restrictions vitiated the whole process of enactment of the impugned Act.

I have had the opportunity of reading in draft the Judgments of their Lordships on this Coram in regard to this issue. They have extensively discussed the issue above and concluded that: - although there was indeed violence, intimidation and restrictions imposed on Members of Parliament and the public during the process of enacting the impugned Act, there is no evidence that the entire process was vitiated as a result. I agree, however. I only wish to add as follows: -

That the actions of some Members of Parliament prior to and during the process of enacting the impugned Act created an environment that precipitated and eventually led to the intervention of both the Police and Army.

I have found no evidence to prove let alone to suggest that, the Police and Army planned to initiate and perpetuate violence and intimidation against the Members of Parliament and the public in order to influence the results of the debate on the impugned Act. From the evidence on record, it is likely and indeed probable, that neither the Police nor the Army would have had a reason to do what they did had the Members of Parliament conducted themselves in an orderly, professional and honourable manner outside and inside the chambers of Parliament during the process that resulted into the enactment of the impugned Act.

However, in view of our history, the hasty intervention of the Army was uncalled for. There was no evidence whatsoever requiring its intervention, as the police force in Uganda is equipped and professional enough to evict unarmed people from a building that is not even on fire. Our history requires that the Army be kept out of partisan politics.

During the constitutional making process the people expressed a view that, the Army must be kept out of politics. I have already reproduced the excerpt of the Odoki report in this respect earlier in this Judgment. The Uganda Police is subject to the law and must at all times treat citizens with respect and dignity. Article 44(a) of the Constitution provides:

> Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, there shall be no derogation from the enjoymentof the following rights and freedoms—
>
> > 44(a) freedom from torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

The petitioners have set out in their affidavits wide ranging allegations against the Police, accusing them of brutality and torture.

Degrading treatment of citizens by Police is unconstitutional and unacceptable. Even if the persons being arrested are really suspected of any criminal activity, they ought to be treated with respect and their presumption of innocence must be protected. It is in my view, an extremely serious matter when individuals and state agencies violate with impurity non-derogable rights.

We know from the Bible that more than 2000 years ago, a Roman citizen enjoyed certain rights and could not be subjected to cruel or humiliating punishment. St. Paul being a Roman citizen could not be put in chains or flogged! Any Roman soldier or officer who flogged a Roman citizen was subject to severe punishment. A Roman citizen could not be crucified. St. Paul was beheaded in a dignified mode of execution reserved for only Roman citizens at the time. This fact is set out in the Bible as follows: -"Acts of the Apostles 24-29 New International Version (NIV)

> [24]the commander ordered that Paul be taken into the barracks. He directed that he be flogged and interrogated in order to find out why the people were shouting at him like this.

[25]As they stretched him out to flog him, Paul said to the centurion standing there, "Is it legal for you to flog a Roman citizen who hasn't even been found guilty?"

[26]When the centurion heard this, he went to the commander and reported it. "What are you going to do?" he asked. "This man is a Roman citizen."

[27]The commander went to Paul and asked, "Tell me, are you a Roman citizen?""Yes, I am," he answered.

[28]Then the commander said, "I had to pay a lot of money for my citizenship.""But I was born a citizen," Paul replied.

[29]Those who were about to interrogate him withdrew immediately. The commander himself was alarmed when he realized that he had put Paul, a Roman citizen, in chains."

The Constitution demands that citizens of this Country be treated with respect and dignity by all agencies of the State. Again I am constrained to refer to the maiden speech of President when in 1986 he promised Ugandans that no citizen would be beaten b the army (read or the Police) as it had been the norm in the past regimes.

The upholding of the dignity of the citizens is what makes them proud and promotes patriotism. The police in Uganda have no right to frog match Members of Parliament, beat them and humiliate them the way they now routinely do which this Court takes judicial notice of being a notorious fact. This is unacceptable and it must stop forthwith. The Attorney General must ensure that this is brought to an immediate end. Today a Member of Parliament is flogged. Tomorrow it shall be a Minister, then God forbid the Chief Justice. We would have gone through full circle.

I find that the action of Police and Army in forcefully evicting Members of Parliament from the Chambers and arresting them after manhandling them violated the Constitution. In my considered view Speaker of Parliament should simply have adjourned the House to the next day and then the Sergeant at Arms would have denied entry to the members who had been suspended. Members of Parliament who were injured, manhandled or otherwise mistreated are at liberty to institute civil and/ or criminal proceedings in an appropriate Court of law to seek redress.

Having said that, the question is whether the intervention of the Police and the Army in Parliament had the effect of vitiating the entire process of the enactment of the impugned Act. It appears to me, as found by the Hon. the Deputy Chief Justice, that the process was not adversely effected by the violence, intimidation and restrictions set out by the petitioners. I find so because on 18th December 2018 the day when Parliament was besieged by the Police and when Members of Parliament, including the Speaker were prohibited by police from parking their motor vehicles outside the Parliament, the House was so full that the Deputy Speaker who was presiding remarked thus: -

> "THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Honourable members, I welcome you to this sitting which looks like a very special one. I am seeing Members that I have not seen in a long time. (Laughter) I should always engage the services of those who mobilised you to do the same always because today is really special. (Laughter) I am even surprised my register is showing 214; it looks like there are more than 214 Members. That means probably the Members who have not been attending do not know that they have to press a button to register. (Laughter)They may want to go back and put their finger print so that we can have the total number of Members properly recorded."

On Tuesday 19th December 2017, Mr. Robert Kyagulanyi an Independent Member of Parliament representing Kyadondo County East, Wakiso District stated as follows on the floor of Parliament: -

> "Today, we know that studies have been made and surveys have been carried out. Madam Speaker, I have had the rare opportunity to traverse the whole country and everywhere I have been, from the north, south, from the east to the west, people are saying do not amend our Constitution. These people know what they are talking about, they know what this is about and who is pushing for it. They are not saying do not amend because it a fashionable thing to do, no. It is because they know what will come if this Parliament disregards the popular view and amends this Constitution."

On 20th December, 2017 when the impugned Bill came up for the third reading, 479 Members of Parliament were present. 315 voted for the Bill, 62 against and 2 abstained. The House was so full that Members were standing in the lobby and the Speaker could not close the doors. I am unable to find that Members of Parliament were prevented from attending Parliamentary proceedings during the debate and voting on the impugned Bill as contended by the petitioners. I am equally unable to find that the Members of Parliament were prevented from consulting the public in view of the above statement made by Hon. Kyagulanyi. Indeed, a careful perusal of the Hansard reveals that, each time a Member of Parliament stood to speak, he or she stated that she or he had consulted the people in one way or the other. I have already held that the nature and mode of public participation fell short of the Constitutional requirement. However, I am not satisfied that the reason for poor public participation was a result of the Members of Parliament having been prevented to do so by the police or anyone else within the precincts of Parliament. Although the opportunity to consult was availed it was purely conceived and was not well utilized.

It is on record that; Parliament did provide each Member of Parliament with Shs. 29,000,000/= (Twenty-nine million shillings) for the purpose of consultations. A few Members of Parliament on their own volition returned the money. I must mention here that they were only 14 members according to the evidence of Jane Kibirige the Clerk to Parliament.

This list did not include Mrs. Betty Nambooze Bakireke. She was not truthful when she stated in her testimony in Court that she did return the money. All she did was to write a cheque which was never cashed. She knew very well at the time she came to Court to testify that, that money had never left her account. She did not appear at all as a truthful witness. I can safely conclude that since Members of Parliament were given money which they accepted they had the freedom to consult the people. All in all, no sufficient evidence was provided to prove that Members of Parliament were prevented by the police from consulting the people.

Before I leave this issue I am constrained to comment on the Shs. 29,000,000/= (Twenty-nine million shillings) given to Members of Parliament. I must state that, it was very disturbing to find out that whereas all Members of Parliament were given this money, almost all of them did not use it for the purpose of facilitating public participation.

Those who attempted to do so, simply held a few meetings and talked to the few they had selected. This is not because they were prevented by the police from consulting. They simply did not bother to consult. I have stated above that this consultation fell short of the required Constitutional standard. It is disturbing to note that the money was given to Members of Parliament irrespective of the location of their constituencies. A Member of Parliament for Kampala Central where Parliamentary Building is located was given the same amount of money as a Member of Parliament for Kisoro, Arua or Kotido hundreds of miles away.

Similarly, Members of Parliament who have no voting rights, being Ex-Officio Members were also given this money although they clearly had no constituencies to consult.

It appears to me clearly that the money was paid to Members of Parliament as a gratification. That money must be accounted for by the Parliament's accounting officer in respect of Members of Parliament with constituencies. In respect of Members of Parliament without constituencies, the money must be refunded or recovered from them through the process established under the law.

Having stated that, I must reiterate what my brothers the Hon the Deputy Chief Justice and Justice Kasule have stated that the Police had no powers to issue directives stopping Members of Parliament and specifically Members of the Opposition in Parliament from consulting the people of Uganda. The Police Officer who issued that directive ought to be brought to account by relevant authorities. This is a free and democratic society, it is not a Police state. The Public Order and Management Act must be implemented subject to the Constitution and in its implementation, the resultant effect must not violate or contravene Constitutional provisions. The act of the Police in issuing the letter in question violated Articles 1, 2, 23, 29 and 39 of the Constitution.

QESTION on Whether consultations were marred with Police restrictions and violence and if so whether that was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 29(1),(a),(d),(e) and 29(2)(a) of the Constitution.

It was also contended by the petitioners that Members of Parliament were prevented from consulting the electorate by the Assistant Inspector general of Police, who on 16th October 2017 issued a message directing all Police officers to ensure they are not allowed to freely consult. This, Counsel for the petitioners contended violated the Constitution and vitiated the process of enacting the impugned Act. The said Police message is set out in the Judgment of Lady Justice Elizabeth Musoke. I have therefore found no reason to reproduce it here.

Suffice it to say, it was issued by Assistant Inspector General of Police, Mr. Assuman Mugenyi to all Police stations throughout the Country. It required the Police to stop Members of Parliament from moving from one Constituency to another. I agree entirely with the observations and findings of my brother Justice Cheborion that the act of issuing the Police directive mentioned above was unconstitutional for the reasons he has given.

The Police directive was issued in complete and total disregard of the Constitution. The Police appears to have acted and continue to act as if this Country has no Constitution. They assume, quite wrongly that, being a Police officer puts one above the law. The Police has no power to curtail the liberty of Ugandans except as provided for under the Constitution. The Police message does not mention under what law it was issued and how it was to be implemented. It criminalises intent. It goes against every letter and spirit of this Constitution and takes us back to the dark days of the past which I have attempted to set out earlier in this Judgment.

By directing the police to stop the intimidation of persons perceived to be supporting the removal of the age limit without issuing a similar directive in favour of those who were not supporting the age limit removal, the police acted in a partisan manner. In the process it also criminalised an otherwise legitimate political issue. By criminalising a section of the society in this case the people who did not support the removal of the age limit, the Police pursued an extremely dangerous path. This kind of trend is what the Constitution was put in place to stop. The Police directive violated the promise of freedom and liberty the President gave to the people of Uganda in 1986 when NRA took power.

Throughout the early colonial years perhaps up to 1955, the colonial policy discriminated and criminalized all the people of Bunyoro. Many had to change their names, dropping Runyoro names and adapting Kiganda ones. More than three quarters of the population of Bunyoro was killed on starved during the Kabalega war leaving empty land that was later turned into National Parks and Game and Forest Reserves by the colonial government. There was also discrimination against and marginalisation of Catholics during the colonial period.

From 1966 to 1971 there was wide spread criminalization of Baganda and the members of the opposition Democratic Party and Kabaka Yekka. From 1971-1978 there was criminalization of Acholi, Langi and members of UPC party. Amin's wrath did not spare the Indian community, who were expelled and their property confiscated by government including those of Ugandan citizens of Indian descent.

Almost the whole population of West Nile Region was forced into exile between 1979- 1986 simply because Idi Amin happened to have been born there. Muslims were persecuted, criminalized and discriminated against after the fall of Idi Amin. The Banyarwanda and Banyankole followed suit between 1981- 1986. During this time many DP and UPM supporters were tortured, killed or exiled on that account alone. All the above are notorious facts of our history that I take judicial notice of.

The 1995 Constitution put to an end to this cycle of violence in Article 21 (1) and (2).

> 21. Equality and freedom from discrimination.
>
> (1) All persons are equal before and under the law in all spheres of political, economic, social and cultural life and in every other respect and shall enjoy equal protection of the law.
>
> (2) Without prejudice to clause (1) of this Article, a person shall not be discriminated against on the ground of sex, race, colour, ethnic origin, tribe, birth, creed or religion, social or economic standing, political opinion or disability.

Under Article 43(2) (a), freedom from political persecution cannot be curtailed in public interest. There is always a danger that, if the Constitution is not strictly complied with our hard earned democracy shall degenerate into authoritarianism, which leads to totalitarianism and dictatorship. Totalitarianism leads to tyranny and oppression both of which inevitably lead into anarchy. This is the trend that our Constitution of 1995 was put in place to stop. It is for this very reason that we must defend every letter of this Constitution and condemn every act that violates it.

I find therefore that the act of the police issuing the said letter contravened Articles 1,2,21,23, 29 and 39 of the Constitution and I hold so.

Having said that, I agree with my brother Cheborion JCC, that no sufficient evidence was adduced to prove the above Police directive unconstitutional as it was, on its own vitiated the whole process of enacting the impugned Act.

QUESTION ON denying the public access to Parliament

I shall proceed to resolve the remaining issues. Issue 7 (a), (c), (e) (g) (iii) relate to the proceedings in Parliament

> Issue 7 (a) is whether the actions of Parliament preventing some members of the public from accessing Parliamentary chambers during the presentation of the Constitutional Amendment Bill No.2 of 2017 was inconsistent with and in contravention of the provisions of Articles 1, 8A, 79,208(2),209,211(3),212, of the Constitution.

It was contended and pleaded by Mr. Mabirizi in his affidavit in support of Constitutional Petition No. 49 of 2017, that he was prevented from accessing Parliamentary Chambers during the presentation of the Constitutional Amendment Bill which was in contravention of Rule 23 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament. The relevant paragraphs in light of the above are 39, 40, 14, 42, 43, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51 and 53.

It was further contended that, the prevention from Parliament was contrary to Article 79(3) of the Constitution and II (i) of the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy where Parliament is obliged to promote the democratic principles and democracy which is only accomplished when people participate in the processes.

Rule 23 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament, 2017 provides as follows:-

"23. Sittings of the House to be public.

1) Subject to these Rules, the sittings of the House or of its Committees shall be public.

(2) The Speaker may, with the approval of the House and having regard to national security, order the House to move in closed sitting."

Rule 230 of the Rules of Parliament, 2017 also provides for admission of the public and press into the House and Committees subject to the rules made by the Speaker.

I find that one of the principles of open participation was indeed violated when the Petitioner was prevented from accessing Parliament during the presentation of the Constitution (Amendment) Bill. People should be able to monitor what their representatives are doing during the Parliamentary proceedings since the same is provided for under the Rules of Procedure of Parliament. However, I do not find that, this omission had any impact on the passing of the impugned Act into law.

QUESTION ON Sitting arrangement in Parliament

Issue 7(c) is whether the alleged actions of the Speaker in permitting Ruling Party Members of Parliament to sit on the opposition side of Parliament was inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A, 69 (1),69 (2)(b), 71, 74, 75, 79, 82A, 83 (1)(g), 83 (3) and 108A of the Constitution.

It was contended by the petitioners that failure by Parliament to observe its Rules of Procedure was in contravention with above Articles of the Constitution. The above issue was specifically raised by Mr. Mabirizi in his affidavit in support of Constitutional Petition No. 49 of 2017at paragraphs 74, 75 and 76. He relied on the Supreme Court decision of Ssekikubo and 4 others Vs Attorney General and others Constitutional Appeal No. 01 of 2015, in which Court interpreted the aspect of "crossing the floor" which I find inapplicable to the above issue. Rule 9 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament 2017 stipulates as follows;-

"Sitting arrangement in the House

(1) Every Member shall, as far as possible, have a seat reserved for him or her by the Speaker.

(2) The seats to the right hand of the speaker shall be reserved for the Leader of Government Business and Members of the Party in Government.

(3) The seats to the left hand of the Speaker shall be reserved for the Leader of the Opposition and Members of the Opposition party or parties in the House.

(4) The speaker shall ensure that each Member of Parliament has a comfortable seat."

Rule 82(1) (b) provides that;-

"a Member shall not cross the floor of the House or move around" unnecessarily."

According to the Hansard of the Tenth Parliament of Wednesday, 27th September 2017 at page 4743, the Speaker called upon Honourable Members take comfortable seats, the Members were not in violation of Rule 82(1) (b) as contended by the petitioner of Constitutional Petition No. 49 of 2017. It was within the Speaker's powers to ensure that all Members have comfortable seats as provided under Rule 9(4). At the time the Speaker made this directive, Members of the Opposition had on their own walked out of Parliament. It would have been difficult if that had not been the case. The order was meant to be temporary and indeed when the Opposition Members returned they occupied their seats comfortably. I find that this order of the Speaker did not have any significant implication on the process of enacting the Constitution (Amendment) Act and was not in contravention with Articles 1, 8A, 69 (1), 69 (2)(b), 71, 74, 75, 79, 82A, 83 (1)(g), 83 (3) and 108A of the Constitution as contended.

QUESTION ON Absence of leaders of Opposition during the debate

In respect of issue 7(e), it is clear that the leader of opposition voluntarily exited the House well knowingly that the majority Committee Report was to be presented by the Chairperson of the Legal Affairs Committee.

The Hansard of the same day, reveals that leader of opposition actually came back into the House shortly afterwards and was present during the presentation of the Majority Committee Report.

Therefore, I find no merit in this ground.

QUESTION ON failing to close all doors during voting.

This issue was raised during the parliamentary proceedings by Hon. Katuntu at page 5229 of the Hansard of the Tenth Parliament on Wednesday, 20th December 2017, follows; -

> "Madam Speaker, I seek your indulgence. Rule 98(4) of the Rules of Procedure reads: "The speaker shall then direct the doors to be locked and the bar drawn no Member shall thereafter enter or leave the House until after the roll call has been taken." All doors are open and Members are moving in and out. I am sorry to have raised this point so that we obey the rules. If the members think that we do not have to obey rules-thank you very much."

The Rt. Hon. Speaker explained the reason why the doors could not be closed during the voting

> "SPEAKER: Honourable members ideally I was supposed to have closed the doors under rule 98(4). However, that exists in a situation where all Members have got seats, but in this Parliament, 150 Members do not have seats. Therefore, it was not possible to lock them out and that is why I did not lock the doors. I hope there is nobody in the lobby. Is there anybody who has not voted? We now close the ballot..." (Hansard Page 5234)

The Speaker explained why the rule could not be complied with. I find that voting when the doors were open offended the Rule of Parliament cited above, however this did not in any way violate the Constitution and vitiate the enactment of the impugned Act. The Hansard of Wednesday, 20thDecember 2017 at pages 5264-5269 indicate that all Members of Parliament who were present and wanted to vote, voted and there is no evidence to the contrary. I find no merit in this ground. The issue is resolved in the negative.

QUESTION ON Continuance in office by the President upon attaining 75 years.

Issue 13 is whether continuance in office by a President elected in 2016 and remains in office on attaining the age of 75 years which is contrary to Articles 83(1) (b) and Article 102 (c) of the Constitution.

Mr. Mabirizi contended that, continuance in office by the President on attaining the age of 75 will be contrary to Articles 83(1) (b) and Article 102 (c) of the Constitution, because the President would have ceased to be qualified as it is for Member of Parliament.

Article 83 (1) (b) stipulates as follows; -

> (b) if such circumstances arise that if that person were not a member of Parliament would cause that person to be disqualified for election as a member of Parliament under Article 80 of this Constitution."

Article 102 provides as follows; -

> "Qualifications of the President.
>
> A person is not qualified for election as President unless that person is

(a) a citizen of Uganda by birth;

(b) not less than thirty-five years and not more than seventy-five years of age; and

(c) a person qualified to be a member of Parliament."

The words used in Articles 83(1) (b) and 102(b) are plain and ought to be given their natural and ordinary meaning. Clearly under this Article the age limit of the President applies only at the time of nomination and not otherwise. Had the framers of the Constitution intended that the President and Members of Parliament have same qualifications, they would have stated so but they did not. The factors that disqualify Members of Parliament are not applicable to the President. This is simple and clear. Therefore, I find that, this ground is misconceived and devoid of any merit whatsoever. The issue is resolved in the negative.

In conclusion I find that, all the consolidated Petitions have substantially succeeded.

SUGGESTIVE APPLAUSE

(1) The entire Constitution (Amendment) Act 1 of 2018 is unconstitutional and is therefore null and void. All its provisions ought to be expunged from the Constitution of Uganda.

(2) The petitioners shall be paid by the respondents 2/3 of the costs of this Petition, in respect of only their disbursements, since this matter was brought in public interest. In respect of each Petition Ug Shs. 2o.ooo.ooo/= is awarded on account of professional fees save for Petition No. 49 of 2017 in which the petitioner represented himself and Petition No. 3 of 2018 in which no professional fees were prayed for.

Recommendations

(1) In view of the fact that, there are pending in Parliament a number of motions seeking to introduce Private Members bills proposing a number of Constitutional amendments and in view of the observations of the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary affairs of Parliament that "A number of stake holders" had requested (read recommended) that the Constitution should be amended after the establishment of a Constitutional Review Commission. Further in view of the recommendations of the Supreme Court in Amama Mbabazi and other Vs Y.K Museveni (Supra).

There is urgent need for the AttorneyGeneral to bring before Parliament a proposal to constitute a Constitutional Review Commission under the Commission of Inquiry Act Cap 166 detailing therein terms of reference, for amendment of the Constitution.

That Commission be tasked with a duty of seeking the views of the people of Uganda in a period of not less than six months on all proposed amendments and to make proposals to Parliament.

(2) A similar commission of inquiry be set up to investigate, determine and make recommendations regarding the apparent brutality of the Police against the citizens of this Country with a view of seeking a remedy to this mischief.

(3) The Government provides sufficient funds for this purpose.

(4) The Attorney General issues within a period of six months from date hereof guidelines to the Police in their implementation of the Public Order and Management Act and a copy thereof be submitted to this Court.

(5) The Auditor General carries out a forensic audit of Accounts of the 10th Parliament, and a copy of the resultant report be submitted to this Court and to the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Affair.

EXEGESIS OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO KAKURU (A critical explanation or interpretation of a text)

Introduction

Ugandan courts cautiously walk the fine line between politically sensitive cases that do not threaten the political establishment and those that do, risking and perhaps sacrificing the court's legitimacy and credibility in some cases and salvaging it in others. Judicial determination of politically sensitive cases is a question of judicial bravery. This is due to the fact that courts operate in an atmosphere of high political tension, time restrictions and legal restrictions.[1048]

Background of the Age Limit Petition

On the 27th December, 2017, Parliament passed a Bill eliminating Presidential Age Limit and extending Parliamentary Term. The Ugandan Parliament passed an amendment to the Constitution which, among other measures, aims to eliminate the requirement that candidates vying for the presidency be under 75 years of age.

Following this amendment, Karuhanga and five other MPs are challenging a decision by Speaker Rebecca Kadaga to expel them at the height of the debate on the controversial Constitution Amendment Act. The others are MPs Jonathan Odur (UPC, Erute South), Ibrahim Ssemujju (FDC, Kira Municipality), Mubarak Munyagwa (FDC, Kawempe South), Allan Ssewanyana (DP, Makindye West) and Anthony Akol (FDC, Kilak North). Others who filed similar petitions separately are former Presidential Candidate Abed Bwanika, city lawyer Male Mabirizi, the

[1048] Oloka Onyango J, When courts do politics, 258

Uganda Law Society and some private citizens from Toro who are represented by lawyer Prosper Busingye. They all sought to, among other prayers, have the Constitution Amendment Act quashed by the Constitutional Court. Led by Senior Counsel Wandera Ogalo, the parties grudgingly agreed to consolidate the petitions.

The court again by a 4-1 majority upheld the larger Bill applying severally the doctrine of severance to save the repeal of the age limit even though all the justices unanimously found unconstitutional means that were used to stifle the MPs' access to their constituents through the police. A sharp dissent by Justice Kenneth Kakuru, at the Constitutional Court found the entire Act unconstitutional.

An Analysis of Justice Kakurus Consideration

The central issue for determination was whether or not sections 3 and 7 of the impugned Act, which removed the 75-year age limit of the President and lowered age limit of the district chairpersons from 35 to 18, years was unconstitutional.

Historical and Constitutional Background

In contextualizing his dissenting judgement, Justice Kakuru considered what he termed as Uganda's checkered constitutional history. His rationale for recounting the Constitutional history was to re-echo the people's cry, in the preamble to the Constitution which he emphasized we must always recall. "Lest we forget". Justice Kakuru stated that the preamble of the Constitution emphasized the Country's history, acknowledging sadly that it has been characterized by political and Constitutional instability. Lest we forget.

It is indeed important to describe the social, economic and political context which informed Justice Kakuru's judgments. In Uganda, the rule of law was the victim of brutal dictatorships. In 1966, Prime Minister Dr. Milton Obote overthrew the President and suspended the 1962 'independence' Constitution. Obote's government therefore enacted the 1966 Interim Constitution abolishing monarchies and providing for a strong executive. But that was only the beginning of Ugandan dictatorships that would subjugate and arm-twist the judiciary to make decisions favorable to executive will.

In Uganda v. Commissioner of Prisoners, ex parte Matovu,[1049] the applicant sought to challenge the validity of the 1966 interim Uganda Constitution and validity of the Emergency Powers (Detention) Regulations of 1966 enacted pursuant to that Constitution. The remarkably executive-minded Matovu court held that a successful, irreversible revolution (backed by the military) had been affected by Obote and thus upheld that Constitution and the constitutionality of the impugned regulations. Dr. Joe Oloka Onyango notes that, in effect, the Matovu Court dressed the patently illegal actions of the government with a shroud of legitimacy and refused to protect constitutionalism, individual liberties and freedoms.[1050] With that step the descent into dictatorship and utter rejection of the rule of law was swift. Shortly after the 1966 events, the Obote regime enacted the Uganda 1967 Republican Constitution. The Uganda 1967 Constitution also concentrated executive powers in the President without checks and balances.

[1049]Uganda v. Commissioner of Prisoners, ex parte Matovu,[1966] East African Law Report (Uganda), 514.

This civilian dictatorship was replaced in 1971 by the unequaled military dictatorship of General Idi Amin who suspended several significant sections of the 1967 Constitution, particularly those on the supremacy of the Constitution. The embodiment of rejection of any semblance of legality and rule of law was epitomized in Idi Amin's Proceedings Against the Government (Protection) Decree,[1051] which provided that courts could not grant relief in any actions brought against the military government for injuries sustained as a consequence of measures taken to maintain public order and security. There were no cases concerning constitutional law brought before the Courts of Uganda from 1972 until Amin was overthrown by military struggle in 1979.

However, even after 1979, Courts remained subjugated by a strong executive backed by the military. The important case of Kayira and Semwogerere v. Rugumayo[1052], Ojok, Ssempebwa & Eight Others, dealt with the patently unconstitutional removal of Professor Lule, the first post-Amin era President. The Court abdicated its constitutional responsibility and held that the case was moot as it had been overtaken by events, namely the appointment of another President, Mr. Godfrey Binaisa, by the powerful National Consultative Council which had control over the military. In turn, Binaisa was removed by a military Council, which then arranged sham elections in 1980 purportedly to return Obote to power. This led to a guerrilla war led by the National Resistance Movement (NRM) of Mr. Yoweri Museveni, the current President.

Upon coming to power in 1986 President Museveni promised a new Constitution for Uganda, one based upon popular will, promulgated by a Constituent Assembly elected by the people themselves. Under the 1995 Constitution, the framers wanted to have a President who would be accountable to the people and greater separation of powers among the three arms of government as system of checks and balances. Whereas under the 1967 Constitution the executive had a role in making laws, the framers of the 1995 Constitution wanted ultimate authority to determine what should become law to lie with the Parliament. The Constitution of Uganda attempts to "tame' the executive. One way to do that was to provide for judicial review within the new Constitution. The Constitution of Uganda provides for an independent judiciary and gives it significant powers to tame parliament and enforce constitutional values. Thus, the Constitution of Uganda provides for constitutional supremacy.[1053]The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda is awash with references to stability. The opening statement of Preamble states that "RECALLING our history which has been characterized by political and constitutional instability." Clearly, there was a desire in Uganda to make a clean and fundamental break with a past which was characterized by military take-overs and dictatorships.

[1050]Joe Oloka Onyango, JUDICIAL POWER AND CONSTITUTIONALISM IN UGANDA23-25 (1993).
[1051] Uganda Decree No.8 of 1972.
[1052] Court of Appeal Const. Case No. 1 of 1979

The Constitutional Court of Uganda has been very cautious as it walks the tightrope between social, political and economic realities. The Court hails the Constitution as a dynamic and living instrument and refuses to interpret it in a narrow and legalistic way. It is true that Article 102(b) is not one of the entrenched Articles and the Parliament has power to amend it. However, when contextualized with our history and why the term limit and age limit had been put in place to check a life presidency, the inference gives a different result. In this light the timing for lifting the age limit is crucial and should be taken into consideration. Uganda was poised to hold general elections in 2021 and President Museveni who has been in power for 31 years, would technically be too old run for office again. The lifting of the term limits leads us to a path of dictatorship and life presidency, the very occurrence the promulgators of the 1995 Constitution sought to safe guard against by inserting both the term and age limit clauses.

Basic Structure Doctrine

One of the issues to be considered was the applicability of the Basic Structure Doctrine. It was Justice Kakuru's holding that indeed the Basic Structure Doctrine applies in Uganda. However, he found that the qualifications of the President and those of Chairpersons District local governments do not in my view form part of the basic structure of the Constitution.

The Basic Structure Doctrine is not a rule of law, it is merely a philosophical postulate, a guide to assist the Constitutional Court and any court dealing with appeals in Constitutional matters, when dealing with an amendment or proposal amendment, to determine whether the amendment goes to the root or core of the Constitution and is therefore a no-go area for parliament. The Basic Structure Doctrine (BSD) was enunciated by the Supreme Court of India in one of its most important decisions ever, in the case of Kesavananda Bharati v The State of Kerala.[1054]The doctrine is to the effect that a national constitution has certain basic features which underlie not just the letter but also the spirit of that constitution. These features constitute the Inviolable Core of the constitution, and any amendment, which purports to alter the constitution in a manner that takes away that basic structure, is void and of no effect. The rationale of the decision was that an amendment which makes a change in the basic structure of the constitution is not really an amendment but is, in effect, tantamount to rewriting the constitution, which parliament has no power to do. The court held that as the Supreme Court of the land, it had a limited power to review and strike down amendments which went to the very heart and core of the constitution, by seeking to alter its basic structure. The Basic Structure Doctrine was upheld and relied on in subsequent decisions in India itself, and in many other jurisdictions.

[1053] Article 2, Constitution of the Republic of Uganda
1054 4SCC 225

Whether or not a provision is part of the basic structure varies from country to country, depending on each country's peculiar circumstances, including its history, political challenges and national vision. In answering this important question, courts will consider factors such as the preamble to the constitution, national objectives and directive principles of state policy (in countries which have them in their constitutions, such as Uganda), the bill of rights, the history of the constitution that led to the given provision, and the likely consequences of the amendment. Whether or not a judge will find a given Constitutional provision basic or fundamental to the Constitution is a highly charged legal as well as political question.

The Importance of the Basic Structure Doctrine.

The BSD has over the last 45 years assumed a significance way beyond what its proponents may have had in mind. The idea that though parliament has wide powers to amend the Constitution, it powers are unlimited and do not extend to the power to tamper ordo away with clauses which are basic to the structure or essence of the constitution is now considered an important safeguard against the possibility of a party or group having a controlling majority in parliament abusing its majority to erode the essence of the Constitution by doing away with vital clauses which they consider bothersome or inconvenient to their exercise or retention of power, or by introducing provisions that enable them to entrench themselves in power. Ordinarily, a constitution contains provisions for its own preservation. For example, most constitutions prescribe more elaborate procedures for their amendment than are prescribed for ordinary statutes.

However, a time comes when these are not enough to protect the constitution. Such a situation arises when a party has an overwhelming majority of members of parliament and can use its numbers to pass any amendment. In such a situation, the express provisions of the constitution are not enough to protect it. In Kesavananda Bharati (Supra) Sikri, CJ explained the importance of the doctrine in guarding against abuse of parliamentary majorities and warned about the likely consequences of such abuse. He stated:

"...a political party with two-thirds majority in parliament for a few years could so amend the constitution as to debar any other party from functioning, establish totalitarianism, enslave the people, and after having effected these purposes make the constitution unamendable or extremely rigid. This would no doubt invite extra-constitutional revolution (my emphasis)."

Sometimes where a situation of a majority intoxicated with power threatens constitutional stability, the constitution can still be protected by certain constitutional restraints known as constitutional conventions. These are underlying norms which are not in written law but are nevertheless considered binding and which cannot be easily overridden.

In a country like Uganda express constitutional restraints and those funded on unwritten conventions are easily overridden. Legal revolutions, whereby the existing constitutional order has been overthrown and replaced not in the manner prescribed by the constitution were experienced in 1966, 1971, 1979, 1985 and 1986.The 1995Constitution attempted to prevent such legal revolutions by outlawing the operation of the Kelsenian theory, through Article 3.However, the provision would possibly not prevent a subversion of the purpose of the constitution through a procedurally lawful amendment of the Constitution, with the same result as if the constitution had been overthrown. Which is where the BSD comes in. The 1995 Constitution has its own in-built restraints on power. The President may not have his way, against the wishes of Parliament. But what if Parliament and the President contrive a common mischief, to make nonsense of the Constitution? Then the Judiciary is expected to come in. The BSD comes in handy in this regard, as a tool the Judiciary can employ to prevent self–cantered adulteration of Constitution, where the express provisions of the constitution itself are not usable, for one reason or the other. At that point the BSD provides the last restraint against the erosion of constitutionalism.

Justice Kenneth Kakuru had the most expansive conception of the doctrine, which he construed to cover sovereignty of the people, supremacy of the constitution, political order through a durable and popular constitution, constitutional and political stability based on the principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and public participation. He added the rule of law, observance of human rights, regular free and fair elections, separation of powers, accountability of government to the people, non-derogable rights, the idea that land belongs to the people and cannot be taken away from them by Government without appropriate compensation, the idea that the state holds natural resources in trust for the people, the duty of citizens to defend the constitution, and abolition of the one-party state.

Some of the aspects that Justice Kakuru considers to be part of the basic structure because most are not actually express provisions in the constitution itself, but are derived from the Preamble to the Constitution and the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy. It is not helpful to draw up a list of Articles that constitute the basic structure of the national Constitution. What is "basic" is not the wording of the provisions. It is not the letter of the constitution, but the spirit. To identify the things which constitute the basic structure, you do not just look at express words of the Constitution. You have to look at the spirit of the Constitution, which may not be captured by a slavish commitment to the express words. The preamble and the National objectives set out at the beginning of the 1995 Constitution cannot be overlooked if you want to appreciate the character of the 1995 Constitution which, the Justices unanimously agreed, is a key consideration in determining the basic structure of the constitution. So, for example, there is no express provision in the Constitution that "there shall be political stability". But can anyone deny that the quest for stability is at the heart of the constitution? Can an amendment that is obviously a recipe for instability pass the test, merely because the Article amended is not an entrenched one under Article 260, but is one that can be amended the ordinary way?

The Basic Structure Doctrine has to be viewed for what it is—a call on the Judiciary to become activist and not constructionist in defending the Constitution. A doctrinaire approach misses the point, by insisting that if the framers of the Constitution had wanted to treat certain Articles as critical, they would have expressly done so, and that what they did not entrench under Article 260 was not deemed critical. In determining whether a provision constitutes the basic structure of the Constitution, its wording is important. However, the wording is not the end of the story. In numerous decisions our own superior courts accepted that the Constitution is a living instrument, which should not be interpreted using a doctrinaire approach. That in constructing the constitution, you are must not look at the state of things at the time it was enacted, but at the present time, but also with an eye to the future.

A proper understanding of the Basic Structure Doctrine, therefore is not that there are certain provisions that parliament can never amend. It is that parliament has not the power to amend the constitution in order to bring about certain results: a fascist state, an autocracy a theocracy and so on. Every Article is amendable, but not in a manner that erodes the underlying purpose of the constitution. Even the bill of rights can be amended, but not in a manner that take away the essence of rights enshrined therein, but so as to introduce new rights or even to impose limitations on the enjoyment of certain rights, so long as the limitations introduced are "reasonable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society.[1055]

Under the 1995 Constitution, there were in-built mechanisms to ensure that our president would not become a life-president. In 2005 we removed term limits, meaning one can be president until one is 75, so long as he can win an election. The Constitution has now been amended to provide that even after 75 he can continue in office, until nature intervenes. Has the basic structure of the Constitution really remained the same? Or to put it differently, without these restraints how is the Constitution different from the 1967 Constitution? The legal system we operate requires that justice should be blind. But should it be that blind—to the consequences of its adjudication.

[1055] Article 43, Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

Public Participation

Core to his dissent judgment on the issue of age limit, Justice Kakuru held that there was no public participation in the processes that led to the amendment of constitutional amendment Act No. 1 of 2018, which public participation was very key and without the same, invalidates the amendment. Justice Kakuru was of the view that the 22 people consulted during the constitutional making process, meant that its 0.0001375 per cent of the registered voters who were consulted, a number he said was very small to be a representation of the more than 15 million registered voters.

He added that even if all the 455 MPs were to be consulted and added on the 22 people who were consulted, still the percentage of the consulted people would still be far less. Justice Kakuru further faulted Parliament for having only made public consultations for a period of two months, which in his view was a short period taking into account the more than 15 million registered voters, 290 constituencies, 112 districts, 1,403 sub-counties and 57,842 villages in the country.

This holding stems from Article 1 of the Constitution states that all powers belong to the people who shall exercise their sovereignty in accordance with this constitution.Under, the 1995 Constitution, unlike any other, the people are sovereign and affirm their sovereignty and their inalienable right to determine the form of government they want through their Constitution.[1056] In this regard, the Constitution itself is not supreme, it simply embodies the supremacy of the people. It is quite evident from the Constitution itself that the people through the Constitution are supreme.[1057]

"Historically, all the past Constitutions lacked legitimacy because they failed to allow the people to participate in the constitutional and legislative process. The Uganda Agreement of 1900 and the Order-in-Council of 1902, were illegitimate on that basis alone. Similarly, the 1962 Constitution, lacked popular support. When it was abrogated the people did not rise in its defence as they had no attachment to it. It had been made by and for their rulers. The worst example was the 1966 interim Constitution which was enacted without having been seen even by the members of Parliament who passed it and swore allegations to it. The 1967 Constitution was debated and passed by Parliament which had constituted itself into a Constituent Assembly. The people's participation was extremely limited as already set out above."[1058]

The 1995 Constitution specifically provided for Public participation in the legislative process and the government. Public participation is very vital and important in the constitutional process, specifically in respect of the Constitution Amendment. The Constitutional Court in Oloka–

[1056] Article 1, The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.
[1057] Ibid
[1058] Excerpt from Justice Kakuru's ruling.

Onyango and 9 Others versus Attorney General[1059], discussed the question as to whether or not Parliament while passing legislation may ignore or waive legal requirements. It was held as follows: -

"Parliament as a law making body should set standards for compliance with the Constitutional Provisions and with its own Rules. The speaker ignored the law and proceeded with the passing of the Act. We agree with Counsel Opiyo, that the enactment of the law is a process, and if any of the stages therein is flawed, that vitiates the entire process and the law that is enacted as a result of it."

Legislators ought to have warned themselves about the dangers of legislating for their selfish interests or that of their political party. Article 1(4) stipulates that the people shall express their will and consent on who shall govern them and how they should be governed through regular, free and fair elections of their representatives or through referenda. The people have conferred their ability to make legislative choices to their elected representatives. This translates to the fact that legislators are mouth pieces for their constituents and not their political parties or themselves. The utter neglect of Members of Parliament in not consulting their constituents in deciding on whether to scrap the age limit or not was an abuse of the constitutional requirement to consult. Public participation is one of the basic structures of our Constitution. The public participation, therefore, cannot be wished away or taken lightly by Parliament. The failure to consult deprived the public of the constitutional right to a fair hearing. The amendment was not Parliament for the peace, order, development and good governance of Uganda as required under Article 79[1060] but rather for the enablement of President Museveni to contest in 2021 General elections for presidency.

Conclusion

There is always danger that if the constitution is not strictly complied with, our hard-earned democracy shall degenerate into authoritarianism which leads to totalitarianism and dictatorship. To borrow the words of Chief Justice Alphonse Dollo, the 1995 Constitution is still in its infancy; it being just a couple of decades old. However, and most unfortunately, before it has sufficiently been tested, or put differently, before the ink with which the promulgation was signed has dried, the Constitution has already been subjected to as many as five amendments. The timing of the scrapping of the term limits and the removal of the age limit show that they were politically orchestrated acts for the pushing of President Museveni's thirst for power and not for the good governance of Ugandans. The Judiciary had a duty to fend back this attack against the constitution, to protect it against being annihilated beyond recognition, Justice Kakuru took on that duty seriously.

[1059]Constitutional Petition No. 8 of 2014(unreported)
[1060] The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO PROF. EKIRIKUBINZA LIILIAN TIBATEMWA JSC VERBATIM

Background

The brief background to this appeal is that in 2017, Hon. Raphael Magyezi, a Member of the 10th Parliament of the Republic of Uganda, brought a Private Member's Bill (Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017).

The Bill was brought in accordance with Articles 259 and 262 of the Constitution intending to amend Articles 61, 102 (b), 183 (2) (b) and 104 (2) and (3) of the Constitution as well as to implement some of the recommendations made by this Court in Presidential Election Petition No.1 of 2016, Amama Mbabazi vs. Yoweri Museveni. The objectives of the said Bill were:

To provide for the time within which to hold Presidential, Parliamentary and Local Government Council elections under Article 61; To provide for eligibility requirements for a person to be elected as President or District Chairperson under Articles 102 (b) and 183 (2) (b); To increase the number of days within which to file and determine a presidential election petition under Article 104 (2) and (3); To increase the number of days within which the Electoral Commission is required to hold a fresh election where a Presidential election is annulled under Article 104 (6).

At the second reading of the Bill, two separate motions were moved to amend the Bill. The first motion was to extend the tenure of Parliament and Local Government Councils from five to seven years introduced by Mbarara Municipality MP Michael Tumusiime. The second motion introduced by Hon. Nandala Mafabi sought to reinstate the Presidential term limits.

On 27th December 2017, the Bill was promulgated into law as Constitution (Amendment) Act (No.1) of 2018.

Pursuant to Articles 137 (1), (3) of the Constitution as well as Rules 3, 4, 5 and 12 of the Constitution Court (Petitions and References) Rules, five Constitutional Petitions challenging the validity of specific provisions of the Constitution (Amendment) Act (No. 1) of 2018 were filed in the Constitutional Court. All the said petitions were consolidated.

The issues for determination before the Constitutional Court were as follows:

Whether sections 2 and 8 of the Act extending or enlarging of the term or life of Parliament from 5 to 7 years is inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, 7, 77 (3), 77 (4), 79 (1), 96, 233 (2) (b), 260 (1) and 289 of the Constitution.

And if so, whether applying it retrospectively is inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, 7, 77(3), 77(4), 79(1), 96 and 233 (2)(b) of the Constitution.

3.Whether sections 6 and 10 of the Act extending the current life of Local Government Councils from 5 to 7 years is inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Articles 1, 2, 8A, 176 (3), 181 (4) and 259 (2) (a) of the Constitution.

4. If so, whether applying it retroactively is inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Articles 1, 2, 8A, 176 (3), 181 (4) and 259 (2) (a) of the Constitution.

5. Whether the alleged violence/scuffle inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Act was inconsistent and in contravention of Articles 1, 2, 3 (2) and 8A of the Constitution.

6. Whether the entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enacting the Act was inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Articles of the Constitution as here-under: -

(a) Whether the introduction of the Private Member's Bill that led to the Act was inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Article 93 of the Constitution.

Whether the passing of sections 2, 5, 6, 8 and 10 of the Act are inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Article 93 of the Constitution.

Whether the actions of Uganda Peoples Defence Forces and Uganda Police in entering Parliament, allegedly assaulting Members in the chamber, arresting and allegedly detaining the said Members, is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 24, 97, 208 (2) and 211(3) of the Constitution.

(d) Whether the consultations carried out were marred with restrictions and violence which were inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 29 (1) (a), (d),(e) and 29(2) (a) of the Constitution.

(e) Whether the alleged failure to consult on sections 2, 5, 6, 8 and 10 is inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Articles 1 and 8A of the Constitution.

(f) Whether the alleged failure to conduct a referendum before assenting to the Bill containing sections 2, 5, 6, 8 and 10 of the Act was inconsistent with, and in contravention of Articles 1, 91 (1) and 259 (2), 260 and 263 (2)(b) of the Constitution.

(g) Whether the Amendment Act was against the spirit and structure of the 1995 Constitution.

7. Whether the alleged failure by Parliament to observe its own Rules of Procedure during the enactment of the Act was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 28, 42, 44, 90 (2), 90 (3) (c) and 94 (1) of the Constitution.

(a) Whether the actions of Parliament preventing some members of the public from accessing Parliamentary chambers during the presentation of the Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017 was inconsistent with and in contravention of the provisions of Articles 1, 8A, 79, 208 (2), 209, 211 (3), 212 of the Constitution.

(b) Whether the act of tabling Constitutional Bill No. 2 of 2017, in the absence of the Leader of Opposition, Chief whip and other opposition members of Parliament was in contravention of and/or inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A, 69 (1), 69 (2)(b), 71, 74, 75, 79, 82A, and 108A of the Constitution.

(c) Whether the alleged actions of the Speaker in permitting Ruling Party Members of Parliament to sit on the opposition side of Parliament was inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A, 69 (1), 69 (2)(b), 71, 74, 75, 79, 82A, 83 (1)(g), 83 (3) and 108A of the Constitution.

(d) Whether the alleged act of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee of Parliament in allowing some Committee members to sign the Report after the public hearings on Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017, was in contravention of Articles 44 (c), 90 (1) and 90 (2) of the Constitution.

(e) Whether the alleged act of the Speaker of Parliament in allowing the Chairperson of the Legal Affairs Committee, on 18th December 2017, in the absence of the Leader of Opposition, Opposition Chief Whip, and other Opposition members of Parliament, was in contravention of and inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A, 69 (1), 69 (2) (b), 71, 74, 75, 79, 82A and 108A of the Constitution.

(f) Whether the actions of the Speaker in suspending the 6 (six) Members of Parliament was in contravention of Articles 28, 42, 44, 79, 91, 94 and 259 of the Constitution.

(g) Whether the action of Parliament in: - waiving the requirement of a minimum of three sittings from the tabling of the Report yet it was not seconded; closing the debate on Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017 before every Member of Parliament could debate on the said Bill;

(iii) failing to close all doors during voting;

(iv) failing to separate the second and third reading by at least fourteen sitting days; are inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, 44 (c), 79, 94 and 263 of the Constitution.

8. Whether the passage of the Act without observing the 14 sitting days of Parliament between the 2nd and 3rd reading was inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Articles 262 and 263 (1) of the Constitution.

9. Whether the Presidential Assent to the Bill allegedly in the absence of a valid Certificate of Compliance from the Speaker and Certificate of the Electoral Commission that the amendment was approved at a referendum was inconsistent with and in contravention of Article 263 (2) (a) and (b) of the Constitution.

Whether section 5 of the Act which reintroduces term limits and entrenches them as subject to referendum is inconsistent with and*/ or in contravention of Article 260 (2)(a) of the Constitution.*

Whether section 9 of the Act, which seeks to harmonise the seven-year term of Parliament with Presidential term is inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Articles 105 (1) and 30 260 (2) of the Constitution.

Whether sections 3 and 7 of the Act, lifting the age limit without consulting the population are inconsistent with and/ or in contravention of Articles 21 (3) and 21 (5) of the Constitution.

Whether the continuance in Office by the President elected in 2016 and remains in office upon attaining the age of 75 years contravenes Articles 83 (1) (b) and 102 (c) of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.

Remedies available to the parties

In resolving the above issues, the Constitutional Court made the following declarations and orders:

1. By unanimous decision, the Court declared Sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No.1 of 2018, which provide for the extension of the tenure of Parliament and Local Government Councils by two years and the introduction of Presidential term–limits unconstitutional.

2. By majority decision of (Owiny–Dollo, DCJ; Kasule, Musoke, Cheborion, JJCC), the Court upheld Sections 1, 3, 4, and 7, of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018, on the removal of the age limit for the President and Chairperson Local Council V offices.

As regards costs, the Court awarded professional fees in the sum of Ushs. 20,000,000/= (Twenty million shillings) for three petitions. This was because in Petition No. 3 of 2018, the Petitioner prayed for disbursements only and in Petition No. 49 of 2017, the Petitioner represented himself. He was therefore not entitled to professional fees. In addition, the Court awarded two–thirds disbursements to all the Petitioners subject to tax.

Being dissatisfied with the decision and orders of the Constitutional Court, three (3) appeals vide Male Mabirizi vs. AG (Constitutional Appeal No.2 of 2018), Hon. Karuhanga Gerald and 5 others vs. AG (Constitutional Appeal No.3 of 2018) and Uganda Law Society vs. AG (Constitutional Appeal No.4 of 2018) were filed in this Court.

Issues for determination

At the pre-hearing conference, the parties with the guidance of Court agreed to the following eight issues:

1. Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves on the application of the basic structure doctrine.

2. Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enactment of Constitutional (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda and the Rules of Procedure of Parliament?

3. Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the violence/scuffle inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda?

4. Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they applied the substantiality test in determining the petition?

5. Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves when they held that the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 on the removal of the age limit for the President and Local Council V offices was not inconsistent with the provisions of the 1995 Constitution?

6. Whether the Constitutional Court erred in law and in fact in holding that the President elected in 2016 is not liable to vacate office on attaining the age of 75 years?

7a. Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court derogated the appellants' right to fair hearing, unjudiciously exercised their discretion and committed the alleged procedural irregularities.

7b. If so, what is the effect of the decision of the Court?

8. What remedies are available to the parties?

Before I resolve the issues raised in the appeal, I must state my position on the Preliminary objections brought by the respondent Attorney General.

I have read in draft the decision of my Learned Brother Hon. Justice Paul Mugamba, JSC regarding the said preliminary objections. And for the reasons he has given, I agree that the objections must fail.

I S S U E 1 :

Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves on the application of the Basic Structure Doctrine.

This issue was canvassed only by the second appellant. Counsel based his submissions on two points:

That the Constitutional Court restricted the application of the Basic Structure Doctrine to amendments which require a referendum. That in applying the basic structure doctrine the majority Justices of the Court ignored the significance of the Preamble.

Counsel submitted that the thrust of the Basic Structure Doctrine is that it attempts to identify the philosophy upon which a Constitution is based as opposed to a textual exegesis of the same. He submitted that the doctrine has been instrumental in shaping the Constitutional jurisprudence of different countries across the world. To augment his case, Counsel relied on authorities from across the globe.

From India, counsel cited Kesavananda Bharati vs. State of Kerala,[1]in which the Supreme Court of India held that: "According to the doctrine, the amendment power of Parliament is not unlimited; rather it does not include the power to abrogate or change the identity of the Constitution or its basic features." He also relied on the case of Minerva Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 1789, where court unanimously held that Parliament has no power to repeal, abrogate or destroy basic or essential features of a Constitution.

The appellant also cited the Council of Grand Justices of Taiwan who stated that: "Although the amendment of the Constitution has equal status with the Constitutional provisions, any amendment that alters the existing Constitution concerning governing norms and order, and, hence, the foundation of the Constitution's very existence destroys the integrity and fabric of the Constitution itself. As a result, such amendment shall be deemed improper."

Counsel also relied on the Bangladesh authority of Anwar Hossain Chowdhury vs Bangladesh[2]in which the Supreme Court of Bangladesh held that: "Call it by any name, basic structure or whatever, but that is the fabric of the Constitution which cannot be dismantled by an authority created by the Constitution itself namely the Parliament… Because the amending power is power given by the Constitution to Parliament and nevertheless it is a power within and not outside the Constitution".

And in South Africa, while discussing the applicability of the basic structure doctrine in Executive Council of Western Cape Legislature vs. The President of the Republic of South Africa and Others[1061]the South African Constitutional Court noted as follows: "There are certain fundamental features of Parliamentary democracy which are not spelt out in the Constitution but which are inherent in its very nature, design and purpose. Thus, the question has arisen in other countries as to whether there are certain features of the Constitutional order so fundamental that even if Parliament followed the necessary amendment procedures, it could not change them..."

In Kenya, the court of Appeal in the case of Njoya vs. Attorney General and Others[1062] held that: "Parliament may amend, repeal and replace as many provisions as it desired provided that the document retains its character as the existing Constitution and that alternation of the Constitution does not involve the substitution thereof a new one or the destruction of the identity [of the existing one"

A reading of the various persuasive authorities cited by Counsel leads to the conclusion that although Parliament may be (is) empowered to amend a Nation's Constitution that power does not extend to authority to produce an output which alters the country's Constitutional order. The Legislature should not engage in amendments which can be described as a Constitutional replacement. This is because the power to replace a Constitution with a radically different one - belongs to the people.

[1061]CCT27/95) [1995] ZACC 8; 1995 (10) BCLR 1289; 1995 (4) SA 877 (22 September 1995).
[1062] (2004) AHRLR 157.

Counsel argued that the Constitutional Court erred when they limited the application of the basic structure doctrine to amendments which require a referendum and consequently arriving at the decision that S. 3, 4 and 7 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 were not in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 79, 90 and 94 of the Constitution. In his view, such a construction of the doctrine was unduly restrictive. In support of his contention, counsel relied on the case of Kesavananda (supra) where court held that:

"To say that there are only two categories of Constitutions, rigid or controlled and flexible or uncontrolled and that the difference between them lies only in the procedure provided for amendment is an oversimplification. In certain Constitutions there can be procedural and or substantive limitations on the amending power. The procedural limitations could be by way of a prescribed form and manner without the satisfaction of which no amendment can validly result. The form and manner may take different forms such as a higher majority either in the houses of the concerned legislature sitting jointly or separately or by way of a convention, referendum etc. Besides these limitations, there can be limitations in the content and scope of the power. The true distinction between a controlled and an uncontrolled Constitution lies not merely in the difference in the procedure of amendment, but in the fact that in controlled Constitutions the Constitution has a higher status by whose touch-stone the validity of a law made by the legislature and the organ set up by it is subjected to the process of judicial review. Where there is a written Constitution which adopts the preamble of sovereignty in the people there is firstly no question of the law-making body being a sovereign body for that body possesses only those powers which are conferred on it. Secondly, however representative it may be, it cannot be equated with the people."

Counsel for appellant also pointed to the history of a country as a guide to Constitutional interpretation. In this, he associated himself with the finding of Kakuru JCC that every Constitution is a product of historical events that brought about its existence and the question whether the doctrine applies depends on the Constitutional history and the Constitutional structure of each country. The learned Justice also stated, not only that the doctrine applies to Uganda's Constitutional order, but also that Articles such as 1, 2 cannot be amended even through a referendum and that doing so would be tantamount to abrogating the Constitution and therefore a violation of Article 3 (4) which obliges all citizens to defend the Constitution. Kakuru continued to state that:

"Under Article 3(4) an amendment by Parliament may have the effect of abrogating the Constitution even if such an amendment has been enacted through a flawless procedure. I say so, because an Act of Parliament amending the Constitution is still subject to Article 2 thereof. It must pass the Constitutionality test."

In his postulation that a country's history is a guide to Constitutional interpretation, counsel also relied on the dissent judgment of Kasule, JA in Saleh Kamba & others Vs. Attorney General & others; Constitutional Petition No. 16 of 2013 where the learned Justice held that in interpreting a Constitution, court ought to take into account the history of a given country. In that case, learned Justice Kasule considered the issue of the basic structure of the Constitution and stated as follows:

Therefore, from the historical perspective, the Constitution is to be interpreted in a way that promotes the growth of democratic values and practices, while at the same time doing away or restricting those aspects of governance that are likely to return Uganda to a one party state and/ or make in-roads in the enjoyment of the basic human rights and freedoms of conscience, expression, assembly and association…

Counsel also relied on Yaakov vs Chairman of the Central Elections Committee for the sixth Knesset EA 1/65 where the Supreme Court of Israel held that: "... There are fundamental Constitutional principles that are of so elementary a nature, and so much the expression of law that precedes the Constitution, that the maker of the Constitution himself is bound by them. Other Constitutional norms, which do not occupy this rank and contradict these Rules can be void because they conflict with them.

In addition to a Nation's history, counsel also pointed to the Preamble of a Constitution as a guide to Constitutional interpretation. He argued that although the key pillars of the 1995 Constitution are reflected and embodied in the preamble to the Constitution the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court overlooked the significance of the preamble. Counsel cited several authorities from other jurisdictions in which courts considered the preamble as part of the basic structure of a Constitution.

In British Caribbean Bank v The Attorney of Belize Claim No. 597/2011, the Supreme Court of Belize invoked the basic structure doctrine to strike down a particular Constitutional amendment which was at variance with the preamble to the Constitution of Belize. The court emphasized that:

The basic structure doctrine holds that the fundamental principles of the preamble of the Constitution have to be preserved for all times to come and that they cannot be amended out of the existence.

There is though a limitation on the power of amendment by implication by the words of the preamble and therefore every provision of the Constitution is open to amendment, provided the foundation or basic structure of the Constitution is not removed, damaged or destroyed. …….

The preamble is the root of the tree from which the provisions of the Constitution spring, and which forms the basis of the intent and meaning of the provisions…. In the case of Minerva case (supra) while emphasizing the essence of the preamble, the Supreme Court of India explained that;

The preamble assures to the people of India a polity whose basic structure is described therein as a sovereign democratic Republic; Parliament may make any amendments to the Constitution as it deems expedient so long as they do not damage or destroy India's sovereignty and its democratic, republican character. Democracy is … a meaningful concept whose essential attributes are recited in the preamble itself.

In the case of Anwar case (supra), the Supreme Court of Bangladesh cited with approval the Indian case of Minerva case (supra) and held that: "… this preamble is not only part of the Constitution but stands as an entrenched provision that cannot be amended by Parliament alone. … If any provision can be called the pole star of the Constitution, then it is the preamble.

Finally, in the Kesavananda case (supra) court observed that the preamble constitutes a landmark in a country and sets out as a matter of historical fact what the people resolved to do for moulding their future destiny.

Counsel invited this Court to take cognizance of the fact that the framers of the 1995 Constitution deemed it necessary to enshrine within the text of the Constitution such provisions as would be necessary to give effect and operationalize the ideals encapsulated in the preamble as well the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy. He argued that these provisions included the two term presidential cap, presidential age limit and abolition of the Kelsenian theory under Article 3 of the Constitution. He contended that these "lofty" provisions were designed and intended to guarantee orderly succession to power and political stability which to date remain a mirage for our motherland.

He argued that by amending Article 102 (b) to remove the presidential age limit, after scrapping term limits, Parliament not only emasculated the preamble to the Constitution but also destroyed the basic features of the 1995 Constitution thereby rendering it hollow and a mere paper tiger.

It was the appellants' contention that the basic features of the Constitution herein mentioned to wit; supremacy of the Constitution as an embodiment of the sovereign will of the people; political order through adherence to a popular and durable Constitution; political and Constitutional stability as well as Constitutionalism and Rule of law in general were fundamentally eroded by the impugned Act thereby destroying the original identity and character of the 1995 Constitution. On that account alone the Constitutional Court ought to have invoked the basic structure doctrine to strike down the entire Constitution (Amendment) Act, No.1 of 2018.

Counsel submitted that Article 102 (b) was also intended to place the destiny of this country in the hands of a mature but not very old president; one who falls within the bracket of 35 to 75 years. That the framers of the Constitution recognized the dangers of entrusting the state structure in the hands of a young person or a frail elder however popular they may be. Uganda having adopted a Presidential system as opposed to a Parliamentary system; and given its checkered history characterized by political upheavals, coup d'etat as well as counter coup d'etat and rigged or sham elections opted to provide a mechanism of age limit as a basic feature of its 1995 Constitution.

Counsel prayed that Issue 1 be answered in the affirmative.

Respondent's reply

The Attorney General (AG) submitted that the Constitutional Court correctly applied the basic structure doctrine when they found that sections 3 and 7 of the impugned Act do not derogate from the Basic Structure of the 1995 Constitution.

Just as had been argued by the appellant, the AG submitted that the doctrine which was defined in the case of Kesavananda Bharati (supra) is to the effect that any amendment has to be done without destroying the spirit and the basic structure and the foundation upon which Uganda was built as a nation.

AG contended that the Constitutional Court clearly and correctly identified provisions of the Constitution which are fundamental and form part of the Basic Structure of the 1995 Constitution. He was in agreement with the court in arriving at the conclusion that what the framers considered as the foundation of the Constitution were safeguarded against the risk of abuse of the Constitution by irresponsible amendment of those provisions. According to the AG, the safeguards are the requirement of at least a two–thirds majority of the entire membership of Parliament, and a referendum, in fulfillment of the provisions of Articles 260 and 261 of the Constitution.

That it follows therefore that Articles 69, 74(1), 75, 260 and 261 of the 1995 Constitution cannot be amended by Parliament under the general powers conferred on it to make law as envisaged under the provisions of Articles 79 and 259 of the Constitution. Only the people can amend these Articles pursuant to the provision of Article 1(4) of the Constitution.

The AG argued that the Constituent Assembly that took a considerable amount of time to debate and eventually include the peoples' views in what eventually became the 1995 Constitution, was alive to the fact that our society is not static but dynamic and over the years, there would arise a need to amend the Constitution to reflect the changing times.

He further contended that Article 79 of the 1995 Constitution primarily gives Parliament the power to make laws that promote peace, order, development and good governance in Uganda. That Article 259 of the Constitution offers the procedure to the amendment of the Constitution by giving Parliament powers to enact an Act of Parliament, the sole purpose of which is to amend the Constitution by way of addition, variation, or repeal of any provision in accordance with the procedure laid down in Chapter Eighteen.

That therefore, it was within the powers of Parliament to enact sections 3 and 7 of the Constitutional Amendment Act 1/2018 into law and this did not in any way contravene the basic structure of the Constitution neither was it inconsistent with or in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 79, 90 and 94 of the Constitution.

The AG supported his arguments with the unanimous decision of the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court's in answer to whether sections 3 and 7 of the impugned Act derogated from the Basic structure of the 1995 Constitution. Owiny-Dollo DCJ held thus:

"…Since Parliament exercised power, which the people have conferred onto them under the provision of Article 2 of the Constitution, I am unable to fault it for the process it took to effect these amendments"

Justice Remmy Kasule noted that:

"…The framers of the 1995 Constitution … in their wisdom … did not put Article 102 amongst those Articles that have to be amended after first getting the approval of Ugandans through a referendum.''

The AG submitted that the people's power to elect the President or District Chairperson of their choice is not taken away by lifting their respective age limits. If anything, citizens would be 10 encouraged to aspire to elect leaders of their choice and to actively participate in politics and elections as they will now be presented with a wider choice of people to choose from.

In support of this submission, the AG referred to the judgment of Justice Elizabeth Musoke where she held as follows:

"…. I have not found Sections 3 and 7 among the ones that have offended or contravened the Constitution. Articles 102 and 183 are not among the entrenched Articles and their amendment did not infect any other provisions of the Constitution.

He also referred to the landmark decision in Kesavananda Bharati vs State of Kerala (supra) wherein it was held that principles of democracy and democratic government are part of the basic structure of the Indian Constitution and incapable of amendment.

The AG agreed with the finding of Cheborion JCC to the effect that that 1, 3 and 7 of the impugned Act were enacted within the reach of the amending power of Parliament and do not derogate from the Basic structure of the 1995 Constitution.

The respondent's Counsel also pointed out that the Odoki Constitutional Commission Report did not propose that the age limits of the President or other local government leaders should be entrenched provisions of the Constitution. The commission had in fact saw it fit that that it would be the electorate to decide on the appropriate candidate.

The respondent in essence agreed with the lower court's elucidation of the doctrine as a principle which does not require amendment procedures beyond what is specified through more stringent prerequisites such as referenda. Whatever is not "entrenched" can be amended under Article 259 of the Constitution.

Consideration by Court

Before I proceed to resolve the issue, I need to get over what I consider a preliminary point. The appellants invited this Court to adopt what the Kakuru JCC outlined as the basic features of the 1995 Constitution. These include: sovereignty of the people and their inalienable right to determine the form of governance for the country; the supremacy of the Constitution; adherence to a popular and durable Constitution; Political and Constitutional stability based on principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and public participation in decision making at all levels; Rule of Law, observance of the Bill of Rights; land belongs to the people and not the state; Natural Resources are held by government in trust for the people; the eminent domain concept, the duty of every citizen to defend the Constitution and Parliament not to make laws legalizing a one party state; separation of powers and accountability of the government to the people.

However, I am unable to oblige the appellants' prayer. As was in the Kesavananda case, each of the Justices of Uganda's Constitutional Court pointed out different features as constituting the basic structure of Uganda's Constitution. In Justice Owiny-Dollo's view, the basic features of the 1995 Constitution are: the sovereignty of the people, the supremacy of the Constitution, political and Constitutional stability, Rule of law, non-derogable rights, eminent domain, non-establishment of a one party state, duty of every citizen to defend the Constitution and separation of powers. According to Justice Musoke JCC, the basic features of the Constitution are: the preamble, sovereignty of the people, the Bill of Rights found in Chapter Four of the Constitution and the non-derogable rights in Article 44 of the Constitution.

I now move on to the central issue – Did the Constitutional Court misconstrue the essence of the Basic Structure Doctrine?

I posit that from a reading of the various persuasive authorities cited by both counsel, it can be concluded that BSD is to the effect that although Parliament may be (is) empowered to amend a Nation's Constitution that power does not extend to authority to produce an output which alters the country's Constitutional order. The Legislature should not engage in amendments which can be described as a Constitutional replacement. This is because the power to replace a Constitution with a different one belongs to the people. The respondents too agreed with this principle.

What therefore was in contention is not whether the Basic Structure Doctrine is applicable in Uganda but rather whether removing the age cap at which an individual can offer themselves for either the Presidency or District Chairperson would violate the basis structure of Uganda's Constitution.

However, in addition to the principle that the power to amend does not extend to authority to produce an output which alters the character or spirit of the Constitution, some of the authorities also posit that in amending provisions of the Constitution, the Legislature must be guided, not only by the procedure specifically laid down in the Constitution but must in addition identify and be guided by the implicit values and principles which form the bedrock of the Constitution.

It is to be noted that Uganda's Constitution provides for the amendment of various provisions by Parliament. These provisions are categorised into three; the first category is amendments requiring a referendum and the support of two-thirds majority votes of members of Parliament. Under this category are Articles: 259 (on the requirement for a referendum), l and 2 (Sovereignty of the people and Supremacy of the Constitution); 44(Prohibition of derogation from particular human rights and freedoms); 69, 74 and 75 (prohibition of a one party state and the right to choose a political system), 79 (2) (power of Parliament to make laws); 105 25 (1) (tenure of the Office of the President being five years); 128 (1) (independence of the Judiciary); and Chapter Sixteen(providing for the institution of traditional or cultural leaders).

The second category contains provisions whose amendment requires approval by District Councils and the support of two-thirds of all members of Parliament at the second and third readings. The said Articles are: 5 (2) (providing for the districts of Uganda); 152 (on tax laws); 176 (1), 178, 189 and 197 (providing for local government system and their functions).

The third category contains provisions whose amendment requires the support of two-thirds of all members of Parliament at the second and third readings. The Articles under this category are those which are not included in the above mentioned category. This means that Article 102 (b) of the Constitution falls under this category.

I note that the amendment of provisions in the first and second category require not only the support of two-thirds majority but also the support of the public through a referendum or the District Local Councils. The provisions in these categories have been said to constitute the

Constitution's basic structure and cannot be amended by normal Constitutional processes.[1063]

The provisions under the third category where Article 102 (b) falls only requires the support of two-thirds majority. No further stringent requirement for amending such provisions is (explicitly) imposed by the Constitution.

On the basis of the fact that Article 102 (b) of the Constitution fell under the third category, the category whose provisions could be amended by the support of two-thirds of all members of Parliament at the second and third readings, the majority Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court held that it therefore follows that it was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution to include the age qualifications of a President as part of the basic features of the Constitution. That had it been the intention of the framers that Article 102 (b) could only be amended by the people as opposed to being amended by the people's representatives, the Article would have been "entrenched" just like the provisions in the first and second categories.

Was the Constitutional Court correct in its interpretation of the Basic Structure Doctrine?

The Basic Structure Doctrine is Judge Made Law. My understanding of the doctrine is that it communicates an implied limitation on the power of Parliament to amend the Constitution.

The claim that a particular provision is a basic feature of the Constitution is determined by the court in each case that comes before it. I therefore do not find it necessary to set down an exhaustive list of what constitutes the basic structure of Uganda's Constitution.

I must emphasize however that I subscribe to the view that the Basic Structure Doctrine is a fundamental factor of Constitutionalism which holds together the substratum of the Rule of law. The doctrine requires that the spirit of the Constitution as distinct from the text be invoked in interpretation of the Constitution.

What constitutes the Basic Structure of a Constitution is not exclusively explicit, it is also implicit. The Basic Structure Doctrine deals with principles and values inherent in a Constitution. It transcends procedural imperatives and its essence cannot be reduced to procedural imperatives which must be followed in amending a particular provision.

The import of the doctrine is that it communicates an implied limitation on the power of Parliament to amend the Constitution – the power to amend is not the same as the power to re-write or replace a Constitution. There is therefore a direct link between the Basic Structure Doctrine and the philosophy of Constitutional replacement. The latter power is with the people and not with the people's representatives.

I posit that the Basic Structure Doctrine is concerned with the substance of a particular provision and its linkages to the spirit or character of the Constitution and with universally accepted principles such as democracy, human dignity, and peoples' sovereignty. I posit that any Article dealing with universally accepted human is part of the Constitution's fabric. I also posit that provisions of the Constitution which inherently rest on the universally acceptable principle of separation of powers between the Judiciary, Parliament and the Executive - such as the independence of the Judiciary - are part of the Constitution's basic structure. The list is long.

[1063] Kesavananda vs. State of Kerala (1973) 4 S.C.C. at 313-329.

And the question which should be asked is: what is the bed rock, the purpose, the value inherent in a particular provision? Would the amendment of this particular provision contravene the spirit of the Constitution, would it alter the character of the Constitution? In which ways would the amendment of a particular provision for example go against the aspirations of the people as espoused in the preamble and in the National Objectives and Directive Principles – both of which were necessitated by our sad history?

I therefore agree with the appellant that to equate the doctrine to the need for referenda is a narrow interpretation of the doctrine.

In the matter before us, the specific question to be answered is: would the removal of the age restriction regarding eligibility to stand for presidency and for the office of District Chairperson change the character of the Constitution? I must answer the question: can one say that alteration of Article 102 (b) which set a minimum and maximum age for presidency and Article 183 (2) (b) which set age limits to who can stand for the office of District

Chairperson restricted run counter to the character of the Constitution?

But before I answer that question, I must also answer another question: what is the role of the Preamble in Constitutional Adjudication?

The preamble to a Constitution has grown from serving as a mere introduction or preface to the substantive part of the Constitution to emerging as the document that lays down the basic structure of the Constitution.[1064] The preamble contains the fundamental values and guiding principles on which the Constitution is based.[7] It serves as a guiding light for Constitutional Judges to interpret the Constitution in its light.[1065]

According to Liav Orgad (2010),[1066] a preamble is the part of the Constitution that best reflects the Constitutional understandings of the framers, what Carl Schmitt[1067] calls the "fundamental political decisions." A preamble presents the history behind the Constitution's enactment, as well as the nation's core principles and values. The preamble "is a key to open[ing] the mind of the makers, as

[1064] The Basic Structure Doctrine of the Indian Constitution: A comparative study of the preambles of the UDHR, ICCPR and ICESCR with the preamble to the Constitution of India, page 30. [7] Ibid, page 42

[1065] Ibid, page 42.

[1066] International Journal of Constitutional Law, Vol 8, Issue 4, 714-738.

[1067] Carl Schmitt, Constitutional Theory 77–79 (Jeffrey Seitzer trans. and ed., 2008).

to the mischiefs, which are to be remedied, and the objects, which are to be accomplished.[1068]

A look at the contents of the Preamble to Uganda's Constitution indeed reflects the country's history. One can confidently say that the preamble to Uganda's Constitution has an explanatory purpose: it serves to specify the reasons for the Constitution's enactment, its raison d'être and eternal ideals. Consequently, the preamble to our Constitution is a guiding framework for Constitutional interpretation and a guide in understanding the spirit of the Constitution. It is what Liav Orgad (supra) refers to as an interpretive preamble.

The importance of an interpretive preamble is that it is part of a Constitution's Basic Structure. In Kesavananda Bharati vs. State of Kerala (supra), the Indian Supreme Court Ruled that the preamble is the key to understanding the Constitution and interpreting its clauses. It was further held that the preamble, together with the Fundamental Rights and the Directive Principles of State Policy – the most important parts of the Indian Constitution – constitute the core of the Constitution. Jaganmohan Reddy J stated that elements of the basic features of the Indian Constitution were to be found in the preamble of the Constitution.

I am persuaded that the above is as true of Uganda's Constitution as it is for the Indian Constitution. Liav (ibid) posits that Preambles are not only a source of rights and powers but also of entrenchment. (My emphasis).

It must therefore be concluded that the Preamble is part of the Basic Structure of our Constitution and the authority of Parliament to amend a specific provision in the Constitution must be tested against the principles in the preamble. Consequently, I must answer the question: can one say that alteration of Articles 102 (b) … which set a minimum and maximum age for presidency and LCV … run counter to the character of the Constitution as represented in the preamble?

I must also posit that in addition to the Preamble, the power to amend a specific provision in the Constitution must be tested against the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy. The central position of the National Objectives and Principles of State Policy in the country's governance was made clear by an amendment to the Constitution which introduced Article 8A which states that Uganda shall be governed based on principles of national interest and common good enshrined in the national Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy. Does an amendment of an Article restricting the age at which an individual can stand for Presidency go against any of the National Objectives and Principles of State Policy?

I have carefully studied the Constitutional Court judgments and find that the learned Justices did not ignore the preamble in considering the basic structure doctrine. In fact, Justice Musoke JCC did mention the preamble as well as the National Objectives and Directive Principles as basic features of Uganda's Constitution. She further held that the preamble to the Constitution captures the spirit behind the Constitution. That the preamble is meant to emphasize the popularity and durability of the Constitution. Cheborion JCC also held that the Preamble and National Objectives and Directive Principles of State are part of the Basic Structure of the Constitution. Justice Kakuru JCC (dissenting) also referred to the preamble in applying the basic structure doctrine.

[1068] Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 218-219 (1883).

I therefore hold that on the face of it, the 2nd appellants' submission that the court ignored the preamble being untenable. Nevertheless, it is possible that after referring to the Preamble, the Learned Justices did not go further to clearly identify the principles and values therein and then come to the conclusion that amending Article 102 (b) and Article 183 (2) (b) would in no way violate the identified principles.

I posit that the import of the Preamble is that it places the Constitution in a historical context. The Constitution was enacted as a tool to protect the people of Uganda from the ills of our sad history, a history characterised by tyranny, oppression and exploitation. It is a history of political and Constitutional instability. What is contained in the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State are linked to the said history. In the appeal before us, Democratic Principle (i) and (ii) are relevant. Principle (i) provides that: The State shall be based on democratic principles which empower and encourage the active participation of all citizens at all levels in their own governance. Democratic Principle (ii) provides that: All the people of Uganda shall have access to leadership positions at all levels, subject to the Constitution.

Counsel invited this court to take cognizance of the fact that the framers of the 1995 Constitution deemed it absolutely necessary to enshrine within the text of the Constitution such provisions as would be necessary to give effect and operationalize the ideals encapsulated in the preamble as well the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy. He argued that these provisions included the two term presidential cap, presidential age limit and abolition of the Kelsenian theory under Article 3 of the Constitution. All these lofty provisions were designed and intended to guarantee orderly succession to power and political stability which to date remains a mirage for our motherland.

As already stated, it was the appellants' contention that the basic features of the Constitution are supremacy of the Constitution as an embodiment of the sovereign will of the people; political order through adherence to a popular and durable Constitution; political and Constitutional stability as well as Constitutionalism and Rule of law. Counsel for the appellant argued that these were fundamentally eroded by the impugned Act thereby destroying the original identity and character of the 1995 Constitution.

Even if I were to agree with what the appellant considers to be the Basic Structure of Uganda's Constitution, there is no evidence to the effect that the tyranny, oppression and exploitation suffered by Ugandans in the past was a result of the leadership being in the hands of particular age groups. I am unable to come to the conclusion that the impugned amendment had the effect of reintroducing the Kelsenian theory into our law or that the amendment violated the sovereignty of the People. It cannot be said that the impugned Section ignored the supremacy of the Constitution. There is no evidence that removing age restrictions in leadership positions would violate the aspirations of Ugandans to build a society based on democracy, a politically and constitutionally stable society.

I therefore hold that amending Article 102 (b) and 183 (2) (b) did not violate the basic structure of Uganda's Constitution.

I S S U E 2

Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and in fact in holding that the entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda and the Rules of Procedure of Parliament.

The appellants contend that there were fatal irregularities committed from the time the motion was presented in Parliament until it was enacted into law.

In resolving the appellants' complaints under this issue, I will in tandem discuss the chronological legislative path that a Private Member's Bill takes.

Article 94 (4) of the Constitution and Rule 120(1) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament (hereinafter abbreviated as Rules) provide for the right of a Member of Parliament to move a Private Member's Bill.

It is pertinent from the outset to note that in October 2017, the 2012 Rules of Procedure of Parliament were amended and the 2017 Rules came into force. Since the amendment occurred during the time when Parliament was already in the process of enacting the impugned Act, the Rules applicable to the proceedings in Parliament at each stage depended on whether the sitting was before or after the amendment.

Stage 1-Leave to bring a motion

According to Rule 121 (1) a Private Member's Bill is first introduced by way of Motion. Rule 55 provides that the motion shall only be moved after the Member responsible for its introduction has given the Speaker 3 days' written notice. After expiry of the 3 days' written notice, the motion shall then be placed on the Order Paper.

In the instant appeal, Hon. Raphael Magyezi introduced a Private Member's Bill seeking to amend various Constitutional provisions. On 21st September 2017, the office of the Deputy Speaker as well as the Clerk received the written notice of the said motion. On 26th Tuesday September 2017, the Speaker informed the House that Magyezi's motion to bring a Private Members' Bill had passed the test of 3 days written notice required by Rule 47 of the old 2012 Rules and was allowed to seek leave to introduce the Bill.

The Hansard of 26th September 2017 at the second session of the 7th sitting reports the Speaker addressing the House as follows:

"Honourable members, I have spent a bit of time trying to rationalize a number of requests for motions for the amendment of the Constitution. Therefore, I will be amending the Order Paper to permit those which are eligible to be presented. For a long time, we have been demanding that the Government presents in this House Constitutional amendments. The last time we discussed this was a year ago when we asked them to bring a comprehensive amendment, but they have not done so. I am now constrained; I do not know how long I can continue stopping Members from bringing motions. Now that the Government has failed, Members should proceed and bring the motions so that we do our part."

The Speaker then went ahead and cited Rule 47 (supra) which allows a Private Members to bring a Bill after 3 days' notice. She then continued her address to the House:

"if we are to include any of the motions on today's Order Paper, the office of the Speaker should have received that notice by 21st September 2017. The following notices for motions for leave to introduce Private Member's Bill have met the test under Rule 47 for inclusion in today's Order Paper: the Magyezi motion whose notice was received by the office of the Deputy Speaker on 21st September 2017; Lyomoki motion providing for the transitional term for the first President under the 1995 Constitution whose notice was received by the Office of the Speaker on 21st September 2017; and the Nsamba motion providing for set up of a Constitutional review Commission to comprehensively review the Constitution. The notice for this motion was received by the Office of the Speaker on 18th September 2017. It had a draft motion attached to it. This motion therefore also meets the test under Rule 47 of our Rules of Procedure for inclusion on today's Order Paper."

However, before Hon. Magyezi sought the leave to introduce Constitutional (Amendment) Bill No.1 of 2018, Hon. Ssegona raised a procedural issue arising out of Rule 26 (1) which states that, "the Clerk shall send to each Member a copy of the Order Paper for each sitting- in the case of the first sitting of a meeting, at least two days before that sitting and in case of any other sitting, at least three hours before the sitting without fail."

Hon. Ssegona raised issue that the Order Paper received by all Members did not include the Magyezi motion. That the Speaker had amended the Order Paper to include the said motion. The Hansard also shows that Hon. Winifred Kiiza also raised the same issue and noted that on the 19th and 20th September the Deputy Speaker had assured Parliament that the matter would not be brought on the floor by "surprise (without first going to the Business Committee). Hon Kiiza stated that since a ruling to that effect had been made by the Chair (Deputy Speaker), such a ruling had to be taken seriously. That whereas the Order Paper was brought out early, the Magyezi proposal had not been includedtherein The Speaker answered: "Honourable Leader of the Opposition, are you questioning the powers of the Speaker?"

The Constitutional Court held that the Rules do not require the Speaker to seek permission from the Members of Parliament or any other person to determine what should be included on the Order Paper. Therefore, the Speaker could not be accused of having smuggled the Magyezi motion onto the Order Paper.

Appellants' submissions

The appellants fault the Constitutional Court for the above finding and submitted that Rule 174 vests the Business Committee with the power to determine the contents of the Order Paper. That the Speaker's powers are limited to determining the order of Business in Parliament and not the Order Paper.

In support of this alleged contravention, the appellants relied on the affidavit evidence of Hon. Semujju Nganda which supported the petition in the Constitutional Court wherein he deponed that:

On 19th and 20th September 2017, the Deputy Speaker of Parliament assured the House that there was not going to be any ambush of the Members of Parliament concerning the Bill introduced by Magyezi since all business was to go through the Business Committee of the House for appropriate action and consideration. That however, on 26th September 2017, the Members of Parliament were taken by surprise when the Speaker amended the Order Paper which was already on the floor of Parliament to include the leave sought by Hon. Magyezi to bring a Private Member's Bill.

The appellants contended that according to Rules 27 and 29 (1), the Speaker had the duty to direct the Clerk to distribute in advance to all Members the Order Paper. This had been done 10 without the Magyezi motion.

AG's Reply

The AG submitted that the Speaker's action of amending the Order Paper was authorized by Article 94 (4). The AG also relied on Rule 25 which provides that the Speaker shall determine the order of business of the House and shall give priority to government business. The AG further contended that the Speaker had been given written notice of the Magyezi motion 3 days in advance before it was placed on the Order Paper on 26th September 2017.

Therefore, the appellants' contention that the Magyezi Bill was smuggled onto the Order Paper was unfounded.

Consideration by Court

Article 94 (1) provides that:

"Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, Parliament may make Rules to regulate its own procedure, including the procedure of its Committees.

(4) The Rules of Procedure of Parliament shall include the following provisions –

(a)The Speaker shall determine the order of business in Parliament and shall give priority to Government Business."

In line with Article 94 (4), Parliament made Rule 25. Rule 25 provides as follows:

"(1) The Speaker shall determine the order of business of theHouse and shall give priority to Government business.

(2) Subject to sub Rule (1), the business for each sitting asarranged by the Business Committee in consultation with the Speaker shall be set out in the Order Paper for each sitting and shall wherever possible be in the following order –

(a) – (y)."

The Rules made by Parliament complied with Article 94 (4) (a) and in fact Rule 25 (1) is in pari materia with the Constitutional imperative that the authority to determine the order of business is with the Speaker.

I however note that the Constitution is silent as to who has the authority to determine what gets to the Order Paper. On the other hand, the Rule 25(2) gives the said role to the Business Committee.

The power of the Business Committee is however subject to the Speaker's authority – the authority set out by Article 94 (4) (a) and Rule 25 (1) – authority to determine the Order of Business.

In resolving this issue, it is important to understand the two different phrases used in the provisions under discussion – Order Paper and Order of Business. In Parliamentary language, an Order Paper would mean the agenda of Parliament at a particular sitting.

On the other hand, Order of Business would be the arrangement of business, the sequence/order in which items will be discussed during a sitting, the time allocated for each item on the agenda and so on. This sequence may be a standard order of business or a sequence listed on an agenda or Order Paper that the Parliament has agreed to follow. This is drawn from Rule 25 (5) which provides that: "The Clerk shall, on instructions of the Speaker, draw up theorder of business for each sitting." (My emphasis)

Rule 174 relied on by the appellants to argue that the power to determine the contents of the Order Paper lies in the Business Committee provides as follows:

"It shall be the function of the Business Committee subject to Rule 25, to arrange the business of each meeting and the order in which it shall be taken; except that the powers of the Committee shall be without prejudice to the powers of the Speaker to determine the order of business in Parliament and in particular the Speaker's power to give priority to Government business as required by clause (4) (a) of Article 94 of the Constitution."

Although Rule 174 (supra) gives power to the Business Committee to arrange the business of each meeting, the Rule does not circumvent the powers of the Speaker given in Rule 25. In fact, Rule 174 and 25 (2) contain the proviso "subject to" which means that the power of the Business Committee to determine the order of business does not override that of the Speaker. The Speaker remains with the final word as to what order the business of Parliament will take. And under Rule 25 (5) the Clerk draws up theorder of business for each sitting on instruction by the Speaker. One notes that the provisions are consistent in linking the powers of the Speaker to determining the order of business but not anywhere does the law link her powers to determining the content of the Order Paper. The provisions limit the Speaker's powers to determining the order of Business in Parliament, the powers do not extend to determining what is to be on the Order Paper. It must have been for this reason that on both the 19th and 20th September 2017, the Deputy Speaker of Parliament assured the House that there was not going to be any ambush of the Members of Parliament concerning the Bill introduced by Magyezi, since allbusiness was to go through the Business Committee of the House for appropriate action and consideration.

It must also be noted that the power to determine the items to be discussed is vested in the Business Committee in consultation with the Speaker. The Speaker is the chair of the said Committee. This means that the power in question is bestowed on a Committee which the Speaker is chair of. The power bestowed upon the Committee cannot be unilaterally exercised by the Speaker, consultation is expected. However, because the Speaker is the Chair of the Business Committee and furthermore the Committee cannot act in isolation but rather in consultation with the Speaker, the role of the Speaker is not whittled down.

I must therefore find that the Speaker had no power to unilaterally determine the contents of the Order Paper/the agenda of the sitting.

I must also emphasize that a reading of all the provisions giving power to the Speaker – Article 94; Rule 25, Rule 174 oblige the Speaker to give priority to Government Business.

"The Speaker shall determine the order of business of the House and shall give priority to Government business. (Article 10 94 and Rule 25)."

"… the Speaker to determine the order of business in Parliament and in particular the Speaker's power to give priority to Government business. (Rule 174)"

It must therefore be concluded that the major reason for empowering the Speaker was to ensure that Government business would be given precedence over other matters. It is this that the power of the Business Committee is subject to. The power was not for purposes of enabling the Speaker to take unilateral decisions without engaging the Business Committee and thus rendering the Committee redundant.

From the above, I come to the conclusion that whereas the Speaker had the authority to determine the order of business, the amendment to the Order Paper which was done on the floor did not comply with the Rules.

Stage 2-Secondement

According to Rule 59 (1) after a Private Member is granted permission to introduce a Bill amending the Constitution, the Private Member's motion has to be seconded. It is on record that the Magyezi Motion was seconded.

At this point, the Speaker also ensures that the Private Member's Bill is accompanied with a Certificate of financial implication.

Under this stage, I will deal with the legal requirement of a Certificate of Financial Implications as well as the import of Article 93 of the Constitution.

Certificate of Financial Implications

Section 76 (1) of the Public Finance Management Act as well as Rule 117 require every Bill introduced in Parliament to be accompanied by a Certificate of Financial Implications issued by the Minister of Finance. The Certificate indicates the estimates of revenue and expenditure over the period of not less than two years after the Bill is passed. It also indicates the impact of the Bill on the economy.

The Attorney General submitted that the evidence on record shows that on 3rd October 2017, when Hon. Raphael Magyezi moved the House to have the Bill read for the first time, it was accompanied by a Certificate of Financial Implications as required by Section 76 of the Public Finance Management Act and the Rules of Procedure of Parliament. In the Attorney General's view, this Certificate also served as a guarantee that the Bill did not have financial implications prohibited by Article 93 of the Constitution.

The Attorney General emphatically submitted that Parliament only proceeded with the original Bill presented by the Hon. Raphael Magyezi after the Speaker and the House were satisfied that the Bill was accompanied by a Certificate of Financial Implications. That this position was confirmed by the Constitutional Court in the judgments of Kasule, Kakuru and Cheborion, JJCC.

Consideration by Court

I note that the Certificate of Financial Implications from the Minister of Finance dated 28th September, 2017 was issued in respect to the original Magyezi Bill which dealt with the amendment of Article 102 (b). This Certificate was received by Parliament on 29th September, 2017 and presented before the House on 3rd October, 2017.

I also note that the original Magyezi Bill did not contain provisions on term limits or the extension of tenure of Parliament which required to be voted on through a referendum. However, the Hansard of Wednesday, 20th December 2017 indicates that while at the Committee stage, Hon. Tusiime proposed amendments to the effect that the tenure of Parliament be extended from five to seven years. These amendments were adopted into the Bill. In support of the said amendments, Hon. Rukutana (the Deputy Attorney General) stood in Parliament and stated that the Minister of Finance had provided a Certificate of Financial Implications in regard to the amendments and the Certificate indicated that if the expected amendments pass, the country will register a saving in revenues."

At the hearing of this matter in the lower court, the Clerk to Parliament tendered in evidence the second Certificate of Financial Implications accompanying the amendments introduced by Hon. Tusiime. Upon interrogation, the Court came to the conclusion that it was not a valid certificate for the following reasons:

(i) Hon. Mugoya Kyawa Gaster, Member of Parliament, Bukoli County North, Bugiri who had requisitioned for the second Certificate of Financial Implications from the Minister of Finance on 18th December, 2017 did not have the legal capacity to do so because it was Hon. Tusiime and not Mugoya who moved the amendments in Parliament.

(ii) Although Hon. Mugoya's letter of requisition was dated 18th December 2017, the endorsements and receipt stamps on the letter showed that it was received by the Deputy Secretary to Treasury on 17th December 2017. The Minister of Finance gave instructions to process the certificate on 16th December 2017. It was unexplainable how the certificate could be processed days earlier before the letter requisitioning for it was actually written.

(iii)Furthermore, no dates and particulars were given to Court as to who received the certificate for and on behalf of Parliament. The Clerk to Parliament only informed Court that, as the accounting officer of Parliament, it was her responsibility to originate a letter to the Minister of Finance requesting for a Certificate of Financial Implications as regards any Bill or amendment to be tabled before Parliament.

Arising from the above reasons, the Constitutional Court came to the conclusion that the second Certificate of Financial Implications was wrongly applied for, issued and was not genuine. Accordingly, it served no legal purpose.

The question which then follows is: whether a Certificate which spoke to only a part of the Bill fulfilled the requirements of the law?

The facts on record reveal that the Certificate of Financial Implications issued on 28th September, 2017 was only in respect to the original Magyezi Bill. Accordingly, the amendments introduced by Hon. Tusiime on 20th December 2017 were not covered at all by that certificate. The Certificate which would have covered the amendments was requisitioned from the Minister of Finance but was rejected by the Constitutional Court as invalid.

I therefore come to the conclusion that by the time the Bill was passed, it was not accompanied by a Certificate speaking to the whole document in its entirety. As a result, I answer this sub-issue in the affirmative.

I now move onto Article 93 of the Constitution which prohibits Parliament from proceeding on a Private Member's Bill that creates a charge on the Consolidated Fund.

Bill violated Article 93

Article 93 of the Constitution provides that:

"Parliament shall not, unless the Bill or the motion is introduced on behalf of the Government—

(a) proceed upon a Bill, including an amendment Bill, that makes provision for any of the following the imposition of a charge on the Consolidated Fund or other public fund of Uganda or the alteration of any such charge otherwise than by reduction;

……..

…….

(b) proceed upon a motion, including an amendment to a motion, the effect of which would be to make provision for any of the purposes specified in paragraph (a) of this Article." (My emphasis)

The provision bars Parliament from proceeding upon a private Member's Bill which imposes a charge by way of increment on the Consolidated Fund or Public Fund of Uganda.

The Constitutional Court held that, the introduction of the Private Member's Bill that led to the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 was not inconsistent with Article 93 of the Constitution, except for the introduction of Sections 2,5,6,8 and 10 because they required a referendum which has a charge on the Consolidated Fund. Musoke, JCC specifically held that the proposed Private Member's Bill in its original form together with its proposed four amendments was not likely to impose a charge on the Consolidated Fund and was budget neutral. However, the amendments which re-introduced term limits and increased the tenure of Parliament and Local Government Councils had the effect of imposing a charge on the Consolidated Fund.

Appellants' submissions

The gist of both the 2nd and 3rd appellants' argument is that the court having found that some of the provisions in the Bill contravened Article 93 should have come to no other conclusion than to nullify the whole Act.

Counsel for the 3rd appellant specifically argued that the words "Parliament shall not proceed" in Article 93 should be given their ordinary meaning. He supported his argument with the authority of Theodore Sekikubo and ors vs. Attorney General[1069] where this Court applied the cardinal rule of statutory interpretation that where words are clear and unambiguous, they should be given their primary, plain, ordinary and natural meaning.

In counsel's view, the words "Parliament shall not proceed" in their ordinary interpretation mean "to stop, not to go forward". He argued that Parliament proceeded with the Bill contrary to Article 93 and subsequently enacted the Act. The fact that the offending provisions were later found to be unconstitutional does not change the fact that Parliament proceeded with the Bill in contravention of the Constitution.

Counsel further contended that according to Rule 113 of the 2012 Rules, the Speaker was required to inform the House that the Bill contravened Article 93. However, the Speaker Ruled that Article 93 was not applicable because the House was dealing with a Committee report and not a Bill. Counsel contended that the Speaker's Ruling was wrong because she had earlier put the question that the Bill be read for the second and called for a vote on the same. Therefore, Article 93 (b) (supra) was applicable.

Counsel contended further that even if the Speaker's Ruling (that the House was dealing with a Committee report and not a Bill) was to be true, the report of the Committee of the Whole House 10 contained provisions which created a charge on the Consolidated Fund.

That in the above circumstances, the Constitutional Court could not validate the unconstitutional acts by severing the offending parts of the Bill.

Counsel also faulted the Constitutional Court for using the Certificate of Financial Implications as the test for determining whether the Bill created a charge on the Consolidated Fund.

In counsel's view, by the Minister stating in paragraph 'e' of the Certificate that there were no additional financial obligations beyond what was provided in the medium term expenditure framework meant that the Bill had financial implications. That "medium term" is defined in the Public Finance Management Act as a period of three to five years. A medium term expenditure framework is a primary document which contains the consensus on policies, reform measures, projects and programmes that a Government is committed to implement during a specific period of between three and five years. It draws on a larger objective such as vision 2025. It may identify priority areas scheduled for implementation during the period, specify economic growth percentage expected policy goals, project sources of financing etc. According to counsel, it is just a plan which is incapable of being used as a yardstick to determine whether a Bill creates a charge on the Consolidated Fund under Article 93 of the Constitution. Thus, the Minister's assertion that the Bill will not have additional financial obligations beyond what is provided in the Medium Term Plan has no relevance to determine whether or not the Bill will create a charge on the Consolidated Fund. Counsel argued that when the law requires a determination of whether a Bill places a charge on the Consolidated Fund, it is erroneous to use a forecast/plan as the yardstick.

[1069] Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No. 01 of 2015.

That the determination of whether a Bill creates a charge on the Consolidated Fund is the Speaker's role and not the Minister of Finance since Article 93 (supra) opens with the phrase: "Parliament shall not proceed ..."

In respect to the 29 million facilitation, counsel argued that Article 156 of the Constitution requires Parliament to prepare estimates which are included in a Bill to be known as an Appropriation Bill "which shall be introduced into Parliament to provide for issue from the Consolidated Fund of the sums necessary to meet that expenditure."

Article 154 of the Constitution also provides that no monies shall be withdrawn from the Consolidated Fund except…. where the issue of those monies has been authorized by an Appropriation Act." The Appropriation Act is in this respect a conduit from the Consolidated Fund. Counsel submitted that it was erroneous for the Constitutional Court to hold that the 29 million did not come from the Consolidated Fund but the account of Parliament. The decision to pay that money was a result of the Motions for the 1st and 2nd second reading of the Bill. Those Motions therefore had the effect of removing 29 million shillings from the Consolidated Fund albeit unconstitutionally. To hold otherwise would mean that expenditure on Magyezi Bill was provided for in the 2016/17 Budget since it was introduced in September 2017. It would mean that at the time of preparing budget estimates in 2016, Parliament was aware of this Bill and made provision for it. That does not seem logical. The logical conclusion is that the Ministry of Finance provided the money. If it was not so, Parliament would have presented evidence of both its estimates for the financial year 2016/17 together with the Appropriation Act. The burden to do so laid with the Respondent but it failed to do so.

On the other hand, the 1st appellant (Mr. Mabirizi) submitted that since the impugned Act affected expenses of various offices like the Electoral Commission, payments and emoluments to the President and Local Government leaders which are charged on the Consolidated Fund, the Bill could not be introduced by a Private Member. To support this argument, Mabirizi cited Article 66(3) of the Constitution and Section 9(2) of the Electoral Commission Act, which are to the effect that the Commission's expenses are charged on the Consolidated Fund.

Mabirizi further contended that the impugned Act added more 15 days for the Supreme Court to determine a Presidential Election petition lodged before it which translated into more allowances. That Article 128(5) of the Constitution provides that, "the administrative expenses of the judiciary, including all salaries, allowances … shall be charged on the Consolidated Fund."

In his view Mabirizi argued that Article 93 (supra) prohibits 'proceeding' against a Bill or motion as opposed to Article 92 which prohibits the 'passing' of a Bill. Mabirizi relied on the Black's Law Dictionary[13], to define the words 'proceeding' and 'passing'. Proceeding is defined as an act or step that is part of a larger action." This means that any step, be it notification of the Speaker of an impending motion or the seeking of leave is prohibited under Article 93. Passing on the other hand is defined as enact (a legislative Bill or resolution); or to adopt.

Mabirizi prayed that the impugned Act be considered illegal and struck out since its enactment was prohibited by Article 93.

AG's reply

The Attorney General submitted that the Justices of the Constitutional Court were right to apply the principle of severance by striking out the provisions of the impugned Act that did not comply with Article 93 and maintained those that complied with the Constitutional provision.

The Attorney General invited this Court to uphold the decision of the Constitutional Court that the original Bill presented by Hon.

Magyezi did not contravene Article 93 of the Constitution.

In regard to the twenty-nine million given to the Members of Parliament, the Attorney General relying on the affidavit evidence of the Clerk to Parliament submitted that the said sum of money was appropriated for use by the Parliamentary Commission. It was not drawn from the Consolidated Fund.

Consideration by Court

The purpose of Article 93 is that, a Bill introduced by a Private Member should not contain any provision which causes the withdraw of funds from the Consolidated Fund.

The amendments introduced by Hon. Tusiime had the effect of placing a charge on the Consolidated Fund contrary to Article 93.

Once it is noted on the floor of the House that a Bill or an amendment to a Bill which is being introduced by a motion brought by a Private Member would have the effect of imposing a charge on the Consolidated Fund, the motion should for that reason fail. In the matter before Court therefore, Parliament should not have adopted the amendment to the Bill.

Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court severed those provisions which had the effect of creating a charge on the Consolidated Fund and upheld the provisions contained in the original Magyezi Bill. We will later in this judgment discuss whether severance was applicable in such circumstances.

Be that as it may, I do not agree with the appellants' arguments that paragraph (e) of the Certificate of Financial Implications accompanying the original Magyezi Bill can be interpreted to mean that the Bill had the effect of causing financial implications contrary to Article 93. Every Bill whether introduced by Government or a Private Member at a certain point has financial implications in terms of administrative and operation costs. It can never be said that any Bill should have a 'zero' financial cost. In fact, Section 76 (2) of the Public Finance Act provides that the certificate shall indicate the estimates of revenue and expenditure over the period of not less than two years after the Bill is enacted into law. Therefore, the appellants' argument that paragraph (e) meant that there was financial implication cannot be sustained.

Arising from my analysis above, I also do not find that the UGX 29,000,000/= facilitation amounted to the impugned law placing a charge on the Consolidated Fund contrary to Article 93. If the money used had already been appropriated for use by Parliament, the funds cannot be said to have been directly withdrawn from the Consolidated Fund for purposes of implementing an amendment to the Constitution brought by a Private Member. Similarly, I also do not find Mabirizi's argument that the allowances to be paid to the Judges due to the extended time of hearing a Presidential petition or expenses incurred by the Electoral Commission in carrying out its mandate amounted to placing a charge on the Consolidated Fund.

Stage 3- First reading

Rule 124 provides that every Bill shall be read three times prior to its being passed. At the stage of the first reading, the clerk to Parliament shall cause the Bill to be printed and published in the gazette. The Clerk shall then read aloud the Short Title of the Bill and it shall be taken to have been read for the first time. In the instant appeal, the Bill that led to the impugned Act was read for the first time on 3rd October 2017.

Stage 4- Committee stage

In regard to this Stage, two complaints were raised by the appellants. One that the Committee report was signed by non-members and the other that the Committee did not comply with the 45 days Rule.

After the first reading is done, the Bill is referred to the appropriate Committee for consideration. (See: Rule 128). In the instant case the appropriate Committee to which the Bill was referred was the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee.

The Committee examines the Bill in detail and makes all such necessary Public inquiries in relation to it and shall report back to the House within 45 days from the date the Bill is referred to the Committee as required by Rule 128 (2).

The Bill that led to the impugned Act was referred to the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee on Tuesday 3rd October 2017. On Monday 18th December 2017, the Speaker informed the House that the majority and minority reports from the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs were ready to be presented to the House. This was way beyond the 45 day's threshold required by the Rule.

The Committee report according to Rule 201 (1), must be signed and initialed by at least one third of all the Members of the said Committee. The majority Committee Report on record was signed by 29 members. During the presentation of the Report, Hon. Ssekikubo raised issue with 8 signatories who were not part of the appointed Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee and the fact that they appended their signatures on to the Report yet they had not attended the Committee sessions.

The Constitutional Court held that although the fact that people who were not members of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee signed the report was irregular, it was not fatal to the enactment process and cannot invalidate the Committee report. The court reasoned that according to Article 94 (3) of the Constitution, the presence or the participation of a person not entitled to be present or to participate in the proceedings of Parliament shall not, by itself invalidate those proceedings. Furthermore, the court stated that even if the eight (8) nonmembers who signed the report after the deliberations were removed, there would still be sufficient quorum of Members who signed the report for it to pass.

Appellants' submissions

The appellants alleged that Rule 201 (1) was flouted when 8 nonmembers of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee signed the report. Rule 201 (1) provides that: "A report of a Committee shall be signed and initialed by at least one third of all the Members of the Committee, and shall be laid on the Table."

Furthermore, the appellants argued that the Committee did not report back to the House within 45 days from the time the Bill was referred to them as required by Rules 128 (2) and 140 (1). The said Rules provide as follows:

"128 (2). The Committee shall examine the Bill in detail and make all such inquiries in relation to it as the Committee considers expedient or necessary and report back to the House within forty-five (45) days from the date the Bill is referred to the Committee.

Rule 140 (1). Subject to the Constitution, no Bill introduced in the House shall be with the Committee for consideration for more than forty-five days."

AG's reply

In response to the appellants' allegation, the AG submitted that the Committee had the requisite quorum to sign the report with or without the non-members. The AG supported the findings of the Constitutional Court and prayed that this Court upholds them.

In regard to the 45-day Rule, the AG submitted that the Committee acted well within the provisions of Rules 128 and 140 of the Rules of procedure of Parliament in that whereas the Bill was referred to the committee on 3rd October 2017, the House was sent on recess on 4th October 2017. During recess, there was no transaction of parliamentary business without leave of the Speaker. That therefore, the 45 days could not start running until the leave was obtained.

It was the AG's submission that by a letter dated 29th October 2017, the Committee Chairperson duly applied for leave to the Speaker, which was granted on the 3rd November 2017. Therefore, the 45 days started to run from 3rd November 2017 and would expire on 16th December 2017. The Committee reported back on 14th December 2017, two days before the expiry of the 45 days' period. Thus, the Committee report was duly presented to the whole House within the period stipulated under Rule 128.

The AG further argued that the above notwithstanding, non-compliance with the 45 days Rule did not vitiate subsequent proceedings on the Bill since Rule 140 provides that where extra time is granted and it expires, the House shall proceed with the Bill without any further delay.

Consideration by Court

Signing of the Committee report by non-members

It is on record and undisputed that the report of the Parliamentary and Legal Affairs Committee was signed by non-members to the Committee. The Hansard indicates that Hon. Ssekikubo raised a procedural issue on the floor of Parliament concerning the matter.

The discourse on record clearly shows that the two Honorable members were part of two Committees at the same time contrary to Rules 154 (1) and 155 (2) which prohibit Members from being part of more than one Committee at the same time.

Be that as it may, Rule 203 allows non-members of a Committee to participate in any of the public proceedings of a particular Committee. Furthermore, Rule 206 (1) and (2) also allows for coopting of Members to participate in the proceedings of a Committee. This Rule provides that:

"(1) A Committee may, with the approval of its Members coopt any other Member who is not a Member of the Committee but shall have no vote on any matter to be decided by the Committee."

From the above cited Rules, it can safely be concluded that non-members of a Committee can participate in proceedings of any Committee but not cast a vote so as to make a binding decision.

The question which follows is: whether the signatures of the eight non-members invalidated the Committee report?

The voting on the resolutions and subsequent signing of the Committee report by members are binding. The votes determine what forms the majority view and the minority view. The binding effect of the signatures flows from people who have the authority to sign the report. The validity or invalidity of the report resulting from non-members' signatures depend on whether the provisions of law makes it material or not. Rules 203 and 206 (supra) emphasize the prohibition that non-members of a designated Committee are not allowed to cast a vote or form part of thequorum. Therefore, a non-member's signature on the report is invalid and has no authority to form binding decisions by their signatures.

A properly constituted Committee Member is one who is entitled to not only participate in Committee proceedings but also cast a vote. I therefore hold that the signing of the Committee report by non-members was a material irregularity which rendered the report suspect. The Constitutional Court erred in holding that although the signing of the report by non-members was fatal, it did not invalidate it. It follows that the AG's argument that the signatures of the 8 non-members when severed do not invalidate the report cannot be sustained.

Non-compliance of the Committee to the 45 days Rule

In light of the explanation given by the AG in regard to this matter, I find that Rule 128 (2) was not violated.

Stage 5- 2nd reading and Constituting of the Committee of the Whole House.

The next procedural step in the legislative path is for the Bill to be read the second time and the Committee report to be debated.

Rule 201 (2) provides that:

"Debate on a report of a Committee on a Bill, shall take place at least three days after it has been laid on the Table by the Chairperson or the Deputy Chairperson or a Member nominated by the Committee or the Speaker."

The appellants argued in the lower court that the rule requires physical laying of a document on the Table in Parliament. Furthermore Mr. Mabirizi argued that the Constitutional Court was dishonest in finding that the motion to suspend Rule 201 (2) was when the House constituted itself into the Committee of the Whole House whereas it was at plenary. That according to Section 8 (2) and (4) of the Electronic Transactions Act, there was no evidence to support the finding of the court that the report had been electronically delivered four days prior to the debate.

On the other hand, the Attorney General contended that since each Member of Parliament had been availed with an ipad, laying on table of the Committee report had been done electronically through the ipads. That it was on this basis that he moved a motion to have Rule 201(2) suspended.

The Respondent submitted that Members of Parliament received the report of the Committee three days before the debate and prayed that the finding of the Justices of the Constitutional Court is upheld.

Regarding the secondment of the motion moved by Hon. Rukutana, the AG submitted that the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court came to the right conclusion that the Rules were not flouted since no secondment was required.

Furthermore, the AG argued that it would be inconceivable for the Speaker to have allowed debate on the motion moved by Hon. Rukutana without it being seconded as required by Rule 59.

In conclusion, the AG invited this Court to uphold the findings of the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court as far as the secondment of the motion for suspension of Rule 201 was concerned.

The Constitutional Court held that the motion by Hon. Rukutana to suspend the operation of Rule 201 (2) (supra) which required a lapse of 3 days before the report was debated was permitted by Rule 16 of the Rules of Parliament. Court concluded that the suspension of Rule 201 (2) was not fatal to the subsequent legislation.

The court reasoned that the proceedings indicated in the Hansard show that the Speaker pointed out to the Members that they had received copies of the report on their ipads four days prior to its being laid on Table. That the purpose of the said Rule is to give adequate notice to Members of Parliament as to the contents of the report so that they are prepared to debate the same on the floor of Parliament.

Furthermore, the court found that the requirement for secondment of the motion to suspend Rule 201(2) was merely directory and not mandatory. This is because the motion to suspend the Rule was moved when Parliament was sitting as a Committee of the Whole House and Rule 59 (2) provides that, "in a Committee of the Whole House or before a Committee, a seconder of a motion shall not be required."

The AG invited this Court to consider the rationale for inclusion of Rule 201 as stated by Cheborion, JCC that since the rationale for the inclusion of Rule 201 was to give adequate notice of the 25 Committee report, the purpose of the Rule was achieved and no breach was occasioned to the Rules.

I however note that on the other hand, Kakuru, JCC (dissenting) held that according to the Hansard, the debate went on without the motion having been seconded or voted upon. That from the record, by the time the motion to suspend Rule 201(2) was moved, Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament had ruled that she had already given the notice required under Rule 201(2) to members electronically through their IPads.

That Rule 201(2) is couched in mandatory terms. It requires that Members of Parliament be given sufficient time to read and internalize a report of a Committee before debating on it. According to Kakuru, JCC, Rule 201 is not one of those that cannot be suspended. However, its suspension was not seconded by anyone as required by Rule 59, of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament which stipulates thus;-

"(1) In the House, the question upon a motion or amendment shall not be proposed by the Speaker nor shall the debate on the same commence unless the motion or amendment has been seconded."

In conclusion on the issue, Kakuru JCC held that the Speaker of Parliament failed to apply Rule 201(2) which is mandatory. He accepted the submissions of the Petitioners' counsel that "laying 20 on the table" means physically presenting the Bill on the table of Parliament and does not include sending an electronic copy to Members. The Judge noted that, Parliament amended and adopted the 2017 Rules in October 2017. That had Parliament intended to amend Rule 201 to take into account "electronic notice", or "electronic laying on the table" it would have done so, since according to the Hon. Speaker, the practice was already in place. The fact the Rule remained unchanged following the 2017 amendment means that, there was no intention to adopt a new procedure or turn the existing practice into law. Therefore, the submissions of the Hon. Deputy Attorney General that when the Members of Parliament were availed with IPads, Rule 201 no longer serves any useful purpose has no legal basis.

Thus, Parliament while passing the impugned Act, failed to comply with Rule 201(2) of its Rules of Procedure, which is mandatory. That failure contravened Article 94 (1) of the Constitution and as such vitiated the whole process of enactment of Act 1 of 2018.

Consideration by Court

The first important question to be addressed under this sub-issue is: the proper meaning of the phrase "laying on the table/tabling."

The interpretation section of the Rules defines "table" and "tabling" as follows:

"Table" means the Clerk's Table;

"Tabling" means the laying of an official document on the Table and laying before Parliament shall be construed accordingly.

The Parliamentary Rules were amended in October 2017 but the definition of the above phrases were left intact. On the other hand, another rule (Rule 29 (1)) which I find pertinent in resolving the issue at hand was amended by integration of electronic interaction as a mode of communication to Members of Parliament.

Rule 29 (1) provides that: "a weekly Order Paper including relevant documents, shall be made and distributed to every member through his or her pigeon hole and where possible, electronically." In my view, this is evidence that where Parliament intended to integrate electronic modes of communication into its rules and practice, the changes were specifically dealt with. Indeed, I am in agreement with Justice Kakuru (dissenting) when he stated that since at the time of debating the impugned Act, Parliament had adopted the 2017 Rules, but did not change the Rules to take into account "electronic laying on the table", Rule 201(2) remains in force.

It therefore is clear to me that tabling and laying an official document before Parliament must be physically done and the document must be placed on the Clerk's table.

Furthermore, a look at the Hansard shows the phrase being equated to physical laying on the table by other Members of Parliament who in the same session presented reports from other committees. For example: in the Hansard of Tuesday 26th September 2017, Hon. Muwanga Kivumbi stated: "Madam Speaker, I beg to lay on the Table a report entitled, Report of the Delegation of Parliament of Uganda …". Muwanga Kivumbi then proceeded to present the physical report to the House. And furthermore, the Hansard of 3rd October 2017 records Hon. Peter Ogwang stating that: "Madam Speaker I beg to lay on the Table reports of the Auditor- General on the financial statements of the following entities…" He then went ahead to physically present the said reports before the House and the Speaker directed that they be sent to the Committee on Public Accounts.

Would it be reasonable in a parliamentary session to attach different meanings to a rule, depending on which report was in issue? My answer is "No".

I therefore find that tabling and laying an official document before Parliament must be physically done and the document must be placed on the Clerk's table. As the Rules stand today, electronic distribution of the Committee Report on Members' ipads or pigeon hole does not amount to tabling.

Arising from the above analysis, it would follow that there was no lapse of three days after the laying on the table of the report. The report was laid on the table on 18th December 2017 and the debate ensued on the same day.

Without prejudice to the foregoing analysis, I must address the appellants' argument that the motion to suspend 201 (2) by Hon. Rukutana needed to be seconded.

The Hansard states that on Monday 18th December 2017, when the House reconvened to receive the Committee report, the Speaker stated as follows:

"... Today, we shall receive two reports; one on the Constitutional (Amendment) (No.2) Bill, 2017. It is anticipated that we shall receive the report; debate it today and tomorrow so that as many Members as possible, are given an opportunity to express their views ... Debate what will be presented to us."

Hon. Karuhanga raised a procedural issue that debating the report on the same day it was laid on the table would violate 201 (2) because the minimum period of 3 days between the tabling of the report and the debate would not be respected. The Deputy Attorney General responded by moving a motion to have the rule suspended so that the debate could continue. A debate on the report indeed ensued.

Did the motion to suspend 201 (2) require secondment?

I note that when Hon. Rukutana moved the motion, the House was constituted as a Committee of the whole House. Rule 59 (2) provides that, "in a Committee of the whole House or before a Committee, a seconder of a motion shall not be required." (My emphasis).

When Hon. Rukutana moved the motion to suspend Rule 201(2), the motion for the second reading of the Bill by Hon. Magyezi had been moved. At this point, the Bill stood committed to the Committee of the whole House. This is according to Rule 130 (1) which is to the effect that if a motion for the Second Reading of a Bill is carried, the Bill shall stand committed, immediately, to the Committee of the Whole House.

Rule 2 defines a Committee of the Whole House as a Committee composed of the whole body of Members of Parliament. As shown above in Rule 59(2) (supra) the motion in issue did not require secondment since the House had been constituted as a Committee of the whole House.

Consequently, the debate which ensued would be regular.

I nevertheless still need to expound on the import of Rule 29 and draw a distinction between the purpose of this rule and Rule 201 (2). It was argued by the AG that the purpose of Rule 201(2) is to adequately notify each Member of the content in a document such as the committee report in this matter. Based on this argument, it was submitted that there was no need to physically lay the Committee Report on table because it was sent to Members' iPads electronically which fulfilled. Let me start with a discussion of Rule 29 and more specifically with how it is formulated. The rule uses the word "and". The use of the word "and" connotes togetherness. The use of "and" would mean that the documents must be availed both in the "pigeon hole" and "electronically." However, whereas availing a hard copy in the pigeon hole is mandatory, the distribution of the electronic copies has been subjected to its being possible.

Why then was it necessary for Parliament to craft Rule 201 (2) in addition to Rule 29? I posit that the purpose of Rule 29 is to notify members that a particular document is ready. On the other hand, Rule 201 (2) is aimed at ensuring that members start reading the document in preparation for meaningful debate. The tabling of a document under Rule 201 (2) is like a referee's whistle, blown so that those in the race commence the run. Without Rule 201, it is possible for members who have been availed with numerous documents under Rule 29 to each concentrate on documents of their choice and consequently members would attend sittings when not on the same page.

I now move on to Mabirizi's contention that the requirements of Section 8(2) of the Electronic Transactions Act were not complied with. It must be noted that the fact that the report was electronically re-laid to all Members of Parliament was not in dispute. What was in issue was whether or not Parliament complied with Rule 201 (2)-an issue I have already discussed above.

Consequently, I do not find it relevant to discuss the Electronic 10 Transactions Act.

Debating the Bill

The next step after the Committee report is tabled and 3 days have elapsed is for the House to constitute itself into a Committee of the Whole House. The Committee of the Whole House starts to debate the Bill clause by clause and any amendments proposed to the clauses or Bill are raised. The appellants here allege that the Speaker denied the Members adequate time to debate the Bill, allowed the debate to proceed in absence of the Leader of Opposition and allowed Members of the Ruling party to cross the floor of Parliament to the Opposition side.

In respect to the above irregularities, the Constitutional Court held that as long as there was the requisite quorum of one-third of the Members in Parliament, the business of Parliament can go on in the absence of the Leader of Opposition, the Chief Whip and opposition Members of Parliament. That Article 94 of the Constitution allows Parliament to act notwithstanding a vacancy in its membership.

Furthermore, Court held that there was no evidence presented as to why the Leader of the Opposition and opposition Members were not in Parliament when the Bill was tabled for debate.

In regard to crossing the floor of Parliament, Court held that the Speaker according to circumstances obtaining at a particular moment can exercise her powers and permit MPs to sit at particular places in the chamber of Parliament. On the denial of adequate time to debate the Bill, the Court held that there is no provision making it a mandatory requirement for deliberations to be got from every Member of Parliament. The only condition precedent under Article 262 is the requirement for the Bill to be supported by a two-thirds majority of all the Members of Parliament. That from the Hansard, 124 Members of Parliament had contributed before the Speaker closed the debate. The Leader of Opposition equally frustrated the Speaker's effort to have more Members contribute to the debate. This however did not adversely affect the passing of the Act.

Appellants' submissions

Denial of adequate time to debate the Bill

Regarding the denial of adequate time to debate the Bill and the debate ensuing in the absence of opposition Members, Mabirizi contended that it is not the quorum which makes Parliament properly constituted to transact business. That the quorum is only a requirement at the time of voting. Therefore, the absence of the Opposition Members at any stage renders the House improperly constituted.

Crossing the floor of Parliament

On crossing the floor of Parliament, Mabirizi submitted that the Court was wrong in finding that the Speaker exercised her general powers under Rule 7 (2) yet Rule 82 (1) (b) provides that, during a sitting, a Member shall not cross the floor of the House or move around unnecessarily. Mabirizi supported this argument with the principle of law that a general provision cannot apply where there is a specific provision. He relied on the authority of Adonia vs. Mutekanga[1070]wherein it was held that the Courts will not normally exercise their inherent powers where a specific remedy is available.

For the 2nd appellant (MPs), it was submitted that there was evidence on record to show that Members of Parliament were denied adequate time to debate the Bill which violated the Rules.

AG's reply

The AG submitted that the Constitutional Court rightly found that the Members of Parliament were given adequate time to debate the Bill. Furthermore, that Rule 9 (1) and (4) obliges the Speaker to ensure that each Member has a comfortable sit in Parliament. The Speaker was therefore justified in the circumstances to permit Members to sit in the available seats on the Opposition side. Thus, there was no crossing of the floor of Parliament as alleged by the appellants.

Consideration by Court

Denial of adequate time to debate

In regard to denial of adequate time to debate the Bill, the appellants did not provide Court with any parameters to guide it in determining what constitutes adequacy of time for debate.

Crossing the floor

The circumstances surrounding the alleged crossing of the floor of the House are that, when the Leader of Opposition voluntarily withdrew from the House, the Speaker invited Members who had been standing on the Government wing of the House to take up seats vacated by the Leader of Opposition and her colleagues. The appellants allege that this was prohibited by Rule 82 (supra). The appellants also fault the Court for interpreting the crossing of the floor of the House in a Political sense.

'Crossing the floor' is an expression used to describe a Member's decision to break all ties binding him or her to a particular party.[1071]

I note that the Members from the Ruling party took up opposition seats at the Speaker's directive. The Members were not changing from their Political party to join the opposition. Consequently, I do not find the appellants argument that there was crossing of the floor sustainable.

[1070] (1970) 1 E A 429.
[1071] A Glossary of Parliamentary words, Parliament of Australia accessed on 4/2/2019 at www.aph.gov.au.

Debating in absence of Opposition Members

The Hansard details the events that led to the absence of the Leader of Opposition-Hon. Winfred Kiiza. Prior to her exit of the chamber, she raised an issue to the Speaker alleging intolerance of Members on the government side. Hon. Winfred appealed to Members who felt that the House was not proceeding within the Rules to first move out and consult each other. Thereafter, she exited the House.

The function of the opposition side in Parliament is to criticize and or offer alternative views in debating national issues. [See: Rule (4)]. It is this arrangement and functionality of Parliamentary opposition that reflects the fundamental Constitutional principle of democracy and Rule of law. The Speaker as Chairperson of the House had to bear this in mind. However, in the circumstances of the present appeal, the Leader of Opposition voluntarily exited the Chamber and never returned.

I therefore cannot fault the Constitutional Court for answering this sub-issue in the negative.

Suspension of Members

Rules 87(2) and 88 provide for the suspension of any Member of Parliament as follows:

"87 (2) The Speaker or Chairperson, shall order any Member whose conduct is grossly disorderly to withdraw immediately from the House or Committee for the remainder of that day's sitting; and the Clerk or the Sergeant-at-Arms shall act on such orders as he or she may receive from the Speaker or Chairperson to ensure compliance with this Rule."

"88 (1) If the Speaker or the Chairperson of any Committee considers that the conduct of a Member cannot be adequately dealt with under sub Rule (2) of Rule 87, he or she may name the Member.

(2) Where a Member has been named, then-

In the case of the House, the Speaker shall suspend the Member named from the service of the House; or in the case of a Committee of the whole House, the Chairperson shall forthwith leave the Chair and report the circumstances to the House and the Speaker shall suspend the Member named from the service of the House."

In addressing the issue of suspension of some Members from the House, the Constitutional Court held as follows:

"Under Rule 87(2), the Speaker has powers to order a Member of Parliament whose conduct is grossly disorderly to withdraw immediately from the House for the remainder of that day's sitting and the member so suspended has to immediately withdraw from the precincts of the House until the end of the suspension period under Rule 89. Under Rule 86(2) the decision of the Speaker on any point shall not be open to appeal and shall not be reviewed by the 20 House, except upon a substantive motion made after notice.

It is asserted by the petitioners that the Speaker ought to have afforded a hearing and also have provided reasons for suspending the six Honourable Members of Parliament under Articles 28(1) and 44(c). It is however unexplained by the petitioners what fair hearing the Speaker should have given to the suspended members. Like in contempt of Court proceedings the members affected misconducted themselves in the very eyes and hearing of the Speaker, including disobeying her very orders to them to be orderly and the very members were exchanging defiant words and physical gestures to the chair.

This Court did not receive any evidence whether any of the suspended members moved a substantive motion to question the decision of the Speaker. At any rate, later on, the Members of Parliament with the necessary quorum freely participated in debating the Constitutional (Amendment) Bill, 2017 in the Second and Third Readings.

It cannot therefore be concluded that the suspension of the six Members of Parliament made the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 to be unconstitutional. Issue 7(f) is answered in the negative."

Appellants' submissions

The appellants submitted that on the 18th December 2017 when Parliament convened to consider the report of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee, three honourable Members of Parliament raised two pertinent points of law to which the speaker declined to give her ruling and instead arbitrarily suspended the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th and 5th Appellants and other Members from Parliament in contravention of Articles 1, 28 (1), 42, 44 (c) and 94 of the Constitution.

That the Hansard clearly showed that Hon. Theodore Sekikuubo brought to the attention of the Speaker the fact that the report of the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary affairs was fatally defective since non-Members to wit; Hon. Akampurira Prossy Mbabazi and Hon. Lilly Akello, who both sat on the Committee of Defence and Internal Affairs had signed it.

Furthermore, Hon. Ssentamu Robert and Hon. Betty Amongi raised another point of procedure that the matter concerning the impugned Bill was before the East African Court of Justice and that proceeding with the same would amount to breach of the subjudice Rule. However, the Speaker declined to pronounce herself on the matter and instead adjourned the proceedings.

Before Members could leave the chambers, the Speaker made an arbitrary order suspending the 1st to 5th appellants together with another MP without assigning any reason whatsoever as required under the Rules nor did she state the offences committed.

Therefore, that the Speaker grossly violated the Rules of Procedure of Parliament by: not according the said MPs a fair hearing before suspending them, not giving any reason for their said suspension and acting ultra vires after being functus officio at the time of making the suspension decision.

Counsel submitted further that by virtue of the illegal suspension of the MPs, the speaker denied them a right to effectively represent their respective Constituencies in the law making process and as such the same vitiated the entire process.

The appellants argued that these illegalities were elaborately presented before the Constitutional Court but the court held that the participation of the new members that were added to the Committee though irregular, did not invalidate the Committee report because even if the number of non-Members was deducted, the majority report still had enough signatures to pass it. Also, that the action taken by the Speaker to suspend certain Members of the House from participating in the proceedings of the House was due to the fact that the suspended members had defied the Speaker and disrupted the proceedings in the House thereby provoking the wrath of the Speaker.

AG's reply

In reply to the appellants' contention above, the AG submitted that Rule 88(2) (a) of the Rulesempowers the Speaker to name and suspend from the service of the House a Member who conducts him/herself in a disorderly manner in Parliament. A Member so suspended from the service of the House is commanded in Rule 89 to immediately withdraw from the precincts of the House until the end of the suspension period. Rule 88 (4) guides the period of suspension of a member and it requires that a Member who is suspended on the first occasion in a session shall be suspended for 3 sittings. In accordance with Rule 88(4), the 3 sittings for which the member is suspended are computed from the next sitting of Parliament.

Arising from the above, the AG contends that the appellants misconstrued the import of Rule 88 (4) in as far as it applied to the circumstances in this case. That it would be absurd that a Member, who is found by the Speaker to have conducted himself in a disorderly manner in the House and is therefore suspended from the service of the House, is then allowed to remain in the House for the rest of the day's sitting.

In regard to the right of fair hearing, Rule 86 (2) provide that the decision of the Speaker or Chairperson shall not be open to appeal and shall not be reviewed by the House, except upon a substantive motion made after notice in the instant case none was made.

In respect to the contention that the Speaker while suspending the Members was out of her chair, the AG referred to the Hansard of 18th December 2017 where the Speaker stated: "I suspend the proceedings up to 2 o 'clock but in the meantime, the following members are suspended:

Hon. Ibrahim Ssemujju

Hon. Allan Ssewanyana

Hon. Gerald Karuhanga

Hon. Jonathan Odur

Hon. Mubaraka Munyangwa

Hon. Anthony Akol."

Article 257 (aa) of the Constitution as well as Rule 2(1) of the Rules define "sitting" to include a period during which Parliament is continuously sitting without adjournment and a period during which it is in Committee. Rule 20 of the Rulesprovide that the Speaker may at any time suspend a sitting or adjourn the House.

The AG therefore submitted that the Speaker only suspended the sitting to 2.00 O' clock and did not adjourn the house, hence She was not functus officio because there was a continuous sitting of the House when Members were suspended. That the Speaker acted within her mandate to suspend Members of Parliament for their un-Parliamentary conduct, there is no evidence to show that the suspended Members of Parliament moved a substantive motion challenging their suspension. The AG therefore prayed that the findings of the Justices of the Constitutional Court be confirmed.

Consideration by Court

It is imperative to note from the outset of resolving this sub-issue that there were two instances of suspension. The instance of suspension contended under issue 2 is one where six MPs were expelled from the House. The Members' suspension occurred during the presentation of the Committee report. Different Members kept interjecting the presentation by raising various procedural issues. I note that from the Hansard none of the six suspended MPs raised any interjections. The Hansard does not show why they were suspended. However, Rule 87 (2) gives discretion to the Speaker to suspend any Member whose conduct is grossly disorderly to withdraw immediately from the precincts of the House. The Speaker did not exercise her powers ultravires the law.

As to when the suspension takes effect, Rule 88 (4) provides that:- If a Member is suspended, his or her suspension on the first occasion in a Session shall be for the next three sittings, excluding the sitting in which he or she was suspended; on the second occasion in a session, for the next seven sittings excluding the sitting in which he or she was suspended, and on the third and any subsequent occasion during the same Session, for the next twenty eight sittings of the House, excluding the sitting in which the Member was suspended.

The correct interpretation of the above provision is that where a Member has been suspended in a Session, the suspension takes effect from the next three sittings. The words 'excluding the sitting in which he/she has been suspended' does not mean that the suspended Member stays in the House until the next three sittings commence. The suspension takes immediate effect and the duration of the suspension lapses after three sittings have been held.

Failure to close doors to the chambers at the time of voting on the 2nd reading of the Bill.

Article 89 of the Constitution provides for the voting procedures in Parliament as follows:

"(1) Except as otherwise prescribed by this Constitution or any law consistent with this Constitution, any question proposed for decision of Parliament shall be determined by a majority of votes of the members present and voting in a manner prescribed by Rules of procedure made by Parliament under Article 94 of this Constitution."

The above Constitutional provision is reiterated in Rule 92 (1). More specifically, Rule 98 (1) (a) provides that, "Roll call and tally voting shall be held at the second and third reading of the Bill for an Act of Parliament to amend a provision of the Constitution."

The appellants alleged that the Speaker did not comply with Rule 98 (4) which required the Speaker to direct that the doors to the chamber to be locked and the bar drawn before the voting commenced.

The Constitutional Court held that since the House was full and there were no seats for all Members of Parliament, the Rules could not be adhered to the letter. That in the absence of any evidence that strangers took advantage of the failure to close the doors and voted, the allegation of any breach of Rule 98 of the Rules of Procedure is legally and factually untenable and did not render the Amendment Act unconstitutional.

Appellants' submissions

Counsel submitted that failure by the Speaker of Parliament to close all doors to the Chambers to Parliament before voting on the 2nd reading of the Bill was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 2, 8A, 44 (c), 79, and 94 of the Constitution as well as Rule 98(4) of the Rules of Parliament. That this fact was admitted by the Clerk to Parliament in her affidavit. According to the 2nd and 3rd appellants' counsel the rationale of Rule 98 (4) is to bar Members who had not participated in the debate to enter Parliament vote. That the Speaker however not only left the doors wide open but called for members who were outside the chambers during the time of debate to enter and vote.

Counsel therefore submitted that the Constitutional Court erred in law in holding that no evidence was availed as to how the failure to close all the doors during voting made the enactment of the Act unconstitutional. That the Rules of procedure were not made in vain. Therefore, they must at all material times be obeyed and respected save where they have been duly suspended. Thus, the non-compliance with Article 98 (4) rendered the entire enactment process and the outcome thereof illegal.

AG's reply

No reply was made by the AG on this sub-issue.

Consideration by Court

I have carefully studied the Hansard when the motion to have the Bill read for the second time was moved. Hon. Kantuntu raised the issue of the need to have the doors locked during voting. The voting continued. After voting, the Speaker gave her reasons for not following the procedure in Rule 98. She stated as follows:

"Honourable members, ideally I was supposed to have closed the doors under Rule 98(4). However, that exists in a situation where all the Members have got seats, but in this Parliament, 150 Members do not have seats. Therefore, it was not possible to lock them out and that is why I did not lock the doors … Is there anybody who has not voted? We now close the ballot."

I find the Speaker's reasoning plausible. Most important is that a roll call of the Members was taken to identify who was present or absent as well as those who were not eligible to cast a vote. The voting process with unclosed doors went on smoothly. Voting was by roll call and the majority votes recorded was 317. Therefore, the appellants' contention that the failure to close the doors of Parliament during voting made the impugned Act unconstitutional lacks merit.

Stage 6- 3rd reading of the Bill

Rule 136 provides that the third reading is upon a motion that "the Bill be now read a third time and do pass."

If any member desires to delete or amend any provision contained in a Bill as reported from a Committee of the whole House he or she may, at any time before a member moves the third reading of the Bill, move that the Bill be recommitted either wholly or in respect only of some particular amendment or amendments. [Rule 137 (1)] The appellants allege that the 2nd and 3rd reading of the Bill was done on the same day, 20th December, 2017. This violated the Constitution.

Non observance of the 14 days Rule between the 2nd and 3rd reading of the Bill.

Article 263 of the Constitution provides that, "the votes on the second and third readings referred to in Articles 260 and 261 of this Constitution shall be separated by at least fourteen sittingdays of Parliament." The Hansard on record shows that the 2nd and 3rd readings of the Bill that led to the enactment of the impugned Act was done on the 20 same day that is 20th December 2017.

In resolving the issues surrounding the enactment of the impugned Act, the Constitutional Court held that it is only the amendment of provisions under Articles 260, 261 and 263 which required the separation of 14 days between the 2nd and 3rd25 readings. That since Sections 1,3,4,7 and 9 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act did not amend any of the provisions covered by Articles 260 (amendments requiring a referendum), 261 (amendments requiring the approval of district councils) and 263 there was no requirement that the second and 3rd readings of the Bill be separated by fourteen sitting days of Parliament.

The court held that it was only the amendments which were introduced after the original Bill that required the separation of the 14 days sitting between the 2nd and 3rd readings. Such amendments were unconstitutional and contravened Articles 262 and 263 of the Constitution.

Appellants' submissions

The 1st and 3rd appellants faulted the majority learned Justices for finding that the passing of the Act without observing the 14 days between the 2nd and 3rd readings did not contravene the Constitution.

The 1st appellant (Mabirizi) argued that it was mandatory for the speaker to separate the 2nd and 3rd readings with 14 sitting days of Parliament. That both the provisions which required the separation of 14 days and those that did not formed part of a single Act. According to Mabirizi, this meant that the Act as a whole had to comply with the 14 days Rule. In support of this argument, Mabirizi cited Article 257 (1) (a) of the Constitution which defines an "Act of Parliament" as a law made by Parliament. That the Article does not define an Act of Parliament as a section, subsection or part of the law made by Parliament. Following this argument, Mabirizi submitted that had the justices keenly looked at the language of the Constitution which uses the word 'Act' as opposed to 'Section', they would have not have made a distinction between those Sections which had to comply with the Rule and those that did not have to.

Similar to the 1st appellant's submission, the 3rd appellant (ULS) argued that when the clauses in the Bill requiring 14 days' separation were passed at the third reading, they became part of the Act. The court could not therefore make a distinction of the provisions which had to comply and those that did not.

That the proper approach Court had to take was to hold that since the Act contained provisions which had the effect of amending Article 1 by infection, there was need to separate the 2nd and 3rd readings by 14 days sitting. Article 260 (1) states that a Bill shall not be taken as passed unless the votes at the second and third reading is by fourteen days.

Counsel for the third appellant argued that it was mandatory for the legislature to comply with the Constitutional 14 days Rule and not relegate its duty to the Constitutional Court to strike out the provisions which contravened the Rule and maintain those which did not.

AG's Reply

The Attorney General submitted that the contents of the original Bill that was presented to Parliament did not contain any provision that required the separation of the second and third sittings of Parliament by 14 days. It is only the amendments that were proposed during the Committee stage that had an infectious effect on Articles 1, 8A and 260 of the Constitution which required the 14 days' separation between the 2nd and 3rd readings. That the learned Justices were right to sever those Articles that offended the Rule from those whose enactment did not require the separation of the second and third reading by 14 days. The Attorney General invited this Court to reject the Appellants' submissions and uphold the findings of the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court.

Consideration by Court

Article 260 provides for the criteria to be met by an Act of Parliament amending the Constitution through a referendum. The Article requires that apart from referring the intended amendment to the people through a referendum, it must also have the support of two-thirds majority of Parliament. The two-thirds majority is determined through a voting system and the votes at the 2nd and 3rd readings have to be separated by 14 days.

Similarly, Article 261 also requires that a Constitutional amendment requiring the approval of district councils be backed by the votes of two-thirds majority of Parliament. The votes are to be separated by 14 days between the 2nd and 3rd readings.

The Constitutional Court held that the impugned Amendment Act did not require compliance with the 14 days sitting Rule in Article 263 (supra) because the Act did not contain provisions that needed a referendum or the approval of district councils. I note that in making this finding, the Constitutional Court severed those provisions which required a referendum and hence the need to comply with the 14 days Rule. The severed provisions were Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 because they had the effect of amending Article 1 on the sovereignty of the people by infection. The said provisions amended the Constitution by extending the tenure of 30 Parliament from five to seven years which provisions had to be submitted to a referendum but were not.

It is evident from the Hansard of 20th December 2017 that the second and third readings of the impugned Act were on the same day. The focus of the 14 days Rule in Article 263 (supra) applies to Constitutional amendments of provisions which either require a referendum or the approval of district councils. These are Articles 10 1, 2, 5(2), 44, 69, 74, 75, 79(2), 105(1), 128(1), chapter 16, 152, 176(1), 178,189 and 197. Article 102 (b) which is in issue before this Court is not one of those provisions whose amendment requires that the 2nd and 3rd reading be separated by 14 days.

I however note that when the Bill was passed at the reading it contained provisions extending the tenure of Parliament from five to seven years which required a referendum. As such, the Bill would have then required to comply with the 14 days Rule. As earlier noted the Constitutional Court severed these provisions from the impugned Act and came to the conclusion that the remainder of the Act did not need to comply with the 14 days Rule. I will discuss later in this judgment whether the doctrine of severance applied.

Stage 7- Assent by the President

The final stage of the Legislative process is the President's Assent to the Bill.

Article 263 (2) of the Constitution provides that: A Bill for the amendment of this Constitution which has been passed in accordance with this Chapter shall be assented to by the President only if—

(a)it is accompanied by a certificate of the Speaker that the provisions of this Chapter have been complied with in relation to it; …

Section 16 of the Acts of Parliament Act provides for the form the certificate of compliance takes. In essence the certificate shows which Articles have been amended, the number of majority votes obtained to pass the amendment and a statement to the effect that Chapter Eighteen of the Constitution has been complied with.

Appellants' submissions

The appellants fault the learned Justices of the Constitutional court for holding that the validity of the entire impugned Act was not fatally affected by the discrepancies and variances between the Speaker's certificate of compliance and the Bill that was sent to the President for assent. The discrepancies are that the speaker's certificate of compliance clearly indicated that the impugned Bill only amended Articles 61, 102, 104 and 183 of the Constitution whereas the Bill itself indicated that Parliament had in addition amended Articles 105, 181, 289, 291 and in fact created another provision to wit, 289A.

Counsel for the appellants averred that the discrepancies and which appeared between the certificate and the Bill were gross both in content as well as form and thus contravened Article 263 (2) of the Constitution and Section 16 of the Acts of Parliament Act. That this had the effect of not only rendering the presidential assent to the Bill a nullity but even the resultant Act.

The Constitutional Court found that the omission of some clauses in the certificate of compliance per se invalidated Sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 on grounds that the Speaker of Parliament did not certify that Articles 77, 105, 181, 289 and 291 had been amended in strict compliance with the provisions of the Constitution. Thus, the purported amendments in respect of these Articles were fundamentally flawed and invalid. However, the Court held that the Certificate was not invalid. That the only logical result of the omission of certain clauses in the certificate is that the omitted Articles were not validly amended.

AG's reply

The Attorney General submitted that the Constitutional Court came to the right finding in holding that the validity of the entire impugned Act was not fatally affected by the discrepancy between the certificate and the Bill at the time of Presidential Assent. That upholding the validity of the certificate was acknowledgement by the court that the certificate complied with the form prescribed in Section 16 (2) and Part VI of the Second Schedule of the Acts of Parliament Act since the Articles that were being amended were enumerated in the certificate.

That the Constitutional Court rightly relied on the severance principle as espoused in Article 2(2) of the Constitution to reach its finding that the other Articles that had been amended but not included in the Speaker's Certificate were unconstitutional.

Consideration by Court

Article 263 (2) of the Constitution hinges the President's assent to a Bill on the availability of the Speaker's Certificate of Compliance.

In Semwogerere vs AG 2002[1072] this Court held that the presidential assent is an integral part of the law making process and not a mere formality and that a bill does not become law until the President assents to it. It was further emphasized that the Constitution commands the President, to assent to a Bill only if specified conditions are satisfied. The command is mandatory and does not allow for discretion in the President to assent without the Speaker's certificate of compliance.

Where the President assents to a bill which is not accompanied by a Certificate, the resultant Act would be invalid for non-compliance with the requirement under Article 262(2) (a) [now 263 (2)]. The resulting Act would not become law and its proposed amendments to the Constitution would not become part of the Constitution.

What is the legal status of a Certificate which speaks to only some of the provisions in a Bill presented to the President for assent and is silent on some provisions? The answer lies in Section 16 of the Acts of Parliament Act. The Section refers to Part V of the 2nd schedule to the Act which provides for the contents of the Certificate of Compliance.

Part V specifically obliges the Speaker to indicate inter alia the Articles sought to be amended; the number of members in support at each reading; and to mention specifically that Article 261 of the Constitution has been complied with. In the matter before this Court, the Certificate presented by the Speaker did not mention some of the Sections in the Bill that and was therefore defective.

I also find it necessary to answer the question: what is the purpose of the Certificate of Compliance envisaged under Article 263 of the Constitution. The purpose of the certificate is to assure/guarantee the President that Parliament complied with the requirements of the constitution. A certificate which tells half the story does not fulfill the legal objective. Furthermore, it is not expected of the President to engage in an inquiry as to what happened in relation to the sections which the certificate does not speak to. After all, Section 16 (7) of the Acts of Parliament Act states that: "A certificate under Section 16 signed by the Speaker shall be prima facie evidence of the facts stated in the certificate." It cannot be expected that the President will inquire into what happened in Parliament. Under no circumstances should a Speaker forward a Bill to the President with full knowledge that it contains provisions passed in contravention of the Constitution.

[1072]Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 2002

To assent to a Bill presented for signature, the President handles the Bill and the Certificate together. The certificate is not read in isolation of the Bill and the Bill is not dealt with in isolation of the certificate. A Certificate which does not comprehensively speak to the Bill cannot be considered a valid certificate. It was not necessary in the Semwogerere case (Supra) for this Court to specifically state that a valid Certificate of Compliance is mandatory - for indeed a document will only qualify for recognition by courts if it is valid. If assent to a Bill which is not accompanied by a certificate renders the assent null and void, assent to a Bill accompanied by a defective certificate leads to the same result – null and of no legal effect.

What the Speaker did at the stage of preparing the certificate should have been done in Parliament – stopping amendments which had not complied with constitutional imperatives from tainting the Bill which would be presented to the President for assent. Instead, with the full knowledge that the Bill contained provisions passed in contravention of constitutional imperatives, the Speaker sent the Bill to the President for assent.

What the President assented to was a Bill which had provisions passed in violation of mandatory constitutional imperatives as well as provisions which perhaps[1073] had been passed in compliance with the Constitution. But the President assents to a Bill and not to sections of a Bill. The assent was therefore to a Bill which was null and void.

Applying the principle of severance to a document which fails to satisfy the objective of a supreme law clause would be reducing the Certificate of Compliance to a mere procedural requirement – the very thing which this Court said it was not, in Semwogerere vs AG (Supra).

I therefore find that the discrepancies in the Speaker's Certificate of Compliance went to the root of the enactment process of the Act and contravened the Constitution. No Consultation in the course of enacting the Bill.

The majority learned Justices of the Constitutional Court held that despite the interference by Asuman Mugyenyi's directive prohibiting MPs from consulting beyond their constituencies, there was proper consultation carried out.

Appellants' Submissions

The Appellants fault the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court for finding that there was proper consultation of the people of Uganda on the impugned Act. The appellants submitted that the requisite consultation and public participation of the people, which is mandatory, was not conducted yet it is one of the basic structures of our Constitution. In support of their arguments, the appellants relied on the Kenyan authorities of: Law Society of Kenya vs. Attorney General[1074]and Robert N. Gakuru & Others vs. Governor Kiambu County & Others[20].

[1073] I say perhaps because I have already made a finding that the Speaker did not comply with Parliamentary Rules when she placed the Magyezi Bill on the Order Paper.

The appellants invited Court to uphold the findings of the learned dissenting Justice of the Constitutional Court that Parliament failed to encourage, empower and facilitate public participation of citizens in the process of enacting the impugned Act.

AG's Reply

The Attorney General submitted that the majority Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court made a proper finding that there was public participation and consultation in the process of the conceptualization and enactment of the impugned Act.

The Attorney General argued that whereas South Africa and Kenya provide for parameters and guidelines for Public Consultations, Uganda did not have such parameters. Therefore, there is no yardstick upon which to measure the extent of the public consultation required to validate an amendment of the Constitution. It was further argued that the body to determine the requisite standard of public consultation was the Parliament.

The Attorney General also argued that the appellants' contention on the quality and quantity of the consultation was not factual. The AG submitted that there is evidence on record of media prints inviting the Public to submit their views on the Bill, the Parliamentary and Legal Affairs Committee conducted open hearings for individuals and groups that wanted to give their views on the Bill and the Hansard which indicates the views that various Members of Parliament had got from their constituencies.

The AG submitted in the court below that consultations were done through live debate on Television, Radios, social and print media calling for the Public' s views on the Bill. Furthermore, that the report of the Parliamentary and Legal Affairs Committee included a list of 53 stakeholders from Civil Society organizations, prominent Constitutional law scholars and other interest groups who submitted their views on the Bill to the Committee. In addition, the Clerk to Parliament, Jane Kibirige, averred that each Member of Parliament was facilitated with UGX. 29,000,000/= to go and consult the masses.

Basing on the above evidence, the Attorney General invited this Court to uphold the majority Judgment of the court that proper consultation was carried out.

[1074] Constitutional Petition No. 3 of 2016. [20] Petition No. 532 of 2013

Consideration by Court

The essence of the arguments from both parties call for resolution of a fundamental question: what parameters should be used to evaluate the adequacy of the public consultations in Uganda? In answering the above question, it is imperative to first understand what public consultation/participation is.

In a constitutional making process, public consultation involves direct engagement with the public or representative groups or other factions of society. Public participation in Constitution making is considered to be essential for the legitimacy and effectiveness of the process.[1075] A representative, open process with direct public input is, on balance, good for setting the course for a democratic state.[1076]

The reason for engaging the public is that people are the custodians of democracy and should be involved at all stages of Constitution making. The process must empower the people ratherthan inhibit them by creating opportunities and avenues for individual effective participation.[1077](My emphasis)

Under the International Human rights regime, Public Consultation is derived from the right to 'democratic participation' under Article 21 of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR). Similarly, Article 25 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) provides for every citizen's rights to take part in the conduct of public affairs.

At the regional level, Article 13 (1) of the African Charter on Human and People's Rights (Banjul Charter) provides for public participation as follows:

"Every citizen shall have the right to participate freely in the government of his country, either directly or through freely chosen representatives in accordance with the provisions of the law." In Uganda's Constitution, public participation is provided for in Objective II (i) of the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy as follows:

"The State shall be based on democratic principles which empower and encourage the active participation of all citizens at all levels in their own governance." (My emphasis)

The content of public participation has been expanded and developed to include other rights like political equality, freedom of speech and association.[24]

Can one say that the public was empowered and encouraged to express their views in regard to the [1075] The Citizen as Founder: Public Participation in Constitutional Approval, Zachary Elkins, Tom Ginsburg and Justin Blount, Temple Law Review, Vol 81 No.2, 2008.

[1076] Post-conflict Peace- Building and Constitution Making (noting benefits of more participatory and inclusive Constitution-building processes), Kirsti Samuels, 6 CHI.J.INTL ,663, 668 (2006).

[1077] S Mwale, Constitution review: The Zambian search for an ideal Constitution making, paper presented at the 10th African Forum for Catholic social teaching (AFCAST) working group meeting, 02 may 2006, Nairobi Kenya. [24] G Hyden & D Ventor, Constitution Making and Democratization in Africa, (2001) .

amendments which resulted into the impugned Act?

Mc Whinney states that in Constitution making, public participation can come in different forms namely a constituent assembly, public meetings and a referendum.[1078] Public participation can also be conducted in various ways, such as using the media and organizing public meetings, depending on the available resources and the geographical area of coverage.[1079]

As submitted by the Attorney General unlike Uganda does not have laws or guidelines on how the public is to be engaged during Constitutional amendment processes. Based on this legal fact and the evidence submitted by the AG and not disputed by the appelllants, one can come to the conclusion that this Court would not be in position to question the modes of consultation adopted by Parliament. Based on this, I would have accepted the proposition by the AG that the body to determine the requisite standard of public consultation should be Parliament. I would have answered this sub-issue in the negative.

However, it is an undisputed fact that in some instances the consultations were interfered with and the process was marred with violence and resulting from the Mugyenyi Directive. This was contrary to Objective II (i) of the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy (supra). I will more elaborately discuss the effect of the Mugenyi directive under Issue 3.

Conclusion on Issue 2: Severance and constitutional violations of procedure.

It was the unanimous decision of the Constitutional Court that Sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018, which provide for the extension of the tenure of Parliament as well as Local Government Councils by two years; and for the reinstatement of the Presidential term–limits, were unconstitutional for contravening various procedural imperatives of the Constitution.

However, the court went ahead and held that the above Sections of the impugned Act could be severed and struck out of the Act so that Sections 1, 3, 4, and 7, of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 would remain part of the Act. It was the contention of the appellants that since violations of Constitutional imperatives had been proved, the only legal remedy which should have been given by the Constitutional Court was nullification of the impugned Act.

Mabirizi specifically faulted the Court for raising and considering the issue of severance suo moto yet it was not pleaded by any of the appellants. That the Court had no power to frame the subissue of whether severance can be applied because Order 15 Rule 3 of the Civil Procedure Rules restricts the court to determine allegations made by the parties on oath, in their pleadings and accompanying documents.

[1078] E McWhinney, Constitution- making: principles, process and practice, (1981) 12.
[1079] H Ebrahim The Soul of Nation: Constitution making in South Africa (1998) 242.

The AG on the other hand submitted that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court were right to apply the severance principle because through severance, the Court is able to control and limit the consequence of its order of invalidity.

What is Severance?

Severance refers to the ability of courts to strike out a portion of a statute if that portion is held to be unconstitutional.

There are two types of unconstitutional legislation:

1. Legislation that violates substantive constitutional requirements.
2. Legislation enacted in violation of procedural constitutional requirements

Substantive constitutional violations occur when a Statute contains provisions that are found constitutionally invalid based on content. A Statute will have been enacted following the procedural requirements of the constitution but later - based on the Constitution – the content of some of the provisions are found by court to be invalid. I opine that Article 2 (2) of the Constitution deals with such enactments. The Article empowers courts to sever portions which are invalid in substance from those whose content does not violate the constitution. It provides that:

Supremacy of the Constitution

(1) This Constitution is the supreme law of Uganda and shall have binding force on all authorities and persons throughout Uganda.

(2) If any other law or any custom is inconsistent with any of the provisions of this Constitution, the Constitution shall prevail, and that other law or custom shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be void.

My view that the Article is only relevant to statutes enacted in a procedurally constitutional manner, but does not deal with statutes enacted through procedurally unconstitutional processes is emboldened by the simultaneous enactment of a related Article 274. In light of the fact that the 1995 constitution came into existence when a legal regime was already in existence, the enactors of the new constitution provided as follows:

274. Existing law.

(1) Subject to the provisions of this Article, the operation of the existing law after the coming into force of this Constitution shall not be affected by the coming into force of this Constitution but the existing law shall be construed with such modifications, adaptations, qualifications and exceptions as may be necessaryto bring it into conformity with this Constitution. (My emphasis)

(2) For the purposes of this Article, the expression “existing law” means the written and unwritten law of Uganda or any part of it as existed immediately before the coming into force of this Constitution, including any Act of Parliament or Statute or statutory instrument enacted or made before that date which is to come into force on or after that date.

The effect of the two Articles read together is that severance is one way in which a statute which contains unconstitutional content can be modified so as to be bring it in conformity with the constitution.

It is in line with the above provisions of the constitution that one can understand the authority of Attorney General vs. Salvatori Abuki[1080] cited by the respondents. In that case, a section which provided for the banishment of a convict of witchcraft from his home area for a period of 10 years after serving a custodial sentence was declared unconstitutional for contravening several fundamental rights of an individual. However, the 1957 Witchcraft Act itself was not declared unconstitutional – the offence of practicing witchcraft, the sentence of imprisonment and other provisions of the Act were left to stand. What can be deduced from a reading of the constitutional provisions and from a reading of Abuki case is that if any provision of a statute is found by the Court to be unconstitutional, the remaining provisions of the statute are valid unless the court finds that the valid provisions of the statute are so essentially and inseparably connected with the void provision that none can be implemented without the other.

Uganda's Legal Framework controls the procedure of the legislative process – this is through provisions of the Constitution and through the Rules of Procedure of the Parliament of Uganda. These types of restrictions "regulate only the process by which legislation is enacted." Such restrictions are "designed to eradicate perceived abuses in the legislative process, such as hasty, corrupt, or private interest legislation." Abuses of these restrictions are called procedural constitutional violations. So it is possible to challenge a Statute on the ground that it is unconstitutional, not because of its content but rather because the process of its being enacted was marred by violations of constitutional procedural rules.

In the appeal before us I must answer the question: faced with the proven fact that the impugned Act contains both provisions which were passed without adherence to constitutional imperatives as well as provisions which did not require adherence to the above mentioned procedural rules, does the Court have the option of severing the unconstitutionally passed portions of the Act and letting the constitutionally handled portions of the bill remain law? If as I have already pointed out, Article 2 and 274 deal only with Substantive constitutional violations what would be the basis of severance?

Writing about the law in the State of Missouri, USA Jonathon

[1080] Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 1998

Whitfield[1081] talks of "statutory severance" on the one hand and "severance by judicial doctrine" on the other. He points out that whereas statutory severance is codified (similar to the presence of Article 2 and 274 of Uganda's Constitution), courts have created a separate doctrine of severability. This doctrine applies to procedurally unconstitutional laws and supplements the statutory delegation of authority. The doctrine was made necessary because the ability to sever portions of laws based on the substance of its provisions does "not adequately address the problems inherent in procedurally unconstitutional statutes.

According to Whitfield for procedural constitutional violations, "the entire bill is unconstitutional unless [the court] is convinced beyond reasonable doubt that one of the bill's multiple subjects is its original, controlling purpose and that the other subject is not." To determine whether or not the provisions that are part of the added subject pass this test, the court considers "whether the additional subject is essential to the efficacy of the bill, whether it is a provision without which the bill would be incomplete and unworkable, and whether the provision is one without which the legislators would not have adopted the bill."

The principle laid down by Whitfield above is based on several decisions of the Supreme Court of Missouri beginning with Hammerschmidt vs. Boone County[29]in which an Act of Parliament was challenged for violating procedural regulations to wit Article III, section 23 of the Missouri Constitution which inter alia provides that: "No bill shall contain more than one subject which shall be clearly expressed in its title." The Law restricted an Act to one subject and matters properly connected therewith.

And the Supreme Court stated that: When the procedure by which the legislature enacted a bill violates the constitution, severance is appropriate if this Court is convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the specific provisions in question are not essential to the efficacy of the bill. Severance is inappropriate if the valid provisions of the statute are so essentially and inseparably connected with, and so dependent on, the void provision that it cannot be presumed the legislature would have enacted the valid provisions without the void one. Severance is also inappropriate if the court finds that the valid provisions, standing alone, are incomplete and are incapable of being executed in accordance with the legislative intent.

In several cases since Hammer schmidt, the Supreme Court of Missouri has applied doctrinal severance in Section 23 cases and has severed the unconstitutional portions in every case.[1082]

[1081]Two Tests of Severance: Procedural and Substantive Constitutional Violations and the Legislative Process in Missouri, 79 Mo. L. Rev. (2014) Available at: http://scholarship.law.missouri.edu/mlr/vol79/iss3/10

[1082] See for example: Legends Bank vs. State 361 S.W. 3d 383 (2012) and MissouriRoundtable for Life, Inc. vs State of Missouri, 396 S.W. 3d 348 (Mo. 2013) (en banc).

Should we adopt the "severance by judicial doctrine" or can we say that the Missouri cases are so distinguishable that they cannot serve as persuasive authorities?

In the Missouri cases the procedural irregularity in each case was the legislature's introduction into the Bill which was already before it, a matter that was unrelated to its original subject. The result was that the Bill contained a multiplicity of subjects – subjects with no link to each other. The Bill either violated the single-subject requirement of constitutional amendments and/or the original purpose requirement of constitutional amendments. The original purpose requirement does not prohibit subsequent additions or changes to legislation but is against the introduction of a matter that is not germane to the object of the legislation or that is unrelated to its original subject.

What type of procedural irregularity is this Court dealing with?

In the matter before us, we are dealing with a Bill which contained various sections calling for different steps as prerequisites for the provision to be validly amended. What the Legislature however did was to subject the Bill to a uniform process. Sections which required stringent/rigorous processes were subjected to the less rigorous processes. On this point the anomalies in the Missouri cases are distinguishable from what we are dealing with in the matter before us. Secondly, whereas the Missouri cases dealt with severance of irregularities in the enactment of ordinary statutes, the instant appeal deals with irregularities in the amendment of the Constitution.

I must also point out the fact that although in both Legends Bank vs. State (Supra) and Missouri Roundtable for Life, Inc. vs. State of Missouri (Supra) Judge Fischer filed concurrence opinions, in each case he stated that although he concurred in the result of the case, he was writing separately to express his view that the judicial doctrine of severance as applied to procedurally unconstitutional Bills should be abolished. The Learned Justice argued that judicial severance encourages the Legislature to disregard its oath to protect the Constitution of theState and procedural mandates expressed within it. That judicialseverance provides no incentive for legislators to follow the clearand express mandates of the constitution.

I am persuaded by Fischer J's reasoning.

But even more important is that severance in the context of an Act of Parliament passed in violation of constitutional imperatives and parliamentary rules goes against several principles already well established in our jurisprudence. One such principle is the principle of legal purity which is to the effect that in enacting and/or amending a country's constitution the actors must ensure that resultant Act is delivered in a medium of legal purity - sound constitution-making should never be sacrificed at the altar of expediency. Another principle is that Parliament as a law making body should set standards for compliance with Constitutional provisions and with its own rules. The result of the said principles is that failure to obey procedural rules of parliament while enacting a law renders the whole enacting process a nullity. That an Act of Parliament so enacted is by such reason unconstitutional.

The said principles are well articulated in the cases of Prof Oloka-Onyango and 9 Others vs. Attorney General,[1083]Ssempebwa vs. AG[32]and Ssemwogerere vs. AG 2002[1084].

In Prof Oloka-Onyango and 9 Others vs. Attorney General,[1085] the 10 Petitioners alleged that the enactment of the AntiHomosexuality Act 2014 by the 9th Parliament was without quorum in the house and that this was in contravention of Articles 2(1) & (2), 88 and 94(1) of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda and Rule 23 of the Parliamentary Rules of Procedure. Article 94 (1) provides that Parliament may make rules to regulate its own procedure. Article 88 of the Constitution provides that the quorum of Parliament shall be prescribed by the rules of Procedure of Parliament made under Article 94 of the Constitution. Rule 23 states that at any time when a vote is to be taken the Speaker shall ascertain whether the Members present in the House form a quorum for the vote to be taken. If the Speaker finds that the number is less, the Speaker shall suspend the proceedings of the House.

On 20th December 2013 when the Anti Homosexuality Act was being put to vote before Parliament, a procedural question as to the quorum in the House was raised by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister stated that if the law was to be passed it must be with quorum. However, the Speaker of Parliament did not respond to the issue raised and instead called for a vote to be taken.

The case for the petitioners was that the Anti- Homosexuality Act was not passed in accordance with the Law because Rule 23(1), a rule made pursuant to Article 94 imposes on the Speaker a Constitutional Command to ascertain that there is Quorum. So when a procedural question is raised about quorum, the question has to be determined. That According to the evidence adduced, the Speaker disobeyed that command. Counsel for the petitioners argued that legislative sovereignty must be exercised in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution.

On the other hand, the respondent stated that there is no evidence to prove that there was no quorum and that the burden to prove that fact rested with the Petitioners. According to the AG the key aspect to the petition was an allegation that Parliament passed the Act without a quorum and thus violated the Constitution, and so the key issue arising from the pleadings is; "the absence of Coram". She argued further that the fact of absence of Coram is what is alleged to have made the Act inconsistent with the Constitution and therefore the petitioners had the duty to adduce evidence that the required number was not present at the time of the vote. That the evidence adduced to prove that the Speaker did not comply with Rule 23 by failing to ascertain Quorum is not itself evidence of the absence of quorum.

[1083] CONSTITUTIONAL PETITION N0. 08 OF 2014 [32]Constitutional Case No. 1 of 1987
[1084]Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 2002

[1085] CONSTITUTIONAL PETITION N0. 08 OF 2014

The court held that Rule 23 obliges the Speaker, even without prompting by any Member of Parliament to ensure that Coram exists before a law is passed. That the Speaker did not ensure compliance with Rule 23 and thus acted illegally in neglecting to address the issue of lack of Coram.

That the speaker is duty bound to ensure compliance with the Rule 23. That Parliament as a law making body should set standards for compliance with the Constitutional provisions and with its own Rules. That the enactment of the law is a process, and if any of the stages therein is flawed, that vitiates the entire process and vitiates the law that is enacted as a result of it. Failure to obey the Law (Rules) rendered the whole enacting process a nullity.

Court declared that the act of the Rt. Hon. Speaker of not entertaining the objection that there was no Corm was an illegality under Rule 23 of the Rules of Procedure which tainted the enacting process and rendered it a nullity. The Act itself so enacted was by this reason unconstitutional.

I must emphasize that indeed it was never proved that the Act was passed in the absence of the required quorum. What was proved was that the Speaker did not comply with a procedural imperative. The critical principle therefore - the Ratio Decidendi – is that An Act of Parliament passed without strict compliance with Parliamentary Rules of Procedure is a nullity.

I also find it useful to draw lessons from the pronouncements by (court which court?) in Ssempebwa vs AG[1086]. The National Resistance Council purported to pass an Act of parliament but did not strictly comply with the 1967 Constitution. It was held that since the Constitution sets out not only who exercises legislative power but also how such powers are to be exercised valid legislation can only be made in accordance with the established legislative framework. The court emphasized many points which I consider very pertinent in a country which values the Rule of Law to wit:

1. Human affairs, much more so affairs of state, should always be conducted on the basis of certainty. That is why there are written laws and constitution according to which individuals and governments are expected to behave.

2. The National Resistance Council (read Parliament) … cannot be an exception. The people of Uganda are entitled to expect it as the legislature to follow the constitution. So it cannot choose to legislate inside or outside that constitution according to its own wish … (even more so for purposes of amending the Constitution).

[1086]Constitutional Case No. 1 of 1987

3.… for reason of sanctity of the Constitution as the supremelaw of Uganda … and certainty which is necessary inconducting affairs of the state it would be a dangerousprecedent for this court to say that laws invalidly made should be left to stand because errors regarding them can be easily corrected. (My emphasis)

In view of our history, Governments in Uganda should follow the rule of law in exercising legislative and other powers. To do so is a necessary process in developing a return to the rule of law which has been conspicuous in this country in breach than in observance by Governments and citizens alike. In this process the Courts as the guardian of the Constitution…. have an important role to play. What was said of the national Resistance Council applies just as much to today's Legislative Body – Parliament.

If an individual is to ask the question: if indeed Parliament has the authority to go back and pass into law the provisions which were severed from the impugned Act and declared valid by the Constitutional Court, why the fuss? I would answer in the words of the persuasive Kenyan authority of Njoya & Ors vs. the Attorney General of Kenya[1087]where Ringera J,stated that:

I have in the end formed the conviction that constitution-making is not an everyday or every generation's affair. It is an epoch-making event. If a new Constitution is to be made in peace time and in the context of an existing valid constitutional order (as is being done in Kenya) as opposed to in a revolutionary climate or as a cease fire document after civil strife it must be made without compromise to major principles and it must be delivered in a medium of legal purity. Sound constitution-making should never be sacrificed at the altar of expediency.

The pronouncements made in regard to the making of a new constitution are equally pertinent in the process of amending a constitution in peace time and in the context of an existing valid constitutional order as exist in today's Uganda. Applying the principle of severance goes against this profound statement. And in the Ssemwogerere vs. AG 2002 case (Supra), Kanyeihamba JSC aptly said in his Lead Judgment:

… if Parliament is to successfully claim and protect its powers and internal procedures it must act in accordance with the constitutional provisions which determine its legislative capacity and the manner in which it must perform its functions.

I now must now specifically make mention of the application of severance to the Certificate of Compliance which was presented to the President by the Speaker. Having found that the President assented to a Bill which was a nullity, I must hold that a court cannot sever a document which has no legal standing.

1087 AHRLR 157

ISSUE 3: VIOLENCE

Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the violence/scuffle inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda?

This issue is based on two "events" to wit: What occurred in Parliament on 27th September 2018 and Prevention of Members of Parliament from consulting outside their constituencies Events in Parliament on 27th September 2017.

The Hansard shows that on 27th Wednesday September 2017, the Speaker welcomed Members to the day's session. The Speaker then informed the House that Parliamentary business had not been properly carried out since 21st September 2017 because Members were not willing to listen to each other. The Speaker also informed the House that she had received credible information that Hon. Kibuule endangered the safety of Members by bringing a firearm into the chamber of Parliament on 21st September 2017. The Speaker also stated that at the previous sitting of 26th Tuesday September 2017, Members were unruly and that therefore she had made a decision to exercise her powers under Rule 87 (2) as well as Rule 88 and suspended Members of Parliament.

Rule 87(2) provides that:

The Speaker shall order any Member whose conduct is grossly disorderly to withdraw immediately from the House or Committee for the remainder of that day's sitting; and the Clerk or the Sergeant-at-Arms shall act on such orders as he or she may receive from the Speaker to ensure compliance with this Rule.

Rule 88 provides as follows:

(1) If the Speaker considers that the conduct of a Member cannot be adequately dealt with under sub Rule (2) of Rule 87, he or she may name the Member.

(2) Where a Member has been named, then-

(a) in the case of the House, the Speaker shall suspend the Member named from the service of the House.

(6) Where a Member who has been suspended under this Rule from the service of the House refuses to obey the direction of the Speaker when summoned under the Speaker's orders by the Sergeant-at-Arms to obey such direction, the Speaker shall call the attention of the House to the fact that recourse to force is necessary in order to compel obedience to his or her direction, and the Sergeant –at-Arms shall be called upon to eject the Member from the House.

After the Speaker naming the suspended Members, she directed their immediate exit and adjourned the House for 30 minutes for the Members to oblige. There is no evidence in the Hansard to show whether the suspended Members were still in the House after the expiry of 30 minutes. What the Hansard shows is that when the Speaker exited the House unknown people entered the House and started evicting the named Members by force.

On record is a letter written by the Speaker on 23rd October, 2017 to H.E the President of Uganda raising concern as to where the unknown people emerged from. The letter states as follows:

"I took action to suspend members of Parliament from the service of the House for 3 sittings. However, after I had requested the Sergeant Arms to remove the members from precincts unknown people entered the Chamber beat up the members, including those not suspended and fight ensued for over an hour. I have had the opportunity to view camera footages of what transpired and noticed people in black suits and white shirts who were not part of the Parliamentary police or staff of the Sergeant at Arms beating Members. Additionally, footage shows people walking in single file from the office of the President to the Parliament precincts.

I am therefore seeking explanation as to the identity, mission and purpose of the unsolicited forces.

I am also seeking an explanation about why they assaulted Members of Parliament.

I am also seeking an explanation why the Members were arrested and transported and confined at police stations."

No response was made to the Speaker's letter. However, the evidence of the Chief of Defence Forces, (CDF) General David Muhoozi confirmed that the 'unknown people' constituted staff from the Uganda People's Defence Forces (UPDF).

In the Constitutional Court the present appellants alleged that Article 24 which deals with respect for human dignity and protection from inhuman treatment was violated when members of the UPDF came into Parliament and manhandled some members of Parliament. That furthermore Article 97 which provides for Parliamentary immunities and privileges was also violated.

In support of this allegation, Honourables: Munyagwa, Karuhanga, Ssewanya and Nambooze swore affidavits. Hon. Betty Nambooze deponed that she was intercepted by security personnel and assaulted. That she was violently thrown on the ground, beaten and kicked. Nambooze averred that this amounted to subjecting her to inhuman and degrading punishment. The Clerk to Parliament confirmed that Parliament footed Nambooze's medical bills when she went to India for treatment. The Clerk however denied knowledge of Hon. Nambooze being assaulted during the scuffle.

Honourable Munyagwa, Karuhanga and Ssewanyana deponed that although they were not among the suspended Members of Parliament, they too were assaulted and thus subjected to inhuman and degrading treatment.

Involvement of UPDF: findings of the Constitutional court

In reference to the intervention of the UPDF in the scuffle at Parliament, Owiny-Dollo, DCJ held that there was absolutely no reason for the intervention of the UPDF. In his view, proof of this is in the fact that the members of the UPDF who intervened went barehanded in civilian attire; something they would not have done had the situation been such as to warrant their intervention. The Learned Justice referred to Uganda's sad and painful history of military intervention in matters that are purely civilian. He then concluded that it was therefore a gross error of judgment on the part of the Army Chief to deploy the UPDF in a situation that did not, by any stretch of classification, warrant military intervention.

The judge however held that despite "the unwarranted and wrongful" intervention by the UPDF, there are extenuating circumstances that point to the fact that the ramifications of the interventions did not in any way vitiate the process in Parliament that resulted in the enactment of the Constitution Amendment Act.

Similarly, Justice Elizabeth Musokeopinedthat the police force could have contained the situation at Parliament and the deployment of the army, albeit from the permanent establishment at Parliament/President's office, was not justified. The Judge noted that the Sergeant at Arms did not request for the back-up from the UPDF even when he knew they had a permanent establishment at the Parliament.

Justice Musoke then made a finding that the acts of the security agents at the Parliament premises constituted acts of security interference that contravened Articles 1, 2 and 8A, of the Constitution. She nevertheless concluded that based on the fact that business went back to normal after the eviction of the offending Members of Parliament and also because on the day the Bill was passed into law, the House was full to capacity, the process leading to the enactment of the impugned Act was not negatively impacted. According to Justice Remmy Kasule, this issue required the court to determine whether there was any violence both inside and outside Parliament, and if there was, whether that violence disabled members from freely enacting the impugned Act.

The Judge held that on the basis of the evidence availed to the court, there was no justification at all for the army and other security forces to join in this scuffle, which should have been handled by the normal police personnel and within the normal security systems of Parliament. Kasule JCC also referred to the 1966 crisis when the Executive deployed the army under Idi Amin and other State security organs to suppress Parliament and to arrest and detain, without trial five Ministers of the Cabinet and other Ugandans. He then stated that it is because of such incidents that the Preamble to the 1995 Constitution implores us to recall

"… our history which has been characterized by political and Constitutional instability". The Judge went further to point out thatUgandans, through the Constituent Assembly, made provision for the army to be represented in Parliament and that the force should restrict its role in political disputes through its representatives in Parliament. That to conduct itself otherwise, is to overlook and disregard the very painful lessons of the history of Constitutionalism in Uganda.

The Learned Justice nevertheless went on to make a finding that since Parliament thereafter carried on its business without any disruption or interference from any internal forces, the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 was not enacted as a result of violence.

Similarly, Kakuru JCC held that there was no evidence pointing to the need for intervention of the UPDF as the Police Force in Uganda is equipped and professional enough to evict unarmed people from a building that is not even on fire. The Learned Justice pointed out that our history requires that the Army be kept out of partisan politics. The Judge held that the action of the Police and the Army in forcefully evicting Members of Parliament from the Chambers and arresting them after man handling them violated the Constitution. He nevertheless came to the conclusion that although there was indeed violence, intimidation and restrictions imposed on Members of Parliament and the public during the process of enacting the impugned Act, there is no evidence that the entire process was vitiated as a result.

It was only Justice Cheborion who opined that the involvement of the Army in the scuffle in Parliament was justified. In his view the intervention of Uganda Police and UPDF "to secure the precincts of Parliament by causing the eviction of the said Members of Parliament was a necessary avenue to enable Parliament to proceed with its Constitutional mandate. The Learned Justice based his opinion on Section 42 of the Uganda Peoples Defence Forces Act which allows the UPDF to be called in aid of civilians in situations of riots or disturbance of peace and Article 209(b) of the Constitution which enjoins the Uganda Peoples Defence Forces to co-operate with civilian authority in emergency situations and in cases of natural disaster. According to the Judge, the question which needed to be answered was: was the situation in Parliament an emergency?

Cheborion JCC pointed to the unrebutted evidence of the Sergeant at Arms that the Speaker had to exit using the rear door and that MPs had started throwing chairs around and some of his staff were injured. That there was also evidence that a Member of Parliament had entered the chamber of Parliament with a gun. In the opinion of the Learned Justice, these events were life threatening and constituted an emergency within the meaning of Article 209(b) of the Constitution and therefore the involvement of the army, an institution which is mandated to act in cases of emergencies, was justified.

The Learned Justice went on to point out that a Member of Parliament is entitled to enjoy the rights enshrined in Articles 1, 2, 3 (2), 8A and 97 to debate and be accorded the privileges under the 1995 Constitution and the Parliamentary (Powers and Privileges) Act. That nevertheless where the conduct of a Member of Parliament in the exercise of their aforementioned rights is inimical to the mandate of Parliament to conduct business, such right may be curtailed as long as the limitation does not go beyond what is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society. The Learned Justice then stated that the next question to be answered therefore would be: Did the measures taken by the Sergeant at Arms and the security forces in implementing the order of the Speaker fall within those stated to be "acceptable and demonstrably justifiable" in a free and democratic society within the meaning of Article 43(2) of the Constitution?

The Judge held that the affected Members of Parliament's right to participate in the debate leading to the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act was curtailed on account of their misconduct. And that therefore the curtailing of such rights did not amount to violation of Articles 1, 2, 3(2), 8A and 97 of the Constitution as it was necessitated by their rather unprecedented misconduct, which was contemptuous of the Rules of Parliament and the orders of the Speaker of Parliament.

The Learned Justice however hastened to say that this finding is not intended to grant a carte blanche to the army and the Sergeant at Arms in Parliament to intervene in matters of Parliament without reasonable cause - each incident should has to be evaluated on its own merits and findings made accordingly.

The Judge also stated that although the intervention of security forces was warranted, the intervening forces used excessive force in stopping the scuffle in Parliament. The treatment of the Members of Parliament was inhuman and contravened Article 24 of the Constitution. That nevertheless, after the said scuffle, the sitting of Parliament resumed when the Bill came for the 3rd reading, 439 Members of Parliament were present and the house was full. Many gave feedback on their consultations and voted on the Bill, there was no evidence of violence in Parliament and consequently, it cannot be said that the entire amendment process was tainted with violence. The Judge concluded that consequently, it is could not be said that 25 Parliament was legislating under duress.

The Mugenyi Directive

On 16th October 2017 Asuman Mugenyi, an AssistantInspector General of Police issued a Directive to District Police Commanders throughout the country. The directive was to the effect that in the process of consulting the public on the proposed amendment of Article 102 (b), Members of Parliament must be restricted to their constituencies. The police was to stop MPs from moving to other constituencies "in order to support their counterparts or to consult outside their constituencies."

Jonathan Odur deponed that in a letter dated 18th October and addressed to the Inspector General of Police, a group of members of Parliament from the Lango Sub-Region notified the police that they would address public rallies to consult the public about the proposed amendment of Article 102 (b). The letter gave the Police a detailed programme indicating where the group would be on particular dates and time. On 24th October 2017, Odur and 5 other Members of Parliament from the Lango Sub-region gathered to hold a joint consultation meeting in Lira District. However, the police dispersed people who had gathered at Adyel Division by firing tear gas and live bullets. Hon Odur further deponed that he and other members of Parliament were arrested, beaten and subjected to torture by security forces (the Army, Police Force and other militia) while in their constituencies for purposes of consulting the people they represent in Parliament.

Hon. Winfred Kiiza similary deponed that public rallies by members of the opposition in Mbale, Lubaga South, Makindye East, Makindye West were dispersed with tear gas and live bullets by members of the Uganda Police Force.

Counsel for the petitioners contended that the directive violated the Constitution and vitiated the process of enacting the impugned Act. In a strongly worded messageto the Uganda Police Force, Owiny Dollo DCJ in his judgment reminded the Police Force that it must exercise its national responsibility in a professional and non– partisan manner; and indiscriminately serve the people without any favour, malice, or ill will. That the Circular, which the leaders of the Police Force sent to the Police throughout the country to ensure that members of Parliament were restricted in their Constituencies … and intimating that this was to ensure members of the opposition did not interfere with the process of consultation, was most unfortunate.

That the Police Force does not belong to, and must never serve the interest of any political party, not even the political party in government. This is owing to the fact that our Constitution and democratic dispensation recognises that Parliament is one of the three arms of government alongside the Executive and the Judiciary; hence, since the opposition parties are also in Parliament, they are together in government with the political party that forms the executive arm of government. The Honourable Justice quoted Lord Hatherly in Campbell's Trustees vs Police Commissioner of Leith (1870) LR 2HL (Sc) 1, at p.3, thus: "The courts will hold a strict hand over those to whom the legislature has entrusted large powers, and take care that no injury is done by extravagant assertion of them."

Nevertheless, the Learned DCJ declined to hold that the unlawful order had vitiated the whole legislative process. The Hon DCJ held that despite the unwarranted and wrongful intervention by the UPDF, and the Police interfering with the consultation of some of the members of Parliament, there are extenuating circumstances that point to the fact that the interventions did not vitiate the process in Parliament that resulted in the enactment of the Constitution Amendment Act in any way. That the consultations took place fairly well. The Learned Justice Kakuru stated that the Police had no powers to issue directives stopping Members of Parliament and specifically Members of the Opposition in Parliament from consulting the people of Uganda. That the act of the Police in issuing the letter in question violated Articles 1, 2, and 29 of the Constitution.

Kakuru JCC also stated that the police directive goes against every letter and spirit of the Constitution. The Learned Justice noted that the directive was aimed only at intimidating persons perceived to be against the removal of the Presidential age limit and therefore the police acted in a partisan manner. And that in the process it also criminalized an otherwise legitimate political issue, it criminalized a section of society - the people who did not support the amendment of the age restriction on eligibility for presidency. In this the police contravened Articles 1, 2, 21, and 29 of the Constitution. The Learned Justice however held that nevertheless no sufficient evidence was adduced to prove that the directive, unconstitutional as it was, on its own vitiated the whole process of enacting the impugned Act.

Similarly, Justice Cheborion, JCC held that the Mugenyi Directive contravened the Constitution. It restricted freedom of association and movement of Members of Parliament without any justification. That in the current multiparty dispensation, most Members of Parliament belong to one party or another and they should therefore be expected to offer support for similar minded colleagues in their constituencies. Political parties exist to lobby the public for their causes and positions. Members of Parliament are therefore within their rights to solicit for support for their views and positions or carry out consultations not only from their constituencies but throughout the country.

That there was absolutely nothing unlawful about Members of Parliament lobbying different individuals beyond their own constituencies. That furthermore, the directive was clearly ignorant of the fact that some Members of Parliament, such as the National Female Youth Representative, literally represent an electorate spread out all over the country. Other Members of Parliament such as representative for special interest groups also cover wide territories and regions with the possibility that they would hold joint consultative meetings with other Members of Parliament. The Learned Judge was of the view that the directive was recklessly and wantonly issued without any regard for the law more specifically Article 29(2) which guarantees the freedom of every Ugandan to move freely in Uganda. That the directive in issue was clearly calculated to muzzle public participation and debate on the proposed amendments in the original Bill tabled by the Honorable Raphael Magyezi.

However, the Learned Justice declined to make a finding that the unlawful directive had a chilling effect. In his view, he could only arrive at such finding if it had been proved that the disruption of meetings was widespread. On the contrary evidence indicated that although in some cases meetings and rallies were dispersed, in some cases the directive was roundly ignored and in most parts of the country meetings went on without disruption. According to the Learned Justice, it could thus not be said that throughout the country, the police unduly restricted consultative meetings thereby rendering the public participation in the Bill nugatory and the entire Bill a nullity.

Kasule JCC made a finding that the Mugenyi Directive was aimed at preventing MPs from exercising their freedom of association and movement within their respective constituencies, and elsewhere in Uganda. By the directive some MPS were prevented from seeking participation of Ugandans whom they represent in Parliament, on the proposed Bill. The directive was contrary to Article 29 (1) (d); 29 (1) (e) and (2) (a) of the Constitution as well as the Provisions of the Parliamentary (Powers and Privileges) Act.

The Judge pointed out that the court received no evidence that the Uganda Police acted as they did in consultation with the Speaker of Parliament, the head of the legislature, the second arm of State. The Learned Justice concluded that this was a subjugation of Parliament as the country's legislature to the unlawful orders of this police officer. The Learned Justice however held that because the overwhelming number of Members of Parliament carried out consultations and only a few were inhibited he could not hold that the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 was enacted as a result of violence having been exerted upon the Honourable Members of Parliament.

I note that at the Constitutional Court, it was the finding of 4:1 that the intervention of the Army was uncalled for. Nevertheless, the Justices who made the above finding and who further held that the intervention contravened the Constitution went on to conclude that nonetheless the unlawful acts of the army did not invalidate the impugned Act.

I also note that it was the unanimous finding of the Constitutional Court that the directive issued by the Asuman Mugenyi was unconstitutional. The court however held that the unlawful directive and acts which ensued did not vitiate the legislative process which culminated into the impugned Act.

In arriving at the finding that the conduct of the security forces contravened the Constitution, the Learned Justices pointed out specific provisions which had been violated. For Justice Musoke Articles 1, 2 and 8 A had been contravened. Similarly, Kakuru JCC made a finding that Articles 1 and 2 had been violated. As already discussed in this judgment, these Articles are part of what constitutes the Constitution's bed rock or Basic Structure.

The findings of Owiny-Dollo DCJ, of Kasule JCC and of Kakuru JCC point us to our "sad and painful" history characterized by military intervention in civilian matters, political and Constitutional instability. As already discussed in this judgment, the Constitution's Preamble which captures our "sad" history forms part of the Constitution's basic structure. The Justices also make findings that fundamental human rights such as the freedom to assemble, to associate and to move freely throughout the country had been violated. The court even made mention of the non-derogable right to be protected from inhuman and degrading treatment - (Article 24) - it was contravened.

In my view what this Court is called upon to determine is whether the proven violations of the Constitution and the proven violation of the rights of individuals had an impact on the validity of the Constitution (Amendment Act) No. 1 of 2018.

In my view, enactment of an Act of Parliament is not an event. It is a process. In the matter before this Court, the conduct complained of violated the rights of individuals who were engaged in activities directly connected to and/or necessary for the enactment of the impugned Act of Parliament. It was the Speaker who specifically sent out legislators to their constituents for the specific purpose of collecting the views of citizens on proposals which were before parliament. Members of Parliament accessed Public Funds for the purpose. The consultations were no doubt directly linked to the enactment process. The Mugenyi Directive specifically gave orders aimed at interfering with this very process. I find it inconceivable that the court could de-delink the proven violations from the legislative process which resulted into the impugned Act.

I find it incomprehensible that a court which found that the sovereignty of the people and the supremacy of the Constitution had been violated in that process, would go on to say that "nevertheless" such violations did not vitiate the enactment process.

In my discussion of Issue 1, I stated that the Preamble to Uganda's Constitution reflects the country's history and that therefore it serves to specify the reasons for the Constitution's enactment, its raison d'être and eternal ideals. I find it inconceivable that a court which made a finding that the conduct of the security forces (conduct connected to activities linked to the legislative process) was a repeat of our sad history, can go ahead and conclude that acts which take us back to our sad history would not be held to have vitiated the enactment process.

Furthermore, it is on record that the Speaker of Parliament disassociated herself from the forces who entered Parliamentary Chambers on 27th September – the forces werenotpart of the Parliamentary Police or staff of the Sergeant at Arms. On the other hand, the Chief of Defence Forces confirmed that the 'unknown people' constituted staff from the Uganda People's Defence Forces (UPDF). This is evidence that there was interference with the sovereignty of Parliament and a violation of the democratic principle of separation 25 of powers - an essential feature of democracy.

Regarding the Mugenyi Directive it was the unanimous finding of the Constitutional Court that it resulted into disruption of consultations of some Members of Parliament. That the work of some MPS was interfered with thus preventing them from seeking the participation of Ugandans whom they represent in Parliament, on the proposed Bill.

It is clear that the Constitutional Court concentrated on the rights of the members of Parliament and said little about the fact that scores of citizens were denied the right to actively participate in issues of governance since they were denied the opportunity to express their views on the proposed amendments. The courtemphasized that it had not been proved that that the disruption ofmeetings was widespread throughout the country. It was for this reason that court declined to make a finding that the unlawful directive rendered the public participation in the Bill nugatory and the entire Bill a nullity.

I respectfully differ from the reasoning of the Constitutional court. I must emphasize that the rights in issue are granted to each and every individual citizen – it was violation of the fundamental right of each and every citizen who wanted their opinions listened to but was denied this right. The right of an individual cannot be rendered inconsequential just because other citizens were enabled to enjoy their rights. What occurred is contrary to Objective II (i)of the National Objective and Directive Principles of State Policy which statesas follows: The State shall be based on democratic principles which empower and encourage the active participation of all citizens at all levels in their own governance.

I must also add that as argued by the 3rd Appellants the Police Directive and what ensued therefrom also violated Article 38 of the Constitution which deals with the Civic Rights of Citizens. I am in agreement with Counsel for the 3rd appellant that when Parliament chose to invoke consultations on Section 3 of the impugned Act, it brought itself under Articles 38 of the Constitution which and provides as follows:

(1) Every Ugandan has a right to participate in the affairs of government, individually or through his or her representatives in accordance with law.

The right to participate in the affairs of government no doubt accrues to each and every citizen and its violation cannot on the basis of numbers, be deemed “inconsequential”.

Issue 4

Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they applied the substantiality test in determining the petition.

1st appellant’s submissions (Mabirizi)

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that under Article 137 of the Constitution, the Constitutional court has no jurisdiction to apply the ‘substantiality’ test. That the Constitutional Court derives its power from Article 137 of the Constitution which does not give it jurisdiction and power to determine whether the contravention affected the resultant action in a substantial manner. That the court’s jurisdiction is to determine whether the actions complained against were in contravention of the Constitution and when it finds a contravention to declare so or give redress or refer the matter for investigation.

That since the court's role is limited to determining whether there was contravention of the Constitution or not, there is no way the Constitutional Court could go ahead to investigate the degree of contravention and whether the (process of enacting the impugned Act) contravened the Constitution in a substantial manner. In the 1st appellant's view, it is only the Presidential and Parliamentary Elections Acts which provide for the 'substantiality test'. There is no law enabling the Court to apply the test in Constitutional petitions.
Similarly, the 2nd appellants submitted that the Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law by applying the substantiality test in evaluating and assessing the extent to which the Speaker and Parliament failed to comply with and/or violated the Rules of procedure of Parliament. That whereas the substantiality test is expressly provided for in electoral laws, in Constitutional matters the test is totally different. That the Constitution being the supreme law of the land does not provide room for any scintilla of violation.
In support of their submission, the 2nd appellants relied on the decision of this Court of Paul K. Ssemogerere & 2 Ors vs. 30 Attorney-General SCCA. NO. 1 OF 2002, where it was held that the Constitutional procedural requirements are mandatory. They also relied on the Kenyan case of Njoya & Ors vs. the Attorney General of Kenya[1088] where Ringera J,stated that:
I have in the end formed the conviction that Constitution-making is not an everyday or every generation's affair. It is an epoch-making event. If a new Constitution is to be made in peace time and in the context of an existing valid Constitutional order (as is being done in Kenya) as opposed to in a revolutionary climate or as a cease fire document after civil strife it must be made without compromise to major principles and it must be delivered in a medium of legal purity. Sound Constitution-making should never be sacrificed at the altar of expediency.
Similarly, the 3rd appellant submitted that the substantiality test is only applicable in electoral laws and faulted the Constitutional Court for applying the test to the unlawful directive of the police and to the invasion of Parliament by security forces. Counsel for the 3rd appellant argued that the wrongful application of the test prevented the court from applying the proper test which is whether the limitations imposed by the police were justified – it prevented the court from asking itself whether the directive passed the test set under Article 43 of the Constitution. Further argued that the substantiality test cannot be applied to violation of rights under Article 29 - it is impossible to measure the degree of curtailed speech or restricted movement of a Member of Parliament. A right cannot be quantified the same way votes can. It would be impossible to evaluate how the failure of a member to go to a particular constituency because of limitations affected the outcome/result of the consultations. And thus the substantiality test is not applicable.

1088 AHRLR 157

The appellants pointed out that the case of Col. Dr. Kizza Besigye versus Y.K Museveni & The Electoral Commission[1089] relied on by the Learned Justice Musoke dealt with the meaning of Section 59 (6) of the Presidential Election Act whereas what is applicable in a Constitutional Petition is Article 137(3) and (4) of the Constitution. That furthermore, the Supreme Court authority of Charles Onyango Obbo and Andrew Mujuni Mwenda vs. Attorney General[1090] specifically provides for the evidential burden in respect of limitations of fundamental rights.

That what was in issue before court was infringement of Constitutional rights such as limitations to free speech and expression, movement and participation. The Court is not required and there is no legal basis for it to determine the effect proved facts (violations).

That furthermore, unlike it is in election petitions, it is impossible to prove the exigent of the Constitutional limits imposed by police, the degree of such limitations and the substantial effect they had on the outcome of the consultations. That where a directive by any organ of the state is sent to all districts of Uganda requiring police officers all over the country to breach the Constitution and indeed there is evidence that the directive was complied with in any part of the country, the burden shifts to the respondent to prove that the limitations were either necessary to protect the rights of others or that it was in public interest to do so. Where the respondent fails to do so, as was in this case, the petitioner has proved breach of the Constitution. All that remains is the remedy. That it cannot be argued that violations of the Constitution have to be widespread throughout the country for the Court to invalidate the Constitutional Amendment Act. That the appropriate test which ought to be applied is whether the violations contributed to or had the effect of contributing to the enactment of the Act. That once the Court found Constitutional violations as it did, it was required to make a declaration to that effect and grant relief.

The essence of the 3rd appellant's argument was that once a petitioner has adduced evidence that the police directive was complied with in any part of the country and court makes a finding that the directive resulted into violation of rights, the burden shifts to the respondent to prove that the limitations were either necessary to protect the rights of others or that it was in public interest to do so. This would be in line with Article 43 of the Constitution. That in the matter before Court, the petitioner proved breach of the Constitution but the respondent failed to prove that the curtailment of rights under Article 29 was justified. Consequently, what remained for the Constitutional Court was to grant the petitioner a remedy.

Like the 2nd appellants, the 3rd appellant relied on the case of Paul K Ssemogerere & 2 Ors versus

[1089] Election Petition No.1 of 2001

[1090] Constitutional Appeal No. 2 of 2002.

Attorney-General SCCA. No. 1 of 2002 for the proposition that Constitutional procedural requirements are mandatory and that the Constitution provides for no room of any scintilla of violation.

The appellants prayed that this Court substitutes the order of the Constitutional Court with one striking down section 3 of the Act.

Submissions of the Respondent AG

The AG conceded that indeed various Rules of Parliamentary procedure were violated and in some instances Constitutional imperatives were contravened. That nevertheless, since the court found that there was general compliance with the Constitutional requirements and procedure for the enactment of the impugned Act, the Justices of the Constitutional Court were justified in applying the substantiality test to arrive at the finding that the few instances of irregularities did not adversely affect the process of passing the impugned Act and subsequently applying the doctrine of severance to reach the decision that some of the sections of the impugned Act were validly passed by Parliament. That having arrived at this finding, the court was right to strike down sections of the impugned law which were tainted with illegal processes but saved that which was amended within the law.

That the question that begs an answer is therefore whether the Court was wrong to use that substantiality test and in so doing failed to properly evaluate the evidence and reached a wrong conclusion.

It was the argument of the AG that the Appellants posited evidence which the Trial Court properly evaluated, the court considered whether the Constitution was amended within the precincts of the law and it interrogated whether the alleged violations of the Constitution impacted the Constitutional making process.

To support their case, the respondent AG relied on the decision of Odoki, C.J in Kizza Besigye vs. Yoweri Museveni Kaguta and & The Electoral Commission (supra) where the court applied the substantiality test in a presidential election petition to determine whether the proven non-compliance with electoral laws would result in nullification of the election. Odoki CJ held that for an election to be nullified, the court has to evaluate the whole process for the election and it must be proved not only that the irregularities affected the result but also that the degree of the effect was substantial. It was also held that numbers are useful in making adjustment for irregularities.

After citing the learned CJ's pronouncements extensively, the AG concluded that the substantiality test therefore is a tool of evaluation of evidence and that to fault the Court for applying the substantiality test in a Constitutional petition is to say that a court interpreting the Constitution should not apply a tool of evaluation in the determination of the matter before it.

It was further argued that the test is derived directly from the law or may be adopted by a Judge while evaluating the evidence. Therefore, whether a court is handling a constitutional dispute or an ordinary suit, it is trite that the matter be determined after a proper evaluation of evidence. The respondent AG contended that the position of the law with regard to the application of substantiality test was canvassed in Nanjibhai Prabhudas & Co. Ltd vs. Standard Bank Ltd[1091].

The respondent further argued that it is pertinent to note that what the court addressed was the lack of evidence to prove that the scuffles and interferences affected the entire process in passing the Bill into law. That the court's evaluation of evidence and resulting decision was not exclusively based on the quantitative test. That the court considered the nature of the alleged non-compliance and rightly reached a conclusion that the quantum and quality of evidence presented to prove the violation was not sufficient to satisfy nullifying the entire process.

The Attorney General also argued that it was evident on the facts of the case that the process in Parliament was not negatively affected as observed by the majority Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court. The respondent noted that in applying the substantiality test, the Learned Hon Lady Justice Elisabeth Musoke, JCC applied both the Quantitative and Qualitative Test. It was submitted that the qualitative requirements appraise the entire legislative process.

The respondent also sought to rely on the High Court case of Winnie Babihunga vs. Masiko Winnie Komuhangi & Others[1092] as a case in which the qualitative and quantitative aspects of the substantiality test were expounded when the court stated that:

"The quantitative test was said to be most relevant where numbers and figures are in question whereas the qualitative test in most suitable where the quality of the entire process is questioned and the court has to determine whether or not the election was free and fair."

The AG argued that a perusal of the 1st appellant's pleadings shows that what was being sought was that the Constitutional Court determines the effect of certain events/actions that occurred during the process of enacting the impugned Act. That the Appellant pleaded and argued in the Constitutional Court that the entire process of amending the Constitution from the tabling of the Bill, to the passing thereof, were compromised and the whole process was marred/tainted with illegalities, irregularities and violence. That however, there was no credible evidence to show that such violence and intimidation affected the validity of the impugned Act.

The AG submitted that it was important to determine what the standard of proof in dealing with Constitutional matters is, most especially where the matters involve amendment and breaches of the Constitution. Is the standard of proof different from the usual on the balance of probabilities?

[1091][1968] E.A 670 at page 683.
[1092]HTC-OO-CV-EP-004-2001

The AG further made submissions on burden of proof in civil disputes. That that it is not in dispute that whoever desires any court to give judgment, as to any legal right or liability dependent on the existence of facts which they assert, must prove that those facts exist. That in the matter before court the Appellants bore the burden of proving to the required standard that the irregularities/violence that occurred affected the result of the entire passing of the Bill into law and that the impugned Act should therefore be nullified. That the evidence adduced by the Petitioners at the lower court did not support their assertion that the proven irregularities and violence were so widespread/massive that the court ought to have nullified the entire resultant Act.

The AG supported the conclusion of the Constitutional Court that the evidence did not disclose any profound irregularity in the management of the legislative process for the enactment of the impugned Act, nor did it prove that the participation of some members of Parliament was gravely affected. That the parts that were so affected were rightly severed by the Court.

That the Constitutional court was right to inquire into the extent of the alleged massive irregularities and to apply the qualitative and quantitative test to consider whether the errors, and irregularities identified sufficiently challenged the entire legislative process so as to lead to a legal conclusion that the Bill was not passed in compliance with the requirements of the Constitution. Prayed that this Court upholds the finding of the Constitutional court that certain irregularities/errors were mere technicalities and were not so fatal as to invalidate the entire process of enactment of the impugned Act.

Consideration of Court.

Analysis of the judgments of Owiny-Dollo DCJ, Kasule JCC, Elizabeth Musoke, JCC and Cheborion JCC clearly indicates that each of the learned Justices applied the substantial effect test in arriving at the decision that the proven violations of the Constitution arising out of the violence in and outside parliament did not invalidate the process in Parliament which resulted into the impugned Act.

Elizabeth Musoke, JCC stated thus:

What this Court has to determine is whether the alleged police orchestrated violence affected the process of consultation and people participation thereby also negatively impacting the enactment of the Constitution(Amendment) Act, 2018, in a substantial manner such as to render the resultant Act null and void. It is important to decide whether the test to apply would be qualitative or quantitative, or both.

I further note that the learned Justice Musoke was guided by the jurisprudence of this Court in Kizza Besigye vs Yoweri MuseveniKaguta (Supra). The case dealt with the applicability of Section 59 (6) (a) of the Presidential Elections Act in resolving a petition challenging the legality of an Election, on the basis that the election was marred by irregularities and malpractices which violated the Presidential Election Act. After analyzing the interpretation given to the section and its application to the facts of the petition, Musoke JCC, stated that the principles developed in the various Presidential Elections would apply to the incidents of violence alluded to by the petitioners in the Constitutional Court - the appellants before this Court.

In regard to the Police Directive issued by AIGP Asuman Mugenyi Cheborion, JCC made a finding that:

The directive in issue was clearly calculated to muzzle public participation and debate on the proposed amendments in the original Bill tabled by the Honorable Raphael Magyezi. ... In some places MPs were violently and unlawfully stopped from consulting their people, live bullets and teargas were fired and fear was instilled. Though isolated, this was most unfortunate. ... However, in some cases the directive was rightly and roundly ignored. ... There was no evidence to prove that throughout the country, the police unduly restricted consultative meetings thereby rendering the public participation in the Bill nugatory. ... The evidence presented by the Petitioners fell woefully short of demonstrating that this directive had that chilling effect in actual fact.

The import of the learned Justice's decision was that arising from the fact that the majority of members of Parliament had been able to consult their constituents, he could not invalidate the impugned Act.

And Kasule JCC held as follows:

"… By the directive of this very senior police officer, a number, however few, Honourable Members of Parliament were prohibited from … seeking support outside each one's Constituency, thus preventing them from seeking participation of Ugandans whom they represent in Parliament, on the proposed Bill. The directive was contrary to Article 29(1)(d)(e) and (2)(a) as well as the Provisions of the Parliamentary (Powers and Privileges) Act.

The Court, however received no sufficient evidence that the …directive was carried out throughout the country. ... The overwhelming number of Members of Parliament held and carried out their meetings of consultations of the people uninterrupted.

The interference by police with the meetings of the Honourable Members of Parliament seems to have been rather isolated and affected only a few … During the debate on the Bill, Members one after the other reported having consulted their electorates throughout the country."

In conclusion, the answer to this issue is that the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 was not enacted as a result of violence having been exerted upon the Honourable Members of Parliament."

And according to Owiny Dollo DCJ,

"... despite the unwarranted and wrongful intervention by the UPDF, and the Police interfering with the consultation of some of the members of Parliament, in the manner that came out in evidence, there are extenuating circumstances that point to the fact that the ramifications of the interventions did not vitiate the process in Parliament that resulted in the enactment of the Constitution Amendment Act in any way. The consultations took place fairly well."

Did the Constitutional Court err in law when they applied the substantiality test in determining the petition?

In Uganda's jurisprudence, the substantial effect test is a creation of statute and is found in Section 59 (6) of the Presidential Elections Act and Section 62 (1) (a) of the Parliamentary Elections Act. Section 59 (6) (a) of the Presidential Elections Act provides that: The election of a candidate as President shall only be annulled on any of the following grounds if proved to the satisfaction of the court (that there was) —non-compliance with the provisions of this Act, if the court is satisfied that the election was not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in those provisions and that the non-compliance affected the result of the election in a substantial manner; (my emphasis)

But in analyzing the issue at hand, I must start off with bringing clarity to what may be considered a preliminary issue – the need to understand the legal character of the substantiality effect test. The Respondent Attorney General submitted that the substantiality test is a tool of evaluation of evidence. The respondent's submissions also suggest that the issue at hand calls for a discussion of the burden as well as standard of proof required in Constitutional disputes. The respondent seems to have understood the arguments of the appellants as contentions which in effect faulted the Constitutional Court for applying the burden and standard of proof applicable in elections laws to Constitutional matters.

My understanding of the test is that it does not define which party bears the burden. It does not depart from the trite legal principle that places the duty of proving a fact on the party who alleges its existence. The import of the test is that it establishes what must be proved by a party who wants to prove a disputed fact. What the test places on the party is not only the duty to prove what he alleges to have occurred but also to prove that the act had significant effect/consequences on something else – the outcome of a process. I do not therefore see how the test can be referred to as a tool for evaluation of evidence. Furthermore, the phrase "standard of proof" refers to the level/degree of certainty of evidence necessary to establish a disputed fact or to establish the occurrence of an event. Consequently, whether or not the substantiality test is applicable in Constitutional adjudication is not in any way linked to the standard of proof required for determining that a Constitutional imperative was contravened. Since the matter before court was a civil dispute – albeit of a Constitutional nature - the standard of proof applicable was the same as required in other civil suits including elections petitions. The applicable standard is proof on a balance of probabilities. The petitioners did not aver anywhere that the court had erred in applying to a Constitutional dispute, the standard of proof applicable to election disputes. I therefore respectfully find that the AG's submissions that in resolving the issue at hand, it was important to determine what the standard of proof in dealing with Constitutional matters is were misplaced. Linking the applicability of the substantiality test to the burden and the standard of proof is evidence of a misunderstanding of the legal nature of the test.

Be that as it may, in answering the question whether the substantial effect Rule is applicable in Constitutional disputes, one must among other things interrogate what the purpose of that test is analysis of the value attached to the test by courts from across the globe[1093] while dealing with presidential election petitions can be summarized into this: "given the national character of the exercise where all voters in the country formed a single constituency, can it be said that the proven defects so seriously affected the result that the result could no longer reasonably be said to represent the free choice and true will of the majority of voters?" Did the proven irregularities decisively show that the conduct of election was so devoid of merit as not to reflect the expression of the people's electoral intent? If a court answers the question in the negative, it refrains from annulling the election. As I sated in my judgment in Kizza Besigye vs. The Attorney General (supra):

The import of the test for Uganda therefore is that it enables the court to reflect thus: did the proved irregularities distort the election to the extent that the ensuing results did not reflect the choice of the majority of voters envisaged in Article 1 (4) of Uganda's Constitution? Did the non-compliance negate the voters' intent? It is the individual preferred by the majority who has the 10 legitimacy to be in leadership. This is the very philosophy on which Article 1 (4) of the Constitution is founded – giving power to voters to choose who is to govern them.[1094]

The test has a quantitative and a qualitative aspect. From the quantitative aspect, the substantial effect test deals with numbers and is based on the proportionality test. It is rooted in the philosophy that in a democratic system constituted strictly on the basis of majoritarian expression through the popular vote, the essence of an election is that the election of a leader is the preserve of the voting public and that the court should not tamper with results which reflect the expression of the population's electoral intent. The question which is in effect asked is: if the irregularities had not occurred, would the declared winner have garnered enough votes to lead and lead with the percentage legally required to be declared president?

[1093] Kizza Besigye vs. Yoweri Museveni Kaguta, Election Petition No.1 of 2001;Anderson Kambela Mazoka and 3 others vs. Levy Patrick Mwanawasa and 3 Others, Presidential Petition No.SCZ//01/02/03/2002, the Zambian Supreme Court); Nana Addo Dankwa Akufo-Addo & 2 others vs. John Dramani, Presidential Election Petition Writ No.J1/6/2013, (Ghana)

[1094]Constitutional Petition no. 0013 of 2009.

However, the substantial effect test is not exclusively quantitative, it has a qualitative aspect. The qualitative aspect is best articulated in the U.K persuasive authority of Morgan and Others v Simpson and another [1974] 3 All ER 722 in which the Court of Appeal held that:

… if the election had been conducted so badly that it was not substantially in accordance with the election law it was vitiated irrespective of whether or not the result of the election had been affected.

In Kizza Besigye vs The Attorney General (Supra) where Section 59 (6) was unsuccessfully challenged for contravening the constitutional, I analyzed both the quantitative and qualitative aspects of the substantial effect testand their import in understanding the meaning Section 59 (6) (a) of the Presidential Elections Act. Specifically, in regard to the qualitative test, I held as follows:

… if there is evidence of substantial departure from Constitutional imperatives that the process could be said to have been devoid of merit and rightly be described as a spurious imitation of what elections should be, the court should annul the outcome. The courts in exercise of judicial independence and discretion are at liberty to annul the outcome of a sham election ….

The above opinion was adopted with approval by the Supreme Court of Kenya in Raila Amolo Odinga and Another vs. Independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission.[1095] The import of the qualitative test is that the process is as important as the outcome – the process is as important as the numbers. As stated by Stephenson L.J in Morgan and Others v Simpson (supra):

For an election to be conducted substantially in accordance with the law there must be a real election … and no such substantial departure from the procedure laid down by Parliament as to make the ordinary man condemn the election as a sham or a travesty of an election. But perhaps even more important is the differentiation between contravening the Constitution on the one hand and violating provisions of an Act of Parliament on the other hand. In Kizza Besigye vs The Attorney General (ibid) I noted as follows:

But perhaps even more important is the need to point out that the wording of Section 59 (6) (a) is silent in regard to non-compliance with provisions of the Constitution and only refers to noncompliance with the provisions of the Presidential Elections Act. The Section provides that: "The election of a candidate as President shall only be annulled on any of the following grounds if proved to the satisfaction of the court (that there was) — non-compliance with the provisions of this [1095] Presidential Petition No. 1 of 2017 [2017] eKLR.

Act, if the court is satisfied that the election was not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in those provisions and that the non-compliance affected the result of the election in a substantial manner;" (my emphasis)

Consequently, there may/would be no need to prove that the substantial departure from the Constitutional imperatives had substantial effect on the results in circumstances where fundamental Constitutional imperatives have been violated.

It is therefore clear in my mind that even in presidential elections where the substantial effect test is applicable, the test is not extended to violations of Constitutional imperatives. It is limited to violations of an Act of Parliament.

The appellants filed petitions in the Constitutional Court under Article 137 of the Constitution which provides as follows:

137. Questions as to the interpretation of the Constitution.

Any question as to the interpretation of this Constitution shall be determined by the Court of Appeal sitting as the Constitutional court.

When sitting as a Constitutional court, the Court of Appeal shall consist of a bench of five members of that court.

A person who alleges that—an Act of Parliament or any other law or anything in or done under the authority of any law; or any act or omission by any person or authority, is inconsistent with or in contravention of a provision of this Constitution, may petition the Constitutional court for a declaration to that effect, and for redress where appropriate.

The Constitutional Court made findings that the Police Directive which interfered with the consultations by some members of Parliament violated various Articles in the Constitution. This would be in line with Article 137 (3) (b) since the police had engaged in acts (conduct) which contravened provisions of the Constitution.

Kasule JCC made a finding that the Police Directive violated Articles 29 (1) (d) (e) and 2 (a) were violated. I note that these are human rights guaranteed to individuals. The learned Justice however held that since the overwhelming number of MPs carried out consultations with their people without interruption, the impugned Act was not enacted as a result of violence exerted upon MPs.

Owiny-Dollo, DCJ held that the interference by the Police with the consultations of some MPs, targeted at opposition MPs was unwarranted and most unfortunate. In regard to the intervention of the UPDF in Parliament, the Honourable DCJ also found that it was a gross error of judgment on the part of the Army Chief to deploy the UPDF in a situation that did not, by any stretch of classification, warrant military intervention. The DCJ linked this to what he referred to as our sad and painful history of military intervention in matters that are purely civilian. He however concluded that the ramifications of the interventions did not in any way vitiate the process in Parliament that resulted in the enactment of the impugned Act.

Musoke JCC also made a finding that the deployment of the army during the scuffle in Parliament was not justified, especially because the Sergeant at Arms did not request for their assistance. She concluded that on the 26th September, 2017, the interference of Security UPDF contravened Articles 1, 2 and 8A of the Constitution. She nevertheless held that the process leading to the enactment of the impugned Act because business went back to normal after the eviction of the "offending" members of Parliament and on the day the Bill was passed into law, the House was full to capacity.

Cheborion JCC held that the Asuman Mugenyi directive was very arbitrary and unconstitutional. It restricted freedom of association and movement of Members of Parliament without any justification and contravened Article 29 (2) of the Constitution which guarantees the freedom of every Ugandan to move freely in the country. The learned Justice however held that however, since the majority of Members of Parliament had been able to consult their constituents, he could not invalidate the impugned Act because the illegal acts had not occurred throughout the country.

So does the test apply to matters which come to court under Article 137 of the Constitution?

Is a party who has successfully proved that their Constitutionally guaranteed rights were violated expected to further prove that the effect of the violation(s) were substantial or in this particular matter that had the violations not occurred, the Act of Parliament would have been different or would never have been passed?

The case for the appellants is that the process which brought the impugned Act into existence was tainted with Constitutional contraventions and violations of Parliamentary procedure. The essence of their argument is that a right granted to an individual by the Constitution can only be limited in line with Article 43. Once a complainant has adduced evidence and successfully proved that a right guaranteed by the Constitution has been interfered with, the complainant will have done their part. The evidential burden the shifts to the respondent, in this case the Attorney General, to bring the actor's conduct within the purview of Article 43 which provides as follows:

43. General limitation on fundamental and other human rights and freedoms.

In the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms prescribed in this Chapter, no person shall prejudice the fundamental or other human rights and freedoms of others or the public interest.

Public interest under this Article shall not permit— political persecution; detention without trial; any limitation of the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms prescribed by this Chapter beyond what is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society, or what is provided in this Constitution.

In the matter before us, the AG did not adduce any evidence to prove that the curtailment of rights in question was justified so as to protect the rights and freedoms of others and/or for purposes of preserving public interest. The AG did not prove that the nature of curtailment of the rights involved was such as is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society, or what is provided in this Constitution. It is for this reason that the court made findings (declarations) that rights had been violated.

The question which should have been asked by the court is: what is the effect of the proven irregularities and or contraventions of the Constitution on the validity of the impugned Act? The question should not have been: did the contravention of the law have substantial effect on the process of enacting the Law?

The substantial effect test cannot be applied to a violation of a Constitutional right - the right of an individual or even of a community. We should even take cue from the fact that even under Section 59 (6) (a) of the Presidential Election Act from where the substantiality test is derived, the test is not extended to violations of Constitutional imperatives. It is limited to violations of an Act of Parliament. And yet the Constitutional Court applied the test to violations of Article 29 and even to violations of Articles which are part of the Basic Structure of the Constitution – 1, 2 and 8A!

Arising from the above, I respectfully hold that the Justices of the Constitutional Court erred when they applied the substantiality test in determining the petition.

Issue 5

Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves when they held that the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 on the removal of age limit for the President and Local Council V offices was not inconsistent with the provisions of the 1995 Constitution.

Appellants' submissions

1st appellant (Mabirizi)

Mr. Mbabrizi submitted that removal of the age limit by Section 3 of the Constitutional (Amendment) Act amounted to 'Constitutional replacement' which has no place in a Constitutional democracy. In support of this argument, Mabirizi relied on Carlos Bernal's Article[1096] in which he laid down the seven-tiered test as the standard for determining Constitutional Replacement.

Mabirizi submitted that, in the instant case, the essential element of the Constitution which is at stake is the age qualification attached to the office of the President.

[1096] Unconstitutional Constitutional amendments in the case study of Colombia: an analysis of the justification and meaning of the Constitutional replacement doctrine, Published in International Journal of Constitutional Law, Volume 11, Issue 2, 1 April 2013, Pages 339–357.

That the element of qualifications of the President is essential because of the immense powers and duties vested in that office. Those powers were balanced in such a way that the President is neither too young nor too old. Removal of such a balance may have grave consequences on exercise of such powers. That the age qualification can only be amended in a compliant way so as not to destroy the entire Constitutional system.

Mabirizi also argued that the powers to remove the age limit only rests in a constituent assembly not Parliament. In order to curb the Parliament's actions, Mabirizi contends that the courts have a role to play. He relied on Carlos Barnel's Article

(supra) in which he stated that, "the Constitutional Court began to exercise innovative forms of control over the government with the purpose of compensating for the predominance of the president and the deficit of political control by the Congress. Judicial review of the content of Constitutional amendments by means of the Constitutional replacement doctrine is one of these new forms of control."

That it is therefore diversionary for court to base its decision on the fact that the Constitutional Commission and the Constituent Assembly did not entrench age limitations. That the majority of the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court justified their decision not to nullify Section 3 on the reasoning that the framers of the Constitution never treated the provisions of Article 102 on age limit for the office of President as a fundamental feature of the Constitution. In this, they underestimate the decision of the framers to include it in the Constitution.

Mabirizi contented that, upholding of Section 3 of the impugned Act will disharmonize the Constitution so as to render among others Articles 51(3), 144(1)(a), (b), 146(2)(a) and 163(11) unconstitutional. Furthermore, that it will open a flood-gate of private members' Bills to amend those Articles which have age restrictions.

2nd appellants' (MPs) submissions

Counsel for the 2nd appellants contended that the Constitutional Court ought to have found that by amending Article 102 (b) of the Constitution, Parliament was usurping the sovereignty of the people and thereby amended Article 1 of the Constitution by infection. Counsel further contended that Parliament also amended Article 21 (3) of the Constitution by creating 'age' as another form of discrimination. That the Constitutional Court however erroneously held that accepting this proposition amounts to over stretching the application of the amendment by infection principle which would in the end render the principle superfluous.

That the purpose of the impugned Act was to pave way for the indefinite eligibility of the sitting. That this Court should execute its noble duty of striking down such nefarious legal instrument which has got far reaching implications in the political trajectory of the nation.

Furthermore, that the provisions which removed the age limits from the Constitution amended Articles 1, 8A and 21 of the Constitution by infection and hence the requirements under Article 263 (1) of the Constitution were mandatory.

3rd appellant's (ULS) submissions.

Counsel for the 3rd appellant first and foremost faulted the Constitutional Court for making a finding that the 3rd Appellant did not challenge the removal of age restrictions. That under paragraph 1(d) of their petition, Section 3 of the impugned Act was challenged.

Counsel argued that as a result, the Constitutional Court limited its answer to Articles 1 and 21 of the Constitution. Articles 8A and 38 which were raised by the 3rd appellant in addition to Article 1 were not considered. That had the court properly considered the appellant's pleadings, it would have come to a different conclusion.

Counsel stated that when Parliament chose to consult citizens on removal of age restrictions for presidency it brought itself under Articles 1, 8A and 38 of the Constitution. Parliament decided the people must be the arbiter. According to counsel, the process must therefore produce a result of what the people want.

Counsel referred to the affidavit of Professor Ssempebwa in which he extensively alluded to the mandate of the Constitutional Review Commission. That the Commission is specifically mandated to examine sovereignty of the people, democracy and good governance and how to ensure that the country is governed in accordance with the will of the people. In their affidavits supporting the appeal, Professor Ssempebwa, Professor Latigo and Francis Gimara averred that there was abuse of human rights, violence, harassment, humiliation, assault, detention and these human rights violations negated a conducive atmosphere to genuinely seek the views of the people.

AG's reply

The Attorney General submitted that the Justices of the Constitutional Court rightly held that amendment of Articles 102(b) and 183(2) (b) did not in any way infect Article 1 of the Constitution.

He cited Article 1 which states that, all power belongs to the people who shall express their will and consent on who shall govern them and how they should be governed, through regular, free and fair elections of their representatives or through referenda.

Parliament is enjoined to make laws under Articles 79 and 259 of the Constitution. This power is exercised through Bills passed by Parliament and assented to by the President.

The Attorney General submitted that the Justices of the Constitutional Court unanimously held that the power to make laws extends to the amendment of Articles 102 and 183 through established Constitutional procedures.

In contrast to the appellants' arguments, the effect of Section 3 is to open up space and widen the scope of persons who are eligible to stand for election for the office of the President. That in fact the amendment actually safeguards the sovereignty of the people as enshrined under Article 1 of the Constitution because the people of Uganda shall have a wider pool of leaders to choose from.

In response to Mabirizi's arguments that Section 3 of the impugned Act amounted to Constitutional replacement, the Attorney General agreed with the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court that the amendment of Article 102 (b) does not amount to a Constitutional replacement. Parliament had the power through the established Constitutional procedures to amend the provisions of Articles 102 (b) and 183 (2) (b). The Attorney General cited Article 259 of the Constitution which vests Parliament with powers to amend by way of addition, variation or repeal, any provision of this Constitution in accordance with the procedure laid down in Chapter Eighteen. He added that the appellant's argument that upholding Section 3 of the impugned Act will disharmonize Articles 1(3), 144(1)(a) and (b), 146(2)(a) and 163(11) of the Constitution is speculative and lacks merit. According to the Attorney General, the Section is not against the spirit of the Constitution. However, that upholding the appellant's argument would instead curtail the right of Members of Parliament to bring Bills in accordance with Article 94 (4)(b) of the Constitution.

Furthermore, the Attorney General argued that the amendment of Article 102 (b) was not a Constitution making process that required a Constituent Assembly. It was an amendment process which the peoples' representatives (MPs) are empowered to do in accordance with Chapter Eighteen of the Constitution.

Consideration by Court

The contentions of the appellants regarding the link between Article 102 (b) on the one hand and Articles 1 and 8A on the other have been discussed under Issue 1 and need not be repeated here.

Article 38 raised by the 3rd Appellants which deals with the civic rights of citizens and entitles every Ugandan citizen to participate peacefully in the affairs of government has been handled under issue 3 which dealt with of the unlawful Police Directive issued by ASP Asumani Mugenyi.

The value of the philosophy of Constitutional replacement was also discussed under Issue 1.

What remains to be resolved under issue 5 therefore is the contention by the appellants that the amendment of Article 102 (b) on the removal of the age restriction which resulted into allowing persons aged above 75 years and below thirty five years to stand for election as president amended Article 21 (3) of the Constitution by infection.

Article 21(3) lists factors on the basis of which an individual cannot be discriminated. These factors are: sex, race, colour, ethnic origin, tribe, birth, creed or religion, social or economic standing, political opinion and disability.

The argument of the appellants as I understand it is that by removing the age restriction for purposes of eligibility to stand for Presidency or District Chairperson, Parliament added age to the list of factors mentioned in Article 21 (3).

I find the argument incomprehensible. It is not only in the area of elective office that the law in Uganda treats people differently based on age. Ugandan law prohibits an individual who has not attained the age of 18 years to participate as a voter in Presidential Elections (Article 103 of the Constitution); the law prohibits an individual from entering marriage before attaining the age of 18 years (Article 31 (1); a person serving as a Chief Justice must vacate office on attaining the age of 70 years (Article 144 (1) (a)) and Section 12 of the Pensions Act provides for the compulsory retirement of a Public Officer on attaining the age of 60 years. The list is endless.

It cannot be said that the removal of age restrictions for purposes of standing for Presidency has the ripple effect of removing age as a parameter or factor for determining rights legal capacity in all areas of the law. I am in agreement with the Constitutional Court that the appellants have misconstrued and over stretched the application of the amendment by infection principle.

Issue 6: Vacation of the office of President.

Whether the Constitutional Court erred in law and in fact in holding that the President elected in 2016 is not liable to vacate office on attaining the age of 75 years. I take note of the fact that although the issues before Court were jointly framed by all parties, it is only the first appellant (Mr. Mabirizi) who addressed this issue.

Article 102 of the Constitution before its amendment provided as follows:

Qualifications of the President.

A person is not qualified for election as President unless that person is—

(a)… not less than thirty-five years and not more thanseventy-five years of age; and a person qualified to be a member of Parliament. (My Emphasis)

The Constitutional Court held that the petitioners' arguments on this point were misconceived. Owiny Dollo, DCJ in particular held that the relevant Constitutional provision to answer the issue is Article 105(3) which provides for the circumstances when the office of the President falls vacant as follows: Tenure of office of a President.

…The office of President shall become vacant—

(a)on the expiration of the period specified in this Article; or

(b) if the incumbent dies or resigns or ceases to hold office under Article 107 of this Constitution.

Article 107 provides for the circumstances under which the President may be removed including: abuse of office, misconduct and mental incapacity.

Owiny Dollo, DCJ interpreted the above Constitutional provisions to mean that, "a President who attains the age of 75 years, while serving a 5 year term would still continue in office until the expiration of the term. We find the requirement of age as a qualification for being elected President is at the point of election; and not at the end or during the incumbency. A President who is elected on the day he or she attains the age of 74 years would be entitled to stay in office for the next five years. This means he or she can stay in office up to the age of 79 years!"

Similarly, Justice Kakuru, JCC (dissenting) held that, the words used in Articles 83(1) (b) and 102(b) are plain and ought to be given their natural and ordinary meaning. The age limit of the President applies only at the time of election and not otherwise. That had the framers of the Constitution intended that the President and Members of Parliament have same qualifications, they would have stated so but they did not. The factors that disqualify Members of Parliament are not applicable to the President. This is simple and clear. Therefore, I find that, this ground is misconceived and devoid of any merit whatsoever. The issue is resolved in the negative.

In summary, the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court unanimously held that the age limit qualification of 75 years for the office of the President in Article 102 is a threshold only at the point of election.

Consideration by Court

I am in agreement with the unanimous decision of the Constitutional Court that the age limit of the President applies only at the time of election. Where words of the Constitution are clear and unambiguous, they ought to be given their primary, plain, ordinary and natural meaning. It is the term of office provided for in Article 105 (supra) that marks the time when a person holding the office of President should vacate that office. The 1st appellant's arguments are therefore not sustainable.

Issue 6 is answered in the negative.

Issue 7:

Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court derogated the appellants' right to fair hearing, un-judiciously exercised their discretion and committed the alleged procedural irregularities.

If so, what is the effect of the procedural irregularities on the decision of Court?

Appellants' submissions

1st appellant

Mabirizi (1st appellant) argued that the Constitutional Court committed the following procedural irregularities:

(i) Violation of the right to a fair hearing by:

(a) Failing to determine the petition expeditiously and violating the renowned principle that: "justice delayed is justice denied. The appellant argued that evidence of this was the fact that the petition which was filed in the Constitutional Court on December 2017 was heard in April 2018. He submitted that the hearing was in a relaxed manner because the court would break for weekends starting from Friday up to Tuesday.

In addition, Mabirizi argued that the Court's failure to give its judgment within 60 days from the hearing date of 19th April 2018 was against Rule 33(2) of The Court of Appeal Rules which provides that, "Judgment or an order may be given at the close of the hearing of an appeal or application or reserved for delivery on some future day which may be appointed at the hearing or subsequently notified to the parties and which shall, in any case, be without delay."

(b) Evicting the appellant from court seats and relegating him to the dock infringed on his right to a fair hearing. He cited the Canadian Supreme court decision of Andrews vs. Law Society of British Columbia[1097], where Mcintyre J stated that discrimination arises where a Rule or standard is adopted which has a discriminatory effect upon a prohibited ground because of some special characteristic.

2nd appellants (MPs)

Counsel for the 2nd appellants submitted that the right to a fair hearing was compromised by the Constitutional Court in a number of ways.

First, that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court declined to invoke their powers under the law to summon key government officials and individuals who played a pivotal role in the process leading to the enactment of the impugned Act to appear and testify in the matter. In particular, the Constitutional Court declined to summon the Speaker of Parliament, the Rt. Hon. Kadaga Rebecca, without assigning any reason.

In the appellant's view, there were other witnesses who were competent to testify before the Constitutional Court on the enactment process of the Act but the court failed to summon them. These were:

a) The Deputy speaker who would testify on his role during the enactment of the impugned Act, the discrepancies in the certificate of compliance, procedural irregularities, arbitrary suspension of the honourable Members of Parliament from Parliament, the unprecedented mayhem and violence that ensued in the precincts and chambers of Parliament, etc.

The Minister of Finance to testify on the contradictory Certificates of Financial Implication which were issued from his Ministry in regard to the impugned Act.

The Hon. Magezi Raphael who was the sponsor of the impugned Act to testify on the conceptualisation and mischief he intended to cure by moving Parliament to enact the said Act.

[1097] [1989] 1SCR 143

The President who assented to the Bill which was not accompanied with a valid certificate of compliance. The Chairperson and Deputy Chairperson of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee who processed the Bill at Committee stage.

Counsel contended that the court should have exercised its powers *under*Rule 12 (3) of the Constitutional Court (Petitions and References) Rules and summoned the above witnesses. The Rule provides as follows: The Court may, of its own motion, examine any witness or call and examine or recall any witness if the Court is of the opinion that the evidence of the witness is likely to assist the Court to arrive at a just decision.

The second procedural irregularity was that the Constitutional Court restricted the appellants and their counsel on what to ask the witnesses during cross-examination. That the Court limited the cross-examination to the averments that were made in the affidavits of the respective witnesses. The 2nd appellants' counsel contended that this contravened Section 137 (2) of the Evidence Act which is to the effect that cross-examination of a witness need not be confined to the facts to which the witness testified about during examination –in- chief.

The third alleged procedural irregularity is that the Constitutional Court adopted a materially defective mode for presenting submissions during the hearing of the petition; for instance:

a) The learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erroneously directed the appellants' counsel to make submissions before cross examining the relevant witnesses.

b) The learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erroneously denied the appellants' counsel a right to a rejoinder after the representative of the Attorney General had made their submissions in reply.

The 2nd Appellants' counsel further contended that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they injudiciously exercised their discretion in awarding UGX. 20,000,000/= (Twenty Million Shillings) as professional fees and two-thirds of the taxed disbursements to all the Petitioners, a sum which is manifestly meagre considering the nature and significance of the matter.

That all the above irregularities contravened the natural principle of fair hearing which is a non-derogable right under Article 44 of the Constitution. That this right has received judicial consideration in a number of authorities for example: Bakaluba Peter Mukasa vs. Nambooze Bakireke[1098]where Katureebe JSC (as he then was) observed that:

"Fair trial, … is one of the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution."

Issue 7 (b)

[1098] Supreme Court Election Petition Appeal No. 04 of 2009.

Both the 1st and 2nd appellants contended that the above procedural irregularities led to a miscarriage of Justice. Furthermore, the 2nd appellant contended that the irregularities limited the Constitutional Court's scope of investigation and thereby failed in its duty vested under Article 137 (1) of theConstitution. That this duty was emphasized by Kanyeihamba JSC in Ssemwogerere (supra) wherein he observed that:

"In Uganda, courts and especially the Constitutional Court and this Court were established as the bastion in the defence of the rights and freedoms of the individual and against oppressive and unjust laws and acts. Courts must remain constantly vigilant in upholding the provisions of the Constitution."

Consideration by Court

The essence of the arguments of the 1st appellant and the 2nd appellants is that the Constitutional Court abused the right to a fair hearing in various aspects and thereby came to a wrong conclusion.

In order to answer the appellants' arguments comprehensively, I will answer the issue on the right to a fair hearing under three subheadings as follows:

(i) Cross-examination and interjections by the court

The appellants' arguments seek to address the question whether the limitations on the cross-examination of witnesses resulted into an unfair trial.

Section 136 of the Evidence Act defines cross-examination as the examination of a witness by the adverse party.

On Monday 9th April 2018, which was the first day of the hearing, Mabirizi and the MPs' counsel - Erias Lukwago - made an oral application to the Constitutional Court seeking the leave of court so that several named witnesses could be summoned and crossexamined.

In its preliminary ruling, the court granted leave to have several witnesses appear for cross examination. The court however stated that they found no reason to have the Speaker of Parliament appear in court. Court then stated that the detailed reasons for their decision would be in their final judgment.

I have carefully studied the judgments and found that none of the learned Justices gave the detailed reasons as promised. This was an error. Court must always give reason for exercising its discretion in a particular manner. The only way that a litigant can gauge whether or not the court exercised its discretion judicially is if reasons are given.

Nevertheless, it cannot be said that the said error - failure to give reasons for the court's decision not have the Speaker testify in court- - prejudiced the appellants' right to a fair hearing. I must emphasize that it cannot be said that there was any particular evidence which could only be accessed by the appellants through the testimony of the Speaker. The procedural irregularities and violations which occurred during the process of enacting the impugned Act could be and were in fact identified from the Hansard. I am therefore of the view that the non-appearance by the Speaker in court did not prejudice the case of the appellants.

Furthermore, the appellants argued before this Court that the Constitutional Court interjected in the cross-examination of the witnesses which limited them from asking questions to the witnesses. On the other hand, the Attorney General contended that the cross-examination should be restricted to the averments made in the affidavits.

The relevant part of the court record indicates as follows:

"Justice Owiny Dollo: So the individual summon will be served on this counsel; the one for the Attorney General will be served on the Attorney General here, the one for the other counsel will be served accordingly. So on Tuesday we expect these witnesses, we finish with them and continue.

Mr. Rukutana (Attorney General):

Much obliged my lords. We have received your ruling with respect and we shall comply, however we are seeking guidance, isn't it prudent for the petitioners who have applied to summon these witnesses to indicate to us the areas on which they intend to examine each and every witness so that we can prepare them?

Mr. Lukwago:

My lords we take it that these are competent witnesses, by the time they took oath they knew what they were testifying on. The only assurance we can give we shall not thereof what they have presented before court [sic]. So our cross examination will be restricted to their averments but of course one question leads to another. We shall restrict ourselves to what is relevant to this case.

Justice Owiny Dollo:

No that is wrong. You will restrict yourself to what has been deponed to in the respective affidavit.

Mr. Mabirizi:

My lords my concern is there are concealments, he may have made an affidavit but concealed some pertinent facts. So when we are so restrictive on what they deponed you may find that we may be closing out concealments because most of them conceal what would be on the table."

In discussing this issue I will be guided by Sections 137 and 147 of the Evidence Act. Section 137 provides that, "the examination and cross-examination must relate to relevant facts, but the crossexamination need not be confined to the facts to which the witnesstestified on his or her examination-in-chief." (My emphasis)

It is therefore clear that the Court erred in its "ruling" that the petitioners "will restrict yourself to what has been deponed to in the respective affidavit."

But although the right to cross-examine a witness is part and parcel of a fair hearing, the right of a party to cross-examine a witness is not absolute. The exercise remains in control of the trial court. Section 147 of the Evidence Act provides that the court can exercise its discretion and decide whether or not to compel a witness to answer a question. In exercising this discretion, the court shall have regard to whether the questions asked convey an imputation of truth which would seriously affect the opinion of the court as to the credibility of the witness on the matter to which he or she testifies or whether the questions are improper such that the imputation which they convey relates to matters so remote in time that the truth or imputation would not affect the opinion of court.

I however note that the Court's restrictions were pronounced before any of the petitioners had posed any questions to any witness. So it cannot be said that the restrictions were in line with Section 147 of the Evidence Act. The Constitutional court therefore acted in error.

(ii) Denial of the right to a rejoinder

Rejoinder is the opportunity for the side that opened the case to offer limited response to evidence presented during the rebuttal by the opposing side.[1099]

The sequence of presentation of a Constitutional petition is governed by the Constitutional Court (Petitions and References) Rules. Rules 4-12 detail the order in which each party to the petition presents their arguments. This order can be summarized as follows:

First, the petitioner presents his or her case; the respondent then makes a reply. The petitioner then makes a rejoinder to the reply/submissions made by the respondent.

The 1st appellant alleges that the above sequence was not followed by the court which made him loose out on the opportunity to make a rejoinder.

The record indicates that after the Attorney General made his submissions in reply, Justice Owiny Dollo, DCJ stated as follows:

"Thank you. In view of what the AG has said as concluding remarks not submissions, would you like to say something? You will be giventhe opportunity to say by way of concluding remarks, apart from that do you have anything to say?

Mr. Ogalo: My Lords, we request your indulgence that you allow a rejoinder. My Lords, in the course of submissions by the learned Attorney General we are of the view in this side that in those arguments new matters were raised.

Justice Owiny Dollo: What is the new matter?"

The petitioners' counsel then went ahead to make rejoinders as follows:

Counsel Byamukama: "My lords I have just a short point on issues No.1 to 4 on the seven year term that they gave themselves and on that issue the learned AG at the end of all their arguments said that anyway they are entitled to make retrospective laws under Article and all I want to do in connection with that argument is provide to court an authority that might be useful on the issue of retrospective legislation. It is a House of Lords decision; Wilson & Others vs. Secretary of State for Trade. It was filed and the respondent was given a copy yesterday. My lords I am seeking validation of it.

[1099] https://definitions.uslegal.com/r/rejoinder, USLegal.com accessed on 4/1/2019 at 12:14p.m.

Justice Owiny Dollo replied: Okay"

Counsel Lukwago then stated: "My Lords, mine is just two matters. One arose out of the first as we were addressing the first set of issues, it was on the doctrine of basic structure. When the AG argued that it is an academic theory, it is not a legal doctrine and so on."

Mabirizi then stated as follows*:* "My lords I have a few, first of all I want this court to note that in the pleadings and submissions the respondent has not refuted the fact that there was colourable legislation."

Justice Owiny Dollo:

No, that is not new.

Mr. Mabirizi: My lords, I am moving to issue 6A and B and have one point to make. I am defining the word charge. The word charge is defined by Black's Law dictionary 8th edition at page 701 under definition 7 as the price, cost or expense.

Again on issue No.13 there was a submission that that issue is moot because the act has been already assented to. My lords, I rely on the authority of Ssemwogerere vs. AG a decison of Kanyeihamba, he said that an Act of Parliament which is challenged under Article 137 remains uncertain until the appropriate court has pronounced itself upon it. Therefore, at the time my lords of you considering this, the issue is not moot because this act is still uncertain and therefore my lords you can determine it."

I find that the Constitutional Court used a wrong phrase "concluding remarks" instead of "rejoinder". However, the gist of what was thereafter submitted by the petitioners in response to the submissions of the respondent constituted a rejoinder.

I therefore find that no miscarriage of justice occurred as a result of the court's error.

(iii) Meagre award of costs to the appellants

I will resolve this sub-issue under the heading of costs.

Having answered Issue 7 (a) and (b) in the negative, I find that this issue should fail.

I S S U E 8

Remedies

All the appellants prayed that the appeal be allowed in the terms and prayers specified in their Memoranda of Appeal.

In particular, the appellants prayed that Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 be annulled and that the respondent pays costs of this Appeal and in the Court below.

In the alternative but without prejudice to the foregoing, if court answers issue 7 in the affirmative, a retrial should be ordered.

Consideration by Court

I will start with the alternative prayer for a retrial which is hinged on the finding in issue 7 above. Since issue 7 has been answered in the negative, it follows that the prayer for a retrial should fail.

Costs

I will first address the issue raised by the appellants that the award of twenty million (Ushs.20, 000,000/=) given by the Constitutional Court as costs was little.

Section 27 of the Civil Procedure Act is to the effect that costs follow the event. The appellants' counsel partially succeeded in the Constitutional Court. It follows that they were entitled to an award in the form of costs. However, the amount awarded remains in the discretion of court. An appellate court can only interfere with the lower court's discretion in the award of costs if that discretion was exercised arbitrarily, based on wrong principles of law or if the award is so excessive or so low.[1100]

In this Court's recent decision of Muwanga Kivumbu vs. AG[50], it was held that, "where costs are awarded in Public interest litigation cases, the award should be nominal."(My emphasis)

Following from the above, I find no reason to vary the award given.

It was neither excessive nor so low.

Conclusion

1. For the reasons given above, I would allow the appeal.

2. Since this is a Public Interest Litigation matter, I would order that each party bears its own costs.

Dated at Kampala this …… day of ……..….. 2019.

……

PROF.LILLIAN TIBATEMWA-EKIRIKUBINZA JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT.

[1100] Kwizera vs. Attorney General Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal N0. 1 of 2008. [50] Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No.6 of 2011.

EXEGESIS OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO PROF. EKIRIKUBINZA LIILIAN TIBATEMWA JSC

BACKGROUND

In 2017, Hon. Raphael Magyezi, a Member of the 10th Parliament of the Republic of Uganda, brought a Private Member's Bill (Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017). On the 27th December, 2017, Parliament passed the Bill eliminating Presidential Age Limit and extending Parliamentary Term. The Ugandan Parliament passed an amendment to the Constitution which, among other measures, aims to eliminate the requirement that candidates vying for the presidency be under 75 years of age.

The court again by a 4-1 majority upheld the larger Bill applying severally the doctrine of severance to save the repeal of the age limit even though all the justices unanimously found unconstitutional means that were used to stifle the MPs' access to their constituents through the police.

Dissatisfied with part of the decision of the Constitutional Court, the appellants appealed to this Court. The Appellant in Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 2018 lodged a Memorandum of Appeal in the Supreme Court containing 84 grounds of appeal categorized under different parts. Issues for court's determination were framed out of the consolidated appeals.

JUSTICE PROF. LILLIAN TIBATEMWA

Central to her dissenting decision to dissent was on the procedures that were flouted in the due course of enacting the impugned Act. Justice Tibatemwa agreed with majority judges that Article 102(b) was not part of the basic structure doctrine and thus could be amended but faulted Parliament for failing to follow its own rules of procedure in passing the impugned age limit bill. Most important to her judgement, Justice Tibatemwa disagreed with the majority holding that the doctrine of severance cannot be applied to save a bill that ought not to have been assented to in the first place due to procedural impropriety.

FATAL IRREGULARITIES IN ENACTMENT OF THE LAW.

The Constitutional Court in Oloka–Onyango and 9 Others versus Attorney General[1101], discussed the question as to whether or not Parliament while passing legislation may ignore or waive legal requirements. It was held as follows: -

"Parliament as a law making body should set standards for compliance with the Constitutional

[1101]Constitutional Petition No. 8 of 2014(unreported)

Provisions and with its own Rules. The speaker ignored the law and proceeded with the passing of the Act. We agree with Counsel Opiyo, that the enactment of the law is a process, and if any of the stages therein is flawed, that vitiates the entire process and the law that is enacted as a result of it."

Failure to scrupulously comply with provisions of the Constitution or Rules of Procedure during the enactment of legislation is fatal.

Smuggling the bill into the order paper

It was the finding of Justice Tibatemwa that the Magyezi bill was smuggled into the order paper by the Speaker of Parliament. Justice Tibatemwa noted that the provisions are consistent in linking the powers of the Speaker to determining the order of business but not anywhere does the law link her powers to determining the content of the Order Paper. The provisions limit the Speaker's powers to determining the order of Business in Parliament, the powers do not extend to determining what is to be on the Order Paper. It must have been for this reason that on both the 19th and 20th September 2017, the Deputy Speaker of Parliament assured the House that there was not going to be any ambush of the Members of Parliament concerning the Bill introduced by Magyezi, since all business was to go through the Business Committee of the House for appropriate action and consideration.

The power to determine the items to be discussed is vested in the Business Committee in consultation with the Speaker. The Speaker is the chair of the said Committee. This means that the power in question is bestowed on a Committee which the Speaker is chair of. The power bestowed upon the Committee cannot be unilaterally exercised by the Speaker, consultation is expected.

The amendment of the order paper on the floor of Parliament was in contravention to the rules of procedure of Parliament. The treatment of this irregularity as a mere irregularity by the Constitutional Court and not being fatal sets a very bad precedent for the conduct of legislation procedure in Parliament. Parliamentary Procedure should not be treated lightly when considering bills that have such a big bearing on the politics and leadership of our country. The speaker of Parliament therefore acted ultra vires by smuggling in the Magyezi bill on the order paper.

Certificate of financial implications

Article 93 of the Constitution provides that:

"Parliament shall not, unless the Bill or the motion is introduced on behalf of the Government—

(a) proceed upon a Bill, including an amendment Bill, that makes provision for any of the following the imposition of a charge on the Consolidated Fund or other public fund of Uganda or the alteration of any such charge otherwise than by reduction;

(b) proceed upon a motion, including an amendment to a motion, the effect of which would be to make provision for any of the purposes specified in paragraph (a) of this Article." (My emphasis)

The provision bars Parliament from proceeding upon a private Member's Bill which imposes a charge by way of increment on the Consolidated Fund or Public Fund of Uganda. The Constitutional Court held that, the introduction of the Private Member's Bill that led to the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 was not inconsistent with Article 93 of the Constitution, except for the introduction of Sections 2,5,6,8 and 10 because they required a referendum which has a charge on the Consolidated Fund.

The amendments introduced by Hon. Tusiime to reinstate term limits among others had the effect of placing a charge on the Consolidated Fund contrary to Article 93. Once it is noted on the floor of the House that a Bill or an amendment to a Bill which is being introduced by a motion brought by a Private Member would have the effect of imposing a charge on the Consolidated Fund, the motion should for that reason fail. In the matter before Court therefore, Parliament should not have adopted the amendment to the Bill.

Signing of the committee report by non-members.

The report of the Parliamentary and Legal Affairs Committee was signed by non-members to the Committee. Rules 203 and 206 of the Parliamentary Rules of Procedure emphasize the prohibition that non-members of a designated Committee are not allowed to cast a vote or form part of the quorum. Therefore, a non-member's signature on the report is invalid and has no authority to form binding decisions by their 25 signatures. A properly constituted Committee Member is one who is entitled to not only participate in Committee proceedings but also cast a vote.

Justice Tibatemwa held that the signing of the Committee report by non-30 members was a material irregularity which rendered the report suspect. The Constitutional Court erred in holding that although the signing of the report by non-members was fatal, it did not invalidate it.

Tabling of documents.

The Parliamentary Rules were amended in October 2017 but the definition of tabling was left intact and could not be said to include electronic tabling. For instance, Rule 29 (1) was amended by integration of electronic interaction as a mode of communication to Members of Parliament. This was evidence that where Parliament intended to integrate electronic modes of communication into its rules and practice, the changes were specifically dealt with.

Justice Tibatemwa was in agreement with Justice Kakuru (dissenting in the Constitutional Court) that since at the time of debating the impugned Act, Parliament had adopted the 2017 Rules, but did not change the Rules to take into account "electronic laying on the table", Rule 201(2) remains in force. The tabling and laying an official document before Parliament must be physically done and the document must be placed on the Clerk's table.

S E V E R A N C E

The doctrine of Severance refers to the ability of courts to strike out a portion of 10a statute if that portion is held to be unconstitutional. A reading of Salvatori Abuki v Attorney General[1102] case states that if any provision of a statute is found by the Court to be unconstitutional, the remaining provisions of the statute are valid unless the court finds that the valid provisions of the statute are so essentially and inseparably connected with the void provision that none can be implemented without the other.

The test used to effect severance is whether 'the good is not dependent on the bad' and whether the inconsistency can be separated from the rest of the statute. The manner in which the court would apply severance, therefore, is to determine whether, after the parts have been cut-off due to invalidity, the part remaining will still be able to give effect to the object of the statute. The test therefore has two parts – to determine:

1. first, whether it is possible to sever or cut-off the invalid provisions, and
2. second, if so, does what remains give effect to the purpose of the legislation?

What has been observed, however, is that it may not always be possible to separate the good from the bad and still give effect to the purpose of the impugned provision. Where this occurs, the court has no option but to declare the provision as a whole invalid. Severance, however, must be distinguished from notional severance. While similar to severance, it allows for the unconstitutional parts to be removed, leaving certain parts unaffected. The difference, however, is that the section is given a particular meaning, which would only apply to certain cases or in certain circumstances.

Whereas statutory severance is codified (similar to the presence of Article 2 and 274 of Uganda's Constitution), courts have created a separate doctrine of severability. This doctrine applies to procedurally unconstitutional laws and supplements the statutory delegation of authority. The doctrine was made necessary because the ability to sever portions of laws based on the substance of its provisions does "not adequately address the problems inherent in procedurally unconstitutional statutes.

Justice Tibatemwa held that the critical principle of Prof. Oloka Onyango and 9 others v Attorney General[1103] is therefore that an Act of Parliament passed without strict compliance with Parliamentary Rules of Procedure is a nullity. She also cited the pronouncements in Ssempebwa vs AG[1104]. The National Resistance Council purported to pass an Act of parliament but did not strictly comply with the 1967 Constitution. It was held that since the Constitution sets out not only who exercises legislative power but also how such powers are to be exercised valid legislation can only be made in accordance with the established legislative framework.

[1102](Constitutional Appeal-1998/1)
[1103]Constitutional Petition No. 8 of 2014(unreported)
[1104]Constitutional Case No. 1 of 198

Justice Tibatemwa denied the application for severance to the Certificate of Compliance which was presented to the President by the Speaker. Having found that the President assented to a Bill which was a nullity, she held that a court cannot sever a document which has no legal standing.

Justice Tibatemwa's refusal to apply the doctrine of severance was very legally informed. The various legislative procedures that were flouted by the Parliament rendered the bill a nullity ab initio.

VIOLENCE AND ITS EFFECT ON PUBLIC PARTICIPATION

Justice Tibatemwa noted that enactment of an Act of Parliament is not an event. It is a process. In the matter before this Court, the conduct complained of violated the rights of individuals who were engaged in activities directly connected to and/or necessary for the enactment of the impugned Act of Parliament. It was the Speaker who specifically sent out legislators to their constituents for the specific purpose of collecting the views of citizens on proposals which were before parliament. Members of Parliament accessed Public Funds for the purpose. The consultations were no doubt directly linked to the enactment process. The Mugenyi Directive specifically gave orders aimed at interfering with this very process. Justice Tibatemwa found it inconceivable that the court could de-delink the proven violations from the legislative process which resulted into the impugned Act. Justice Tibatemwa was of the view that a court which found that the sovereignty of the people and the supremacy of the Constitution had been violated in that process, would go on to say that "nevertheless" such violations did not vitiate the enactment 5process.

Regarding the Mugenyi Directive it was the unanimous finding of the Constitutional Court that it resulted into disruption of consultations of some Members of Parliament. That the work of some MPS was interfered with thus preventing them from seeking the participation of Ugandans whom they represent in Parliament, on the proposed Bill. It is clear that the Constitutional Court concentrated on the rights of the members of Parliament and said little about the fact that scores of citizens were denied the right to actively participate in issues of governance since they were denied the opportunity to express their views on the proposed amendments. The court emphasized that it had not been proved that that the disruption of meetings was widespread throughout the country. It was for this reason that court declined to make a finding that the unlawful directive rendered the public participation in the Bill nugatory and the entire Bill a nullity. Justice Tibatemwa differed from the reasoning of the Constitutional court.

The rationale was that the right of an individual cannot be rendered inconsequential just because other citizens were enabled to enjoy their rights. What occurred is contrary to Objective II (i)of the National Objective and Directive Principles of State Policy which states as follows: The State shall be based on democratic principles which empower and encourage the active participation of all citizens at all levels in their own governance. The right to participate in the affairs of government no doubt accrues to each and every citizen and its violation cannot on the basis of numbers, be deemed "inconsequential".

APPLICABILITY OF SUBSTANTIALITY TEST IN CONSTITUTIONAL CASES

The substantiality test has been deployed by the Supreme Court in declining to annul election petitions. However, this has been in instances of violating the Presidential Elections Act and not the Constitution. Justice Tibatemwa emphasized a differentiation between contravening the Constitution on the one hand and violating provisions of an Act of Parliament on the other hand. The wording of Section 59 (6) (a) is silent in regard to non-compliance with provisions of the Constitution and only refers to non-compliance with the provisions of the Presidential Elections Act.

The AG did not adduce any evidence to prove that the curtailment of rights in question was justified so as to protect the rights and freedoms of others and/or for purposes of preserving public interest. The AG did not prove that the nature of curtailment of the rights involved was such as is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society AS REQUIRED UNDER Article 43 of the Constitution, or what is provided in this Constitution.

It is very clear that even in presidential elections where the substantial effect test is applicable, the test is not extended to violations of Constitutional imperatives. It is limited to violations of an Act of Parliament. The substantial effect test cannot be applied to a violation of a Constitutional right the right of an individual or even of a community.

CONCLUSION

The majority seemed to give leeway for the procedural impropriety that was carried on by Parliament. Secondly, whereas they strongly condemned the violence that was visited on legislators and the citizens of Uganda, they failed to appreciate the qualitative impact that had in vitiating the outcome of the voting on the bill. These were concepts that were well captured by Justice Tibatemwa in her well-reasoned judgement.

Most importantly, Justice Tibatemwa discussed the doctrine of severance in its entirety, differentiating its origins, importance, applicability and non-applicability.

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MWANGUSYA JSC, VERBATIM

These three appeals were filed separately in this Court. During prehearing, they were consolidated with the consent of the parties since they arose from the same Judgment of the Constitutional Court in consolidated Constitutional Petitions Nos. 49 of 2017; 03 of 2018; 05 of 2018; 10 of 2018 & 13 of 2018.

In the above Constitutional Petitions, the appellants had challenged the constitutionality of the provisions of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, No. 1 of 2018 (hereinafter referred to as the impugned Act) and the process of its enactment into law. The appellants argued that because the process of enacting the impugned Act and the provisions therein were unconstitutional, the impugned Act should be nullified.

The Constitutional Court found that some of the provisions of the impugned Act were indeed unconstitutional, as I shall highlight later, and accordingly struck them out. The Constitutional Court however found that some of the provisions of the impugned Act were constitutional. Applying the principle of severance, the Constitutional Court retained those provisions it found constitutional and on that basis declined to grant the main relief sought by the appellants which was to nullify the whole impugned Act. The Constitutional Court also found although that there were some procedural irregularities in the course of passing the impugned Act, the irregularities were not substantive enough to nullify the entire Act.

Before considering the submissions and merits of this appeal, it is necessary to provide a brief background to this appeal. The appellants lodged various petitions in the Constitutional Court challenging the constitutionality of the impugned Act. The major contention of each appellant in their respective Petition was that the impugned Act was unconstitutional both in regard to the process of enacting it and to the provisions themselves.

The Attorney General duly filed responses to the Petitions. His response was to the effect that the impugned Act was enacted by Parliament in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution that provide for its amendment and the provisions of the impugned Act were constitutional.

The parties agreed upon fourteen issues for determination by the Constitutional Court. These where:

Whether Sections 2 and 8 of the Act extending or enlarging of the term or life of Parliament from five to seven years is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, 61(2)(3), 77(3)(4), 79(1), 96, 105(1), 260(1), 233(b) and 289 of the Constitution.

And if so, whether applying the said Act retroactively is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, 5 77(3)(4), 79(1), 96 and 233(2)(b) of the Constitution.

Whether Sections 6 and 10 of the Act extending the current life of local government councils from five to seven years is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 1,2, 8A, 176(3), 181(4) and 259(2) (a) of the Constitution.

4. If so, whether applying it retroactively is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 1,2, 8A, 176(3), 181(4) and 259(2)(a) of the Constitution.

Whether the alleged violence/scuffle inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Act was inconsistent and in contravention of Articles 1,2,3 (2) and 8A of the Constitution.

Whether the entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enacting the Act was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of the Articles of the Constitution as hereunder:

Whether the introduction of the private member's Bill that led 20 to the Act was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Article 93 of the Constitution.

Whether the passing of Sections 2,5,6,8 and 10 of the Act was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Article 93 of the Constitution.

(c) Whether the actions of Uganda Peoples Defence Forces and Uganda Police in entering Parliament, allegedly assaulting Members of Parliament in the Parliamentary Chambers, arresting and allegedly detaining the said members, is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 24, 97, 30 208(2) and 211(3) of the Constitution.

Whether the consultations carried out were marred with restrictions and violence which was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 29(1)(a)(d)(e) and 29(2)(a) of the Constitution.

Whether the alleged failure to consult on Sections 2,5,6,8 and 10 is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 1 and 8A of the Constitution.

Whether the alleged failure to conduct a referendum before 5 assenting to the Bill containing Section 2,5,6,8 and 10 of the Act was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1,91(1), 259(2), 260 and 263(2) (b) of the Constitution.

Whether the Act was against the spirit and structure of the 1995 Constitution.

7. Whether the alleged failure by Parliament to observe its own Rules of Procedure during the enactment of the Act was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 28, 42, 44, 90(2), 90(3)(c) and 94(1) of the Constitution; and in particular:

i) Whether the actions of parliamentary staff preventing some members of the public from accessing the parliamentary chambers during the presentation of the Constitutional amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017 was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of the provisions of Articles 1, 8A, 79, 208(2), 20 209, 211(3), and 212 of the Constitution.

Whether the act of tabling Constitutional Bill No. 2 of 2017, in the absence of the Leader of Opposition, Chief Whip, and other opposition members of Parliament was in contravention of and/ or inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A, 69(1), 69(2)(b), 71, 25 74, 75, 79, 82A, and 108A of the Constitution.

Whether the alleged actions of the Speaker of Parliament in permitting the ruling party members of Parliament to sit on the opposition side of Parliament was inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A, 69(1), 69(2)(b), 71, 74, 75, 79, 82A, 83(1)(g), 30 83(3) and 108A of the Constitution.

Whether the alleged act of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee of Parliament in allowing some committee members who had become Members of the Committee after the public hearings on Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017 had been held and completed, to sign the Report of the said Committee, was in contravention of Articles 44(c), 90(1) and 90(2) of the Constitution.

v) Whether the alleged act of the Speaker of Parliament in allowing the Chairperson of the Legal Affairs Committee on 18th December, 2017 to submit to Parliament the said

Committee's Report in the absence of the Leader of Opposition, Opposition Chief whip, and other Opposition Members of Parliament, was in contravention of and inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A, 69(1), 69(2)(b), 71, 74, 75, 79, 82A and 108A of the Constitution.

vi) Whether the actions of the Speaker in suspending the 6 (six) members of Parliament was in contravention of Articles 28, 42, 44, 79, 91, 94 and 259 of the Constitution.

vii) Whether the action of Parliament in:

(a) Waiving the requirement of a minimum of three sittings before the tabling of the report which was also not seconded;

Of closing the debate on the Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017 before every willing Member of Parliament had been afforded an opportunity to debate the said Bill;

Failing to close all the doors leading to the Parliamentary Chamber where Members of Parliament carried on the debate of the Bill, are in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, 44(c), 79, 94 and 263 of the Constitution.

8. Whether the passage of the Bill into an Act without Parliament first having observed 14 days of Parliament sitting between the 2nd and 3rd reading was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 262 and 263(1) of the Constitution.

Whether the Presidential assent to the Bill allegedly in absence of a certificate of compliance from the Speaker and a certificate of the Electoral Commission that the amendment was approved at a referendum, was inconsistent with and in contravention of Article 263(2)(a) and (b) of the Constitution.

Whether Section 5 of the Act, which re-introduces term limits and entrenches them as being subject to a referendum is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Article 260(2)(a) of 35 the Constitution.

Whether Section 9 of the Act, which seeks to harmonise the seven year term of Parliament with the presidential term is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 105(1) and 260(2) of the Constitution.

12. Whether Sections 3 and 7 of the Act, lifting the age limit are inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 21(3) and 21(5) of the Constitution.

Whether the continuance in office of the President of Uganda by one who was elected in 2016 and who attained the age of 75 years is inconsistent with or in contravention of Articles 83(1)(b) and 102(c) of the Constitution.

What remedies are available to the parties?

On 26th July 2018, the Constitutional Court partially allowed the consolidated Petitions and declared as follows:

1. By unanimous decision, that sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018, which provide for the extensions of the tenure of Parliament and Local Government Councils by two years, and for the reinstatement of the Presidential term–limits unconstitutional for contravening provisions of the Constitution.

2. That accordingly, sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018, be struck out of the Act.

3. By majority decision that sections 1, 3, 4, and 7, of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018, which remove age limits for the President, and Chairperson Local Council V, to contest for election to the respective offices, and for the implementation of the recommendations of the Supreme Court in 30 Presidential Election Petition No. 1; Amama Mbabazi vs Yoweri Museveni, have, each, been passed in full compliance with the Constitution; and therefore remain the lawful and valid provisions of Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018.

The Constitutional Court awarded professional fees of Ug. Shs. 20,000,000/= (Twenty million only) for each Petition (and not Petitioner).

5 The Court however noted that this award did not apply to Petition No. 3 of 2018 since the Petitioner prayed for disbursements only, and Petition No. 49 of 2017 where the Petitioner appeared in person.

The Court further awarded two–thirds disbursements to all the Petitioners; to be taxed by the Taxing Master.

10 Dissatisfied with part of the decision of the Constitutional Court, the appellants appealed to this Court. The appellant in Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 2018 lodged a Memorandum of Appeal in this Court containing 84 grounds of appeal categorized under different parts. These grounds were:

PART A: GROUNDS RELATING TO DEROGATION OF THE RIGHT TO FAIR AND SPEEDY HEARING BEFORE AN IMPARTIAL COURT

1. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they failed to hear and determine the Constitutional petition expeditiously.

2. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they evicted the petitioner from court seats occupied by representatives of other petitioners, putting him in the dock throughout the hearing and decision of the petition.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they caused a miscarriage of justice by not giving the petitioner ample time to present his case and extremely and unnecessarily interfered with his submissions.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they derogated the petitioner's right to fair hearing by preventing the petitioner from substantially responding to the respondent's submissions by way of rejoinder.

PART B: GROUNDS RELATING TO OMISSIONS AND FAILING IN THE COURT'S DUTY IN DETERMINATION OF THE DISPUTE.

5. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not give reasons for their decision not to summon the speaker of Parliament.

6. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not at any one point mention the existence of or even rely on the petitioner's two supplementary affidavits in support of the petition, rejoinder to the answer to the petition and the supporting affidavit thereto as well as affidavits in rejoinder to affidavits of Jane Kibirige, Keith Muhakanizi and Gen. David Muhoozi, which were on court record.

7. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not determine the legality of the substantial contents in the affidavit of Gen. David Muhoozi, the chief of Defence forces, which were put in issue as hearsay.

8. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not determine the legality of the substantial contents in the affidavit of Keith Muhakanizi, the Secretary to the Treasury, which were put in issue as hearsay.

9. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not make a clear and specific determination of Issue 6(a) and all submissions made in that regard relating to restrictions on private members' bills imposed by Article 93 of the Constitution.

10. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not make a finding on the principle of Constitutional Replacement as ably submitted before them by the Petitioner.

11. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not determine the point that the Speaker was stopped from presiding over actions and presenting them as lawful which she had earlier found and ruled to be unlawful.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not declare unconstitutional Section 1(b) of the impugned Act allowing the Electoral Commission to hold a presidential election on a day different from that of a parliamentary election.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not make a finding on the constitutionality of the presence of armed forces outside parliament and in the entire country.

14. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not make a finding on constitutionality of detaining and arresting of Members of parliament from parliamentary chambers.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not make a finding on constitutionality and legality of the action of ejection/eviction of Members of parliament purportedly on orders of the Speaker when the Speaker was out of her chair.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not make a finding on the validity of the Certificate of compliance by the Speaker of parliament which was in issue.

17. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they resolved most of the issues without referring to the evidence and submissions of the petitioner.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not consider the variety of authorities from within and outside the jurisdiction which were referred to them, supplied and summarized to them by the petitioner.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they failed to properly evaluate the pleadings, evidence and submissions hence reaching wrong conclusions.

PART C: GROUNDS RELATING TO CONTRADICTIONS AND MISAPPLICATION OF LEGAL PRINCIPLES AND FACTS.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they highly contradicted themselves on legal principles and facts of the case and hence reached wrong conclusions not connected to the stated principles and facts on record.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they applied statutory substantial effect/quantitative principles applicable to election petitions which do not apply to principles of determination of validity of a Constitution Amendment Act of parliament.

22. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the location of an entrenchment provision in the constitution does not matter.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they upheld part of the Act in total defiance of the binding Supreme Court decision(s) that a law is null and void upon a finding that the procedure of enacting and assenting to it was incurably defective and flouted.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they upheld part of the Act in total departure from Constitutional Court decision(s) to the effect that the enactment of the law is a process, and if any of the stages therein is flawed, that vitiates the entire process and the law that is enacted as a result of it.

PART D: GROUNDS RELATING TO VIOLATION AND MISAPPLICATION OF EVIDENCE AND ITS PRINCIPLES.

25. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they suggested answers to Gen. David Muhoozi, The Chief of Defence Forces, a witness who was under cross-examination on oath, prevented him from answering questions and with threats, ordered the petitioner not to ask any further questions.

26. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they over-protected Mr. Keith Muhakanizi, The Secretary to The Treasury, a witness under cross-examination and prevented him from answering questions put to him as wells as preventing the petitioner from asking pertinent questions.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in fact when they held there was no other evidence to prove that the petitioner was denied access to parliament's gallery.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they held that there was need for corroboration of the petitioner's evidence of being denied access to the gallery of parliament.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in fact in holding that there was no evidence that the speaker allowed members to cross from one side of the floor to another, in absence of a video.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in fact in holding that the motion by Hon. Mwesigwa Rukutana, to suspend the rules of Procedure requiring skipping of at least 3 sitting days after tabling of the Committee Report was at Parliament committee stage and not in a normal plenary sitting.

31. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in fact in holding that members of parliament obtained a report of the Committee three days prior to 18th December 2017.

32. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in fact in holding that enough members and all those who wanted to debate had debated the Bill before voting on the second reading.

PART E: GROUNDS RELATING TO THE CONCEPTUALIZATION AND PROCESSING OF THE ACT BY WAY OF A PRIVATE MEMBER'S BILL.

33. Without prejudice to the above, all the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the Motion to introduce the private members Bill, the bill itself and the entire process did not contravene Article 93 of The Constitution.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the initial motion and Bill by Hon. Rapheal Magyezi did not make provision for and/or had effect of a charge on the consolidated fund.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that there was a requirement for a Certificate of Financial implications instead of government presenting the impugned Bill itself.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law in relying on the provisions of Section 76 of The Public Finance Management Act, 2015, to deviate from the clear provisions of Article 93 of the Constitution.

10 PART F: GROUNDS RELATING TO FAILURE OF PUBLIC

PARTICIPATION IN PROCESSING OF THE ACT.

37. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in upholding prevention of the petitioner from attending parliamentary gallery during the proceedings to amend the Constitution.

38. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that preventing members of parliament from debating on the Bill was not fatal in the constitutional amendment process.

39. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in making a finding that in absence of regulations for public participation, parliament was not bound to carry out public participation and/or that what it did was sufficient.

40. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they, after finding that the constitution prohibits governing people against their will, did not nullify the entire Act to which people were not consulted and which was processed in a tense, chaotic and military manner.

PART G: GROUNDS RELATING TO PARTICIPATION OF ARMED FORCES, VIOLENCE AND RESTRICTIONS ON FUNDAMENTAL HUMAN RIGHTS IN PROCESSING THE ACT.

41. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they condoned violation of non derogable rights against torture, inhuman and degrading treatment and validated the resultant outcome which was tainted.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that since the members of parliament called violence for themselves, the torture, inhuman degrading treatment against them cannot be held to be unconstitutional and that the resultant Act cannot be invalidated on ground of violence.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in failing to invalidate the entire impugned Act on the basis of its being processed amidst violence inside and outside of parliament.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in refusing to invalidate the entire law on the basis of a police circular addressed to and complied with by Uganda Police Force commanders in Uganda.

45. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they failed to declare the entire impugned Act unconstitutional after making a finding that the restrictions on fundamental rights during the process were not demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society.

46. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they failed to nullify the entire Act after making a finding that the presence of Uganda Peoples Defence Forces in parliament was not called for.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in failing to nullify the entire Act after making a finding that the police circular which curtailed public participation was unconstitutional.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the police circular, which was enforced countrywide, had no effect on the amendment of the Constitution.

49. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the actions of the Uganda Peoples Defence Forces were demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the violence in parliament, which they found to be uncalled for and unconstitutional, did not vitiate the entire law.

PART H: GROUNDS RELATING TO NON-COMPLIANCE WITH THE RULES OF PROCEDURE OF PARLIAMENT AND/OR ALIGNING THEM WITH CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the Speaker has sweeping powers to prevent the petitioner from accessing parliament without a resolution of parliament or any rules gazetted for that purpose.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the Speaker, solely, has powers to determine the business of parliament and order paper.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they justified and upheld suspension and eviction of members of parliament on the same day of reading out their names.

54. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that non-secondment of the motion to suspend the Rules of Parliament requiring separation of at least three sittings after presentation of the Committee Report was not fatal to the Constitutional Amendment process.

55. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the Speaker was justified in entertaining Hon. Raphael Magyezi's motion to present a private members' Bill earlier than the earlier motion of Hon. Nsamba for a resolution for establishment of a constitutional review commission.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they upheld the committee report which was signed by members of parliament who did not participate in the hearing of the public and other committee processes.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law in justifying and upholding the Speaker's refusal to close the doors of parliament chambers during the roll call voting on the 2nd and 3rd reading of the Bill.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they held that the Speaker of parliament has unfettered powers in parliament.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in upholding the suspension of rules of parliament during the constitutional amendment process.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they failed to apply estoppels against the Speaker in respect of an un-seconded motion and crossing and sitting of members of parliament to the opposite side.

PART I: GROUNDS RELATING TO MULTI-PARTY DEMOCRACY.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that in a multi-party dispensation, absence of opposition members of parliament does not render parliament not fully constituted.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they validated the Speaker's arbitrary decision to allow ruling party members of parliament to cross and sit on the opposition side.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they, after finding that under normal circumstances, opposition members of parliament had to be in attendance, went ahead to validate part of the Constitutional Amendment Act.

PART J: GROUNDS RELATING TO REMOVAL OF AGE LIMIT QUALIFICATIONS FOR PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they did not find that amendment of Article 102(b) of the Constitution amounted to colourable legislation/amendment of Articles 1, 2 and 3(2) of the Constitution in a manner prohibited by the Constitution.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in not finding that amendment of qualifications and disqualifications of a president under our 1995 constitution amounted to a constitutional replacement which parliament had no power to do.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that qualifications and disqualifications of a president under our 1995 constitution is not one of the core structures embedded in the Constitution.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in upholding lifting of the age limit on ground that even members of parliament have no age limit.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they failed to make a finding that the justifications for the removal of age-limits were flimsy, selfish, irrational and not demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society and not allowed by the constitution rendering the amendment null and void.

PART K: GROUNDS RELATING TO GENERAL MISAPPLICATION OF

PRINCIPLES OF CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION

69. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in not invalidating the Act after making a finding that the process was marred with tension and chaos.

70. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law in holding that members of parliaments' right to represent the people is not absolute.

71. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they applied the substantial/quantitative effect test in determining the validity of the Constitutional Amendment Act.

PART L: GROUNDS RELATING TO SEPARATION OF 14 SITTING DAYS

BETWEEN THE 2ND AND 3RD READING AND PRESIDENTIAL ASSENT 30 TO THE IMPUGNED BILL.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that separation of 14 sitting days of parliament was not mandatory for the entire Bill to pass.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the Certificate of electoral commission that a referendum was held in respect of the entire Bill was not required in respect of the entire Bill.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in failing to declare the false and legally insufficient Certificate of compliance invalid.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in failing to declare the entire Act invalid after making a finding that the pre-conditions of a presidential assent were not followed.

PART M: GROUNDS RELATING TO CONTINUANCE IN OFFICE OF A PRESIDENT ELECTED IN 2016 ON ATTAINING 75YEARS.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they held that a president elected in 2016 is not liable to vacate office on attaining the age of 75years.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the qualifications of a president should not be maintained through his/her stay in office.

PART N: GROUNDS RELATING TO PRAYERS & PLEADINGS.

78. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the petitioner did not contest particular provisions relating to age-limit, extension of time for Supreme Court to determine a presidential election petition.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they proposed and granted a remedy of severance which was not pleaded by the respondent both in his answer to the petition and all affidavits in support thereto.

PART O: GROUNDS RELATING TO REMEDIES.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law in 30 applying the principle of severance of some sections in a single Act in a situation where the constitutional amendment procedure was fatally unconstitutional and defective.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they denied the petitioner general damages on ground that he did not prove them.

PART P: GROUNDS RELATING TO UN-JUDICIOUS EXERCISE OF DISCRETION.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they unjudiciously exercised their discretion in contravention of basic legal principles by not summoning the speaker of parliament for questioning on her role in the process leading to the impugned Act.

All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they in exercise of their discretion unjudiciously without any sound reason held that the petitioner is not entitled to professional indemnification.

84. All the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they unjudiciously, without any reasoning held that each petition should receive professional fees of

Ugx. 20,000,000(Uganda Shillings Twenty Million only.)

On these grounds, the appellant prayed for orders that:

The Appeal be allowed.

All the proceedings of the Constitutional court be declared were null and void for derogating the right to fair hearing.

c. The Constitutional Petition be remitted back to the Constitutional Court for expeditious hearing, in compliance with fair hearing principles, before a different panel.

The appellant be granted general damages for inconveniences.

The costs of this appeal and in the court below be paid by the respondent to the appellant.

An interest of 25% per annum be paid by the respondent on the above damages and costs.

In the alternative but without prejudice to the above reliefs sought, the appellant prayed for orders that: a. The Private Members Bill, Constitution (Amendment) Bill No. 2 of 2017 was barred by Article 93 of the Constitution.

Failure to comply with mandatory constitutional provisions and the Rules of Parliament, the violence, failure of public participation among other lapses rendered the entire process leading to enactment and assent to the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018, null and void and of no effect.

The appellant be granted general damages for inconveniences.

The costs of this appeal and in the court below be paid by the respondent to the appellant.

e. An interest of 25% per annum be paid by the respondent on the above damages and costs.

The appellants in Constitutional Appeal No. 03 of 2018 on the other hand lodged a Memorandum of Appeal containing 24 grounds of appeal. These grounds were framed as follows:

1. The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that sections 1, 3, 4 and 7of the constitutional (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 which remove age limits for the President and Chairperson Local Council V to contest for election to the respective offices were passed in full compliance with the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.

2. The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that sections 1, 3, 4 and 7of the constitutional (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 which remove age limits for the President and Chairperson Local Council V to contest for election to the respective offices did not abrogate, emasculate or destroy the basic structure of the 1995 Constitution of Uganda.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves on the construction and application of the basic structure doctrine thereby coming to a wrong decision.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in failing to pronounce themselves on the implied amendment of Article 21 of the Constitution by the impugned

Act.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the validity of the entire impugned Act was not fatally affected by the discrepancies and variances between the Speaker's Certificate of compliance and the Bill at the time of Presidential assent to the Bill.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the President of Uganda validly and lawfully assented to the Constitutional (Amendment) Act, 2018 in the circumstances.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the deployment and/or intervention of Uganda Police and UPDF in the chambers and within the precincts of the parliament by causing eviction of some members of Parliament was justified to enable Parliament to proceed with its Constitutional mandate.

8. The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the violence that ensued following the invasion of Parliament by Police and members of the UPDF and other security agencies did not vitiate the process leading to the enactment of the Constitutional (Amendment) Act.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the impugned Bill and the process leading to the enactment of the Constitutional (Amendment) Act did not contravene the provisions of Article 93 of the Constitution.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the Ug. Shs. 29,000,000/= (Twenty Million Shillings) doled out to each Honourable Member of Parliament created no additional charge on the consolidated fund.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that there was no evidence to demonstrate that the unconstitutional Directive issued by the Assistant Inspector General of Police, a one Asuman Mugenyi to District Police Commanders on 16th October 2017, curtailing public participation was never implemented and that it had adversely affected the entire consultative process and the passing of the impugned Act.

12. The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the public consultation by Honourable Members of Parliament took place fairly well and that the instances of interruption of public consultation and participation of the people in the enactment process of the impugned Act by Police throughout the country did not render the entire Act a nullity.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in finding that the Speaker of Parliament did not violate the rules of Procedure.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the Speaker did not breach the Rules of procedure allowing Hon. Raphael Magyezi's motion for leave to introduce a private Member's Bill onto the Order Paper of 26th September 2017.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law by applying the substantiality test in evaluating and assessing the extent upon which the Speaker and Parliament failed to comply with and/or violated the rules of procedure of parliament.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the extent upon which the Speaker and Parliament failed to comply with and/or violated the rules of procedure of parliament did not adversely affect the whole process of enacting the impugned Act as to render it null and void in toto.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the Speaker validly and lawfully exercised her discretion by suspending Members of Parliament from participating in the proceedings in the House.

The learned Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves in ordering counsel for both parties to proceed with submissions before cross examination of their respective witnesses.

The learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law in denying the Petitioners a right to rejoin after closure of the Respondent's case.

20. The learned Justices of the Constitutional Court in their conduct throughout the proceedings in the consolidated Petitions and all applications arising therefrom acted with material procedural irregularities.

21. The learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law in failing to exercise their discretion to call for the evidence of the Speaker of Parliament, Deputy Speaker, Minister of Justice and Constitutional Affairs, the Chairperson and the Vice Chairperson of the Committee of Legal and Parliamentary Affairs and Hon. Raphael Magyezi.

22. The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves in law and fact by failing to take into consideration the Respondent's failure to adduce evidence of the Speaker of Parliament, Deputy Speaker, Minister of Justice and Constitutional Affairs, Minister of Finance, Attorney General, the Chairperson and Vice Chairperson of the Committee of Legal and Parliamentary Affairs and Hon. Raphael Magyezi.

23. The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law by failing to pronounce themselves on a number of the Appellants' prayers and misapplying the doctrine of severance in determining the validity of the Constitutional (amendment) Act, No. 1 of 2018.

24. The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in awarding UGX. 20,000,000/= (Twenty Million Shillings) as professional fees for each petition including Constitutional Petition No. 05 of 2018 and two-thirds of the taxed disbursements to all the Petitioners.

On these grounds, the appellant asked for the following orders:

1. That this appeal be allowed.

2.That the majority judgment and orders entered for the Respondent against the Appellants by the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court in the Constitutional Court of Uganda at Mbale be set aside and be substituted with the following:

I. That the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 be annulled.

II. In the alternative, but without prejudice to paragraph (I), the following sections of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 hereunder listed be annulled;

a) That section 3 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 in as far as it purports to lift the minimum and maximum age qualification of a person seeking to be elected as

President of Uganda.

b) That section 7 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 in as far as it purports to lift the minimum and maximum age qualification of a person seeking to be elected as District Chairperson.

That the invasion and/or heavy deployment at the Parliament by the combined armed forces of the Uganda People's Defence Forces and the Uganda Police and other militia in using violence, arresting, beating up, torturing and subjecting the Appellants and other Members of Parliament to inhuman and degrading treatment on the day the impugned Bill was tabled before the parliament amounted to amending the Constitution using violent and unlawful means, undermined Parliamentary independence and democracy and as such was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 20, 24, 29, 79, 208(2), 209, 211(3) and 259 of the Constitution.

That the arbitrary actions of the armed forces of the Uganda People's Forces, Uganda Police Force and other militia in frustrating, restraining, preventing and stopping some members of Parliament from attending and/or participating in the debate and/or proceedings of the House on the Constitutional (Amendment) Bill was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, 20, 24, 28(1), 79, 208(2), 211(3) and 259 of the Constitution of Uganda.

V. That the actions of the armed forces of the Uganda People's Defence Forces, Uganda Police and other militia to invade the Parliament while in plenary thereby inflicting violence, beating, torturing several Members of Parliament at the time when the motion seeking leave of Parliament to introduce the Private Members' Bill, Constitution (Amendment) Bill No. 2 of 2017 was being tabled was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 20, 24, 29, 79, 208(2), 209, 211(3), and 259 of the Constitution. The actions of the armed forces of the Uganda Police force in beating, torturing, arresting, and subjecting several Members of Parliament while in their various constituencies to consult the people on the Constitution (Amendment) Bill, 2017 was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 20, 24, 29, 79, 208(2), 209, 211(3), 259 and 260 of the Constitution. That the arbitrary decision of the Inspector General of the Uganda Police Force of restricting several Members of Parliament to their respective constituencies in their bid to consult their electorates on the constitution (Amendment) Bill No. 2 of 2017 was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 20, 24, 29, 79, 208(2), 209, 211(3) and 259 of the Constitution.

That the process leading to the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 was against the spirit and structure of the 1995 Constitution enshrined in the preamble of the Constitution, the National Objectives and Directive Principles of state policy and other constitutional provisions and as a result was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 2, 3, 8A, 79, 91 and 259 of the Constitution of Uganda.

That the actions of Parliament to prevent members of the public, with proper identification documents to access the Parliament's gallery during the seeking of leave and presentation of the Constitutional (Amendment) Bill No. 2 of 2017 was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, and 79 of the Constitution of Uganda.

X. That the procedure and manner of passing the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 was flawed with illegality, procedural impropriety and the same was a violation of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament and therefore inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 79, 91, 94, and 259 of the Constitution of Uganda.

XI. That the actions of the Speaker in entertaining and presiding over the debate on the impugned Bill when the matter on the same was before Court was a violation of Rule 72 of the Rule of Procedure of Parliament of Uganda therefore inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 79, 91, 94 and 259 of the Constitution of Uganda.

XII. That the arbitrary actions of the Speaker of Parliament to suspend the 1st, 2nd,3rd,4th and 5th Appellants who were in attendance in the Parliamentary Proceedings on the 18th day of 25 December, 2017, a sitting of Parliament where the two reports on the Constitution (Amendment) (No. 2) Bill, 2017 were to be debated was a violation of Rules 87 and 88 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament of Uganda therefore in contravention of Articles 28, 42, 44, 79, 91, 94 and 259 of the Constitution of Uganda.

That the actions of the Speaker of Parliament to close the debate on the Constitution (Amendment) Bill No. 2 of 2017 before each and every Member of Parliament could debate and present the views of their constituents concerning the Constitutional (Amendment) Bill was a violation of Rule 133(3)

(a) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament therefore in contravention of Articles 79, 91, 94 and 259 of the Constitution of Uganda.

That the actions of Parliament in waiving Rule 201(2) requiring a minimum of three sittings from the tabling of the Committee Report on the Constitution (Amendment) Bill No. 2 of 2017 was in contravention of Articles 79, 91, 94 and 259 of the Constitution of Uganda.

XV. That the purported decision of the Government of Uganda to make an illegal charge on the consolidated fund to facilitate the Constitution (Amendment) Bill No. 2 of 2017 which was tabled as, a private member's Bill was inconsistent with and in contravention of Article 93 and 94 of the Constitution of Uganda.

XVI. That the purported decision of the Government of Uganda to issue a certificate of compliance in regard to the Constitution (Amendment) Bill No. 2 of 2017 was inconsistent with and in contravention of Article 93 and 94 of the Constitution of Uganda.

XVII. That the actions of the President of Uganda to assent to the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 2, 8A, 44(c), 79, 91, 94 and 259 of the Constitution.

The appellants also prayed for costs of this Appeal and in the Court below. Lastly, the appellant in Constitutional Appeal No. 04 of 2018 lodged a Memorandum of Appeal in this Court containing four grounds of appeal.

These were:

1. The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that passing of the Constitution (Amendment) (No.2)

Bill 2017 into law without Parliament first observing 14 days of Parliament sitting between the 2nd and 3rd reading is not inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.

The learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enactment of the Constitution (Amendment)

Act 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with 5 the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.

The learned majority Justices of Constitutional Court misdirected themselves when they held that the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 is not invalid for the reasons that some of the sections therein are 10 inconsistent with provisions of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.

The learned majority Justices of Constitutional Court erred in law when they found that there were breaches of the Constitution and failed to make orders on the Appellant's prayers.

On these grounds, the appellant prayed for the following orders:

That the appeal be allowed

That the majority judgment and orders entered for the Respondent against the Appellants by the learned Justices of the Constitutional

Court in the Constitutional Court of Uganda at Mbale be set aside and 20 be substituted with the following:

That the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 be annulled and declared unconstitutional;

In the alternative but without prejudice to paragraph (i) section 3 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 be annulled and declared unconstitutional in as far as it purports to lift the minimum and maximum age qualification of a person seeking to be elected as president of Uganda undermines the sovereignty and civic participation of the people of Uganda and is inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A, 38, 105(1) and 260(1);

iii. that the actions of the security forces in entering Parliament, assaulting and detaining members of Parliament is inconsistent with or in contravention of Articles 23,24 and 29 of the 1995 Constitution of the republic of Uganda;

iv. That the entire process of conceptualizing, tabling, consultation, debating and passing of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 was inconsistent and in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, 29, 38, 69(1), 72(1), 73 and 79 of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda;

That the passing of the Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Bill 2017 at the second and third reading without the separation of at least 10 fourteen sitting days is unconstitutional and inconsistent with Articles 1,105(1), 260(2)(b) & (f) and 263(1) of the Constitution;

That the actions of Parliament waiving rule 201 (2) requiring a minimum of three sittings from the tabling of the committee report on the Constitution (Amendment) (No.2) Bill 2017 was in contravention of Articles 79,91,94 and 259 of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.

3. That the Appellant prays for costs of this Appeal and in the Court below.

Representation

The appellant in Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 2018 represented himself. M/S Lukwago & Co. Advocates together with M/S Rwakafuzi & Co. Advocates appeared on behalf of the appellants in Constitutional Appeal No. 03 of 2018. Counsel Wandera Ogalo represented the appellant in Constitutional Appeal No. 04 of 2018. The Attorney General

Byaruhanga William led a team consisting of the Deputy Attorney General Mwesigwa Rukutana, Mr. Francis Atoke the Solicitor General, Ms. Christine Kahwa the Ag. Director Civil Litigation, Mr. Philip Mwaka Principal State Attorney, Mr. George Karemera Principal Senior State Attorney, Mr. Richard Adrole Senior State Attorney, Mr. Geoffrey MadeteState Attorney, Ms. Imelda Adongo State Attorney, Mr. Johnson Natuhwera State Attorney, Ms. Jacky Amusugat State Attorney, Mr. Sam Tusubira State Attorney and Mr. Allan Mukama State Attorney.

All parties filed written submissions and were allowed to give oral highlights of their cases during the hearing of the consolidated appeal.

Before I proceed to the merits of this appeal, I wish to dispose two issues raised by the Attorney General regarding the competence of Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 2018.The Attorney General contends that the Memorandum of Appeal contravenes the Rules of this Court and secondly that the appellant filed his petition from which his appeal arose way before the impugned Act had been enacted.

Attorney General's Submission

The Attorney General contended that all the 84 grounds of Appeal in Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 2018 offended Rule 82 of the Rules of this Court. In his view, the grounds were speculative, argumentative, narrative, insolent and an abuse of Court process.

According to the Attorney General the grounds in the Memorandum of Appeal offended Rule 82 in that they did not specify the points that are alleged to have been wrongly decided by the Constitutional Court, the nature of order they wanted this Court to make and were not concise, but were rather narrative, argumentative and speculative.

In the Attorney General's view, this was an abuse of Court process. He relied on Hwan Sung Ltd V. M&D Timber Merchants & Transporters Ltd, Civil Appeal No. 02 of 2018 to argue that a ground of appeal which does not state in what way the Court of Appeal erred offended Rule 82.

In light of his contentions above, the Attorney General prayed that the Memorandum of Appeal in Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 2018 be struck out.

The Attorney General submitted that the appellant's appeal should fail since the Petition did not conform to Article 137 of the Constitution. He argued that the Petition was filed in December 2017 before the Bill from which the impugned Act arose had been passed into an Act. He further argued that the appellant did not amend the Petition after the impugned Act had been enacted.

Relying on the authorities of Miria Matembe & 2 Ors v. Attorney General, Constitutional Petition No. 02 of 2005 and Makula International v. His Eminence Cardinal Nsubuga & Anor, Court of Appeal Civil Appeal No. 21 of 2001, the Attorney General argued that this rendered the Petition null and void. On this basis, the Attorney 10 General prayed that this appeal be struck out.

Appellant's Reply

The appellant who represented himself, objected to the manner raising this preliminary objection. He contended that Rule 98 (b) of the Rules of this Court the objection to memorandum of appeal should have been by Notice of Motion.

Without prejudice to his submissions above, the appellant contended that the Attorney General misinterpreted the provisions of Rule 82 by arguing that every ground of appeal must contain in it the nature of the order which it is proposed to ask the Court to make. In his view, grounds of appeal drafted in such a way would lead to an absurdity. The appellant further argued that what Rule 82 requires is that at the end of stating the grounds of appeal, the appellant must state the nature of the order which it is proposed to ask the Court to make. In the appellant's view, he did exactly that as is evident at pages 19-21 of the Record of Appeal.

On the issue of the grounds of appeal being speculative, argumentative, narrative, insolent and an abuse of court process, it was the appellant's contention that Rule 82(1) only prohibits 'argument' or 'narrative' and not 'speculation', 'insolence', and 'abuse of court process' as contended by the Attorney General.

The appellant argued that the purpose of Rule 82(1) was to ensure that the Court adjudicates on specific issues complained of in the appeal. In the appellant's view as long as a ground of appeal points to a specific complaint so as to be able to contemplate what will be argued, such ground is compliant with the Rule. The appellant then proceeded to highlight why his grounds of his appeal were competent. The summation of these highlights was that:

(a) The grounds of objection do not need to be wrongly decided, they can be omissions and errors which may render the decision to be null and void [for instance failure to give a fair hearing in the course of hearing]

Conciseness of a ground depends on the nature of the complaint and the fact that a ground of appeal contains several words does not mean that it is not concise

The grounds of appeal did not need to have prayers in themselves.

The appellant prayed that since he had demonstrated that the memorandum of appeal complied with Rule 82(1) and that the objection was irregularly raised, the Attorney General's objection should be rejected.

In the alternative, the appellant prayed that in the unlikely event that this Court found any merit in Attorney General's submissions, then the Court should find that the Attorney General has suffered no prejudice since he was able to understand the complaints in the appeal and adequately responded to them.

The appellant submitted that the claim that the petition did not conform to Article 137 was unfounded and that the objection was neither raised nor argued in the Constitutional Court and thus cannot be raised at this level.

The appellant further contended that even if the Attorney General's objection was not incompetent, there was a clear failure by the Attorney General in comprehending Article 137 of the Constitution.

The appellant argued that the Attorney General's contention that the petition was incompetent because it was filed before the Bill had become an Act does not make it incompetent in light of Article 137(3) of the Constitution.

Relying on Article 137(3), the appellant argued that his locus arose the moment Parliament prevented him from accessing Parliament and all the subsequent actions up to the purported voting were inconsistent with or in contravention of the Constitution. The appellant, citing some excerpts of his petition submitted that in his petition he clearly challenged the actions of the persons stated in the petition which in his view passed the test under Article 137(3) of the Constitution.

In conclusion, the appellant submitted that the Attorney General's objection lacks merit and should be rejected.

Court's Determination of the Preliminary Objection

