I agree with the Attorney General that for the reasons he so ably expounds the appellant's Memorandum of Appeal does not meet the standards set out under Rule 82 of the Rules of this Court. However, as rightly pointed out by the appellant the preliminary point should have been raised at the earliest opportunity which was at the Pre hearing

Conference when apart from consolidating the appeals issues arising from all the memoranda of appeal were framed. After framing the issues court allowed parties to file written submissions which the parties including the appellant complied with. Having allowed the appellant to proceed with the appeal this court cannot strike it out at this stage of the hearing and as rightly pointed out by the appellant the Attorney General would not suffer any prejudice.

The Attorney General also contended that the appellant's petition at the Constitutional Court did not disclose a cause of action since the impugned Act that is being challenged had not yet been enacted.

On the other hand appellant contends that Article 137(3) of the constitution gives a right to any person to lodge a petition to the Constitutional Court as under:-

"A person who alleges that—

(a) an Act of Parliament or any other law or anything in or done under the authority of any law; or

(b) any act or omission by any person or authority, is inconsistent with or in contravention of a provision of this Constitution, may petition the constitutional court for a declaration to that effect and 10 for redress where appropriate."

In Ismail Serugo v. Kampala City Council, Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 1998, Mulenga, JSC (as he then was) held that a petition brought under Article 137 (3) of the Constitution:

"Sufficiently discloses a cause of action if it describes the act or omission complained of and shows the provision of the Constitution with which the act or omission is alleged to be inconsistent or which is alleged to have been contravened by the act or omission and pray for a declaration to that effect."

In Baku Raphael Obudra & anor v. Attorney General, Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 1998, Odoki, CJ (as he then was) while relying on the above ratio held as follows:

*"*In my opinion, where a petition challenges the constitutionality of an Act of Parliament, it sufficiently discloses a cause of action if it specifies the Act or its provision complained of and identifies the provision of the Constitution with which the Act or its provision is inconsistent or in contravention, and seeks a declaration to that effect. A liberal and broader interpretation should in my view be given to a Constitutional petition than a plaint when determining whether a cause of action has been established."

A review of the appellant's petition shows that he was aggrieved and dissatisfied with numerous acts and omissions of various persons and/or authorities which acts and/omissions, in his view contravened or were inconsistent with various provisions of the Constitution. Some of these acts and omissions were even done before the impugned Act had been assented to by the President. He proceeded to ask for various declarations the climax of which was that the Act which was a product of such a process be declared unconstitutional.

Thus in line with the provisions of Article 137 of the constitution and the ratio in Ismael Serugo (supra), it is my finding that the appellant's Petition disclosed a cause of action warranting its consideration by the Constitutional Court. It therefore follows that the appellant's petition was properly before the Constitutional Court and so is his appeal before this Court.

Principles of constitutional interpretation relevant in this Appeal.

In interpreting the Constitution, one of the principles to be followed is that where the words of the Constitution are clear and unambiguous, then they are given their primary, plain, ordinary and natural meaning. However, where the language of the Constitution is imprecise, unclear and ambiguous, then the same is given a liberal, broad, generous and purposive interpretation so as to give effect to the spirit of the Constitution as a continuing instrument whereby governance is upon principles that are acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society.

Interpreting the Constitution, requires Court to look at the Constitution as a whole. All the provisions of the Constitution touching on the issue have to be considered together. The Court must give effect to all the provisions of the Constitution. This is because each provision is an integral part of the Constitution and must be given meaning or effect in relation to others. Failure to do so leads to an apparent conflict within the Constitution. Where a Constitutional provision is in conflict or inconsistent with another Constitutional provision, the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction to resolve the inconsistency so that the Constitution remains whole. See: Ssemogerere & Another v AG: Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 2002 (SCU). See also: Mtikila V AG: High Court Tanzania Civil Case No. 5 of 1993.

The Constitution must be interpreted in such a way that it does not whittle down any of the rights and freedoms contained in it, unless there are clear and unambiguous words to that effect within the Constitution itself. See Dow –v- AG (1992) LRC (Const) 623 at 668. The interpretation must be directed at ascertaining the foundation values inherent to the Constitution and not merely the literal meaning of its provisions. See: Matison & Others –v- The Commanding Officer Port Elizabeth Prison & Others [1994] 3 BCLR 80 at 87. Interpreting the Constitution should take account of the context, scene and setting under which it is operating, not necessarily when it was enacted, so as to take account of the growth and the changing circumstances of the society it is regulating. See: Archbishop Okogie V AG (1981) 2 NCLR 337 at 348 (Nigeria COA).

Where Constitutional history is relevant in interpreting the Constitution, particularly so as to point out past mistakes so that they are not repeated or revived, then such a history should be resorted to. Indeed, this is very well brought out by the preamble to the 1995 Constitution that:

"We the People of Uganda:

Recalling our history which has been characterised by political and Constitutional instability";

That "Recalling of our history" cannot be left out when interpreting the Constitution. See: Karuhanga vs AG: Constitutional Court Petition No. 39 of 2013.

The principles that govern interpretation of ordinary Statutes also apply to interpretation of a Constitution. However, because of the very important objectives of a Constitution that evolve upon the development and aspirations of the people and being the framework for the legitimate exercise of government power as well as the protection of basic individual rights and liberties, the Court interpreting the Constitution must go further than the one interpreting an ordinary Statute, by reading the words of the Constitution and attaching to them great purposes that were intended to be achieved by the Constitution as a continuing instrument of government. It is only this way that the people can have full protection of their fundamental rights and freedoms as well as that of the whole Constitution: See: Attorney General V Whiteman [1991] 2 WLR 1200 at 1204 and Attorney General of Gambia V Momadu Jube (1984) AC 689 (Privy Council).

Under the purpose and effect rule of Constitutional interpretation, the purpose and effect of an impugned Act go to determine the Constitutionality of that Act. If the purpose or its effect infringes a Constitutionary guaranteed right, then the Act is declared unconstitutional. See: Abuki & Another V AG: Constitution Petition No. 2 of 1997.

Related to the above, is the rule of interpretation that the Constitution must be interpreted to give logical and practical meaning and effect to its provisions. Hence the right to life guaranteed under the Constitution has been interpreted to include the right to livelihood: See Abuki & Another V AG (Supra) where the Uganda Constitutional Court relied in the Indian Supreme Court decision of Tellis & Others V Bombay Municipal Council (1987) LRC (Const) 351.

In interpreting the Constitution resort is also made, where necessary and relevant, to international and regional treaties and instruments. This is because, in the case of Uganda, paragraph 28 of the National objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy, provides that Uganda is to respect international law and treaty obligations and actively participate in international and regional organizations that stand for peace, well-being and progress of humanity. The Uganda Human Rights Commission under Article 52(i) (h) monitors the Government's compliance with the international treaty and convention obligations on human rights. It follows therefore that under the Constitution the role of the international and regional treaties and Instruments is a recognized one. It is therefore right of the Constitutional Court to hold that in matters of interpreting the Constitution:

" …… we may have to use aids in construction that reflect an objective search for the correct construction. These may include international instruments to which this country has acceded and thus elected to be judged in the community of nations." Per Egonda-Ntende AG JA, in Tinyefuza –v- AG (Supra)."

At pre-hearing conference, 8 issues were agreed upon by the parties and the Court, these are;

1. Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves on the application of the basic structure doctrine.

2. Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enactment of Constitutional (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda and the Rules of Procedure of Parliament?

Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the violence/scuffle inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda?

Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they applied the substantiality test in determining the petition?

Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional

Court misdirected themselves when they held that the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018

on the removal of the age limit for the President and Local Council V offices was not inconsistent with the provisions of the 1995 Constitution?

6. Whether the Constitutional Court erred in law and in fact in holding that the President elected in 2016 is not liable to vacate office on attaining the age of 75 years?

7a. Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court derogated the appellants' right to fair hearing, un-judiciously exercised their discretion and committed the alleged procedural irregularities.

7b. If so, what is the effect of the decision of the Court?

8. What remedies are available to the parties?

I shall now proceed to determine these issues starting with issue No.7 because if resolved in the affirmative it may not be necessary to delve into the merits of the appeal which would have been disposed by way of annulment of the entire trial.

Issue 7: PROCEDURAL IREEGULARITIES

This issue was framed as follows:

"7a. Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court derogated the appellants' right to fair hearing, un-judiciously exercised their discretion and committed the alleged procedural irregularities.

7b. If so, what is the effect of the decision of the Court?"

Appellants' Submissions

MPs submissions on Issue No.7

Counsel submitted that the right to a fair hearing a non derogable right under Article 44 of the Constitution was compromised in a number of ways by the Constitutional Court.

Counsel submitted that one of the salient features of what constitutes fair trial is that it must be before "an independent and impartial Court or tribunal established by law."

In counsel's view, allegations of denial of the right of fair hearing or trial are very serious and should not be made lightly or merely in passing. That they impact on the very core of our trial system.

Counsel submitted on the principle in determining the question of judicial discretion which was succinctly explained in the case of Uganda Development Bank- versus – National Insurance Corporation SCCA No. 28/1995 where court observed that;

"The principles which this court applies when deciding whether to interfere with the exercise of discretion by a Trial Judge are well known and are set out in such decisions as MbogoVs. Shah (1968) E.A. 93 where, Newbold, P. at page 96, stated the principles to be that—

"…a Court of Appeal should not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of a Judge unless it is satisfied that the Judge in exercising his discretion has misdirected himself in some matter and as a result has arrived at a wrong decision, or unless it is manifest from the case as a whole that the Judge has been clearly wrong in the exercise of his discretion and that as a result there has been misjustice."

Counsel submitted that Judicial discretion must be exercised on fixed principles: Jetha Vs. Sigh (1931) 13L.R.K.1. Where there has been no improper exercise of discretion, the Judge's decision cannot normally be upset: Devji Vs. Jinabhai (19341 1 E.A.C.A. 87.

That a mere difference of opinion between the appellate court and the lower court as to the proper order to make is no sufficient ground for interfering with a discretion which has been exercised in the Court below. There must be shown to be an unjudicious exercise of the discretion or an exercise of discretion at which no Judge could reasonably arrive whereby injustice has been done to the Party complaining Counsel submitted that though there is a presumption in favour of judicial discretion being rightly exercised, an appellate court may look at the facts to ascertain if such discretion has been rightly exercised.

According to counsel the learned justices of the Constitutional court misdirected themselves when they unjudiciously exercised their discretion by declining to invoke their powers under the law to summon key government officials and individuals who played a key role in the process leading to the enactment of the impugned Act to appear and testify on the same.

That under Rule 12 (3) of the Constitutional Court (Petitions and References) Rules, SI. 91 of 2005;

"The Court may, of its own motion, examine any witness or call and examine or recall any witness if the Court is of the opinion that the evidence of the witness is likely to assist the Court to arrive at a just decision."

Counsel relied on the observations of Justice Mulenga (RIP) in the case of Ssemwogerere& Anor v Attorney General; Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 2002 who while considering the nature and scope of inquiry and investigations which ought to be done by the Constitutional Court, noted that;

"In my view, facts pertaining to constitutional questions ought to be proved with certainty rather than being left to the fate of "hide and seek" between litigants, which the rules on the onus of proof evoke...I would go as far as to say that if the parties failed to do so, it was open to the court……to call direct evidence from the appropriate officer of Parliament without appearing 'to unduly descend into the arena'. The desirability to decide constitutional issues on ascertained facts cannot be over emphasized."

Counsel contended that it is apparent that the Constitutional Court had discretion and a daunting task of even investigating beyond the evidence adduced before it since constitutional matters are of great national importance, transcending rights of litigants before Court. It was therefore injudicious on part of the Constitutional Court to decline to summon the Speaker of Parliament the Rt. Hon Kadaga Rebecca, without assigning any reason. That the Constitutional Court ought to have exercised its discretion to summon the following persons to testify on these matters where they played a central role;

a) The Speaker and the Deputy speaker to testify on their lead role in the enactment of the impugned Act, the discrepancies in the certificate of compliance, procedural irregularities, arbitrary suspension of the Honourable Members of Parliament from Parliament, the unprecedented mayhem and violence that ensued in the precincts and chambers of Parliament, etc.

The Minister of finance to testify on the contradictory Certificates of Financial Implication which were issued from his Ministry in regard to the impugned Act.

The Hon. Magyezi Raphael who was the architect, progenitor, midwife and sponsor of the impugned Act to inter alia testify on the conceptualization and mischief he intended to cure by moving Parliament to enact the said Act.

The President who assented to the Bill which was not accompanied with a valid certificate of compliance.

The Chairperson and Deputy Chairperson of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee who processed the Bill at committee stage.

That Justices of the Constitutional Court erred when they restricted the Appellants' and their counsel on what to be asked in cross examination of the witnesses limiting them to the scope to the averments in the affidavits for the respective witnesses. It was counsel's submission that this was in contravention of the basic principles of evidence law incorporated under Section 137 (2) of the Evidence Act which is to the effect that cross examination of a witness need not be confined to the facts to which the witness testified about

That the mode adopted for submission during the hearing of the petition was also materially defective for the following reasons;

The learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erroneously directed the Appellants' counsel to make submissions before the cross examining the relevant witnesses.

The leaned Justices of the Constitutional Court erroneously denied the Appellants' counsel a right to a rejoinder after the representative of the Attorney had made their submissions in reply.

That all these procedural irregularities occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

b) If so, what is the effect on the decision of the Court?

Counsel submitted that the above irregularities limited the Constitutional court's scope of investigation thereby failing on its noble duty vested under Article 137 (1) of the Constitution thereby coming to a wrong decision. He relied on the case of Semwogerere (supra) where Kanyeihamba JSC observed that;

"In Uganda, courts and especially the Constitutional Court and this Court were established as the bastion in the defence of the rights and freedoms of the individual and against oppressive and unjust laws and acts. Courts must remain constantly vigilant in upholding the provisions of the Constitution."

The Appellants also contended that the Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact and injudiciously exercised their discretion in awarding UGX. 20,000,000/= (Twenty Million 20 Shillings) as professional fees and two-thirds of the taxed disbursements to all the Petitioners, a sum which is manifestly meagre considering the nature and significance of the matter.

Submissions of Mabirizi

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that the court was duty bound to determine the petition expeditiously whose failure derogated the right to fair hearing.

He cited Article 137(7) of The Constitutionand Rules 10 & 11 of The Constitutional Court Rules which place a duty on the Constitutional Court to determine a Constitutional Petition expeditiously. That the petition was filed in December 2017 and court heard it in April 2018 and interrupted by unnecessary lengthy adjournments. He cited the case of M/S Mfmy Industries Ltd-Pakistan (supra), where it was held that "justice delayed is justice denied. The courts must… prevent any delays which are being caused at any level by any person whosoever…"

Mr. Mabirizi contended that failure to render judgment within 60 days from 19th April 2018 derogated the right to fair hearing, invalidating the decision. He cited Rule 33(2) of the Court of Appeal Rules and the Uganda Judicial Code of Ethics, Paragraph 6.2 which provides that "…Where a judgment is reserved, it should be delivered within 60 days, unless for good reason, it is not possible to do so."

Hearing was concluded on 19th April 2018 but judgment was only rendered on 26th July 2018, 97 days after hearing, with no single reason.

He cited the case of Chief Ifezue V. Mbadugha-Nigeria Nigeria Supreme Court Case No. 68 of 1982, where the Justices declared that the Judgment delivered out of the three months allowed by the law was null & void.

Mr. Mabirizi prayed that court be persuaded to find that there was no valid judgment the court could give after expiry of the 60 days from 19th April 2018.

On the evicting the appellant from court seats he submitted there was a derogation of his right to a fair hearing & rules of natural justice

Mr. Mabirizi complained that the court turned into 'defence counsel' through excessive interruptions hence derogating the right to fair hearing.

He cited the case of Peter Michel V. The Queen [2009] UKPC 41- the Privy Council declared the proceedings and judgment a nullity due to incessant interruptions by court. It was inter alia held that the core principle, that under the adversarial system the judge remains aloof from the fray and neutral applies no less to civil litigation than to criminal trial…He must not be sarcastic or snide…he must not make obvious to all his own profound disbelief in the defence being advanced.…this conviction cannot stand.

That failure to grant him ample time to present his case was a failure of fair hearing since ample time is one of the facilities required in fair hearing, as already pointed out in the Kenyan Juma case.

That despite his warning as to the speed, the Justices were sarcastic in their reply and never bothered.

That the denial of the right to a rejoinder derogated the right to fair hearing & Court of Appeal rules nullifying the entire process.

That his right to reply after submissions by the respondent is absolute and not at the whims of court as the court made it to the extent that he had to plead for it. That the DCJ introduced two terms; 'Closing Remarks' and 'New Matter'. Which are not known under any law.

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that court was bound to be patient to enable presentation of the case as required by Principle 6.3 of the Judicial Code of Ethics which provides that "A Judicial Officer shall …be patient and dignified in all proceedings, and shall require similar conduct of advocates, witnesses, court staff and other persons in attendance."

That to the contrary, throughout the proceedings, the learned justices seemed to be so much in a hurry which indeed led to derogation of the right to fair hearing.

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that the Justices of the Constitutional Court did not refer to appellant's pleadings, evidence, authorities & decided cases which was contrary to the rules relating to judgments.

He cited the case of Charles Onyango Obbo and Anor v Attorney General (Constitutional Appeal No.2 of 2002) where Tsekooko JSC noted that "Courts should at least as a matter of courtesy acknowledge the effort of advocates who produce relevant and useful or binding decided cases…In the Court below the majority decision did not allude to any of those cases and no reasons were given why."

That in the case of Ssemwogerere V. Ag, (Supra), Kanyeihamba, JSC "…the majority of the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court do not appear to have taken into account counsel's submissions and relevant authorities cited…" Mr. Mabirizi submitted that Court had a duty to confirm reading of the authorities and their conclusions on them.

That the constitutional court was bound to determine all matters in controversy between the parties before it. He relied on Section 33 of the Judicature Act and referred to the case of Ebenezer & Ors V. Onuma & Anor, Nigeria Supreme Court Case No.213/88, where ESO, JSC, he held that It is the primary obligation of every court to hear and determine issues in controversy before it, and as presented to it by litigants.

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that court was duty bound to determine issue 6(a) in relation to Article 93 of the constitution which was pleaded & argued, that instead, the DCJ dealt with issue No. 6 but did not resolve issue 6(a).

Mr. Mabirizi argued that court failed to make a decision on arresting & detaining members of parliament from the house yet it was in issue 6(c).

That the court was bound to make a decision on his application to strike out the affidavits of Mr. Keith Muhakanizi & Gen David Muhoozi. That except, Justice Musoke, who declined to expunge the paragraphs for reason that Mr. Keith Muhakanizi disclosed the sources of information, the DCJ, Kasule, Kakuru & Barishaki JJCS said nothing about this affidavit and no decision was therefore reached.

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that it was irregular for court to propose answers to witnesses & to prevent the appellant from cross examining witnesses. He referred to Section137(2) of the Evidence Act provides that "…the cross-examination need not be confined to the facts to which the witness testified on his or her examination-in-chief.".

He complained that lower court over-protected Mr. Keith Muhakanizi and made it so impossible for him to give the answers which he wanted. That the DCJ, with threats to evict him prevented Gen. Muhoozi from answering questions to point out that his affidavit was not commissioned.

That the DCJ's interference defeated his intention to strike out the affidavit hence irregular as it derogated his right to cross-examine which is part of the right to fair hearing.

That this court in Mbabazi V. Museveni & 2 Ors, PEP No.1/16, prohibited affidavits of third parties but insisted that an affidavit must be by a person who perceived the actions.

It was his contention that the two affidavits of Gen. Muhoozi and Keith Muhakanizi were nothing but a pile of fabricated lies intended to mislead court which had to be thrown out as was done by Kato JSC, in Tibebaga V. Begumisa & Ors, SCCAPl. No. 18/02, BERKO, JCC, in Ssemwogerere V. Ag, CCP No.3/and in Mubiru V. Ag, CCP No.1/01.

Mr. Mabirizi contended that there is no reason why Patrick Ochailap who Mr. Keith Muhakanizi says is the one who processed the certificates of Financial implications or the commander who commanded the UPDF military operation at parliament did not make their respective affidavits.

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that his desire to have the speaker summoned was well pleaded & the application in court was so contentious that its decision could not go without reasons, but none was given in the Judgment, which amounted to a whimsical exercise of discretion. That failure by court to give reasons for dismissing the application for summoning the speaker was an abuse of discretion.

That at hearing, the effects of not summoning the speaker caught up with the Justices and Attorney General since the Speaker would be the only person to answer questions relating to the invalid certificate of compliance. That without summoning the speaker, court erred in commenting and deciding in favour of & against her without testing the basis and credence of these actions.

ISSUE 7(b): If so, what is the effect on the decision of the Court?

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that the failure to accord him a fair hearing and the procedural irregularities highlighted rendered all the proceedings and judgment null & void.

In the alternative, Mr. Mabirizi submitted that since this court is empowered by Section 7 of The Judicature Act, it can make directions that can remedy the irregularities and grant appropriate remedies.

The Attorney General's submissions

The Attorney General submitted that the 2nd Appellant's submissions are presumptuous and without any basis whatsoever. That at the outset, he points out that the 2nd Appellant did not apply to the Court to examine the Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament - or any of the other witnesses that had not sworn Affidavits in respect of the Petition, including those cited herein. The record shows that it was only the 1st Appellant that requested Court to examine the Rt. Hon. Speaker and the Respondent has already dealt with the same ground/issue its submissions in reply to the 1st Appellant and therefore incorporates its arguments in Constitutional Petition No. 2/2018 by way of reference.

The Attorney General cited the case of Constitutional Appeal No. 1/2015: Hon. Theodore Ssekikubo& 4 Others Vs. The Attorney General & 4 Others, while considering the power (discretion) of the Constitutional Court to grant leave to allow cross examination of deponents of affidavits under Rule 12 of the Constitutional Court (Petitions and Reference) Rules SI No. 91/2005 at pages 18 – 19 of the decision, the Supreme Court made reference to Mbogo& Others Vs. 5 Shah [1968] E.A.

The Attorney General submitted that beyond making general submissions that the cross-examination was guided by the ground rules established by the Hon. Justices, the Appellants have not demonstrated how they were prejudiced or otherwise denied a fair hearing in the circumstances.

The Attorney General submitted that the Hon. Justices of the Constitutional Court duly heard and determined the Consolidated Petition according all parties an equal chance to present their respective cases and the record of proceedings demonstrates that the 2nd Appellants – and all the parties in the Consolidated Petitions - fully participated in the proceedings and had ample time to present their case.

On the rejoinder, The Attorney General submitted it was only on new matters raised during the course of the Respondents submissions. The Respondent contended that no prejudice was occasioned by the Court permitting cross examination after submissions had commenced and the Appellants had the opportunity to extensively submit on the matter raised during the cross examination. Additionally, the Appellants did not object to the mode adopted by the Honorable Court and this is therefore an afterthought.

The Attorney General relied on the case of American Express International Banking Ltd Vs. Atul [1990-1994] EA 10 (SCU); in which the Supreme Court of Uganda elaborated the circumstances/tests for interference with discretion, including: -

"i. Where the Judge misdirects himself with regard to the principles governing the exercise of his discretion;

ii. Where the Judge takes into account matters which he ought not to consider; or fails to take into account matters which he ought to consider;

iii. Where the exercise of his discretion is plainly wrong - see: The Abidin Daver [1984] All ER 470.

Referring to the case of Mbogo Vs. Shah (1968) EA 10 (Supreme Court of Uganda);

The Attorney General contended that under Article 137(7) of the Constitution requires that upon presentation of a Petition, the Constitutional Court; - "… shall proceed to hear and determine the Petition as soon as possible …" Rule 10(1) of the Constitution Court (Petition and References) Rules SI No. 91/2005 similarly provides; - "… the Court shall, in accordance with Article 137(7) of the Constitution, hear and determine the Petition as soon as possible …"

Accordingly, that the standard established by the Constitution for the Constitutional Court to hear and determine Constitutional Petitions is "as soon as possible". The Attorney General submitted that he five (5) Petitions were lodged respectively in December, 2017 and January 2018.The 1st Appellant specifically lodged his petition in December 2017. On 9th April 2018 several petitions were called for hearing in Mbale and thereafter consolidated for purposes of being heard together with others due to the similarity of the issues raised by the different petitioners in the lower court. The timetable adopted by the Court was implemented.

The Attorney General submitted that the record of proceedings demonstrates that the Constitutional Court considered and determined the Five (5) Consolidated Petitions with due diligence and expedience in the circumstances considering the multiple claims and multiple litigants and Counsel participating in the Court proceedings.

The Attorney General invited this Honorable Court to find that the Constitutional Court duly expeditiously heard and determined the Consolidated Petitions as required by the standard established by Article 137(7) of the Constitution and that the Appellants suffered no prejudice whatsoever or derogation of the right to a fair hearing on account of the manner in which the hearing and determination was conducted.

On the eviction of 1st Appellant from Court seats occupied by representatives of other Petitioners and being put in the dock, the Attorney General referred this court to the authoritative and conclusive guidance of the Hon. Deputy Chief Justice which I intend to rely on in this judgment.

The Attorney General prayed that the Honorable Court finds that the 1st Appellant was courteously treated like other litigants and that the record of appeal clearly demonstrates that the 1st Appellant enjoyed and was accorded every opportunity to present his case.

On the excessive interruption, the Attorney General submitted that Court was seeking clarification on the proper construction of the contents of documents and enquiring into the legality of the passage of the Constitutional Amendment Bill, No. 1/2018 as part of its duty under Article 137(1) of the Constitution.

The Attorney General submitted that there was no derogation of the 1st Appellant's right to a fair hearing arising from the procedure adopted by the Hon. Justices of the Constitutional Court and the allegations that the Court acted contrary to International Conventions do not arise whatsoever.

The Attorney General cited the case of Constitutional Appeal No. 1/2015: Hon. Theodore Ssekikubo & 4 Others Vs. The Attorney General & 4 Others, while considering the power (discretion) of the Constitutional Court to grant leave to allow cross examination of deponents of affidavits under Rule 12 of the Constitutional Court (Petitions and Reference) Rules SI No. 91/2005 at pages 18 – 19 of the decision, the Supreme Court made reference to Mbogo & Others Vs. Shah [1968] E.A. pages 93 and stated that: -

"From the wording of Rules 12(2) above, the Court's power is purely a discretionary one. That being the case, it is well settled that this Court will not, as an Appellate Court, interfere with the exercise of discretion by a lower Court including the Constitutional Court, unless it is shown that the Court took into account an irrelevant matter which it ought not to have taken into account or failed to take into account a relevant matter which it ought to have taken into account or that the Court has plainly gone wrong in its consideration of the issues raised before it."

On the failure by the Constitutional Court to consider evidence, submissions and authorities, he submitted that each and every Hon. Justice of the Constitutional Court acknowledged the pleadings, submissions and authorities in their respective Judgments.

On the determination all matters in controversy between the parties as required by Section 33 of the Judicature Act, Cap. 13. The Attorney General submitted that the Hon. Justices of the Constitutional Court duly determined and resolved all the issues in controversy as presented in the pleadings, framed in the issues and submitted by the respective litigants.

He cited the case of Supreme Court Civil Appeal No. 1/2012: British American Tobacco (U) Ltd Vs. Shadrach Mwijikubi & 4 Others it was held that "While it is prudent for Judges to provide explanations for how and why they reached a certain decision, I am of the opinion that this is not an indication that the evidence was not properly evaluated, and is simply, as Counsel for the Respondent asserted, 'a matter of style'. However, I have carefully perused the leading Judgment and found that he actually re-evaluated the evidence of the two principal 10 witnesses in detail and came to his own conclusion before he agreed with the findings of the trial Judge. The learned Justice ensured that he recounted the various points in contention and had them in mind while writing the Judgment."

The Attorney General contended that the Hon. Justices of the Constitutional Court duly considered the matters and issues complained of by the 1st Appellant and the complaints of the 1st Appellant are in respect of style and not substance.

On the proposing answers to witnesses, The Attorney General submitted that the Court has discretion to regulate cross examination and guide litigants to cross examine witnesses on pertinent matter related to the litigation and surrounding circumstances.

On the failure by the Constitutional court to give reasons for the decision not to summon the Rt. Hon. Speaker of Parliament the Attorney General submitted that a review of the record demonstrates that the 1st Appellant was the only one that sought cross examination of the Rt. Hon. Speaker and the reason for not summoning her was given.

The Attorney General submitted that on not calling the Rt. Hon. Speaker for examination are overtaken by events and any decision of the Court in that regard would therefore be moot. That the verbatim record of Parliamentary proceedings produced in the Hansard is already on Court record together with the Certificate of Compliance. The designated custodian of the records of Parliament is the Clerk to Parliament who fulfilled her duty by making the Hansard and Certificate of Compliance available to Court and the Litigants in the consolidated Petition who had the opportunity to cross examine her at length.

The Attorney General further submitted that neither the 1st Appellant, nor the 2nd Appellant, sought to examine the Rt. Hon. Deputy Speaker of Parliament, the Hon. Minister of Justice and Constitutional Affairs, the Chairperson and Deputy Chairperson of the Parliamentary Committee of Legal and Parliamentary Affairs and Hon. Raphael Magyezi. Their submissions on the same was an afterthought and prayed that the Honorable Court finds the Appeal entirely without merit.

(b) If so, what is the effect on the decision of the Court?

The Attorney General submitted that the Appellants participated at each and every stage of the proceedings in the Constitutional Court and duly were accorded a fair hearing in accordance with the Article 28 of the Constitution. The Respondent further contended that the procedures adopted by the Constitutional Court were entirely within their discretion and did not in any way prejudice the Appellant or occasion derogation of such right. In conclusion, he submitted that the Appellants had not proved any of their respective Grounds of the Appeal, prayed that the Consolidated Appeals are dismissed with costs.

Court's Determination of Issue No. 7

Failure to summon the Speaker.

As already stated in this judgement the petition was brought under Article 137 of the constitution. The allegations were that under Clause 3(a) an Act of parliament and under 3(b) a number of acts and omissions were inconsistent with or in contravention of the constitution and the petitioners prayed for annulment of the Act. The petitioners filed affidavits to prove the acts and omissions that would warrant annulment of the Act and the Attorney General filed a number of affidavits in defence of the enactment of the Act. The Attorney General did not find it necessary to include the Speaker or Deputy Speaker among the witnesses to swear affidavits. As a party defending the petition, a decision as who would testify in the case was his prerogative because he knew better the witness that would support the case he wished to present. The acts and omissions in the proceedings in the parliament were well documented by the evidence of the Clerk to Parliament, the Parliamentary Hansard and evidence of some of the petitioners who were in Parliament. So the factual aspect of the case was well covered and there was not so much controversy about what happened in parliament during the enactment of the impugned Act. What was in the controversy was the constitutionality of the acts, omissions and the Act itself.

During the trial at the Constitutional Court, the Petitioners sought the indulgence of the court to summon the speaker for cross examination on a number of matters. The petitioners sought to rely on Rule 12(3) of the Constitutional Court (Petition and References) Rules S.I.91 of 2005 which provides that; -

"The Court may, of its own motion, examine any witness or call and examine or recall any witness if the Court is of the opinion that the evidence of the witness is likely to assist the Court to arrive at a just decision."

The appellants argue that apart from the Speaker and Deputy Speaker who should have been called to testify on their lead role in the enactment of the impugned Act others who should have been called included the minister for finance who would testify about contradictory certificate of financial implications, Hon. Raphael Magyezi who moved the impugned Act, the President who assented to the Bill which was not accompanied by a valid Certificate of compliance and the Chairperson and the deputy Chairperson of the legal and parliamentary affairs committee of parliament.

On their own motion the court did not find it necessary to call any witness outside those that had filed affidavits. Some of those that had filed affidavits like Mr. John Mitala, Head of the Civil Service, Mr. Keith Muhakanizi, Mr. Frank Mwesigwa, Mr. Asuman Mugenyi, General David Muhoozi and Hon. Nambooze Bakireke were cross examined from the loads of evidence that was filed by both the petitioners and the respondent. With that cross examination of the witnesses the court was equipped with more than sufficient material to make the necessary interpretation as required under Article 137 (3) (a) and (b) of the constitution.

As to the failure by the Constitutional Court to give detailed reasons as to why they found no reason to call the Speaker, the reasons advanced in this court cure the omission because as a first appellate court we are required to do a re-evaluation and come to our own conclusion.

Cross Examination after submissions

I agree with the submissions of counsel that it was irregular of the court to take final submissions of the case before cross examination. The submissions are supposed to be a final act in a trial before judgement. The evidence elucidated during cross examination would be part of the comments during final submissions. In my own view the cross examination after final submissions was not fatal to the trial since the evidence was at the disposal of the justices and it would be taken into account during their own analysis of the case.

Interjections

Interjections by the court should be within limits. Court may wish to clarify a point or even give direction of the trial without appearing to be descending in the arena. The appellants who complain of the interjections were able to present their cases which was not any different from that presented in this court. In fact, Mr. Mabirizi submitted before this court that he was able to present his case with a number of authorities which constitutional court did not acknowledge.

Submissions of Authorities

Mr. Mabirizi complained that he presented his case with a number of authorities which court did not acknowledge. But all the justices supported their findings with a number of good authorities from a number of jurisdictions. This might have been as a result of their own research in addition to the authorities presented by the parties. They might not have mentioned who of the parties was the source of the authorities but they were assisted by the authorities submitted by all parties including Mr. Mabirizi.

Delay of the trial and delivery of the judgement.

According to Mr. Mabirizi the commencement of the trial and the trial itself were delayed. This court is not in position to comment at why the trial did not start immediately after the filing of the petition as required under Article 137 of the Constitution. In relation to the adjournments of the case during the trial, an adjournment of the case does not necessary mean that because there no hearing in the court room there is no work going on. The hearing of case entails a lot of work during the hearing in court and outside court where there is a lot of reading and research being done.

I have studied Mr. Mabirizi's argument about the consequences of the delayed judgement. He cited the Nigerian case of Chief Ifezue V. Mbadugha, Nigeria (supra) where a judgment was annulled for failure to deliver it within 90 days prescribed by the Constitution. In our case it is a Regulation in the Judicial Code of Conduct Which Courts should endeavor to adhere to. However, I would not go as a far as saying that failure to deliver a judgement within sixty days renders it null and void. A judgement of a court cannot be invalidated by reason of delay. In the instant case the Constitutional court made pronouncement on the constitutionality of the impugned Act and unless it is reversed it remains on the record as the judgement of the court.

Mr. Mabirizi complained that he was made to sit in a dock during the trial of the case. There was an argument as to whether a litigant can sit at the Bar with counsel and court found that Mr. Mabirizi who was representing himself could not sit at the table reserved for counsel. The DCJ Dollo went to a great length to the position and he stated that: -

"… the position is this, Mr. Mabirizi is a Petitioner and he has every right to be heard like other Petitioners, the other Petitioners chose to be heard through learned Counsel, they brokered professional services of learned Counsel and they are called members of the bar with the right to appear here in a particular way. The right to be heard does not mean you choose where to sit. The right to be heard is to be able to present your case, every institution, every profession has got its rules of conduct and rules of procedure. Our Court is not going to be the first to breach those rules of procedure. Accordingly, Mr. Mabirizi will sit with the other litigants and when the time comes for him to present his case we will bring him to sit in an appropriate place where he can present his case."

I agree with the guidance of the court on this point. From wherever he was he was able to present his petition and I do not see how his right to a fair hearing was compromised by being denied a seat at the Bar.

The Appellants submitted that they were restricted on what to ask in cross examination of the witnesses which limited them to the scope to the averments in the affidavits. I am aware of the provisions of Section 137(2) of the Evidence Act which makes the scope of cross examination wide. But where a witness has been summoned with leave of court the court may limit the cross examination to the facts deponed to the 20 affidavit.

The court, in my view inadvertently denied the appellants' counsel and appellant right to a rejoinder after the Attorney General had made his submissions in reply. But no prejudice was suffered by the appellants.

On the affidavits of affidavits of Mr. Keith Muhakanizi and General David Muhoozi being hearsay, my view is that affidavit evidence like any other evidence is subject to evaluation. Upon evaluation court is entitled to accept or reject the evidence if it is worthless it may not be necessary to strike out the affidavits.

I don't find any basis for an award of professional compensation or damages to Mr. Mabirizi.

On whether the Court determined all issues in controversy, I agree with the submissions of the Attorney General that from the consolidated Petitions issues were framed and the Constitutional Court resolved them and if not this court is duty bound to re-evaluate the case and come to its own conclusions.

In conclusion on this issue, I wish to observe that some of the issues raised are valid as I have tried to explain. However, none of the irregularities was fatal to the whole trial as would warrant annulment as prayed by the appellants. The issue is answered in the negative

Issue No.1.

Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves on the application of the basic structure doctrine.

Appellants' Submissions (MPS)

Counsel submitted that the basic structure doctrine attempts to identify the philosophy upon which a constitution is based as opposed to a textual exegesis of the same. He submitted that the doctrine has been instrumental in shaping the constitutional jurisprudence of different countries across the world since the case of Kesavananda Bharati Versus State of Kerala, AIR 1973 SC where it was held as follows; "According to the doctrine, the amendment power of Parliament is not unlimited; rather it does not include the power to abrogate or change the identity of the constitution or its basic features." The case was followed in Minerva Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 1789, where court unanimously held that Parliament has no power to repeal, abrogate or destroy basic or essential features of a constitution.

Counsel cited cases in other jurisdiction where the doctrine was followed like in Taiwan, where the Council of Grand Justices of Taiwan announced interpretation No. 499 and stated that; "Although the amendment of the Constitution has equal status with the Constitutional provisions, any amendment that alters the existing constitution concerning governing norms and order, and, hence, the foundation of the Constitution's very existence destroys the integrity and fabric of the constitution itself. As a result, such amendment shall be deemed improper."

In Bangladesh the Supreme Court in the case of Anwar Hossain Chowdhury vs Bangladesh 10 41 DLR 1989 App Div 169, held: - "Call it by any name, basic structure or whatever, but that is the fabric of the Constitution which cannot be dismantled by an authority created by the Constitution itself namely the Parliament… Because the amending power is power given by the Constitution to Parliament and nevertheless it is a power within and not outside the Constitution".

In South Africa, the South African Constitutional Court in the case of Executive Council of Western Cape Legislature Vs The President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (CCT27/95) [1995] ZACC 8; 1995 (10) BCLR 1289; 1995 (4) SA 877 (22 September 1995) while discussing the applicability of the basic structure doctrine noted as follows:- "There are certain fundamental features of Parliamentary democracy which are not spelt out in the Constitution but which are inherent in its very nature, design and purpose. Thus, the question has arisen in other countries as to whether there are certain features 30 of the constitutional order so fundamental that even if Parliament followed the necessary amendment procedures, it could not change them. I doubt very much if Parliament could abolish itself, even if it followed all the framework principles mentioned above. Nor, to mention another extreme case; could it give itself eternal life - the constant renewal of its membership is fundamental to the whole democratic constitutional order. Similarly, it could neither declare a perpetual holiday nor, to give a far less extreme example, could it in my view, shuffle off the basic legislative responsibilities entrusted to it by the Constitution."

In Kenya, the court of Appeal in the case of Njoya vs Attorney General and Others (2004) AHRLR 157 held that: - "Parliament may amend, repeal and replace as many provisions as it desired provided that the document retains its character as the existing Constitution and that alteration of the Constitution does not involve the substitution thereof a new one or the destruction of the identity or the existence of the Constitution attained." (Sic)

In applying this doctrine to the instant petition, counsel strongly submitted that the learned justices of the Constitutional Court misconstrued the application of the basic structure doctrine in their finding that the qualifications of the President or Chairpersons of the District Local Government do not form part of the basic structure doctrine and as such S. 3, 4 and 7 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 were not in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 79, 90 and 94 of the Constitution. He faults the learned Justices in according the basic structure doctrine a narrow and restrictive application when they held that it only applied to amendments which required a referendum and specifically to the extension of the term of parliament and not to the age limit. To this submission, he relied on the case of Kesavananda (supra) where court held that;

"To say that there are only two categories of Constitutions, rigid or controlled and flexible or uncontrolled and that the difference between them lies only in the procedure provided for amendment is an over-simplification. In certain Constitutions there can be procedural and or substantive limitations on the amending power. The procedural limitations could be by way of a prescribed form and manner without the satisfaction of which no amendment can validly result. The form and manner may take different forms such as a higher majority either in the houses of the concerned legislature sitting jointly or separately or by way of a convention, referendum etc. Besides these limitations, there can be limitations in the content and scope of the power. The true distinction between a controlled and an uncontrolled Constitution lies not merely in the difference in the procedure of amendment, but in the fact that in controlled Constitutions the Constitution has a higher status by whose touch-stone the validity of a law made by the legislature and the organ set up by it is subjected to the process of judicial review. Where there is a written Constitution which adopts the preamble of sovereignty in the people there is firstly no question of the law-making body being a sovereign body for that body possesses only those powers which are conferred on it. Secondly, however representative it may be, it cannot be equated with the people."

Counsel for appellant further associated himself with the finding of Kakuru JCC that the question of whether or not the doctrine of basic structure applies, depends on the constitutional history and the Constitutional structure of each country. Every Constitution is a product of historical events that brought about its existence. He relied on the dissent judgment of Kasule, JA in Saleh Kamba & others Vs. Attorney General & others; Constitutional Petition No. 16 of 2013 in support of his submission.

In that case the learned Justice held that in interpreting a constitution, court ought to take into account the history of a given country. He further considered the issue of the basic structure of the Constitution and stated as follows:

"Therefore from the historical perspective, the Constitution is to be interpreted in such a way that promotes the growth of democratic values and practices, while at the same time doing away or 10 restricting those aspects of governance that are likely to return Uganda to a one party state and/ or make in-roads in the enjoyment of the basic human rights and freedoms of conscience, expression, assembly and association…"

He argued that what constitutes the basic structure of the 1995 Constitution was aptly highlighted by Kakuru JCC in his dissent, where he came up with what he believed were features of the Constitution that should not be tampered with lest the fabric of the constitution is destroyed

The sovereignty of the people of Uganda and their inalienable right to determine the form of governance for the Country.

The Supremacy of the Constitution as an embodiment of the sovereign will of the people, through regular free and fair elections at all levels of political leadership.

Political order through adherence to a popular and durable Constitution.

Political and constitutional stability based on principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and public participation.

Arising from 4 above, Rule of law, observance of human rights, regular free and fair elections, public participation in decision making at all levels, separation of powers and accountability of the government to the people.

Non-derogable rights and freedoms and other rights set out in the extended and expanded Bill of Rights and the recognition of the fact that fundamental Rights and Freedoms are inherent and not granted by the State.

Land belongs to the people and not to the government and as such government cannot deprive people of their land without their consent.

Natural Resources are held by government in trust for the people and do not belong to government.

Duty of every citizen to defend the Constitution from being suspended, overthrown, abrogated or amended contrary to its provisions.

Parliament cannot make a law legalizing a one-party state or reversing a decision of a Court of law as to deprive a party."

That it is on that premise that Kakuru JCC makes a finding that;

"Parliament, in my view, has no power to amend, alter or in any way abridge or remove any of the above pillars or structures of the Constitution, as doing so would amount to its abrogation as stipulated under Article 3 (4). This is so, even if Parliament was to follow all the set procedures for amendment of the Constitution as provided.

In this regard therefore, I find that the basic structure doctrine applies to Uganda's Constitutional order having been deliberately enshrined in the Constitution by the people themselves. My view expressed above is fortified by the following provisions of the 5 Constitution.

Articles 1 and 2: These Articles establish the foundation of the Constitution upon which all other Articles are anchored therefore in my view cannot be amended, not even by a referendum. Doing so would offend Article 3(4). Article 3. This Article is really unique, and I have not seen or known of any other Constitution with a similar Article, which effectively renders inapplicable to Uganda the Kelsen Theory of pure law. Under Article 3(4) an amendment by Parliament may have the effect of abrogating the Constitution even if such an amendment has been enacted through a flawless procedure. I say so, because an Act of Parliament amending the Constitution is still subject to Article 2 thereof. It must pass the constitutionality test."

Counsel therefore invited this Honourable court to consider the finding of Kakuru, JA as a locus classicus on the basic features of the 1995 Constitution and also further relied on the case of Yaakov vs chairman of the Central Elections committee for the sixth Knesset EA 1/65 where the Supreme Court held that:

"The invalidity of a constitutional provision cannot be rejected merely because the provision itself is part of the Constitution. There are fundamental constitutional principles that are of so elementary a nature, and so much the expression of law that precedes the constitution, that the maker of the constitution himself is bound by them. Other constitutional norms, which do not occupy this rank and contradict these rules can be void because they conflict with them." Counsel contended that the aforesaid key pillars of the 1995 Constitution are reflected and embodied in the preamble to the constitution yet the Majority Justices of the Constitutional Court overlooked the significance and importance of the preamble. Counsel again cited several authorities such as the British Caribbean Bank v The Attorney of Belize Claim No. 597/2011, Kesavananda case(supra) and Minerva case(supra) followed in of Anwar case(supra) that applied the basic structure in emphasising the essence of the preamble in support of his submission.

In British Caribbean Bank v The Attorney of Belize Claim No. 597/2011, the Supreme Court of Belize invoked the basic structure doctrine to strike down a particular constitutional amendment which was at variance with the preamble to the constitution of Belize. The court emphasized that;

"The basic structure doctrine holds that the fundamental principles of the preamble of the Constitution have to be preserved for all times to come and that they cannot be amended out of the existence... There is though a limitation on the power of amendment by implication by the words of the preamble and therefore every provision of the constitution is open to amendment, provided the foundation or basic structure of the constitution is not removed, damaged or destroyed. …The preamble is the root of the tree from which the provisions of the Constitution spring, and which forms the basis of the intent and meaning of the provisions…."

In the case of Minerva case (supra) while emphasizing the essence of the 25 preamble, the Supreme Court of India explained that;

"The preamble assures to the people of India a polity whose basic structure is described therein as a sovereign democratic Republic; Parliament may make any amendments to the Constitution as it deems expedient so long as they do not damage or destroy India's sovereignty and its democratic, republican character. Democracy is not an empty dream. It is a meaningful concept whose essential attributes are recited in the preamble itself."

The Supreme Court of Bangladesh in the case of Anwar case (supra) cited with approval the Indian case of Minerva case (supra) and held that;

"We the people declared the fundamental principles of the constitution and the fundamental aims of the state" this preamble is not only part of the constitution but stands as an entrenched provision that cannot be amended by parliament alone. It has not been spun out of gossamer matters nor is it a little star twinkling in the sky above. If any provision can be called the pole star of the Constitution, then it is the preamble."

Finally, in the Kesavananda case (supra) court observed that the preamble constitutes a landmark in a country and sets out as a matter of historical fact what the people resolved to do for moulding their future destiny.

Counsel therefore invited this Honourable court to take cognizance of the fact that the framers of the 1995 constitution deemed it absolutely necessary to enshrine within the text of the constitution such provision as would be necessary to give effect and operationalize the ideals encapsulated in the preamble as well the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy; these included the two term presidential cap, presidential age limit and abolition of the Kelsenian theory under Article 3 of the Constitution. All these lofty provisions were designed and intended to guarantee orderly succession to power and political stability which to date remains a mirage for our motherland.

He argued that by amending Article 102 (b) to remove the presidential age limit, after scrapping term limits, parliament not only emasculated the preamble to the constitution but also destroyed the basic features of the 1995 Constitution thereby rendering it hollow and a mere paper tiger.

Therefore, it is the Appellants' contention that the basic features of the constitution herein mentioned to wit; supremacy of the constitution as an embodiment of the sovereign will of the people; political order through adherence to a popular and durable Constitution; political and constitutional stability as well as constitutionalism and rule of law in general were fundamentally eroded by the impugned Act thereby destroying the original identity and character of the 1995 constitution. On that account alone the Constitutional Court ought to have invoked the basic structure doctrine to strike down the entire Constitution (Amendment) Act, No.1 of 2018.

Finally, on this issue counsel prayed that this Honourable court be pleased to answer issue 1 in the affirmative.

Attorney General's Submissions.

Attorney General submitted that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court correctly applied the basic structure doctrine when they found that sections 3 and 7 of the impugned Act do not derogate from the Basic Structure of the 1995 Constitution.

He contended that the doctrine was defined in the case of Kesavananda Bharati vs. The State of Kerala Petition (Civil) 135 of 1970; (A.I.R 1973 SC 1461) Vol 5 Tab DD page 64, where S.M. Sikri, C. J defined the Basic Structure in the following terms:

"The basic structure may be said to consist of the following features:

Supremacy of the Constitution;

Republican and Democratic form of Government;

Secular character of the Constitution;

Separation of Powers between the Executive;

Federal character of the Constitution;

He pointed out that it is important to note that any amendments have to be done without destroying the spirit and the basic structure and the foundation upon which Uganda was built as a nation.

He therefore contended that the Constitutional Court unanimously found that the framers of the 1995 Constitution clearly identified provisions of the Constitution which are fundamental and form part of the Basic Structure of the 1995 Constitution. He argued that the framers carefully entrenched these provisions by various safeguards for protection against the risk of abuse of the Constitution by irresponsible amendment of those provisions.

According to the Attorney General, the Safeguards are the requirement of at least a two–thirds majority of the entire membership of Parliament, and a referendum, in fulfillment of the provisions of Articles 260 and 261 of the Constitution.

It follows therefore that Articles 69, 74(1), 75, 260 and 261 of the 1995 Constitution cannot be amended by Parliament under the general powers conferred on it to make law as envisaged under the provisions of Articles 79 and 259 of the Constitution. Only the people can amend these Articles pursuant to the provision of Article 1(4) of the Constitution.

The Attorney General submitted that the Constituent Assembly that took a considerable amount of time to debate and eventually include the peoples' views in what eventually became the 1995 Constitution, was alive to the fact that our society is not static but dynamic and over the years, there would arise a need to amend the Constitution to reflect the changing times.

He further contended that Article 79 of the 1995 Constitution primarily gives Parliament the power to make laws that promote peace, order, development and good governance in Uganda.

Accordingly, Article 259 of the Constitution offers the procedure to the amendment of the Constitution by giving Parliament powers to enact an Act of Parliament, the sole purpose of which is to amend the Constitution by way of addition, variation, or repeal of any provision in accordance with the procedure laid down in Chapter Eighteen.

Therefore, it was within the powers of Parliament to enact sections 3 and 7 of the Constitutional Amendment Act 1/2018 into law and this did not in any way contravene the basic structure of the Constitution and neither was it inconsistent with or in contravention of the constitution

The Attorney General fortified his submissions by the unanimous decision of the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court where it was found as follows: -

As to whether sections 3 and 7 of the impugned Act derogated from the Basic structure of the 1995 Constitution, Justice Owiny Dollo held as thus;

"…Since Parliament exercised power, which the people have conferred onto them under the provision of Article 2 of the Constitution, I am unable to fault it for the process it took to effect these amendments"

Justice Remmy Kasule noted on Page 77 paragraph 2051- page 78 paragraph 2070, Volume 4 of the Record of Appeal that;

"…The framers of the 1995 Constitution that is the Constituent Assembly, in their wisdom saw it fit to have the age limits of one who is to stand for election as President of Uganda, under the category of the qualifications of the President. They provided for these qualifications under Article 102 of the Constitution. They did not put this Article 102 amongst those Articles that have to be amended after first getting the approval of Ugandans through a referendum.''

The Attorney General submitted that the people's power to elect the President or District Chairperson of their choice is not taken away by lifting their respective age limits. If anything, citizens would be encouraged to aspire to elect leaders of their choice and to actively participate in politics and elections as they will now be presented with a wider choice of people to choose from.

He referred to the judgment of Justice Elizabeth Musoke in support of this submission where she held on pages 794 Vol. 4 as follows:

"…. I have not found Sections 3 and 7 among the ones that have offended or contravened the Constitution. Articles 102 and 181 are not among the entrenched Articles and their amendment did not infect any other provisions of the Constitution.

He referred further to Justice Cheborion Barishaki judgment where he makes reference to the German jurist, Professor Dietrich Conrad, who introduced the basic Structure doctrine to Indian scholars and subsequently Indian jurisprudence in a series of public lectures he delivered in that country, notably his 1965 Public Lecture; Prof. Dietrich Conrad, "Implied Limitations of the Amending Power." He also refers to the landmark decision in Kesavanand Bharati vs State of Kerala (A.I.R 1973 SC 1461) wherein it was subsequently held that principles of democracy and democratic government are part of the basic structure of the Indian Constitution and incapable of amendment.

The Attorney General agreed with Justice Cheborion JCC on the applicability of the basic structure doctrine to the 1995 Constitution that sections 1, 3 and 7 of the impugned Act were enacted within the reach of the amending power of Parliament and do not derogate from the Basic structure of the 1995 Constitution.

In conclusion, He affirmed his submission that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court took time to review the basic structure Doctrine and construed it rightly in as far as it's applicable to the 1995 Constitution.

Court's Determination of Issue No. 1

This issue as framed at the Constitutional court for determination as: -

6(g) Whether the Act was against the spirit and structure of the 1995 Constitution.

The Basic Structure doctrine as judicial principle was well defined by all the parties in the Consolidated Constitutional Petition at the constitutional Court as well as in this court.

Both the appellants and the Attorney General seem to agree on the doctrine and in fact the Attorney General agreed with Mr. Lukwago that the basic structure as defined by Justice Kakuru constitutes the basic structure of the 1995 Constitution which should be adopted by this court.

Before we go any further it should be observed that much as there are proponents of the doctrine there are also its opponents.

In the judgement of Kesavananda Bharati v. State of Kerala AIR 1973 SC 1461 there were six dissenters out of the 13 judges that presided over the case. One of the six dissenting judges, Hon. Justice A.N. Ray had this to say:

"Fundamental or basic principles can be changed. There can be radical change in the Constitution like introducing a Presidential system of government for a cabinet system or a unitary system for a federal system. But such amendment would in its wake bring all consequential changes for the smooth working of the new system. (see paragragh 960) …

The problems of the times and the solutions of those problems are considered at the time of framing the Constitution. But those who frame the Constitution also know that new and unforeseen problems may emerge, that problems once considered important may lose their importance, because priorities have changed; that solutions to problems once considered right and inevitable are shown to be wrong or to require considerable modification; that judicial interpretation may rob certain provisions of their intended effect; that public opinion may shift from one philosophy of government to another…The framers of the Constitution did not put any limitation on the amending power because the end of a Constitution is the safety, the greatness and wellbeing of the people. Changes in the Constitution serve these great ends and carry out the real purposes of the Constitution. (See para 987).

In quoting the above passage from judgment of Hon. Justice A.N. Ray, Justices Tsekooko in the case of Paul k. Ssemogerere and Ors v Attorney General Constitutional Appeal No.1 of 2002 stated that: -

"This passage indicates that written constitutions are not static and are liable to be amended. There is an obvious implication in this passage that courts have to interpret constitutional provisions to bring the constitution in line with current trends. Implicit in this is the real possibility that one part of the constitution can be harmonised with another part of the same constitution."

In the case of Rev. Christopher Mtikila v Attorney General Misc. Civil 25 Cause No. 10 of 2005, the Tanzanian Court of Appeal found: -

"we are definite that the courts are not the custodian of the will of the people, that is the property of elected members of parliament", so if there are two or more Articles or portions of Articles which cannot be harmonised then it is parliament which will deal with the matter and not the court unless power is expressly given by the constitution.

On the doctrine of 'basic structure' of the Constitution, the Court held in that case that:

We agree with Prof. Kabudi that that doctrine is nebulous, (meaning it is misty, it is cloudy, it is hazy according to the dictionary) as there is no agreed yardstick of what constitutes basic structure of a constitution."

There were attempts by both the Indian court and the Constitutional court to define what the basic structure of our respective constitutions are. In the case of Kesavananda Bharati v. State of Kerala AIR 1973 SC 1461 from which the doctrine has its genesis, never came up with a 10 single structure that would be said to be a useful guide as to determining as to which part/Articles of our constitution is amendable because it is not part of the basic structure and which part/Articles cannot be amended because to do so would lead to the destruction of the Basic structure leading to total collapse of the constitution.

In the same case Chief Justice Sarv Mittra Sikri, writing for the majority, indicated that the basic structure consists of the following:

The supremacy of the constitution.

A republican and democratic form of government.

The secular character of the Constitution.

Maintenance of the separation of powers.

The federal character of the Constitution.

Justices Shelat and Grover in their opinion added three features to the Chief Justice's list:

The mandate to build a welfare state contained in the Directive 25 Principles of State Policy.

Maintenance of the unity and integrity of India.

The sovereignty of the country.

Justices Hegde and Mukherjea, in their opinion, provided a separate and shorter list:

The sovereignty of India.

The democratic character of the polity.

The unity of the country.

Essential features of individual freedoms.

The mandate to build a welfare state.

Justice JaganmohanReddy preferred to look at the preamble, stating that the basic features of the constitution were laid out by that part of the document, and thus could be represented by:

A sovereign democratic republic.

The provision of social, economic and political justice.

Liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship.

Equality of status and opportunity

It can be easily discovered from above that each of the above justices had his own understanding of what formed the Basic structure of the Indian constitution at that time. There was no unanimity as to what constituted the basic structure of the Indian Constitution.

The same can be seen by Ugandan Constitutional Court justices whose attempt to define what the basic structure of the Ugandan constitution suffered the same fate as that of the Indian court.

The Hon. Justice Alfonse C. Owiny – Dollo; DCJ/PCC in his judgement considered what formed the Basic structure and stated that;

“The principal character of the 1995 Constitution, which constitute its structural pillars, includes such constitutional principles as the sovereignty of the people, the Constitution as the supreme legal instrument, democratic governance and practices, a unitary state, separation of powers between the Executive, Parliament, and the Judiciary, Bill of Rights ensuring respect for and observance of 25 fundamental rights, and judicial independence.

In the fullness of their wisdom, the framers of the 1995 Constitution went a step further in clearly identifying provisions of the Constitution, which it considers are fundamental features of the Constitution. They carefully entrenched these provisions by various safeguards and protection against the risk of abuse of the Constitution by irresponsible amendment of those provisions. The safeguards contained in the provisions entrenched in the Constitution either put the respective provisions completely and safely beyond the reach of Parliament to amend them, or fetter Parliament's powers to do so and thereby deny it the freedom to treat the Constitution with reckless abandon. Article 259 of the Constitution offers the provision signifying the safeguards to the Constitution; by providing as follows:

‘(1) Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, Parliament may amend by way of addition, variation, or repeal, any provision of this Constitution in accordance with the procedure laid down in this Chapter.

(2) This Constitution shall not be amended except by an Act of Parliament–

The sole purpose of which is to amend this Constitution; and

The Act has been passed in accordance with this Chapter.’

Article 75 of the Constitution prohibits Parliament from enacting a law establishing a One Party State; meaning, in essence, that it is only the people who can do so pursuant to the provision of Article 1(4) of the Constitution. Article 260 of the Constitution lists provisions in the Constitution, the amendment of which Parliament can only recommend; but can only become law upon the approval of the people in a referendum. Similarly, Articles 69 and 74(1) of the Constitution provides for the requirement of a referendum to determine whether there should be a change in the political system to be applicable in Uganda at a given time. Other provisions, such as Articles 260, and 262, require special majority; to wit, two –thirds majority of the entire membership of Parliament in the second and third readings of the Bill for the amendment of provisions referred to under Articles 260 and 261 of the Constitution.

It is only such provision of the Constitution as is referred to under Article 262, which Parliament may amend under the general powers conferred on it to make laws as is envisaged under the provision of Articles 79 and 259 of the Constitution. Otherwise, for amendment of the provisions of the Constitution covered under Articles 260 and 261 of the Constitution, as exceptions to the general rule, there is, respectively, the mandatory requirement of approval by the people in a referendum, and ratification by the specified proportion of 5 District Councils. In addition, Article 263 provides that the votes required in the second and third readings referred to in Articles 260 and 261 of the Constitution must be separated by at least fourteen sitting days of Parliament.

Article 77 (4) for its part, as I will discuss at length below, restricts the extension of the tenure or life of a serving Parliament to six months at a time; which can only be necessitated by either a situation of war, or emergency, rendering holding an election impossible. Furthermore, in addition to the requirement for satisfying the threshold of the stated special majority, and fourteen sitting days space between the second and third readings of the Bill, Article 260 provides that the provisions entrenched therein can only be amended after the people have positively pronounced themselves thereon in a referendum. These provisions, for the people to exercise their original constituent power in the amendment of the Constitution, are clear manifestation of the safeguards inbuilt within the Constitution to secure the provision of Article 1 of the Constitution; which recognises that ultimate power vests in the people.

Then there is the special provision of Article 44 of the Constitution; which prohibits any form of derogation whatever from the human rights and freedoms specified therein; as follows:

"Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, there shall be no derogation from the enjoyment of the following rights and freedoms–

(a) Freedom from torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment;

Freedom from slavery or servitude;

The right to fair hearing;

The right to an order of habeas corpus."

It is these non–derogable provisions, protecting fundamental human rights, with respect to which the phrase 'tojikwatako' (do not touch it) – which gained notoriety during the Constitution amendment process, urging members of Parliament not to touch the Constitution – would have been most relevant."

In the judgment of Hon. Justice Remmy Kasule correspondingly attempted to define the doctrine he stated that;

"Therefore, the doctrine of basic structure is embedded in the 1995 Constitution. As the Njoya vs Ag & Others (Supra) case shows, Kenya has also embraced the said doctrine. Tanzania seems not to have embraced it fully, given the Tanzania Court of Appeal decision of AG vs Mtikila: Civil Appeal No. 45 of 2009. But our history of tyranny, violence and Constitutional instability is different from that of Tanzania that has had Constitutional stability since her becoming an Independent State, and it is fitting that Uganda adopted the doctrine of basic structure.

Accordingly, by application of the doctrine of basic structure, the Parliament of Uganda can only amend the Constitution to do away or to reduce those basic structures such as sovereignty of the people (Article 1), the supremacy of the Constitution (Article 2) defence of the Constitution (Article 3), non-derogation of particular basic rights and freedoms (Article 44), democracy including the right to vote (Article 59), participating and changing leadership periodically

(Article 61), non-establishment of a one-party State (Article 75), separation of powers amongst the legislature (Article 77): The Executive (Article 98): The Judiciary (Article 126) and Independence of the Judiciary (Article 128), with the approval of the people through a referendum as provided for under Article 260 of the 30 Constitution."

In his judgment Justice Kenneth Kakuru, JA/ JCC outlined what in his opinion formed the Basic structure of the 1995 Constitution. The structure which is already outlined in counsel Lukwago's submissions was supported by the Attorney General in his submissions. After outlining the structure, he concluded as follows: -

"Parliament, in my view, has no power to amend alter or in any way abridge or remove any of the above pillars or structures of the Constitution, as doing so would amount to its abrogation as stipulated under Article 3 (4). This is so, even if Parliament was to follow all the set procedures for amendment of the Constitution as provided.

In this regard therefore, I find that the basic structure doctrine applies to Uganda's Constitutional order having been deliberately enshrined in the Constitution by the people themselves."

This was in spite of his acknowledgement that the doctrine had not yet attained universal acceptance as he explained: -

"Needless to say, the doctrine of basic structure has not yet attained universal acceptance. It was rejected in Tanzania, when the Court of Appeal reversed the Judgment of the High Court that had upheld it in Attorney General vs Christopher Mtikila (Civil Appeal No. 45 of 2009).

It has not been fully accepted in Pakistan or even in South Africa where it has been alluded to but not adopted.

The Supreme Court of Sri Lanka, also rejected it because the language in its Constitution permitted expressly any amendment or repeal of any Constitutional provision. The doctrine has also been rejected in Malaysia, where the Court granted Parliament and unlimited power to amend the Constitution…"

In the judgment of Hon. Lady Justice Elizabeth Musoke, JCC. She took the stance of Justice Jaganmohan Reddy (supra) that in the definition of the doctrine, we must not lose sight of the preamble of the constitution and she proceeded to state that;

"I find that in Uganda the Preamble to the Constitution captures the spirit behind the Constitution. The Constitution was made to address a history characterized by political and constitutional instability…The new Constitution is for ourselves and our posterity, and the Preamble is meant to emphasize the popularity and durability of the Constitution. Further still, a critical aspect of the basic structure of our Constitution is the empowerment and encouragement of active participation of all citizens at all levels of governance. This is the hallmark of the Democratic Principle No. II (i) of the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy.

All the people of Uganda are assured of access to leadership positions at all levels. [See Directive Principle II (i)]. The goal of ensuring stability is echoed in Directive Principle No. III. And pursuant to Article 8A, the Objective Principles are now justiciable.

Another of the basic pillars of our Constitution is Article 1(1), which guarantees the sovereignty of the people by providing that all power belongs to the people who shall exercise their sovereignty in accordance with the Constitution.

The Bill of Rights to be found in Chapter Four of the Constitution contains fundamental human rights which are inherent and not granted by the State. The ones in Article 44 are non-derogable and are part of the basic structure which if removed or amended would be replacing the Constitution altogether."

In the judgment of Hon. Justice Cheborion Barishaki, JCC, he stated that the doctrine had been rejected by the Court of Appeal of Tanzania. He made a comparison between the Tanzanian constitution and ours, which I think was not necessary. He stated as follows:-

"By contrast, the Court of Appeal of Tanzania, in Attorney General vs Rev. Christopher Mtikila, Civil Appeal No.45 of 2009 in 2010 (EA) 13 rejected application of the doctrine and overruled the High Court of the said country which had held that the doctrine applies to Tanzania as well. The Justices of the Court of Appeal took the view that the Tanzanian Constitution does not contain any provisions that cannot be amended.

In particular, they seem to have been persuaded by the fact that the doctrine must be expressly legislated since Constitutions of countries such as Algeria, Malawi, Namibia, South Africa, Italy, France and Turkey specifically contain provisions providing that certain clauses of the Constitution are not subject to amendment under any circumstances. A similar provision does not exist in the Tanzanian Constitution.

The Tanzanian Constitution is unique on that account and the unanimous decision of its final appellate Court must be viewed in that regard. The Ugandan Constitution does not contain any clause prohibiting amendment of any provision but it, in my view, differs in major respects from the Tanzanian Constitution. I will enumerate a few unique features which clearly militate against reaching a similar conclusion like the Tanzanian Court of Appeal on applicability of the basic structure doctrine.

Firstly, our Constitution contains elaborate National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy that emphasize democratic government, public participation in governance, promotion of unity and stability, respect for fundamental rights and freedoms inter alia. Article 8A of the Constitution requires Uganda to be governed based on the principles of national interest and common good.

Secondly, Article 20(1) of the Constitution, touching upon fundamental rights and freedoms provides that;

"Fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual are inherent and not granted by the State."

In light of the above provision and the Directive Principles of State Policy, can Parliament effect a Constitutional amendment seeking, for instance, to do away with certain rights by scrapping this provision? I will not speculate but clearly, faithful interpretation of our Constitution given its historical background as earlier detailed and in light of its preamble favour the position that the basic structure doctrine, to a restricted extent, be upheld as applicable in our legal system to govern amendments to the Constitution. We must also take into account our shared values as a country which are alluded to in the Directive Principles of State Policy.

I am not convinced that Parliament, in exercise of its powers under Article 79(1) is free to effect amendments that would in effect replace the Constitution resulting from the consensus of the Constituent Assembly with a new one. Consequently, I hold that the Ugandan Constitution is designed to recognise, to a certain extent, the basic structure doctrine in its preamble, national objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy read together with Article 8(A).

In my view, in the Ugandan context the basic structure doctrine operates to preserve the people's sovereignty under Article 1 of the Constitution.

Amendments to the Constitution should not be introduced or passed in a manner that defeats our country's national objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy without the input of the people in a referendum. Amendments that directly impact on the people's sovereignty enshrined in Article 1 of the Constitution, if passed without a referendum, are deemed to have offended our Constitution's basic structure.

I am persuaded to follow the Kenyan, South African and Indian authorities on this point and respectfully decline to follow the approach of the Court of Appeal of Tanzania. I will therefore determine the extent, if at all, to which the impugned amendments violate the basic structure of our Constitution.

Throughout the trial at the Constitutional court and the appeal before this court there was no suggestion that the Indian Constitution is the same Model as our constitution because our constitution was structured according to our history.

In our constitution there is the whole chapter eighteen with the heading "Amendment of the Constitution", under which there are various Articles including: - Article 259 Amendment of the Constitution, Article 260 Amendments requiring a referendum, Article 261 Amendments requiring approval by district councils and Article 262 Amendments by Parliament which provides: -

A bill for an Act of Parliament to amend any provision of the Constitution, other than those referred to in Articles 260 and 261 of this Constitution, shall not be taken as passed unless it is supported at the second and third readings by the votes of not less than twothirds of all members of Parliament.

These Articles give a framework within which the constitution can be amended. I do not think that it is necessary to agonize as to what the basic structure of the constitution is. As I have already stated both the Indian Court and the Constitutional court attempted to define what the basic structure of the Indian and Ugandan Constitution is but it was an exercise in futility.

My understanding of the basic structure doctrine is that within this framework the constitution is amendable but it can still be protected from compromise of its own foundation and structure so that every amendment is harmonized with the rest of the constitution and the wishes of the people of Uganda.

The framework provided under Articles 259,260 and 261 of the constitution should not be seen as a licence to the Legislative arm of Government to amend the constitution the way they wish. As to whether this amendment was part of the basic structure it was adequately addressed by the Constitutional court which came to the conclusion that the removal of the age limit would not affect the basic structure of the constitution and I agree with that finding. The issue is answered in the negative.

ISSUE No. 2

This issue was framed as follows:

"Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enactment of Constitutional (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda and the Rules of Procedure of Parliament?" The appellants submitted that the procedure and manner of passing the entire Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 was flawed and/or tainted with illegalities, procedural impropriety in violation of Articles 28, 42, 44, 79, 91, 92 and 259 of the Constitution and the Rules of Procedure Parliament. Parliament is enjoined under Article 94 of the Constitution to make rules to regulate its own procedure, including the procedure of its committees, subject to the provisions of the Constitution. That Parliament was obliged to follow the provisions of the Constitution and its own Rules of procedure. In support of this argument, they relied on the case of Oloka Onyango & 9 Ors vs Attorney General [2014] UGCC 14 which was cited with approval in the case of Law Society of Kenya vs Attorney General & Anor [2016] eKLR where court held that:

"Parliament as a law making body should set standards for compliance with the constitutional provisions and with its own Rules. ... the enactment of the law is a process and if any of the stages therein is flawed, that vitiates the entire process and the law that is enacted as a result of it ..."

The appellantsstated that the net effect of non-compliance of parliament with its own rules of procedure and those laid down in the Constitution rendered the impugned Bill and the resultant Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 null and void. That the constitution being the supreme law of the land, the procedure for its amendment ought to be sanctified and followed to the letter. They cited the case of Indira Nehru Gandhi vs Shri Raj Narain Civil Appeal No. 887 of 1975 where the Supreme Court of India held that:

"In a democratic country governed by the constitution which is supreme and sovereign, it is no doubt true that the constitution itself can be amended by Parliament but that can only be validly done by following the procedure prescribed by the constitution. That shows that even when the Parliament purports to amend the constitution, it has to comply with the relevant mandate of the constitution itself. Legislators, Minister and Judges all take oath of allegiance to the constitution, for it is by the relevant provisions of the constitution that they derive their authority and jurisdiction and it is to the provisions of the constitution that they owe allegiance."

They therefore invited this Court to answer issue two in the affirmative.

The Attorney General's Submissions in Reply

The Attorney General submitted that the entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda (and the Rules of Procedure of Parliament).

The issue raises a number of acts and omissions for which the appellants sought declarations and redress under Article 137 of the Constitution. The Article which defines the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court provides as follows: -

"137. Questions as to the interpretation of the Constitution.

Any question as to the interpretation of this Constitution shall be determined by the Court of Appeal sitting as the constitutional court.

When sitting as a constitutional court, the Court of Appeal shall consist of a bench of five members of that court.

A person who alleges that—

(a) an Act of Parliament or any other law or anything in or doneunder the authority of any law; or (b) any act or omission by anyperson or authority, is inconsistent with or in contravention of a provision of this Constitution, may petition the constitutional courtfor a declaration to that effect, and for redress where appropriate.

(4) Where upon determination of the petition under clause (3) of thisArticle the constitutional court considers that there is need forredress in addition to the declaration sought, the constitutional court may— (a) grant an order of redress; or (b) refer the matter tothe High Court to investigate and determine the appropriate redress.

(5) Where any question as to the interpretation of this Constitution arises in any proceedings in a court of law other than a field court martial, the court— (a) may, if it is of the opinion that the question involves a substantial question of law; and (b) shall, if any party to the proceedings requests it to do so, refer the question to the constitutional court for decision in accordance with clause (1) of this Article.

(6) Where any question is referred to the constitutional court under clause (5) of this Article, the constitutional court shall give its decision on the question, and the court in which the question arises shall dispose of the case in accordance with that decision.

(7) Upon a petition being made or a question being referred under this Article, the Court of Appeal shall proceed to hear and determine the petition as soon as possible and may, for that purpose, suspend any other matter pending before it." (Underling for emphasis)

I deal with each act or omission as raised by the petitioners/appellants to determine the unconstitutionality of the alleged acts and omissions before determining the constitutionality of the Act.

1. Charging the Consolidated Fund contrary to Article 93 of theConstitution

Submission by MPs

In respect to whether or not the Bill had a charge on the consolidated fund contrary to the provisions of Article. 93 of the Constitution, counsel contended that although the Constitutional Court made a finding that the impugned Act violated the provisions of Article 93 of the constitution, it declined to nullify the entire Act on ground that the non-compliance with the Constitutional provision only affected Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the impugned Act extending the term of Parliament and local government councils from five to seven years. That the said Sections were introduced by way of amendments that imposed a charge on the consolidated fund.

On the above premise, counsel argued that the entire Act ought to have been struck out because Article 93 (a) (ii) and (b) of the Constitution in 'absolute' terms prohibits Parliament from proceeding on a private member's bill or a motion including amendments thereto which has the effect of creating a charge on the consolidated fund. Parliament therefore flagrantly violated Article 93 of the Constitution when they proceeded to consider and enact into law the impugned Bill with its amendments which had the effect of imposing a charge on the consolidated charge as found by the constitutional court. It was therefore erroneous to apply the doctrine of severance in a Bill which was considered and passed as an integral legislation in the same process.

Counsel further submitted that there was a charge on the consolidated fund by paying each Member of Parliament UGX 29 million as facilitation to carry out consultations with the public regarding the Bill. Counsel invited this Court to make a finding that this exgratia payment imposed a charge on the consolidated fund and therefore violated Article 93 (a) (ii) (iii) and (b) of the constitution.

3rd Appellant's submissions

Counsel submitted that having found some of the provisions in the challenged Act contravened Article 93 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court would have come to no other conclusion than nullifying the whole Act. Article 93 provides that;

(a) Parliament shall not……. proceed upon a bill that makes provision for……. the imposition of a charge on the Consolidated Fund or other public fund of Uganda

(b) Proceed upon a motion ... the effect of which would make provision or any of the purpose specified in paragraph "a" of this Article.

In counsel's view, the words "Parliament shall not proceed" should be given their ordinary meaning as was held by this Court in Theodore Sekikubo and others vs. Attorney General Constitutional Appeal No. 01 of 2015. Those words simply prohibit Parliament from proceeding on a Bill or motion. The words in their ordinary interpretation mean "to Stop, do not go forward". Parliament proceeded with the Bill and subsequently enacted the Act. The fact that the offending provisions are later found to be unconstitutional does not change the fact that Parliament proceeded with the Bill and motion in contravention of the Constitution. The provisions of the Constitution deal with a Bill. It is the Bill which was in issue and the Court with respect ought to have made a decision on the constitutionality as at the time of considering the Bill and not after the Bill became law.

The Speaker was required under Rule 113 (2012 Rules) to make a ruling. That it is the responsibility of the Speaker to decide whether a bill contravenes Article 93. In effect the speaker ruled that Article 93 was not applicable because the House was dealing with a committee report and not Bill. This was the wrong way of interpreting the provision. The House was proceeding under a motion for second reading and as such Article 93(b) was applicable.

The House then proceeded with debating the motion. The Speaker reminded members that she had earlier put the question that the bill be read for the second and called for a vote. Members voted. That was proceeding and making a decision on a motion.

Subsequently, Hon. Tusiime brought in amendments to enlarge the life and term of both Parliament and local councils which as the Court found contravened Article 93. At that stage and in line with Article 93 and the Rules of the House the Speaker ought to have made a ruling striking those amendments out and informing the House that the hands of Parliament were tied by the Constitution and they could not proceed with debate in respect of the motions introduced by Hon. Tusiime. Instead, the Speaker allowed the matter to proceed to debate and at the end she put the question and members voted on a motion which created a charge on the Consolidated Fund.

Furthermore, the report of the committee of the whole House contained the provisions which created a charge on the Consolidated Fund. Hon. Magyezi moved a motion for adoption of the report.

The Bill itself, containing the offending provisions was put to a vote and members accepted that the Bill should pass. It passes. The final approval is given. That is proceeding on the Bill. It is that Bill which is then sent to the President for assent. Parliament has at this stage already breached the Constitution by proceeding with a bill and motions charging the Consolidated Fund and even sending it to the President who then assented to it with the clauses creating a charge on the Fund. Contrary to the Constitution the Parliament considered a bill charging the Consolidated Fund and enacted it into law.

That in the above circumstances, the Constitutional Court could not validate the unconstitutional acts by holding that after all the offending parts of the Bill have been struck down. The question that will still remain is: Did Parliament proceed on a bill creating a charge on the Consolidated Fund? Counsel also faulted the Constitutional Court for not addressing its mind to the provisions of the Constitution and the Public Finance Management Act and thereby came to the wrong conclusion.

Section 76 of the Public Finance Management Act requires every Bill introduced in Parliament to be accompanied by a certificate of financial implications which indicates the estimates of revenue and expenditure over a period of two years after coming into effect of the Bill when passed into law.

The Certificate of Financial Implications in respect of the Bill states that the planned expenditure will be accommodated within the medium term expenditure framework for Ministries Departments and agencies concerned. In so stating the Minister appears to concede that the Bill will have some sort of expenditure. The Minister then states there are no additional financial obligations beyond what is provided in the medium term. Expenditure framework “medium term” is defined in the Act as a period of three to five years.

A medium term expenditure framework is a primary document which contains the consensus on policies, reform measures, projects and programmes that a Government is committed to implement during a specific period of between three and five years. It draws on a larger objective such as vision 2025. It may identify priority areas scheduled for implementation during the period, specify economic growth percentage expected policy goals, project sources of financing etc. In short, it is just a plan.

On the other hand, the Consolidated Fund is provided for in Article 153 of the Constitution and Section 2 of the Interpretation Act.

Counsel submitted that Section 76 of the Public Finance Management Act was ignored and not used to determine whether the Bill created a charge on the Consolidated Fund under Article 93 of the Constitution. That therefore the court erred when it whole heartedly embraced the Certificate of Financial Implication as the test of whether the Bill created a charge on the Consolidated Fund.

In respect to the 29 million facilitation, counsel argued that Article 156 of the Constitution requires Parliament to prepare estimates which are included in a Bill to be known as an Appropriation Bill "which shall be introduced into Parliament to provide for issue from the Consolidated Fund of the sums necessary to meet that expenditure
...."

Article 154 of the Constitution also provides that no monies shall be withdrawn from the Consolidated Fund except…. where the issue of those monies has been authorized by an Appropriation Act."

The Appropriation Act is in this respect a conduit from the Consolidated Fund. Counsel submitted that it was erroneous for the Constitutional Court to hold that the 29 million did not come from the Consolidated Fund but the account of Parliament. The decision to pay that money was a result of the Motions for the 1st and 2nd second reading of the Bill. Those Motions therefore had the effect of removing 29 million shillings from the Consolidated Fund albeit unconstitutionally.

To hold otherwise would mean that expenditure on Magyezi bill was provided for in the 2016/17 Budget since it was introduced in September 2017.It would mean that at the time preparing budget estimates in 2016

Parliament was aware of this bill and made provision for it. That does seem logical. The logical conclusion is that the Ministry of Finance provided the money. If it was not so, Parliament would have presented evidence of both its estimates for the financial year 2016/17 together with the Appropriation Act. The burden to do so lay with the Respondent but it failed to do so.

Mr. Mabirizi's Submissions

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that parliament's power and functions are not absolute or above the law but subject to the provisions of this Constitution as provided under Article 97.

He cited the cases of Oloka-Onyango & 9 ORS V. Attorney General, CCCP No. 8/14, where it was held that "Parliament as a law making body should set standards for compliance with the constitutional provisions and its own rules...The enactment of the law is a process, and if any of the stages therein is flawed, that vitiates the entire process and the law that is enacted as a result of it"

The case of Doctors for Life International v. The Speaker of the NATIONAL Assembly & ORS South Africa Constitutional Court Case No. CCT 12/05, it was noted by Ngobo, J that "…Failure to comply with manner and form requirements in enacting legislation renders the legislation invalid…"

The constitutional provisions under application in the American case are couched in the same way like our Article 93 which starts with a prohibition "…Parliament shall not ..." The Article does not give any exception whatsoever. Section 76 of The Public Finance Management Act 2015, has no single word of a Private Members Bill, it was only designed to guide ministers.

Mr. Mabirizi contended that a prohibited law is null & void only waiting to be struck down. Although Article 94 of The Constitution allows members of Parliament to introduce Private members' bills, they can only legally introduce bills in line with Article 93 of The Constitution.

Mr. Mabirizi contended non-compliance with rules of procedure rendered the outcome null and void. That the justices agreed with him where they relied on Paul Ssemwogerere and Ors Vs Attorney General and Oloka Onyango and Others Vs Attorney General (supra) to find that failure by Parliament to strictly follow laid down procedures in the Constitution and Parliamentary Rules of Procedure will invalidate subsequent legislation even if it be an Act for amending the Constitution.

Attorney General's submissions

The Attorney General begun by pointing out that Article 93 of the Constitution provided for restrictions on financial matters and specifically prohibited Parliament from proceeding with a bill, except when introduced on behalf of the by Government, that had financial implications as provided therein.

The Attorney General further pointed out that the above notwithstanding, Article 94 of the Constitution guaranteed the right of a Member of Parliament to move a private member's bill. Relying on the decision of this Court in P.K. Ssemwogerere & Anor Vs Attorney General, Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 2002, the Attorney General submitted that the above two provisions of the Constitution had to be construed harmoniously with each sustaining the other and not destroying the other.

The Attorney General submitted that pursuant to Article 94 of the Constitution, Parliament made Rules of procedure governing the way it conducted business. Referring this Court to Rule 117 of the Parliamentary Rules of Procedure, the Attorney General contended that it was a requirement for every bill introduced in Parliament to be accompanied by a Certificate of Financial Implication. In the Attorney General's view, this served as a guarantee to the Speaker and/or Parliament that the Bill did not have financial implication and did not contravene Article 93 of the Constitution.

The Attorney General further contended that Rule 117 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament was in pari materia with Section 76 of the Public Finance Management Act of 2015. The Attorney General submitted that the evidence on record showed that on 27th September 2017, the Hon. Raphael Magyezi, a Member of Parliament representing Igara County West constituency, tabled in Parliament a motion for leave to introduce a private Members' Bill titled The Constitution (Amendment) (No. 2) Bill of 2017.

The Attorney General further submitted that his evidence showed that on 3rd October 2017, the Hon. Raphael Magyezi moved the House so that the bill could be read for the first time and the same was seconded and laid on the table of Parliament, accompanied by a Certificate of Financial Implications as required under the section 76 of the Public Finance Management Act, 2015 and the Rules of Procedure of Parliament.

The Attorney General was emphatic that that Parliament only proceeded with the bill presented by the Hon. Raphael Magyezi after the Rt. Hon. Speaker and the House were satisfied that the bill did not create a charge on the consolidated fund. He further argued that this position was confirmed by the Constitutional Court. The Attorney General referred this Court to the Judgment of Kasule, JCC and quoted the learned Justices holding thus:

"This Court accepts this Certificate of Financial Implications as being valid in law as a correct certification by Government, through the Ministry of Finance, that the proposed amendments in the original Bill satisfied the provision of Article 93 of the Constitution, the Public Finance Management Act and the appropriate Rules of Parliament."

The Attorney General further referred to the same Judgment of Kasule, JCC were his lordship observed as follows:

"Article 93 of the Constitution and Section 76 (1) of the Public Finance Management Act, 2015 compulsorily require every Bill presented to Parliament to be accompanied by a certificate of 10 financial implications from the Minister of Finance.

He also referred us to the Judgment of Cheborion, JCC where his lordship held thus:

"As a consequence, I find that the Bill which was introduced by Hon. Magyezi in respect of amendment of Article 61, 102, 104 complied with the requirements of Article 93 of the Constitution and section 76 of the Public Finance and Management Act 2015 while the amendments introduced by Hon. Nandala Mafabi and Hon. Tusiime did not comply."

Lastly, the Attorney General referred this Court to the Judgment of 20 Kakuru, where his Lordship held as follows:

"None of the Petitioners presented any serious challenge to the constitutionality of the original Bill as first presented. I have already found that it was not in contravention of or inconsistent with Article 1, 2 and 8A of the Constitution. There was evidence that a Certificate of Financial Implications was properly obtained and was indeed available before the motion to introduce the said bill was proceeded with upon in Parliament."

The Attorney General also pointed out that a similar position was reached by Musoke, JCC in her judgment. The Attorney General submitted that the Justices of the Constitutional Court were right to strike out the provisions of the impugned Act that did not comply with the Article 93 and maintain the provisions of the Act that complied with the Article by applying the principle of severance.

The Attorney General invited this Court to uphold the decision of the Constitutional Court that the Bill presented by Hon. Magyezi did not contravene Article 93 of the Constitution.

Regarding the UGX 29,000,000/= given to Members of Parliament, the Attorney General submitted that during cross examination the Clerk to Parliament ably pointed out in her evidence that the above sum was appropriated for use by the Parliamentary Commission and not drawn from the consolidated fund.

The Attorney General further observed that the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court found that said facilitation to Members of Parliament did not make the enactment of the impugned Act inconsistent with Article 93 of the Constitution. In support of his contention, he referred this Court to the Judgments of Kasule, Cheborion, JCC, Kakuru, JCC and Musoke, JCC.

In conclusion on this point, the Attorney General submitted that Article 93 of the Constitution only prohibited Parliament from proceeding with a bill, unless introduced on behalf of Government that made provision for financial implications. In his view, the Article did not concern itself with the money used in processing the bill, allowances/facilitations that was paid out to the Members of Parliament to process the Bills.

The Attorney General invited this Court to uphold the learned majority Justices' decision that the money given to members of Parliament as facilitation did not contravene Article 93 of the Constitution.

Determination of the Court.

Article 93 of the 1995 constitution provide as follows: -

93. Restriction on financial matters.

Parliament shall not, unless the bill or the motion is introducedon behalf of the Government—

(a) proceed upon a bill, including an amendment bill, that makes provision for any of the following—

(i) the imposition of taxation or the alteration of taxation otherwise than by reduction;

(ii) the imposition of a charge on the Consolidated Fund orother public fund of Uganda or the alteration of any such charge otherwise than by reduction;

(iii) the payment, issue or withdrawal from the Consolidated Fund or other public fund of Uganda of any monies not charged on that fund or any increase in the amount of that payment, issue or withdrawal; or

(iv) the composition or remission of any debt due to the Government of Uganda; or

(b) proceed upon a motion, including an amendment to a motion, the effect of which would be to make provision for any of the purposes specified in paragraph (a) of this Article.

The essence of this Article is to enable the government plan on how such charge or others imposition on consolidated fund can be effectively implemented by it without causing unnecessary restraints on its budget. This is to prevent Parliament from proceeding with Bills and Motions that create charge on consolidated fund unless they are brought by government.

The impugned Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018, had two certificates of financial implications. The first was issued upon the request of Hon. Magyezi and another issued by Ministry of Finance to Hon. Tusiime Michael for an amendment to original Magyezi bill to add a clause for extension tenure of parliament from 5 years to 7 years starting with current parliament. The issue of the second certificate having glitches was properly handled by the Constitutional court which found it to have 30 been irregularly issued. The other amendment of Hon Nandala Mafabi had no certificate of financial implication.

The majority of Constitutional Court justices found that the impugned Act violated the provision of Article 93 of the constitution and they contended that non –compliance only affected section 2,6,8 and 10 of the impugned Act which provided for extension of the term of parliament and Local government from five to seven years which were introduced by the way of amendment that it imposed a charge on the consolidated fund and severed it and saved the original contents of the Magyezi bill as it had no imposition of a charge on the consolidated fund.

I concur with the Constitutional court that the Magyezi Bill had no charge or imposition of the same on the consolidated Fund. The amendments did. Under Article 93(a) of the Constitution debate on the Magyezi Bill should not have proceeded. It was incumbent on the speaker to resolve this issue before proceeding with the debate.

The Article forbids private members from introducing or proceeding with Bills that make a charge on consolidated fund. The language is in mandatory terms.

I therefore find that the process of debating and passing Constitutional (Amendment) Bill 2017 with its amendment that infringed on Article 93 of the Constitution was null and void and vitiated the entire enactment of the Constitutional (Amendment) Act 2018.

On the issue of 29 million.

The Parliamentary Commission spent moneys which were already appropriated. I would leave this matter for the Auditor General to establish whether or not there was misappropriation of the funds much as its source was the consolidated fund.

2. Consultation/Participation

Submissions by MPs

On the issue of Consultation/Public Participation, counsel submitted that the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that there was proper consultation of the people of Uganda on the impugned Constitution (Amendment) Bill, 2017. He submitted that the requisite consultation and public participation of the people, which is mandatory, was not conducted. He argued that public participation is one of the elements of the basic structures of our Constitution and therefore this being a matter which touched the foundation of the Constitution Specifically Articles 1, 2 and 8A, public participation was paramount.

In support of his submissions above, counsel cited the persuasive Kenyan cases of:

i)Law Society of Kenya Vs. Attorney General, Constitutional Petition No. 3 of 2016 where the Court noted that:

"...public participation in governance is an internationally recognized concept. This concept is reflected in the international human rights instruments. The Universal declaration of Humanrights of 1948 proclaims in Article 21 that everyone has a right totake part in the government of his country, directly or throughfreely chosen representatives..."

The Kenyan Constitutional Court further pronounced that;-

"...To paraphrase Gakuru case (Supra), public participation ought to be real and not illusory and ought not to be treated as a mere formality for the purpose of fulfilment of the constitutional dictates. It behoves Parliament in enacting legislation to ensure that the spirit of public participation is attained both quantitatively and qualitatively. It is not enough to simply "tweet" messages as it were and leave it to those who care to scavange for it. Parliament ought to do whatever is reasonable to ensure that as many Kenyans are aware of the intention to pass legislation. It is the duty of Parliament in such circumstances to exhort the people to participate in the process of enactment of legislation by making use of as many for a as possible such as churches, mosques, public "barazas", national and vernacular radio broadcasting stations and other avenues where the public are known to converge and disseminate information with respect to the intended action..."

ii) Robert N. Gakuru& Others –Vs- The Governor Kiambu County &10 Others wherethe Court noted that:

"...the obligation to facilitate public involvement is a material part of the law making process. It is a requirement of manner and form. Failure to comply with this obligation renders the resulting legislation invalid. In my Judgment, this Court not only has a right but also has a duty to ensure that the law making process prescribed by the Constitution is observed. And if the conditions for law making process have not been complied with, it has the duty to say so and declare the resulting statute invalid..."

Counsel stated that the significance of consultations is a fundamental value of our Constitution which was not appreciated by the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court. That the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court failed in their duty of evaluating the evidence on record and arrived at a wrong decision that the people were consulted on the impugned Constitution (Amendment) Bill, 2017 whereas not.

Counsel expounded that there was overwhelming and cogent evidence on record indicating that;-

a. The process leading to the enactment of the impugned Constitution (Amendment) Act was not preceded by a Consultative Constitutional review exercise as was the case with the promulgation of the 1995 Constitution and the 2005 amendments.

b. The Constitution (Amendment) Bill was presented in Parliament by a private member, Hon. Raphael Magyezi and there is no evidence on record to the effect that he consulted the people of Uganda later on his constituents in Igara West Constituency before tabling the same before Parliament.

c. Much as the Speaker directed that consultations should be conducted, Parliament as an institution never designed a structured frame work or process for public participation or consultation which may have included Parliamentary barazas, public rallies, radio and Television broad castings among others.

d. The Committee on Legal and Parliamentary affairs which was assigned the duty of processing the Bill did a shoddy job.

e. The opposition members of Parliament were denied the opportunity and right to engage the people over the aforesaid bill. The public gatherings for opposition members of Parliament which had been organized countrywide were blocked, ruthlessly and violently dispersed by the police and other security agencies and many Members of Parliament and other citizens were arrested, tortured and subjected to inhuman and degrading treatment

In breaking up the opposition MPs' rallies, Police relied on the directive issued by Asuman Mugyenyi, the Director of operations which directive was unanimously declared unlawful, arbitrary, obnoxious, unfortunate and unconstitutional by the Constitutional Court. Ironically, the Constitutional Court held that there was no evidence to demonstrate that the aforesaid illegal directive was ever implemented and that it had adversely affected the entire consultation process. Counsel submitted that the finding was untenable, both in law and fact as there was overwhelming evidence on record to the effect that the said directive was enforced as illustrated hereinabove. Indeed, Asuman Mugyenyi himself admitted during cross examination that his directive was enforced by all the police officers countrywide.

Despite the fact that Members of Parliament were given exgratia facilitation of Ugx. 29m the purported consultation as argued by the Attorney General was illusory and ineffectual. He invited Court to adopt the finding of Justice Kakuru where he held that, "…the process of public participation in my humble view is required to pass the SMART test; that is, it has to be Specific, Measurable, Attainable, Relevant and Time bound…"

He further contended that Justice Kakuru, while applying the qualitative test, found that only 7 out of 455 members of Parliament who were on the Roll call, when the bill was passed were proved to have consulted the people in some way and that "…The number of constituencies in which consultations were made appear to have been only 7 out of 290 constituencies representing 2.41% of the total…"

In conclusion on this issue, Justice Kakuru observed that; "…I find that Parliament failed to encourage, empower and facilitate active public participation of all citizens in the process of enacting the impugned Act in contravention of Articles 1, 2 and 8A of the constitution and this omission vitiated the whole impugned Act."

Counsel therefore invited this Court to uphold the finding of Justice Kakuru that the Committee could not sufficiently consult the people of Uganda in a span of only 60 days given the fact that they needed to gather views from 15,277,198 registered voters, 290 Parliamentary /constituencies, 112 Districts, 1,403 Sub-Counties, 7,431 Parishes and 57,842 villages. The committee in its report, indicated that it managed to interact with only 53 groups and individuals, nearly almost of whom are Kampala based.

3rd Appellant's (ULS) submissions

Counsel submitted that the actions of the police during consultations deprived citizens of the freedom to assemble and associate. There was evidence as found by the Constitutional Court of violent dispersing of rallies and stopping citizens from interacting with their members of parliament by the Police. Unfortunately, the Court did not pronounce itself on the infringed rights of citizens

Furthermore, counsel submitted that rights are vested in every individual. Even if only one Ugandan is deprived of a right it remains a contravention of the Constitution. Once proved as the judges clearly found, the burden shifted to the Respondent to show that the actions of violently dispersing rallies and intimidating the population is demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society.

Counsel argued that the Attorney General failed to discharge his burden and consequently this proved that the actions of the police contravened Articles 1, 8A, 29 and 38 of the Constitution. Counsel contended that the court erred when it failed to make declarations to that effect.

Submissions by Mr. Mabirizi

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that there was no way the majority justices could find that public participation was sufficient in the face of violence during the process & restrictions to fundamental rights & freedoms. That participation of the people in legislation processes has historical roots & is a universally acceptable principle as elaborated by in the case of Doctors for Life International v. The Speaker of the National Assembly & ORS South Africa Constitutional Court Case No. CCT 12/05. It is an integral part of the law making process that the test for determining whether the legislature took all reasonable steps to ensure participation of the people in legislation as stated was not passed by the respondent because parliament was not reasonable in closing out people's participation and in rushing a constitutional amendment which sought to amend Articles that rotate around the sovereignty of the people.

In all fairness, parliament was obliged to consult the people in the amendments and the failure indeed vitiated the entire process. There is a strong rationale for public participation in the legislation process as pointed out in Doctors for Life (supra) by Ngobo, J & SACHS J, The rationale is to ensure that people, who are sovereign retain that sovereignty, in presence of Parliament. Mr. Mabirizi submitted that the effect of failure of public participation renders the resultant law null & void.

Attorney General's submissions

On public consultation, the Attorney General submitted that the majority Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court made a proper finding that there was public participation and consultation in the process of conceptualization and enactment of the impugned Act.

The Attorney General also argued that unlike the Constitutions of South Africa and Kenya and the County Governments Act, 2012 of Kenya, the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda did not provide a standard measure or parameters for consultative constitutional review. Rather that it recognizes various roles of people and bodies in the constitutional amendment process and in so doing, permits amendment of the Constitution in various ways as provided in Articles 259, 260, 261 and 262.

The Attorney General further submitted that other than what is contained in the 1995 Constitution and as rightly observed by the Constitutional Court, Parliament has never enacted a law to guide consultation or set parameters or standard measure against which effectiveness of consultation or public participation can be measured, be it at pre-legislative stage, legislative stage, and post legislative stage. The Attorney General observed that the only exception was in Article 90(3)(a) which gives the committees of Parliament the power to call any Minister or any person holding public office and private individuals to submit memoranda or appear before them to give evidence.

In light of this, the Attorney General submitted that there is no yardstick upon which to measure the extent of the public consultation required to validate an amendment of the Constitution. He argued further that it was dependent on Parliament to determine how best to achieve the participation objective.

The Attorney General also distinguished two cases on public consultation relied upon by the appellants. He argued that the Doctors for Life Case which provided for what to look at while gauging whether a Parliament has met the consultation or public participation requirement, was decided basing on the South Africa Constitution which had mandatory provisions under section 72 that required public participation in the law making process which is not the case in Uganda.

In relation to the case of Robert Gakuru and others v. Governor Kiambu County, Petition No. 532 of 2013, the Attorney General submitted that while it was elaborate on public participation and consultation it is limited in its application to the Ugandan setting because unlike the provisions in the Constitution of Uganda, public participation is elaborately and illustratively provided for in the Constitution of Kenya and in the County Governments Act, 2012 of Kenya. Further that these requirements were clearly stipulated in a mandatory manner in Articles 10, 94, 118, 174, 196 and 201 of the Constitution of Kenya. Furthermore, that the yardsticks to be used to measure compliance with the public participation and consultation requirements were also provided in section 87 of the County Governments Act, 2012 which is not the case for Uganda.

In the Attorney General's view, because of the different legal regime in these countries, it would be erroneous for the cited cases and standards set therein to be deemed 100% applicable to Uganda in the absence of a clear legal regime on public participation.

The above notwithstanding, the Attorney General submitted that at pages 620 – 640 Vol. 3 of the record, he detailed what the Parliamentary Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs did to comply with the requirement for public participation. He adopted the same views. The Attorney General further submitted that the law making process it is not that all persons must express their views or that they must be heard or that the hearing must be oral. Similarly, he argued, the law does not require that the proposed legislation must be brought to each and every person wherever the person might be. In his view, he argues that what was required was that reasonable steps had been taken to facilitate the said participation. In other words, that what was required was that a reasonable opportunity had been afforded to the public to meaningfully participate in the legislative process.

The Attorney General also argued that the appellants' attack on the nature of consultations in terms of quality and quantity was not factual. He argued that notices of invitation were published in the print media inviting all persons who wished to be part of the process. He argued further that fifty-four groups of persons, legal and natural, heeded the invitation, including the President of Uganda and registered political parties. The Attorney General also argued that Parliament could not deny them audience. He however argued that Parliament could not force unwilling participants to come to the committee.

It was also the Attorney General's contention that the committee operated within its powers and conducted open hearings as a means of accomplishing its mandate in relation to legislation. The Attorney General further argued there was no merit in the appellants' contention that because only seven out of 455 members adduced evidence of consultation the Act should be nullified for lack of public participation. The Attorney General submitted that an examination of the relevant Hansard clearly showed that the reports of Members of Parliament through their debating and voting was representative of the consultations carried out.

The Attorney General invited this Court to uphold the majority Judgment of the Constitutional Court that in the circumstances proper consultation was carried out.

Determination of the Court.

As a brief Background I wish to quote paragraph O.22 of the Odoki report where the Constitutional Commission made the following remarks;

"The government also faced its challenge successfully. It created and maintained the atmosphere of peace, security and freedom of expression so necessary for the success of the exercise. It left in full freedom in the organization and direction of our work. At no time did it in anyway interfere with what we were doing. The people everywhere manifested signs of tremendous growth in political maturity. They discussed issues without quarreling or fighting. We observed no hostile tensions in any of the seminars or meetings we conducted as a part of the exercise. Ugandans seems to have agreed that the constitutional making process was the critical exercise for the future peace and stability of Uganda."

The process of consultation and passing of the impugned Act was the exact opposite of the above observation.

The Magyezi bill was from the outset very controversial if what happened in parliament on 26th and 27th September, 2017 is anything to go by. Parliament was polarized. The Hon. Speaker recognized the importance of the bill and adjourned the House to allow consideration by the Parliamentary committee and consultation by members of parliament.

Unfortunately, the consultation by members of parliament was interfered with and interupted by directive by the Inspector General of Police issued by Assistant IGP Asuman Mugenyi which all the Justices of Constitutional court condemned.

I quote a passage in the judgement of Cherborion Barishaki JCC to 20 illustrate the condemnation in very strong words; -

"I must state here that I find the obnoxious directive issued by AIGP Asumani Mugenyi appalling. It does not make any legal or logical sense. The directive restricted freedom of association andmovement of Members of Parliament without any justification whatsoever.

The directive was intended to prohibit Members of Parliament fromholding joint rallies or canvassing support for certain positionsoutside their constituencies. This is unlawful. Firstly, in the currentmultiparty dispensation, most Members of Parliament belong to one party or another. They should therefore be expected to offer supportfor similar minded colleagues in their constituencies. Political parties exist to lobby the public for their causes and positions. Members of Parliament are therefore within their rights to solicit for support for their views and positions or carry out consultations not only from their constituencies but throughout the country.

Secondly, there is absolutely nothing unlawful about Members of Parliament lobbying different individuals beyond their own constituencies.

Thirdly, the directive was clearly ignorant of the fact that some Members of Parliament, such as the National Female Youth Representative, literally represent an electorate spread out all over the country. Other Members of Parliament such as representative for special interest groups also cover wide territories and regions with the possibility that they would hold joint consultative meetings with other Members of Parliament. This should have been foreseen and the directive adjusted accordingly. In my view, the directive wasrecklessly and wantonly issued without any regard for the law more specifically Article 29(2) which guarantees the freedom of everyUgandan to move freely in Uganda. Yet, it was issued, ironically, bya custodian of law enforcement.

During cross examination, AIP Asuman Mugenyi explained that their reason for the restriction was based on security intelligence that some MPs were planning to move people from their areas and cause chaos. He testified thus;

"My Lords, we had a reason and this was based on intelligence information pertaining at that time. If I am allowed to explain the genesis of the circular, my lords, we got intelligence information that some members of Parliament were planning to move people outside their constituencies to cause chaos and violence in other constituencies while consulting and as police we are mandated by the Constitution to detect and prevent crimes." There was no evidence adduced to prove that Members of Parliament were planning to cause chaos in the Country.

The directive in issue was clearly calculated to muzzle publicparticipation and debate on the proposed amendments in theoriginal Bill tabled by the Honorable Raphael Magyezi. However, theevidence presented by the Petitioners fell woefully short ofdemonstrating that this directive had that chilling effect in actualfact.

In some cases, the directive was rightly and roundly ignored while in other isolated cases such as parts of Lango and central region, at least based on the evidence on record, meetings and rallies were dispersed. Hon. Odur averred that on 24th October,2017, he with five other MPs were violently and unlawfully stopped from consulting their people and that police dispersed people who had gathered at Adyel Division in Lira District for consultation by firing live bullets and teargas inflicting severe fear in him (para(s) of his affidavit in support of the petition). Hon. Joy Atim Ongom who was part of the MPs mentioned in Hon. Odur's affidavit report that her consultation in Lira Municipality were interrupted by police with tear gas. She added that Cecilia Ogwal was beaten (see Hansard page at 53). Though isolated, this was most unfortunate. I find that my position would have been different if there was sufficient evidence to prove that throughout the country, the police unduly restricted consultative meetings thereby rendering the public participation in the Bill nugatory. I would not have hesitated to hold that there was no public consultation and participation thereby rendering the entire Bill a nullity. I do not have such evidence before me." (Underling for emphasis)

There is no doubt that this act was unconstitutional and the Attorney General conceded so. In terms of Article 137 (3) (b) already cited in this judgement, what the Constitutional court was required to do was to make a Declaration to that effect and give redress where appropriate. I do make the declaration the consequences of which are that the process in parliament following infringement of fundamental rights of not only the members of Parliament but also members of the public who might have been interested in participating in consultations vitiates the process.

3. 'Smuggling' of the motion to introduce the impugned Bill onto the order paper

Submissions by MPs

Regarding the issue of Smuggling of the motion to introduce the impugned Bill onto the order paper, counsel submitted that the Bill leading to the enactment of the impugned Act was presented in contravention of Article 94 of the Constitution and Rules 8, 17, 25, 27, 29 and 174 of the Rules of Procedure by virtue of the fact that the same was smuggled onto the order paper.

He faulted Owiny Dollo, DCJ for holding that the Speaker enjoyed wide, and almost unfettered, discretionary powers to determine the Order of Business in the House and as such no wrong was committed by the Speaker in amending the order paper to include the motion seeking leave to introduce a private member's Bill.

He contended that Rule 174 vests power to arrange the business of Parliament and the order of the same in the Business Committee. In the proviso to the said rule the Speaker is only given a prerogative to determine the order of business in Parliament. He contended that the evidence on record specifically under paragraphs 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16 of Hon. Semujju Nganda's affidavit in support of the petition demonstrates that on 19th September 2017 the Rt. Hon. Deputy Speaker assured the house that there was not going to be any ambush to MPs as far as handling the impugned Amendment Bill was concerned because there was a lot of anxiety and that the order paper will reflect the day's business. On 20th September 2017 the Rt. Hon. Deputy Speaker reassured Members that nothing would be done in secrecy since all business has to go through the Business Committee under Rule 174. However, the bill was never presented in the Business Committee for appropriate action and consideration.

He therefore argued that the Members of Parliament were taken by surprise on the 26th day of September 2017 when Rt. Hon. Speaker amended the order paper on the floor of the house to include a motion by Hon. Magyezi that sought leave to introduce a private member's Bill to amend the constitution. Efforts made by the shadow Minister of Justice and Constitutional Affairs, Hon. Medard Sseggona MP Busiro East and other MPs to raise procedural matters specifically the fact that there were other motions which had preceded this one were futile.

Counsel contended that under Rule 27 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament, the Speaker and Clerk to Parliament were enjoined to give the order paper in case of the first sitting at least 2 days before the sitting and in any other case, at least 3 hours before the sitting without fail. In Rule 29 that there must be a weekly order paper including relevant documents that shall be distributed to every Member through his/her pigeon hole and where possible, electronically. All these Rules were flagrantly violated.

Attorney General's Submissions

The Attorney General refuted the appellants' contention that the Bill from which the impugned Act emerged was smuggled into the House. He submitted that in the exercise of its legislative powers set out in Article. 91, Parliament has power to make law. Further that under Article 94(1), it had powers to make rules to regulate its own procedure, including the procedure of its committees.

The Attorney General further pointed out that under Article 94(4) the Speaker had powers to determine the order of business in parliament; and that a Member of Parliament had a right to move a private members Bill.

The Attorney General contended further that on 27th September 2017, in exercising his powers under Article 94(4), the Hon. Raphael Magyezi tabled in Parliament a motion for leave to introduce a private Members' Bill entitled, The Constitution (Amendment) (No. 2) Bill, 2017. The Attorney General submitted that the inception, notice of motion and tabling of the motion was undertaken well within the Rules. In the Attorney General's view, there was no smuggling of the Bill as alleged by the appellant.

The Attorney General also argued that there was an amendment of the Order Paper by the Speaker as authorized in Article 94 (4) and Rule 24 (Old Rules) (New Rules 25) wherein she had power to set the order of business and that under Rule 7 she presides at any sitting of the house and decides on questions of order and practice. In the Attorney General's view, the Speaker was aware of Rule 25(s) old and 24(q) new that provides for an Order of precedence and therein the Private Members Bills come before all others.

The Attorney General also asserted that the Magyezi Bill met requirement set by Rules 120 and 121 (1) which allow every Member to move a Private Members Bill. He pointed out that the bill was introduced by way of a Motion to which was attached the Proposed Bill noting that the other two Bills, that is the Nsamba and Lyomoki Bills had no attachments and one was a mere Resolution.

The Attorney General further contended that the Speaker had [under Rule (47 old) 55 new] been given written Notice of this Motion three days prior. In his view, the Speaker as the Custodian of what gets onto the Order Paper under Rule 24(Old) Rules gave a go ahead to the Magyezi Bill.

In conclusion, the Attorney General submitted that the appellants' contention that the Magyezi Bill was smuggled into proceedings of the House was therefore unfounded. He called on this Court to uphold the Constitutional Court finding that the Bill required procedure, up to its enactment.

Determination by Court

The allegation of 'smuggling' of the Magyezi bill onto the Order Paper emanate from session of the 7th sitting –first meeting of parliament held on 26th September 2017.The speaker of Parliament Ms. Rebecca Kadaga during communication from the chair, she told the members of Parliament that she was amending the order paper so as to permit those members of eligible motions to amend the communication to present them. She went further and stated that they had been demanding government to present constitutional amendment to parliament but it had failed. That she had been constrained and she could no longer hold on the members who wanted to bring their motions foe constitution amendment.

The speaker went ahead outlined motions which were eligible and had passed the test under Rule 47 and these include;

A motion for leave of parliament to introduce a constitutional amendment by Hon. Raphael Magyezi amend the constitution to provide for time within which to hold presidential, parliamentary and local government election and amend Articles 102 (b) and 183 (2) b to remove the age limit.

A motion for leave of parliament to introduce a constitutional amendment by Hon. Dr. Sam Lyomoki to amend the constitution under Article 98 to provide for a transitional term and arrangements for peaceful, smooth and democratic transition for first president under the 1995 constitution while providing immunities, exemption and privileges to same individual when they cease to be president.

3.A Notice of motion by Hon.Patrick Nsamba for a resolution of parliament urging Government to constitute a constitutional review commission to comprehensively review the constitution.

The speaker went ahead and outlined motions which were not competent and she excluded them from the order paper because they were not copied to the Clerk to Parliament or did not have a draft motion and draft bill and this include;

A motion for leave of Parliament to introduce a constitutional amendment by Hon. Mbwatekamwa to amend the constitution to remove all academic restrictions imposed in the constitution.

A motion for leave of Parliament to introduce a constitutional amendment by Hon.John Nambeshe to amend the constitution to require members of parliament to relinquish their parliamentary seats once appointed ministers.

A motion for leave of Parliament to introduce a constitutional amendment by Hon.Mbabaali Muyanja to amend the constitution to create a second chamber so that parliament constitutes two houses lower and upper chamber.

4. A motion for leave of Parliament to introduce a constitutional amendment by Hon.Muyanja Ssenyonga to amend the constitution to make provision for the issue of federal.

5. A motion for leave of Parliament to introduce a private members bill by Hon.Dr Sam Lyomoki entitles the Museveni succession transition and immunities bill 2017.

The above amendment of the order paper by the speaker was challenged by the leader of opposition (Ms. Winfred Kiiza) because the Deputy speaker who presided over the 19th and 20th sitting of a parliament had promised members of parliament that they would not be surprised and ambushed. The Leader of opposition was questioned by the speaker, if she was questioning the powers of the speaker. From above it can be seen that each of the Members of Parliament was seeking leave by way of motion to amend the constitution. Three motions were ready and motion were not.

The speaker of parliament is mandated under 25(1) and (2) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament 2017 to determine Order of business in Parliament. It provides that: -

25. Order of business

The speaker shall determine the order of business of the House and shall give priority to Government business.

Subject to sub rule (1) the business for each sitting as arranged by the business committee in consultation with the speaker shall be set out in order paper for each sitting

It is clear from above that order paper which contains business for each sitting is prepared by Business committee with consultation of the speaker.

I find that the speaker has powers to determine the order of business and even amend the same. As to whether or not the speaker did so with consultation of the business committee of Parliament is an internal matter of the workings of parliament in which court is not going to interfere.

Denying MPs adequate time to debate and consider the impugned Bill.

Submissions by the MPs

In regard to denying MPs adequate time to debate and consider the impugned Bill, counsel submitted that there was overwhelming evidence on record to show that Members of Parliament were not accorded sufficient time to debate on the report of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee notwithstanding the fact that this was a matter of great 20 national importance.

He contended that immediately after the report was "tabled", a resolution was hastily passed suspending rule 201 (2) of the Rules of parliament which required a minimum of three sittings. Each Member was given only 3 minutes within which to make their submissions on the report and hard copies of the said Report were not duly tabled before the House as provided under Rule 201(1) of the Rules of Procedure.

Counsel for the Appellants further contended that the actions of the speaker of Parliament to close the debate on the impugned bill before each and every MP could debate and present their views on the bill was in violation of Rule 133 (3) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament.

Attorneys General's submissions

The Attorney General submitted that Rule 80 (2) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament provides that if the question of closure is agreed to by a majority, the motion which was being discussed when the closure motion was moved shall be put forthwith without further discussion. He argued that the requirement is that the majority have to agree to the closure and that this was done in. the Attorney General further argued that there was no requirement that each and every Member of Parliament must debate before closure.

He called on this Court to find that the Constitutional Court rightly arrived at the decision they made and prayed that this Court upholds the same.

Determination by Court

The time given to each Member of Parliament to speak is determined by the speaker. Rule 69 (11) of Rules of Procedure of the Parliament 2017, provide "The speaker may, on the commencement of the proceedings of the day or on any motion, announce the time limit he or she is allowing each member contributing to debate and may direct a member to his seat or her seat who has spoken for period given"

Under Rule 70 Close of debate provides that "No member may speak on any question after it has been put by the speaker, that is after the voices of both Ayes and Noes have been given on it"

It can be seen from the Hansard that the majority of the members who had an opportunity to address the House were timed out. Out of 452 Member of Parliament only 124 members of parliament contributed or debated on the constitution (Amendment) Bill No.2 of 2017 leaving out others notably the leader of opposition pleading for time to debate. The time given for debate and closure of the same is determined by the speaker in accordance with Rules 69 and 70. I can only comment that the debate was rushed leaving out members of Parliament who still wanted to express their views yet in the first place it was the speaker who had sent them to gather the views of the electorate in accordance with Article 1 of the constitution. There was also no time for debate on other aspects of the Bill relating to electoral reforms as recommended by this court but that again is prerogative of the speaker and court cannot interfere.

4. Suspension of MPs

Submissions by MPs

On the Suspension of some members of parliament and other illegalities committed by the speaker during the Parliamentary sitting of 18th December 2017, counsel submitted that on the 18th December 2017 when parliament convened to consider the report of the legal and parliamentary affairs committee, three honourable Members of Parliament raised two pertinent points of law to which the speaker declined to give her ruling. Instead at the time of adjourning the house arbitrarily suspended the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th and 5th Appellants and other Members of Parliament from parliament in contravention of Article 1, 28(1), 42, 44 (c) and 94 of the Constitution.

Submissions by Mr. Mabirizi

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that it was unconstitutional for the speaker to suspend members of parliament for several sittings after stating that the bill was dealing with the sovereignty of the people. This in a way disenfranchised not only the members but also their voters. Contrary to court's finding the right of members of parliament to represent people is absolute and stands taller than normal rights, it did not fault the speaker for suspending the MPs. Mr. Mabirizi contended that the constitutional court's justification for suspension of members of parliament at was only based on morals & emotions as opposed to sound constitutional principles. Eviction of a member from the house is not an event as the Speaker did it. It is a process starting with naming for the suspension to begin in the next sitting excluding the one in which he has been suspended and then he is given an opportunity to write a regret. Indeed, one of the purposes of prohibition of an instant exclusion is to enable member table a formal application for review.

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that evicting members from the same sitting in which they were suspended robbed them of their right to request for a reversal. In Uganda Law Society & Anor V. AG, CCCPS NO.2 & 8/02, Kavuma JCC held that "…It is unacceptable that any free democratic society in the modern world, which jealously protects fundamental human rights of all, which Uganda's society is, should ever experience a situation where even one life of an individual can be terminated by a court of first instance without at least a second opinion on whether or not such a life should be terminated.".

Submissions by Attorney General

The Attorney General contended that Rule 7 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament provided for the general power of the Speaker. He argued that under Rule 7(2), the Speaker had an obligation to preserve order and decorum of the House. Further that Rules 77 and 79(2) give the Speaker powers to order any members whose conduct is grossly disorderly to withdraw from the house. Furthermore, that under Rule 80, the Speaker is permitted to name the member who is misbehaving and that under Rule 82 the Speaker has power to suspend the member from the service of the House.

The Attorney General submitted that the Constitutional Court rightly found that the Rules conferred upon the Speaker of Parliament the mandate to order a Member of Parliament whose conduct has become disorderly and disruptive to withdraw from Parliament and the Speaker properly did so.

The Attorney General further pointed out that once a Member who conducted him/herself in a disorderly manner was suspended, Rule 89 required that such a member had to immediately withdraw from the precincts of the House until the end of the suspension period. The Attorney General also argued that Rule 88 (4) gives guidance on the period of suspension of a member and that it requires that a Member who is suspended on the first occasion in a session shall be suspended for 3 sittings. The Attorney General placing reliance on Rule 88(4) argued that the 3 sittings for which the member was suspended started running from computed from the next sitting of Parliament.

In light of his submission, the Attorney General submitted that the Appellant misconstrued the import of Rule 88 (4) in as far as it applied to the circumstances in this case. He argued that going by the Appellant's arguments, it would be absurd that a Member who was found by the Speaker to have conducted himself in a disorderly manner in the House and is therefore suspended from the services of the House, is then allowed to remain in the House for the day's sitting.

As far as the right to fair hearing was concerned, the Attorney General submitted that Rule 86(2) of the Rules of Procedure of parliament provide that the decision of the Speaker or Chairperson shall not be open to appeal and shall not be reviewed by the house, except upon a substantive motion made after notice which in the instant case was not made by the suspended Members.

Regarding the contention that the speaker while suspending the Members was out of her chair, the Attorney General submitted that this was not true. In support of his contention, he referred to the hansard of 18th December 2017 [at page 726 of the record] of appeal where the speaker said

"... I suspend the proceedings up to 2 o 'clock but in the meantime, the following members are suspended…"

The Attorney General further submitted that the reason for suspension was at page 731 of the record of appeal.

The Attorney General submitted that under Article 257 (a) of the Constitution as well as under Rule 2(1) of the Rules of procedure of Parliament define, 'sitting' is defined to include a period during which Parliament is continuously sitting without adjournment and a period during which it is in Committee. Furthermore, that Rule 20 of the rules of Procedure of Parliament provide that the Speaker may at any time suspend a sitting or adjourn the house.

In light of this, the Attorney General contended that the Speaker only suspended the sitting to 2.00 O' clock and did not adjourn the house, hence there was a continuous sitting and therefore she was not functus officio.

In conclusion on this point, the Attorney General submitted that the Speaker properly acted within her mandate to suspend Members of Parliament for their unparliamentarily conduct. Further that there is no evidence to show that the suspended Members of Parliament moved a substantive motion challenging their suspension. He prayed that the findings of the Justices of the Constitutional Court be confirmed.

Determination by Court

There were two suspensions by the speaker, the first being on Wednesday, 27 September 2017, where by the speaker suspended twenty-five members for gross misconduct which ranged from carrying a firearm into chambers of Parliament and unruly conduct which included failure to listen to the speaker in silence, standing and climbing on chairs and tables and dressing in manner not appropriate. The speaker clearly explained to the members the above reasons before suspending them under Rule (80) (2). This first suspension is what the constitutional court dwelt on and I cannot fault them for finding that the Speaker was right to act the way she did.

There was a second suspension on Monday, 18 December 2017, whereby the Speaker suspended 6 members of parliament who included Hon. Ibrahim Ssemujju, Allan Ssewanyana, Gerald Karuhanga, Jonathan Odur, Mubarak Munyagwa and Antnony Akol without assigning any reason for their suspension.

I am aware that the Rules of Procedure of Parliament clearly show the procedure to take to challenge the Speaker's ruling which is by motion. The members should have taken that course of action and this court cannot intervene where this specific remedy is available and members omitted to take it.

6. Failure to close doors to the chambers at the time of voting the Bill.

Submissions by MPs

On the Failure to close the doors to the chambers at the time of voting on the bill, counsel submitted that failure by the Speaker of Parliament to close all doors to the Chambers to Parliament before voting on the 2nd reading of the Bill and during voting was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 2, 8A, 44 (c), 79, and 94 of the Constitution and rule 98(4) of the Rules of Parliament which fact was also admitted by the clerk to Parliament in her affidavit. According to counsel the rationale of this Rule 98 (4) is to bar Members who had not participated in the debate to enter Parliament and in decision making. The speaker however not only left the doors wide open but called for members who were outside the chambers during the time of debate to enter and vote.

Counsel therefore submitted that the Constitutional Court erred in law in holding that no evidence was availed as to how failing to close all the doors during voting made the enactment of the Act to be unconstitutional and that the rules of procedure were not made in vain. They must at all material times be obeyed and respected save where they have been duly suspended and that noncompliance renders the entire process and the outcome thereof illegal.

Submissions by Mr. Mabirizi

Mr. Mabirizi submitted failure to close the doors during the roll call & tally voting was well pleaded. Closing the doors was not at the speaker's discretion as the majority justices held looking at the provisions of Article 89(1) of the Constitution which requires "voting in a manner prescribed by rules of procedure made by Parliament under Article 94 of this Constitution."

Submissions by the Attorney General

The Attorney General submitted that Rule 98(4) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament provide that the Speaker shall direct the doors to be locked and the bar drawn until after the roll call vote has taken place. Further that the Speaker in not doing stated [at pages 373 of the record citing Hansard dated Wednesday 20th December 2017] that:

"…ideally I was supposed to have closed the doors under Rule 98(4). However, that exists in a situation where all members have got seats. Therefore, it is not possible to lock them out and that is why I did not lock the doors…."

According to the Attorney General, this action by the Speaker was validated by Rule 8(1) where the Speaker can make a decision on any matter "having regard to the practices of the House..."

The Attorney General further pointed out that under Rule 8 (2) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament the Speaker's ruling under sub rule (1) becomes part of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament until such a time, when a substantive amendment to these rules is made in respect to the ruling. The Attorney General contended that the action taken by the Speaker not to close the doors of the House during voting was within the ambit of these powers. The Respondent therefore submits that the court properly arrived at the decision they made.

Determination by Court

By unanimously decision, the Constitutional Court found that the Speaker gave a sound reason on her failure to observe this rule and this what Hon. Kakuru Kenneth JCC, stated:-

"The Speaker explained why the rule could not be complied with. I find that voting when the doors were open offended the Rule of Parliament cited above, however this did not in any way violate the Constitution and vitiate the enactment of the impugned Act. The Hansard of Wednesday, 20th December 2017 at pages 5264-5269 indicate that all Members of Parliament who were present and wanted to vote, voted and there is no evidence to the contrary. I find no merit in this ground. The issue is resolved in the negative."

I concur with the Constitutional Court that it was hard for Parliament to observe this rule due to space and enormous numbers of the members who could not fit in the chamber. There was also no suggestion that the voting was compromised in any way.

7. Discrepancies in the speaker's certificate of compliance and the Constitutional (Amendment) Bill.

Submissions by the MPs

On the Discrepancies in the speaker's certificate of compliance and the Constitutional (Amendment) Bill, counsel contended that the Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the validity of the entire impugned Act was not fatally affected by the discrepancies and variances between the Speaker's Certificate of compliance and the Bill at the time of Presidential assent to the Bill.

Counsel submitted that the Speaker's certificate of compliance was materially defective, ineffectual and it rendered the presidential assent a nullity. The requirement of a valid certificate of compliance under Article 263 (2) of the Constitution is couched in mandatory terms.

It is apparent that the speaker's certificate of compliance which accompanied the impugned Bill was but full of glaring inconsistencies and discrepancies. Whereas the certificate clearly indicated that the impugned bill not only amended Articles 61, 102, 104 and 183 of the constitution, the bill itself indicated that parliament had amended in addition to the said provisions; Articles 105, 181, 289, 291 and in fact created another provision to wit, 289A.

Counsel for the appellants vehemently averred that the discrepancies and variations which appeared between the speaker's certificate of compliance and the constitutional (amendment) bill were gross both in content and form; thus in contravention of Article 263 (2) of the Constitution and S.16 of the Acts of Parliament Act and rendered not only the presidential assent to the bill a nullity but even the resultant 10 Act.

However, the Constitutional court wrongly concluded that the discrepancies only affected those provisions forming part of the Constitution (Amendment) (No. 2) Bill, 2017 amending Articles 77, 105, 181, 289, 289A, and 291 of the Constitution which were not included in the speaker's certificate; and, not the entire Act.

Counsel submitted that the Constitutional Court misdirected itself on the legality of the speaker's certificate of compliance in light of the Supreme Court authority of Ssemwogerere & Anor v Attorney General; Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 2002 where court held that:

"In the case of amendment and repeal of the constitution, the Speaker's certificate is a necessary part of the legislative process and any bill which does not comply with the condition precedent to the provision is and remains, even though it receives the Royal Assent, invalid and ultra vires."

While citing the foregoing position in the instant matter, Owiny – Dollo DCJ, made held that:

"This requirement, in my view, is not only about the issuance of a certificate of compliance; but is equally about its content, as is provided for in the Format for such certificate in the Schedule to the Acts of Parliament Act"

Counsel averred that the highlighted inconsistencies were deliberate and intended to subvert and fraudulently circumvent constitutional provisions which required for a referendum for the amendment to be valid under Article 263 (1) of the constitution.

Submission by Mr. Mabirizi

He submitted that the presence of the purported certificate of compliance is not conclusive on its validity or compliance with the constitution

Submission by the Attorney General

The Attorney General refuted the appellant's contention that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the validity of the entire impugned Act was not fatally affected by the discrepancy and variances between the Speaker's certificate of compliance and the Bill at the time of Presidential Assent. He further refuted the Appellant's contention that the Speaker's Certificate of compliance was materially defective, ineffectual and that this rendered the presidential assent a nullity.

The Attorney General submitted that the Constitutional Court came to the right finding in holding that the validity of the entire impugned Act was not fatally affected by the discrepancy and variances between the Speaker's certificate of compliance and the Bill at the time of Presidential Assent.

The Attorney General submitted that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court individually dealt with the discrepancy and variances between the Speaker's certificates of compliance and found that the discrepancies were not fatal. In the Attorney General's view, majority learned Justices came to the right conclusion in holding that the discrepancy in the Speaker's certificate of compliance and the Bill 5 was not fatal.

The Attorney General further contended that it was not in dispute that the Bill that was sent to the President for assent was accompanied by a certificate of compliance as required in Article 263 (2) (a) of the Constitution. He further argued that The Certificate however indicated that four (4) Articles of the Constitution were being amended and yet ten (10) Articles of the Constitution were amended. He noted that the Articles that were indicated in the Certificate were Articles 61, 102, 104 and 183 while the Articles that had been amended but excluded were Articles 77,105,181,289 and 291.

The Attorney General submitted that that the decision of the majority Justices in upholding the validity of the certificate of the Speaker was a recognition that the certificate complied with the form prescribed in section 16 (2) and Part VI of the second schedule of the Acts of Parliament Act Cap 2 since the Articles that were being amended were enumerated 20 thereunder.

The Attorney General further submitted that in holding that the other Articles that had been amended but not included in the Speaker's Certificate to be unconstitutional, the Constitutional Court rightly relied on the severance principle as espoused in Article 2(2) of the Constitution.

Determination by Court

Certificate of compliance and Presidential assent are mandatory requirement that must be met before any Bill can become law. See Article 91 and 263 of the Constitution.

Article 263(2) (a) provides that: -

(2) A bill for the amendment of this Constitution which has been passed in accordance with this Chapter shall be assented to by thePresident only if— (a) it is accompanied by a certificate of the Speaker that the provisions of this Chapter have been complied with in relation to it; and

Parliament passed the Constitution (Amendment) (No. 2) Bill, 2017 which in fact amended Articles 61, 102, 104,183, 77, 105, 181, 289, 289A, and 291 of the Constitution. The speaker of Parliament prepared certificate of compliance in which she included Articles 61, 102, 104 and 183 of the Constitution as the only ones amended and excluded Articles 77, 105, 181, 289, 289A, and 291 of the Constitution

The speaker was supposed to send the entire bill with all Articles amended and passed by parliament to the President. The majority of constitutional court justices found her action to beirregular and Hon. Justice Cheborion, JCC stated that;

"There is no doubt in my mind that the exclusion by the Speaker, ofArticles 77,105,181,289 and 291, from the Certificate ofCompliance accompanying the Constitution (Amendment) Bill sentfor Presidential assent is fatal. It is a mandatory requirement under Article 263 that must be met in respect of each amended Article ofthe Constitution and cannot be waived in any circumstance."

In Paul Semwogerere & Others vs Attorney General (supra), JusticeOder held that "It is my view that the Constitutional proceduralrequirements for the enactment of legislation for amendment of the Constitution are mandatory conditions, which cannot be waived by Parliament as mere procedural or administrative requirements. They are conditions to be complied with. Mandatory Constitutionalrequirements cannot simply be waived by Parliament under its own procedural rules".

This omission per se invalidates Sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 on grounds that the Speaker of Parliament did not certify that Articles 77, 105, 181, 289 and 291 had been amended in strict compliance with the provisions of the Constitution. As already determined above, the purported amendments in respect of these Articles were fundamentally flawed and invalid for other reasons already highlighted.

However, I will hasten to add that the Speaker's Certificate is not invalid as asserted by the Petitioners. The only logical result of the omission of certain clauses in the certificate is that the omitted Articles were not validly amended."

The learned justice properly explained the importance of certificate of compliance and clearly stated it is mandatory requirement under Article 263 of the Constitution. This position was stated by this court in case of Paul Semwogerere & Others vs Attorney General (supra). With due respect to the majority of the Constitutional Court justices, once it was found that the certificate of compliance was fatal it is contradiction to conclude that it was valid. I therefore find there was no valid certificate of compliance prepared by the speaker.

8. Illegal assent to the Bill by the President

Submissions by the MPs

On the Illegal assent to the bill by the President, counsel submitted that the act of the President assenting to the bill without scrutinizing the same to ascertain its propriety was in contravention of Articles 91(1) (2) and (3), and 263 of the Constitution and Section 9 of the Acts of Parliament Act. He also relied on the decision of the Supreme Court in the Ssemwogerere case (supra) where court held that;

"The presidential assent is an integral part of law making process. Under Article 262(2), the Constitution commands the President, to assent only if the specified conditions are satisfied. The command is mandatory, not discretionary. It does not allow for discretion in the President to assent without the Speaker's certificate of compliance."

He therefore submitted that the constitutional duty imposed on the President requires him to scrutinize the certificate of compliance and the accompanying Bill as to their regularity before appending his signature.

Submissions by Mr. Mabirizi

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that presidential assent is an integral part of a law making process & any defect therein renders the law a nullity. S.9 (1) of The Acts of Parliament Act, provides that "The President shall, subject to Article 91 or 262(263) of the Constitution, assent to the bill presented to him."

That any disparity between a certificate & any other related document, invalidates it as it was in Wakayima & Anor V. Kasule, CA EPA NO. 50/16. In light of the disparity between the Hansard, the final bill and the Certificate, the president would have done more before he could assent. That the president was not "guided by considerations of reasonableness, good faith, honesty and diligence" in assenting to the bill since the purported speaker's certificate was not a certificate at all.

That the certificate from the electoral commission is a mandatory requirement whose absence invalidated the act as held in SSEMWOGERERE & ANOR V. AG, by Mulenga, JSC, even if the president assented, the assent does not validate the act which flouted.

That passing of a constitutional amendment act is not only about the majority numbers, it is also about the constitutional due process & integrity. That the amendment process was a sham & an imitation short of any validity.

Submissions by the Attorney General

The Attorney General invited Court to reject the assertion by the Appellants and uphold the findings of the majority that the discrepancy and variances between the Speaker's certificate of compliance and the Bill at the time of Presidential Assent was not fatal to the Bill

Determination by the court

Having held that there was no valid certificate of compliance it follows that there was nothing valid to assent to. I find that there was no valid assent to the Bill by the president.

9.Failure to comply with the 14 days sitting between the 1st reading and the 2nd reading.

Submissions by ULS

Counsel faults the majority learned Justices for finding that the passing of the Act without observing the 14 days between the 2nd and 3rd reading contravened the Constitution but did not find the contravention fatal that this was not a correct approach. When the clauses in the Bill requiring 14 days separation were passed at third reading they became part of the Act. However, Article 260(1) states that such Bill shall not be taken as passed unless the votes at the second and third reading is by fourteen days

In the ordinary meaning of the words "a bill shall not be taken as passed, means that the Bill will not make it to 3rd reading where the House does not comply with the 14 days.

Having amended Article 1 of the Constitution by infection, the proper course was to separate the two votes at second and third reading by 14 days. Thereafter it would be referred to referendum. It is irrelevant that one year later the court declares some of the provisions unconstitutional. Each of the two arms of government namely the Judiciary and the Legislature has its own functions and responsibilities. The one for the legislature is to ensure that there is a 14 days' separation of the two votes. The legislature cannot sit back and say, "These provisions will be struck down by the Constitutional Court; there is therefore no need for us to separate the two sittings with 14 days". The constitutional provisions must be complied with. It cannot be left to speculation what will happen in future.

Article 260(1) is clear that a bill [not some provisions of a bill] "shall not be taken as passed unless…. the votes on the second and third reading……separated by at least fourteen days…."

The motions of passing it at third reading and sending it to the President for assent was all in vain. The bill remained and remains what it was- a Bill. I submit that the court gives effect to the words "shall not be taken as passed" and holds that the failure to separate the two sittings is fatal to the Act. The Act cannot be validated and given Constitutional cover when it never passed. That means validating a constitutional illegality.

Submissions by Mr. Mabirizi

Mr. Mabirizi it was mandatory for the speaker to separate the 2nd & 3rd

5 readings with 14 sitting days of parliament. By unanimously deciding that the Act amended Articles 1,2 & 260 of the Constitution, had the justices keenly looked at the language of the constitution which uses the word 'Act' as opposed to the word 'Section', they would have not saved any part of the law. Article 257(1)(a) provides that "Act of Parliament" means a law made by Parliament;" it does not define it as a section, subsection or part of the law made by Parliament.

Mabirizi relied on the authority of SSEKIKUBO V. AG, CHOWDHARY V.UEB SCCA No. 27/10 and KASIRYE V. BAZIGATTIRAWO, CAEPA No.03/16, where Court held that it was evident that the voting could not take place without separating the sittings with 14 sitting days.

Submissions by the Attorney General

The Attorney General refuted the appellant's contention that the Constitutional Court erred in holding that the failure to separate the second and third seating by 14 days was not fatal. He further refuted the appellant's submissions that the failure to submit a Certificate of the Electoral Commission envisaged in Article 263 (2) (b) invalidated the whole Act.

The Attorney General submitted that the issues of observance of the 14 days sitting between the second and third reading as well as the failure to submit a certificate of the Electoral Commission were ably determined by the Constitutional Court. In support of his contention he relied on the Judgments of Cheborion, JCC and Owiny-Dollo, DCJ.

He submitted that the majority learned Justices came to the right conclusion in holding that the non-observance of the 14 days sitting as well as the failure to accompany the Speaker's certificate of compliance and the Bill was not fatal.

He further argued that the contents of the original Bill that was presented to Parliament did not contain any provision that required the separation of the second and third sittings of Parliament by 14 days. Further that in the same vein, the Bill did not contain any provision the amendment of which required its ratification by the people of Uganda through a referendum, thereby necessitating the issuance of a certificate of the Electoral Commission.

He further pointed out that as the learned Justices found, it is only the amendments that were proposed during the Committee stage that had an infectious effect on Articles 1, 8A and 260 of the Constitution. Thus, that having found that the amendments that were proposed during the Committee stage that had an infectious effect on Articles 1, 8A and 260 of the Constitution and therefore null and void, the learned Justices were right to apply the severance principle and severed those Articles that offended the Constitution from those whose enactment would not require the separation of the second and third reading by 14 days as well as those ratifications of such a decision through a referendum.

He invited Court to reject the assertion by the Appellant and uphold the findings of the majority Justices. Determination by the Court

The majority of the Justices of Constitutional Court found that sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 required fourteen days' separation between the second and third readings followed by approval in a referendum. On the other hand, Sections 1,3,4,7 and 9 which did not amend any of the Articles covered by Articles 260, 261 and 263 did not require the second and third readings of the Bill to be separated by fourteen days.

The contention of the appellants is that failure to observe the constitutional requirement renders the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 nullity. While the argument of the Attorney General is that the two sets of laws were severable. I deal with the principle in this judgement but it suffices to state that the Act was passed as one and the original bill lost it originality at the Committee stage when the amendments which required 14 sitting days of Parliament between the 2nd and 3rd reading were introduced. Upon introduction of this provisions Parliament was bound to observe Article 263 of the constitution which require the fourteen sitting days between 2nd and 3rd reading of the Bill.

Debating in absence of Opposition Leader

Mr. Mabirizi contended that the absence of leader of the opposition, opposition chief whip & other opposition members & allowing ruling party members to sit on opposition side was well pleaded without any rebuttal That parliament was not properly constituted in absence of the leader in opposition.

Mr. Mabirizi argued that the reasons given by the Constitutional Court for justification of proceeding without opposition have no constitutional basis since The fear that parliament may be taken at ransom by opposition when a decision is made that it is not properly constituted is without any legal basis. It actually goes against the very purpose of multiparty democracy which is to promote tolerance of divergent minority views as opposed to a single party system which is prohibited in the Constitution.

Submissions by the Attorney General

The Attorney General submitted that Rule 24 of the rules of parliament enacted pursuant to Article 88 of the Constitution provides that the quorum for the business of parliament shall be one third of all Members of Parliament entitled to vote. In his view, it followed that the business of parliament can go on in the absence of the leader of opposition and opposition Members of Parliament as long as there is the requisite quorum in Parliament and under Article 94 of the Constitution, Parliament may act notwithstanding a vacancy in its membership. Determination by the Court

On this issue, Justice Owiny Dollo, DCJ had this to say:-

"The evidence regarding the absence of the Leader of Opposition when certain proceedings took place is quite interesting. When the Speaker ruled that she should sit down, the Hon. Leader of Opposition took offence, and on her own volition, walked out of the Chamber of Parliament. I do not understand why anyone should blame the Speaker for the Leader of Opposition's free willed choice to evacuate herself from the Chambers of Parliament. If every time a Member walks out in protest, the Speaker must suspend proceedings, I can envisage a situation where Parliament would always be held at ransom; thus paralyzing the work of Parliament."

The rest of the Justices of the Constitutional court were in full agreement with DCJ Owiny Dollo. The Constitutional Court rightly found that leader of Opposition on her own volition exited the House. The speaker's stance to proceed in her absence was the correct one.

11. Crossing the Floor of Parliament

Mr. Mabirizi submitted the speaker was estopped from allowing members to cross the floor yet she had punished others for doing the same. The fact of crossing the floor was not in issue and members did not cross for purposes of voting as found by Justice Musoke & Barishaki, JJCC hence Barishaki, JCC's call for a video was not required. That contrary to what Justice Kasule, JCC held the powers of the speaker do not involve violating the Administration of Parliament Act and Rules that prohibit crossing the floor.

He submitted that it applied to Parliament, the Speaker cannot exercise her general power is the face of clear provisions Rule 9 which prescribes sitting arrangements and Rule 82(1)(b) providing that "During a sitting— a Member shall not cross the floor of the House or move around unnecessarily;" That the finding that no evidence was adduced that the crossing prejudiced any members was unexpected of a constitutional court in light of the above stated constitutional provisions and Rules of Parliament which call for Members of Parliament to be accountable to the electorate. Mabirizi argued that if there is no prejudice in casual crossing of the floor, why is it prohibited and punishable?

Therefore, Justices Musoke & Barishaki, JJCC were wrong to assume that the point in issue before them was actual switching of political sides yet it was a breach of rules of procedure because if it was membership, the right court would be the high court and not the constitutional court.

Submissions by the Attorney General

On this point, the Attorney General submitted that Rule 9 (1) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament obligated the speaker to as far as possible reserve a sit for each Member of Parliament. Further that Rule 9(4) on the other hand obligates that speaker to ensure that each Member has a comfortable sit in Parliament.

The Attorney General submitted that since the members of the opposition walked out leaving empty seats, the Speaker was justified in the circumstances to permit Members of Parliament to sit on the available sits in the chambers of Parliament. The Attorney General further argued that embers taking up available sits as had been directed by the speaker did not amount to them joining the opposition and did not contravene any rules of procedure of parliament and therefore the Justices of the Constitutional Court rightly found so.

In light of his submissions above, the Attorney General submitted that the majority learned Justices of the Constitutional Court did not err in law and fact when they held that entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda (and the Rules of Procedure of Parliament) and pray that court finds as such.

Determination by the Court

On this issue, Justice Cheborion, JCC had this to say:-

"It has not been proved that by inviting Members of Parliament to sit on the seats left vacant by the opposition members of Parliament, who had stormed out of Parliament, the Speaker in essence allowed Members of the Ruling Party to Cross to the Opposition. In my view "crossing the floor" of Parliament must be with the intention of joining the Opposition or otherwise as envisaged in Article 83 of the Constitution. I am of the considered view that even if members crossed the floor that would not render the Act unconstitutional."

I concur with the unanimous decision by the Constitutional court that permitting members from Ruling party to sit on Opposition side did not any way amount to crossing the floor. Crossing is a mental and not a physical and there was no suggestion that after that particular sitting members had changed parties.

12. Signing of the Report by Non-Committee Members

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that there was ample evidence that members who did not participate in committee proceedings signed the report. The majority justices misconstrued the law & acted casually in failing to nullify the report signed by members who never participated in the proceedings of the committee. Rule 187(2) of the Rules of Procedure relied on by Barishaki JCC to find that the committee had quorum does not apply because the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee is not a select committee. Select committees are set up under Rule186 and they are temporary Committees. That the legal and parliamentary Affairs Committee is a sectoral Committee established under Rule 183(1) & 2(g). Contrary to the justices stated members' minimum, under Rule 184(1), the minimum number for a sectoral committee is. Had the justices keenly looked at Article 90(2) & (3) of The Constitution, they would not have treated the matter the way they did.

Mr. Mabirizi submitted the majority justices erred in relying on Article 94(3) which does not apply to committees of parliament because Article 94(3) deals with the entire Parliament and not Committees which are provided for under Article 90. Article 257(1)(u) provides "Parliament" means the Parliament of Uganda;" and does not include committees. The compliant before court was whether it was in line with the Constitution for members who never participated in the proceedings of the committee to sign a report but they veered off the rail when they started going into issues of vacancy and participation of none-members which were not in issue.

Submissions by the Attorney General

On this point, the Attorney General submitted that the Committees of Parliament are provided for under Article 90 of the Constitution and Rule 183(1) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament. Further, that Article 94(3) of the Constitution provides that the presence or the participation of a person not entitled to be present or to participate in the proceedings of Parliament shall not by itself invalidate those proceedings. Furthermore, that Rule 184 (1) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament provides that each Sectoral Committee of Parliament shall consist of not less than fifteen Members not more than thirty Members selected from among Members of Parliament.

The Attorney General further placed reliance on Rule 201 (1) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament which provides that a report of the Committee shall be signed and initialed by at least one third of all the Members of the Committee. The Attorney General argued that the Members who constituted the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee were listed in the report of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee and were 26 members.

In light of his submissions above, he contended that the requirement of the law in regard to quorum and non-validation of the report were considered and correctly adjudicated by the Constitutional Court and prayed that this Court upholds the same.

The Attorney General submitted that in his affidavit in rejoinder to the affidavit of Jane Kibirige, the Clerk to Parliament, Mr. Mabirizi submitted that that the report of Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee was not valid since it had delayed in the Committee beyond 45 days contrary to Rule 128 (2) and 140 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament.

The Attorney General submitted that it was crucial to note from the outset that the appellant did not specifically plead this issue in his 10 petition but only brought it up in an affidavit in rejoinder. According to the Attorney General, this explains why he could not respond to it.

The Attorney General further argued that this also constituted a departure from pleadings and should be disregarded.

Without prejudice to his submission above, the Attorney General submitted that Rule 128 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament provides that whenever a Bill is read the first time in the House, it is referred to the appropriate Committee for consideration, and the Committee shall report to the house within 45 days.

He further pointed out that Rule 140 (1) provides that no Bill shall be in the Committee for more than 45 days. Further that Rule 140 (2) provides that if a committee finds itself unable to complete consideration of any Bill referred to it, the Committee may seek extra time from the Hon. Speaker

The Attorney General submitted that the basis of the appellant's argument was that the Bill was referred to the Committee on the 3rd of October, 2017 and the 45 days run out on 17th November 2017 yet the committee reported to the House on 14th December, 2017 after expiry of 45 days.

The Attorney General submitted that had this matter been raised in time, he would have led evidence to prove that the committee acted well within the provisions of Rules 128 and 140 of the Rules of procedure of Parliament in that whereas the Bill was referred to the committee on 3rd October 2017, the house was sent on recess on 4th October 2017. Further that during recess, no parliamentary business is transacted without leave of the Speaker, therefore, the days could not start running until the leave was obtained.

The Attorney General further pointed out that by a letter dated 29th October 2017 the Chairperson duly applied for leave, which leave was granted by the Rt. Hon Speaker on the 3rd November 2017. That both letters are annexed. Further that the 45 days started running from the 3rd November 2017. In the Attorney General's view, this meant that the days would expire on 16th December 2017. Thus, the Committee reported on the 14th December 2017 two days before the expiry of the 45 days period.

He added further that in any event none compliance with the 45 days' rule does not vitiate proceedings on a Bill. He placed reliance on Rule 140 which provides that where extra time is granted, or upon expiry of the extra time granted under sub rule 2, the House shall proceed with the Bill without any further delay.

The Attorney General submitted that the report of the committee was duly presented to the whole House within the period stipulated under Rules 128 and 140 and alternatively, if it delayed, which is denied, the delay did not vitiate or invalidate the enactment of the constitutional amendment Act No.2 of 2018.

Determination by the Court

This matter was first raised by Hon Ssekikubo shortly after the chairperson of the committee on legal and a parliamentary Affairs was presenting the majority report of the committee. He noted that two Hon members of Parliament, namely Hon Lilly Akello and Hon Akampurura Prossy who signed the report of the majority were members of committee of Defence and Internal Affairs and that they were brought as mercenaries to append their signatures. The speaker later on the evening told members that the said members had been designated to that committee by the Government chip whip on the 29th November 2017.

It is on record that the Constitution (Amendment) bill 2017 was read for the first time on 3rd October 2017 by the Hon. Raphael Magyezi and subsequently referred to committee on legal and a parliamentary affairs for scrutiny .The committee started its work without the effort and input of the said members of parliament .It was almost two months when they were sent to committee by the Government Chief whip and it was correctly argued by the Hon Ssekikubo on floor of parliament that these 20 members were sent there to sign the report and form the majority.

The Constitutional court justices had their take on this and held that;

The Hon. Justice Owiny Dollo, DCJ stated that "In the same vein, thefact that people who were known not to be members of the LegalCommittee signed the report is not fatal to the process; though it was irregular. First is that, on the evidence, they did not participate at the hearings; but merely signed after the conclusion of the proceedings. Second is that even if they are removed from the list of those who signed the report, there would still be sufficient members who attended the Committee propceedings, and signed the report. Lastly, Article 94 of the Constitution covers this type of situation, since it provides as follows:

"(3) The presence or the participation of a person not entitled to be present or to participate in the proceedings of Parliament shall not, by itself, invalidate those proceedings."

The Hon. Justice Kasule, JCC Stated that;

"It was not clearly established at what stage these members beganparticipating in the deliberations of the committee. Some of thesemembers, it was asserted, signed the report of the committee. This, if true, was irregular. However, Article 94(3) of the Constitution provides that the presence or the participation of a person not entitled to be present or to participate in the proceedings of Parliament shall not, by itself, invalidate those proceedings.

Accordingly, the proceedings of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee cannot be invalidated because of the signing of the report by those very few members who joined the committee late."

The Hon. Justice Kenneth Kakuru, JCC held that;

"From the above excerpts, it is very clear that some Members of Parliament who were not originally on the Legal and Parliamentary committee when the impugned bill was sent to it for consideration, later joined it while they were still Members of other committees.

With all due respect, to the Rt. Hon. Speaker, her Ruling that the issue should be treated as simply indiscipline had no legal justification. It is clear from the excerpts above that some members who signed the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee report in respect of the impugned bill which was later enacted into law, were not legally members of that committee. This is a legal matter that has an impact on the validity of the process of enacting legislation.

It is not an issue of discipline. I am, however, unable to find that, in ordinary circumstances failure to comply with Rule 155 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament, would vitiate the proceedings of a Parliamentary committee in view of the provisions of Article 94 (3) of the Constitution."

The Hon .Justice Musoke, JCC stated that;

"Act of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee of Parliament allowing some Committee members to sign the Report after the public hearings on the bill.

I am inclined to agree with the Respondent's submission that thefact that 8 members joined the Committee at a later stage, did not negatively affect their participation in the proceedings of theCommittee because they were adequately briefed.

From perusal of the Report and the signatures attached, I find that with or without the additional 8 members to the Committee of Parliamentary and Legal Affairs, the original members who signed the Report constituted a third of the total number. The report was, therefore, validly signed since under subsection (2) of Rule 201, the decision of the Committee is collective.

I therefore resolve this issue in the negative."

The Hon. Justice Cheborion, JCC stated that;

"The participation of the new members that were added to theCommittee, even if irregular, cannot invalidate the Committeereport because even if their number was deducted, the majorityreport still had enough signatures to pass it. Rule 187(2) of the 2017 Rules of Parliament sets the quorum of a select committee of Parliament if the committee consists of more than five members to be 1/3 of all the members. In this case, even if the members complained of were not to be considered, still the quorum would be met. I therefore answer issue 7(d) in the negative"

I have endeavored to reproduce Constitutional Court finding on this issue, in order to demonstrate that it was unanimously held that the added 8 members of a parliament were not originally members of the committee when the bill was sent to it. They were brought to sign the report without actual participation in proceedings and hearing of the said committee that drafted the final report.

All the justices found this to be irregular and relied on Article 94(3) of the Constitution to effect that it validates their act. I also agree with the Constitutional court that signatures of the members who had not participated in the discussion did not vitiate the report.

13.Waiving the requirement of a minimum of three sittings from the tabling of the Report and Non-Secondment of the motion Mr. Mabirizi submitted that majority justices were dishonest in finding that the motion to suspend rule 201(2) by Hon. Rukutana was at the committee of the whole house stage yet the evidence prove that it was at plenary. The speaker was estopped from claiming that secondment is not essential yet she had earlier made it essential. The failure to second the motion by Hon. Rukutana was an illegality that rendered subsequent proceedings invalid, in line with Makula International Ltd V. CARDINAL Nsubuga & ANOR (1982) HCB 11.

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that the finding by majority of the Constitutional Court justices that MPs had obtained the committee report 3/4 days prior to 18/12/17 had no evidential basis according to Section 8(2) and (4) of The Electronic Transactions Act The words of Hon. Rukutana that "…this report has been on our ipads for the last five or more days…" did not pass the test of the report being delivered to the ipads contrary to the finding that there was evidence that members of parliament were prevented from debating the bill and that only 28% of the house debated.

Submissions by the Attorney General

The Attorney General refuted the Appellants' assertion that the suspension of Rule 201 (2) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament and non seconded of the motion to waive Rule 201 adversely affected the whole process of enacting the impugned Act. He further disputed the appellants' assertions that the suspension of Rule 201(2) deprived Members sufficient time to debate the report of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee in that they were given only 3 minutes to debate and that hard copies were not duly tabled before the house as 20 provided in Rule 201 (1).

The Attorney General submitted that the evidence [at page 719 of the record] shows that on 18th December, 2017 the Right Hon. Speaker informed the House that on the preceding Thursday, she directed the Clerk to upload all the on their ipads and that therefore the highlighted 25 Rule did not apply. The Attorney General further submitted that at page 263 of the record, wherein the motion to suspend Rule 201 (2) was moved and debated, the said motion was supported by Hon Janepher Egunyu at Page 761 of the record and other members who rose up to debate and support the motion.

Relying on the decision of Alfonso Owiny-Dollo, [DCJ at page 176] and Cheborion, JCC [at Page 95], the Attorney General submitted that Members of Parliament had adequate notice as to the contents of the report (four days before debating the same) and that therefore the purpose of Rule 201(2) was achieved

He prayed that since, the Members of Parliament received the report of the Committee three days before the debate, this Court should uphold the finding of the Constitutional Court that no prejudice was put on the members.

Regarding the issue of secondment of the motion by the Deputy Attorney General, the Attorney General submitted that this issue was extensively interrogated by the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court before making their findings. He argued that all the Justices of the Constitutional Court found that found since Parliament was proceeding as a Committee of the Whole House, the failure to second the motion of Hon Mwesigwa Rukutana offended no Rule at all.

The Attorney General contended that the Constitutional Court came to the right conclusion on this matter and asked this Court to find that the Constitutional Court came to the right decision as far as the secondment of the motion for suspension of Rule 201 was concerned. He invited this to reject the assertion by the Appellants and uphold the findings of the majority Justices.

Without prejudice to his submissions above, the Attorney General submitted that Rule 59 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament does not prescribe the manner of seconding a motion. Rather that it simply required a motion to be seconded. I the Attorney General's view, considering that the Rules are silent on the manner of secondment, the practice that has been adopted by the House is for Members who are seconding a motion to either rise up in support when a motion is proposed or if the motion is with notice, the designated Members stand up and speak to the motion in support. He further argued that the adoption of such practice was premised on the authority of Rule 8 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament which allows the adoption of practices of the House, the Constitutional provisions and practices of other Commonwealth Parliaments in so far as they are applicable to Uganda's Parliament.

He then concluded that since in Parliamentary practice, secondment of a proposed motion acts only as an indication that there is at least one person besides the mover that is interested in seeing the motion considered and debated by the House and the motion by Hon. Rukutana to suspend Rule 201 (2) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament satisfied the requirements of Rule 59 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament

Determination by the Court

Rule 201(2) of The Rules of Procedure of parliament 2017 provides that:-

Debate on report of a committee on a bill, shall take place at least three days after it has been laid on the Table by the chairperson or the Deputy Chairperson or the member nominated by the committee or the speaker. The purpose of the rule was well articulated by Hon.Justice Cheborion when he stated that:-

"The purpose of the rule is clearly, to give adequate notice to Members of Parliament as to the contents of the report so that they are prepared to debate the same on the floor of Parliament."

It was the argument of the speaker and the Constitutional court justices that the requirement of the said rule was met when the work of the committee was loaded on the MPs Ipads four days before. I find this rule to be in mandatory terms "shall", it calls for strict adherence. This was well stated Justice Kakuru JCC that:-

"The Speaker of Parliament with all due respect failed to apply Rule 201(2) which is mandatory. I accept the submission of Counsel in this regard that "laying on the table" means physically presenting the bill on the table of Parliament and does not include sending an electronic copy to members. I note that, Parliament amended and adopted new Rules as recently as October 2017. Had Parliament intended to amend Rule 201 to take into account "electronic notice", or "electronic laying on the table" it would have done so, since according to the Hon. Speaker, the practice was already in place. The fact the Rule remained unchanged following the 2017 amendment means that, there was no intention to adopt a new procedure or turn the existing practice into law. Therefore, the submissions of the Hon. The Deputy Attorney General on the floor Parliament that when the Members of Parliament were availed with Ipads Rule 201 no longer serves any useful purpose has no legal basis

.I therefore, find that, Parliament while passing the impugned Act, failed to comply with Rule 201(2) of its Rules of Procedure, which is mandatory. I find that failure contravened Article 94(1) of the Constitution and as such vitiated the whole process of enactment of Act 1 of 2018."

The Hansard of Monday 18, December 2017, shows that the Chairperson of the committee on legal and parliamentary affairs stated that;-"Madam Speaker, I beg to lay on the table a copy of the main report before I make the presentation, which is accompanied by the minutes of the proceeding of the committee."

At that point the Hon Karuhanga rose on point of procedure and pointed out Rule 201 (2) was being flouted by Parliament. The speaker overruled him pointing that the report was uploaded on iPads and the rule did not apply.

In addition to what Justice Kakuru stated I wish to add that if indeed the introduction of the iPads had rendered the rule inapplicable evidence should have been adduced to show that a number of motions and reports had been laid on table through that method. But if following the introduction of the iPads Parliament continued to follow the physical laying on the table there was no reason why the practice was not followed in this case.

I also need to comment on motion that was moved by The Deputy Attorney General to suspend Rule 201(2).This motion was moved after the Chairperson of committee had stated reading out part of his report to House. Parliament was not in committee stage as stated by majority of the justices of the Constitutional court. It was receiving and debating the report of the committee and therefore there was need for secondment of the motion which was not done. Failure to second the motion means that there was no substantive motion moved by Deputy Attorney General to suspend Rule 201(2) hence the violation of Rule 59(2) of the Rules of Procedure which I find that vitiates the subsequent legislative process and the enactment of the Constitutional (Amendment) Act .2018.

14. On Severance

Appellant's submissions

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that court granted the remedy of severance, which was not pleaded. That no issue was framed on whether none compliance affected the act in a substantial manner, or even whether court should sever some parts of the act from others because both parties knew that failure to comply leads to nullification. The court originated the 'pleading' & 'prayer' of severance it is the court that originated the discussion of un-pleaded matter relating to severance and court indeed turned into the pleader for the respondent who never pleaded any alternative prayer that severance be adopted or even that the nonecompliance did not affect the amendment in a substantial manner.

He contended that court had no power to frame sub-issues of whether severance can be applied & whether the none-compliance affected the act in a substantial manner which did not arise out of the pleadings. He submitted that the court could not originate issues of whether the amendment affected the Act in a substantial manner or whether there would be severance. That it was contrary to fair hearing for court to apply the principles & grant un-pleaded remedy of severance.

Mr. Mabirizi further that it was erroneous for the Constitutional Court to rely on Article 2 of the constitution & the case of Salvatori Abuki v AG; Constitutional case No. 2 of 1997 to support severance. That the Court relied on Salvatori Abuki v AG; (supra), which was not relevant to this case because as per the issues laid out in the lead judgment of Manyindo, there was no issue of the procedural validity and constitutionality of the Witchcraft Act 1957 which was passed by the colonial regime when there was no democracy to talk about or even rule of law. The petitioner's complaint was on the exclusion order under Section 7 of The Act and no other provisions or the enactment process.

That the decision in Ag For Alberta V. Ag For Canada (1947) AC503 AT518 relied upon by Justice Kasule to support severance was quoted out of context because from the facts as summarized by Viscount Simond at it is clear that the only point in contest was whether the legislature could legislate on 'Banking' and not whether the procedure adopted in the legislation was contrary to that laid down by the law granting powers to the legislature. This decision would have instead helped him to find for him on Article 93.

That the decision of Matiso V Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison was not relevant to the facts before court. Justice Kasule relied on it but the facts as summarized by KRIEGLER J, reveal that the petitioners therein were not challenging the process of enacting legislation. They were challenging some parts of the Magistrates Courts Act, enacted prior.

That the decision of Lord Denning, In Kingsway Investment (Kent) Ltd V. Kent County Council (1969) 1 ALLER 601 AT 611 was misapplied by Justice Barishaki, because in the circumstances of this case, no severance could be done because the law depended on the process. Looking at the facts as stated at, the issue before court was whether the provisions of the urban authority outline planning permissions were in line with the law at the time and the effect of invalidity of a clause of a permission or license. It is also clear that severance was only used in reference to a building permission and not to a statute making process.

That Justice Barishaki's reliance on the decision of South Africa National Defence Union Vs Minister of Defence & another Constitutional Court Case NO. 27 OF 1998 was misconceived because looking at facts as summarized by O'REGAN, J at what was under challenge was only Section 126B of the South Africa Defence Act 44 of 1957, which was stated to be in contravention of the 1994 South African Constitution. That there was no challenge on the procedures and processes adopted in enacting the Act as it is here.

MP's submissions

Counsel submitted that the Constitutional Court made a finding that the impugned Act violated the provisions of Article 93 of the constitution but declined to nullify the entire Act contending that noncompliance only affected Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the impugned Act extending the term of Parliament and local government councils from five to seven years as from the date of the last elections since they were introduced by way of amendments that imposed a charge on the consolidated fund. They accordingly applied the doctrine of severance to strike out the said provisions.

He submitted that the entire Act ought to have been struck out because Article 93 (a) (ii) and (b) of the Constitution in 'absolute' terms prohibits Parliament from proceeding on a private member's bill or a motion including amendments thereto which has the effect of creating a charge on the consolidated fund. Parliament therefore flagrantly violated Article 93 of the Constitution when they proceeded to consider and enact into law the impugned Bill with its amendments which had the effect of imposing a charge on the consolidated charge as found by the constitutional court. It was therefore erroneous to apply the doctrine of severance in a Bill was considered and passed as an integral legislation in the same process.

ULS Submissions

Counsel Wandera Ogalo submitted that all the authorities the Respondent cited and relied like Abuka Silverori vs Attorney General, Kauesa vs Minister of Home Affairs, Matiso vs. Commanding officer of Port Elizabeth, Attorney General for Alberta vs. attorney general for Canada, Kingsway investments vs. Kent County and South Africa National Defence Union vs. Minister of defence on the principle of severance to justify the refusal to nullify the whole Act by the lower Court were foreign and non-binding authorities for the following reasons.

That those authorities interpreted the witchcraft Act, Regulations under Police Act, the Magistrate Courts Act, the Alberta Act and Defence Act respectively in their respective jurisdictions. None of those authorities were amending the Constitution. Different standards and procedures apply in enacting an ordinary law as opposed to the Constitution.

That in Uganda the produce of enacting legislation is to be found in rules 112 to 136 of the rules of procedure of the House. That all bills have to comply with those rules. However, in respect of constitutional amending legislation, Articles 259 to 263 are applicable in addition to rules 112 to 136. An ordinary legislation does not go through the process laid down in Articles 259 to 263.

Counsel contended that all legislations cited above were enacted by respective Parliaments using the rules of procedure of the House and not their national Constitutions. Authorities applying the principle of severance to legislation enacted under the ordinary rules of procedure of Parliament are not applicable to legislation enacted under a procedure prescribed by the Constitution. Those authorities apply parliamentary regulations fundamentally different from the one in the instant case.

That in all the cases cited above, the process followed by Parliament was never in issue. What was in issue was simply the final product as it appeared on the law books viz-a viz the Constitutions.

That in all the cases cited, Parliament was not warned that it was about to enact unconstitutional law but nevertheless went ahead to enact the law as is in the case now before the court. That in the cases relied upon the challenged and severed sections were not arrived at as a result of constitutional breaches. The severance maintained the purpose of the Bill, it is not a valid reason because purpose of a Bill can change after it is introduced in Parliament. Rule 133(20) allows Parliament to amend the long title to reflect amendments made to the Bill. It is therefore not a sound reason to justify severance on maintaining the original purpose of a Bill. Counsel prayed that this court to hold that the principle of severance is not applicable in the present case.

Attorney General's Submissions

The Attorney General submitted that the Court was right in making reliance on the provisions of Article 2 of the Constitution while applying the principle of severance. That the Constitution of Uganda allows for the application of the Doctrine of Severance under Article 2(2).

The Hon, Alfonse Owiny Dollo cited the authority of Salvatori Abuki V Attorney General; Constitutional Case No. 2 of 1997 where the Constitutional Court considered the constitutionality of Sections 3 and 7 of the witchcraft Act Cap 108. Justice Remmy Kasule stated that; - 'I also hold and order that sections 1,3,4, and 7 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018, …hereby retained as constituting the said Act by reason of their having been enacted in compliance and in conformity with the Constitution.'

Also that Justice Cheborion Barishaki, applied the authority in South African National Defence Union vs Minister of Defence& Another Constitutional Court Case No. 27 of 1998, the same approach was applied as is evident from this passage,

"The offending provisions, however, can be rendered constitutionally valid by the technique of severance applied to both subsection (2) and (4) of t section 126 B….."

He also stated that "In the circumstances, I hold that section 2, 5, 8, 9 and 10 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 are hereby struck down and expunged from the Act. Section 1, 3, 4 and 7 of the Act are upheld since they are constitutionally valid.''

That the Hon. Justice Elizabeth Musoke applied the principle of severance when she declared that section 1, 3, 4, and 7 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 are not inconsistent with and/or in contravention of the 1995 Constitution.

It is the Attorney General's submission that Justices of the Constitutional Court properly applied the principle of severance when they upheld sections of the Act that had been validly passed into law and invite this Court to uphold the decision of the Constitutional Court.

The Attorney General submitted that the core role of the Constitutional Court under Article 137(1) of the Constitution is to interpret its provisions while Article 137(3)(b) and 137(4) provide for the grant redress within the discretion of the Court based on the circumstances pertaining. Accordingly, while declarations are the primary duty the Court may grant redress including the remedy of severance either at the pleading or prayer of Counsel or a Litigant or exercising its own discretion.

The Court has the discretion to require Counsel or litigants to address it even on under pleaded issues and remedies and even to accordingly frame issues for Counsel and litigants to address. Severance is a wellestablished legal remedy and there is no bar to the Hon. Justices of the Constitutional Court exercising their discretion to grant the remedy of severance. The Respondent addressed Court on the remedy of severance, the 1st Appellant had every opportunity to address the Hon. Justices of the Constitutional Court on the issue of severance, did not suffer any prejudice and was duly accorded a fair hearing.

The Attorney General submitted that in the course of a Court conducting its enquiry the Court has wide discretion to draw on existing Constitutional and legal principles and both pleaded and not pleaded depending on the circumstances of the case and it is the duty of the Court to apply the relevant principles for the ends of justice. The Hon. Justices of the Constitutional Court in applying the remedy of severance relied on Article 2(2) of the Constitution as well established authorities. The principles considered and applied by the Court are well established Constitutional and legal principles which the 1st Appellant had opportunity to address Court on. No prejudice was occasioned and the 1st Appellant was accorded a fair hearing.

Additionally, the 1st Appellants arguments are misconceived because authorities cited related to litigants being bound by facts and matters pleaded. They do not preclude a litigant from relying on the abundance of legal principles to advance their cases

Court’s Determination on Severance

The majority of Constitutional Court Justices applying the principle of severance, severed the amendments which were introduced by Hon Tusiime Michael of the extension of tenure of parliament and that of Hon Nandala Mafabi of Term limits at Committee stage of the whole House from the original Magyezi bill.

I don’t agree with Mr. Mabirizi that because the principle was not pleaded or argued by any of the parties at the trial the Constitutional Court was precluded from applying it. To me if court, through its own research finds a principle that may have been missed by the parties but is helpful in solving a case there is nothing to stop the court from relying on it.

The concern to the parties should be whether the principle is actually applicable or the court was misconceived in applying it.

The above two amendments emanated from the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs committee’s general recommendations where by the committee recommended for reinstatement of the presidential Term Limits and expansion of the term of president from five to seven years.[1105]

During the debate of the report of the committee some of the members of parliament supported the above amendment which influenced debate as shown below:-

The Hon James Waluswaka NRM Bunyole County West Butaleja stated that "…My people told me that we restore the term limits not only for the president but for all elected members of parliament. There are members of parliament who have been for several years but they do not want to leave. Why don't they serve two terms and go? That is what they told me…"

The Hon Kenneth Luboogo NRM Bulamogi County Kaliro stated that "Madam Speaker the report talks of about reinstatement of term limits and entrenching and expanding the same. I agree with the reinstatement and entrenchment of the same but disagree withexpansion from five to seven years…I think we should we maintain the five term and restore term limits"

The Hon. Violet Akurut NRM woman Representatibe Katakwi stated that

"I did consult my people of Katakwi we have ten sub counties and out of ten sub counties, seven agreed to the amendment of the constitution and other three did not.as a safeguard, however theyalso recommended that term limits be reinstated in theconstitution… Thank you."

The Hon Norah Bigirwa NRM Woman Representative, Buliisa stated that

"The people of Buliisa are saying that they look forward to seeing us, as country adhering to what is embedded in the constitution. Theyrequested me to go ahead and restore the term limits and entrenchthem within the constitution because they feel that these are some of the things that will help us to run this country..."

The Hon. Alex Byarugaba NRM Isingiro County South states that "it wason that basis that I took my consultative meetings to the five sub-counties in my constituency with a population of about 220,000people. I traversed all the sub counties and collected the following: yes sometime in the parliament, term limits were removed. My people instructed me to come back and share with you that we mustkeep this country together and that term limits must be reinstated and entrenched."

The Hon. Eric Musana NRM Buyaga County East Kagadi stated that "I also support the committee's recommendation of establishing the constitution review commission. We have a number of serious issues that must be incorporated and this commission will help us to bring all these warring parties and Uganda to a better consensus. I am alsoin support of reinstating term limits. This was paramount in myconstituency…"

The Hon.Dononzio Kahonda NRM Ruhinda county Mitooma stated that

"Madam Speaker on the issue of term limits, it was raised at Kabira Sub County by lay Canon, that it should be reinstated to address the issue of transition that all Ugandan have been yearning for."

[1105] see parliamentary Hansard of 18 December 2017 at page 32-33.

The Minister of State for Health (General Duties) Hon. Sarah Opendi stated that "Madam Speaker, the people however said we should restore term limits. I am glad that this is clearly contained in report of the committee."

The Hon. Gilbert Olanya FDC Kilak County south, Amuru stated that "I would like to stand firm in this ground and support the position of the committee to reinstate terms limits."

There were some members of parliament who were totally against the reinstatement of the terms limit and the following were their views

The Hon. Patrick Opolot NRM Kachumbala County, Bukedea stated that

"… if a leader is very good, the people will decide to continue renewing his mandate. If the people find a leader unworthy-maybe if he is a drunkard-even the leader himself can decide to abandon power. It has ever happened in 1985, a leader abandoned power here because he saw that he could not manage it. Therefore, I don't support the reinstatement of term limits in our constitution. I begto submit madam speaker"

The Hon. Joseph Kasozi (NRM Bukoto County Mid-west Lwengo) started that "Madam Speaker on issue of reinstating terms limits. I remember very well 12 years ago this parliament removed terms limits. My question is what mischief was meant to be cured by the removal of term limits? Has that mischief been cured so that it requires us to reinstate term limits once again as proposed by the committee?"

Later when it comes to second reading of the Bill, The Hon Beatrice Anywar stated that "Madam Speaker on lifting the term limits I vote 'yes'." she was called back by the speaker to vote properly and she voted yes but her support for the Bill was clearly influenced by the return of term limits.

I am of the opinion that the amendments introduced were not foreign to the Magyezi bill. The members of Parliament were sent out by the speaker and she emphasized that they should properly consult the people in accordance with Article 1 of the constitution. The members during the debate clearly demonstrated that their voters had strictly demanded for reinstatement of the term limits in the constitution. At the committee stage of the whole house, the Hon Tusiime sought permission to chairperson to introduce his amendment to original Bill. His amendments were on Articles 61, 77,181,289 291 of the constitution. His proposal of the amendments were debated by members of Parliament, some of them like Hon. Nandala Mafabi were strictly opposed to the 30 amendment.

The chairperson put a vote on it and her words she stated "Honorable members, I put the question that new clause be introduced as proposed." the Hansard show shows (Question put and agreed to).

Towards the end of proceeding of the committee, the Hon.Nandala Mafabi sought leave of the chairperson to add amendments on Article 105 of the constitution and introduce the terms limits which were to be entrenched. Again the chairperson put the question to members and stated

"Honorable members, I put the question the question Article 105 be amended as proposed." the Hansard show that Question put and agreed to. Later on the Hon.Nandala requested the amendment be re-entrenched and question was put and agreed upon by members.

The Deputy Attorney General moved to block the amendment by Hon. Mafabi because it was not debated and that it was matter of referendum that would reinstate them. He was overruled by chairperson since the matter had been voted on.

After the committee stage, the chairperson put question to members the title to do stand part of the bill and Hansard shows that question was put and agreed to.

From above it is crystal clear that the two amendment were proposed and voted upon by entire members of parliament in the committee and agreed that the form part of the original Magyezi Bill. From this moment up to the conclusion of the process the amendments become an integral part 20 of the Bill judging from the report of Raphael Magyezi indicates below:-

At report from the committee of the whole house, the Hon Raphael Magyezi stated that "Madam Speaker, I beg to report that the committee of the whole House has considered the Bill entitled, 'The Constitution (Amendment) No.2 Bill,2017' and passed the entire Bill with amendments and also introduced and passed new clausesamending Articles 77,181,29,291,105 and 260. I beg to report."

At the motion for adoption the report from the committee of the whole House and the again the Hon. Magyezi sated "Madam Speaker, I beg to move that the report of the committee of the whole House be adopted."

The speaker put question to members that the report of the committee of the whole house be adopted and the Hansard shows that the question was put and agreed to.

The bill went to third reading. The Hon Magyezi moved that the bill be read for third time and do pass and speaker put the question to member and voting for the third reading started.

On the third reading it is important to note that bill was voted on as a whole without separately voting on each clause. The pattern of the vote also indicates that the amendments influenced the vote as a few example will show the Hon. Deputy Attorney General who fought 'tooth and nail' to block the amendment of Hon. Nandala Mafabi voted yes to the Bill and so do did other members like Hon. Joseph Kasozi and Hon. Patrick Opolot who were categorically against the return of term limits. Interestingly the Hon. Nandala Mafabi who substantially contributed to the Bill by adding an amendment to it voted No to the Bill.

The third voting as shown from above was done on the Bill as a whole. After the voting the Clerk to Parliament tallied the votes which were 315 vote in favour of the bill and 62 voted against. The speaker declared The constitutional (Amendment) No.2 Act,2017 had been passed.

I have reproduced the above part of Hansard to show that the amendments by Hon.Tusiime and Mafabi were passed by members of Parliament and allowed to be added on Original Magyezi Bill at the committee stage. Secondly the report of the committee of the whole house which contained the amendments was adopted by Members of Parliament. Thirdly the third voting on the Bill was done as one. Fourthly the Act was passed as one by Parliament and lastly some Members of Parliament as seen from above were sent by their people (electorates) and instructed to reinstate the term limits and that must have greatly influenced their third time voting on the Bill.

The Constitutional Court Justices with due respect misconstrued the doctrine of severance because from time of the introduction the amendment, the bill become one. The speaker left out the contents of the amendment in her Certificate of compliance which rendered the certificate invalid as already determined in this judgement.

The second point about the misapplication of the principle of severance is that well before the introduction of the amendments to the Bill, the 5 process of enacting the Act was already tainted with acts of unconstitutionality already discussed in this judgement.

Both Justice Kasule JCC and DCJ Dollo followed the case of Silvatori Abuki v Attorney General; Constitutional Case No. 2 of 1997, Where the Constitutional Court considered the constitutionality of Sections 3 10 and 7 of the Witchcraft Act, Cap 108.With due respect, the case of Abuki is different from the present case because it was not concerning the enactment of Witch Craft Act as whole being null and void and it be said that Act must be have been enacted according to the law but had the two sections inconsistent with constitution which is not the case we have now where by the whole Act was not passed according to Constitution.

In conclusion having found that some of the acts and omissions vitiated the enactment Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 the doctrine of severance was wrongly applied by the Constitutional Court. The Act was passed as one and I find the principle inapplicable. I answer issue No.2 in the positive.

ISSUE 3: VIOLENCE

This issue was framed as follows:

"Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the violence/scuffle inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda?"

Appellants' Submissions

Submissions of MPs

Counsel submitted that the Constitutional Court rightfully established that the UPDF, the Uganda Police force and other militia wrongfully intervened in the entire process leading to the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act.

According to counsel, use of force to amend the Constitution is not only prohibited but is also treasonable.

Counsel contended that the directive issued by AIGP Asumani Mugenyi to all the police forces countrywide stopping opposition MPs from consulting was unconstitutional because the effect of the said directive was to curtail and restrict the conduct of consultative meetings. The same was calculated and aimed at muzzling public participation and debate on the proposed amendment bill.

Counsel averred that the bill was passed amidst violence within and outside Parliament, and also in the whole Country during public consultations thereby vitiating the entire process, and thus making it unconstitutional.

That It was as a result of the heavy deployment and unprecedented violence meted out against Members of Parliament within the precincts and chambers of the August House that prompted the Speaker of Parliament to write a letter addressed to the President of Uganda inquiring into the existence of armed personnel in the perimeters of Parliament.

That the unlawful invasion and/or heavy deployment at the Parliament by combined forces of the Uganda People's Defence forces, the Uganda 25 police force and other militia before and on the day the impugned bill was tabled before Parliament amounted to amending the Constitution using violent means, undermined Parliamentary independence and as such was inconsistent with and contravened the Constitution.

Counsel submitted that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court acknowledged that security forces committed acts of violence in and out of Parliament but held that those acts were not sufficient to vitiate the enactment. Their Lordships applied the qualitative test. It was erroneous for the learned justices of the Constitutional Court to apply and/or misapply the qualitative test on grounds that where the prohibited conduct amounts to an offence, like in the instant case, then the qualitative test is inapplicable. The moment Court found as proved that security forces violently restrained or stopped many people from participating in the enactment of the impugned amendment, then the offence was proved.

Counsel criticized the Constitutional Court finding that the violence was not as prevalent as to vitiate the enactment process. Submitting that the violence had a chilling effect on other members of the public that wished to participate and other members of Parliament that would have wished to oppose the amendment.

It was imperative for the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court to find that the amendment was begotten from violence inflicted on persons opposed to the amendment, and therefore contravening to Art 3 (2) of the Constitution.

Counsel contended that all the five justices of the Constitutional Court held that public participation is one of the basic structures of our constitution and cannot be wished away nor taken lightly.

Counsel cited the case of In Doctors for Life International & Ors -Vs- The Speaker of National Assembly & Ors. Constitutional Court (of South Africa) 12/05, the South African Constitutional Courtemphasized the concept of participating democracy (as is found in Art.1 of our Constitution) "… therefore our democracy includes as one of its basic and fundamental principles of participatory democracy. The democratic government that is contemplated is partly representative and partly participatory … and makes provision for public participation in the law making process …"

In conclusion counsel submitted that the invasion of Parliament by the combined armed forces of the Uganda People's defence forces, the Uganda police and other militia was unwarranted and uncalled for as rightly found by the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court. It was unjustified in the circumstances which later on had an adverse effect of curtailing several persons and Ugandans at large from participating in the process leading to the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act. Counsel invited court to answer this issue in the affirmative and find that the learned trial justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the violence inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act did not contravene nor was it inconsistent with the Constitution.

Submissions of Uganda Law Society

Counsel submitted that the violence inside Parliament included the arrest, assault detention of members of Parliament and their forceful exclusion from representing the Constituents. The actions complained of violated several provisions of the Constitution. That the constitutional Court erred in failing to come to definite conclusions that Article 23 24 and 29 were contravened. As a result the Court neither made any declarations nor granted redress as required by Article 137 of the Constitution for the contraventions.

There was no attempt whatsoever to bring the actions of the security forces within the defenses stipulated in Article 43 instead court embarked on rationalizing the limitations on the member's right to liberty. That there is no evidence whatsoever of misconduct being a basis for the constitutional limitations on their liberty. On the contrary it is the speaker's orders which should be faulted as the events of 26th and 27th September show.

Counsel submitted that the court erred when it held that the Members misbehaved and this led to loss of liberty. If Court came to correct conclusion that there was no misbehavior, it would have come to a different conclusion. It would not have held that exclusion from debate, assault and detention was necessitated by the member's bad conduct. Instead it would have found that the suspension of the member by the Speaker is what was unjustified. The invitation of the police was therefore without foundation and the eventual trespass by Special Forces uncalled for. Consequently, the limitations to the fundamental rights of the members to liberty and to represent their constituents and was unjustified.

Applying the test laid down in Onyango Obbo and another Vs Attorney General he submit that the continuance of debate in Parliament on that particular day was not particularly important to warrant overriding the fundamental rights. Debate could have taken place on another date. The debate continued for only 46 minutes and adjourned at 5.00p.m. There was nothing important about a debate. A member was simply seeking permission of Parliament to introduce a bill. I submit there is nothing particularly important in that debate to justify the limiting of fundamental rights.

The limitation of the fundamental rights cannot be rationally connected to the object. How misbehavior in the House is linked to limiting MPs fundamental rights. That is not rational. It is arbitrary and unfair. The rules of the House provide for a procedure to follow in case of misbehavior. It does not include inviting in the army and police. The limitations were therefore unjustifiable

The means used to impair the right were not necessary to accomplish the object of eviction. The record is full of evidence of assault inhuman treatment and deprivation of liberty. All those were not necessary to remove the members.

Counsel submitted that had the Justices in the lower Court addressed themselves to the pleadings and affidavits there would have held that there was contravention of Article 24 and would have made a declaration to the effect and given redress.

Counsel submit that the redress to the violations has to be related to reasons his submissions which were to start the Age Limit bill on its path without the voices of opposition. The product is as good as the process.

That product is tainted with deliberate and planned constitutional violations and this Court ought not to allow it to stand. The ghosts of unconstitutionality will only go back to sleep if the Act is struck down. If it is not, those ghosts will disturb the country for a long time to come.

Submissions of Mabirizi

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that violence which was well pleaded/ deponed to in the affidavits was not rebutted by the respondent but as could be seen the justices had a pre-conceived mind that violence was justified.

He submitted that it was erroneous to approach the violence as a disciplinary measure by the speaker yet parliament had been suspended.

The Chamber ceased to be the House and her directions to Sergeant-At Arms could not be implemented because no parliament was sitting, the Sergeant at arms could only act in the sitting and under supervision of the Speaker.

Mr. Mabirizi contended that violence, whether real, perceived or attempted vitiates not only legislation but also any action done pursuant to it. Violence is defined by BLACK'S LAW Dictionary, 8th Edition The use of physical force, usu. accompanied by fury, vehemence, or outrage; esp., physical force unlawfully exercised with the intent to harm...and veiled threats by words and acts." Violent is defined at pg 4857 as "…relating to, or characterized by strong physical force….2. Resulting from extreme or intense force…3. Vehemently or passionately threatening..."

That the Amendment of the Constitution through violence was foreseen by the framers of the Constitution who made a strong prescription against violence of any kind in the constitutional amendment process and invalidated each and every thing arising out of violence and created an offence of treason. The perpetrators of violence in the Constitutional amendment process committed the treason envisaged under Article 3 of The Constitution.

All the provisions rhyme well with the language in Article 3 of the Constitution against violence because in every offence where violence is an element, the maximum punishment is either death or life imprisonment, including heavy punishments for attempts. Therefore, there was no way the justices could justify violence simply because the MPs could have originated it.

He cited the cases of THE EAST AFRICAN COURT OF JUSTICE in KATABAZI & ORS V. THE SECRETARY GENERAL, East African Community & ANOR, Reference No.1/07], SADC REGIONAL COURT in CONGO & ANOR V. ZIMBABWE, (supra) & THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT ITSELF in DR. BESIGYE & ORS V. AG, CCC Petition No.7/07 have set precedents that violence & arbitrary rule invalidates the resultant or intended benefit and the constitutional court was bound by this authority.

He submitted that the court erred in applying a subjective test as opposed to an objective test approved by this court in onyango obbo's case at in dealing with the violence and prayed that court reverse it.

The Attorney General's Submissions

The Attorney General submitted that Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court rightly found that the violence/scuffle inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 did not amount to a breach the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda sufficient to justify a declaration of the whole process as unconstitutional and prayed that this Honourable Court does uphold the decision of the Court on this matter.

He pointed out that it is factually incorrect for the Appellants to state that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court found that the UPDF, Uganda Police force and other militia wrongfully intervened in the entire process leading to the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act. It was the unanimous decision of the Court that the intervention of the Uganda Police Force was lawful and there was never any reference to militias as alleged by the Appellants should make factual references to the Judgments of the Court.

The Attorney General contended that the evidence on record clearly illustrated that the proceedings of Parliament on the 21st, 26th and 27th September 2017 was characterized by unprecedented chaos, disorder and misconduct from the Hon. Members of Parliament that eventually led to the Speaker issuing an order for their immediate suspension from the House. However, the Hon. MPs chose not to heed the Speaker's orders to leave the House and this led to their eviction by members of the security forces under the command of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

That Article 79(1) of the Constitution gives Parliament power to make laws on any matter for the peace, order and development and good governance of Uganda under Article 94(1):

Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, Parliament may make rules to regulate its own procedure, including the procedure of its committees. In line with the above Constitutional Provisions; Part XIV of the Rules of Procedure of the Parliament of Uganda was enacted that provide for Order in The House and Regulation 85. Rule 88 (6) Where a Member who has been suspended under this rule from the service of the House refuses to obey the direction of the Speaker when summoned under the Speaker's orders by the Sergeant-at-Arms to obey such direction, the Speaker shall call the attention of the House to the fact that recourse to force 83 is necessary in order to compel obedience to his or her direction, and the Sergeant At Arms shall be called upon to eject the Member from the House.

It was the Appellants' case that there was an unlawful invasion and/or heavy deployment at the Parliament of the armed forces on the day of tabling of the impugned bill before Parliament which action amounted to amending the Constitution using violent means, undermined Parliament independence and was therefore inconsistent with the Constitution.

The Attorney General submitted that from the authorities cited above it is apparent that the Rt. Hon. Speaker is legally mandated to ensure that order and decorum is maintained in the House and she clearly had the powers as derived from the 1995 Constitution to suspend the MPs who perpetuated violence in the Parliamentary chambers.

The Attorney General prayed that this Honourable Court upholds the decision of the Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court that in the circumstances as presented by the evidence, the Rt. Hon. Speaker acted within her powers and in accordance with the Constitution to evict the 25 names 25 Members of Parliament as a it was the Attorney General's case that the events that transpired on 26th and 27th September 2017 that led to the scuffle with our security agencies were contrary to the public interest and necessitated the limitations to the enjoyment of the rights of the MPs and their eventual arrest and detention by the Security forces.

It was apparent from the findings of the Constitutional Court that their Lordships considered the evidence on the record and came to the appropriate conclusions on this issue of the alleged violence against the members of the public.

The Attorney General faulted the Appellants for allegation that the Constitutional Court did not address this issue and the evidence was evaluated and yet it was found that an overwhelming number of Members of Parliament carried out their meetings of consultations with the people in an uninterrupted manner and they were then able to come and vote on the Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017.

That the Appellants, as was the case in the Constitutional Court, have not illustrated any evidence to show that there was a group of Ugandans whose right to participate in the process leading to the enactment of the Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017 was curtailed by the security forces. He invited this Honourable Court to confirm the finding of the Constitutional Court that the consultative process was not marred with violence by the security forces against the people and there is no need to invalidate the same.

The Attorney General argued that the Appellant had raised a new argument on appeal that force was used to amend the Constitution and as a result the Respondents are in breach of Article 3(2) of the constitution.

That Appellants never raised this issue at the Constitutional Court and they are therefore precluded from raising this argument at the Supreme Court. Rule 82 (1) Judicature (Supreme Court Rules) Directions S.I. 13, he submitted that this particular argument cannot be raised by the Appellant as it was never raised at the Constitutional Court level and there is no decision on the same to be appealed against. However, in the event that this Honourable Court accepts to consider the ground of appeal in the manner that has been raised by the Appellant, the evidence as has been led by the Respondents clearly illustrates that the amendment was done with the full participation of the Members of Parliament and this contention should be dismissed. The Attorney General prayed that this Honourable Court finds that the Appellants severely misconstrued the application of Article 3 (2) of the Constitution as the expulsion of the Members of Parliament was not a singular event but was a result of their consistent misconduct during the debate of Constitutional Amendment Act No. 1 of 2018.

The Attorney General in conclusion prayed that this Honourable Court finds that the Constitutional Court correctly found that the violence inside and outside Parliament was not sufficient to warrant a finding of inconsistency with the Constitution.

The Attorney General submitted that the Appellant had misconstrued the Speaker's order to have been effected when the house was not in session and it was his contention that the order could be implemented when the House was suspended and there was no misdirection on either Law or fact by the Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court.

He referred this Honourable Court to page 165 of the record of Appeal where the Rt. Hon. Speaker clearly explains that the suspension of the MPs was for actions that had occurred the previous day the 26th September 2017 and goes ahead to direct them to leave the House which they objected and she chose to leave the House to enable them to be removed by the Sargent at Arms. Clearly, the House was still in session and regardless the Speaker did have powers to evict the errant MPs.

That his Lordship the DCJ Owiny Dollo at page 2431 paragraph 2 line 7 and Her Lordship Justice Elizabeth Musoke at Page 2563 of the record of proceedings, paragraph 5, Line 976 found that the Rt. Hon. Speaker is empowered to maintain order, discipline and decorum in the House. We pray that this Honourable Court accepts our submission that based on the enabling Laws cited above, the Speaker was mandated to maintain order, discipline and decorum in the proceedings in Parliament and is at liberty to use Rule 77 and 80(6) of the Rules of Parliament in order to achieve this purpose.

He further contended that such internal mechanisms, control and disciplines in Parliament of Uganda will be able to maintain effective discipline and order during debates. The essence of debate in a multi-party dispensation in Parliament is that Peoples' representatives are allowed to engage in debates and once its concluded, vote on the matter and that would be the conclusion of the particular issues.

It was the Appellant's submission that the forceful removal of the MPs on the 27th September 2017 amounted to a treasonous act under Article 3(2) of the 1995 Constitution.

That the Appellant had severely misconstrued this Article 3 (2) of theConstitution as this was a singular event that came about due to the misconduct of the MPs whereas the debate, passing and eventual enactment of the Constitutional Amendment Act No. 1 of 2018 was carried out strictly in accordance with the Constitution.

He argued that the public interest was the debate on such an important issue as the Constit*utional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017* which needed to be conducted in a manner that promoted debate by members across the political spectrum as the matter were clearly of high national importance. The orders of the Speaker to maintain decorum should have been adhered to by the offending Members of Parliament.

He contended that the test of consideration of the phrase "acceptable and demonstrably justifiable" under Article 43(2) of the 1995 Constitution was defined in the case of Charles Onyango Obbo & Andrew Mujuni MwendaVersus Attorney General. In C.P. 15/1997. See page 33: paragraph 2: that illustrates the criteria in assessment of what amounts to establishing limits in a free and democratic society.

The Attorney General prayed that this Honourable Court finds it appropriate to adopt the finding of His Lordship Justice Cheborion Barishaki at page 2727 of the record of appeal and specifically paragraph 10 line 25 when he found that the intervention of Uganda Police was to enable parliament to execute their mandate.

He further prayed that in resolving these issues, Court should employ the principle of harmony and completeness in the interpreting the Constitution as one whole singular document with no particular provision destroying the other but each sustaining the other.

Refer to Hon. Lt. (Rtd) Kamba Saleh & Anor Vs Attorney General & Four Others Consolidated Petitions Constitutional Petition No. 16 Of 2013

The Attorney General submitted that the MPs must not confuse their right to legislate to mean it extends to disruption of other peoples' representatives right to debate and the disruption of the conduct of Parliamentary business. The enjoyment of Articles 1, 2, 3(2), 8A, 97,208(2), and 211(3) must be read together with Article 43(2)(c) and it is our submission that Court should confirm the findings of the Constitutional Court that the actions of the Uganda Police passed the proportionality test and did not in any way contravene the 1995 Constitution in trying to ensure that the debate went on smoothly.

The Attorney General submitted that it is important to note the nature of our political system is that it is a multi-party dispensation. The implication of this fact is that each party and every Member of Parliament must have a right to full and meaningful participation in and contribution to the parliamentary process and decision-making. In the event that these rights are curtailed, the very notion of our constitutional democracy is abused.

However, in the exercise of the debate in a multi-party dispensation there can be no doubt that the Speaker's authority under Part XIII of the Rules of Procedure is wide enough to enable Parliament to maintain internal order and discipline in its proceedings by means which the Speaker considers appropriate for that purpose.

In the case of Twinobusingye Severino Versus Attorney General Constitutional Petition No. 47/2011 in the Judgment of the Court at page 24, paragraph 2 the Court observed that;

"We hasten to observe in this regard, that although members of Parliament are independent and have the freedom to say anything on the floor of the House, they are however, obliged to exercise and enjoy their Powers and Privileges with restraint and decorum and in a manner that gives honour and admiration not only to the institution of Parliament but also to those who, inter-alia elected them, those who listen, to and watch them debating in the public gallery and on television and read about them in the print media.

As the National legislature, Parliament is the fountain of Constitutionalism and therefore the Honourable members of Parliament are enjoined by virtue of their office to observe and adhere to the basic tenets of the Constitution in their deliberations and actions."

It was the Attorney General's submission that this Honourable Court should adopt the persuasive reasoning of the Constitutional Court in finding that the Rt. Hon. Speaker was well within her powers to order the eviction of the errant Members of Parliament.

It is not in dispute that the MPs enjoy rights enshrined in Article 1, 2, 3(2), 8A, 97 to debate and enjoy the privileges as enshrined in the 1995 Constitution. However, the enjoyment of such rights as illustrated above is valid only if it is done in a manner that is "acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society" as illustrated in Article 43(1):

It was the Attorney General's case that the events that transpired on 26th and 27th September 2017 that led to the scuffle with our security agencies were contrary to the public interest and necessitated the limitations to the enjoyment of the rights of the MPs and their eventual arrest and detention by the Security forces.

Submissions in rejoinder for MPs

That on the record there is no explanation whatsoever that was given either by the sergeant at arms or by the police or any security officer or even the addressee the president himself never responded to that letter and it is very clear that the parliament was invaded. The speaker calls it invasion of parliament by strangers.

Court's Determination of Issue No. 3

The Constitutional court unanimously found and rightly so in my view that given the gross indiscipline of some members of Parliament who were involved not only in a shouting match in complete disregard of the decorum of parliament but also in a brawl all in full view of the speaker, the speaker was left with no alternative but to wield the stick and suspend the offending members of the House. As a court we should not be seen to interfere with the discretion of the speaker to reign on errant members of parliament to protect the integrity of the House as the Circumstances prevailing warranted.

However, what I find disturbing and of concern to this court is that after the speaker had pronounced her punishment the execution of her orders was bungled by what she describes as strangers in her letter to His Excellency the president which I reproduce hereunder.

"Your Excellency,

RE: INVASION OF THE PARLIAMENT PRECINTS BY SECURITY AGENCIES ON THE 27TH SEPTEMBER 2017

As you may be aware there were some disruptions of parliament proceeding by some rowdy members of parliament on the 21st September, 26th and 27th September 2017.

I took action to suspend members of parliament from the service of the house for three (3) sittings.

However, after I had requested the Sergeant At Arms to remove the members from the precincts unknown people entered the chamber beat up the members, including those not suspended and a fight ensued for over one hour. I have had the opportunity to view camera footage of what transpired and noticed people in black suits and white shirts who are not part of the parliamentary police or the staff of the Sergeant At Arms beating members.

Additionally, footage shows people walking in single file from the office of the president to the Parliament precincts.

I am therefore seeking an explanation as to the identity, mission and purpose of the unsolicited forces. I am also seeking an explanation about why they assaulted the Members of Parliament.

I am also seeking an explanation why the members were arrested and transported and confined at police stations.

I would also like to know the commander of operations was since the Parliamentary Commission/Speaker did not request for any support.

Yours faithfully

Rebecca A. Kadaga (MP)

SPEAKER OF PARLIAMENT OF UGANDA

cc. Rt.Hon. Prime Minister

cc. Minister of Internal Affairs cc. Inspector General of police cc. Commander of the Special Forces Command"

I do not need to go any further than this communication from the Hon. Speaker as to the unconstitutionality of the actions by the strangers.

There is no evidence that anybody responded to her concerns which raises a question of interference of one branch of Government into the activities of another branch which is a breach of the constitution.

The second question it raises is that the Members of Parliament including those who were not on the Speaker's list were assaulted, thrown on police vehicles, detained and released without charge all of which amount to inhuman treatment which is in contravention of the Constitution. In terms of Article 137 clause 3 (b) of the constitution I would interpret both the acts of interference with the work of Parliament as complained about by the speaker and the mistreatment of members of Parliament as unconstitutional. The provision of the constitution does not require this court to inquire into the consequences of an unconstitutional 'act' as the constitutional court did and neither is it required to make an order for redress. The unconstitutionality the act vitiates the process. I find issue No.3 in the positive.

ISSUE 4: SUBSTANTIALITY TEST

This issue was framed as follows:

"Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they applied the substantiality test in determining the petition?"

Appellants' submissions

Submission of MPS

Counsel submitted that the Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law by applying the substantiality test in evaluating and assessing the extent to which the Speaker and Parliament failed to comply with and/or violated the Rules of Procedure of Parliament as well as the invasion of Parliament. According to counsel the test is only applicable in Electoral matters.

Counsel further submitted that it is an absurdity and indeed a paradox that the Constitutional court, whose primary mandate and duty is to jealously guard and defend the sanctity of the Constitution to suggest that there can be room for certain individuals and agencies of government like Parliament to violate the constitution with impunity which is charged with the duty of protecting the constitution and promoting democratic governance in Uganda under Article 79 (3) of the Constitution. He relied on the decision of this Honourable court in Paul K. Ssemogerere & 2Ors versus Attorney-GeneralSCCA. NO. 1 OF 2002; where it was held that the constitutional procedural requirements are mandatory.

Submissions of Mr. Mabirizi

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that under Article 137 of the constitution, the constitutional court has no jurisdiction to apply the 'substantiality' test. He contended jurisdiction of the constitution court is to determine whether the actions complained of are inconsistent with and/or in contravention of the Constitution and if so to make declaration and give redress or refer the matter to investigation.

He cited the case of Centre for Health, Human Rights & Development (CEHURD) V.AG, SCCA No.1/13, Kisaakye, JSC, stated "…the Constitutional Court…may, after hearing the parties, grant the declaration that such an act or omission is inconsistent with or contravenes the provision(s) in question" "…the Constitutional court was established and given powers under Article 137(1) and

(3) to consider these allegations and determine them one way or another. Indeed, the Constitutional Court as had no problem in the past in dealing with such kinds of problems before...with striking out the Referendum and other Provisions Act, 1999 on ground that the Act had been passed by Parliament without the requisite quorum stipulated in the Constitution…the Anti-Homosexuality Act 2014 on ground that it was passed by Parliament while it lacked the requisite quorum required."

He contended that it is only the presidential & parliamentary elections acts which provide for 'substantial test' & there is no law enabling it in constitutional petitions. The substantial test is found in two specialized laws; S. 59(6)(a) of Presidential Elections Act, 2005 and S.61(1)(a) of The 25 Parliamentary Elections Act, 2005 and in no other law.

Submissions of ULS

Counsel for the appellant submitted that the Court misunderstood the test laid down by the Supreme Court and therefore misapplied it to the facts of the Constitutional Petition resulting in a wrong decision. He faulted the Court for the following reasons;

The Election Petition case of Kizza Besigye Vs Yoweri Museveni Kaguta Election Petition No.1 of 2001 interpreted Section 65(a) of the Presidential Election Act which lays down the principle that an election cannot be set aside unless the non-compliance with the Act affects the result in a substantial manner. Counsel contended that it relates to standard and burden of proof in election petitions and in a Constitutional Petitions where Article 137(3) and (4) as well as the usual rules of evidence which apply.

The allegation of facts in the Besigye case was that the number of voters on the voters roll was unknown, voters were disfranchised and not verifiable and the petitioners agents were not allowed an opportunity to scrutinize the voters roll or safeguard the interest of the petitioner at polling stations. Counsel asserted that the Court was required to interpret the Act to determine whether proved facts were widespread. The facts in the present case are infringement of constitutional rights i.e. limitations to free speech and expression, movement and participation. According to counsel, the Court is not required and there is no legal basis for it to determine the extent of proved facts.

The Supreme Court was called upon to determine the result of an election while in the present case the court was called upon to determine the constitutionality of particular acts. According to counsel, one considers nominations campaigns polling counting tallying and declaration of results, the other considers policemen running all over the country unleashing violence and violating the Constitution. In one the Court inquiries into a legal process while the other it inquiries into an illegal process. The test cannot be the same.

Substantial effect was defined as the effect must be calculated to really influence the result in significant manner" Counsel argued that, if that was applied to the present set of facts, it would mean proof that the action of the police were calculated to influence the consultation in a significant manner. That with greatest respect shows the inapplicability of applying the test. According to counsel, the constitutional limitations were intended to impact the Members of Parliament and not the process and its results.

If the test is applicable, then the Court would have to determine what the result of the consultation was. Can the views on a bill be quantified the same way votes can? I submit not. How would one handle a view which says;

"I support removal of age limit provided term limit is reinstated: or I support the inclusion of the recommendations of the Supreme court but I do not support the removal of the age limit?".

According to counsel, the outcomes of the consultations cannot be equated to the number of votes obtained by candidates.

Lastly counsel submitted that unlike in election petitions it is impossible to prove the extent of the constitutional limits imposed by police, the degree of such limitations and the substantial effect they had on the outcome of the consultations. Counsel contended that it is impossible to measure the degree of curtailed speech or restricted movement of a member of parliament. A right cannot be quantified the same way votes can. How does the failure of a member to go to a particular constituency because of limitations be related to result of the consultations? Clearly the test cannot apply.

Counsel for the appellant submitted that the wrongful application of the test prevented the court from applying the proper test which is whether the limitations imposed by the police were justified. He argued that where a directive by any organ of the state is sent to all districts of Uganda requiring police officers all over the country to breach the Constitution and indeed there is evidence that the directive was complied with in any part of the country, the burden shifts to the respondent to prove that the limitations were either necessary to protect the rights of others or that it was in public interest to do so. Where the respondent fails to do so, as was in this case, the petitioner has proved breach of the Constitution. All that remains is the remedy.

Counsel submitted that it cannot be argued that violations of the Constitution have to be widespread throughout the country for the Court to invalidate the Constitutional Amendment Act (the subject of the constitutional breaches). That the test ought to be whether the violations contributed or had the effect of contributing to the enactment of the Act. If in the affirmative the Act ought not to stand. According to counsel, there is abundant evidence that the violations in and out of Parliament had that effect.

He submitted that the directive speaks for itself. It reminds all Regional Police Commanders, District Police Commanders, Directors, the IGP, the Deputy IGP that there is a proposal to amend the constitution" to remove presidential age limits" (it does not refer to the other provisions of the Bill). Only the age limit.

Counsel further submitted that the directive then requires all police officers to all over Uganda to stop any Member of Parliament moving or "intending to move" to a constituency other than his or hers. "A member consulting in any other constituency must be stopped……". According to counsel, it was in furtherance of this that the police violated the Constitution. He argued that the subsequent actions of the police cannot be separated from the age limit specifically mentioned in the directive. The author of the directive wants the recipients to know that limiting fundamental human rights they are called upon to do is linked to the passage of the Bill.

The limitations were calculated to increase the chances of removing the age limit from the Constitution. The constitutional violations cannot be delinked from section 3 of the Constitution Amendment Act. Since the constitutional limitations were intended to facilitate its passage, the redress the court can give must be in relation to that section. According to counsel, the only remedy available is to strike that section down.

Counsel submitted that if the court had not applied the substantiality test, it would have come to this conclusion. To hold otherwise is to send a message that the Court will tolerate violations of the Constitution. That is the surest way for us to return to our dark past ably spelt out in the Preamble to the Constitution i.e. our history being characterized by political and constitutional instability. A message has to go out that it is expensive to breach the Constitution and there will be a price to pay. A slap on the wrist is to play around with the future of our children and their children. This Court ought not to countenance that. Only then will the rule of law and continued stability be guaranteed. The Constitutional Court is the Guarantor but with the greatest respect it failed to protect us and future generations. It emboldened those who will breach the Constitution.

He contended that once the Court found Constitutional violations as it did, it was required to make a declaration to that effect and grant redress.

Counsel prayed for court to substitute the order of the Constitutional Court with one striking down section 3 of the Act.

Attorney General's Submissions

The Attorney General submitted that the Constitutional Court correctly applied the substantiality test and in so doing reached a proper conclusion.

He relied on the finding of Odoki, C.J in Kizza Besigye Vs Yoweri Museveni Kaguta Election Petition No.1 of 2001, the learned Chief Justice, where he stated the evaluation tests for the effect of noncompliance on an election. He stated,

"In order to assess the effect, court has to evaluate the whole process for the election to determine how it affected the result and then asses the degree of the effect. In this process of evaluation, it cannot be said that numbers are not important just as the conditions which produce those numbers. Numbers are useful in making adjustment for irregularities. The crucial point is that there must be cogent evidence direct or circumstantial to establish not only the effect of non-compliance or irregularities but to satisfy the court that the effect on the result was substantial".

The Attorney General submitted that the substantiality test is used as a tool of evaluation of evidence. To fault the Court for applying the substantiality test in a constitutional petition meant that a court in interpreting the Constitution should not apply a tool of evaluation in determination of the matter before it, that proposition would be absurd.

He contended that the test is derived directly from the law or may be adopted by a Judge while evaluating the evidence. Therefore, whether it is constitutional court, or an ordinary suit, it is trite that the matter or matters in controversy should be determined after a proper evaluation of evidence.

He cited the case of Nanjibhai Prabhudas& Co. Ltd versus Standard Bank Ltd [1968] E.A 670 where it was held that the Courts should not treat any incorrect act as a nullity with the consequence that everything founded thereon is itself a nullity, unless the incorrect act is of a most fundamental nature. In my view the alleged non-compliance is a procedural irregularity, which is not of a most fundamental nature, as to render a law null and void. The import from the above is that there was general compliance with the constitutional requirements and procedure for the enactment of the impugned Act.

He pointed out that it was pertinent to note that what the court addressed was the lack of evidence to prove that the scuffles and interferences affected the entire process in passing the Bill into law. The Court's evaluation of evidence and resulting decision is not exclusively based on the quantitative test. The Court considered the nature of the alleged noncompliance and rightly reached a conclusion that the quantum and quality of evidence presented to prove the violation must were not sufficient to satisfy nullifying the entire process.

He argued that the facts of this case, the process in Parliament was not negatively affected as was observed by the majority Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court. That the Learned Hon Lady Justice Elisabeth Musoke, JA applied the Quantitative Test (verifying the impact of noncompliance or inaccuracy on the actual vote numbers and final outcome).

The Attorney General submitted that the qualitative requirements appraise the entire legislative process prior to and during tabling motion for leave, tabling bill for First Reading, consideration by the Committee, debate, voting and assent to the Bill. There was thus substantial compliance.

The two tests were expounded in Winnie Babihunga v. Masiko Winnie Komuhangi & Others, HTC-OO-CV-EP-004-2001 where it was stated;

"The quantitative test was said to be most relevant where numbers and figures are in question whereas the qualitative test in most suitable where the quality of the entire process is questioned and the court has to determine whether or not the election was free and fair."

He therefore argued that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court found that the few instances of irregularities did not adversely affect the process of passing the impugned Act.

The Attorney General submitted that the question that begs an answer is therefore whether the Court was wrong to use that test and in so doing failed to properly evaluate the evidence and reached a wrong conclusion.

He contended that a perusal of the pleadings (petitions and affidavit) of the Appellant showed that he was seeking the Constitutional Court to determine the effect of certain events/actions/commissions that occurred during the process of enacting the impugned Act on the entire Process/Promulgation of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, No. 1 of 2018.

That the Appellant pleaded and argued in the Constitutional Court that the entire process of amending the Constitution from the tabling of the Bill, to the passing thereof, were compromised and the whole process was marred/tainted with such illegalities, irregularities and violence.

He therefore argued that the Petitioners did not adduce credible evidence to show that such violence and intimidation affected the validity of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, No. 1 of 2018.

He also pointed out that the big question that should be raised is what then is the standard of proof in dealing with Constitutional matters, most especially where the matters touch on amendment and breaches of the Constitution? Is the standard of proof different from the usual on the balance of probabilities?

The Attorney General submitted that it was not in dispute that the common law concept of burden of proof that whoever desires any court to give judgment as to any legal right or liability dependent on the existence of facts which he or she asserts must prove that those facts exist. In this case therefore, it is common ground that it is the Appellant who bore the burden of proving to the required standard that, there were such irregularities/violence that affected the result of the entire passing of the Bill into law and should be nullified.

He noted that the form of evidence that was presented during the hearing of the Petition was both affidavit and oral evidence. A scrutiny and evaluation of the above evidence did not support the Petitioners' assertion of such widespread/massive irregularities and violence that would have led

Court to nullify the entire resultant Act.

He concluded by supporting the conclusion of the Court that the evidence did not disclose any profound irregularity in the management of the legislative process for the enactment of the impugned Act, nor did it prove that the participation of some members of Parliament was gravely affected. The parts that were so affected were rightly severed by the Court. He submitted that in this particular case, the Constitutional court was right to inquire into the extent of the alleged massive irregularities and in so applying the qualitative and quantitative test, it considered whether the errors, and irregularities identified sufficiently challenged the entire legislative process and lead to a legal conclusion that the Bill was not passed in compliance with the requirements of the constitution.

In conclusion, Attorney invited this Court to uphold the finding of the Constitutional court that certain irregularities/errors were mere technicalities and were not fatal to sufficiently invalidate the entire process of enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, No. 1 of 2018.

Court's Determination of Issue 4

The Substantiality test as applied in Election Petitions simply means that even if court was to find that an election was not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in those provisions, it is required to find that non-compliance affected the results of an election in a substantial manner.

Section 62 of the Parliamentary Elections Act (2005) as amended

62. Grounds for setting aside election

(1) The election of a candidate as a member of Parliament shall only be set aside on any of the following grounds if proved to the satisfaction of the court—

(a) non-compliance with the provisions of this Act relating to elections, if the court is satisfied that there has been failure toconduct the election in accordance with the principles laid down inthose provisions and that the non-compliance and the failureaffected the result of the election in a substantial manner;

(b) That a person other than the one elected won the election; or

(c) That an illegal practice or any other offence under this Act wascommitted in connection with the election by the candidatepersonally or with his or her knowledge and consent or approval; or

(d) That the candidate was at the time of his or her election not qualified or was disqualified for election as a Member of Parliament.

(2) Where an election is set aside, then, subject to section 64, a fresh election shall be held as if it were a by-election in accordance with section 4 of this Act.

(3) Any ground specified in subsection (1) of this section shall be proved on the basis of a balance of probabilities.

Section 57 of the Presidential Elections Act as amended

57. Challenging a presidential election.

Any aggrieved candidate may petition the Supreme Court for an order that a candidate declared elected as President was not validly elected.

A petition under subsection (1) shall be in a form prescribed by the Chief Justice under subsection (11) and shall be lodged in the Supreme Court registry within ten days after the declaration of the election results.

The Supreme Court shall inquire into and determine the petition expeditiously and shall declare its finding not later than thirty days from the date the petition is filed.

Where no petition is filed within the time prescribed under subsection (2), or where a petition having been filed, is withdrawn by the person who filed it or is dismissed by the Supreme Court, the candidate declared elected shall conclusively be taken to have been duly elected as President.

After due inquiry under subsection (3), the Supreme Court may— dismiss the petition; declare which candidate was validly elected; or annul the election.

The election of a candidate as President shall only be annulled on any of the following grounds if proved to the satisfaction of the court—non compliance with the provisions of this Act, if the court issatisfied that the election was not conducted in accordance with theprinciples laid down in those provisions and that the non compliance affected the result of the election in a substantial manner;

That the candidate was at the time of his or her election not qualified or was disqualified for election as President;

That an illegal practice or any other offence under this Act wascommitted in connection with the election by the candidate personally or with his or her knowledge and consent or approval.

Nothing in this section confers on the Supreme Court when hearing an election petition power to convict a person for a criminal offence.

Where upon hearing a petition and before coming to a decision, the court is satisfied that a recount is necessary and practical, it may order a recount of the votes cast.

Where it appears to the Supreme Court on hearing an election petition under this section that the facts before it disclose that a criminal offence may have been committed, it shall make a report on the matter to the Director of Public Prosecutions for appropriate action to be taken and shall state in the report the name of the person, the nature of the offence and any other information that the court may consider relevant and appropriate for the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Where an election is annulled, a fresh election shall be held within twenty days from the date of the annulment.

The Chief Justice shall, in consultation with the Attorney General, make rules providing for the conduct of petitions under this Act. (Underlining provided)

It was a misdirection for the Constitutional Court to apply the substantiality test as it is applied in Electoral matters. Secondly the Parliamentary Elections Act and Presidential Elections Act make a clear distinction between an illegal practice where the substantiality test is applicable and an electoral offence where the test is not applicable.

I would put an unconstitutional act in the category of cases where it is impossible to apply the substantiality test as I illustrate below from the Attorney General's argument.

The Attorney General argued that the substantiality test is used as tool of evaluation of evidence and I agree, however the purpose for which the evaluation is required becomes relevant. If the evaluation of evidence is for determination of an election result the test is specifically provided for by the statutes cited in this judgement. If the test was for general application in evaluation of evidence it would not be necessary to specifically provide for it in election related matters. On the other hand, if the evaluation of evidence is related to interpretation of the Constitution under Article 137 Clause 3 of the Constitution, the substantiality test is irrelevant because once a petitioner makes a case that an 'act' or 'Act' is inconsistent with or in contravention of a provision of the Constitution the proof of inconsistency or contravention does not require application of the substantiality test.

In my view a constitutional infringement in relation to any 'act' or 'Act' that is declared unconstitutional under Article 137 (3) (b) of the Constitution cannot be subjected to the substantiality test. An infringement on the supreme law which is the Constitution is a grave matter. Its interpretation does not go beyond the declaration unless there is need for redress under Article 137 (4) of the constitution.

Issue No. 5

This issue was framed as follows:

"Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves when they held that the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 on the removal of the age limit for the President and Local Council V offices was not inconsistent with the provisions of the 1995 Constitution?"

Appellants' Submissions

Submissions of MPs

The MPs argued this issue together with issue 4

Submissions of ULS

Counsel for the appellant had in paragraph 1(d) of the Petition in Constitution Petition 3 of 2018

challenged the removal of the age limit and supported it with the affidavits of Professor Sempebwa, Professor Latigo and Francis Gimara. The issue was also argued in the lower Court. Counsel's complaint is that none of the evidence was evaluated nor the arguments considered. The challenged provision was not tested as against Articles 8A and 38. Counsel submitted that if the court had considered the Appellant's case, it would have come to a different conclusion.

Counsel submitted that peaceful transfer of power and orderly succession of Government is a principle of democracy which ought to be used in interpretation of the Constitution. He cited the case of Sekikubo and others vs. Attorney General (supra) for application of democratic principles. According to counsel, the Court below did not consider this argument and therefore made no decision on it.

Counsel referred to the affidavit of Professor Sempebwa which refers to the Constitutional Review Commission which was specifically mandated to examine sovereignty of the people, democracy and good governance and how to ensure that the country is governed in accordance with the will of the people. However, as found in the evidence of Professor Sempebwa, Professor Latigo and Francis Gimara there was abuse of human rights, violence, harassment, humiliation, assault and illegal detentions all of which negate a conducive atmosphere to genuinely seek the views of the people.

He submitted that those reasons advanced in respect of term limits equally apply in respect of a non-limit on age.

Counsel argued that the evidence of Professor Sempebwa is also to the effect that the conflict in Uganda is instigated by unchecked executive power and unlimited incumbency to the position of president.

Counsel referred to the Odoki Commission report on the questions of orderly succession and clinging to power via disregard of constitutional provision.

He contended that, had the Court held that orderly succession is one of the principles of democracy, it would have come to the conclusion that given our history, removal of the age limit is in conflict of with orderly succession and peaceful transfer of power and therefore inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A and 38 of the Constitution. According to counsel, the Court would have nullified the Act if it has considered all these facts.

Counsel submitted that the process of consultations invalidates the Act inclusive of Section 3. He referred to the authority of Robert Gakuru which deals with public participation. The following are the discerned principles;

(i) Invitation must be given to those participating sufficient time to prepare

(ii) In Adequate time must be given to the public to study the Bill consider their stand and formulate representatives to be made

The legislature should facilitate public involvement

Parliament should create conditions that are conducive to the effective exercise of the right to participate

(v) Parliament should designate places where consultations would be held.

Counsel submitted that there were no consultations in contravention of Articles 1, 8A and 38 of the Constitution that invalidate the Act. He argued that, since the consultations were primarily in respect of the age limit, Section 3 cannot stand.

Submissions of Mabirizi

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that removal of the age limit under Article 102 was a 'constitutional replacement' which has no place in a constitutional democracy. He referred to Carlos Bernal's Article, Unconstitutional constitutional amendments in the case study of Colombia: an analysis of the justification and meaning of the constitutional replacement doctrine, published in International Journal of Constitutional Law, Volume 11, Issue 2, 1 April 2013, Pages 339–357, which demonstrated what the standard for determining Constitutional Replacement. Bernal laid down the seven-tiered test. According to Mabirizi the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 is nothing more than a partial constitutional Replacement which cannot stand.

Mabirizi submitted that, in the instant case, the essential element of the constitution which is at stake is the qualifications/capacity of the president/fountain of Honour which is underpinned under 63 provisions of the Constitution.

That the element of qualifications/capacity of the president/fountain of Honour is essential because of the huge powers and duties vested in the president. Those powers were balanced in such a way that the president is neither too young nor too old. Removal of such may have grave consequences on exercise of such powers in the 63 provisions. Although the element of qualifications of the president are essential, that is not to say that they are eternal, not capable of amendment but can only be amended in a compliant and careful way not to destroy the entire constitutional system & base. That the essential element of the restricted qualifications of a president has been opened-up and the unrestricted qualities of a president is in conflict with restricted qualifications.

That the powers to remove the age limit only rests in a constituent assembly not parliament since it amounts to a constitutional replacement. Mabirizi contented that, upholding of section 3 of the Act will deharmonize the constitution so as to render among others Articles 51(3), 144(1)(a) & (b), 146(2)(a) &163(11) unconstitutional, which is against the spirit of the Constitution. That it will open a flood-gate of private members' bills to amend those Articles which have age restrictions.

Attorney General's Submission in Reply

The Attorney General submitted that the appellants challenged the removal of the Age limit from the Constitution in Constitutional Petition No.5 of 2018. That the appellants contend that that section 3 and 7 of the impugned Act which scrapped the age limit qualification for election to the office of the President and district Chairperson amended Article 1 of the Constitution by infection. They further contend that Parliament also amended Article 21(3) of the Constitution creating another form of discrimination to wit; age.

The Attorney General contended that the Justices of the Constitutional Court correctly directed themselves to the law by holding that amendment of Articles 102(b) and 183(2)(b) did not in any way infect Article 1 of the Constitution.

He cited Article 1 which states that, all power belongs to the people who shall express their will and consent on who shall govern them and how they should be governed, through regular, free and fair elections of their representatives or through referenda.

Parliament is enjoined to make laws under Article 79 and 259 and this power is exercised through bills passed by Parliament and assented to by the President. (see Article 91(1) of the Constitution)

The Attorney General submitted that the Justices of the Constitutional Court were unanimous and rightly held that this power extends to Articles 102 and 183. The Justices of the Constitutional Court rightly observed that Parliament had the power through the established Constitutional procedures to amend the provisions of Articles 102 (b) and 183 (2) (b). He contended that, contrary to the appellants' argument in C.A No. 3/2018 that the amendment takes way the sovereignty of the people of Uganda enshrined under Article 1, the respondents agree with the finding of the Court that in amending Articles 102 (b) and 183 (2) (b), the sovereignty of the people is not infected at all.

In contrast, the effect of this amendment is to open up space and widen the scope of persons who are eligible to stand for election to the office of the president. According to counsel, the amendment actually safeguards the sovereignty of the people as enshrined under Article 1 of the Constitution because the people of Uganda shall have a wider pool of leaders to choose from.

The Attorney General agreed with the finding of the Constitutional Court that the amendment of Article 102 (b) did not in way infect the provisions of Article 21 (3) of the Constitution.

The Attorney General submitted that the appellant in C.A No. 2/2018 advances the theory of Constitutional replacement. That the appellant argues that the amendment of Article 102 to remove the age limit qualification for election to the office of the President amounts to Constitutional replacement. He labours to justify this assertion by citing various Constitutional provisions which he claims vest so much power in the office of the president and goes on to peddle without any proof or authority the notion that a president must not be too young or too old as a justification for the restriction on age as a qualification for election to the office of the President.

The Attorney General concurred with the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court that the amendment of Article 102 (b) does not amount to a Constitutional replacement. He averred that Article 102 (b) provides that; - a person is not qualified for election as President unless the person is not less than thirty-five years and not more than seventyfive years of age. According to counsel, the amendment of Article 102(b) did not undermine any of the 63 provisions of the Constitution cited by the petitioner or any other provision of the Constitution. Counsel contended that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court rightly directed themselves to the law in holding that amendment of Article 102 (b) did not amount to Constitutional replacement of Article 1.

The Attorney General submitted that Article 1 (1), 1 (4) illustrates that power belongs to the people and is exercised through elections of their representatives. According to counsel, the Justices of the Constitutional Court rightly observed that Parliament had the power through the established Constitutional procedures to amend the provisions of Articles 102 (b) and 183 (2) (b). He cited Article 259 of the Constitution which vests Parliament with powers to amend by way of addition, variation or repeal, any provision of this Constitution in accordance with the procedure laid down in Chapter Eighteen. That the Justices of the Constitutional Court were unanimous and rightly so that this power extends to Articles 102 and 183. Counsel entirely concurred with the Constitutional Court that the qualifications for election to the office of the President and Local Council V Chairpersons can and should be amended by the people's representatives where circumstances that necessitate the change arise. He added that the appellant's argument that upholding section 3 of the Amendment Act will disharmonize Articles 51(3), 144(1)(a) and (b), 146(2)(a) and 163(11) of the Constitution is speculative and lacks merit. According to counsel, it is not against the spirit of the Constitution and upholding the appellant's argument would curtail the right of Members of Parliament to bring bills in accordance with Article 94 (4)(b) of the Constitution.

The Attorney General argued that the amendment of Article 102 (b) was not a Constitution making process that requires a Constituent Assembly. According to counsel, it was an amendment process which the peoples' representatives are empowered to do in accordance with Chapter Eighteen of the Constitution.

The Attorney General agreed with the finding of the Constitutional Court that the amendment of Article 102(b) and 183 did not contravene any provisions of the Constitution.

The Attorney General submitted that the appellants raised no grounds in reference to this particular issue. That their submissions are therefore not premised on any grounds contrary to the provisions of rule 82 of Judicature (supreme Court Rules) Directions which are mandatory.

The Attorney General prayed that the Appellants' submissions to this particular issue be disregarded by this Court. That without prejudice to the above, the appellants challenged the removal of the Age limit qualification for election to the offices of President and District Chairpersons respectively from the Constitution in Constitutional Petition No.3 of 2018. In their submissions they allege that the Constitutional Court did not consider her evidence thus reaching a wrong conclusion. They claim that if the Constitutional Court had considered their submissions in regard to the infection of Articles 8A and 38 of the Constitution by the amendment to Article 102 (b), Court would have come to a different conclusion.

According to the Attorney General, the amendment did not in any way take away the people's right to choose who leads them in free and fair elections held regularly every five years. That it is on this basis that the Constitutional Court found that the enactment of sections 3 and 7 of the Constitutional Amendment Act No. 1 0f 2018 did not infringe on the basic structure of the Constitution and therefore was not inconsistent with and or in contravention of the Constitution.

Submissions in reply by ULS

The 3rd appellant challenged section 3 which removed the 75 years age limit.

In Ground 2 of its memorandum of appeal the 3rd appellant objects to the finding by the lower court that the entire process of conceptualizing and enactment of the Constitution [Amendment] Act did not contravene the Constitution. In its prayer the 3rd appellant specifically prays that section 3 of the Constitution [Amendment] Act 2018 be annulled and declared unconstitutional Counsel submitted that in the consolidated the petitions in the lower court, this particular issue was argued both under issues 6 and 12[volume 1 pages 136, 195, 257, 288, 355 and 404] As seen from prayer 2(ii) in the memorandum of Appeal it is specifically prayed that section 3 of the Act be declared unconstitutional for inconsistence with Articles 1, 8A, 38, 105(1), and 260(1). This prayer arises from ground 2. This is also in line with the petition of the appellant.

Counsel submitted that it was framed as an issue and agreed to by the Respondent. He argued that it is rather late for the Respondent to attack an issue agreed upon as arising out of the grounds of appeal and argue it as never raised.

Counsel submitted that Rule 82 is not applicable. It amounts to raising a preliminary objection in reply to submissions. Further this offends the whole purpose of scheduling at which issues to be submitted on were agreed upon. In any case Rule 98© allows a ground set forth or implicit in the memorandum of appeal. All is required is an opportunity for the respondent to be heard which the respondent has done.

Court's Determination of Issue No.5

In my finding in issue No.1 above, I have opined that the constitution is amendable as longer as the procedure laid down in Chapter 18 of the constitution is followed. Under Article 79 of the Constitution, Parliament is mandated to carry out the following functions; -

Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, Parliament shall have power to make laws on any matter for the peace, order, development and good governance of Uganda.

Except as provided in this Constitution, no person or body other than Parliament shall have power to make provisions having the force of law in Uganda except under authority conferred by an Act of Parliament.

(3) Parliament shall protect this Constitution and promote the democratic governance of Uganda.

The petitioners/appellants put forward arguments against removal of age limits while the Attorney General Vehemently defends their removal. I would not go into the merits or demerits of the removal of age limits because if the people of Uganda through their representatives decide to remove them the debate goes to the legislature and not to the Constitutional Court. Evidence was adduced of what transpired during the debate in parliament and it is very clear that is where the debate belongs. The issue is answered in the negative.

Issue 6

This issue was framed as follows:

"Whether the Constitutional Court erred in law and in fact in holding that the President elected in 2016 is not liable to vacate office on attaining the age of 75 years?"

Appellants' Submissions

Submissions by Mabirizi

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that, had the learned justices harmonized Article 83(1)(b) with 102(b) of the constitution, they would have found that the president elected in 2016 ceases to hold office on attaining 75 years of age.

He adopted his submissions in the lower court on this issue and added that by calling upon court to make an interpretation that a president ceases to be qualified to hold office the moment he/she ceases to posess the qualifications which were the basis of his/her qualifications, he called upon them to perform their duty of harmonization as elaborated by Odoki CJ in the case of Ssemwogerere when he stated that: "...It is not a question of construing one provision as against another but of giving effect to all the provisions of the' Constitution. This is because each provision is an integral part of the Constitution and must be given meaning or effect in relation to others. Failure to do so will lead to an apparent conflict within the Constitution."

Mr. Mabirizi submitted that this is because the constitution, sets similar qualifications for the holders of all national elected offices and Local council V chairman but they do not repeat them in every Article. They are pegged on that of a member of Parliament the reason why Article 102(c) for president states that "a person qualified to be a member of Parliament" and Article 183(2)(a) for District Chairperson goes that "qualified to be elected a member of Parliament', 108A(1) for Prime minister states that 'persons qualified to be elected members of Parliament', 113(1) for ministers reads that 'persons qualified to be elected members of Parliament'

Therefore, with proper intentions of interpretation and harmonization of the Constitution, no one can divorce the qualifications and disqualifications of a president from those of a Member of Parliament, prime minister, minister or a district chairperson, unless the constitution is explicit on that difference.

Just like how Article 80 prescribes what is expected of a person at nomination, Article 102(b) prescribes the nature of a person to appear for nomination. This has nothing to do with what happens after nomination and possibly elections. He prayed that this issue be answered in affirmative, in the spirit of posterity of our constitution and to ensure that all its provisions are harmonized.

Respondent's Submissions

The Attorney General submitted that this issue was only raised by Mr. Male Mabirizi. It arises from grounds 76 and 77 of the appellant's memorandum of appeal in C.A No. 2/2018. The Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court rightly directed themselves to the law when they found that Articles 102 (b) which provide for the qualifications of a person wishing to stand for election to the offices of President, purely relate to the qualifications prior to nomination for election and not during the person's term in office. Article 102 (b) of the Constitution before the amendment provided that; A person is not qualified for election as President unless that person is not less than thirty-five years and not more than seventy-five years of age;

The Attorney General emphasized that the Constitutional Court considered the provisions of Article 102 and unanimously found that the provisions therein purely relate to the qualifications prior to nomination for election and not during the person's term in office. In interpreting the Constitution, the basic principle to be followed is that where the words of the Constitution are clear and unambiguous, then they ought to be given their primary, plain, ordinary and natural meaning.

That from the onset, Article 102 is clear that it provides for the qualifications for a person to be elected President. In other words, one must be seized with these qualifications prior to being elected to the office of the President. The learned Justices of the Constitutional Court were unanimous that this issue had no merit and rightly resolved that Article 102 refers to qualification prior to being elected as President. See Judgment of Justice Keneth Kakuru, Justice Remmy Kasule at and Justice Owiny A.C. Dollo.

The Attorney General concurred with the finding of the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court that a President elected in 2016 is not liable to vacate office on attaining the age of 75 years.

Court's Determination of Issue No.6

This issue was framed at Constitutional court as Issue No.13 and stated as:-

"13. Whether the continuance in office of the President of Uganda by one who was elected in 2016 and who attained the age of 75 years is inconsistent with or in ntravention of Articles 83(1)(b) and 102(c) of the Constitution."

All the Constitutional Court Justices found that the office of the President does not become vacant on the incumbent attaining the age of 75 years.

One of the principles of the Constitutional interpretation already stated in this judgement and explained by the Attorney General in his submissions is that where the words of the constitution are clear and unambiguous they ought to be given their primary, ordinary and natural meaning.

I am in full agreement with the Constitutional court and my interpretation of Article 102(b) of the constitution is that the Qualifications referred to are pre- nomination qualifications and not midterm. I do not think that the framers of the Constitution intended for example that a seventy four year old person would be qualified for elections but a year later he or she no longer qualifies and the Country goes through another election.

Article 102(b) of the constitution should be read together with Article 105 which provides that:-

105. Tenure of office of the President.

A person elected President under this Constitution shall, subject to clause (3) of this Article, hold office for a term of five years.

A person may be elected under this Constitution to hold office as President for one or more terms as prescribed by this Article.

(3) The office of President shall become vacant—on the expiration of the period specified in this Article; or if the incumbent dies or resigns or ceases to hold office under Article 107 of this Constitution.

So quite clearly the office of the president does not become vacant on attainment of seventy five years of age of the incumbent. The issue is answered in the negative.

Issue 8

This issue was framed as follows:

"What remedies are available to the parties?"

Appellants' Submission

The MPs submission.

The counsel prayed that the appeal be allowed in the terms and prayers specified in the Memorandum of Appeal and specifically that the Constitution (Amendment) Act, No. 1 of 2018 be annulled and that the Respondent pays costs of this Appeal and in the Court below.

In the alternative but without prejudice to the foregoing, they prayed that if court answers issue 7 in the affirmative a retrial should be ordered.

Submissions by ULS

Counsel relied on the authority of Tinyefuza vrs Attorney General Appeal 1 of 1997 Oder JSC at page 37 which cited with approval the case of Troop vs. Dulles where the Supreme Court of the US stated that:

"The provisions of the Constitution are not time-worn adages or hollow shibboleths. They are vital. Living principles that authorize and limit government power in our nation. They are rules of government. When the constitutionality of an Act of Congress is challenged in this Court, we must apply those rules. If we do not the words of the Constitution become little more than good advise"

Oder JSC then went on to say

"These remarks were cited with approval in Zimbabwe Supreme Court in the case of A Juvenile vrs the State [1989] LCR [Const.] 774 at 789 by Dumbutshena CJ. I agree with the remarks of the US Supreme Court. It is the duty of this Supreme Court of Uganda to enforce the paramount commands of this Constitution. I have already said in this judgment that, following highly persuasive opinions from courts in the commonwealth, that court should apply generous and purposive construction of the provisions of the Constitution that give effect to and recognition of fundamental rights".

Counsel went on and submitted that Article 20(2) requires all organs and agencies of government to uphold and promote rights and freedoms enshrined in the Constitution

That Article 137(4)(a) of the Constitution provide that Court may grant an order of redress in addition to the declarations sought.

That the Petition before the court shows that the violations and limitations to the fundamental rights and freedoms do not even come near any of the possible defenses in Article 43. That there is callousness and extreme disregard for humanity in the manner the violations were carried out.

He noted that the Judges lamented over the conduct of Constitutional violators. Elizabeth Musoke JCC at line 1789 page 70 stated "therefore although the said violence and restrictions in themselves are to be condemned in the strongest terms……. Cheborion Barishaki JCC at line 25 page 210 makes it clear that the treatment of members of Parliament was inhuman and degrading and their arrest and detention uncalled for. Owiny – Dollo Dy CJ castigates military intervention page 545 as does Kasule JCC.

That clearly the court appears to appreciate that the security forces crossed the red line. Indeed, in many instances the Court holds that the constitutional limitations were not justifiable though no declarations are made.

It was his submission that this was not just violation of the Constitution, it was a well thought out strategy to facilitate enactment of the Act as he submitted above. That it was calculated to end a message to the Members of Parliament and their constituents that opposition to the Bill was a red line for government. Counsel submitted that it was intended to instill terror and fear.

In addition, he also submitted that also the emboldened of the army that grievously beating up our Members of Parliament to an extent of long hospitalization is now acceptable. It is for these reasons that he submits that redress must be tied to the Act. That the country must know that there is a price to pay for contravention of the Constitution. Nullifying the Act is the only remedy. That then in future individuals in government shall not look at violence as a means of achieving their objectives, there will always be the fear that the objective will not be achieved.

Counsel prayed that the Petition be allowed. Declarations and redress as stated herein above be granted. That Issues 2 3 4 and 5 be answered in the affirmative. That just as in the lower Court the Appellant in Appeal Number 4 of 2018 did not seek costs of the Appeal but prays for disbursements only.

Submissions by Mabirizi

He prayed that court nullifies the entire process in the Constitutional Court for reasons stated above. That however, given the nature of this dispute, in the alternative court nullifies the entire law in order to reassert the relevancy of courts in Constitutional development of this country as was done by this court in Ssemwogerere V. Ag(supra), the Constitutional Court in Oloka-Onyango & 9 Ors V. Ag(supra) and the then Constitutional Court in Ssempebwa V. Ag(supra).

That the above position is supported by Nwokoro & Ors V. Onuma & Anor-Nigeria(supra) where ESO, JSC, held that "It is a fundamental principle of legality that where an act or course of conduct fails to meet with the requirements prescribed by law, such that the non-compliance renders the act or course of conduct devoid of legal effect no legal consequences flow from such acts or course of conduct…"

It was his submission that since it is clear that the entire process of introducing, processing and enactment of The Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 was flawed, in addition to other factors discussed above, the entire process was vitiated rendering the Act unconstitutional, null and void.

He prayed for general damages and full costs of the case in this court and the court below with an interest of 25% per annum from the date of judgment till payment in full, putting in mind the Ugandan experience as expressed by Twinomujuni, JA in Akpm Lutaaya V. Ag(supra) that "…from Ugandans experience, he is likely to chase the proceeds of this decree for yet many years to come."

The Attorney General's Submissions.

The Attorney General contended that the Appellants have not made out any case on appeal to justify this Court reversing and/ or varying the decision of the Constitutional Court of Uganda of 26th July 2018 in the Consolidated Constitutional Petitions. In the premises, the Attorney General prayed that the Honourable Court finds that the appeal lacks merit and thereby dismisses the appeal accordingly with costs to the Respondent and declined to grant all prayers specified and orders sought in the Memoranda of Appeal.

The Attorney General further prayed that this Honourable Court be pleased to affirm and uphold the findings of the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court of Uganda in their Judgment of 26th July 2018 that sections 1, 3, 4 and 7 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 which remove age limits for the President and Chairperson of Local Council V to contest for election to the respective offices and for implementation of the recommendations of the Supreme court in Presidential Election Petition No. 1; AmamaMbabazi vs. Yoweri Museveni were lawfully enacted in full compliance with the Constitution and valid provisions of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, No. 1 of 2018.

In regard to the alternative prayer that the court orders a retrial, it is ontended for the Attorney General that this prayer is, with all due respect, misconceived and ought to be denied as the Appellants have not adduced evidence before this Honorable Court to warrant issuance of an order for a retrial. The respondent prays that the prayer for a retrial be denied.

Regarding the prayer for general damages with interest at 25% per annum from the date of judgment that it is trite that general damages are awarded to restore a party to a position he or she was in before he suffered injury, loss or inconvenience arising from a breach of duty or obligation. That general damages are awarded to fulfil the common law remedy of restitutio in integrum meaning the innocent party is to be placed so far as money can do so in the same position as if he had not suffered loss or inconvenience arising out of a violation.

It is contended for the Attorney General that the Appellant has not proved or adduced evidence to show that he suffered any material inconvenience or at all a loss by the passing of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018. Damages are usually measured by the material loss suffered by a party. It is thus submitted for the Respondent that the Appellant's claim for general damages with interest at 25% per annum from the date of judgment until payment in full is misconceived and ought to be denied.

Court's Determination of Issue No.8

It follows from my finding that as a consequence of a number of 'acts' that infringed on the Constitution in the process of enactment of the Constitutional (Amendment) Act 2018, the Act cannot be allowed to stand 20 and is hereby annulled.

It also follows from my findings and declarations that there were 'acts' which were inconsistent with and in contravention of the constitution the prayer for nullification of the entire Constitutional (Amendment) Act of 2018 is granted.

On costs I would order that each party meets its own cots.

Dated at Kampala this ..... day of ..... 2019. .....

JUSTICE ELDAD MWANGUSYA

JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT

EXEGESIS OF THE GOPSPEL ACCORDING TO MWANGUSYA, JSC

In 2017, Hon. Raphael Magyezi, a Member of the 10th Parliament of the Republic of Uganda, brought a Private Member's Bill (Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017). On the 27th December, 2017, Parliament passed the Bill eliminating Presidential Age Limit and extending Parliamentary Term. The Ugandan Parliament passed an amendment to the Constitution which, among other measures, aims to eliminate the requirement that candidates vying for the presidency be under 75 years of age.

The court again by a 4-1 majority upheld the larger Bill applying severally the doctrine of severance to save the repeal of the age limit even though all the justices unanimously found unconstitutional means that were used to stifle the MPs' access to their constituents through the police.

Dissatisfied with part of the decision of the Constitutional Court, the appellants appealed to this Court. The Appellant in Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 2018 lodged a Memorandum of Appeal in the Supreme Court containing 84 grounds of appeal categorized under different parts. Issues for court's determination were framed out of the consolidated appeals.

MWANGUSYA, JSC

One of the considerations on appeal of the age limit petition was whether Article 102(b) constituted part of basic structure of the Constitution. Justice Mwanguya did not find it necessary to set down an exhaustive list of what constitutes the basic structure of Uganda's Constitution as he thought it as an exercise in futility. Amending Article 102 (b) and 183 (2) (b) did not violate the basic structure of Uganda's Constitution.

The Basic Structure Doctrine and the Preamble in Uganda

Given our history, the 1995 Constitution sought to bring a stop to cries that prior to its adoption were cries attributed to instructions of governance in Uganda. The 1995 Constitution looked backed at history and not in admiration of what it saw committed itself to building a better future. This it said could be achieved by establishing a socioeconomic and political order through a popular and durable national Constitution based on the principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and progress. The 1995 Constitution was verily an instrument that could lead Uganda to a better future but its failure to pass the test of time clouds the better future the Constitution intended to achieve with doubt.

The preamble to a Constitution has grown from serving as a mere introduction or preface to the substantive part of the Constitution to emerging as the document that lays down the basic structure of the Constitution. The preamble contains the fundamental values and guiding principles on which the Constitution is based. A preamble presents the history behind the Constitution's enactment, as well as the nation's core principles and values. It serves as a guiding light for Constitutional Judges to interpret the Constitution in its light. The Preamble is part of the Basic Structure of our Constitution and the authority of Parliament to amend a specific provision in the Constitution must be tested against the principles in the preamble.

The basic structure doctrine holds that the fundamental principles of the preamble of the Constitution have to be preserved for all times to come and that they cannot be amended out of the existence. There is though a limitation on the power of amendment by implication by the words of the preamble and therefore every provision of the Constitution is open to amendment, provided the foundation or basic structure of the Constitution is not removed, damaged or destroyed. The preamble is the root of the tree from which the provisions of the Constitution spring.

In the case of Anwar case, the Supreme Court of Bangladesh cited with approval the Indian case of Minerva and held that: "…this preamble is not only part of the Constitution but stands as an entrenched provision that cannot be amended by Parliament alone. ... If any provision can be called the pole star of the Constitution, then it is the preamble."

The Constitution gives the parliament the function to protect the constitution and promote democratic governance of Uganda, this makes the legislature the custodian of the people's volition hence giving it the responsibility to make the 1995 Constitution pass the test of time. Disappointingly however in the exodus of escaping the claimed upshots that Article 102 brings that called for its amendment, members of parliament were unsighted to the vision intended by the 1995 Constitution to yield democratic governance. The members of parliament traded the people's volition at a price of satisfying of their own desires when a torrent of accusations arose that NRM members of parliament in support of the removal of age limits where distributed cash to give the amendment a shove. This disappointingly is not the first amendment claimed to only be possible due to parliament's jobbery.

In reliance on the above-mentioned exposure of jobbery parliament alone cannot be relied on to ensure protection of the 1995 Constitution to achieve democratic governance in Uganda, as provisions of the Constitution that could help to achieve this goal fall one after the other, what can be done to ensure that the constitution is protected and democratic governance is promoted? Is the question to rise? And the answer to the raised question can be generated from Article 3(4) of the 1995Constitution that provides for the duty to protect the Constitution. In consideration that this duty extends to the Judiciary the Basic Structure Doctrine is that equipment the judicial organ of the government can activate in Uganda to cause there being a second well-armed organ of government to facilitate protection of the 1995 Constitution, make it durable and promote democratic governance of Uganda.

In the 2013 case of Saleh Kamba and others v Attorney General[1106] and others a reasoning of the learned Kasule JCC in his dissenting judgment in consideration of the Basic structure doctrine which he concluded that owing to the historical perspective compelled that the Constitution be interpreted in manner that promotes the growth of democratic values and practices, while at the same time doing away or restricting those aspects of governance that are likely to return Uganda to a one party State or make in – roads in the enjoyment of the basic human rights and freedoms of conscience, expression, assembly and association, makes this case a reference most relied on by applicants in cases that followed. This conclusion was certainly an attempt by the judge in hindering excellence of the 1995 Constitution from being forfeited on the altar of worthlessness; it clearly articulates the result that can be achieved if this doctrine is to be employed.

The Basic structure doctrine has no rule that limits it to protect only particular provisions of the Constitution. The doctrine roams freely during the protection of the Constitution and offers its protection to any provision in the constitution that it has been deemed to be essential to form part of the constitution's basic feature.

A Missed opportunity to apply the Basic Structure Doctrine?

The Basic Structure Doctrine (BSD) is Judge made law and implies tacitly, a limitationon the power of Parliament to amend the Constitution. The Basic Structure Doctrine is to the effect that although Parliament may be (is) empowered to amend a Nation's Constitution that power does not extend to authority to produce an output which alters the country's Constitutional order. The Legislature should not engage in amendments which can be described as a Constitutional replacement. This is because the power to replace a Constitution with a different one belongs to the people.

[1106] Constitutional Petition No. 8 of 20012

This doctrine was enunciated by the Supreme Court of India in one of its most important decisions ever, in the 1973 case of Kesavananda Bharativs. The State of Kerala[1107].The doctrine is to the effect that a national constitution has certain basic features which underlie not just the latter, but also the spirit of that constitution, and any amendment, which purports to alter the constitution in a manner that takes away that basic structure, is void and of no effect. The rationale of the decision was that an amendment, which makes a change in the basic structure of the constitution, is not really an amendment, but is in effect, rewriting the new constitution, which Parliament has no power to do. The court held that as the Supreme Court of the land, it had a limited power to review and strike down amendments which went to the very heart and core of the constitution, by seeking to alter its basic structure.

In its wisdom, the Court did not lay down a list of provisions it considered to constitute the basic structure. The claim of any particular feature of the constitution to be a "basic structure" is left to be determined by the court on a case by case basis. The basic structure doctrine has since been upheld and relied on in subsequent decisions in that country, for example, in Minerva Mills Ltd y. Union of India (1980) and Indira Nehru Gandhi v. Raj Narain (1975). It has also been widely accepted, adopted and cited with approval in many other commonwealth countries, or what we call common law jurisdictions.

In the process, the courts have suggested various guidelines which can be relied on to determine whether an amendment touches the basic structure of a particular constitution and is, therefore, void. Whether or not a provision is part of the basic structure varies from country to country, depending on each country's peculiar circumstances, including its history, political challenges and national vision. Importantly, the decisions I have cited show that in answering this important question, courts will consider factors such as the preamble to the constitution, national objectives and directive principles of State policy (in countries which have them in their constitutions, such as Uganda), the Bill of rights, the history of the constitution that led to the given provision, and the likely consequences of the amendment.

In Kenya, the court of Appeal in the case of Njoya vs. Attorney General and Others held that: "Parliament may amend, repeal and replace as many provisions as it desired provided that the document retains its character as the existing Constitution and that alternation of the Constitution does not involve the substitution thereof a new one or the destruction of the identity of the existing one"

[1107]AIR1973SC1461

THE PROCEDURE AND MANNER OF PASSING THE ENTIRE CONSTITUTION (AMENDMENT) ACT NO. 1 OF 2018

In Oloka Onyango& 9 Ors vs Attorney General[1108] the Constitutional Court held that:

"Parliament as a law making body should set standards for compliance with the constitutional provisions and with its own Rules. ... the enactment of the law is a process and if any of the stages therein is flawed, that vitiates the entire process and the law that is enacted as a result of it ..."

Public Consultation

Justice Mwanguya declared that the infringement of fundamental rights of not only the members of Parliament but also members of the public who might have been interested in participating in consultations vitiates the process. Public consultation is an essential ingredient in constitution amendment and plays a legitimation function. Citizens have a right to participate in such processes. Public consultation in constitution amendment is an affirmation of the 'constituent power' of the people and of participatory democracy.

The obnoxious directive issued by AIGP Asumani Mugenyi was appalling. The directive restricted freedom of association and movement of Members of Parliament without any justification whatsoever. The directive was intended to prohibit Members of Parliament from holding joint rallies or canvassing support for certain positions outside their constituencies. It was unlawful. In the current multiparty dispensation, most Members of Parliament belong to one party or another. They should therefore be expected to offer support 30for similar minded colleagues in their constituencies. Political parties exist to lobby the public for their causes and positions. Members of Parliament are therefore within their rights to solicit for support for their views and positions or carry out consultations not only from their constituencies but throughout the country. There is absolutely nothing unlawful about Members of Parliament lobbying different individuals beyond their own constituencies.

The failure to consult deprived the public of the constitutional right to a fair hearing.

Discrepancies in the Speaker's certificate of compliance and the Constitutional (Amendment) Bill.

The constitution made the Speaker's certificate a condition precedent to the presentation of an amending bill for presidential assent, and non-compliance would invalidate the purported Act. The requirement of a valid certificate of compliance under Article 263 (2) of the Constitution is couched in mandatory terms. It is apparent that the speaker's certificate of compliance which accompanied the impugned Bill was but full of glaring inconsistencies and discrepancies. Whereas the certificate clearly indicated that the impugned bill not only amended Articles 61, 102, 104 and 183 of the Constitution, the bill itself indicated that parliament had amended in addition to the said provisions; Articles 105, 181, 289, 291 and in fact created another provision.

[1108][2014] UGCC 14; Cited with approval in the case of Law Society of Kenya vs Attorney General & Anor [2016] e KLR where

The certificate of compliance indicated that only four Articles in the Constitution had been affected by the amendment. The Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 assented to by the President showed ten Articles were affected by the amendment.

SEVERANCE

Severance refers to the ability of courts to strike out a portion of 10a statute if that portion is held to be unconstitutional. There are two types of unconstitutional legislation – legislation that violates procedural constitutional requirements and legislation that violates substantive constitutional requirements. Controls on the procedure of the legislative process are featured in most state constitutions. These types of restrictions regulate only the process by which legislation is enacted. Examples of procedural regulations on legislation include limitations on the purpose, subject, or title of the bill. Each of these restrictions is "designed to eradicate perceived abuses in the legislative process, such as hasty, corrupt, or private interest legislation." Abuses of these restrictions are called procedural constitutional violations.

First, severance is inappropriate when the unconstitutional and constitutional provisions are "so essentially and inseparably connected" that a court cannot presume that the legislature would have enacted the valid provisions without the unconstitutional one. Second, severance is inappropriate when the valid provisions cannot be executed in accordance with legislative intent as a result of incompleteness after severance.

For procedural constitutional violations, "the entire bill is unconstitutional unless [the court] is convinced beyond reasonable doubt that one of the bill's multiple subjects is its original, controlling purpose and that the other subject is not." To determine whether or not the provisions that are part of the added subject pass this test, the court considers "whether the additional subject is essential to the efficacy of the bill, whether it is a provision without which the bill would be incomplete and unworkable, and whether the provision is one without which the legislators would not have adopted the bill."

Justice Mwanguya differentiated the application of the doctrine of severance in the case of Salvatori Abuki v Attorney General[1109], where the Constitutional Court considered the constitutionality of Sections 3 and 7 of the Witchcraft Act, Cap 108 from the case before the Court. He differentiated the case of Salvatori Abuki from the present case because it was not concerning the enactment of Witch Craft Act as whole being null and void and it be said that Act must be have been enacted according to the law but had the two sections inconsistent with constitution which is not the case we have now where by the whole Act was not passed according to Constitution. He concluded that having found that some of the acts and omissions vitiated the enactment Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 the doctrine of severance was wrongly applied by the Constitutional Court.

[1109]Constitutional Case No. 2 of 1997

Severance does not apply to acts that have no legal standing. The amendment act was null and void due to the flawed procedure under which it was enacted.

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JUDGMENT OF MUGAMBA, JSC VERBERTIM

On 26th July 2018, the Constitutional Court rendered its decision on the contested validity of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, No. 1 of 2018. Three respective parties appealed that decision to this Court. At the pre-hearing conference, the three appeals were, with the consent of the parties, consolidated on the reasoning that this was appropriate since the appeals arose from the same Judgment and comprised similar issues.

In their Constitutional Petitions all the appellants had challenged the constitutionality of the Constitution (Amendment) Act, No. 1 of 2018. It was their contention that the process leading to the enactment of the impugned Act was tainted with irregularities and illegalities. They sought to have the entire Act nullified.

The Constitutional Court found that a majority of the provisions of the impugned Act were indeed unconstitutional and accordingly struck them down.

The Constitutional Court however found that some of the provisions of the impugned Act were constitutional. Applying the principle of severability of Statutes, the Constitutional Court retained those provisions it found constitutional and on that basis declined to grant the main relief sought by the appellants which was to nullify the whole impugned Act. It is worthwhile to note that the Constitutional Court found that there were some procedural irregularities in the course of passing the impugned Act but that it held that the irregularities were not substantive enough to nullify the entire Act.

The parties agreed upon fourteen issues for determination by the Constitutional Court. These were:

Whether Sections 2 and 8 of the Act extending or enlarging of the term or life of Parliament from five to seven years is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, 61(2)(3), 77(3)(4), 79(1), 96, 105(1), 260(1), 233(b) and 289 of the Constitution.

And if so, whether applying the said Act retroactively is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, 77(3)(4), 79(1), 96 and 233(2)(b) of the Constitution.

Whether Sections 6 and 10 of the Act extending the current life of local government councils from five to seven years is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 1,2, 8A, 176(3), 181(4) and 259(2) (a) of the Constitution.

If so, whether applying it retroactively is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 1,2, 8A, 176(3), 181(4) and 259(2)(a) of the Constitution.

Whether the alleged violence/scuffle inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Act was inconsistent and in contravention of Articles 1,2,3 (2) and 8A of the Constitution.

6. Whether the entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enacting the Act was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of the Articles of the Constitution as hereunder:

(a) Whether the introduction of the private member's Bill that led to the Act was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Article 93 of the Constitution.

(b) Whether the passing of Sections 2,5,6,8 and 10 of the Act was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Article 93 of the Constitution.

Whether the actions of Uganda Peoples Defence Forces and Uganda Police in entering Parliament, allegedly assaulting Members of Parliament in the Parliamentary Chambers, arresting and allegedly detaining the said members, is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 24, 97, 208(2) and 211(3) of the Constitution.

Whether the consultations carried out were marred with restrictions and violence which was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 29(1)(a)(d)(e) and 29(2)(a) of the Constitution.

Whether the alleged failure to consult on Sections 2,5,6,8 and 10 is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 1 and 8A of the Constitution.

Whether the alleged failure to conduct a referendum before 5 assenting to the Bill containing Section 2,5,6,8 and 10 of the Act was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1,91(1), 259(2), 260 and 263(2) (b) of the Constitution.

Whether the Act was against the spirit and structure of the 1995 Constitution.

7. Whether the alleged failure by Parliament to observe its own Rules of Procedure during the enactment of the Act was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 28, 42, 44, 90(2), 90(3)(c) and 94(1) of the Constitution; and in particular:

i) Whether the actions of parliamentary staff preventing some members of the public from accessing the parliamentary chambers during the presentation of the Constitutional amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017 was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of the provisions of Articles 1, 8A, 79, 208(2), 20 209, 211(3), and 212 of the Constitution.

Whether the act of tabling Constitutional Bill No. 2 of 2017, in the absence of the Leader of Opposition, Chief Whip, and other opposition members of Parliament was in contravention of and/ or inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A, 69(1), 69(2)(b), 71, 25 74, 75, 79, 82A, and 108A of the Constitution.

Whether the alleged actions of the Speaker of Parliament in permitting the ruling party members of Parliament to sit on the opposition side of Parliament was inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A, 69(1), 69(2)(b), 71, 74, 75, 79, 82A, 83(1)(g), 30 83(3) and 108A of the Constitution.

Whether the alleged act of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee of Parliament in allowing some committee members who had become Members of the Committee after the public hearings on Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017 had been held and completed, to sign the Report of the said Committee, was in contravention of Articles 44(c), 90(1) and 90(2) of the Constitution.

v) Whether the alleged act of the Speaker of Parliament in allowing the Chairperson of the Legal Affairs Committee on 18th December, 2017 to submit to Parliament the said

Committee's Report in the absence of the Leader of Opposition, Opposition Chief whip, and other Opposition Members of Parliament, was in contravention of and inconsistent with Articles 1, 8A, 69(1), 69(2)(b), 71, 74, 75, 79, 82A and 108A of the Constitution.

Whether the actions of the Speaker in suspending the 6 (six) members of Parliament was in contravention of Articles 28, 42, 44, 79, 91, 94 and 259 of the Constitution.

Whether the action of Parliament in:

(a) Waiving the requirement of a minimum of three sittings before the tabling of the report which was also not seconded;

Of closing the debate on the Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017 before every willing Member of Parliament had been afforded an opportunity to debate the said Bill;

Failing to close all the doors leading to the Parliamentary Chamber where Members of Parliament carried on the debate of the Bill, are in contravention of Articles 1, 8A, 44(c), 79, 94 and 263 of the Constitution.

8. Whether the passage of the Bill into an Act without Parliament first having observed 14 days of Parliament sitting between the 2nd and 3rd reading was inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 262 and 263(1) of the Constitution.

9. Whether the Presidential assent to the Bill allegedly in absence of a certificate of compliance from the Speaker and a certificate of the Electoral Commission that the amendment was approved at a referendum, was inconsistent with and in contravention of Article 263(2)(a) and (b) of the Constitution.

Whether Section 5 of the Act, which re-introduces term limits and entrenches them as being subject to a referendum is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Article 260(2)(a) of the Constitution.

Whether Section 9 of the Act, which seeks to harmonise the seven-year term of Parliament with the presidential term is inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 105(1) and 260(2) of the Constitution.

Whether Sections 3 and 7 of the Act, lifting the age limit are inconsistent with and/or in contravention of Articles 21(3) and 21(5) of the Constitution.

13. Whether the continuance in office of the President of Uganda by one who was elected in 2016 and who attained the age of 75 years is inconsistent with or in contravention of Articles 83(1)(b) and 102(c) of the Constitution.

14. What remedies are available to the parties?

On 26th July 2018, when the Constitutional Court partially allowed the consolidated Petitions it declared as follows:

1. By unanimous decision, that sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018, which provide for the extensions of the tenure of Parliament and Local Government Councils by two years, and for the reinstatement of the Presidential term–limits are unconstitutional for contravening provisions of the Constitution.

2. That accordingly, sections 2, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018, be struck out of the Act.

3. By majority decision that sections 1, 3, 4, and 7, of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018, which removed age limits for the President and District Chairpersons, to contest for election to the respective offices, were passed in full compliance with the Constitution; and therefore remain the lawful and valid provisions of Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018.

Kenneth Kakuru JCC, did not agree with the majority decision in respect of the finding that sections 1, 3, 4 and 7 had been lawfully passed. He ruled, in his dissent, that the entire Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 was unconstitutional as it had been passed in violation of various 5 provisions.

The Constitutional Court awarded costs, in form of instruction fees, of Shs. 20,000,000/= (Twenty million only) for each Petition (and not Petitioner). The Court however noted that this award did not apply to Petition No. 3 of 2018 since the Petitioner prayed for disbursements only, and Petition No. 49 of 2017 where the Petitioner appeared in person. The Court further awarded two–thirds disbursements to all the Petitioners; to be taxed by the Taxing Master.

Dissatisfied with part of the decision of the Constitutional Court, the appellants appealed to this Court. The Appellant in Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 2018 lodged a Memorandum of Appeal in this Court containing 84 grounds of appeal categorized under different parts. Issues for court's determination were framed out of the consolidated appeals and for space and convenience I shall not list the said grounds of appeal.

The appellants in Constitutional Appeal No. 03 of 2018 on their part lodged a Memorandum of Appeal containing 24 grounds of appeal. Lastly, the appellant in Constitutional Appeal No. 04 of 2018 lodged a Memorandum of Appeal in this Court containing three grounds of appeal.

At the hearing, the Respondent raised two preliminary objections to the competency of Constitutional Appeal No.2 of 2018. Let me first dispose of the preliminary objections raised by the Respondent at this point.

The first was that the grounds of appeal offended against Rule 82 of the Judicature (Supreme Court) Rules. It was contended by the respondent that the grounds are speculative, argumentative, narrative and an abuse of court process. Indeed, Rule 82 relates to the contents of a memorandum of appeal and in sub rule (1) reads as follows:

'(1) A memorandum of appeal shall set forth concisely and under distinct heads without argument or narrative, the grounds of objection to the decision appealed against, specifying the points which are alleged to have been wrongly decided, and the nature of the order which it is proposed to ask the court to make'.

In support of his objection the Respondent cited two cases, Beatrice Kobusingye vs Fiona Nyakana & Another, Civil Appeal No. 5/2004 and Hwan Sung Limited vs M&D Timber Merchants & Transporters, Civil Appeal No. 2/2018.

Essentially in the Beatrice Kobusingye case this Court stated, citing Rule 65(2) of the Rules of the Court of Appeal:

'Grounds or any of them may ordinarily be rejected if all or any of them offended that rule which reads: -

"The Memorandum of Appeal shall set forth concisely and under distinct heads numbered consecutively without argument or narrative the grounds of objection to the decision appealed against, specifying, in the case of a first appeal, the points of law or fact or mixed law and fact and, in the case of a second appeal, the POINTS OF LAW, OR OF MIXED LAW ANDACT(SIC), which are alleged to have been wrongly decided ……" (underlining added).

Generally, therefore, objections to any ground of appeal in this Court of Appeal can be based on these provisions'.

In the Hwan Sung Limited case the ground read:

'The Learned Justices of Appeal erred in Law in dismissing the appeal'.

It was held by this Court that since there was no way to tell how the Court of Appeal decision was wrong, the ground, as it appeared, offended Rule 82(1) of the Rules of this Court given that no specific error on the part of the Court appealed from was indicated.

Needless to say, the objection above was opposed by Appellant Male Mabirizi in particular. He argued that Rule 82(1) of the Rules was not applicable given that Rules 78, 98(b) and 42(1) rendered this irrelevant.

For ease of reference below are the mentioned provisions:

`78. Application to strike out notice of appeal or appeal.

A person on whom a notice of appeal has been served may at a time, either before or after the institution of the appeal, apply to the court to strike out the notice or the appeal, as the case may be, on the ground that no appeal lies or that some essential step in the proceedings has not been taken or has not been taken within the prescribed time'.

`98. Arguments at hearing

`At the hearing of an appeal….

(a)……

(b)a respondent shall not, without the leave of the court, raise any objection to the competence of the appeal which might have been raised by application under rule 78 of these Rules;

`42 Form of applications to Court

(1) Subject to sub rule (3) of this rule and to any other rule allowing informal applications, all applications to the court shall be by motion, which shall state the grounds of the application'.

According to Black's Law Dictionary, 8th edition an objection is a formal statement opposing something that has occurred or is about to occur, in court and seeking the judge's immediate ruling on the point. From the above definition not every objection need be by motion. Rules 42(1) and 98 (b) of the Rules of this court certainly do not provide that all objections should be that formal. Rule 78 itself is not mandatory.

On the face of it nothing should stand in the way of the Respondent raising that preliminary objection relating to Rule 82(1). Prima facie, it is true that a large number of the Appellant's grounds of appeal offend the cited rule. Nevertheless, it should be borne in mind that this appeal is an aggregate of three separate appeals which were for reasons of expedience combined at a scheduling conference. At the conference, one hundred and more grounds of appeal, gathered from the three appealing parties were with the help and knowledge of the Respondent compressed into eight issues.

At the hearing of the appeal what featured were the issues rather than grounds of appeal which were the discarded raw material of the issues. Respectfully, it is misleading for the Respondent at this point in time to be making references to incompatible grounds of appeal. This objection fails.

The other objection as I understand it is that this court should not allow this appeal because the Petition in the Constitutional Court which was genesis to it was filed in December 2017 before the Bill was enacted. In this connection the Respondent referred to Article 137 of the Constitution. The Article relates to the Constitutional Court. There is no evidence that this concern on the part of the respondent was ever brought to the attention of the Constitutional Court, let alone being addressed by that court. It is trite law that a matter that was not subject to adjudication in the original court of adjudication does not qualify to be addressed by this court on appeal.

Both objections lack merit. They are rejected.

Arising out of the several grounds of appeal filed by the three Appellants in their different memoranda of appeal, 8 issues were framed and agreed upon by the parties and the Court at the pre-hearing conference as being sufficient to address the Appellants' grievances with the decision of the Constitutional Court. These issues are reproduced below;

Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves on the application of the basic structure doctrine.

Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enactment of Constitutional (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda and the Rules of Procedure of Parliament?

3. Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the violence/scuffle inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda?

Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they applied the substantiality test in determining the petition?

Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves when they held that the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 on the removal of the age limit for the President and Local Council V offices was not inconsistent with the provisions of the 1995 Constitution? 6. Whether the Constitutional Court erred in law and in fact in holding that the President elected in 2016 is not liable to vacate office on attaining the age of 75 years?

7a. Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court derogated the appellants' right to fair hearing, un-judiciously exercised their discretion and committed the alleged procedural irregularities.

7b. If so, what is the effect of the decision of the Court?

8. What remedies are available to the parties?

Legal Representation

The appellant in Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 2018 represented himself. M/s Lukwago & Co. Advocates together with M/s Rwakafuzi & Co. Advocates appeared on behalf of the Appellants in Constitutional Appeal No. 03 of 2018 whereas Mr. Wandera Ogalo represented the appellant in Constitutional Appeal No. 04 of 2018. The Attorney General appeared in person.

Both parties filed written submissions and were allowed to give oral highlights of their cases during the hearing of the consolidated appeals.

Principles of constitutional interpretation

The Constitutional Court and this Court have in numerous cases endorsed various principles of constitutional interpretation and there is no dispute, as such, on those principles. The Justices of the Constitutional Court, particularly in the judgments of Remmy Kasule, JCC and Kenneth Kakuru JCC, unanimously and elaborately restated those principles and I do not therefore find it necessary to repeat them.

Similarly, the relevant Constitutional history, ably reproduced in the preamble to the 1995 Constitution, was highlighted by the Constitutional Court especially in the lead judgment of Owiny-Dollo, DCJ. Kenneth Kakuru, JCC, in his dissenting judgment also extensively discussed our nation's constitutional history and its relevance for approaching questions of fostering the rule of law and a culture of constitutionalism. I agree with him and will take that history into consideration as well.

Ultimately, I agree with the following restatement of the law, by Kanyeihamba JSC as he then was, in Besigye v Museveni, Presidential Election Petition No.1 of 2006 endorsed by Remmy Kasule, JCC in his judgment; "… the overriding constitutional dogma in this country is that Constitutionalism and the 1995 Constitution of Uganda are the Alpha and Omega of everything that is orderly, legitimate, legal and decent. Anything else that pretends to be higher in this land must be shot down at once by this Court using the most powerful legal missiles at its disposal… Judges have the responsibility to pronounce themselves on a disputed matter guided only by the Constitution and laws of Uganda."

I now turn to a discussion of the issues framed by the parties to ease determination of the numerous grounds of appeal, 109 of them to be specific, in the consolidated appeals. In evaluating the grounds of appeal canvassed by the Appellants herein, I am also mindful of the duty of a first appellate court to re-appraise the evidence on record and subject it to a thorough scrutiny and reach my own conclusion bearing in mind that I have not had opportunity to see the witnesses testify.

Some witnesses were cross examined on their affidavit evidence in the Constitutional Court while a number of deponents were not summoned for cross examination. In respect of the latter category, the lower court did not enjoy any superior advantage over this Court in terms of reappraising the affidavit evidence on record. I will bear that in mind as well.

Issue 1: Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves on the application of the basic structure doctrine."

Appellants' Submissions

Counsel strongly submitted that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court misconstrued the application of the basic structure doctrine in their finding that the qualifications of the President or Chairpersons of the District Local Government do not form part of the basic structure of the constitution and as such Sections 3, 4 and 7 of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 were not in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 79, 90 and 94 of the Constitution.

Counsel for the Appellants submitted that the thrust of the basic structure doctrine is that it attempts to identify the philosophy upon which a constitution is based as opposed to a textual exegesis of the same. He submitted that the Basic Structure doctrine has also been instrumental in shaping the constitutional jurisprudence of different countries across the world.

He relied on numerous authorities specifically Kesavananda Bharati Versus State of Kerala, AIR 1973 SC, Minerva Mills v. Union of India, AIR 1980 SC 1789, Interpretation No. 499 of the Council of Grand Justices of Taiwan, Anwar Hossain Chowdhury vs Bangladesh 41 DLR 1989 App Div 169, Executive Council of Western Cape Legislature Vs The President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (CCT27/95) [1995] ZACC 8; 1995 (10) BCLR 1289; 1995 (4) SA 877 (22 September 1995) and Njoya vs Attorney General and Others (2004) AHRLR 157.

Counsel faulted the learned Justices for according the basic structure doctrine a narrow and restrictive application when they held that it only applied to amendments which required a referendum and specifically to the extension of the term of Parliament but not to the removal of upper age limit restrictions in the constitution.

Counsel argued that the aforesaid key pillars of the 1995 Constitution are reflected and embodied in the preamble to the constitution yet the Majority Justices of the Constitutional Court overlooked the significance and importance of the preamble. Counsel cited also authorities such as the British Caribbean Bank v The Attorney of Belize Claim, No. 597/2011 that applied the basic structure doctrine in emphasizing the essence of the preamble in support of the submission.

Counsel therefore invited this honourable court to take cognizance of the fact that the framers of the 1995 constitution deemed it absolutely necessary to enshrine within the text of the constitution such provision as would be necessary to give effect and operationalize the ideals encapsulated in the preamble as well as the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy; these included the two term presidential cap, presidential age limit and abolition of the Kelsenian theory under Article 3 of the Constitution.

In Counsel's view, these provisions were designed and intended to guarantee orderly succession to power and political stability which to date remains a mirage for our motherland and that by amending Article 102 (b) to remove the Presidential age limit, after scrapping term limits, Parliament not only emasculated the preamble to the constitution but also destroyed the basic features of the 1995 Constitution thereby rendering it hollow and a mere paper tiger.

It was contended by the Appellants therefore that the basic features of the constitution were fundamentally eroded by the impugned Act thereby destroying the original identity and character of the 1995 constitution. In their view, on that account alone, the Constitutional Court ought to have invoked the basic structure doctrine and struck down the entire Constitution (Amendment) Act, No.1 of 2018.

Respondent's Submissions

The learned Attorney General submitted that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court correctly applied the basic structure doctrine when they found that sections 3 and 7 of the impugned Act did not derogate from the Basic Structure of the 1995 Constitution.

Counsel argued that the proper definition of the doctrine was that found in the case of Kesavananda Bharati vs. The State of Kerala Petition (Civil) 135 of 1970; (A.I.R 1973 SC 1461) Vol 5 Tab DD page 64, where S.M. Sikri, C. J defined the Basic Structure of the Constitution to consist of supremacy of the constitution, republican and democratic form of government, secular character of the state, separation of powers and the federal character.

It was argued that it was within the powers of Parliament to enact sections 3 and 7 of the Constitutional (Amendment) Act, No.1 of 2018 into law and that this did not in any way contravene the basic structure of the Constitution and that it was not inconsistent with or in contravention of Articles 1, 3, 8A, 79, 90 and 94 of the Constitution.

Resolution of issue 1

It is contended by the Appellants that the qualifications for eligibility for the offices of President and District Chairpersons are part of the basic structure of the Constitution implying that they are not subject to amendment or at the very least, their amendment would require the involvement of the people through a referendum that was never held prior to the enactment of the impugned Act.

The Justices of the Constitutional Court, including the dissenting Justice, unanimously held that the qualifications for eligibility for office are not part of the basic structure of the Constitution. They all agreed that our constitution contains a basic structure or fundamental pillars but that qualifications, in particular upper age limit restrictions, for the office of President or District Chairperson were not part of them.

In his lead judgment, Owiny-Dollo, DCJ, considered the basic structure doctrine and its applicability to the Ugandan constitution as follows;

"The principal character of the 1995 Constitution, which constitute its structural pillars, includes such constitutional principles as the sovereignty of the people, the Constitution as the supreme legal instrument, democratic governance and practices, a unitary state, separation of powers between the Executive, Parliament, and the Judiciary, Bill of Rights ensuring respect for and observance of fundamental rights, and judicial independence.

In the fullness of their wisdom, the framers of the 1995 Constitution went a step further in clearly identifying provisions of the Constitution, which it considers are fundamental features of the Constitution. They carefully entrenched these provisions by various safeguards and protection against the risk of abuse of the Constitution by irresponsible amendment of those provisions."

With due respect to the Appellants, I am unable to fault the collective conclusion of the Justices of the Constitutional Court in that regard. In my view, Owiny Dollo DCJ gives a correct restatement of the basic structure of the Ugandan Constitution.

The fundamental pillars of our constitution do not surely include the minimum qualifications for the offices of President or District Chairperson. The removal of age limit restrictions do not fundamentally alter the character of the constitution. I will briefly explain my reasons for that conclusion.

From the outset I must declare that the doctrine of basic structure in a given Constitution is a derivative of Indian judicial experience and that it defies universal description. The several authorities available lend testimony to this. Curiously, what forms basic structure in one jurisdiction is not necessarily what forms basic structure in another. Suffice to say that the basic structure in a given Constitution is embedded in that particular Constitution and that it is accompanied by the intended rigidity. That rigidity is woven in the Constitution and its assured mission is to ensure that the Constitution is not wantonly tampered with by way of amendment.

Thirteen Justices of the Supreme Court were on the bench in Kasavananda Bharati vs State of Kerala, AIR 1973 SC 1461. They had disparate views of what constituted the basic structure in the Constitution of India. Chief Justice Sarv Miltra Sikri read the majority opinion where he said the basic structure comprised of:

-The Supremacy of the Constitution

-A republican and derivative form of government

The secular character of the Constitution

-Maintenance of the separation of powers

The federal character of the Constitution

To the above majority list was added another three by Justices Shelat and Grover. The three additions were:

The mandate to build a welfare state contained in the Directive Principles of State Policy.

Maintenance of the unity and integrity of India.

The sovereignty of the country.

Justices Hegde and Mukherjea, in their opinion, mentioned:

The sovereignty of India

The democratic character of the polity

-The unity of the country

Essential features of individual freedoms

The mandate to build a welfare state

Justice Jaganmohan Reddy relied on the preamble and cited:

A sovereign democratic republic

The provision of social, economic and political justice

Liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship

-Equality of status and opportunity

The array above is striking. In the Bangaladesh Supreme Court case of Anwar Hussein Chowdhury vs Bangladesh, 41 DLR, 1989, App. Div 169, Justice B.H. Chowdhury stated:

"Call it by any name `basic feature' or whatever, but that is the fabric of the Constitution which cannot be dismantled byan authority created by itself –namely the Parliament…… Because the amending power is but a power given by the Constitution to Parliament, it is a higher power than any other given by the Constitution to Parliament, it is a higher power than any other given by the Constitution to Parliament, but nevertheless it is a power within and not outside the Constitution".

(The emphasis above is added).

Similarly in Bangladesh Italian Marble Works Ltd vs Bangladesh (2006) 14 BLT (Special) (HCD) I the Supreme Court had this to say:

"Parliament may amend the Constitution but it cannot abrogate it, suspend it, or change its basic feature or structure ……The enabling powers to amend cannot swallow theConstitutional fabrics. The fabrics of the Constitution cannot be dismantled …even the Parliament, which is a creation ofthe Constitution itself. While the amendment power is wide it 30 is not that wide to abrogate the Constitution or to transform its democratic republican character into one of dictatorship or monarchy". (The emphasis above is added).

Also instructive is the South African Constitutional case, Executive Council of Western Cape Legislature vs the President of the Republic of South Africa and others (Case No. CCT 27/95). [1995] ZACC 8; 1995 (10) BCLR 1289; 1995 (4) SA 877where Justice Albie Sachs stated inter alia:

"There are certain fundamental features of Parliamentary democracy which are not spelt out in the Constitution but which are inherent in its very nature, design and purpose. Thus the question has arisen in other countries as to whether there are certain features of the Constitutional order so fundamental that even if Parliament followed the necessary amendment procedures, it could not change them. I doubt very much if Parliament could abolish itself, even if it followed all the framework principles mentioned above. Nor, to mention another extreme case, could it give itself eternal life-the constant renewal of its membership is fundamental to the whole derivative constitutional order. Similarly, it could neither declare a perpetual holiday, nor, to give a far less extreme example, could it in my view, shuffle off the basic legislative responsibilities entrusted to it by the Constitution".

Of further relevance is the dicta in S vs Acheson, 1991 (2) SA 805, a case from Namibia, where at page 813 of the report Mohamed Ag. JA referring to a Constitution of a nation said it is:

"……not simply a structure which mechanically defines the structures of government and the relations between the government and the governed. It is a mirror reflecting the national soul, the identification of the ideals and aspirations of a nation; the articulation of the values bonding its people and disciplining its government. The spirit and the tenor of the Constitution must therefore preside and permeate the process of judicial interpretation and judicial discretion".

Without exception, all the Justices who heard the Petition in the Constitutional Court related to the Constitution as the source of the basic structure or basic features. They referred to the preamble, the National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy and to several Articles in the Constitution to this effect. They called to memory the chequered history of Uganda prior to the promulgation of the present Constitution. Mention was made also of some pertinent records in the report of the Constitutional Commission that aided the Constitution making process.

In his judgment Alfonse Owiny Dollo DCJ held that the `structural pillars in the 1995 Constitution include the sovereignty of the people, the Constitution as the supreme legal instrument, democratic governance and practices, separation of powers between the Executive, Parliament and the Judiciary, the bill of rights ensuring respect for and observance of the fundamental rights and judicial interference.

Justice Remmy Kasule JCC mentioned the following to comprise the basic structure in the Constitution sovereignty of the people (Article 1)

the supremacy of the Constitution (Article 2) defence of the Constitution (Article 3) non – derogation of particular basic rights and freedoms (Article 44) democracy including the right to vote (Article 59) participating and changing leadership periodically (Article 61)

non-establishment of a one party state (Article 75) separation of powers amongst the legislature (Article 77) separation of powers amongst the executive (Article 98) separation of powers amongst the Judiciary (Article 126)

Independence of the Judiciary (Article 128)

Kakuru JCC held that the basic structure of the 1995 Constitution comprises of:

The sovereignty of the people of Uganda and their inalienable right to determine the form of governance of the country.

The supremacy of the Constitution as an embodiment of the soverign will of the people, through regular free and fair elections at all levels of political leadership.

Political order through adherence to a popular and durable Constitution.

Political and Constitutional stability based on principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and public participation.

5. Arising from 4 above, Rule of Law, observance of human rights, regular free and fair elections, public participation in decision making at all levels, separation of powers and accountability of the government to the people.

6. Non-derogable rights and freedoms and other rights set out in the extended and expanded Bill of Rights and the recognition of the fact that fundamental Rights and Freedoms are inherent and not granted by the State

Land belongs to the people and not to the government and as such government cannot deprive people of their land without their consent.

Natural Resources are held by the government in trust for the people and do not belong to government.

Duty of every citizen to defend the Constitution from being suspended, overthrown, abrogated or amended contrary to its provisions.

Parliament cannot make a law legalizing a one-party state or reversing a decision of a Court of Law as to deprive a party.

The basic structure in the 1995 Constitution, according to the decision of Elizabeth Musoke JCC, includes empowerment and encouragement of active participation of all citizens at all levels of governance as well as ensuring stability. The Learned Justice also held that Article 1(1) of the Constitution which guarantees the sovereignty of the people by providing that all power belongs to the people who shall exercise their sovereignty in accordance with the Constitution is part of the basic structure. She also held that the Bill of Rights, especially the non derogable rights, form part of the basic structure and their removal or amendment would result in actual replacement of the Constitution.

In his consideration of the basic structure in the Constitution of Uganda Cheborion Barishaki JCC had this to say:

"Firstly, our Constitution contains elaborate National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy that emphasize democratic government, public participation in governance, promotion of unity and stability, respect for fundamental rights and freedoms inter alia. Article 8A of the Constitution requires Uganda to be governed based on the principles of national interest and common good.

Secondly, Article 20(1) of the Constitution, touching upon fundamental rights and freedoms provides that;

`Fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual are inherent and not granted by the state`.

……

In my view in the Ugandan context the basic structure doctrine operates to preserve the people's sovereignty under Article 1 of the Constitution".

I have demonstrated that each Justice of the Constitutional Court exhaustively addressed the doctrine of basic structure in relation to the 1995 Constitution. It is the argument of the Appellants that any amendment to the basic structure would result in the Constitution itself being abrogated or replaced. The Respondent on the other hand contended that the process by which amendment can be effected is contained in the Constitution itself and that provided that the set process is adhered to, it is possible to effect a legitimate amendment. In the Constitutional Court, four of the Justices agreed with the submissions of the Respondent in this respect.

Kenneth Kakuru JCC however was adamant that there was no possible amendment of the basic structure because such amendment would result in the replacement or abrogation of the Constitution. With respect, I do not agree. The position of the majority Justices is the correct approach in my view.

The finding of the majority of the Justices of the Constitutional Court, with which I agree, is in consonance with the dicta of Mahomed DP in Premier KwaZulu – Natal vs President of the Republic of SouthAfrica, 1996 (1) SA 769 (CC) in a majority opinion. He observed:

"There is a procedure which is prescribed for the amendment to the Constitution and this procedure has to be followed. If that is properly done, the amendment is constitutionally unassailable. It may perhaps be that the purported amendment to the Constitution, following the formal procedures prescribed by the Constitution, but radically and fundamentally restructuring and reorganizing the fundamental premises of the Constitution, might not qualify as an `amendment' at all".

Subject to the above caveat on "amendments that may not qualify as amendments at all", an amendment that follows the constitutionally prescribed procedure is unassailable.

It is assuring that we have in our Constitution Article 1 on the sovereignty of the people, Article 2 on the supremacy of the Constitution as well as Article 3 enjoining us to defend the Constitution. Needless to say there are several other provisions in the Constitution that amplify the sovereignty of the people through the Constitution. It is exactly in that spirit that we have Article 79 which states:

"Functions of Parliament

(1) Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, Parliament shall have power to make laws on any matter for the peace, order, development and good governance of Uganda.

(2) Except as provided in this Constitution, no person or body other than Parliament shall have power to make provisions having the force of law in Uganda except under authority conferred by an Act of Parliament.

(3) Parliament shall protect this Constitution and promote the democratic governance of Uganda".

Clearly Parliament is enjoined to act in accordance with the Constitution. The Constitution is the embodiment of the social contract between the governors and the governed. In that respect no legitimate amendment process in Parliament can be effected except where Parliament has adhered to the provisions of the Constitution.

In my view, there is inbuilt in our Constitution adequate and robust provisions whose effect is to protect the Constitution. As such any concern is ill placed and assuredly no chaperons need be called for. Articles 1, 2, 3, Chapter Four and Chapter Eighteen are self evident. It is reassuring that to effect any amendment to the Constitution, there is need to go through an elaborate gate-keeping process laid down in the Constitution.

The stringency may vary though depending on the matter at stake. The cumbersome process was obviated by the need to sustain participation by the people in matters that concern their governance. It may be touted here that the rigidly ring fenced provisions of the Constitution comprise the basic structure. My view however is that basic structure as a term is amorphous. What is basic structure varying from country to country and from case to case.

I am unable to wholly endorse the contention that provisions exist in the Constitution that are so sacrosanct that even if one followed provisions of the Constitution it would not be possible to amend them legitimately. Respectfully, that would be turning human progress on its head. What one generation may consider impossible and unnecessary, the exigencies of the times might lead to a different conclusion for a subsequent generation. We have no right to hold our progeny in bondage. That is why the Constitution allows for amendment so long as the delicately laid down process contained in it is adhered to.

Consequently, in the matter at hand I find no basis to fault the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court in their verdicts concerning the basic structure doctrine. I answer this issue in the negative.

Issue 2: Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the entire process of conceptualizing, consulting, debating and enactment of Constitutional (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda and the Rules of Procedure of Parliament?"

Appellants' Submissions

Counsel contended that the procedure and manner of passing the entire Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 was flawed and/or tainted with illegalities, procedural impropriety in violation of Articles 28, 42, 44, 79, 91, 92 and 259 of the Constitution and the Rules of Procedure Parliament.

It was argued that although Parliament is enjoined under Article 94 of the Constitution to make rules to regulate its own procedure, it must do so subject to the provisions of the Constitution. In support of this argument, counsel relied on the case of Oloka Onyango & 9 Ors vs Attorney General [2014] UGCC 14 which was cited with approval in Law Society of Kenya vs Attorney General & Anor [2016] eKLR where court held that:

"Parliament as a law making body should set standards for compliance with the constitutional provisions and with its own Rules. … the enactment of the law is a process and if any of the stages therein is flawed, that vitiates the entire process and the law that is enacted as a result of it …"

Counsel thus invited this Court to find the above authority persuasive and hold that failure by Parliament to comply with its own Rules of Procedure rendered the whole process a nullity. In respect to whether or not the Bill was a charge on the consolidated fund contrary to the provisions of Article 93 of the Constitution, counsel contended that although the Constitutional Court made a finding that the impugned Act violated the provisions of Article 93 of the constitution, it declined to nullify the entire Act on ground that the non-compliance with the Constitutional provision only affected Sections 2, 6, 8 and 10 of the impugned Act extending the term of Parliament and local government councils from five to seven years.

Counsel argued that the entire Act ought to have been struck out because Article 93 of the Constitution in 'absolute' terms prohibits Parliament from proceeding on a private member's bill or a motion including amendments thereto which has the effect of creating a charge on the consolidated fund. He added that the sum of Shs. 29,000,000 paid as facilitation to carry out consultations with the public regarding the Bill. was a charge on the consolidated fund?

On the issue of Consultation/Public Participation, Counsel submitted that the learned majority

Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that there was proper consultation of the people of Uganda on some of the clauses of the impugned Constitution (Amendment) Bill, 2017.

In support of the submissions above, counsel cited the persuasive Kenyan cases of Law Society of Kenya Vs. Attorney General, Constitutional Petition No. 3 of 2016 andRobert N. Gakuru& Others –Vs- The Governor Kiambu County & Others.

Counsel submitted that there was overwhelming and cogent evidence on record indicating that the process leading to the enactment of the impugned Constitution (Amendment) Act was not preceded by a Consultative Constitutional review exercise as was the case with the promulgation of the 1995 Constitution and the 2005 amendments. Counsel relied on the affidavit evidence of the Appellants who are Members of Parliament for this view.

Counsel further argued that members of Parliament opposed to the amendments were denied the opportunity and right to engage the people over the aforesaid Bill by the police and other security agencies. The affidavit evidence of some members of Parliament including the Appellants as well as the testimony in cross examination by AIGP Asuman Mugenyi, was relied on.

The Appellants contend that the motion to introduce the impugned Bill was smuggled onto the order paper in contravention of Article 94 of the Constitution and Rules 8, 17, 25, 27, 29 and 174 of the Rules of Procedure. Counsel submitted that the finding of Owiny Dollo, DCJ that the Speaker had considerable latitude in determining the content of the order paper was an erroneous conclusion at variance with the express Rules of Procedure of Parliament. He contended that Rule 174 vests power to arrange the business of Parliament and the order of the same in the Business Committee.

The affidavit evidence of Hon. Semujju Nganda, to the effect that on 19th September 2017 the Deputy Speaker assured the house that there was not going to be any ambush to MPs as far as handling the impugned Amendment Bill was concerned, is relied upon. The Appellants contend that Rules 27 and 29 regarding prior provision of an order paper with relevant documents to members of parliament were flagrantly violated.

It is argued that Members of Parliament were denied adequate time to debate and consider the impugned Bill as well as the Report of Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee notwithstanding the fact that this was a matter of great national importance. Counsel additionally contended that the Committee Report was not tabled in accordance with rule 201 (1).

It is argued that the suspension of some members of Parliament, the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th and 5th Appellants, by the speaker during the parliamentary sitting of 18th December 2017, was in contravention of Article 1, 28(1), 42, 44 (c) and 94 of the Constitution.

Further, one of the Appellants disputes the validity of the Committee Report on the impugned Bill and faults the majority decision of the Constitutional Court for holding that the participation of the new members that were irregularly added to the Committee could not invalidate the Committee report because even if their signatures were disregarded, the majority report still had enough signatures to pass it.

It is argued by the Appellants that the Failure to close the doors to the chambers at the time of voting on the impugned bill, was inconsistent with and in contravention of Articles 1, 2, 8A, 44 (c), 79, and 94 of the Constitution and rule 98(4) of the Rules of Parliament which fact was also admitted by the Clerk to Parliament in her affidavit.

Counsel further submitted that the Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the validity of the entire impugned Act was not fatally affected by the discrepancies and variances between the Speaker's Certificate of Compliance and the Bill at the time of Presidential assent to the Bill.

It is argued that the Speaker's certificate of compliance was materially defective, ineffectual and it rendered the presidential assent a nullity. Counsel added that the requirement of a valid certificate of compliance under Article 263 (2) of the Constitution and Section 16 of the Acts of Parliament Act is couched in mandatory terms.

The Appellants raised various other irregularities that, in their view, contravened the Rules of Procedure of Parliament including the nonadmission of Appellant Male Mabirizi to the gallery during the debate, Parliament proceeding without the official opposition in the house and delay by the committee to issue its report.

In conclusion, the Appellants contend that the net effect of noncompliance of Parliament with its own rules of procedure and those laid down in the Constitution was to render the impugned Bill and the resultant Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 null and void.

Respondent's Submissions

The Attorney General begun by pointing out that Article 93 of the Constitution provided for restrictions on financial matters and specifically prohibited Parliament from proceeding with a bill, except when introduced on behalf of the Government, that had financial implications as provided therein.

The Attorney General was emphatic that Parliament only proceeded with the Bill presented by the Hon. Raphael Magyezi after the Rt. Hon. Speaker and the House were satisfied that the bill did not create a charge on the Consolidated Fund. He further argued that this position was rightly confirmed by all the five Justices of the Constitutional Court who held that the original Bill presented on the floor of Parliament by Hon.Raphael Magyezi did not contravene Article 93 of the constitution.

Regarding the contested facilitation of Ug. Shs. 29,000,000/= given to Members of Parliament, the Attorney General submitted that during cross examination [at pages 309 Vol. 3 of the Record], the Clerk to Parliament ably pointed out in her evidence that the above sum was appropriated for use by the Parliamentary Commission and not drawn from the Consolidated Fund.

In conclusion on this point, the Attorney General submitted that Article 93 of the Constitution only prohibited Parliament from proceeding with a bill, unless introduced on behalf of Government that made provision for financial implications. In his view, the Article did not concern itself with the money used in processing the bill, allowances/facilitations that was paid out to the Members of Parliament to process the Bills.

On public consultation, the Attorney General submitted that the majority learned Justices of the Constitutional Court made a proper finding that there was public participation and consultation in the process of conceptualization and enactment of some clauses of the impugned Act.

In light of this, the Attorney General submitted that there is no yardstick upon which to measure the extent of the public consultation required to validate an amendment of the Constitution. He argued further that it was dependent on Parliament to determine how best to achieve the participation objective.

The Attorney General submitted that the two cases on public consultation relied upon by the appellants were distinguishable. Additionally, he submitted that the above notwithstanding, at pages 620 – 640 Vol. 3 of the record, the Parliamentary Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs had complied with the requirement for public participation.

The Attorney General refuted the appellants' contention that the Bill was smuggled onto the order paper. The Attorney General pointed out that under Article 94(4) the Speaker had powers to determine the order of business in parliament. He submitted that the inception, notice of motion and tabling of the motion was undertaken well within the Rules. In the Attorney General's view, there was no smuggling of the Bill as alleged by the appellants and that the amendment of the Order Paper by the Speaker was authorized in Article 94 (4) and Rule 24 (Old Rules) (New Rules 25).

The Attorney General pointed out that the matter of suspension of the six Members of Parliament was ably canvassed in the Affidavit of the 30 Clerk to Parliament [at Paragraphs 17- 23, pages 612-613 of the record].

He submitted that the Constitutional Court rightly found that the Rules conferred upon the Speaker of Parliament the mandate to order a Member of Parliament whose conduct has become disorderly and disruptive to withdraw from Parliament and that the Speaker properly did so.

The Attorney General refuted the Appellants' assertion that the invalid suspension of Rule 201 (2) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament and non secondment of the motion to waive Rule 201 adversely affected the whole process of enacting the impugned Act. He further disputed the appellants' assertions that the suspension of Rule 201(2) deprived Members sufficient time to debate the report of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee in that they were given only 3 minutes to debate and that hard copies were not duly tabled before the House as provided in Rule 201 (1).

The Attorney General submitted that the evidence [at page 719 of the record] shows that on 18th December, 2017 the Right Hon. Speaker informed the House that on the preceding Thursday, she directed the Clerk to upload the Committee report on their ipads and that therefore the highlighted Rule did not apply.

The Attorney General further submitted that at page 263 of the record, wherein the motion to suspend Rule 201 (2) was moved and debated, the said motion was supported by Hon Janepher Egunyu at Page 761 of the record and other members who rose up to debate and support the motion.

Relying on the decision of Alfonse Owiny-Dollo, [DCJ at page 176] and Cheborion, JCC [at Page 95], the Attorney General submitted that Members of Parliament had adequate notice as to the contents of the report (four days before debating the same) and that therefore the purpose of Rule 201(2) was achieved

He prayed that since, the Members of Parliament received the report of the Committee three days before the debate, this Court should uphold the finding of the Constitutional Court that no prejudice was occasioned to the members.

It was submitted that the Speaker explained the reason for the non compliance with Rule 98(4) of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament as being the large numbers of members present inside the Parliamentary chambers. The Attorney General submitted that there was no requirement that each and every Member of Parliament must debate before closure and that the Appellants' contentions in that regard were mistaken.

In respect to the allegation of signing of the Committee Report by non members, the Attorney General submitted that Article 94(3) of the Constitution provides that the presence or the participation of a person not entitled to be present or to participate in the proceedings of Parliament shall not by itself invalidate those proceedings. In light of his submissions, he contended that the requirement of the law in regard to quorum and non-validation of the report were considered and correctly adjudicated upon by the Constitutional Court. He prayed that this Court upholds the same.

The Attorney General refuted the appellant's contention that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact in holding that the validity of the entire impugned Act was not fatally affected by the discrepancy and variances between the Speaker's certificate of compliance and the Bill at the time of Presidential Assent. The Attorney General submitted that the Constitutional Court came to the right finding in holding that the validity of the entire impugned Act was not fatally affected by the discrepancy and variances between the Speaker's certificate of compliance and the Bill at the time of Presidential Assent.

The Attorney General reiterated his submissions in the Constitutional Court [at pages 2154-2159 Vol K, of the record]. He added that Rule 230 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament vests in the Speaker power to control the admission of the public to the premises of Parliament so as to ensure law and order as well as the decorum and dignity of Parliament. He argued that the non-admission of Appellant Male Mabirizi was well within the powers of the Speaker.

In answer to the contention that the proceedings conducted in the absence of the official opposition were a nullity, the Attorney General reiterated his submissions made in the lower court. He however pointed out that Rule 24 of the Rules of parliament enacted pursuant to Article 88 of the Constitution provides that the quorum for the business of parliament shall be one third of all Members of Parliament entitled to vote.

In his view, it followed that the business of Parliament can go on in the absence of the leader of opposition and opposition Members of Parliament as long as there is the requisite quorum in Parliament. He added that under Article 94 of the Constitution Parliament may act notwithstanding a vacancy in its membership.

The Attorney General also defended the validity of the Report of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee against the contention that it was invalid since it had delayed in the Committee beyond 45 days, contrary to Rule 128 (2) and 140 of the Rules of Procedure of Parliament. The Attorney General submitted that this allegation constituted a departure from pleadings that be disregarded.

It is submitted that had this matter been raised in time, evidence would have been led to prove that the committee acted well within the provisions of Rules 128 and 140 of the Rules of procedure of Parliament in that whereas the Bill was referred to the committee on 3rd October 2017, the house was sent on recess on 4th October 2017. He added that during recess, no parliamentary business is transacted without leave of the Speaker. He contended that the days could not start running unless the leave was obtained.

The Attorney General further pointed out that by a letter dated 29th October 2017 the Chairperson duly applied for leave, which leave was granted by the Rt. Hon Speaker on the 3rd November 2017. He added that the 45 days started running from the 3rd November 2017. In the Attorney General's view, this meant that the days would expire on 16th December 2017. He argued that, the Committee reported on the 14th December 2017 which date was two days before the expiry of the 45 days period.

He submitted further that in any event non compliance with the 45 days rule does not vitiate proceedings on a Bill. He placed reliance on Rule 140 which provides that where extra time is granted, or upon expiry of the extra time granted under sub rule 2, the House shall proceed with the Bill without any further delay.

The Attorney General refuted the appellant's contention that the Constitutional Court erred in holding that the failure to separate the second and third seating by 14 days was not fatal. He further refuted the appellant's submissions that the failure to submit a Certificate of the Electoral Commission envisaged in Article 263 (2) (b) invalidated the whole Act.

The Attorney General submitted that the issues of observance of the 14 days sitting between the second and third reading as well as the failure to submit a certificate of the Electoral Commission were ably determined by the Constitutional Court. He further argued that the contents of the original Bill that was presented to Parliament did not contain any provision that required the separation of the second and third sittings of Parliament by 14 days. He said that in the same vein, the Bill did not contain any provision the amendment of which required its ratification by the people of Uganda through a referendum, thereby necessitating the issuance of a certificate of the Electoral Commission.

Resolution of issue 2

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court held that Parliament substantially complied with the Constitution and with its Rules of Procedure save for certain Rules of Procedure which the Speaker, in particular, violated. The Justices of the Constitutional Court unanimously ruled that the following alleged infractions of the Constitution and Rules of Procedure of Parliament were without merit:

The payment of Shs.29,000,000/= as an alleged charge on the Consolidated Fund. Denying adequate time for debate in the house.

Alleged arbitrary suspension of members of Parliament

Failure to close doors at the time of voting

Illegal crossing of the floor of parliament by members of the ruling party

Proceeding in the absence of the Leader of Opposition and other opposition Members of Parliament

Delay by the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee to submit the Report on the Bill initiated by Honourable Raphael Magyezi

It is worth noting that the dissenting Justice equally held that the above alleged violations of the Rules of Procedure of the Parliament of Uganda and the provisions of the Constitution were without merit. He was in agreement with the majority on this aspect of the petition. On the other hand, Kenneth Kakuru JCC, in his dissenting judgment held that the following alleged infractions of the Rules of Procedure and the Constitution had been proved by the Appellants and thus rendered the entire Act a nullity:

The unlawful sidelining of the motion of Honourable Patrick Nsamba and prioritizing the one of Honourable Raphael Magyezi. The failure to formally lay on the table, prior to debating, the Committee Report.

The amendment of the order paper to include the motion by Honourable Raphael Magyezi without three hours' notice to members.

The voting by non-members of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee on the majority Report.

The failure to carry out proper consultations on the Bill.

Elizabeth Musoke, JCC agreed with Kenneth Kakuru JCC that the Speaker acted unlawfully in sidelining the motion moved by the Honourable Patrick Nsamba and prioritizing the motion by the Honourable Raphael Magyezi. Her Lordship however did not agree with Kakuru JCC on the effect of this illegality. She went on to hold nevertheless that the motion by Honourable Patrick Nsamba did not have an accompanying draft Bill and would have been incompetent on that ground.

The Appellants invite this Court to find that the alleged infractions of the Rules of Procedure and provisions of the Constitution rendered the entire Act a nullity. Let me first address the alleged violations which the entire Constitutional Court ruled were non-existent or inconsequential before addressing the infractions found to have been proved by the dissenting Justice of the Constitutional Court and which the dissenting Justice ruled were fatal to the validity of the entire Act.

It is trite law that Parliament must comply with its own Rules of Procedure enacted under Article 94 of the Constitution and that failure to follow those Rules amounts to a violation of the said constitutional provision. See Prof Oloka Onyango & Others vs Attorney General, (Supra)

I have re-appraised the affidavit evidence on record proffered both by the Appellants and the Respondent. In particular, the largely undisputed affidavit evidence of Honourable Ibrahim Ssemujju Nganda in regard to the manner in which the motion by the Honourable Raphael Magyezi was introduced onto the order paper of Parliament after an unexpected amendment of the Order Paper.

He testified also, in his affidavit, about the manner in which the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs went about its responsibility of scrutinizing the Bill proposed by the Honourable Raphael Magyezi. In particular, I take note of the largely undisputed testimony that the Speaker of Parliament initially approved of the need by the Committee to consult as widely as possible throughout the country on the said Bill but evidently the extent of the consultations is a subject of dispute.

I have also considered the affidavit evidence adduced by the Respondent especially the affidavit of Jane Kibirige, Clerk to Parliament, rebutting the averments by the Appellant Members of Parliament. After a careful appraisal of the evidence on record, I do not, with the greatest respect, agree with the unanimous findings of the Justices of the Constitutional Court that the complaint concerning denial of adequate time for debate on the Bill, contrary to the Rules of Procedure, was without basis. The evidence on record and the exhibited proceedings in the Hansard demonstrate that there was unusual haste and a complete lack of transparency in the manner in which the Honourable Speaker handled the impugned Bill.

Similarly, the Honourable Speaker's ruling suspending Members of Parliament on 18th December 2017 lacked transparency. While the suspension of some Members of Parliament for disrupting order in the house on 26th September 2017 was lawfully and fairly handed down, the record does not show any cause for the suspension ordered on 18th December 2017. During the proceedings of 26th September 2017, a number of Members of Parliament disrupted proceedings when they sang the National Anthem repeatedly to block further business till the house was adjourned. Their suspension was in my view deserved and lawful.

By contrast, the record, particularly the Hansard, clearly demonstrates that the Appellants did not engage in any form of misconduct or indiscipline warranting suspension from the proceedings of 18th December 2017. What appears on the record is that those members firmly and politely strove to draw the Hon. Speaker's attention to what they considered to be violations of Rules of Procedure. Then the suspension followed. However, the members did not invoke Rule 86(2) of the Rules of the House. As such the act of the Speaker remained unchallenged. In the circumstances the Speaker cannot be faulted.

As for the other alleged violations of the Constitution and the Rules of Procedure, I am in agreement with the unanimous decision of the Constitutional Court that those allegations were without merit. For avoidance of doubt, those are the following;

The payment of Ug. Shs. 29,000,000/= as an alleged charge on the Consolidated Fund.

Failure to close doors at the time of voting

Illegal crossing of the floor of parliament by members of the ruling party

Proceeding in the absence of the Leader of Opposition and other opposition Members of Parliament

Delay by the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee to submit the Report on the Bill initiated by Honourable Raphael Magyezi

In respect to the payment of Ug. Shs. 29,000,000/=, I am unable to agree with the interpretation advanced by the Appellants that this amounted to an unconstitutional charge on the Consolidated Fund arising out of a private Member's Bill. Article 93, in my view, prohibits the presentation of a private Member's Bill that contains financial provisions that have a prospective effect on the Consolidated Fund.

I agree with the decision by the Justices of the Constitutional Court that preparation of every Bill, including a private Member's Bill, requires facilitation and use of Parliamentary and other resources. Such do not translate to a charge on the Consolidated Fund. Were this the case, no private member's bill would be possible since it is the duty of Parliament to assist and facilitate every mover of such a bill. Certainly there is some expenditure involved but not what the appellants allege.

Concerning the contested proceedings conducted without closed doors, the crossing of the floor of Parliament, the proceedings conducted in the absence of the Leader of the Opposition, and some other opposition MP's as well, I find these were minor infractions that the Speaker of Parliament, in exercise of her discretionary powers, lawfully disregarded. The evidence on record, especially the affidavit of the Clerk to Parliament, does explain away the said infractions and the recourse to the Speaker's discretionary powers. I do observe however that those occurrences were unusual.

I do not agree with the Appellant Male Mabirizi that the Committee Report was tabled outside the 45 days limit. I accept the explanation given by the Attorney General to the effect that no such delay occurred given that the appellants computation of the days wrongly included the time spent on parliamentary recess.

I will now consider the alleged violations of Rules of Procedure which the dissenting Justice found to have merit and held that they invalidated the entire Constitution (Amendment) Bill 2017. These were the following;

i. The unlawful sidelining of the motion of Honourable Patrick Nsamba and prioritizing the one of Honourable Raphael Magyezi.

ii. The failure to formally lay on the table, prior to debating, the Committee Report

iii. The amendment of the order paper to include the motion by Honourable Raphael Magyezi without three hours notice to members

The voting by non-members of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee on the majority Report

The failure to carry out proper consultations on the Bill.

I have carefully reviewed the Constitution, Rules of Procedure and the authorities provided in regard to the five violations alleged above. Concerning the voting by non-members of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee on the majority Report, I am unable to agree with the dissenting Justice that this violation was fatal. The evidence on record indicates that only two non-members were pointed out to have signed the majority report. The exclusion of their signatures from the Report would still leave a majority of members as signatories to the said report. I agree nevertheless that it was an irregularity.

In law, their participation in the proceedings was not fatal either as the Constitution provides for such eventuality. Article 94(3) of the Constitution is relevant. It is only the act of signing their names against the majority report that is problematic. I would have reached a different conclusion if the split in numbers between the majority and minority reports was adversely affected by those two members of Parliament.

In regard to the alleged violation of the Rules of Procedure namely; the sidelining of the Honourable Patrick Nsamba motion, the irregular amendment of the order paper to include the Honourable Raphael Magyezi's motion and the failure to formally table the Committee Report on the floor of Parliament, I am of the view that the motion of Hon. Patrick Nsamba could not precede that of Hon. Magyezi because the former had no draft Bill whereas the latter had. That is not to say that the introduction of the motion was not inordinate and suspect.

I appreciate the concerns of the dissenting Justice, that the cited acts and omissions grossly violated the Rules of Procedure especially considering that this was done in the context of effecting a Constitutional amendment. There was no apparent justification on the part of the Honorable Speaker to prioritize the Honourable Raphael Magyezi's motion which was hastily introduced onto the Order Paper. I look at this in light of the haste that attended the transaction so soon following the Deputy Speaker's assurance earlier on that due notice would be given.

Nevertheless, I acknowledge that the Speaker exercised her discretion.

The Justices of the Constitutional Court ably set out the law regarding the mandatory nature of public participation and consultation in the constitution making process and legislative processes generally. There is no doubt that the process of effecting constitutional amendments requires and mandates involvement of the people in accordance with Article 1 of the Constitution.

The Honourable Speaker of Parliament, to her credit, was alive to the need for involvement of the people in accordance with Article 1 and she duly discharged her role in bringing the same to the attention of the August House.

Regrettably, several subsequent events detailed in the cogent affidavit evidence of the Appellants lead me to conclude that the attempt to involve the people in this process was less than would be expected. First, the relevant Committee of Parliament charged with collecting views from Ugandans across the country was unable, for unknown reasons, to carry out that exercise; contrary to the Speaker's earlier indications. Secondly, there is evidence on record that some members who were opposed to the proposed Constitutional amendments, were unlawfully blocked from openly collecting views from the public. This was most unfortunate. While I agree with the majority decision of the Constitutional Court that there were in evidence only a handful of interruptions of some members of parliament, the fact that it occurred at all is unfortunate. It is equally exasperating to note that no system is in place to gauge the extent of consultation and participation such as the one in contest. The extent of the consultation would have been better assessed had a system been in place to measure consultation and participation. In the circumstances I cannot fault the majority Justices.

Assistant Inspector General of Police, Asuman Mugenyi, in his affidavit confirmed that he issued a directive that was uniformly enforced by all police stations in the country. Where MPs attempted to breach it police was on hand to disperse the gatherings. This directive, which was unanimously found to be unlawful, arbitrary and obnoxious, prohibited MPs opposed to the proposed Constitutional amendments from holding joint rallies or conducting public consultation beyond their constituencies.

The affidavit evidence on record indicates, without challenge, that a number of MPs who attempted to hold joint rallies or conduct public dialogues had their gatherings dispersed by the police as the Leader of Opposition testified. There is no affidavit evidence on record to support the finding by the majority Justices that the disruption of joint rallies and public consultations by those opposed to the impugned amendment were isolated events.

Consequently, I am in agreement with the dissenting Justice that the attempts at public participation were restricted. However, for want of a proper measuring tool I find no basis to pronounce myself on the extent of public participation country wide.

I must now determine whether the entire Bill or parts of it are invalid in light of my findings above. I will also address the significance of the Speaker's Certificate of Compliance that accompanied the Bill sent for Presidential assent.

The learned Justices of the Constitutional Court, by a 4 to 1 majority, found that all the clauses which were introduced into the original Bill were invalid. However, they ruled that all procedural requirements for the original Bill had been met and that those original clauses were good law. The Justices invoked the doctrine of severability of Statutes in holding that the impugned clauses were invalid. They saved the original clauses of the Honourable Raphael Magyezi's Bill, those existent before the introduction of amendments by the Honourables Micheal Tusiime and Nandala Mafabi. The majority Justices held that the original clauses were validly passed.

I have addressed my mind to the process of enactment. It should not be doubted by anyone that both the provisions that were severed and those that were saved from severance were enacted as one entity.

On 3rd October 2017 the Constitution (Amendment) (No. 2) Bill, 2017 was tabled as a Private Members Bill by Honourable Raphael Magyezi, MP, Igara County West. He sought to amend Articles 61, 102(6) and 183 (2) (b) of the Constitution. The Bill was also meant to amend Article 104(2) and (3) as well as Article 104(6) of the Constitution.

In the course of the debate on the floor of Parliament, additional amendments were proposed and accommodated, notably those made by Honourable Michael Tusiime regarding extension of the term of the current Parliament and those made by Honourable Nandala Mafabi seeking the return of the Presidential term limits. Without dwelling on the merits of the questioned process, I can declare that the original Bill together with its amendments were voted on and passed, lock, stock and barrel.

The Hansard of Wednesday 20th December 2017 at page 5263 refers to the Report from the Committee of the whole House and captures the Honourable Raphael Magyezi stating as follows:

'Madam Speaker, I beg to report that the Committee of the Whole House has considered the Bill entitled, "The Constitution (Amendment) (No. 2) Bill, 2017" and passed the entire Bill with amendments and also introduced and passed new clauses - amending Articles 77, 181, 29, 291, 105 and 260. I beg to report.'

The report was adopted that day and the Speaker invited Honourable Raphael Magyezi to move for the third reading. Roll call followed. Those for the Bill were 315. Those against were 62. Two members were absent.

Thereafter the Speaker declared that the Bill had been passed.

Article 263 (2) (a) regards the certificate of compliance issuing from the Speaker to the President if an Assent is to be obtained. It states:

'(2) A Bill for the amendment of this Constitution which has been passed in accordance with this Chapter shall be assented to by the President only if -

(a)it is accompanied by a certificate of the Speaker that the provisions of this Chapter have been complied with inrelation to it;

The emphasis above is added.

In the Certificate of Compliance, the Speaker recorded:

'I certify that the Constitution (Amendment) (No. 2) Bill, 2017 seeking to amend the following Articles -

Article 61 of the Constitution;

Article 102 of the Constitution;

(c) Article 104 of the Constitution; and

(d) Article 183 of the Constitution was supported by 317 Members of Parliament at the second reading on the 20th day of December, 2017 and supported by 315 Members of Parliament on the third reading on the 20th day of December, 2017, in Parliament, being in each case not less than two thirds of all Members of Parliament, the total membership of Parliament at the time, being 434; and that the provisions of Articles 259, 262 and chapter Eighteen of the Constitution have been complied with in relation to the Bill.'

In the event, the Bill that the Honourable Speaker proceeded to proffer to the President for assent was different from the one Honourable Raphael Magyezi had initially proposed. However, it was similar to the one that the House had gone on to pass on 20th December 2017.

Given the circumstances, the Bill the President assented to bore little resemblance to the one the certificate of compliance, issued by the Honourable Speaker, certified as having been passed in Parliament. The certificate of compliance indicated that only four Articles in the Constitution had been affected by the amendment. The Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 assented to by the President showed ten Articles were affected by the amendment.

It is not contested that the President signed what was actually passed by the House. What is in contest is the veracity of the certificate of compliance. Yet the legislation was passed as one whole and it was the Speaker herself, upon passing of the law, who declared that the legislation had been passed as a complement. The Hansard of 20th December 2017 bears testimony to this. The Bill as originally intended metaphorically lost its claim to innocence when other provisions were added to it. There was, therefore, in my view no certificate accompanying the Bill to be assented to as is mandatory under Article 263(2)(a) of the Constitution.

A certificate is meant to certify the contents of the Bill to be assented to. Since the document tendered by the Speaker as the certificate did not tell the truth when certifying the legislation to be assented to, I hold there was no certificate. The assent in my view was made in vain. This is a fundamental procedural irregularity which cannot be cured by severance as the Justices of the Constitutional Court attempted to do. To do so would tantamount to the judiciary entering the legislative arena which should not be countenanced.

This irregularity has company. It should be seen in the light of other irregularities that attended the impugned enactment which are highlighted elsewhere in this judgment. Contrary to Article 93 of the Constitution, Parliament proceeded to legislate on the impugned enactment including provisions that required a certificate of no financial implication. No effort was made to secure it following the additions and in the endeavor the legislature went on to debate and pass the amendment bill without the necessary certificate. The resulting legislation is therefore illegal. Needless to say the additions that were later accommodated with the original provisions rendered the entire Bill subject to Article 263 (1) of the Constitution. The mandatory separation of at least 14 days ordained by the Constitution between the second and third reading of the Bill was not observed. It was deliberately ignored. All the above omissions point to the failure of the legislature to follow the procedure laid down by the Constitution for its amendment. For these reasons, the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they applied the doctrine of severance to hold that some clauses of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2017 had been lawfully passed. I shall be addressing severance in issue 8 herein.

For now I must answer this issue in the affirmative.

ISSUE 3: Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the violence/scuffles inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 did not in any respect contravene nor was it inconsistent with the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda?"

Appellants' Submissions

Counsel for the Appellants as well as appellant Male Mabirizi submitted that the learned trial Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the violence inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act did not contravene nor was it inconsistent with the Constitution.

Counsel argued that they rightfully established that the UPDF, the Uganda Police force and other militia wrongfully intervened in the entire process leading to the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act.

The Appellants contended that the directive issued by AIGP Asumani Mugenyi to all the police forces countrywide stopping opposition MPs from consulting was complied with by all police personnel. The Police in blocking the said consultations invoked the directive of the Director of Operations, AIGP Asuman Mugenyi, which directive was unanimously declared by the Constitutional Court to be unlawful, arbitrary, obnoxious, unfortunate and unconstitutional.

Counsel averred that the bill was passed amidst violence within and outside Parliament. Counsel alleged that there was violence throughout the Country during public consultations. Counsel added that the entire process was vitiated and rendered the ensuing Bill unconstitutional. It was argued that as a result of the heavy deployment and unprecedented violence meted out against Members of Parliament within the precincts and chambers of the August House, the Speaker was prompted to write a letter to the President of Uganda inquiring into the existence of armed personnel in the precincts of Parliament.

Counsel stated that the unlawful invasion and/or heavy deployment at Parliament by combined forces of the Uganda People's Defence Forces, the Uganda Police Force and other militia before and on the day the impugned bill was tabled before Parliament amounted to amending the Constitution using violent means, that it undermined Parliamentary independence and that as such it was inconsistent with and contravened the Constitution.

Counsel submitted that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court acknowledged that security forces committed acts of violence in and out of Parliament but held that those acts were not sufficient to vitiate the enactment. Counsel argued that application of the qualitative test by the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court was erroneous. Counsel faults the majority Justices for wrongfully introducing the qualitative test used in electoral law in a dispute dealing with non-compliance with constitutional provisions in the legislative process.

Counsel criticized the Constitutional Court finding that the violence was not so prevalent to vitiate the enactment process. Counsel submitted that the violence had a chilling effect on other members of the public that wished to participate as well as some members of Parliament that would have wished to oppose the amendment. Counsel said it was imperative for the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court to find that the amendment was begotten from violence inflicted on persons opposed to the amendment, and therefore this was contrary to Art 3 (2) of the Constitution.

In conclusion, the Appellants submitted that the invasion of Parliament by the combined armed forces of the Uganda People's defence forces, the Uganda police and other militia was unwarranted and uncalled for as rightly found by the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court. Counsel stated that the violence was unjustified in the circumstances and that this later on had an adverse effect of curtailing several persons and Ugandans at large from participating in the process leading to the enactment of the impugned Constitution (Amendment) Act.

Counsel invited court to answer this issue in the affirmative and find that the learned trial justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law and fact when they held that the violence inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the impugned Constitution (Amendment) Act did not contravene nor was it inconsistent with the Constitution.

Respondent's Submissions

The Attorney General submitted that Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court rightly found that the violence/scuffle inside and outside Parliament during the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 did not amount to a breach of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda sufficient to justify a declaration of the whole process as unconstitutional and prayed that this Honourable Court does uphold the decision of the Court on this matter.

He pointed out that it is factually incorrect for the Appellants to state that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court found that the UPDF, Uganda Police Force and other militia wrongfully intervened in the entire process leading to the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act. It was the unanimous decision of the Court that the intervention of the Uganda Police Force was lawful and there was never any reference to militias as alleged by the Appellants.

The Attorney General contended that the evidence on record clearly illustrated that the proceedings of Parliament on the 21st, 26th and 27th September 2017 were characterized by unprecedented chaos, disorder and misconduct from the Members of Parliament that eventually led to the Speaker issuing an order for their immediate suspension from the House. However, he argues that some MPs chose not to heed the Speaker's orders to leave the House and this led to their eviction by members of the security forces under the command of the Sergeant-atArms.

The Respondent submitted that the Rt. Hon. Speaker is legally mandated to ensure that order and decorum is maintained in the House and she clearly had the powers as derived from the 1995 Constitution to suspend the MPs who perpetuated violence in the Parliamentary chambers.

The respondent prayed that this Honourable Court upholds the decision of the Learned Justices of the Constitutional Court that in the circumstances as presented by the evidence, the Rt. Hon. Speaker acted within her powers and in accordance with the Constitution to evict the named Members of Parliament.

It was the Respondent's case that the events that transpired on 26th and 27th September 2017 that led to the scuffle with the security agencies were contrary to the public interest and necessitated the limitations to the enjoyment of the rights of the MPs and their eventual arrest and detention by the security forces.

The Attorney General submitted that it was apparent from the findings of the Constitutional Court that their Lordships considered the evidence on the record and came to the appropriate conclusions on this issue of the alleged violence against the members of the public.

The Attorney General faulted the Appellants for alleging that the Constitutional Court did not address this issue. He submitted that when the evidence was evaluated it was found that an overwhelming number of Members of Parliament carried out their meetings of consultations with the people in an uninterrupted manner and that they were then able to come and vote on the Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017.

The Attorney General stated that the appellants, as was the case in the Constitutional Court, did not adduce any evidence to show that there was a group of Ugandans whose right to participate in the process leading to the enactment of the Constitutional Amendment Act No. 1 of 2018 was curtailed by the security forces.

He invited this Honourable Court to confirm the finding of the Constitutional Court that the consultative process was not marred with violence by the security forces against the people and that there is no need to invalidate the same.

The respondent argued that the Appellant had raised a new argument on appeal that force was used to amend the Constitution and as a result the Respondents are in breach of Article 3(2) of the Constitution.

The Attorney General argued that the appellants never raised this issue at the Constitutional Court and that therefore they are precluded from raising this argument at the Supreme Court. Rule 82 (1) Judicature (Supreme Court Rules) Directions S.I. 13-11.

He submitted that this particular argument cannot be raised by the Appellant as it was never raised at the Constitutional Court level and there is no decision on the same to be appealed against.

He pleaded that, in the event that this Honourable Court accepts to consider the ground of appeal in the manner that has been raised by the Appellant, the evidence as has been led by the Respondent clearly illustrates that the amendment was done with the full participation of the Members of Parliament and this contention should be dismissed.

The Attorney General prayed that this Honourable Court finds that the Appellants severally misconstrued the application of Article 3 (2) of the Constitution as the expulsion of the Members of Parliament was not a singular event but was a result of their consistent misconduct during the debate of Constitutional Amendment Act No. 1 of 2018.

The Respondent in conclusion prayed that this Honourable Court finds that the Constitutional Court correctly found that the violence inside and outside Parliament was not sufficient to warrant a finding of inconsistency with the Constitution.

Resolution of Issue 3

In my resolution of the Appellants' complaints regarding the disruption, by police, of joint consultative rallies and meetings organised by the Members of Parliament opposed to the constitutional amendments, I already determined that the unlawful and unconstitutional actions of the police force rendered the attempts at public participation and consultation futile. For that reason alone, I would answer this issue in the affirmative.

However, for the sake of completeness, I will briefly address the affidavit evidence on record and the arguments in respect of the events that transpired inside the Parliamentary chambers on 27th September 2017.

In respect of the violence in Parliament, the Respondent contends that the Appellants and other rowdy Members of Parliament were to blame particularly for the events of 27th September 2017. While it is true that some Members of Parliament did not behave honorably throughout the proceedings concerning the impugned amendment, I am unable to agree with the Respondent that the events of 27th September 2017 when unknown security agents invaded Parliamentary chambers and assaulted a number of MPs are justified.

First, the evidence on record indicates that the members of the UPDF were unlawfully involved since there was no state of emergency declared to warrant their involvement. Members of the national army are only required to intervene in curbing civilian unrest in cases of emergency under the Constitution.

Consequently, their unwarranted involvement in dragging MPs from Parliamentary chambers and assaulting them was unconstitutional. That operation was in breach of Article 97 of the Constitution regarding the immunities and privileges of Members of Parliament.

Secondly, the Right Honourable Speaker of Parliament, in her letter to the Head of State, protested the invasion of Parliament by the unknown security agents attached to the army who assaulted MPs and dragged them from Parliamentary chambers. Clearly the head of the House was not privy to the operation.

It is pertinent to note that the Speaker pointed out to the President, in agreement with evidence of the Appellants, that some MPs who had not even been suspended were also targeted by the said security agents and assaulted before being dragged out of the parliamentary chambers. The affidavit evidence of Gerald Karuhanga, Ibrahim Ssemujju Nganda and the Winifred Kiiza is corroborated by the Speaker's protest to the Head of State in this regard.

An extract of the Speaker's letter to the Head of State, which was relied on and annexed to the affidavits of Honourables Gerald Karuhanga and Winifred Kiiza, is worth reproducing to put the whole episode in its proper perspective;

"As you may be aware there were some disruptions of Parliament proceeding by some rowdy members of Parliament on the 21st20 September, 26th and 27th September 2017.

I took action to suspend 25 members of Parliament from the service of the House for three (3) sittings.

However, after I had requested the Sergeant At Arms to remove the Members from the precincts unknown people entered the Chamber beat up the Members, including those not suspended and a fight ensued for over one hour.

I have had opportunity to view camera footages of what transpired and noticed people in black suits and white shirts who are not part of the Parliamentary Police or the staff of the Sergeant at Arms beating Members. Additionally, footage shows people walking in single file from the Office of the President to the Parliament Precincts.

I am therefore seeking an explanation as to the identity, mission and purpose of the unsolicited forces. I am also seeking an explanation about why they assaulted the Members of Parliament.

I am also seeking an explanation why the members were arrested and transported and confined at Police stations.

I would also like to know who the commander of the Operation was since the Parliamentary Commission/Speaker did not request for any support"

The said letter, addressed to the Head of State, was copied to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Internal Affairs, the Inspector General of Police and the Commander of the Special Forces Command.

Clearly, the events of 27th September 2017 and the Speaker's formal protest cum inquiry to the Head of State corroborate the Appellants' claims, especially the affidavit averments of Honourables Gerald Karuhanga and Ibrahim Ssemujju, that they were assaulted, harassed and targeted by security agents on account of their opposition to the impugned Constitutional amendments. Such deplorable acts carried out by some elements of the country's security forces were most unfortunate and should never be allowed to happen again.

I do not agree with the Justices of the Constitutional Court who sought to lay blame for the violence inside parliament solely on the rowdy Members of Parliament. As the Speaker of Parliament confirmed in her letter, she viewed the video footage of the saga and observed that some Members of Parliament whom she had not suspended for being rowdy were equally targeted, assaulted and taken to various police stations. The learned Justices ought to have given due consideration to the above concerns raised by the Speaker which were never satisfactorily answered by the Respondent. In my view, the Justices misdirected themselves on this issue and reached an erroneous conclusion.

Consequently, I hold that there was violence orchestrated by state security agents inside and outside Parliament targeted at some Members of Parliament who were forcefully dragged out of parliamentary chambers despite the fact that they had not been suspended by the Honourable Speaker for any misconduct.

I cannot underestimate the chilling effect of this violence on the rest of the August House. Certainly, no meaningful legislative role could be played by parliament in this atmosphere of intimidation, harassment and outright violence visited on some individual legislators.

I therefore answer this issue in the affirmative.

ISSUE 4: Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law when they applied the substantiality test in determining the petition?"

Appellants' Submissions

The Appellants contend that the Justices of the Constitutional Court erred in law by applying the substantiality test in evaluating and assessing the extent to which the Speaker and Parliament failed to comply with and/or violated the Rules of procedure of Parliament and the Constitution as well as the invasion of Parliament.

The Appellants contend that whereas the applicability of the substantiality test is expressly provided for in electoral laws, in constitutional matters the test is totally different. The Constitution being the supreme law of the land provides for no scintilla of violation in their view.

Counsel relied on the decision of this court in Paul K. Ssemogerere & 2 Ors versus Attorney-General, SCCA. NO. 1 OF 2002; where it was held that the constitutional procedural requirements are mandatory.

Appellant Mabirizi submitted under Article 137 of the constitution, the Constitutional Court has no jurisdiction to apply the 'substantiality' test.

That court has no powers to determine disputes and grant remedies outside its jurisdiction. He stated that the Constitutional Court derives its power from Article 137 of the Constitution which gives it no jurisdiction and power to determine whether the constitutional contravention affected the resultant action in a substantial manner. He contended that its work is to determine whether the actions complained of are inconsistent with or in contravention of the Constitution and when it finds in favour, to declare so, give redress or refer the matter to investigation.

In his view, since this role under Article 137 of the Constitution, is limited to only determine whether there was contravention of the constitution, not the degree of contravention, there is no way the Constitutional Court could go ahead to investigate, moreover without any pleading to that effect, whether the contravention of the Constitution affected the enacted law in a substantial manner.

Respondent's Submissions

The Attorney General submitted that the Constitutional Court correctly applied the substantiality test and in so doing reached a proper conclusion. He further relied on the finding of Odoki, C. J in Kizza Besigye Vs Yoweri Museveni Kaguta Election Petition No.1 of 2001.The Attorney General submitted that the substantiality test is used as a tool of evaluation of evidence. He contended that the test is derived directly from the law or may be adopted by a Judge while evaluating the evidence. He said that as such, whether it is in the Constitutional Court, or an ordinary suit, it is trite that the matter or matters in controversy should be determined after a proper evaluation of evidence.

He cited the case of Nanjibhai Prabhudas & Co. Ltd versus Standard Bank Ltd [1968] E.A 670 where it was held that the Courts should not treat any incorrect act as a nullity with the consequence that everything founded thereon is itself a nullity, unless the incorrect act is of a most fundamental nature. The Learned Attorney General therefore supported the majority decision of the Constitutional Court for having had recourse to the substantiality test.

Resolution of Issue 4

In my resolution of the second issue, I found that the violation of provisions of the Constitution and the Rules of Procedure of Parliament went to the root of the validity of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018. For that reason, consideration of this issue is moot. However, I will briefly address this issue for the sake of clarity.

It is argued for the appellants that in arriving at its decision, the substantiality test was erroneously applied by the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court. The Appellants argue further that the substantiality test is not known to our Constitutional law but that it is a creation of electoral laws which apply it in appropriate issues. In this respect, section 59(6) (a) of the Presidential Elections Act, 2005 and section 61(1) (a) of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 2005 were mentioned.

The Respondent on the other hand agreed with the majority decision of the Constitutional Court in this connection arguing that the substantiality test had been used as a tool of evaluation of evidence and that ultimately the verdict was that there had been general compliance with the constitutional requirements and procedure for the enactment of the Act in issue.

The Respondent proceeded to refer to the fights and scuffles in the environs of Parliament as well as the alleged non-compliance with the procedure necessary to be followed during legislation. It was the contention of the Respondent that all these were first considered but that later court found that the amount and extent of the evidence adduced was not sufficient to merit nullification of the entire process.

It is true our electoral law allows for the substantiality test as noted by the Appellants. Section 59(6) (a) of the Presidential Elections Act, Act 16 of 2005 reads:

"(6) The election of a candidate as President shall only be annulled on any of the following grounds if proved to the satisfaction of the court

(a) noncompliance with the provisions of this Act, if the court is satisfied that the election was not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in those provisions and that the non compliance affected the result of the election in asubstantial manner;"

The emphasis above is added.

Needless to say both the provision in the Presidential Elections Act and that in the Parliamentary Elections Act relate to decisions to be made in the wake of election petitions. The matter in contention however is different in origin. Article 137 (1) and (3) of the Constitution is relevant in this respect.

It reads:

"137 Questions as to the interpretation of the Constitution

(1) Any question as to the interpretation of this constitution shall be determined by the Court of Appeal sitting at the Constitutional Court…

A person who alleges that -

(a) an Act of Parliament or any other law or anything in or done under the authority of any law; or (b)any act or omission by any person or authority, is inconsistent with or in contravention of a provision of this Constitution, may petition the constitutional court for a declaration to that effect, and for redress where appropriate.….".

The emphasis above is added.

According to Black's Law Dictionary, 8th edition, a declaration is a formal statement, proclamation, or announcement. It defeats the purpose of a petition when a petitioner seeks for a declaration that for reasons stated there was a miscarriage in the procedure which rendered the result nullified only to receive the reply: "although there were some unwelcome incidents not compatible with what is expected to happen in the process, the process was well carried out since the alleged incidents are of little moment". That borders on obfuscation.

Lest we forget Court here is mandated to declare. In my view, court goes beyond the call of duty when it enters the field of justification. In their judgments, the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court ruled that the incidents attending the enactment process did cause concern but that what transpired, though illegal, was not so significant that they could cause the annulling of the impugned enactment. A declaration under Article 137 of the Constitution ought to be unequivocal. I am not at one with the way the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court resolved this question.

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court erroneously in my view applied the substantiality test prevalent in the electoral law to determine the consequences of non-compliance with the law in legislative processes.

With due respect to the majority Justices, it is trite law the failure to scrupulously comply with provisions of the Constitution or Rules of Procedure during the enactment of legislation is fatal. See Oloka Onyango & Others vs Attorney General, (Supra)

The substantiality test is not relevant in adjudicating questions regarding validity of a constitutional amendment and there is not a single Common Law or civil jurisdiction that applies it as a test for validity of legislation. I have not been able to come across one and the Respondent did not cite any.

I would therefore answer the issue in the affirmative.

ISSUE 5: Whether the learned majority Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves when they held that the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 on the removal of the age limit for the President and Local Council V offices was not inconsistent with the provisions of the 1995 Constitution?"

Appellants' Submissions

Counsel for the appellant faulted the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court for not addressing the contention that the clauses on removal of age limits in the impugned Act violated Articles 1, 8A and 38 on orderly succession and peaceful transfer of power as a principle of democracy. Counsel submitted that peaceful transfer of power and orderly succession of Government is a principle of democracy which ought to be used in interpretation of the Constitution. He cited the case of Ssekikubo and others vs. Attorney General for application of democratic principles. According to counsel, the Court below did not consider this argument and therefore made no decision on it.

He submitted that when Parliament chose to invoke consultations on Section 3 it brought itself under Articles 1 8A and 38 of the Constitution. It submitted that Parliament recognized the issue as being one of a fundamental controversy that could threaten cohesion of the country. It decided the people must be the arbiter. According to counsel, the process must therefore produce a result of what the people want.

Counsel referred to the affidavit of Professor Ssempebwa which refers to the Constitutional Review Commission specifically mandated to examine sovereignty of the people, democracy and good governance and how to ensure that the country is governed in accordance with the will of the people. He argued that as found in the evidence of Professor Ssempebwa paragraph5, 8(f), and (q); Professor Latigo paragraphs 13, 14, 15, 16, 21 23, 24, 25 and 26 and Francis Gimara's affidavit paragraphs 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 16, 17 and 19 there was abuse of human rights violence, harassments, humiliation, assault, detention all of which negate a conducive atmosphere to genuinely seek the views of the people.

He submitted that those reasons advanced in respect of term limits equally apply in respect of a non-limit on age. Counsel argued that the evidence of Professor Ssempebwa is also to the effect that the conflict in Uganda is instigated by unchecked executive power and unlimited incumbency to the position of president. Counsel referred to the Odoki Commission report on the questions of orderly succession and clinging to power through disregard of the Constitutional provisions.

He contended that, had the Court held that orderly succession is one of the principles of democracy, it would have come to the conclusion that given our history, removal of the age limit is in conflict with the principles of democracy on orderly succession and peaceful transfer of power and therefore inconsistent with Articles 1 8A and 38 of the Constitution.

According to counsel, the Court would have nullified the Act if it had considered all these facts. Appellant Male Mabirizi submitted that removal of the age limit under Article 102 was a 'constitutional replacement' which has no place in a constitutional democracy. He argued that the essential element of the constitution which is at stake is the qualifications/capacity of the President/Fountain of Honour which is underpinned under 63 provisions of the Constitution.

Appellant Mabirizi contends that although the element of qualifications of the President are capable of amendment, it should be in a compliant and careful way not to destroy the entire constitutional system & base.

Respondent's Submissions

Counsel for the Respondent submitted that the Justices of the Constitutional Court correctly directed themselves to the law by holding that amendment of Articles 102(b) and 183(2)(b) did not in any way infect Article 1 of the Constitution.

Counsel submitted that the Justices of the Constitutional Court were unanimous and rightly held that the amendment power of parliament extends to Articles 102 and 183. He added that the Justices of the Constitutional Court rightly observed that Parliament had the power through the established Constitutional procedures to amend the provisions of Articles 102 (b) and 183 (2) (b).

He contended that, contrary to the appellants' argument that the amendment takes way the sovereignty of the people of Uganda enshrined under Article 1, the sovereignty of the people is not infected at all. In the Attorney General's view, the effect of this amendment is to open up space and widen the scope of persons who are eligible to stand for election to the office of the President. According to counsel, the amendment actually safeguards the sovereignty of the people as enshrined under Article 1 of the Constitution because the people of Uganda shall have a wider pool of leaders to choose from. He relied on the majority judgments to support this view.

In conclusion, the Attorney General concurred with the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court that the amendment of Article 102 (b) does not amount to a Constitutional replacement. Counsel contended that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court rightly directed themselves to the law in holding that amendment of Article 102 (b) did not amount to Constitutional replacement of Article 1.

Resolution of Issue

In my consideration of the question of whether age limit clauses form part of our Constitution's basic structure, I already ruled that age restrictions are not fundamental pillars on which the 1995 Constitution stands and that removal of the upper age limit restrictions per se does not fundamentally alter the nature of the said Constitution.

There is no doubt that most of the Preamble to the 1995 Constitution is useful, well thought out and has a historical background to it. However, in arguing for the alleged uniqueness and fundamental importance of age limit restrictions in the Constitution, the Appellants' argument goes too far off the point in my view.

As the learned Justice Remmy Kasule JCC ruled, at page 78 of his judgment, maximum age limit restrictions were not even originally proposed by the Odoki Constitutional Commission Report that informed the draft constitution which was debated by the Constituent Assembly and gave birth to the present Constitution. The Appellants' contentions regarding the uniqueness of upper age limit restrictions in the Constitution are misplaced.

Before the enactment of the Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 there were limits to the ages of persons eligible to be nominated for the offices of President or District Chairperson (Local Council V Chairperson). Regarding the office of President Article 102 of the Constitution relevantly reads:

`102 Qualification of the President

A President is not qualified for election as President unless that person i*s…….*

2*(b) not less than thirty five years and not more than seventy five years of age;*

As concerns the office of District Chairperson the relevant provision is in 25 Article 183 (2) (b) which provides:

`183 District Chairperson

(1)……

(2) A person is not qualified to be elected district chairperson unless he or she is….

(a)……

(b) at least thirty years and not more than seventy five years of age;……'

The Justices of the Constitutional Court properly found that the Constitution bears provisions of diverse moment, a fact underlined by the varying ways in which different provisions may be amended. Chapter Eighteen bears testimony to this. The process for its amendment is given nowhere else apart from the Constitution itself, the supreme law of the land. It is not a question of wishes or sentiments to be addressed. Rather our guide is what is ordained in the Constitution. In Chapter Eighteen Article 259 provides:

`259 Amendment of the Constitution

(1) Subject to the provisions of the Constitution,

Parliament may amend by way of addition, variation or repeal, any provision of this Constitution in accordance with the procedure laid down in this chapter.

(2) This Constitution shall not be amended except by an Act of Parliament -

(a) the sole purpose of which is to amend this Constitution; and

(b) the Act has been passed in accordance with this Chapter'.

Article 260 relates to amendments requiring a referendum. Evidently neither Article 102 nor Article 183 calls for a referendum in its process of amendment.

Amendments requiring approval by District Councils are specified in Article 261. Again neither Article 102 nor Article 183 feature there.

There is provision for those not specifically provided for either under Article 260 or 261 or even those specially entrenched under Article 44.

For the residue a simpler method is prescribed under Article 262 and that is where amendment for either Article 102 or Article183 fall. It simply provides:

"262 Amendment by Parliament

A bill for an Act of Parliament to amend any provision of the Constitution, other than those referred to in Articles 260 and 261 of this Constitution, shall not be taken as passed unless it is supported at the second and third readings by the votes of not less than two-thirds of all members of Parliament".

Given the provisions of Article 262, specific amendment of Article 102 and Article 183 is not a process demanding exacting procedure before finally being enacted by Parliament. Provided the lawful procedure laid down in the Constitution is followed. I find that the clauses on age limit restrictions can be amended without infecting any other provision of the Constitution.

In the circumstances I see no basis to fault the finding of the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court.

I therefore answer this issue in the negative.

Issue 6: Whether the Constitutional Court erred in law and in fact in holding that the President elected in 2016 is not liable to vacate office on attaining the age of 75 years?"

Appellants' Submissions

Appellant Mabirizi, who solely raised this ground of appeal, submitted that, had the learned Justices harmonised Article 83(1)(b) with 102(b) of the Constitution, they would have found that the President elected in 2016 ceases to hold office on attaining 75 years of age.

He adopted his submissions in the lower court on this issue and called upon court to make an interpretation that a president ceases to be qualified to hold office the moment he/she ceases to possess the qualifications which were the basis of his/her eligibility to stand for office.

In his view, the provisions of Article 80 of the Constitution which provide for instances when a Member of Parliament loses his/her seat also apply to a sitting president by analogy and when the Constitution is interpreted harmoniously. He therefore prayed that this Court issue a declaration that the incumbent President is ineligible to hold office upon attaining the age of 75 years.

Respondent's Submissions

The Learned Attorney General emphasized that the Constitutional Court considered the provisions of Article 102 and unanimously found that the provisions therein purely relate to the qualifications prior to nomination for election and not during the person's term in office. He supported that interpretation and argued that it was the right one.

Resolution of Issue 6

The Appellant's novel interpretation of Article 102 is clearly without merit. I agree with the unanimous decision of the Constitutional Court that the eligibility criteria for nomination at the time of elections is different from disqualifying factors for a sitting Member of Parliament, Local Government leader or even President.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Ouma Adea vs Oundo Sowedi & Deogratias Hasubi, Election Petition Appeal No.51 of 2016 which was cited by the Constitutional Court, is relevant in appreciating this distinction. In the said decision, their Lordships of the Court of Appeal unanimously held that the Appellant was disqualified from nomination as district chairperson on account of his criminal conviction under the Anti-Corruption Act.

The Appellant's counsel argued that the Appellant was actively challenging the said conviction in the appellate system and that the same was therefore not conclusive and could not be relied on to bar him from presenting himself for nomination as a candidate for district chairperson, Busia. He cited, by way of analogy, Section 95 of the Parliamentary Elections Act which protects a sitting Member of Parliament from losing his/her seat on account of a criminal conviction provided he/she has not exhausted his/her appellate rights.

The Court of Appeal Justices disagreed and held that a sitting Member of Parliament could not be treated in the same manner he or she would be treated at the point of nomination. Nominees who have criminal convictions that operate as a bar to their candidature cannot be validly nominated even if they have not exhausted their appellate rights. However, a sitting elected official who has not exhausted appellate rights is allowed to remain in office in spite of a criminal conviction that would bar him or her from nomination.

While I agree with Appellant Mabirizi that the decision is certainly not the best analogy on this point, I am unable to fault the interpretation reached by the Constitutional Court. If the framers of the Constitution had intended that the upper age limit of 75 years would be a disqualifying factor for a sitting President, they would have expressly stated so. Most importantly, they would have lowered the upper age limit at the point of nomination to 70 years.

In fixing the upper age limit at 75 years, the framers of the Constitution were certainly aware that candidates aged 70 to 74 years would surely offer themselves for nomination. It would be an absurdity if this category of candidates had to vacate office upon reaching the age of 75 years following successful election to the presidency. The finding by Justice Remmy Kasule, JCC, that upper age limit restrictions were historically not even part of the draft report leading to the 1995 Constitution further reinforces this position.

If the Appellant's novel interpretation were what was intended, it would have made more sense for the said provision to bar individuals who would attain the age of 75 years while in office from being validly nominated in the first place.

Since the Constitution did not expressly prohibit this category of candidates, it would be a usurpation of the legislative role for this Court to hold otherwise under the guise of constitutional interpretation. The interpretation supported by the Appellant would require an express provision of the Constitution. Presently, there is none.

In the circumstances, to hazard the suggestion that a President in office would be bound to step down upon celebration of 75 years of life would be moot not only because it is not provided for under the Constitution but also because age in the case of the office of the President features only on the occasion of nomination and nowhere else. There is no doubt that once qualified for nomination and elected the individual would go ahead and serve the full term.

The unanimous finding of the Justices of the Constitutional Court is the proper statement of the law. It should not be disturbed.

I therefore answer this issue in the negative.

Issue 7: Whether the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court derogated the appellants' right to fair hearing, un-judiciously exercised their discretion and committed the alleged procedural irregularities. 7b. If so, what is the effect of the decision of the Court?"

Appellants' Submissions

It was submitted by the Appellant, Appellant Male Mabirizi, that the right to a fair hearing was compromised in a number of ways by the Constitutional Court. He stated that the learned Justices of the Constitutional Court misdirected themselves when they injudiciously exercised their discretion by declining to invoke their powers under the law to summon key government officials and individuals who played a key role in the process leading to the enactment of the impugned Act to appear and testify on the same in accordance with Rule 12(3) of the Constitutional Court (Petitions and References) Rules, SI. 91 of 2005; The provision states:

"The Court may, of its own motion, examine any witness or call and examine or recall any witness if the Court is of the opinion that the evidence of the witness is likely to assist the Court to arrive at a just decision."

Counsel relied on the observations of Justice Mulenga (RIP) in Ssemwogerere& Anor v Attorney General; Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 2002 who while considering the nature and scope of inquiry and investigations which ought to be made by the Constitutional Court, noted that;

"In my view, facts pertaining to constitutional questions ought to be proved with certainty rather than being left to the fate of "hide and seek" between litigants, which the rules on the onus of proof evoke. I would go as far as to say that if the parties failed to do so, it was open to the court,……to call direct evidence from the appropriate officer of Parliament without appearing 'to unduly descend into the arena'. The desirability to decide constitutional issues on ascertained facts cannot be over emphasized.

Appellant Mabirizi contended that Court ought to have exercised its discretion to summon the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker, the Minister of Finance, Honourable Raphael Magyezi, the Chairperson and Deputy Chairperson of the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee as well as the President.

He went on to argue that the Justices of the Constitutional Court erred when they restricted the Appellants and their counsel on what to be asked in cross examination of the witnesses limiting them to the scope of the averments in the affidavits for the respective witnesses. It was

Appellant Male Mabirizi's submission that this was in contravention of the basic principles of evidence law incorporated under Section 137 (2) of the Evidence Act which is to the effect that cross examination of a witness need not be confined to the facts to which the witness testified about

Appellant Male Mabirizi further complains that the mode adopted for submissions during the hearing of the petition was also materially defective for the following reasons;

The Justices of the Constitutional Court erroneously directed the Appellants' counsel to make submissions before the cross examination of relevant witnesses.

The Justices of the Constitutional Court erroneously denied the Appellants' counsel a right to a rejoinder after the representatives of the Attorney General had made their submissions in reply.

In his view, all these procedural irregularities occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

b) If so, what is the effect on the decision of the Court?

He submitted that the above irregularities limited the constitutional court's scope of investigation thereby failing on its noble duty vested under Article 137 (1) of the Constitution. He said that thereby it came thereby coming to a wrong decision.

He went on to state that the Court failed to determine the petition expeditiously thereby invalidating the decision. He relied on Chief Ifezue V. Mbadugha-Nigeria for the view that a Judgment delivered out of time by three months was null and void. In addition, he complained about being denied an opportunity to sit at the bar as he addressed the Court since he was unrepresented by Counsel. Lastly, he argued that he was frequently interrupted by the Court in the course of his submissions thereby occasioning him a miscarriage of justice.

Respondent's Submissions

The Respondent submitted that the 2nd Appellant did not satisfy or otherwise meet the threshold required for an Appellate Court, herein the Supreme Court hearing the instant Constitutional Appeal, to interfere with the discretion of the Constitutional Court.

In regard to refusal to summon certain individuals for cross examination, the Attorney General relied on Constitutional Appeal No. 1/2015: Hon. Theodore Ssekikubo& 4 Others Vs. The Attorney General & 4 Others, and Mbogo& Others vs. Shah [1968] E.A.

The Attorney General contended that there were no irregularities at the hearing which occasioned a miscarriage of justice. In his view, the Justices of the Constitutional Court properly exercised their discretion throughout the hearing.

Resolution of Issue 7

The Appellants fault the Constitutional Court for allegedly denying them a fair hearing in so far as they were not allowed sufficient opportunity to cross examine the deponents of certain affidavits. They also complain about the procedure adopted by the Court in requiring submissions on certain issues before cross examination of deponents. Lastly, the Appellants complain that they were denied their right to make a rejoinder to the Respondent's submissions.

Certainly, the right to a fair hearing is fundamental and is non-derogable in all circumstances. However, courts of law are also enjoined by Article 126 (2) to administer substantive justice without undue regard to technicalities. It was with this principle in mind that this Court rejected the Appellant's contentions in Bakaluba Peter Mukasa vs Betty Nambooze, S.C. EPA NO. 4 OF 2009 that he had been denied a fair hearing at an election petition challenging his election on grounds that the Respondent was allowed to rely on allegations that had not been properly pleaded. This Court overruled the Appellant's contentions on grounds that he had substantially been granted a fair hearing despite the irregular pleading of some of the allegations against his election as Member of Parliament.

The Appellants' complaints present a similar scenario in my view. The Appellants do not demonstrate that they suffered any miscarriage of justice as a result of the said omissions by the Constitutional Court. They simply complain that the Justices of the Constitutional Court were wrong. While it is true that the Appellants should have been allowed a rejoinder to the submissions of the Respondent, the appellants did not show how the denial of this opportunity prejudiced their case.

Secondly, it was not shown by the appellants how requiring the Appellants to submit on issues that were purely of law, such as that on the applicability of the basic structure doctrine and the extensions of the tenure of parliament and local governments, prejudiced their ability to prosecute the petitions.

In regard to the appellant's complaint on refusal to summon certain individuals for cross examination; in Constitutional Appeal No. 01 of 2015, Theodore Ssekikubo & 4 Others vs Attorney General & 4 Others this Court observed:

`This leaves the discretion to allow cross-examination purely in the hands of Court. In constitutional petitions, this power is expressly conferred upon the Constitutional Court by Rule 12 oftheConstitutional Court (Petitions and References) Rules, 2005, Statutory Instrument No. 91of 2005which provides that: -

"(2) With leave of the Court, any person swearing an affidavit whichis before Court, may be cross-examined or recalled as a witnesses if the Court is of the opinion that the evidence of the witnesses is likely to assist the Court to arrive at a just decision" (underlining is added for emphasis).

From the wording of Rule 12(2) above, the Court's power is purely a discretionary one. That being the case, it is well settled that this Court will not, as as appellate Court, interfere with the exercise of discretion by a lower Court including the Constitutional Court, unless it is shown that the Court took into account an irrelevant matter which it ought not to have taken into account or failed to take into account a relevant matter which it ought to have taken into account or that the Court has plainly gone wrong in its consideration of the issues raised before it. (See. Mbogo and Others vs Shah [1968] E.A.93.)'

In the Ssekikubo case this Court went on to hold that the decision of the Justices of the Constitutional Court not to call a witness for crossexamination was a discretion the Court exercised after it had afforded both sides opportunity to address Court on the issue. No side was denied a right to fair hearing. The Constitutional Court adopted the proper course in restricting the cross examination of deponents to matters within their affidavits. I do not see how that prejudiced the Appellants. This court will not interfere with a lawful exercise of discretion by the trial Court. The complaints made by the Appellants in respect of denial of a fair hearing are in respect of exercise of discretion by the Constitutional Court in a bid to expedite the hearing of the petitions.

Ironically, one of the Appellants Mabirizi complains about the late delivery of the Constitutional Court's decision without considering that a protracted and lengthy hearing that seeks to explore and test all manner of complaints and authorities is partly a cause of the delay in decision making. For instance, in this appeal, appellant Mabirizi put together 82 grounds of appeal even though a perusal of his memorandum of appeal shows that his substantive complaints against the decision of the Constitutional Court are hardly in excess of. There is no doubt that this sort of onerous pleading and prosecuting cases itself makes it difficult for a Court to reach a timely and accurate decision.

In the same vain, concerning the complaint that authorities they presented by the appellants in support of their petitions in the Constitutional Court were not considered is answered by my findings that though many authorities were brought in Court, it isn't in the character of this Court to cite all authorities tendered to it. Some may be relevant and others not so relevant. They may also be too numerous to serve any useful purpose. Suffice it to say, all the Justices of the Constitutional Court founded their decisions on relevant authorities.

I am therefore unable to fault the Constitutional Court for the measures that were invoked to expedite the hearing of the consolidated petitions. No miscarriage of justice was occasioned to any of the Appellants and I cannot interfere with the said exercise of discretion.

Consequently, I answer this issue in the negative.

Issue 8

"What remedies are available to the parties?"

Appellants' Submission

The appellants prayed that the appeal be allowed in the terms and prayers specified in the Memorandum of Appeal and specifically that the Constitution (Amendment) Act, No. 1 of 2018 be annulled in its entirety and that the Respondent pays costs of this Appeal and in the Court below. In the alternative but without prejudice to the foregoing, they prayed that if court answers issue 7 in the affirmative a retrial should be ordered.

Appellant Male Mabirizi also prayed for general damages and full costs of the case in this court and the court below with an interest of 25% per annum from the date of judgment till payment in full.

Respondent's Submissions

The Respondent supported the findings of the Constitutional Court and prayed that this Court upholds the same.

Resolution of issue 8

The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court applied the doctrine of severance and held that the entire Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 was not affected by the numerous illegalities proved to have been committed in its passing. I have already held that I disagree with that conclusion.

It is gainful to address the doctrine of severance which was relied upon by the majority Justices of the Constitutional Court. Their decision was ultimately based on that doctrine. It is incumbent on a court faced with an option to severance to define carefully the extent of the inconsistency between the Act in question and the Constitutional requirements.

In Attorney General for Alberta vs Attorney General for Canada, [1994] AC 503, 518 the Board considered the severability of statutory provisions viewed for constitutionality, stating:

'The real question is whether what remains is so inexplicably bound up with the part declared invalid that what remains cannot independently survive or, as it has sometimes been put, whether on a fair review of the whole matter it can be assumed that the legislature would have enacted what survives without enacting the part that is ultra vires at all……. .'

That above is the Canadian experience.

In the United States of America there is the case of Missouri Roundtable, 3965.S.W. 3d 348 which I find relevant for purposes of the matter in hand. The case is cited in the Missouri Law Review Vol 79. Iss. 3[2014], Art 10. The Missouri Law review at page 840 thereof notes:
`Since one of the grounds for the inapplicability of Section
1.140 is non-sensical when applied to procedural constitutional violations, the procedural violations taint the entire affected act, and it makes more sense to restrict it to substantive constitutional violations. Legislative intent is regularly used in ascertaining the substantive constitutionality of a statute, and it is possible for such violations to be restricted to only a portion of a bill. As such, statutory severance under section 1. 104 is not applicable to procedural violations - in particular the single-subject rule – and it is applicable only to substantive constitutional violations. This reasoning supports the conclusion in MissouriRoundtable that substantive and procedural constitutional violations have separate analyses in the context of severance.'

Earlier on at page 835 of the Review the following passage appears:
'Judge Fischer, however, filed a concurrence in the case, stating that he believed that the judicially created doctrine of severance should be abolished. Specifically, he argued two grounds that supported his contention: first, that the doctrinal severance provides "no incentive [for legislators] to follow the clear and express procedural mandates of the Missouri Constitution [,]" and second, that it potentially violates state separation of powers. Elaborating on the effort of judicial severance on the separation of powers, Judge Fischer stated that it may subvert the legislative process by allowing legislation that might not have received enough votes to become law to survive. Procedural constitutional violations, severance, and the discussion prompted by them came into sharp focus in Missouri Roundtable.'
Returning to these Constitutional Appeals, several procedural irregularities were referred to. Some of these were disposed of by the Constitutional Court. Some others are before this Court for determination. The majority Justices of the Constitutional Court in their wisdom ordered for the severance of some of the sections in the Constitution (Amendment) Act, No. 1 of 2018. Other sections were saved on the ground that they were the provisions originally intended to be legislated on and that on their own they did not infringe on the 5 Constitutional provisions in the course of their process of enactment.

Reference has been made to the case of Salvatori Abuki vs AttorneyGeneral, Constitutional Case No. 2 of 1997 in justification of the doctrine of severance. For the record the decision in that case was later appealed.

On appeal in Attorney General vs Salvatori Abuki, Constitutional Appeal No. 1 of 1998 the Supreme Court declared:

`That section 7 of the Witchcraft Act is void for inconsistency with Articles 24 and 44(a) of the Constitution, in that it authorizes the making of an exclusion order prohibiting a person from entering in his or her home, this treatment or punishment which is torturous, cruel, inhuman and degrading'.

The significance of the Salvatori Abukicase is that it struck down or severed section 7 of the Witchcraft Act from the rest of the Act. That kind of severance should be distinguished from the one in issue where the process of enactment was attended by glaring illegalities.

For the reasons given above I find that the enactment in its entirety cannot be saved by way of severance. It must be annulled not partially but as a whole.

In view of my findings on the second, third and fourth issues, the consolidated appeals partly succeed.

A declaration is issued that the Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 is unconstitutional having been enacted in violation of the Constitution. I would declare that the entire Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 was illegally enacted and is null and void.

The Appellants appealed against the award of costs in the Constitutional Court arguing that the amount awarded was inordinately low. The award of costs in the Constitutional Court is contained in the judgment of Owiny Dollo DCJ. It relevantly reads:

'……

4. Court awards professional fee of U. shs 20m/= (Twenty million only) for each Petitioner (not Petitioner). This however does not apply to Petition No. 3 of 2018 where the Petitioner prayed for disbursements only, and Petition No. 49 of 2017 where the Petitioner appeared in person .'

5. Court awards two-thirds disbursements to all Petitioners, to be taxed by the Taxing Master.'

These appeals involve questions of great public interest. They were initiated as public interest petitions. I have already set down the views of the Justices of the Constitutional Court regarding costs that were awarded. Regarding public interest litigation this court has expressed the view that courts while taking into consideration the provisions of Section 27 of the Civil Procedure Act should not automatically enforce orders on costs in public interest litigation because of pertinent factors.

In Muwanga Kivumbi vs Attorney General, Constitutional Appeal No. 06 of 2011 Tibatemwa Ekirikubinza JSC who wrote the lead judgment stated inter alia:

`A proper reading of the above cases reveals that the Court re-affirmed the already established legal principles inherent in section 27 (2) of the Civil Procedure Act.

……

..

The principles which can be deduced from the section are that:

The award of costs is left to the discretion of the court.

Costs normally follow the event-the general rule is that a successful party will be awarded costs .

(iii)Just as it is in other areas of the law where the court is empowered to make decisions, the courts discretion must be exercised judicially.

However, while accepting that the principles inherent in section 27 apply to public interest litigation cases, the above authorities emphasized that costs in public interest litigation cases should only be awarded in rare cases, that the court must balance the need to compensate the successful litigant on the one hand with the value (s) underlying public interest litigation such as growth of constitutional jurisprudence which would be stifled if potential litigants know that there is a possibility of being saddled with costs in the event of the case being dismissed

In other words, in public interest litigation, a court should exercise its discretion to award costs infrequently. Furthermore, where costs are awarded in public interest litigation cases, the award should be minimal.'

Kisaakye JSC agreed with the above dicta and went on to give further 5 justification:

'In awarding and assessing costs in constitutional litigation, courts should not lose sight of the danger that would arise if the constitutional order in this country were to break down.

In my view, society owes a litigant, who averts such a breakdown in the constitutional order through a constitutional petition pointing out areas of contravention of the Constitution, a duty to reimburse him or her for the direct costs he or she incurred in the process of filing and prosecuting the petition and/or appeal. Such a litigant should not bear the economic burden of maintaining the constitutional order for the rest of Ugandans.'

The South African experience is Trustees For The Time Being of the

Biowatch Trust vs Registrar, Genetic Resources & Others [2009]20 ZACC 14 where Sachs J stated:

This is not to deny that vulnerable sectors of society are particularly dependent on the support they can get from public interest groups. A perusal of the law reports shows how vital the participation of public interest groups has been to the development of this court's Jurisprudence. Intervention by public interest groups have led to important decisions concerning the rights of the homeless, refugees, prisoners on death row, prisoners generally …… There has also been pioneering litigation brought by groups concerned with gender equality, the rights of the child……..and in relation to freedom of expression. Similarly, the protection of environmental rights will not only depend on the diligence of public officials, but on the existence of a lively civil society willing to litigate in public interest.

This is expressly adverted to by the National Environmental Management Authority (NEMA) which provides that a court may decide not to award costs against unsuccessful litigants who are acting in the public interest or to protect the environment and who had made due efforts to use other means for obtaining the relief sought.

……

……

56. I conclude, then, that the general point of departure in a matter where the state is shown to have failed to fulfill its constitutional and statutory obligations, and where different private parties are affected, should be as follows: the state should bear the costs of litigants who have been successful against it, and ordinarily there should be no costs orders against any private litigants who have become involved. This approach locates the risk for costs at the correct door-at the end of the day, it was the state thathad control over its conduct.'

The opinion expressed by Sachs J in the South African case are at one with the views of this court and I find them persuasive.

In this matter I find the appellants successful both in this court and in the Constitutional Court.However, the prayer for general damages by appellant Male Mabirizi is misplaced and has no basis in a constitutional petition challenging the validity of the passing of the impugned Act. Equally, his claim to be a professional is out of context as he represented himself. Only an enrolled advocate with audience before this Court could claim for instruction fees. I should add that, even an enrolled advocate representing himself would not be eligible for professional fees.

In conclusion, I would make the following orders:

The consolidated appeals partially succeed.

The Constitution (Amendment) Act 2018 is hereby struck down in its entirety for having been passed in violation of the Constitution and Rules of Procedure of Parliament.

The awards in the Constitutional Court are upheld.

Parties to meet their costs in this Court.

Dated at Kampala this ..... day of ..... 2019.

.....

J U S T I C E P A U L K . M U G A M B A

JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT

EXEGESIS OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MUGAMBA, JSC

BACKGROUND

In 2017, Hon. Raphael Magyezi, a Member of the 10th Parliament of the Republic of Uganda, brought a Private Member's Bill (Constitutional Amendment Bill No. 2 of 2017). On the 27th December, 2017, Parliament passed the Bill eliminating Presidential Age Limit and extending Parliamentary Term. The Ugandan Parliament passed an amendment to the Constitution which, among other measures, aims to eliminate the requirement that candidates vying for the presidency be under 75 years of age.

The court again by a 4-1 majority upheld the larger Bill applying severally the doctrine of severance to save the repeal of the age limit even though all the justices unanimously found unconstitutional means that were used to stifle the MPs' access to their constituents through the police.

Dissatisfied with part of the decision of the Constitutional Court, the appellants appealed to this Court. The Appellant in Constitutional Appeal No. 02 of 2018 lodged a Memorandum of Appeal in the Supreme Court containing 84 grounds of appeal categorized under different parts. Issues for court's determination were framed out of the consolidated appeals.

PAUL MUGAMBA JSC

Justice Paul Mugamba was one of the 3 Justices that dissented in the constitutional appeal No. 2 of 2018. He dissented citing procedural impropriety in passing the bill, violence visited upon members of Parliament as well as the misguided use of the substantiality test in a constitutional petition.

FAILURE TO FOLLOW RULES OF PROCEDURE

It is trite law that Parliament must comply with its own Rules of Procedure enacted under Article 94 of the Constitution and that failure to follow those Rules amounts to a violation of the said constitutional provision as per the case of Prof Oloka Onyango & Others vs Attorney General[1110].

Certificate of Compliance

Article 263 (2) (a) regards the certificate of compliance issuing from the 25Speaker to the President if an Assent is to be obtained. It states:

'(2) A Bill for the amendment of this Constitution which has been passed in accordance with this Chapter shall be assented to by the President only if –

(a)it is accompanied by a certificate of the Speaker that the provisions of this Chapter have been

[1110][2014] UGCC 14

complied with in relation to it;

A certificate of compliance is meant to certify the contents of the Bill to be assented to. Since the document tendered by the Speaker as the certificate did not tell the truth when certifying the legislation to be assented to, I hold there was no certificate.

The Bill that the Honourable Speaker proceeded to proffer to the President for assent was different from the one Honourable Raphael Magyezi had initially proposed. However, it was similar to the one that the House had gone on to pass on 20th December 2017. Given the circumstances, the Bill the President assented to bore little resemblance to the one the certificate of compliance, issued by the Honourable Speaker, certified as having been passed in Parliament.

The certificate of compliance indicated that only four Articles in the Constitution had been affected by the amendment. The Constitution (Amendment) Act No. 1 of 2018 assented to by the President showed ten Articles were affected by the amendment. It was not contested that the President signed what was actually passed by the House. What was in contest is the veracity of the certificate of compliance.

The assent to the bill was made in vain. This is a fundamental procedural irregularity which cannot be cured by severance as the Justices of the Constitutional Court attempted to do. To do so would tantamount to the judiciary entering the legislative arena which should not be countenanced. This irregularity has company. It should be seen in the light of other irregularities that attended the impugned enactment which are highlighted elsewhere in this judgment.

Contrary to Article 93 of the Constitution, Parliament proceeded to legislate on the impugned enactment including provisions that required a certificate of no financial implication. No certificate accompanying the Bill to be assented to as is mandatory under Article 263(2)(a) of the Constitution.

VIOLENCE IN THE PARLIAMENTARY CHAMBERS

Justice Mugamba found that the members of the UPDF were unlawfully involved since there was no state of emergency declared to warrant their involvement. Members of the national army are only required to intervene in curbing civilian unrest in cases of emergency 20under the Constitution. Consequently, their unwarranted involvement in dragging MPs from Parliamentary chambers and assaulting them was unconstitutional. The operation was in breach of Article 97 of the Constitution regarding the immunities and privileges of Members of Parliament.

The Parliamentary invasion by the army takes us back to our militarized and dictatorial past. The very past the Constitution not to repeat as stated in the Preamble. In 1967, Apollo Milton Obote, the prime minister, has spent several months fending off an attempt by a coalition consisting of some of his Cabinet ministers, President Edward Luwangula Muteesa II (who is the Kabaka of Buganda), MP Daudi Ocheng, and Brig Shaban Opolot, the army commander, that wants to remove him from power. The story is well known and well documented. Suffice to say that the plotters have tried both constitutional and military options to overthrow Obote. Thwarted attempts to arrest him on at least two occasions have tipped the contest toward inevitable confrontation.

The military coup is set for Tuesday, February 22, 1966. Obote gets wind of it. On the fateful morning, the police arrest five of his ministers during a Cabinet meeting. The men – Grace Ibingira, Emmanuel Lumu, Balaki Kirya, George Magezi and Matiya Ngobi - are part of the plotters of the coup. Two days later, Obote suspends the 1962 Constitution. Claiming to be acting in the interest of "national stability and public security and tranquility," he assumes all powers of the Government of Uganda and embarks on rule by decree.

To legalise his coup d'état, Obote needed a new Constitution. He ordered Godfrey Lukongwa Binaisa, the Attorney General, to do the needful. Binaisa, together with Nkambo Mugerwa, the Solicitor General, and Kofi Crabbe, a Ghanaian draftsman, sets to work. They write it in one night. The draft of the new Constitution is to be tabled before Parliament the next day, April 15, 1966. However, the MPs are not given copies of the draft document. To avoid any hiccups, a military invasion of Parliament is ordered.

The 1966 invasion set the stage for military control of the Legislature and, five years later, a military coup that would destroy everything. The 2017 invasion has snuffed out the faint flicker of hope that Uganda might find its way out of the dark hole into which it was thrown by the events of 1966. Fifty years of history and experience have not changed the ruler's attitude.

Justice Mugamba took the view that the violence orchestrated had a chilling effect of this violence on the rest of the August House. Certainly, no meaningful legislative role could be played by parliament in this atmosphere of intimidation, harassment and outright violence visited on some individual legislators.

S U B S T A N T I A L I T Y T E S T

Just like Justice Tibatemwa, Justice Mugamba found that the substantiality test is not relevant in adjudicating questions regarding validity of a constitutional amendment and there is not a single Common Law or civil jurisdiction that applies it as a test for validity of legislation.

The substantiality test has been deployed by the Supreme Court in declining to annul election petitions. However, this has been in instances of violating the Presidential Elections Act and not the Constitution. The usage of the substantiality test in election petitions stems from the wording of Section 59 of the Presidential Elections Petition which provides for annulment of an elections for non-compliance with the provisions of this Act if the court is satisfied that the election was not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in those provisions and that the non-compliance affected the result of the election in a substantial manner.

However, the wording of Article 137 of the 1995 Constitution of Uganda does not in any way provide for the substantiality test in determining whether an Act of Parliament contravenes a provision of the Constitution. The use of substantiality test by the Constitutional court to find that the violence meted on the Parliamentarians and citizens was not substantial enough to vitiate the amendment of the constitution was therefore baseless and unfounded in law.

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JUSTICE DR. ESTHER KISAKYE EXEGESIS OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JUSTICE DR. ESTHER KISAKYE

BACKGROUND

On 16th January, 2021, the Electoral Commission declared the results of the election returning Yoweri Museveni Tibuhaburwa Kaguta of the National Resistance Movement party, hereinafter the 1st respondent as the validly elected President of the Republic of Uganda having polled 5,852,037 votes representing 58.64% of the total votes cast. Aggrieved with the outcome of the Election, the applicant contested the results of the election in this court, this being the court of first instance in challenging presidential elections. The grounds advanced included; that President Museveni was not validly elected as the elections were not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in the provisions of the Constitution, the Presidential Elections Act, the Electoral Commission Act and other relevant laws, and that the non-compliance affected the results of the election in a substantial manner.

On 9th February, 2021, the court dismissed an application by the applicant/petitioner to amend the petition. The reasons were given on the 18th March after the petitioner Kyagulanyi sought to withdraw the petition accusing the court of being biased, partisan and remote-controlled by Mr. Museveni.

JUSTICE KISAAKYE'S RULING

Justice Kisaakye agreed with the majority ruling of the judges that Mr. Kyagulanyi couldn't amend his presidential petition, reasoning that there is no law that supports such and that he couldn't pay costs.

Justice Kisaakye specifically disparaged as "unconstitutional" provisions of the Presidential Elections Act that somehow make it apparent that a petitioner pays costs the moment he or she withdraws a presidential petitioner before it's logically determined.

Justice Kisaakye's departure from others was mainly on the issue of additional affidavits that Mr. Kyagulanyi's legal team couldn't file in court as they failed to meet the deadline set by the court in their presence. In the detailed majority ruling, which was read by Justice Mugamba, the eight judges insisted that allowing Mr. Kyagulanyi to file more 200 affidavits out of time would have meant that the respondents would have needed more days to respond and this would have eaten up much of the constitutionally laid out 45 days in which they are supposed to deliver a judgment.

Justice Kisaakye believed Mr. Kyagulanyi's narrative that he couldn't collect evidence in time because he was under incarceration from election day until the High Court intervened and declared his detention illegal on the prompting of Mr. Kyagulanyi's lawyers.

The judge squarely put the blame on President Museveni. "The first respondent [Museveni] is the commander-in-chief [of the armed force] and also the president-elect. He appoints the Chief of Defence Forces and you can't say he wasn't in the know of the petitioner's incarceration. It's possible that he is the one who sanctioned it," Justice Kisaakye ruled.

"The framers of the Constitution didn't envisage that an incumbent [Museveni] would restrict movements of his opponents," she stated. Justice Kisaakye's latest disagreement with the majority at the Supreme Court has further enhanced her label of being "a dissenting judge" because she has dissented in most critical judgments.

Reading of the "Kisakye 'Judgement

The Supreme Court was thrown into pandemonium on 18th March, 2021 after Justice Esther Kisakye's file was confiscated before she read her ruling on Robert Kyagulanyi Ssentamu's withdrawn petition challenging Mr. Yoweri Museveni's election victory. Justice Kisaakye, the longest-serving member of the Bench, was left all alone in a tent that was enveloped in darkness, with power and consequently the public address system, switched off. In the tent, the judge was lamenting before the cameras. She alleged that her file containing her ruling had been confiscated on the orders of Justice Owiny-Dollo.

"My reasoning in the ruling we have made in the presidential petition, which was withdrawn recently, I instructed my staff to put my ruling here for delivery." [1111]The Chief Justice and other members of the Coram have opted not to be part of this afternoon's proceedings and I respect their decision." She added: "However, what's of surprise to me is that my file has been confiscated on the orders of the Chief Justice. I'm going to proceed in the court building to recover my file and I will come back and read my ruling today as scheduled." The court had spent the entire morning giving detailed reasoning why they had rejected two of Mr. Kyagulanyi's applications, in which he sought to amend his petition, and also one in which he wanted his more than 200 additional affidavits allowed out of time.

[1111] Daily Monitor

Before midday on Thursday, the eight justices were through with reading their joint ruling, and the stage was set for Justice Kisaakye to read her "dissenting" ruling, but Chief Justice Owiny-Dollo said they had to take a break and he promised they would be back to complete the job by 1:30pm. Instead, Judiciary sources, who asked not to be named, said when the judges retreated to their chambers, it became apparent that they didn't want to go and be part of Justice Kisaakye's session in the afternoon. The culture at the Supreme Court and the Court of Appeal, which doubles as the Supreme Court, is that since they work in coram, judges share their rulings or judgements before the day of reading them for everyone to know how the other had decided but judges at the Supreme Court accused Justice Kisaakye of keeping them in the dark about her decisions and reasoning. They said she preferred to ambush them in court as she reads her rulings.

While the Chief Justice was okay with returning to court for Justice Kisaakye to do her bit, sources say other justices made it clear they weren't returning and asked him to adjourn the matter until Justice Kisaakye disclosed her ruling to them. Justice Owiny-Dollo was left with no choice, according to our sources, and he accordingly summoned the Attorney General, Mr. William Byaruhanga; Mr. Museveni's legal team led by Mr. Ebert Byenkya and Mr. Kiryowa Kiwanuka; and the Electoral Commission's legal team led by Mr. Joseph Matsiko and Mr. Elison Karuhanga, and informed them about their decision not to return to court as they had promised until Justice Kisaakye first released her ruling to them.

When the meeting was done, the three sets of lawyers left for their cars as soon as it became apparent that Justice Kisaakye had insisted on reading her ruling whether the other judges attended or not. For a moment, there was a sense of confusion as journalists couldn't understand why Justice Kisaakye was seated alone in a tent, with power switched off yet the lawyers were leaving one after another. Only Mr. Kyagulanyi's lawyers stayed put.

When Justice Kisaakye waited for minutes for her file and it became apparent that it wasn't coming, she walked back to the court building and for some minutes, security officers at the court promises were telling a journalist to go away. The expectation was that Justice Kisaakye wasn't going to have her way, but a few minutes later, she returned with what she termed as "a carbon copy" of her ruling. She first sought to clarify the standoff at the highest court in the country.

"While it is good practice for members of the court to circulate their draft ruling to colleagues, there is no law in Uganda that I'm aware of that requires me to do so," Justice Kisaakye said before she read out the details of her ruling, which took hours. "As you heard from the rulings, the 45 days required to finalise this matter constrained me to do so."

Before judges who are on a panel come to court, the practice in Uganda's Supreme Court is that they meet, say, in the Chief Justice's chambers, or the boardroom, and they agree on how to proceed. "The meeting," a retired Supreme Court judge, who asked not to be named, explained, "helps the Chief Justice to organise well by knowing the stand of each member and how they are doing."

This meeting, according to some justices interviewed for this story, becomes critical on the day the judges are set to deliver either a judgment or ruling as it helps them to know clearly who is in the majority and those in the minority. Judges accused judges Kisaakye of consistently missing such meetings and they insisted that the Chief Justice should call her to order- even if it came with bad press.

"A judge having a dissenting judgment or ruling isn't new," one of the Justices on the panel, who preferred anonymity, said. "In fact, everybody knew that Justice Kisaakye had dissented in one of the issues in the Kyagulanyi case … but we find it disrespectful that she doesn't attend meetings and she also doesn't circulate her draft judgments or rulings. That's not how things work."

OFFICE POLITICS?

Justice Kisaakye was together with Justice Owiny-Dollo and others, interviewed for the Chief Justice job last year. The job finally went to Justice Owiny-Dollo. When Chief Justice Bart Katureebe retired in June last year, Justice Kisaakye was the most senior judge at the Supreme Court and some thought her seniority would propel her to the highest office in the Judiciary. There was a precedent: Justice Katureebe was the most senior judge at the Supreme Court when Chief Justice Benjamin Odoki retired in 2013 and he replaced him later in 2015.

Judiciary staff say before Justice Kisaakye competed for the Chief Justice job, she had years earlier tried without success to become the Deputy Chief Justice.

When the retired Justice Katureebe was Chief Justice, there were again some issues involving Justice Kisaakye but different Judiciary sources say Justice Katureebe acted differently to the way Justice Owiny-Dollo has.

A year ago, Justice Kisaakye sued former Supreme Court Judge George Kanyeihamba and a one Michael Kalule Buwembo for alleged defamation, invasion of privacy, unlawful conduct over allegations against her that were contained in a letter Prof Kanyeihamba wrote to former Chief Justice Katureebe and the letter was published in a book by Mr. Buwembo.

THE KYAGULANYI ALIAS BOBI WINE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION PETITION CASE.

Justice Esther Kisakye of the Supreme Court disagreed[1112] with eight Justices in their decision on two applications arising from the presidential election petition filed by former presidential candidate Robert Kyagulanyi Ssentamu.

Kyagulanyi petitioned the Supreme Court to challenge President Museveni's victory in the presidential elections. At the start of the petition hearing, Kyagulanyi first filed an application seeking to be given more time to amend his petition and introduce new grounds. He filed another seeking to file additional affidavits and another seeking to withdraw the whole petition.

Kyagulanyi argued that there were unusual circumstances including the fact that his lawyers were operating mobile law firms due to insecurity and fears that state operatives may steal the evidence. He also argued that state operatives seized their political party offices which made it difficult for him to file relevant affidavits and evidence in support of his petition on time.

On Thursday, the two applications were dismissed by the eight Justices led by Chief Justice Alfonse Owiny-Dollo on grounds that a presidential election petition cannot be amended due to its strict timelines within which it should be determined.

However, in her dissenting judgement read to Kyagulanyi's lawyers, Justice Kisakye said that the reasons advanced by Kyagulanyi were more than unusual circumstances and therefore his applications should have all been allowed. She noted that it was not right for the Attorney General to argue the way he did on the strict timelines because the issue of amending petitions has happened before in the presidential election petition of Amama Mbabazi and therefore it cannot be unlawful. She added that although the extension to file additional evidence was going to have an impact on the roadmap of court, the respondents who were the majority opted to ignore the fact that those provisions were enacted and the constitution amended.

But to Kisakye, whereas the law says that the matter should be determined within 45 days from the date of filing, this requirement didn't impose on the Supreme Court the duty to ignore the unconstitutional and unlawful acts as declared by the High Court to the detriment of Kyagulanyi.

"The restrictions on the movements of the applicant as pleaded in his affidavit and as confirmed by High Court more than constituted the special circumstances which were envisaged under rule 17 of the Presidential Election Rules," she said. Kisakye added the rest of the Justices should have allowed the applicant to file additional evidence which was ready on the morning of February 15, 2021, when the deadline was on February 14th 2021.

Court heard that the fact that the evidence was ready by February 14 and the country is under curfew, coupled with the siege of NUP offices, the shutdown of the internet for five days and Kyagulanyi's house arrest, it was impossible that the time was sufficient for him to do all that was required.

[1112]Kampala, Uganda | THE INDEPENDENT

She added that there is a principle that the mistake made by the lawyers should not be blamed on his client like the majority of the Justices did yet Kyagulanyi had already lost ten of the fifteen days.

"The applicant's counsel was not able to deliver all the evidence in the time prescribed for a variety of reasons some of which were submitted on by counsel Sseggona. By the majority attributing the mistakes of counsel to the client, the court was reversing its decisions without giving reasons," said Kisakye.

On the issue of Kyagulanyi's witnesses being arrested by the state, Justice Kisakye dismissed the arguments by the respondents saying that he should have brought evidence of the list on who was arrested and taken where and by who.

She noted that the argument lacked merit because Kyagulanyi knew who exactly was his witnesses and where they were and that the respondents were talking about matters that they didn't know about.

"The first respondent is the incumbent president, He has been in power for 35 years with an established party structure which is in place and which has not suffered any disruptions or closures as were suffered by the applicant's party at the expense of the state organs," said Kisakye.

According to her, the Electoral Commission and Attorney General also have nationwide offices throughout the country and it didn't make any sense when they said that Kyagulanyi's witnesses should have been in Kampala for them to file their responses to additional evidence he wanted to file.

Since the application for the withdrawal was consented to, Kisakye said she was not going to say much about it. She noted that what Kyagulanyi went through was unconstitutional and in the interest of justice and fairness, Museveni, Electoral Commission and Attorney General shouldn't have asked for costs.

K I S A A K Y E ' S O T H E R R U L I N G S

Last year, sitting as a single judge of the Supreme Court, she triggered a debate in Uganda's criminal justice system, when she ruled that it's unconstitutional to allow a convicted person out on bail pending appeal. "The reasoning that a convicted person should be allowed to first exhaust all his rights of appeal before he can start serving his sentence in our legal system is flawed," she argued.

In 2013, Justice Kisaakye was on the Coram of seven justices who heard an application filed by four National Resistance Movement (NRM) party MPs who had been provisionally locked out by a ruling delivered by the Constitutional Court.

The MPs were Theodore Ssekikubo (Lwemiyaga), Wilfred Niwagaba (Ndorwa East), Muhammad Nsereko (Kampala Central) and Barnabas Tinkasiimire (Buyaga West).

Justices Christine Kitumba and Galdino Okello ruled that the MPs should go back to Parliament. Justice Kisaakye had different ideas. “In my view, Article 132 of the Constitution only vests this court appellate jurisdiction to hear from decisions of the Constitutional Court.

It does not vest in this court supervisory powers to police the Constitutional Court in every incidental or interlocutory decision the Constitutional Court makes in the course of hearing a constitutional petition,” Justice Kisaakye said. She additionally disagreed with fellow judges, arguing that the MPs had no right of appeal to the Supreme Court, on interim decisions made so far by the Constitutional Court.

“I entirely agree with the first part of the majority’s ruling that there is no right of appeal granted under Article132 (3) of the Constitution from interlocutory decisions made by the Constitutional Court. With all due respect … I respectfully disagree with the majority that the two rulings made by the Constitutional Court on the admissibility of the affidavits evidence of President Museveni and the Coram of the Court of Appeal sitting as Constitutional Court are appealable as of right because there weren’t final decisions,” Justice Kisaakye said.

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JUSTICE TSEKOOKO, JSC. VERBATIM

The conclusions I reached in this petition were based on the evidence available and on the belief that the framers of the current constitution must have envisioned that the country will be governed under a constitutional democracy where there is free and fair democratic elections and in the belief that each branch of the state would do its duty properly and with due diligence.

Last year Col. (RTD) Dr. Kizza Besigye, the Petitioner, contested in the presidential election with four other candidates. The others were DR. ABED BWANIKA, MAMA OBOTE MIRIA KALULE, SSEBAANA JOHN KIZITO AND YOWERI KAGUTA MUSEVENI. The last named who was the incumbent President of Uganda is the second respondent in this petition. The election was conducted under a multiparty system of politics. Apart from Dr. A.Bwanika, the other candidates were sponsored by their respective political parties, namely: The Uganda People's Congress (UPC) sponsored Mama Obote Miria Kalule, the Democratic Party (DP) sponsored Ssebana John Kizito and National Resistance Movement (NRM) sponsored Yoweri Kaguta Museveni. The petitioner was sponsored by his party, the Forum for Democratic Change (FDC). The petitioner was in fact nominated in absentia while he was in custody at Luzira on a charge of treason. The contest was for the office of the President of this country. The Electoral Commission, the first respondent, which organised the election, declared on 25th February 2006, the second respondent the winner. He polled 4,078,911 votes, representing 59.28% of the valid votes cast. The petitioner, who polled 2,570,603 votes, representing 37.36% of the votes cast, considered himself aggrieved by the result of the presidential election. On 7th March, 2006, he petitioned this Court and set out complaints upon which he based his dissatisfaction. He asked the Court:

To declare that Yoweri Kaguta Museveni was not validly elected as President.

In the petition, the petitioner raised complaints against each of the two respondents and their agents and/or servants, for acts and or omissions which he contends contravened and or were contrary to the provisions of the Constitution, of the Electoral Commission Act, 1997, (ECA) and of the Presidential Elections Act, 2005 [PEA].

He also contended, in paragraph six of the petition, that S.59 (6) (a) of the PEA is contrary to the provisions of clause (1) of Article 104 of the Constitution and applied for the issue to be referred to the Constitutional Court for interpretation under paragraph (b) of clause (5) of Article 137 of the Constitution.

In paragraphs 7, 8 9 and 10, the petitioner stated his grievances against the 1st respondent in the following words:

"7 In the FURTHER ALTERNATIVES but without prejudice with the foregoing paragraph the Election of the 2nd Respondent was invalid on the ground that the election was not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in the Provisions of the Presidential Elections Act and thatsuch non- compliance affects (sic) the result in a substantial manner.

8

Your petitioner avers that the entire Electoral process on the 23rd day of February, 2006 Presidential Elections, beginning with the campaign period up to the polling day was characterised with intimidation, lace (sic) of freedom and transparency, unfairness and violence and commission of numerous electoral offences and illegal practices contrary to the provisions of the Presidential Elections Act, Electoral Commission Act and the Constitution.

(a)

Contrary to S.19 (3) and S.50 of the Electoral Commission Act, the 1stRespondent disenfranchised voters by deleting their names from the voters roll/register.

(b) Contrary to S.32 of the Presidential Elections Act, the 1st Respondent allowed multiple voting and vote stuffing in many electoral districts in Uganda.

(c) Contrary to S.57 of the President Elections Act the 1st Respondent failed to cancel results of polling stations where gross malpractices and irregularities took place in particular the districts of Kiruhura, Manafa and Pallisa.

(d) Failing to declare the results of the Election in accordance with S.56 and S.57 (4) of the Presidential Elections Act and Electoral Commission Act.

(e) Contrary to S.12 (e) and (f) of the Electoral Commission Act, failing to take measures to ensure that the entire electoral process is conducted under conditions of freedom and fairness.

(f) Contrary to section 9 of the Presidential Elections Act the 2nd Respondent was neither sponsored as a candidate by a registered political organisation or party or as an independent candidate.

(g) Misleading voters by printing and using ballot papers which indicated that the 2nd Respondent's party was the NRM, which is not a registered party participating in the elections.

(h) Misleading the voters by allowing the use of a symbol of the "Bus" which was used by the Movement's Political System during the referenda.

9 Your petitioner avers that the 2nd Respondent benefited from the above non-compliance with the provisions of the Presidential Elections Act and Electoral Commission Act.

10 IN THE ALTERNATIVE and without prejudice failing to declare the result of the Election in accordance with Article 103 (4)"

In its answer to the petition, the first respondent asserted that the petitioner has no real grievance within the meaning of Article 104 (1) of the Constitution and denied most of the allegations contained in the petition and asserted that it validly declared the second respondent elected as president. It averred that if there was any non-compliance such non-compliance did not affect the result of the election in a substantial manner and that the election was held under conditions of freedom and fairness. To the accompanying affidavit of the Chairman of the Commission, Engineer Dr. Badru M.Kiggundu were annexed copies of observers reports of the European Union (R2) and of the Commonwealth (R3) to support the commission's stand that the elections were properly conducted.

The Petitioner's case against the 2nd Respondent is that he personally, or by his agents with his knowledge and consent or approval, committed illegal practices and offences in contravention of S.24(5) (b) to 24(5) (9) of the PEA and Section 23 (3) (b) of the ECA. These include publication of false, insulting, derogatory, derisive statements about the Petitioner alone, his party or the petitioner and the other Presidential Candidates, offering money and gifts to voters;
In respect of the 2nd respondent, the petitioner alleged in paragraphs 11 and 12 as follows:

"11. Your Petitioner avers that the 2nd Respondent personally committed the following illegal practices and or offences, while campaigning:
(a)
Used words or made statements that were malicious contrary to S.24 (5) (b) of the Presidential Elections Act.
(b) Made statements containing sectarian words or innuendos against your petitioner and or his party and other candidates contrary to S.24 (5) (c) of the Presidential Elections Act.
(c) Made abusive insulting and or derogatory statements against the petitioner, F.D.C and other candidates contrary to S.24 (5) (d) of the Presidential Elections Act.
(d) Made exaggerations of the Petitioner's period of service in the government and the reason why he was removed from the several portfolios your petitioner held in government and he also variously ridiculed the petitioner contrary to S.24 (5) (e) of the Presidential Elections Act.
(e) Used derisive or mudslinging words against the petitioner.
(f) Used defamatory and or insulting words contrary to section 23(3) (b) of the Presidential Elections Act.
(g) The 2nd Respondent Statements which were false either knowingly at a rally or recklessly namely:

(i) That the F.D.C frustrated efforts to build another dam.
(ii) That I was working in alliance with Kony, PRA and other terrorists.
(iii) That I was an opportunist and a deserter.

12. The Petitioner further contends that the 2nd Respondent committed acts of bribery of the electorate by his agents with either his consent and or approval;

(a)
Bribery of voters just before and during the elections contrary to S.64 of the Presidential Elections Act.
(b) Attempting and interfering with the free exercise of the franchise of voters contrary to S.26(c) of the Presidential Elections Act.
(c) By agent procuring the votes of individuals by giving out tarplins, saucepans, water containers' salt, sugar and other beverages and making promises of giving such beverages.
Annexed to the petition was the mandatory affidavit required by Rule 4 (7) of the Presidential Elections (Election Petitions) Rules, 2001 sworn by the Petitioner. Subsequently the petitioner lodged two supplementary affidavits together with nearly 200 other affidavits from his witnesses in support of his petition.

In his answer to the petition, the 2nd respondent denied that the petitioner had any real or genuine grievous within the meaning of Article 104(1) of the Constitution or S 59 (1) of the PEA. He asserted that on 25th February, 2005, he was validly elected as President and no recount was called for and that he was elected in accordance with the principles laid down in the PEA and denied most of the allegations made against him, contending that the entire presidential electoral process was conducted under conditions of freedom and fairness. He admitted making certain statements during his campaign and reproduced the alleged statements in his affidavit accompanying his answer to the petition which he deponed he actually made.

In answer to paragraph six of the petition, both respondents contended that there was no question to be referred to the Constitutional Court and asserted that this Court has exclusive jurisdiction to inquire into and determine all questions arising in a presidential election petition.

There are two matters I ought to mention at this stage. The first relates to election monitors or observers. Before the elections, the first respondent accredited a number of local and foreign institutions or groups of individuals as election monitors or observers. The prominent foreign groups are the Commonwealth election observers group and the European Union team. They monitored the electioneering process before the election day. They observed the voting and in some cases the announcement of the election results. They issued preliminary reports R3 and R2 respectively on 24/2/2006. Among the local monitors/observers are (1) Democracy Observes Group (Demogroup), Human Rights-network (Hurinet), Foundation for Human Rights Initiatives (FHRI). These in various ways monitored the preparations for elections, the electioneering, the voting and the announcement of results. Each of these groups produced its own report on the election process and the declaration of results. I shall be referring to these reports in the course of these reasons. Naturally each candidate or his or her party monitored the elections in their own way.

The second matter to be noted is that the Commission formed a National Electoral Liaison Consultative Forum (NELCF) which was chaired by one of the Commissioners, Mr. Steven D. Ongaria. Apart from him, some officials of the commission were included. These were the Head of the Commission's Legal Department, its Public Relations officer, a Senior Elections Officer and an Electoral Liaison officer. Each of the political parties was, or was expected, to be represented by two persons on the NELCF. Replicas of NELCF were supposed to be formed at District level. The purpose of NELCF was, according to Commissioner Ongaria, to exchange ideas and resolve challenges related to the Presidential election. NELCF held its first meeting on 20/12/2005. That was some time after electioneering had started.
The Petitioner's counsel were led by Mr. Dan Ogalo Wandera and his deputy was Mr. John Matovu. Other members of the team included M. Mbabazi and Y. Nsibambi.

The first respondent was represented by a team led by Mr. Lucian Tibaruha, the Solicitor General. The other members included Mr. Joseph Matsiko, Ag. Director of Civil Litigation and Mr. Peter Kabatsi. Dr. Joseph Byamugisha led a ten team of Counsel to represent the second respondent.

The following issues were framed for decision by this Court.
1. Whether there was non-compliance with the provisions of the Constitution, Presidential Elections Act and Electoral Commission Act in the Conduct of the 2006 Presidential Elections.
2. Whether the said Election was not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in the Constitution, Presidential Elections Act and the Electoral Commission Act.
3. Whether if either issue 1 or 2 or both are answered in the affirmative, such non-compliance with the said laws and principles affected the results of the election in a substantial manner.
4. Whether any illegal practices or electoral offences alleged in the petition were committed by the 2nd Respondent personally or by his agents with his knowledge and consent or approval.
5. Whether the petitioner is entitled to the reliefs sought.

Before I discuss these issues, I should say something about the question of whether an annulment of a presidential election can only be made under the provisions of subsection (6) of S.59 of the PEA. This arises from the interpretation to be placed on Subsection (2) of Section 1 of the PEA. It states that "The Commission Act shall be construed as one with this Act." It seems clear to me that the ECA has to be considered along with matters stated in subsection 6 of S.59 of the PEA in deciding on annulment.

PRELIMINARY MATTERS

1. REFERENCE TO THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

In paragraph 6 of his petition, the petitioner contended that the provisions of Section 59(6) (a) of the Presidential Elections Act, 2005 are contrary to or inconsistent with the provisions of Clause (1) of Article 104 of the Constitution.

At the beginning of the hearing of the petition, Mr. John Matovu, one of the petitioner's counsel, moved court to refer the matter to the Constitutional Court for interpretation under Article 137 (5) (b) of the Constitution. Mr. Kabatsi, second counsel for the first respondent and Dr. Byamugisha, lead counsel for the second respondent, opposed the application. We rejected the application and promised to incorporate our reasons in our judgment. In our decision which we delivered on 6th April, 2006, we set out reasons why we rejected the application. For emphasis, I wish to add that Article 137 sets our two main scenarios under which the Constitutional Court may be moved.
The first scenario is provided by Clause (3) of the Article and the second scenario is provided for under Clause (5) of the same Article.

The two clauses read as follows.
137 (3) Any person who alleges that -
(a) an Act of Parliament or any other law or anything in or done under the authority of any law; or
(b) any act or omission by any person or authority, is inconsistent with or in contravention of any provisions of this Constitution, may petition the Constitutional Court for a declaration to that effect, and for redress where appropriate.
137 (5) Where any question as to the interpretation of this Constitution arises in any proceedings in a court of law other than a Field Court Martial, the Court-
(a) may if it is of the opinion that the question involves a substantial question of law; and
(b) shall if any party to the proceedings requests it to do so, refer the question to the Constitutional Court for decision in accordance with clause (1) of this Article.
Under Clause (3) any aggrieved party can petition the Constitutional Court on matters stipulated by the clause, whereas under clause (5) there is a condition precedent which is the existence of court proceedings.

Clearly under clause (3) the right of the petitioner (or any other person) to challenge S.59 (6) (a) of the PEA by petitioning the Constitutional Court was in existence before filing this Presidential Election Petition. He was, or should have been, aware of the alleged inconsistency before the Presidential Election was held on 23/2/2006 and before this petition was filed. The question as to the interpretation never arose in the proceedings of this petition.

In my considered opinion, Clause (5) can be invoked only in instances where, during the progress of a case in any civilian court, either the Court on its own, or a party, discovers any question requiring an interpretation of the Constitution. I think that the scope of the right is narrower under clause (5) than under clause (3). This is because under Clause (5) a specific question which arises in a proceeding must be identified and framed before it is referred to the Constitutional Court. It goes there as a reference. In this case, clause (3) was not applicable because the alleged right to petition existed long before the petition was filed and arose, not during the hearing of, but independently of, the petition. In my opinion to adopt the course for which the petitioner asked can easily lead to abuse of court process and ultimately even to undue delays in disposal of cases filed in court.

I do not think that the framers of our Constitution intended that a petitioner had two alternative ways by which to institute a petition based on allegations of inconsistency or contravention as suggested in this petition.

This objection is in substance similar to objections raised by respondents in the Zambian's Presidential Election Petition SC.2/EP/01/02/03 of 2002 (Anderson Kambela Masoka, Lt.Gen.S.Tembo and G.W.Myanda Vs. Levy Patrick Mwanawasa, theElectoral Commission and Attorney-General) which was cited to us by Dr. Byamugisha. The respondents challenged the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Zambia to hear and determine the three consolidated Presidential Election Petitions partly on the grounds that because the petition had not been heard and determined within the limitation period of 180 days stipulated by law, the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction to hear it after the lapse of 180 days since it was filed.

Under Article 41(2) of the Zambian Constitution,

> "(2) Any question that may arise as to whether:
>
> (a)……
>
> (b) any person has been validly elected as president under Article 34……..
>
> shall be referred and determined by the full bench of the Supreme Court."

The Supreme Court held that this provision clothed it with mandate to determine whether any person had been validly elected as President even after the expiry of the limitation period. The point was really that it was only the Supreme Court of Zambia which must dispose of the Presidential Election Petition. This is similar to the position in Uganda.

2. OBJECTIONS TO ADMISSIBILITY OF CERTAIN AFFIDAVITS

The petitioner tendered evidence by way of affidavits from over nearly 200 deponents, himself inclusive, in support of his allegations. Likewise, the two respondents tendered evidence by way of affidavits including affidavits from officials of the first respondent and the affidavits of the second respondent personally. They total to nearly 300 affidavits.

Counsel for the two respondents objected to the admissibility of very many of the affidavits tendered by, or on behalf of the petitioner, after the petitioner's counsel had presented the case of the petitioner.

Mr. Didus Nkurunziza, one of counsel assisting Dr. Byamugisha, made submissions on behalf of counsel for the two respondents, in support of the objections. For purposes of these objections, Mr. Nkurunziza classified the objectionable affidavits into four categories and advanced several arguments in support of the objections to each category of affidavits. Normally the objections should have been raised before the general submissions of counsel for the petitioner were made. This was not possible because of the time constraints imposed by Clauses (2) and (3) of Article 104 of the Constitution and by S.59 (2) and (3) of the PEA. So we allowed counsel for the respondents to belatedly raise the objections to the various affidavits. Of course this method has inherent risks.

The four categories are:

- Affidavits which contravene the law;
- Affidavits which do not disclose a cause of action or evidence of a complaint.

The belated raising of objections to affidavits in the first three categories though made for convenience owing to the short time frame within which the petition had to be decided, present difficulties of sorts. These affidavits are part of the evidence to which the respondents have replied by corresponding affidavits. Those replies in effect clarified some points which were bases of objections. As it will appear later in these reasons, an example is the affidavit of Salaamu Musumba to which the second respondent replied.

2.1 AFFIDAVITS CONTRAVENING THE LAW

Mr. Nkurunziza submitted that by virtue of S.67 (1) of the Advocates Act, it is mandatory that any instrument that has been drawn or prepared relating to any legal proceedings must bear the name and address of the person who draws it. He singled out eleven affidavits. Seven of them purport to have been prepared by: M/s Mwene-Kahima & Mwebesa, Advocates, of Mbarara and four other affidavits which do not bear any endorsement on them. Learned counsel urged us to ignore all the eleven affidavits on the basis that they are forgeries because

Mr. Mwene-Kahima, the Managing Partner of the firm, swore an affidavit claiming that his firm did not draw nor prepare those eleven affidavits nor any other affidavit. On behalf of the petitioner, Mr.Dan Ogalo Wandera prefaced his reply to this point of the first category of affidavits that Mr. Nkurunziza's submission raises a legal issue as well as serious ethical issues. On the legal issue, learned counsel concurred that it is mandatory that instruments must be endorsed as stated by Mr. Nkurunziza but submitted that all the contested affidavits have been endorsed by the firm of Mwene-Kahima and Mwebesa, Advocates. Therefore the legal requirements were met. So the court should rely on those affidavits.

On the ethical issue, Mr. Ogalo Wandera contended that the affidavits were drawn in the Kabale Branch of Mwene-Kahima & Mwebesa, Advocates, where a Mr. Murumba works and from where that advocate prepared the affidavits. Mr. Ogalo intimated that Mr. Murumba was in Court and was prepared to give evidence in court to support this fact.

Subsection (1) of S.67 of the Advocates Act reads this way:

"Every person who draws or prepares any instrument to which S.66 applies shall endorse or cause to be endorsed on it his or her name and address; and any such person omitting to do or falsely endorsing or causing to be endorsed any of such requirements commits an offence".

Does the provision say, such instrument must not be relied upon in court? The answer is no.

I have perused the contested affidavits sworn by Turyasingura Joseph, Kainamira Bernard, Byaruhanga Johnson, Turyamureba Mande, Katwakura Edward, Twinomukago Vanice and of Ensinikweri Godfrey, and noted that although the address of the firm (Mwene-Kahima, Mwebesa and Co. Advocates) is given as P.O Box 343, Mbarara, these affidavits show that they were in fact sworn before a Magistrate in Kabale, apparently where the seven deponents originate. This appears to support Mr. Ogalo Wandera's submission that the affidavits were prepared in Kabale. I accept Mr. Ogalo Wandera's statement that these affidavits were drawn in Kabale and were endorsed by the firm. The fact that a Mr. Murumba, the lawyer who prepared them, was available in court to swear to their authenticity supports their genuiness. I have also perused the other four affidavits deponed by Aryeija Simon, Byaruhanga Charles, Mayombo Dick and Asiimwe Ivan Kasigaire which again bear the seal of Kabale Magistrates Court as the Commissioner administering the Oath. These four do not bear the endorsement of the firm or person drawing them.

In my view the omission to endorse these four affidavits with the name of the person or firm which prepared them is not fatal. They are not rendered inadmissible merely because of absence of endorsement. The above provision does not prohibit use of such affidavits in court. I do not think that it is proper to reject these four affidavits merely because of non-endorsement. Forgery generally means making a false document in order that it may be used as genuine. I am not persuaded by Mwene-Kahima's affidavit that these affidavits are forgeries. He is vague about when his two assistants left his firm. In any case the breach of the law complained of is just a technicality. It is not fatal. Does the fact that these affidavits were drawn by a firm of lawyers not now representing the petitioner render them inadmissible? No objection was raised based on that ground. Whatever the case that is immaterial. They have been placed on record by the petitioner.
I would not reject these eleven affidavits. In my opinion, each affidavit should be evaluated along with the other affidavits presented by both sides so as to determine its evidential value.

2.2 AFFIDAVITS THAT DO NOT DISCLOSE OR PROVE A CAUSE OF ACTION OR ANY EVIDENCE OF COMPLAINT

Mr. Nkurunziza contended that many affidavits sworn in support of the petition do not prove a cause of action or are not evidence of any complaint. Such affidavit like that of deponent Alegi Gilbert of Nebbi District complain about disenfranchisement. Each deponent swore that they registered as voters, mentioning stations where they were registered. They deponed that when they visited the polling stations on the day of voting, their names were not in the voters register. Counsel attempted to fault the deponents on the basis that each of them should have verified during the period of 21 days display of the register whether or not they were on the register. Learned counsel, therefore, asserted persistently, that these deponents have no right to fault the first respondent for the absence of their names from the register.

Mr. Nkurunziza relied on the two supplementary affidavits sworn by Mr. Nsimbi Charles, both of which were sworn on 22nd March 2006.
Mr. Nsimbi is described as the Head of Voter Registration at the Electrol Commission (1st Respondent) where his duties include registering voters, maintaining the voters register and issuing voters cards. In his affidavits both the original sworn on 21/03/2006 and the said two supplementaries, he states that he examined his records including the national register of voters and found that:

Many of deponents who complained that their names were not on the register were actually on the register.
(May I point out here that during the meeting of the National Electoral Liaison Consultative Forum (NELCF) on 12th January, 2006, political parties representatives complained that the Commission display officials keep the registers in their houses and that tribunals were not active. This is reflected in the minutes annexed to the affidavit of Commissioner Ongaria).
Deponents who complained that their names were not on the register had not been registered at all or were registered at stations different from where they claim they should have been registered.

Mr. Nsimbi had on the previous day (21/03/2006) sworn another rather lengthy affidavit. In it he pointed out that the voters register was updated from 29th September to 30th October, 2005. This was followed by display of the register from 22nd December 2005 to 11th January, 2006, which was eventually extended to 17th January 2006. The objective of the display "was to enable persons who had registered to check and confirm the corrections of their particulars". He then lists about four different forms each of which would be completed for a particular purpose.

What puzzles me in the display exercise, though, is first the period of display, i.e., 22ndDecember 2005 to mid – January 2006. This is a period when Ugandans are normally busy on Christmas and New Year activities. This is a notorious fact. I have known many people, both low and high, who abandon offices at this time to prepare for, and participate in Christmas and New Year holidays and festivities. It would be a miracle to expect ordinary Ugandans to religiously inspect registers during such period or indeed to expect display officials to be in one place all the time displaying the registers. This is particularly so, in as much as there does not appear to have been reasonable and adequate education of the public about the registration and the display exercises. Many Ugandans watched and heard the "education exercise" on TV and radios occasionally. Again occasionally one could see advertisement in a news paper. How accessible are these facilities to ordinary voters who must be the majority?

Mr. Ogalo Wandera responded to the objection to the said affidavits generally during his rejoinder to the general submissions of counsel for both respondents.
The gist of his contention in support of the deponents who complained of disenfranchisement is that evidence in the affidavits shows massive disenfranchisement of voters in such districts as Busia, Iganga, Kampala, Mbale, Nebbi, Sironko and Pallisa. He relied on the affidavits of the deponents. These include Atukwage Rogers (Mbarara), Obedigu Richard (Nebbi) Nafula Christine and Namakula Sarah (Idudi), Kagoya Fatuma and Kabode Abdu (Iganga). The question of the disenfranchisement is relevant to the first and second issues framed for decision by this Court. In any event, the two supplementary affidavits of Nsimbi largely do support the claims of the deponents. He was obviously based in Kampala. He only gives explanations why names were removed or were missing from the register. I do not, with respect, accept Mr. Nkurunziza's contention that citizens who have, for instance, applied for registration and in some cases obtained certificate of registration, should be faultered for not inspecting the register during the display, which display, as mentioned earlier, took place during the period of festivities. It is common knowledge that the display of registers was not all that smooth. Party representatives on NELCF complained that in some areas, display was not done daily or at particular places. In Nsimbi's supplementary affidavit (in Vol.8 in Para 5) he referred to the affidavits of Major (Rtd) Rubaramira Ruranga and that of L. Kizito.

There is no evidence anywhere showing that any of the voters who were removed from the register were afforded opportunity to show cause why they should not be removed. I note that the Commonwealth observers team observed and disapprovingly reported this aspect. Mr. Nkurunziza's faultering of the disenfranchised deponents reminds me of criticism of voters in Morgan Vs. Simpson (1974) 3 ALL ER.722, an English Election petition case where the result depended on the omission of voters to mark the ballot papers.

The case shows that a voter would go into one of a compartment and with the pencil provided in the compartment, place a cross (x) on the right-hand side of the ballot paper, opposite the name of the candidate for whom he votes. The voter will then fold up the ballot paper so as to show the official mark on the back, and leaving the compartment will, without showing the front of the paper to any person, show the official mark on the back to the presiding officer, and then, in the presence of the presiding officer, put the paper into the ballot box, before leaving the polling station.

Denning, M. R. who presided over the appeal in the English Court of Appeal stated this:-

Now those directions are more observed in the breach than in the letter. Rarely does a voter look to see that the ballot paper is stamped with the official mark. At least I never do. Rarely does a voter go back to the presiding officer and show him the official mark on the back. At least I never do. Often enough the polling station is not suited for it. It is so furnished that the natural thing is for the voter to go straight from the compartment to the ballot box and put his paper in it without showing it to the presiding officer. So I should think that the 44 mistakes were due largely to the fault of the officers in the polling stations and very little to the fault of the voters. If their votes are not to count, they are disfranchised without any realblame attaching to them."

Similarly, I think that Ugandan voters who complained were disenfranchised without any real blame attaching to them.

During the hearing of the petition we noted from some Forms described as particulars of persons deleted from the Registers, which were annextures to Mr. Nsimbi's affidavit that the removals were all done on 16/01/2006 which was 37 days before polling day, and four days before the end of display which apparently ended on 21/1/2006. There is no evidence of how the discoveries of disqualified persons was made.

Mr. Nkurunziza relied on the provisions of Ss.23, 24 and 25 of the E C A to support his opinion that voters were properly removed from the register. Subsections (4) (5) and (6) of S.25 of the ECA are informative.

These subsections states:

"(4) An objection under Subs (3) shall be addressed to the returning officer through the Chairperson of the parish council of the person raising the objection.

(5) The returning officer shall appoint a tribunal comprising five members to determine objections received by him or her under subjection (4).

(6) The tribunal shall comprise-

(a) at least three members of the village executive committee, at least one of whom shall be a woman; and

(b) at least one each of the following –

(i) elders

(ii) chiefs.

I did not see any evidence of the objections except sheets indicating removals.

It is evident from the foregoing subsections that a parish council chairperson would be a major player in determining initially how objections would be made. "Parish council" is not defined. I can only infer that that parish council is basically the one set up under the Movement Act (Cap.261) perhaps read together with Local Government Act. Under S.22 (3), of the Movement Act, such council consists of all the chairpersons of the village movement committees. In my opinion the Local Government Act - Cap 243 - is not helpful.

The chairperson of the parish council who is also the chairperson of the parish movement committee is elected by the parish council. Parish movement committees are responsible to movement sub-county committee. And this manner of responsibility reaches the top of the National Executive Committee of the movement which is chaired by the leader of NRM who under the law current then is also the President of the Country and their party's Chairman. So removal of voters from the register initiated, as in this case, at parish level by an official of the movement raises grave suspicions. I say at this level because the forms attached to Mr. Nsimbi's affidavits alluded to earlier, show that the persons who recommended the removals were RC Officials and the RC's stamps on each card clearly shows this. These same recommenders are the same persons who sat on the committee (almost uniformly consisting of four members instead of five) which recommended to the returning officers the removal of any person. Clearly, according to Mr. Nsimbi, the removals were done as recommended by the Parish Tribunals. None of the persons whose removals were done appears to have ever been made aware of the removals. Since subs (8) of S.25 of ECA provide for review of decisions of tribunals, my opinion is that such reviews could normally be made at the instance of a person affected by the removal. Such a person cannot challenge his/ her removal of which he/she is unaware. So they were condemned unheard contrary to rules of natural justice.

Without going further into this matter, I think that the whole exercise was tainted with unfairness from beginning to end. In my considered opinion, therefore, the removal of the deponents was against the principle of the right to vote which is anchored in the Constitution [Article 1 (4)] and Article 59 (ii)]; S.19 of the ECA and S.2 (1) and 30 (4) of the PEA. The affidavits in my view disclosed a cause of action.

2.3 AFFIDAVITS WHICH CONTAIN STATEMENTS THAT HAVE NO BASIS OR ANY PROBATIVE OR EVIDENTIAL VALUE.

Mr. Nkurunziza contended that these are affidavits which contain generalised allegations such as wide spread intimidation and wide spread bribery yet deponents did not have instances of personal knowledge of such wide spread activity. Learned counsel singled out para 10 of Ruzindana's affidavit and para 16 of Kamateneti Ingrid Turinawa affidavit. Counsel contended that these two witnesses did not indicate how they personally knew the matters alleged. Unfortunately, Mr. Nkuruzinza did not allude to the many related affidavits from Ntungamo District from where Ruzindana hails or from Rukungiri District where Kamateneti was based at the time material to this petition.

It is true that paragraphs of the affidavits of Ruzindana and Kamateneti are on the whole drawn in general terms. However, Ruzindana explained in the affidavit, for instance, how he was an MP of Ruhama Constituency where he contested for re-election under FDC (para 2) and was conversant with facts relating to elections in the Ntangamo District because he was a candidate in one of the constituency there and the petitioner was his presidential candidate. He indicates in para 3 that he was a member of FDC National Campaign Committee for the petitioner in charge of Research and was Deputy Secretary General. In that paragraph 10 complained of by Mr. Nkurunziza, Mr. Ruzindana shows that the information about countrywide spread of payment of Shs 50,000/= to all LC 1 chairpersons is based on his survey which he carried out among all his District coordinators that there was countrywide distribution of the money. Indeed Annexture R2 AI (infra) supports Ruzindana as regards money distribution.

In the case of Kamateneti, she states in para 1 of her affidavit that "she was the National Secretary for women FDC." In Paragraphs 3 and 4 she averred as follows:

"3. That on the eve of the elections, the FDC District Election Task Force put in place a team of monitors to go around the District (of Rukungiri) to monitor on election and report to the District Task Force what was happening at various polling centres. The office also provided video camera to the team that was to cover Rukungiri Town Council, Nyarusanje and Nyakishenyi Sub counties.

4. That on the election day the 23rd February 2006. I sat in the FDC office to receive reports from our FDC monitors".

In the subsequent paragraphs, Kamateneti sets out what she received from FDC monitors and agents. In one instance she received information of pre-ticking of ballot papers in favour of the second respondent and the candidates of NRM who were contesting other positions. As a result she and the petitioner made a complaint to the District Returning Officer who caused his Assistant Returning Officer and the District Registrar to investigate the complaint. These two apparently took half-hearted remedial action eventually.

In the circumstances of this petition, it cannot be said that the affidavits have no basis or value. I think that the proper approach is to evaluate these affidavits alongside those of the respondent's affidavits in reply in order to establish the credibility of the deponents on related facts. Obvious hearsay should be ignored.

Mind you, there were lamentations during the hearing of the petition about the short time available within which parties were able to assemble evidence. While shortage of time is no good excuse for shoddy work, such complaints if genuine, must be taken into account in assessing the value of evidence available.

2.4 AFFIDAVITS SPECIFICALLY REFERRED TO BY PETITIONER'S COUNSEL.

Mr. Nkurunziza referred to the affidavit of Pte. Barigye. Learned counsel dwelt on it and referred us to the counter affidavits from the respondents' six witnesses whose purpose was to contradict Pte. Barigye and show that he was unreliable. They are all soldiers. Two of them (Brig.Mukasa and Capt. Ndyabagye) were Barigye's superiors in the army. This submission on this category of affidavit is to be considered later at the appropriate place in the course of my discussion of each of issues No.1, 2, 3 and 4. The contentions of Mr. Nkurunziza really concern evaluation of the credibility of witnesses. For instance he contends that affidavit refers to both ballot papers and registration cards. I think that the context is important in understanding what Barigye referred to. If Barigye had given oral evidence, or if he had been cross-examined on his affidavit, his credibility would have been better assessed, I think.

Before I leave the question of objections, I want to refer to a passage in the Presidential Election Petition Judgment of the Supreme Court of Zambia to which the respondents' counsel referred in relation to the standard of proof. It is an internet copy. This is A.K.Mazoka & 2 others Vs P. Mwanawasa & 2 others (supra). Apparently, there, in Zambia, the petitioners had led evidence which in part was a departure from the pleadings (petitions) and so partly raised a new cause. Counsel for the respondents cross-examined the petitioners' witnesses at length on those new matters and apparently indeed adduced evidence in rebuttal of the new matters. Much later during submissions, the respondents' counsel objected to the admissibility of, or reliance by the Court on the said evidence. The Supreme Court alluded to some of its previous decisions on the issue and concluded that:

"In our considered opinion, the respondents having not objected to evidence immediately it was adduced, this Court is not precluded from considering that evidence. At the end of the day, the issue will depend on the weight the court will attach to the evidence which was let in on unpleaded issues. At this late stage, we cannot therefore exclude the evidence adduced and allowed without objection. This, however, does not mean that we condone in any way shoddy and incomplete pleadings. Each case must be considered on its own facts. In a proper case the court will always exclude matters not pleaded more so where an objection has been raised."

With respect, I think that this passage equally applies to our situation in this case. The main differences are two. First, in Zambia, witnesses gave oral evidence which was supplemented with documentary evidence. In the present petition evidence was based on affidavits of deponents for each side. In our case instead of cross-examining witnesses for the petitioner, the respondents filed counter affidavits. In effect parties left the court to assess the evidential value of the competeting affidavits. The second distinction is that in Zambia, the trial of the petition lasted a long time and so the respondents' counsel apparently had more than ample time to raise objections which they raised after objectionable evidence had been received by court. In this petition, every side was under pressure to present their case within the limited time allowed by law. However the essence of the holding by the Zambia Supreme Court is sound and persuasive on this particular point of raising objection belatedly.

In the Presidential Election Petition No.1 of 2001 between the same parties virtually similar objections were raised as those raised by learned counsel in this petition. I said then and I say so again that trial of election petition is governed by a special Act and special rules of procedure. See Order 45 Rule 4 of CPR. These laws emphasize expeditious disposal of a presidentional election petition. Therefore placing undue reliance on technicalities can lead to unwarranted injustice.

CONSIDERATION OF THE ISSUES

The five issues were argued separately.

Counsel for the petitioner first argued issue 4, followed by issue 1, 2 and then 3. Issue 5 which is about reliefs was argued half-heartedly.

It will be noticed as I go along that evidence of many witnesses cuts across the first four issues. Certainly that is the case particularly in the cases of bribery, harassment, violence and intimidation. Evidence on these is from many parts of the country.

If I may mention instances of witnesses whose evidence cuts across the four issues: Examples are : Mr. Augustine Ruzindana, Mr. Jack Sabiiti, Ms Kamatenite, Mr.Turyasingura, Mr. Ozo, Mr. Ekanya, Mr. Katuntu of Iganga, Patrick Kitimbo, Iganga District.

I now proceed to give my reasons in support of my opinions on the issues beginning with the first issue. I would like to repeat what I said in my reasons in Presidential Election Petition No1 of 2001 on trial by affidavits. There are inherent problems in conducting the hearing of and deciding a petition of this importance on the basis of only volumes of affidavits and annextures thereto. Any experienced trial judge will agree that trying a case, or a petition, by way of oral testimony has obvious advantages. The impression which a trial judge gets from, for instance, observation of demeanours of witnesses, is totally missing from a trial based on affidavits only. Affidavit evidence is unlikely to elicit the bad out of a witness. Falsehoods are unlikely to be exposed easily. Oral testimony is particularly helpful because a court can intervene and seek clarification from a witness about what he/ she states. In this petition, like that of 2001, matters were not made any better because there were very many affidavits upon which counsel never commented because of limited time. Where any comments were made, comments were hurriedly made. Most affidavits were referred to en masse. Of course where trials are based on oral testimony, there is the fear of the consequences of witnesses not turning up in time or at all? I do not think that that would be good enough reason for not receiving oral evidence. I hope that the authorities concerned will consider these points and amend the relevant laws especially the PEA and rules made thereunder, so that future Presidential Election Petitions are tried on the basis of oral testimony or both oral and affidavit evidence with emphasis on oral testimony.

For conveniences, I will in some instances use the acronyms “PS” for polling station or stations, “PO” for presiding officer or officers and “RO” for returig officer(s).

THE 1ST ISSUE

WHETHER THERE WAS NON-COMPLIANCE WITH THE PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION, THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS ACT AND THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION ACT IN THE CONDUCT OF THE 2006 PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

This issue arises from paragraphs 5 and 8 of the amended petition, especially the latter paragraph.8.

In our decision of 6th April, 2006, we found that there was non-compliance with the provisions of the Constitution, the Presidential Elections Act (PEA) and the Electoral Commission Act (ECA) in the conduct of the 2006 Presidential Elections by the 1st respondent in the following instances:

(a) In disenfranchisement of voters by deleting their names from the voters register or denying them the right to vote;

(b) In the counting and tallying of results.

It is fair to state that the Court's decision on this issue was a compromise position. This is illustrated by the answers which each of the members of this Court gave to both the 3rd and the 4th issues.

DISENFRANCHISEMENT

Mr. Dan Ogalo Wandera, lead counsel for the petitioner, first referred us to paragraph 8 (a) of the petition in which the petitioner alleged breach of sections 19(3) and 50 of the ECA.

I have already reproduced it but for easy reference I quote it again:

"8 Your petitioner avers that the entire electoral process on the 23rd day of February, 2006 Presidential Election, beginning with the campaign period up to the polling day was characterised by acts of intimidation, lace (sic) of freedom and transparency, unfairness and violence and commission of numerous electoral offences and illegal practices contrary to the provisions of the Presidential Elections Act; Electoral Commission Act and the Constitution.

(a)Contrary to S.19 (3) and S.50 of the Electoral Commission Act, the 1st Respondent disenfranchised voters by deleting their names from the voters roll/register"

Mr. Ogalo argued that by reason of S.19 (3), a voter is entitled to vote in a place where he/she resides or he is registered. The provision read thus:

"19 (3) subject to this Act, a voter has a right to vote in a parish or ward where he or she is registered."

Learned counsel contended that during the 2006 presidential election names of many voters' were deleted from the register.

He relied on the affidavits of Major (Rtd) Ruranga Rubaramira as well as the affidavits of very many other deponents that were filed in support of the petition. The various deponents swore that they could not vote because their names were missing from the voters register. To the affidavits of Rubaramira were annexed a number of reports made by accredited election observers. These observers were accredited by the first Respondent to observe or monitor the electoral process and the voting. Among these were Commonwealth Observers, European Union, DEM-group, Hurinet Uganda, Foundation for Human Rights Initiatives (FHRI). Mr. Ogalo Wandera contended that the deponents proved the allegation of country wide disenfranchisement. Examples are deponents from the Districts of Bushenyi, Busia, Iganga, Kampala, Mbale, Nebbi, Pallisa and Ntungamo. Counsel contended that deponents had voters cards in some cases or registration certificates in other cases. Photocopies of these were annexed to the affidavits as exhibits. He contended that there is ample evidence proving this issue.

Mr. Joseph Matsiko, the Ag. Director of Civil Litigation, replied on behalf of the two respondents. He adopted the submissions of Mr Nkurunziza which the latter made as already indicated on the four categories of affidavits supporting the petition. Mr. Matsiko contended that the affidavit evidence tendered in Court did no prove the allegations in the petition.

Responding to Mr. Ogalo Wandera's submissions on para 8 (a), i.e., DISENFRANCHISEMENT, of many voters, Mr. Matsiko contended that the petitioner did not in his petition or in the accompanying affidavit indicate the number of voters who registered after his return from exile and who were disenfranchised. Nor did be enumerate the districts affected by this. Mr. Matsiko repeated again Mr. Nkurunziza's opinions and contended that the affidavit of Major Ruranga Rubaramira contains hearsay, is deficient, defective and unreliable. He cited in support the decision of this Court in Presidential Election Petition No.1 of 2001, [Col. (Rtd) Dr. Besigye Kizza Vs Electoral Commissions & Museveni Yoweri Kaguta] Vol.II Supreme Court Bound Volumes of the decision (Reasons of Odoki CJ, Karokora and Mulenga JJSC).

The learned Ag. Director of Civil Litigation contended that since Major Ruranga Rubaramira did not, in his affidavit, name the FDC agents from whom he received reports about disenfranchisement, such agents even if they swore affidavits cannot corroborate the Major's evidence.

Mr. Matsiko, like Mr. Nkurunziza, argued that a voter's right is shown by the presence of a voter's name on the register and for this he relied on S.19 (1) (a) of the ECA. And like Mr. Nkurunziza, Mr. Matsiko contended that voters should have inspected the register during the display period to ascertain whether or not they were in fact on the register. He referred to several paragraphs of the affidavits of Dr. B.Kigundu, the Chairman of 1st Respondent and, that of Mr. Nsimbi, an official of the commission, in which the latter attempted to show the position of the register and why some voters were removed. Mr. Matsiko argued surprisingly that the allegations of disenfranchisement were not proved. He prayed that we answer this issue in the negative.

I begin with the first Article of our Constitution which proclaims the people as sovereign and also proclaims the principles of regular, free and fair elections. In terms of clause (4) of the Article,

"The people shall express their will and consent on who shall govern them and how they should be governed, through regular, free and fair elections of their representatives or through referenda."

Clearly therefore, the people have a constitutional right to freely participate in choosing who is to govern them. The people's right to vote and the responsibility of the state to help citizens to participate in voting is emphasised in Article 59 of the same Constitution. That Article states:

(1) Every citizen of Uganda of eighteen years of age or above has a right to vote.
(2) It is the duty of every citizen of Uganda of eighteen years of age or above, to register as a voter for public elections and referenda.
(3) The state shall take all necessary steps to ensure that all citizens qualified to vote, register and exercise their right to vote.

Clearly the right to vote is constitutional and the state is commanded by the Constitution to ensure that all citizens qualified to vote register and exercise their right to vote. On the face of it, it appears to me that S.19 of the Electoral Commission Act curtailed the citizen's right by stipulating that they can only vote where they originate or reside. For it seems to me that voting where one originates or resides is really a matter of convenience. It cannot be used to disenfranchise a potential voter once he has registered or applied for registration in a particular area of Uganda.

I am not persuaded by the explanations given by Mr. Nsimbi that some voters had to have their names removed because of the recommendation of Parish Councils. Disenfranchising citizens without affording them opportunity to be heard on the matter appears to me to be contrary both to the letter and the spirit of Article.59 of the Constitution.

I do not accept contentions of both Mr. Matsiko, and Mr. Nkurunziza that the affidavits of major Rubaramira and other deponents are valueless and do not support the complaints of the petitioner nor of the voters who have sworn the affidavits. About 90 deponents were able to swear affidavits in support of the complaints about disenfranchisement from different parts of the country. Some local election observers groups as well as the European Union observers report (R2) support the major.

Rubaramira indicated what his status was at the material time, i.e., the FDC National Electoral Commissioner. His claim that he was involved in monitoring the electoral process throughout the country was not disputed. His other claim that he made complaints to the first respondent about irregularities was not denied. Indeed the fact of removal from the register, at least of some voters, is acknowledged in their respective affidavits by both Dr. Kigundu and Mr. Nsimbi. These two officials rely on technicalities to support their stand that the removal was according to law. They appear not to appreciate that the Supreme law of the land, namely the Constitution requires the state to enable citizens to register and to vote. An official should not hurry to disenfranchise a citizen without a sound basis.

Apart from Major Ruranga Rubaramira, volume I(b) of the affidavits of the petitioners' supporters shows that at least 54 were disenfranchised. Wetaka Paul, Siroko District visited no less than 6 stations on 23/2/2006. His name was missing. Similarly Vol.2 (d) has affidavits of no less than 41 witnesses to the same effect. These witnesses are from different parts of the country.

The deponents' names were removed without being afforded opportunity to show cause why they should not be removed from the register. Secondly as observed earlier, the tribunals which initiated the removal exercise do not appear to have been independent or transparent in as much as half the members of the tribunals were members of Movement Parish Councils and who, according to the Movement Act, were members of the Movement of which the 2nd Respondent was its President. Here the question of fairness on the part of the tribunal is questionable. The Electoral Commission Act was enacted in 1997. It provided for objections to be routed through the Chairman of a parish council (which council is made up of executive committee of LCs). The Tribunal, according to S.6 of ECA, shall comprise- (a) at least three members of the village executive committee."

The forms annexed to Mr. Nsimbi's affidavit show that the tribunals that recommended removal of persons who had registered were made up of 4 members two of whom were RC officials. It is odd that these two RC officials were the same persons who recommended the removal of the voters (see annextures to Nsimbi's affidavit). Lack of transparency and fairness in the removal exercise is too obvious to be dwelt upon. I am amazed that those in charge of the policy of the PEA and the legislature which enacted the PEA 2005 never considered and remedied that obvious anomaly.

It may be true that the petitioner did not mention by name in his affidavit the voters who were removed. But his supporters have sworn affidavits, to which Mr. Nsimbi responded.

It is not unreasonable for the petitioner to claim that voters who registered after his return from exile were mostly the ones who were deregistered. It is not unreasonable because the chairpersons of the Parish Council where deregistration occurred cannot be said to have acted with apparent impartiality in as much as they or members of their council (as official stamps show) were the same ones who recommended the removal. They simply endorsed their own recommendations!!

It puzzles me that this type of situation was allowed to go on up to 23/2/2006, the day of the Presidential Elections, despite the fact that the Presidential Elections Act was enacted in November, 2005, nearly 8 years after he ECA was enacted in 1997. The former Act provided for Presidential Elections under multiparty politics and, therefore, the employment of chairmen of Parish Councils (who are members of movement hierarchy) should have been corrected when the PEA 2005 was enacted so that a semblance of neutral tribunals were put in place.
I note from the minutes of the 6th meeting of the Nation Electoral Liaison Committee (NELCF) held on 12/01/2006 (see Commissioner Stephen Ongaria's affidavit – Annex ECG) that representatives of political parties complained at that late time that "display officials keep registers in their houses". It was also reported that "tribunals were not active on the ground hence fears of deleting genuine voters".

As stated earlier, the various reports of the monitors who were accredited by the 1st Respondent corroborate Rubaramira on the issue of disenfranchisement. These observers, such as the Demo group, had monitors at virtually every polling station. FHRI, Hurinet, (Uganda), the Commonwealth observers and European Union observers group reports all support Rubaramira in varying degrees. I have noted that the foreign observers were indeed over cautious in their reports about what took place. Rubaramira is also supported by the many deponents themselves to whom I have referred already, who were victims of disenfranchisement. Needless to say, I have to rely on the evidence before me in arriving at my conclusions.

Like Mr. Nkurunziza, Mr. Matsiko relied on reasons given by only three of the members of this Court in the 2001 Presidential Election Petition No.1 of 2001. The Court consisted of five members and each member gave reasons and relied on certain authorities to support his opinion on the status of the various affidavits where their reliability was questionable. On that occasion I held that even if some paragraphs of the affidavits might contain hearsay matters and even if a deponent did not specify the source of certain information contained in the affidavit, those were not sufficient grounds for declaring a whole affidavit defective or a nullity. In my reasons I referred to such cases as M.B. Nandala Vs Fr. Lyding (1963) EA 706, Mayers & Another Vs Akira Ranch (1969) EA 169, Zola Vs Ralli (1969) EA 691 and Rossage Vs Rossage (1960) I.W.R. 249. At page 15, I stated –

"I think that the inclusion of the words 'belief' or information." is in some cases superfluous and does not render each affidavit invalid, at any rate not the whole of each affidavit.
In my opinion it would be improper in this petition to strike out wholly affidavits which are found to contain so called hearsay evidence in some parts where the offending parts of the same affidavit can be severed from the rest of the affidavit without rendering the remaining parts meaningless."
I have not been persuaded that I was wrong in that opinion and that what I stated in 2001 does not apply to the affidavits of Rubaramira and other deponents in this petition.

It is because of these reasons that I agreed on 6th April, 2006, that the constitution, ECA and PEA provisions were violated when many voters were removed from the register and were denied their right to vote. It was an unjustified disenfranchisement.

COUNTING AND TALLYING OF RESULTS

In our decision of 06/04/2006, we held that there was non-compliance with the provisions of the Constitution, the ECA and PEA in the counting and tallying of the results. This point has an obvious bearing on multiple voting and ballot stuffing. In their report (R2) released on 24/2/2006, the European Union Observers state " Counting procedures were also generally followed in polling stations observed, although in over half of counts observed, recouncilliation did not take place at the start of the process and in close to half the cases, results were not immediately posted." Therein lay the danger. The petitioner alleged in para 8(b) to (d) of his amended petition as follows:

"8 (b) Contrary to S.32 of the Presidential Elections Act, the 1st Respondent allowed multiple voting and vote stuffing in many electoral districts in Uganda.
(c) Contrary to S.32 of the Presidential Elections Act, the 1st Respondent failed to cancel results of polling stations where gross malpractices and irregularities took place in particular in the districts of Kiruhura, Manafwa and Pallisa.
(d) Failing to declare the results of the election in accordance with S.56 and S.57 (4) of the Presidential Elections Act ……. andElectoral Commission Act.

Section 32 of the Presidential Elections Act governs voting at the presidential election. According to subs (1) thereof, " 32 (1) A person shall not vote or attempt to vote more than once at an election irrespective of the number of offices held by the person relevant to the election."
S.56 of the Presidential Election Act is concerned with the work of a returning officer. After adding up and declaring results for each candidate, a returning officer must complete relevant return forms and thereafter transmit them to the Commission.

Mr. Ogalo Wandera relied on the second affidavit of Pte. Barigye, the affidavit of Major Rubaramira and of ninety other deponents as evidence proving the allegations that there were country wide practice of multiple voting, pre-ticking and ballot stuffing in favour of the 2nd respondent. That Barigye voted at least 5 times and had 16 Pre-ticked ballot papers which were ticked in favour of the second respondent. According to this witness many other soldiers did the same.
On Pre-ticking, multiple voting and ballot stuffing, there are affidavits of Karyarugokwe Ambrose, Komujuni Anna both of Rukungiri, Yowana Tebasobelwa, and at least forty other deponents from different districts who deponed about multiple voting, pre-ticking and ballot stuffing.

In respect of para 8 (d) of the petition, Mr. Ogalo Wandera referred us to Ss.56 and 57 and to the contents of the affidavit of Major General Mugisha Muntu and contended that the Commission is required to first receive (from returning officers) return forms, reports of the elections, tally sheets and declaration of results forms as set our in S.56 (2) of ECA to enable the Commission to ascertain, publish and declare the results in a presidential election. He submitted that in the instant petition the Commission declared the results before receiving the said documents. In that connection counsel relied on the information contained in the affidavit of Major General Mugisha Muntu. He also referred to the affidavits of Kamateneti Ingrid Turinawe and Kiroko Sam both from Rukungiri District: Kiroko was denied viewing the forms to verify their contents. Beti Olive.N.Kamya of Kampala District in her affidavit swore that there was a difference of 8,145 votes between the results noted by herself and what was announced by the electoral commission in respect of her constituency of Rubaga North for the petitioner. Ms. Edith Byanyima of Kiruhura District in her affidavit lists the irregularities she observed in Kiruhura District. I will later reproduce her affidavit in another context. These include interference in voting by security people, e.g., Captain Basheija. Other irregularities include presiding officers refusing to allow agents of the petitioner to observe voting or to verify declaration forms.
Kamatenite annexed a report by Mugume R.Kaginda, a Returning Officer. Counsel referred to Taaka Kevin (Busia District) to which were annextures of results and a report by an Assistant Returning Officer. This report details what happened. Taaka, was herself a candidate for women, Busia District M.P. She was the petitioner's coordinator and swore that in some polling stations presiding officers refused agents of the petitioner to see declaration of results forms.

In opposition, Mr. Matsiko contended that the allegations of ballot stuffing and multiple voting were not proved. He contended that Major Rubaramira's affidavits were contradicted by that of Barigye about the number of cards produced by the latter. So the two witnesses should not be believed nor relied upon. He contended, correctly, that because of ballot stuffing in Pallisa District, results of elections in some 7 affected polling stations were cancelled. He argued again surprisingly, that there is no evidence of ballot stuffing or multiple voting.

Regarding failure to declare results in accordance with Ss.56 and 57 of PEA, as alleged in para 8 (d) of the Petition, Mr. Matsiko submitted that the petitioner did not prove the allegation. He argued that Subs (1) of S.57 does not provide any specific method of ascertaining the results and contended that the Commission has wide discretion to employ any transparent method to ascertain the results. He relied on Clause 7 of Article 103 of the Constitution for the view that the clause does not restrict the method of ascertaining. That clause reads as follows:
"The Electoral Commission shall ascertain, publish and declare in writing under its seal, the results of the presidential election within forty eight hours from close of polling."
He relied on the affidavit of Mr. Wamala, an official of the Electoral Commission, the 1st respondent, for the view that results can be received by telephone or fax and, therefore, these are among the means available for sending results to the commission. (From this last submission by Mr. Matsiko, he impliedly admitted that original documents setting out formal returns were not available to the Commission at the time the results were declared).

He referred to the affidavit of Mr. Nyakojjo Sam another official of the Commission, who deponed to the old and current methods of transparency in transmitting results. He argued that the holding of a meeting between the Commission and the representatives of participating political parties is evidence of transparency even though some of those representatives were unhappy with resultant decisions. He prayed that this ground should fail.
Mr. Matsiko ignored the affidavit of Major-General Mugisha Muntu whose responsibility at the National Counting Centre was to ensure that results were properly received, ascertained and declared according to the relevant law. The General shows in his two affidavits that the law was not followed.
Mr. Matsiko opined that because clause (7) of Article 103 does not specify a mode of ascertaining results, the 1st respondent was free to employ any mode of ascertaining the results. He thus appears to ignore the provision of clause (9) which provides that Parliament shall, by law, prescribe the procedure for the election and assumption of office by a president. Had he appreciated the import of Clause (9) he would have agreed that that law is the PEA which in S.56 governs the duties of returning officers. That section was enacted in 2005, very much later after telephones and faxes were in use. Yet that law did not refer to the use of these facilities by the Commission.

S.56 directs the returning officers to, immediately after adding the votes, declare the number of votes obtained by each candidate, complete a return in the prescribe form and transmit to the commission:

Freedom & Fairness

In Para 8 (c) the petitioner alleged that Contrary to S.12 (e) and (f) of the ECA, the commission failed to take measures to ensure conditions of freedom and fairness during the electoral process. Intimidation and violence against agents of a candidate have a bearing on counting and tallying of results and validity of declaration of results forms.

Mr. Matsiko submitted that Kamatenite Ingrid Turinawe should not be believed on what she deponed to as having happened in Rukungiri District because her informers did not swear affidavits to support her. Similarly, and like Mr. Nkurunziza, he rubbished, as hearsay evidence, portions of the contents of the affidavits of Ruzindana and Salaam Musumba whose affidavits refer to bribery and intimidation. In the case of Ruzindana, he testified about wide spread intimidation and bribery by agents of the 2nd respondent in his constituency of Ruhama and Ntungamo District in particular and generally in the country. According to learned counsel the petitioner failed to adduce credible evidence to show that the presidential election was not free and fair.

MULTIPLE VOTING AND BALLOT STUFFING.

This has a bearing on the counting and tallying of results.

The two respondents have provided counter affidavits in reply to the affidavits supporting the allegations of the petitioner. The fact that there was multiple voting and ballot stuffing in some seven or so polling stations in Pallisa District in Eastern Uganda was incontrovertible. As a result the Assistant Returning Officer of the District nullified those results. Some of the perpetrators of ballot stuffing and multiple voting wore army uniforms as testified to by Tazanya Musitafa, who was FDC's Assistant Supervisor in charge of Buseta sub county, Pallisa District. He found Lt. Kaweru Daba and his paramilitary group terrorising and addressing people to vote for the 2nd Respondent. He is supported by among others, Tamwenya Charles. The group hounded out of the polling stations agents of other parliamentary and presidential candidates except those of the 2nd Respondent. Similarly, Bwire Swaib testified about the same Lt. Kaweru's group at another polling station where polling officials were giving out ballot papers to people not eligible to vote at the station. On polling day, Mpima Kolonerio, presiding officer, was held hostage in Pallisa by the same group as they stuffed ballot papers at Kabowa station. Of course, Mpima later, for some strange reason, swore another affidavit in support of the respondents to disown some of the statements he had stated in his earlier affidavit!! But other witnesses to what happened to him and to the polling process have given their affidavits in proof of what happened.

Dr. Katebariwe testified about what happened in Rukoni sub country of Ntungamo District in Western Uganda.

According to Dr. Katebariwe's affidavit, para 4-

"On polling day at Rukoni Sub country headquarters at around 10.00 p.m I found Bajungu, the Ag. Sub county Chief for Rukoni Sub County together with Katsigazi, the GISO, LDUs and other presiding officers opening ballot boxes and changing the declaration forms. I took a photograph of the proceedings copy is attached hereto enclosed as "A".

The photograph depicts what took place that night - Rukoni Sub County is in Ruhama constituency of Mr. Ruzindana for which he was contesting for re-election. He was contesting with Mrs. Janet. K. Museveni, the wife of the second respondent. Witnesses refer to the heavy presence of the army especially the Presidential Brigade Guard soldiers.
Dr. Katebariwe must have been very brave. Despite being arrested and detained till 2.30 a.m, he lived to tell what he saw.
His evidence supports what Ruzindana deponed to in his own affidavit about intimidation and interference by army personnel and other security agencies in the electoral process.
Bajungu admits that he was the Sub county Chief and an election supervisor of Rukoni SubCounty. He also admits that he is in the photograph taken by Dr Katebariwe but claims simply that it was taken "while I was receiving sealed envelopes containing declaration forms from various presiding officers." Why should Dr. Katebariwe take a photograph of an official innocently engaged in simple innocent activity? GISO Katsigazi admits being at Rukoni sub county claiming-
"I only passed by Rukoni Subcounty headquarters to supervise the security situation in the area."
He did this at 10.00 p.m. Why? I have said before, and I repeat it here, that army or security personnel, other than police personnel, are not suitable for ordinary electoral duties. The functions should be discharged by police.

Dr. Katebariwe talks of extra ordinary presence of members of the Presidential Protection Unit (Presidential Guard Brigade) in Ntungamo District and in Rukoni Subcounty in Ruhama constituency. In that subcounty the Unit was under the command of Mugaga Stanley. The latter admits that he is a member of that PP Unit and that at the material time he was at Lushome in Rukoni. But he claims that he was attending to his sick parents. His parents may have been sick. However, I am not convinced by his denials.

I have no hesitation in accepting Dr. Katebariwe's honest account that officials of the 1st respondent, i.e, the presiding officers, the sub county chief, in collusion with GISO and LDUs altered the declaration forms results in Rukoni Subcountry area and that PPU harassed the supporters of the petitioner. A similar graphic account is given by James Birungi Ozo who was FDC elections monitor in Kamwenge and Kyenjojo Districts. I will later reproduce his affidavit under issue No.3. He was badly roughed up by armed groups of LDUs, GISO who roamed about in the company of a man wearing NRM T-Shirt harassing voters at polling stations. The harassment of voters, ballot stuffing and multiple voting cut across Ntungamo District and the country as the evidence in the affidavits of witnesses from the Districts of Ntungamo, Kabale, Kisoro, Rukungiri, Bushenyi, Kihurura, Ibanda and Kamwenge (in the West), Nebbi and Arua in the North; Busia, Sironko, Mbale, and Iganga Districts (in the East) and Kampala and Mukono District (Central) illustrate.

Hon .Geofrey Ekanya, MP Tororo County, who was the Zonal coordinator for FDC in Tororo and Busia Districts, in his affidavit also depones about some of these malpractices. According to Ekanya, he and the RDC called Kasibante Dauda addressed rallies in Tororo and Butaleja Districts where the RDC intimidated supporters of the petitioner. The RDC and a woman called Felista Etyang told people who do not support NRM that the Army would be deployed to deal with them. According to Ekanya, two days before polling day, the Army was actually deployed in Tororo and Malaba Towns and in other areas in Tororo District. Military vehicles popularly called Mamba, were deployed and they cruised around Tororo and Malaba Towns and in the subcountries of Mela and Kwapa. (There are affidavits from Bungokho County, Mbale District, showing that a similar thing was at this time going on in Mbale District). This frightened the population and sent pervasive fear among voters which was no doubt emphasised by the roughing up of voters by Mr. Fox Odoi, a Legal Assistant to the 2nd Respondent.

Contrary to the assertion of the Chairman of the 1st respondent and of Messers Nsimbi and Wamala, there is ample evidence proving that the counting and tallying of results, before the declaration of the results were declared, was done contrary to the provisions of the ECA and PEA. Even if the evidence of Pte. Barigye is discarded, there is other ample evidence to support this finding.

Those were some of my reasons why I answered the first issue in the positive, namely, that there was non-compliance with the provisions of the Constitution, the PEA and the ECA in the conduct of the Presidential Elections of 2006.

ISSUE NO.2.

Whether the said election was not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in the Constitution, Presidential Elections Act and Electoral Commission Act.

This issue arises from the petitioner's allegations set out in paragraph 8 of the amended petition which I reproduced earlier in these reasons. It will be noticed that evidence and arguments on the first and this issue are interrelated.

On 6th April, 2006, we stated that there was non-compliance with the principles laid down in the Constitution, the Presidential Elections Act, and the Electoral Commission Act in the following areas:

(a) Tthe principle of free and fair elections was compromised by bribery and intimidation or violence in some areas of the country.

(b) The principles of equal suffrage, transparency of the vote and secrecy of the ballot were undermined by multiple voting and vote stuffing in some areas.

I must again say that the decision of the court on this issue was a compromise.

Mr. Ogalo Wandera cited five principles which characterise a free and fair democratic election. These principles were summarised by Odoki, CJ, in the reasons which he gave in support of the court's decision in a similar petition between the same parties in Presidential Election Petition No.1 of 2001 in Besigye Kizza Vs Museveni Yoweri Kaguta and Electoral Commission.

At page 34 of his reasons for the judgment of the Court, the learned Chief Justice summarised these principles thus: -

These principles are indeed derived from the current Constitution and the Electoral Commission Act, 1997.

Thus clause (4) of Article 1 of the Constitution states-

" 1 (4) The people shall express their will and consent on who shall govern them and how they should be governed through regular, free and fair elections of their representatives or through referenda."

The right to vote is enshrined in Article. 59(1). The secrecy of the vote and the transparency of counting the vote and of the declaration of the results are set out in Articles 68 and 103 and are echoed in part VII, of the PEA, i.e. sections 48, 51, 54 and 57.

Mr. Ogola Wandera argued that the affidavits evidence of numerous deponents supporting the petition show that voters were deprived of the right to vote [see Rubaramira, Voters from the Districts of Kampala, Busia, Mbale, Nebbi, Ntungamo, Bushenyi, among others]. Learned counsel also argued that Ss.56 and 57 (4) of the PEA required that there is accuracy in counting votes and announcing results in a timely manner. In turn this requires that tally sheets be completed immediately after, so as to reflect the votes cast for each candidate. There is need, for a returning officer to announce the results before transmitting details to the Commission. This is transparency. Learned counsel relied on the affidavits of Major General Mugisha Muntu in support of his argument that the presidential election results were announced before the Commission received the necessary documents stipulated in S.56 of PEA. Under that section, declaration forms compiled by presiding officers must be transmitted to the Commission for the purposes of announcing the national results. Counsel opined that Dr. Kigundu, the Chairman of the Commission, did not satisfactorily explain this in his affidavits.

I N T I M I D A T I O N

Mr. Ogalo Wandera contended that there was countrywide spread intimidation of voters. He singled out the killing of three people at Mengo by Lt. Magara of the RDC's office, Kampala, the intimidation of voters in Tororo District especially on the voting day (23/2/2006) by Fox Odoi, the Legal Assistant to the 2nd Respondent who in company of armed LDUs wielded a gun and fired it during broad daytime. This is deponed to by Hon. Ekanya in his affidavit.

Some of the threats, such as those in Bugiri were reported in writing by the petitioners' agent to the first respondent and to the CID Headquarters (See FDC letter dated 28th January, 2006) receipt of which is acknowledged by the two addressees. Apparently the 1st respondent did not reply to the letter.

The letter reads as follows: -

28th January, 2006.
The Secretary,
Electoral Commission,
Jinja Road,
KAMPALA.

The Officer-In-Charge,
Electoral Offences Squad,
Criminal Investigations Department,

KAMPALA.

Gentlemen,

RE: 1. CHARLES KITOSI LCIII, CHAIRMAN, MUTUMBA 2. SUBCOUNTY.
2. JOSEPH WANGIRA OSINYA NRM CHAIRMAN, BANDA SUBCOUNTY
3. TITO OKWARE SUBCOUNTY COUNCILOR, BUINJA SUBCOUNTY

4. MUKISA JULIUS, BUSWALE SUBCOUNTY
5. OUNDO KUUCHA, MUTUMBA SUBCOUNTY
6. BARASA ONDYEGE, BANDA SUBCOUNTY
7. NGUABE MUHULO, BANDA SUBCOUNTY

We refer to the above named persons who are candidate Museveni's agents in Bugiri District and wish to bring to your attention the following:
Each of the said agents is moving in the villages with exercise books. Each interviews a voter asking for his/her name, demand to see the voters registration card and ask who the voter is going to cast the vote for in presidential and parliamentary elections. All the particulars are then recorded in the exercise books. After this, the voter is informed that the agent has been asked by the Government to take these particulars to enable candidate Museveni and NRM make a decision about the voter.

The voter is left in no doubt that his or her decision will be subject of further action by the Government.

These actions are causing a lot of fear among voters and it is unfortunate that this countrywide exercise has not been stopped by the Electoral Commission.

Anyway, the abovementioned people are contravening section 26 of the Presidential Elections Act which prohibits interference with the free exercise of the franchise of a voter. The offence carries a sentence of three years imprisonment.
The National Resistance Movement has through its spokesman sought to justify these crimes by claiming that the party is carrying out a census. This means that these offences are being committed with the knowledge and approval of candidate Museveni within the meaning of section 59 (6) (c) of the Presidential Election Act.

We request you to immediately put a stop to these illegal practices.

Yours faithfully,
……
Secretary Legal/Constitutional and Human Rights Affairs.

cc. Returning Officer
Bugiri District

The letter implies that the exercise was countrywide.

Indeed, this type of threats or intimidation is mentioned by Charles Byaruhanga an FDC candidate in Kabaale constituency, in Kamwenge District, in Western Uganda, where an NRM Chairman also registered FDC supporters. Byaruhanga talks about threats and briberies and involvement of RDC E. Byabarema. FDC supporters were assaulted. Byaruhanga reported some of the incidents to Obinga Onzi Gasper, the DPC, Kamwenge. This DPC admits receiving the report and took action.

On the secrecy of voting,
Mr. Ogalo Wandera relied on the contents of the second affidavit of Pte. Barigye and the counter affidavits filed by the respondents' witnesses

On the principle of equlity and fairness,
Mr. Wandera contended that his arguments about disenfranchisement apply to the violation of the principles of free and fair elections.
He contended that there was multiple voting and ballot stuffing throughout the country: see affidavits of Chabo Yasin of Yumbe District, Yowana Tebasobehwa of Sembabule District; Pte. Barigye, Judith Komuhangi and Muhwezi. J of Mbarara District, Assimwe. I .Kasigaire of Kanungu District; Mpiima K, a presiding officer in Pallisa, Bwire Swaibu of Pallisa District; Mubbala Dawsin, Kaigo Geofrey of Demogroup, Karyagowe.A, Komujuni.A. of Rukungiri District.

Mr. Matsiko for the respondents, contended that the allegations of ballot stuffing and multiple voting were not proved. He acknowledged that in Pallisa District, only seven (7) polling stations were affected and the Assistant Returning Officer (Higenyi) cancelled the results of those stations. As regards Barigye's affidavits and that of Major Rubaramira on multiple voting, Mr. Matsiko urgued court to ignore these two witnesses because they are inconsistent and contradictory to each other.

As regards the declaration of results in accordance with Ss.56 and 57 of PEA, Mr. Matsiko agreed that the Commission did not rely on the reports submitted by the Returning Officers. He argued that the petitioner had not proved the allegations in para 8 of his petition. He contended as he had done earlier that S.57 (1) of the PEA, does not provide a specific method of ascertaining results and therefore the commission has wide discretion to employ any transparent method to ascertain results. That clause (7) of Article 103 of the constitution does not restrict the method of ascertaining the results. Counsel relied again on the affidavits of Mr. Wamala in support of his contention that results could be sent to the Commission by fax or by telephone. Learned counsel submitted that in the absence of any law prohibiting use of faxes or telephones, use of these means for transmitting results by returning officers was legitimate.

On transparency, he relied on the affidavit of Rwakojo the Commission Secretary. He contended that representatives of political parties participated in some decisions relating to the electoral process.

The affidavit of Pte.Barigye, attracted replies from six military personnel including Brig. Hudson Mukasa, the Commading Officer of 2nd Division, Mbarara. The other army witnesses are Pte.E. Tumusime, Pte. Kizza Moses, Lt Balamu Byarugaba, Pte. Wandera Rogers and Captain Remeo Nyabagye. The thrust of their evidence is to show that Barigye is a liar.

The Brigadier, naturally, would not know a private soldier such Barigye. He depended on his records which showed that Pte. Barigye joined army in July, 2005 and not 2003. The Brigadier denies Barigye's claims and swore –

(a) That soldiers were not given orders to vote for any presidential candidate.

(b) That soldiers were not given more than one voters cards,

(c) That on voting day he never collected voters cards,

(d) His soldiers were never engaged in multiple voting and

(e) That none of the soldiers mentioned by Pte. Barigye were arrested and the Brigadier annexed to his affidavit some five photocopies of an alleged list of soldiers detained in lock up.

Pte. E Tumusime in his affidavit denied knowledge of Pte. Barigye and of being imprisoned as claimed by Barigye. He voted in Kanungu and not Mbarara. Pte. Kizza Moses contradicts the Brigadier on when Barigye joined the army. The Brigadier seems to imply that barigye joined in July 2005 whereas Pte. Kizza swore that he met Barigye during air defence course in October, 2004 at Nakasongola. However Kizza denied being involved in election malpractices in Mbarara. He also denied being imprisoned as stated by Barigye. Lt Byarugaba the itelligence officer, of 2nd Division, does not know Barigye and denied what Barigye attributes to him on voting day. Pte. Wandera Rogers supports Barigye to the effect that in 2003 the later was in the army undertaking basic training course and in 2004 they both went on training in Nakasongola from where Barigye went to Kadogo Community Polytechnic in Mbarara in 2005. He denies being involved in election malpractices or being imprisoned. Cpt. R.D.Ndyabagye does not know Private Barigye and denied briefing soldiers about voting as claimed by Barigye. He denied involvement in issuing voters cards and the arrest of Barigye and group as claimed by Barigye.

On the question of ballot stuffing and multiple-voting the evidence of Muhwezi J. (KakYEKKA polling centre) and Judith Komuhangi, in Mbarara District; of Asiimwe.I. Kasigaire at Nyakagyezi.I PS, (Kanungu District) of Bwire Swaib and Mubbala Dawson of Buseta subcounty, Pallisa District, and Kaigo Geofrey of Demgroup who saw people in yellow pickup and yellow T-shirts take over a polling station, where Mr. Mpiima Kolonerio, a presiding officer at Kobolwa Polling station was held hostage by people in the same numberless yellow pickup. According to Kaigo the group went to Kampala Trading Centre twice in the morning, the group ordered voters to vote for only the 2nd respondent and Namuyangu. In the afternoon, they returned, took over the station and ticked ballot papers in favour of R2 and Namuyangu.

According to Mpiima Kolonerio, these armed people in the numberless yellow pick-up-

"Alighted from the vehicle, locked voters inside (a classroom) and returned to the room where I was, held me hostage, grabbed the ballot papers and started ticking against presidential candidate Yoweri Museveni and Parliament candidates Hon. Jennipher Namuyangu and Kamba Saleh."

These candidates were on NRM ticket. Namuyangu contested on women MP ticket while Kamba was for Kibuku county, constituency. Because of double dealing I do not place much relience on Mpiima's evidence. But there are other witnesses such as Kaigo and Tumwenya who saw what happened. Mpima Kolonerio was infact also proffered by the Respondents. He modified what he deponed earlier on 15/3/2006 in support of the petitioner. By drawing another affidavit for Mpiima, the conduct of the respondent's counsel tantamount to perverting justice. Tumwenya was the Petitioner's supervisor in Kibuku Sub County. Kairaka Chris saw a presiding officer pre- ticking ballot papers in favour of the second Respondent.

In addition to Mpiima Kolonerio, the respondents produced affidavits of ASP Oyuku Jimmy Anthony, Pallisa Police station and Wairagala Godfrey. The latter's affidavit is to rebut Bwire Swaib's statements that ineligible persons were allowed to vote and that he (Wairagala) and Kaweru voted many times. He admits visiting many polling stations in Buseta subcounty to give lunch money to agents of candidate Lt.Kamba Saleh. He travelled in the same vehicle with Kaweru and Wampanda Stephen. The DPC just denies receiving a complaint from Bwire about conduct of Wairagala's group. Kaano Samuel replied to Mubbala's affidavit denying that as a Presiding Officer at Buyalya PS, he issued more that one ballot paper to any voters. Kintu Polycarp and ASP Bamunoba Ubaldo responded to the affidavit of Tamwenya Charles. Kintu was PO at Nanoko PS (Kampala T.C) where at 1.50pm men in a yellow pick up went and grabbed a booklet of ballot papers for Presidential and Parliamentary Candidates, ticked the papers and instructed Kintu to put those papers in the ballot boxes. After 20 minutes Tamwenya appeared and demanded to know what had transpired. It then started raining till the time of counting votes. When the RO arrived at 4.40pm, Kintu told him that he considered those ticked papers as spoiled. He denied being held hostage by the people in the yellow vehicle. Cadet ASP Bamunoba denied receiving a report from Tamwenya (the petitioner's supervisor in Kibuku subcounty) about what went on at Nanoko (or Mawako) polling station. He however responded to a telephone call report about commotion at Kobulwa PS where he found the Deputy District Registrary, the district CID Officer and the OC (police) Operations had impounded the vehicle of people causing the commotion. The Registrar had halted voting. That is the station where Mpiima Kolonerio was the PO. Indeed, Pabire Higenyi, the District Returning Officer, Pallisa District, confirmed in his affidavit that there were malpractices at Kobolwa, so he cancelled the election results of that station along with another PS. Higenyi swore his affidavit in reply to that of Anthony Adone who was the FDC Chairman in Pallisa District. The two affidavits relate to multiple malpractices. Both Adome (in para 11 of his affidavit) and Higenyi (in para 7 of his affidavit) agree that results of 2 stations were cancelled outright because of massive malpractices. They both also agree that in at least 5 other stations the number of votes received were over and above the number of registered voters. The results were therefore nullified. This evidence proves allegations of multiple voting in parts of Pallisa District.

Asiimwe Ivan Kasigaire in Kanungu District an agent of the petitioner at Nyakagyezi polling station in his affidavit talks about multiple voting by Councillor Margaret, by polling agents of the 2nd Respondent. Polling Assistants and the Constable were partisan and did the same, despite Asiimwe's protests. Biruingi Robert (PO) and his assistant Byarugaba .F swore identical affidavits (except for their names) by simply denying what Asiimwe stated. I have no reason to doubt what Asiimwe swore.

Ms Judith Komuhangi was petitioners polling agent in Lubiri K-L Polling Station, in Mbarara Municipality. In her affidavit she accused Cpt .Chris Ndyabagye, Divisional Intelligence Officer, Mbarara, for causing multitple voting and chaos at the PO. She also accused a Mrs. Bwita for causing ineligible voters to vote. As a result of protests by Komuhangi, there was a scuffle. It will be recalled that Pte.Barigye implicated this same Captain in multiple voting. In his affidavit, the Captain devoted most of his affidavit in denying Barigyes statements. He denies knowledge of Komuhangi and what she states in her affidavit and asserted that although he voted, thereafter he was involved in duties of Regional Election Security co-ordinating committee headed by RPC. I do not believe the Captain

There is Hon. Ekanya from Tororo District and Hon. Nandala Mafabi and Rev. Phabiano Muduma who swore about what took place in Sironko District. There are affidavits of Asiimwe, Mayombo of Nkikizi, in Kanungu District deponing about massive preticking and voting at night. Respondents offered affidavits of Mrs.J. Mbabazi, Hon. Amama Mbabazi and Muhwezi. L to contradicts these.

Oginga Godfrey was FDC chairperson, Kichwanba subcounty, Bushenyi deponed about what took place there. There is James Barungi Ozo of Kamwenge District. Ozo was FDC elections monitor in Kyenjojo and Kamwenge Districts where he was terrorised by GISO and LDU armed groups who were accompanied by a man in an NRM T-Shirt.

The European Union Observers report (R2), annexed to Dr. Kiggundu's affidavit, shows that although these observers did not cover all the districts of Uganda, there was evidence of violence, threats thereof and intimidation as well as lack of level playing field.

There are many affidavits in further support of intimidation and violence. Samples are the affidavit of the Abdu Katuntu in Iganga District, and of the aforementioned Barungi Ozo. There is the affidavit of Augustine Ruzindana supported by affidavit of Dr. Katebariwe and Bisimaki in Ntungamo District. In that District we have affidavits of Karugaba Charles, Bakalema James, Kagumire, Alex Kamuhangire, Ssali Mukago, Kanyesige Kato and Kagonyera Constance. They all speak of harassment and, in some instances, assault and arrest by Hon. Mwesigwa Rukutana. He swore an affidavit in reply and infact admitted that Karugaba, Bakalema and Kamuhangire were arrested on 22/2/2006 by the ISOs and one of his own employees Kidokori allegedly because they were bribing voters or issuing FDC agents Appointment letters. The Hon. Mwesigwa Rukutana admits that on voting day, he caused these people to be transferred to and detained at Ntungamo Police Station. Kagonyera and Ssali Mukago in their affidavits talk about multiple voting, underage voting and violence by Mwesigwa Rukutana who indeed slapped A Taryatemba, the petitioner's agent, at Kanungu parish polling station, causing Kagonyera and Turyatemba to run away. Ssali Mukago was the petitioners coordinator in Bushenyi county (Constituency) Ntungamo District of which Hon. Mwesigwa Rukutana was the sitting MP and was seeking re-election. Ssali visited many polling stations where he noted malptractices such as multiple voting, underage voting and lack of secrecy and noted the chasing away of FDC agents. Though Hon. Mwesigwa Rukutana denies wrong doing, he, as stated earlier, admitted being involved in causing three deponents to be transferred to Ntungamo police station. He admitted his presence at Kagugu market polling station where he engaging in hot arguments with Bakulu Mpagi (RO), and an FDC agent Turyatemba about voting malpractices. I believe Ssali and Kagonyera in what they state and I find as a fact that the Hon.Mwesigwa Rukutana was involved in malptractices. The respondents offered the evidence of Bajungu Natuyamba, GISO Katsigazi Francis and Mugaiga of PPU to contradict Dr. Katebariwe. As shown later, Katebariwe's evidence is credible. Nathan Nandala Mafabi from Sironko District is supported by Rev. P. Muduma about intimidation and multiple voting in the same Sironko District. The affidavit of Jack Sabiti is supported by Rukandema, D.Katwakura.A in Kabale District. Mushebo, Nafula, Nabulayo, Khaitsa and others deponed about Musoola, in Bungokho, in Mbale

District. They were terrorised and intimidated by military personnel led by Mr. Joram Mayatsa, NRM Mbale District Chairman before and during election day. In his reply Mr. Mayatsa and Nashawo James Wateya, (a PO), denied the allegations. Mayatsa admitted that he was escorted by an armed police man. He makes no attempt to justify why he had to be escorted by an armed policeman, if election was being conducted under conditions of freedom or fairness. Indeed, Wateya contradicts Mayatsa by claiming that Mayatsa never went to his (Wateya's) polling station with an armed policeman.

As stated earlier, intimidation was widespread in the country. I have mentioned some of the witnesses in Mbarara District. Ms Damali Nagawa deponed about what happened in Mbarara. She was FDC Coordinator for Ruti Ward in Nyanutanga Division, Mbarara District. On 23/2/2006, she left home at 6.00 a.m for distribution of appointment letters to FDC polling agents and assign the agents to respective polling stations. She was in the company of an LC I Chairman. When she reached Ruti Trading Centre, she met with a GISO man and LDUs on a pick up. The GISO man told her that it was illegal for her to move around before 7.00 a.m. The LCI Chairman run away while Nagawa was arrested and taken to Mbarara Police Station where she was detained with about 300 other FDC supporters until 3.00 p.m when Charles Atanba, Stephen Katembeya and Edith Byanyima intervened before the group was released by the Police!!

Although Nagawa did not name the GISO man, he is Mpairwe Moses who is in charge of the Division. He responded to Nagawa's affidavit. According to him, on 23/2/2006 at about 5.00 a.m he received a phone message to the effect that Nagawa "was involved in the distribution of sugar to voters." He and his "constables" intercepted Nagawa who was in the company of an LC I official. The LCI man "took off" on his motorcycle. Mpairwe and group asked Nagawa where she was coming from and where she was going. According to him, Nagawa rudely responded telling him it was none of his business. But she stated that she was distributing appointments letters to FDC polling agents, although she did not have those letters. All returned to Nagawa's home where they found two ladies who said they were waiting for Nagawa to assign them duties. Mpairwe and his group took Nagawa and the two ladies to LCI Chairman. The latter sighted the group and disappeared. He then consulted DISO (District Internal Security Organisation) officer and took Nagawa and the two women to Police. The OC, Mbarara Police Station also replied to Nagawa's affidavit and deponed that it is true Nagawa was one of the people who were arrested and taken to police on 23/2/2006 on allegations that she was one of the people involved in bribing voters. The OC denied that there were 300 people detained. He admits that Nagawa was eventually released because there was no merit in the complaint against her!!

Clearly the evidence of Nagawa has been substantially corroborated by the response from GISO and the OC. What the Nagawa evidence establishes is that in Mbarara, some FDC supporters and agents were intimidated and harassed even as late as on voting day. The OC does not really indicate the time of release but the time given by Nagawa must be accepted. The Nagawa incident and these affidavits of many other witnesses to intimidation by ISO security officers appear to point to the fact that ISO was heavily involved in intimidation of opponents of the 2nd respondent who happened to be the incumbent president under whose office is ISO (Internal Security Organisation) run. If such an incident occurred in one place or two or even three separate places, I would treat those as isolated incidents of some enthusiastic officials. In the case of Nagawa, Mr. Mpairwe, a Gombolola ISO Officer, his District Officer who gave orders for the arrest and detention of Nagawa, meaning that ISO was heavily involved in the elections.

Thus in Bushenyi District, Twinomujuni Appollo was FDC Chairman in Bihanga Subcounty. He cordinated and deployed polling agents for FDC. On polling day, at Nyakaziba polling station, he found Gilbert Bintabara, an ISO official with other men carrying guns and these men were threatening and telling voters to vote for the 2nd respondent. He chased away FDC polling agents and dared Twinomujuni to do whatever he wanted about it. When Twinomujuni tried to prevent Rutankundira, LC3 Movement Chairman from multiple voting, Byamugisha Gerevasio, a GISO pushed Twinomujuni away. After voting Bintabara ordered FDC agents "to sign declaration forms if they wanted their lives" One Babigumura Peter a PO at Nyakaziba is among those who replied to Twinomujuni. Although he denied the presence of Twinomujuni at Nyakaziba, he admits the presence of Gilbert Bintabara (ISO), of GISO Byamugisha Getevasio and LC3 NRM Chairman C. Rutankundera. He did not see any of the three men do what Twinomujuni ascribed to them except that the GISO man Byamugisha spoke to the polling agents. On his part, GISO Byamugisha claimed he was in-charge of his sub county where he monitored security situation on the polling day and that indeed he visited Nyakiziba polling station and talked to polling agents who reported no problem. He denied that Bintabara had guns nor threatened people. He denied meeting Twinomujuni at polling station nor pushing him. He only met Twinomujuni in the evening at the subcounty where poling materials from different polling stations were being collected. Neither Byamugisha nor Babigyeni have provided any reason why Twinomujuni should implicate them. I believe Twinomujuni's version of what happened.

Again there is the affidavit of Turyasungura Joseph of Nyabirerema, Rukiga constituency of Kabale District. He was a campaign agent for the petitioner for the presidency and for Jack Sabiiti for the constituency.

On polling day at Kakatenda polling station, he saw Rubaramira Bernard, Mrs Kabarisa and Apollo Nyegamehe giving money to voters and urging them to vote for the 2nd Respondent. When he intervened, LDU Commander, Buherezo, who was accompanied by four other armed LDUs chased him away. Shortly after, Pte. Byamugisha, of the Directorate of Military Intelligence arrived driving a double cabin pick up carrying Lt. Kakooza and two other soldiers who were brandishing pistols. These army men grabbed Turyasingura, beat him up and dumped him on the pickup and drove to and kept him at Kabale police station where he was detained till evening where he was released when the voting was over.

As the army men drove away, they telephoned some one and reported to have got hold of a big fish. Turyasingura deponed that his arrest caused many FDC supporters to go into hiding. A similar story is told by Kainamura of Nyabirerema parish who was picked by armed men at Kabaare polling station dumped on a pickup and driven to and detained at Kabale police station till after the voting. I must mention that these two deponents are among the 11 deponenets to whose affidavits Mr. Nkurunziza objected on the ground that the affidavits were disowned by advocate Mwene Kahima and that they contravened S.64 of Advocates Act.

Mr. Apollo Nyagamehe was NRM District task force in charge of NRM agents in Bukinda Subcounty. He denied statements by Jack Sabiiti and Turyasingura that he together with Rubura Rubaramira, Mrs. Kabirisa bribed voters with money, sugar, salt and soap on 23/2/2006.

Franco Bindeeba was the Presiding Officer at Kabaare polling station. He stated that "there was no incident where Kainamura was picked up by armed men, placed at gun point and or placed on a pick up and driven away. He never saw terror and chasing away of voters."

Apollo Nyagamehe does not say whether Turyasingura was at the station stated in the affidavit neither does Franco Bindeba say so in respect of Kainamura. Mr. Kafeero Moses, OC, Kabale police station, claimed that Kainanura was arrested and charged on suspicion of bribing.

Interestingly, both Turyasingura and Kainamura produced police form 18 showing that they were detained but released on 24/2/2006 on bond where Jack Sabiiti and Rev. Fr. Gaitano were sureties for the two men. The police form (Bond) shows that the two men were charged with inciting violence and not bribing, as Kafeero claimed.

I believe the stories told by both Turyasingura and Kainamura. As I stated earlier, while giving reasons why their affidavits should be admitted, the alleged irregularity in the drawing and filing of the affidavits does not diminish their evidential value.

Turyamureeba Mande, an FDC Chairman of Nyakagabagaba parish, in Kabale District, depones about similar facts as Turyasingura. He coordinated election activities for the petitioner in the parish. On polling day he went to Kihorezo polling station to vote at 11.00 a.m. On reaching there, a pick up full of soldiers armed with guns and pistols arrived. Among the soldiers was Bosco. The witness was identified to the armed soldiers as FDC Chairman. The soldiers cocked their guns and "one of them put a pistol on my (witness's) head and arrested" him. He was put into the pick up which was then locked. The armed soldiers then demanded to know if there were any other FDC supporters. Voters were scared and said no. The soldiers ordered everybody to vote for the 2nd respondent. The witness was then driven to Kabale police station where he was detained overnight. He never voted. He was released on police bond the following day when again Jack Sabiiti and Rev. Fr. Gaitano stood surety for him. Advocate Mwene-Kahima simply denied drawing Mandes' affidavit. I discussed this earlier. I believe the evidence of Turyaimureeba Mande which corroborates the evidence of the other three deponents about threats, violence and intimidation of voters by soldiers and other security agencies personnel.

In Kanungu District a sample of evidence on intimidation is the affidavit of Byarugaba Charles who was Chairman of Kanungu District FDC task force.

According to this man, during the campaign period NRM put forth the message that voting for the petitioner meant voting for war and that failure to vote for the second respondent means taking the country back to war and misery. Ordinarily this could be characterised as exercising freedom of expression in a campaign period. However he deponed that NRM agents staged war films in the two towns of Kanungu and Kihiihi showing film wars of former presidents Idi Amin and Obote. During the film shows, the audience was given the message that not voting the 2nd respondent meant voting for the past days of terror and chaos. He claimed in his affidavit that on the eve of election, i.e, 22/2/2006, at 9.00 p.m, the police arrested him on his way home after meeting his party parish agents and coordinators. The police removed shs 687,500/=, $8 and 80 Euros from him. That this money was intended to be paid to FDC polling agents as lunch allowances for 23/2/2006. His arrest was announced by NRM agents through out that night on Nkikiizi FM Radio allegedly owned by Hon. Amama Mbabazi and he opined that this demoralised FDC supporters. The Hon. Amama Mbabazi responded to some of Byarugaba's statements. He deponed that the radio is a limited liability company and a commercial enterprise. That the NRM campaign in Kanungu District was based on the achievements of Uganda and the Movement Government and Programmes set out in the NRM manifesto. In para 13 he stated that the Kanungu District NRM task force did not stage films anywhere in the district showing wars of Presidents Amin and Obote nor sponsor broadcasts on Kinkiizi FM Radio to the effect that a vote for candidate Besigye was a vote for war.

Although Muhwezi Laban's affidavit is headed Reply to Affidavits of Mayombo and Byarugaba, the affidavit says nothing about the latter's affidavit. Muhwezi was the Registrar of Kanungu District. The affidavit is at page 52/54 of R's Vol.III. ASP Joab Wabwire, the OC Kanungu District Police Station also replied to Byarugaba's affidavit. He admits the arrest of Byarugaba at night and states that the police had received information that Byarugaba was driving around Rutenga Subcounty distributing money and hoes to voters. The OC states that at Rutega, he heard that Byarugaba "had distributed money and hoes to voters which we recovered and exhibited at police." Then OC and his team went to Mafuga looking for Byarugaba. They arrested him and on searching him removed from him shs 687,500/= which was exhibited. That Byarugaba was subsequently charged with the offence of bribery.

It should be noted here that the OC does not say he found Byarugaba carrying any hoe. He does not mention any individual from whom he recovered hoes or money allegedly given by Byarugaba. There is no evidence of any deponent saying he/she was bribed by Byarugaba. So the OC's evidence on bribery is valueless.

Elliot Kabangira swore as Manager and News Editor of Kinkiizi FM Radio. He echoes Hon. Mbabazi statements that Nkikiizi FM Radio is a private company. Kabangira, in para 5, denied that the radio station broadcast any announcements that Byarugaba Charles has been arrested or detained. He contradicted this in para 8 of the same affidavit by deponing that –

"Nkinkiizi FM included in its news brief on the morning of 23rd February, 2006, the news then that Byarugaba Charles had been arrested on 22nd February, 2006 and was in police custody as per the information from the police. The station has news in Runyankore Rukiga at 7.00 a.m, in Kishwahiri at 900 a.m and in English at 10.00 a.m."

According to this witness, the DPC had passed by the radio station and informed the witness that Byarugaba had been arrested and shs 687,500/= was found in his possession and was suspected to be for bribing voters. Here the arrest of Byarugaba is corroborated. The motive of the DPC reporting the arrest to a radio station manager is not easy to explain since apparently when Byarugaba was arrested, he was not found bribring any body. I have not seen any affidavit of any body claiming to have been bribed. I am inclined to believe Byarugaba that his arrest and subsequent announcement on the radio of his arrest was ill-motivated intended to cause fear and fright among supporters of the petitioner who could hear about the arrest. This is the gist of Byarugaba's affidavit.

I may point out that although Hon. Mbabazi and Mr. Kabangira say the Nkinkizi FM radio is a private limited company commercial enterprise, each was careful not to mention the shareholders of that private company nor the real proprietor(s).

As already noted Mr. Ekanya detailed what Mr. Fox Odoi, a Legal Assistant to the second respondent, did on the polling day in Tororo Town. This is how Ekanya describes the situation, in paras 10 to 13 of his affidavit:

"10. That on polling day Fox Odoi, the Legal Assistant of the second respondent terrorised voters in Tororo Municipality.

11. That I saw the said Fox Odoi armed with a gun accompanied by Local Defence Units blocking the road between Tororo and Mbale and forcing passengers out of the vehicle.

12. That I heard him order the LUDs to undress the passengers and to beat them up which LDUs did heartly using gun buts.

13. That the said Fox Odoi fired in the air and many voters run back to their homes and did not vote.

14. That he eventually dumped the passengers at the police station."

In para 23 of the affidavit accompanying his petition, the petitioner raises this incident and alleged that his supports were harassed, assaulted and intimidated by Fox Odoi. This allegation is proved by Ekanya.

There is no evidence proving or suggesting that Odoi did all these things to advance his own personal activity. In his affidavit, he states that he was on his own things. This things are not metioned. Mr. Fox Odoi, in his affidavit, down plays his activities. Some of the victims of his violence swore affidavits. One Epakasi Lawrence of Aukot village, Tororo District, swore such affidavit denying that he was assaulted by Odoi. However he admitted seeing Odoi together with "policemen" at the scene where the policemen arrested this unfortunate man and four other men. Epakasi claims he had already voted. Others were going to vote. After being detained at Tororo Police, he was taken to CID headquarters where he and the others made statements allegedly denying being assaulted by Mr. Odoi.

There are affidavits of Abenaitwe Ezera of Bushenyi to which are replies of affidavits by DPC Aguma J, Hon. Prof. T. Kabwegyere and Ntege. There is the evidence of Fred Kagumire, of Mbarara District and Edith Byanyima, in Kiruhura District.

Byanyima was assigned by the petitioner to supervise and monitor the polling day process in Kiruhura District. She deponed about what she noted, or what was reported to her by FDC agents, about intimidation, interference, in electoral process and chasing away of FDC agents from some polling stations. To her affidavit are replies by Musindi Rogers, a Presiding Officer, at Rusherere, Matsiko.H.E, an LC3 Chairman, Captain David Bashaija an LC5 Councillor, Kagaba Allen Mukyira, Rwakashaija S, George Kabagambe, LC2 Chairman, Mugume A, G.Byabakama, Kansiime.C, Presiding Officers.

At the risk of being lengthy, I will produce what Edith Byanyima swore about her experience in Kiruhura District and summarise the evidence of respondent's witnesses who replied to her affidavit.

1. That I was appointed by the petitioner to supervise and monitor the voting process on polling day in Kiruhura District.

2. That I travelled through the district and observed many irregularities.

3. That at Sanga and Kanyereru polling station there was no secret ballot as voters were required to openly tick the ballot papers at the first table.

4. That at those two polling stations I saw captain Bashaija who is also a Councillor Local Council V leading a group of soldiers and local defence units and overseeing what happening at the polling stations.

5. That I met several people who informed me they had not voted because of Bashaija and his men.

6. That at Rushere polling station the petitioner's agent had been chased away and ballot boxes were not sealed. When I protected to the presiding officer he too informed me the boxes had come without seals.

7. That at Omukatongole polling station I found the second respondent's agents seated on the same table with the residing officer John Mwesige and when I protested to him, he informed me the agents were very important persons in the area. I also observed that the ballot boxes were not sealed.

8. That at Rushonge polling station the Presiding Officer Justine Ingeine allowed underage persons to vote as well as people not in the roll nor holders of voters cards and that when I threatened to report him to police he stopped and said he would not repeat the same mistake.

9. That I reached Nyakasharira Polling station at 2:00 p.m only to find the petitioners agents chased away and so I appointed Mapozi and Kagezi and left. That when I reached the trading centre about 100 meters from the polling station Mapozi and Kagezi came running after me and informed me they had been chased as well.

10. That I went back at the polling station and pleaded with Matsiko Hope the councillor of the area to prevail on the presiding officer to be fair. When I went back in the evening to collect the declaration of results forms Kagezi and Mapozi both informed me that though they had been allowed to stand around, the presiding officer had refused to give the declaration forms.

11. That I reached Kirihura polling station at 3:00 pm and found that the petitioners polling agents had been chased away allegedly because they were not registered voters. That I appointed Mbabazi Allen and Matsiko Edward.
12. That I arrived at Rugongi I polling station and found the petitioners agent Zabandure Edward petrified. He pleaded to leave with me because he had questioned the ballot stuffing by Chairman LC.II Kabagambe Justus and has been threatened.
13. That I appointed Bakunde David and left with Zabandure. I later met Bakunde who informed me the presiding officer had refused to give him declaration forms.
14. That at Malina polling station the petitioner's agents refused to sign the declaration forms because of the ballot stuffing."

Musindi Rogers, a PO for Rushere PS, in his reply to Byanyima's affidavit stated that what the latter deponed in para 6 is false and that he never saw Byanyima at his PS. Although he claimed in para 7 that no agent of the petitioner came to the PS, he in effected contradicted himself when he stated in the next paragraph that "the only person I saw representing the petitioner was Kagumire Fred who came at 2.30 p.m and asked about presence of any agents of the petitioner. Musindi does now tell us the answer he gave to Kagumire about the petitioner's agents. Matsiko Hope Eric, an LC.III Chairman of Keshunga subcounty deponed that what Byanyima stated in Paras 7,8 and 10 of her affidavit is false.

What is stated to be false in para 7 is the name of the presiding officer. While Byanyima mentions Mwesige, the LC.III Chairman mentions Tumwesige. As regards para 8 of Byanyima's affidavit, the Chairman claims that there was no polling station called Rushonge and that he does not know one Justice Ingeine. Byanyima deponed that the PO at Rushonge was Justine Ingeine who allowed the underaged to vote. Although Chairman Matsiko denies that Byanyima pleaded with him to prevail over the PO of Nyakasharira III to be fair, he admits having a brief dismission with Byanyima there. He does not mention what the discussion was about. Byanyima stated that she discovered that the petitioner's agents had been chased away. She was forced to appoint new ones and so she appointed Mapozi and Kagezi. The Chairman admits that these two were agents but seems to suggest that they were not also chased away as stated by Byanyima.

Incidently the chairman's evidence seems to support Byanyima to the effect that she went around checking on PS and yet Musindi and some other PO whom Byanyima implicates in malpractices deny seeing her. Rushere PS manned by Musindi as well as Nyakasharira are in Keshunga Subcounty. It is improbable that Byanyima could visit Nyakasharira and leave out RushereI noticed that Akandwanaho Amoni, a polling assistant at Omukantongole polling station which is also in Keshunga saw Byanyima attempting to open ballot boxes there to check on sealing. This is evidence of the movement of Byanyima.

There is something peculiar about Chairman Matsiko. Although he swore that he was an LC3 Chairman and a registered voter, he does explain what was his role in polling matters which enabled him to know such particulars as names of polling officers and particular polling stations so as to be able to challenge Byanyima on these. Matsiko's activities support the concerns expressed by the European Union Observers in their report about the continuation of the old NRM system up to the election day, despite the fact that these elections were held under multiparty political dispensation and that this led to lack of level field. The fact that Byanyima implored him to intercede points to the influence which LC officials could bring to bear an elections.

Retired army Captain Bashaija David, is another one who responded to Byanyima's affidavit in paras 4 and 5. She implicated the captain in leading a group of soldiers and LDUs at Sanga and Karyerera stations to make voters tick ballot papers openly. The captain is an LC5 Councillor in Kiruhura District where he is also Secretary for Defence. He knows Byanyima but claim he did not see her at Kibega PS where he voted at 11.00 a.m. He denied visiting the two polling stations as stated by Byanyima. I think that visiting at Kibega at 11.00 a.m is no proof that Byanyima was not there at a different time. I have found no explaination about why Byanyima should falsely accuse the captain who by virtue of his post as District defence secretary would normally supervise the LDUs.

Rwakashaija.S. was a polling constable at Kanyerera PS on 23/2/2006 and claimed that he never saw captain Bashaija there, alone or with LDUs, nor was there open voting. Allan Kagaba Rukira was a Presiding Office at Nombe III PS which is at Sanga subcounty Hqtrs. He stated that there was no PS known as Sanga. He denied that voters ticked ballot papers at presiding officers' table as claimed by Byanyima. I note that although Kagaba asserts that there was no polling station called Sanga, Captain Bashaija referred to such a station. In any case Kagaba admits that Nombe III is at Sanga subcounty Hqtrs which probably explains why Byanyima calls it Sanga as does the Captain.

The other witness is George Kabagambe. Like Matsiko (LC3) Kabagambe is an LC 2 Chairman in Rugonyi Parish, in the same Keshunga subcounty. In effect he denies that he is Kabagambe Justus whom Byanyima implicated in threatening Zabandure Edward, a petitioner's agent who had challenged Kabangambe because he (Kabagambe) was engaged in ballot stuffing. The chairman denies knowing Byanyima. He swore that although he knows Zabandure, he never saw the latter at the PS. Kabagambe is yet a member of the old NRM retained up to election day. I note that because Zabandure, an FDC agent at Rugongi, was petrified by Kabagambe's threats, Byanyima substituted Bakunde David for Zabandure at Rugongi PS. The PO of the station, Basiime Boaz, in effect corroborates Byanyima. Although Basiime denies seing Zabandure, he accepts that Bakunde David was an agent of the petitioner at the station. Kabagambe simply denied knowledge of Byanyima. Neither Kabagambe nor Basiime deny seeing Byanyima at Rugongi Polling Station.

Mugume Arthur was the presiding officer at Karyaryera. He deponed that he does not know Byanyima and that he was a presiding officer at Karyaryeru but not Kanyaryeru referred to by Byanyima in her affidavit. This appears to be a typing error. Indeed both captain Bashaija and Rwakashaija refer to the PS as Kanyanyeru and Kanyaryeru respectively, while referring to the same polling station. The other witness for the respondents is Geofrey Byabakama who was PO at Rushere1 (A-L). He deponed that it is not true as Byanyima stated in para 6 of her affidavit that there were FDC agents at the station nor were they chased away. That only NRM and foreign monitors had agents at the station. He denied knowing Byanyima. That may explain his failure to recognize her. Akandwanaho Amon, alluded to earlier, stated that it is not true, as Byanyima says in her affidavit, that at Omukatongole, agents of 2nd respondent sat at the same table with PO. Interestingly, the actual presiding officer implicated by Byanyima does not appear to have sworn any affidavit denying being involved in the malpractices. It is chairman LC3, Matsiko, whose role in elections is not disclosed, appears to suggest that the name mentioned by Byanyima as that of PO is not correct.

Kansiime Caleb was PO at Rushare II PS where he arrived at 12.50 on polling day. This time is confusing. He denies that the petitioner had agents there as claimed by Byanyima. He denied seeing Byanyima at the station. Twongyereho Robert, presiding officer at Nyakasharura III PS, was the last of the respondents' witnesses who replied to Byanyima's affidavit. He admits that Mapoza (Asiimwe) and Kagyezi were FDC agents. He denies knowledge of Byanyima and does not know whether she visited his station or not.

Twongyereho is not honest. He denies seeing Byanyima at the station yet LC3 Chairman, Matsiko, says Byanyima was there and she held a discussion with him (the chairman) at that station. Of course the chairman does not disclose what the two discussed. I have no doubt in my mind that in the discussion Byanyima was pleading with the chairman to prevail upon the PO to be fair and to allow FDC agents to be present and do their agency work.

I have evaluated the evidence set out in affidavit of Byanyima and those of the tweleve offered by respondents. As I pointed out above, there are some contradictions and inconsistencies in the evidence of these witnesses of the respondents. Byanyima gives the image of a courageous woman who went about her coordinating work bravely in the Kiruhura district, the home district of an incumbent presidential candidate. I find as a fact that what she described is what happened and I accept her account and reject that given by the respondent's witnesses.

Kamateneti Ingrid Turinawe deponed about intimidation, violence and arrests of FDC agents and supporters in Rukungiri District. She annexed to her affidavit a letter from FDC Chairman, Rukungiri dated 24/2/2006 which is a summary of the complaints allegedly made by FDC to Rukungiri District Returning Officer. In varying degrees the complaints included arrest of FDC agents, making FDC agents to sign declaration forms before voting, deployment of Army by RDC, bribery and, distribution of salt and soap to voters, lack of secrecy during voting, refusal by POs to hand over declaration forms to FDC agents, unsealed ballot boxes and multiple voting. Kamateneti's affidavit drew responses from the RDC, Mr. Byabakama Charles, Nkurunziza Francis, District Registrar, District Police Commander, Okoti R. Obwona, Ntaho Frank, the returning officer/CAO, Zedekiya Karokora, the then LC.5 Candidate for Chairmanship, DISO Bwogi Hadge Asuman and Ruraka Byaruhanga George an NRM Subcounty chairman, Kebisoni.

I have considered the evidence of these witnesses elsewhere but the general drift of these witnesses for the respondents is that they deny what Kamateneti state. Some of them, such as Zedekiya Karokora, admit the presence of NRM money but he says it was for facilitation of NRM electoral work. Nkurunziza was at least honest enough to admit that there were some unsealed boxes, which were eventually sealed. This was done after Kamateneti and the petitioner personally had reported the matter to the District Returning Officer where they found Nkururnziza.

About more malpractices there is the affidavit evidence of Mayombo Dick, Rukandene, Byaruhanga Charles of Kanungu District to which the Hon. Amama Mbabazi, Mrs J. Mbabazi; Mr. Elliot Kabangira, Mr. Ben Rullonga (RDC) responded.

I have read the affidavits of Major Henry Matsiko and other deponents who challenged what the petitioner's supporters deponed on what happened in Kabale District. Major Matsiko refuted what Jack Saabiiti stated about the former's role in electioneering process especially in acts of intimidations, bribery and showing of war films. But the election observers' reports such as those of Commonwealth Observers team, Action For Development, Demogroup, FHRI, and Hurinet, tend to corroborate the facts deponed to by supporters of the petitioner on allegations, inter alia, of intimidation by soldiers and other security personnel. Perusal of affidavit of Byarugaba.C, David Dongo Katwakwora, Twinomukago, Vanice and Ensinikweri Godfrey for the petitioner and those of the Hon. Amama Mbabazi, Mrs. J.Mbabazi, Major H. Matsiko, Elliot Kabangiri for the respondents leads to a clear inescaple conclusion.

To quote the mild conclusions by Action for Development, they said-
"Generally, the elections were seen to be free but the whole process was not fairly done. There was unseen intimidation due to the presence of army since women were told that if they don't vote the incumbent, war would break. Citing many irregularities by our monitors in different polling station was an indication that the elections were not free and fair."

These pieces of evidence prove that the principles of free and fair election, transparency, etc, were trampled upon and were not complied with. Moreover the incidents cited by deponents are not isolated. If a legal Assistant to the 2nd Respondent, other soldiers, and Presidential Guard Brigade, LDUs, ISOs are involved in flouting the electoral law in very many districts across the country, the inescapable inference must be that this was an organised operation. At the material time the Secretary-General of NRM was the Minister of Defence. The second Respondent was the Command-in-Chief of the Army. In Western Ugandan, the evidence shows intimidation appears to have been the norm rather than the exception. I am unable to say that during a civilian election in Uganda of today security personnel such as ISO, PGB, LDU, on their own can cause army vehicles to rumble through some villages in such Districts as Mbale, Tororo, Ntungamo, or Bushenyi by accident. Similarly I can not understand how PGB, other soldiers, DISO and LDUs appear in sizeable numbers at polling stations where some of them threaten voters or direct voters to vote for the 2nd Respondent and members of Parliament contesting on the NRM ticket. Obviously the elections were not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in the Constitution, the PEA and the ECA. One certainly makes the same irresistible conclusion when presiding officers from many stations across the country encourage or force pre-ticking, ballot stuffing and multiple voting: The same conclusion is made when so much money is splashed around in payment to poor voters or giving such poor voters gifts. NRM of which the 2nd Respondent is the leader has been leading the country for many years even though as a political party or organisation, it was registered in 2005. Its presence and leadership was or should have been well known to the country and to the voters. The fact of introduction of multiparty election was known by NRM or at least by its leaders more than a year in advance of the elections held on 23/02/2006. So giving money and gifts around the country during the last one week or two weeks before the election day cannot be described as intended for just facilitation of NRM functionaries to buy such things as pens, pencils, etc. This must be money targeting the poor voters. In my opinion, this went against the principles of fair, free, democratic and transparent electioneering.

Even if the evidence of Pte. Barigye and of Major Ruranga Rubaramira is disregarded, the other evidence available does establish:-

(a) Violations of the principles of free and fair election, bribery, intimidation and violence and

(b) Multiple voting and vote stuffing. These contravened the law.

It was for the foregoing reasons that I concurred in the finding of the Court on the second issue and answered the issue in the affirmative.

Issue No.3

WHETHER IF ISSUE 1 OR 2 OR BOTH ARE ANSWERED IN THE AFFIRMATIVE SUCH NON-COMPLIANCE WITH THE SAID LAWS AND PRINCIPLES AFFECTED THE RESULTS OF THE ELECTION IN A SUBSTANTIAL MANNER

In my opinion, this issue and the next issue (No.4), pose and will continue to pose some intellectual controversy as long as provision of S.59 (6) (a) remain as they are now. That is why in the Presidential Election Petition 1 of 2001 there was a split of 3 to 2 and in the present petition there is split on the bench (4-3) in favour of the respondents. It is perhaps a test of the operation of a constitutional democracy.

I was one of the minority of three Justices who believe that answering this issue in the positive is based on available evidence. There is evidence of wide spread harassment and intimidation of (voters and supporters of the petitioner) by agents of NRM and members of security forces including intelligence agencies in such districts as Mbale, Sironko, Bushenyi, Kabale, Rukungiri, Kanungu, Pallisa, Iganga, Bugiri, (Kamuli), Kiruhura, Mbarara, Ntungamo, Tororo, Kyenjojo and Kamwenge. There is evidence of ballot stuffing, multiple voting, involving security and LC personnel. There is evidence of wide spread giving of money in very many districts as well as threats of war in some districts. Surely these must affect the results in a substantial manner. Evidence prove wide spread lack of fairness and freedom in electioneering and voting, let alone transparent counting of votes in some areas. Principles of fairness and freedom during elections were wounded.

On the 6th April, the answer of the Court read as follows:

"On issue No.3, by a majority decision of four to three, we find that it was not proved to the satisfaction of the Court, that the failure to comply with the provisions and principles, as found on the first and second issues, affected the results of the presidential election in a substantial manner."

The wording of issue No.3 is of course based on the contentions of the two sides as alleged in their respective pleadings. Those contentions are themselves based on para (a) of subsection (6) of S.59 of the Presidential Elections Act, 2005. This provision is identical to a similar provision in the PEA of 2000 which also split the court in answering a similar issue in Presidential Election Petition No.1 of 2001. The current provision reads this way-

"59 (6) The election of a candidate as President shall only be annulled on any of the following grounds, if proved to the satisfaction of the court-

(a) non-compliance with the provisions of this Act, if the Court is satisfied that the election was not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in those provisions and that the non-compliance affected the result of the election in a substantial manner."

Perhaps it is inappropriate to say that the Act laid down principles. Principles are read into an Act by interpretation. In other words, principles are inferred from the various provisions of the Act. Earlier in these reasons while explaining my views on issue No.2, I reproduced those principles as summarised in the 2001 Presidential Election Petition reasons for the judgment of the Court.

The question of affecting the result of an election "in a substantial manner" is the question on which we were divided. I must admit that the question is not clear cut. It is not obvious because first it appears to depart from what Article 104 says. In clause (5) of the Article, the Constitution states that-

(5) After due inquiry under clause (3) of this Article, the Supreme Court may –

(a) dismiss the petition; or

(b) declare which candidate was validly elected; or

(c) annul the election.

This clause does not prescribe that a decision of the Supreme Court shall be made on basis of substantial effect. It can be argued that because Parliament was given power to make laws about the election of a President, and annulment of the election, in enacting S.59 (6) Parliament obeyed the Constitution.

Secondly, by requiring that the non-compliance with the principles should affect the result of an election in a substantial manner, members of the court are driven, I think, into applying subjective tests which can even involve moral judgment. Perhaps S.59 (6) (a) in a way recognizes human frailty in the activities of mankind such as contesting for a political office.

The provision appears to me to imply a licence to candidates to cheat or flout the law but do it in such way that the cheating or flouting ought not to be so much as to amount to creating a substantial effect on the election result. The cheating must be such as can be tolerated by the courts!! This notion of substantial effect is found in the English law from which we drive our own law. The notion of "substantial manner" could be a recognition of many things. It can be argued that an election exercise such as that of a President of a country involves a lot of preparations by many actors. It can be agued that preparation for election should end soon or that the exercise even though it is done once in every so many years, it is costly and, therefore, some violation of the law need not be treated as fatal. Therefore a repeat of such an election is bound to cost the country more resources. As against these possible arguments, there are considerations of virtues of a free and fair democratic election. If the principles enshrined in our laws, and especially the Constitution, are properly observed during a free and fair democratic election, losing candidates and their supporters will surely be satisfied and, therefore, allow the country to develop peacefully. But if a presidential election is won through fraud, cheating or through the flouting of the law and the constitution, dissatisfied candidates and their followers may create instability and disaffection among the population. Allowing candidates licence to cheat even as little as cannot affect results would render the election exercise a farce, a play thing or frivolous. Indeed tolerating cheating and fraud in elections can imply that holding elections itself is not desirable or necessarilly. Yet proper election should give legitimacy to winners.

On the question of standard and burden of proof, I will quote what I stated in Election Petition No.1 of 2001. At page 124 of my typed judgment, I said when referring to the 2000 PEA provision similar to present S.59 (6) (c) –

"I think it is safer to apply the words (of the statute) themselves and say that the standard of proof required to nullify an election of a president after a presidential election, must be proof to the satisfaction of the justices trying the petition, namely proof so that the trial justices are sure that on the facts before them, one party and not the other party is entitled to judgment."

Whether a petitioner has discharged the burden or not will invariably depend on the evidence adduced by the petitioner. For instance, I think that in cases of commission of an electoral offence or an illegal electoral practice where proof of such offence justifies nullification of the election of a president, the burden of proof might be lighter than the burden of proof that non-compliance with the provisions of PEA affected election results in a substantial manner. I say this because in the former case evidence in proof of a single case of bribery will suffice while in the latter case evidence must be adduced in respect of many incidents. The difference may possibly be on whether burden of proof is the same as the standard of proof.

Fortunately this Court is not the only Court faced with such a task in election matters. Other courts, both within Uganda and outside Uganda, have faced similar tasks. See the Uganda case of Ojera Vs Returning Officer (1962) EA 532(U) and Tanzania case of Bura Vs Sarwatt (1967) EA 234 (T) and to some extent Morgan & Others Vs. Simpsons (1974) 3 ALL E.R. 722 especially the judgment of Lord Denning, MR. See also the Nigeria Court of Appeal decision in Alhaji Mohamed Dikko Yusuf and others Vs. Oluseguri Aremu Akikiota Obasanjo and 53 others, CA/A/EP/1/2003. All these decisions arise from similar law which has its origin from the English law.

Be that as it may, by answering yes to both the first and the second issues this Court acknowledged violations of some relevant sections of ECA and the PEA and the principles underlying those sections. I have already given my reasons in support of the answer to both issues 1 and 2. I cited some of the Districts across the country where violations occurred. I also mentioned some witnesses from both sides in support of the petitioner or the respondents.

So how does a judge arrive at the conclusion, as I did, that non- compliance affected the result in a substantial manner? Or how does a judge arrive at the conclusion that the non-compliance did not affect the election results in a substantial manner? I think that before answering these questions, a judge must evaluate and appraise all the evidence of both sides not only in relation to this issue but also to the first two issues in order to reach his own conclusions. Would a judge in a constitutional democracy by annulling an election be interfering with a decision made by voters who are given power to choose who is to govern them? I think that Judges have a constitutional duty to annul an election where there is clear evidence of patent violations of the principles of free and fair democratic election such as the evidence of intimidation, threats and violence or the violation of the principle of one man one vote or the violation of the principle of transparency? On 23/2/2006, the voting day, in midmorning, voters are roughed up, arrested while on the way to voting and taken to police station and detained as happened in Tororo, by an apparently important official such as Fox Odoi. Similar incidents were carried out in many districts in Western Uganda. What effect does this have on those voters who have not voted or who are on their way to voting stations but hear about these?

There is a view that because in 2001, by a decision of 3 to 2, this Court answered a similarly worded issue in the negative, therefore, all of us on this court, are bound to answer the third issue in this Presidential Election Petition in the negative. Indeed, Mr. Ogalo Wandera, for the petitioner urged us to depart from the decision of 2001. He relied on Art. 132 (4). With respect, I do not agree. First the doctrine of binding precedent is set out in Art.132 (4). That relates to our exercise of appellate jurisdiction. In this petition, we are sitting as a trial court to exercise special jurisdiction conferred on us by Article 104 [especially clause (5) thereof]. Moreover as a trial court we must decide the petition on the basis of all the evidence tendered before us in this particular petition. Each case is decided on its own facts.

What must be understood is that in this petition even though by coincidence the parties are the same as those in 2001 and the issues are framed in identical terms, in reality we have evidence from vastly different witnesses, except the petitioner and the 2nd respondent.

I think that here our decision does not rotate around settling a law. It is about assessment of facts as set forth in affidavits. It is the evaluation of the facts and not the settlement of law which is at issue.

I can foresee a real possibility of an incumbent who won a previous presidential election petition, (or any other election) some how encouraging his or her agents to employ the same malpractices, or modified malpractices but similar to previous ones, in order to win an election. He/she will be advised that he and his agents are in order to do any similar thing, however wrong, to win election because that thing was done previously and was accepted as proper by the Supreme Court of Uganda.

Another point is that whereas in 2001 only five of us sat, this time the full court is participating.

I now proceed to examine the evidence as adduced through witnesses' affidavits and the observers reports to show how non-compliance with the principles affected the results. As I hinted, there are many affidavits containing facts which cut across all the four issues.

In my opinion the non-compliance with the principles of the PEA affected the results in a substantial manner. In particular I think that-

(a) The principles of a democratic free and fair election were clearly violated substantially in that-

- There was no level playing field between the petitioner and the second respondent. All election observers and monitors agree on this.
- It is remarkable that in areas where intimidation and violence were intense and extensive such as many parts in Western and Eastern Uganda, the petitioner got less votes. Examples are districts of Kiruhura, Mbarara, Ntungamo, Bushenyi, Kabale, Kyenjojo, Kamwenge, Kanungu and Rukingiri, and Iganga. This is reflected in results announced by Dr. Kigundu, Chairman of the Electoral Commission, 1st Respondent.

(b) The principle of equal suffrage, transparency of the vote and secrecy of the ballot were grossly undermined by-

- Multiple voting

There are very many witnesses who testify to this. So do the accredited election observers, both local and foreign.

Mr. Ogalo Wandera made forceful arguments in relation to the clause "Non- compliance affected the result of the election in a substantial manner," andurgued us to look at the nature of non-compliance. Learned counsel contended that non-compliance which negates the basic principles enumerated earlier in these reasons must be taken to have affected the results in a substantial manner. He opined that these principles are the yardstick of an election, i.e., the principles determine whether there was or there was no election or a gravely defective election. Counsel contended that the petitioner's evidence established disenfranchisement throughout the country contending that 38% of the polling stations had instances where voters were turned away which translates into 7000 polling stations. Turning away voters at such stations has substantial effect on election results because voters did not vote. In his opinion there is no need to make head count.

INTIMIDATION, THREATS AND VIOLENCE

Learned counsel contended that there was widespread intimidation of and violence against voters. Counsel asked us to take judicial notice of the existence of many FM Radio Stations and argued that these stations give a lot of publicity to murders of supporters of an opposing presidential candidate such as that which occurred at Mengo. He also argued that the recording, as was done in the recent presidential and general elections, of names by NRM officials of voters who are supporters of the opposing candidate can and does cause fear and this would be particularly so where those in charge of recording the names make threats to non-supporters of NRM, as happened in such districts like Iganga, Kamwenge and Kyenjonjo Districts.

In the alternative learned counsel submitted that if numbers are to be taken into account in respect of affecting results in a substantial manner, then the court should consider the effect of multiple voting and ballot stuffing. Counsel urged court to determine whether, in view of multiple voting, ballot stuffing and disenfranchisement, at the end of the whole process the votes of each candidate would have affected the results in a substantial manner.

He contended that the effect of all the proved irregularities greatly reduced the majority margin. He further contended that the petitioner's evidence point to a narrowing majority and that the majority of 9% on the part of the second respondent is in doubt. In this regard, counsel relied on the report of Dr. Odwee, a statistician from Makerere University, who explained in his report and his affidavit how the results of votes for the petitioner and for 2nd respondent were affected.

Counsel concluded that the petitioner's evidence proved his case to the satisfaction of the court and prayed that the court declares that the second respondent was not validly elected.

Mr. Lucian Tibaruha, The Solicitor General argued issue No.3 on behalf of the two respondents with particular reference to subparas (a), (b) (d) and (e) of paragraph 8 of the petition. He adopted the submissions of Mr. Nkurunziza generally on the value and relevance of affidavits in support of the petition. He also adopted the submissions of Mr. Matsiko, which the latter made when responding to Mr. Ogalo Wandera's submission on the 1st and the 2nd issues.

According to the learned Solicitor-General, the phrase "to the satisfaction of the Court" used in S.59 (6) of the PEA, means that the petitioner must adduce evidence to satisfy court that the evidence proves the allegations made in the petition. He contended that the evidence adduced on behalf of the petitioner does not establish the allegations so as to result in the annulment of the election of the 2nd respondent. He relied on the reasons given by the majority (Odoki .CJ, Karokora and Mulenga, JJSC.), in Presidential Election Petition No.1 of 2001(Col. Dr. Besigye Kizza VsThe Electoral Commissionand Museveni Kaguta Yoweri)

The learned Solicitor-General contended that in this petition, the petitioner should have indicated that the difference between the petitioner's total votes and the 2nd respondent's total votes were affected. According to the Solicitor-General:

(1) Numbers must be used to measure the effect of irregularities;

(2) The number of votes obtained by the 2nd Respondent, i.e, over 1.5 million votes, must be taken into account. The petitioner must show that irregularities affected this difference.

(3) Court must consider that the result of the election is that of the whole national constituency and not in isolated districts.

(4) Court must take into account the number of polling stations where irregularities took place in relation to the national total. 189 Polling Stations which is 0.8% must be related to over 19000 polling stations. He argued that 189 polling stations do not constitute "substantial."

The learned Solicitor-General contended that the petitioner failed to prove that there are any irregularities which affected the results in a substantial manner and so he urged us to answer issue 3 in the negative.

The evidence available shows that intimidation, threats and violence were perpetuated by a sizeable number of members of the security forces especially members of Internal Security Organisation (ISO), Presidential Protection Brigade/Unit, UPDF, LDUs and by NRM functionaries.

I have already referred to the evidence of some of the witnesses who deponed in the affidavits about intimidation, threats and violence. This is reflected particularly in the evidence of such witnesses as of Hon. Ekanya of Tororo District, Mr. Augustino Ruzindana, Dr. Katebariwe in Ntungamo District, of Abenaitwe Ezera the FDC Secretary- General in Bushenyi District as well as Mr. Byarugaba of Kanungu District (the latter two heard agents of the 2nd respondent talk of war if he looses). There is evidence from Kabale District of Jack Sabiiti, Kanaimura, Turyamureeba Mande, Katwakura Edward, Twinomukego Vanice, Rukandena, and Ensimkweri Godfrey and of Damali Nagawa of Mbarara District. A typical example of intimidation and threats in the form of terror and use of security personnel is given by Turyasingura Joseph, who was a campaign agent of the petitioner in Nyabirerema parish, in Kabale District. According to him, on 23/2/2006, he found Rubaramira Bernard, Mrs Kabarisa and Apollo Nyegamahe distributing money to voters allegedly to vote for second respondent. When he intervened, LDUs harassed him. A double Cabin Pick-Up arrived at the scene carrying Pte. Bosco Byamugisha of the Military Intelligence together with Lt. Kakooza and two other soldiers. It is pertinent to quote what Turyasingura Joseph stated in paras 5 to 11 of his affidavit-

"5. That in a short while, a double cabin pickup with private numbers being driven by Pte Bosco Byamugisha attached to Directorate of Military Intelligence together with Lt. Kakooza, and two other soldiers both in civilian clothes and brandishing pistols stopped at the polling station.
6. That the armed men asked for me and people pointed at me and immediately I was grabbed, beaten and dumped in the double cabin and driven away.
7. That Nyabirerema Parish of which I am an LC.II Chairperson is an over whelmingly supportive area for Col. (Rtd). Dr. Kizza Besigye and candidate Museveni did not have any votes in this area.
8. That through systematic bribery which I witnessed and my subsequent arrest and detention and intimidation of other supporters, candidate Museveni managed to get some votes which were otherwise Col. Dr. Besigye's votes.
9. That when these armed men arrested me, they telephoned to some people and informed them that they had arrested a big fish and the famous Kakatunda Polling Station was now finished.
10. That I was denied my right to vote like many others who supported Col. Dr. Besigye as I was incarcerated at Kabale Police for that whole day until I was released in the evening and a copy of Police form 18 upon which I was released on police bond is attached hereto and marked "Annexture PI."
11. That after my unlawful arrest, many of our supporters went into hiding for fear of eminent arrest and did not vote."

Apollo Nyangambehe an NRM member of its task force in Kabale District swore an affidavit denying what Turyasungura and Jack Sabiiti deponed about. He does not suggest any motive why he was implicated.

This is how Mayombo Dick, a petitioner's elections monitor in Kinkizi West Constituency, Kanungu District, describes what happened there in paras 3 to 11 of his affidavit. He refers to voting at night which hampered identification of voters, preticking, intimidation, open voting and interference with petitioners' agents as follows:-

3. That on the said polling day I noted that the commencement of the elections was very late as voting began after 1:30 pm and ended at Night Under circumstances that ware not favourable for proper Identification of voters hence enabling massive fraud aided by partisan polling officials.

4. That at Samalia polling station at 6.30 p.m, Mrs. Jackline Mbabazi instructed the presiding officer that voting should take place on the open table.

5. That the presiding officer called Muteraba insisited on secret ballot whereupon one Zepher Mugisha who was in company of Mrs. Amama Mbabazi Telephoned the Registrar called Muhwezi Laban who arrived immediately and took over the station from the presiding officer and sent away the presiding officer.

6. That Hon. Amama Mbabazi also arrived with soldiers escorting him and army vehicle No.H4 DF 669 6 armed soldiers also parked at the station and the armed soldiers surrounded the place causing terror and fear among voters and agents.

7. That voting continued into the night and Agents were unable to identify the people that were being issued ballots for casting on the lumps couldn't provide sufficient light.

8. That the agents for candidate Museven including Abdu Muhire were giving money to people and taking them to the ballot box and ticking the ballots in favour of candidate Museveni.

9. That the polling officials systematically invalidated ballot papers of known FDC supporters by pre-ticking candidate Abed Bwanika so that when FDC supporters tick on candidate Kizza Besigye the vote are invalidated.

10. That the RDC called Ben Ruronga also came at the station and intimidated the agents of Dr. Kizza Besigye to allow people to vote with out disturbance of FDC agents.

11. That because it was at night and presence of soldiers at the station caused constant fear in the population and the systematic bribery where voters were being given money and led to vote by candidate Museven's agents I saw candidate Kizza Besigye loosing his votes.

Mrs. Jackline Mbabazi and the Hon. Amama Mbabazi, Mr.Muhwezi Laben (RO) Kanungu, the RDC, Ben Rullonga, Beni Mutera and some other witnesses have deponed denying only where malpractices are pointed out by Mayombo - Hon. Mbabazi and Mrs. J. Mbabazi admit the presence of soldiers as being his bodyguards as Minister of Defence. Mr. Barageine James, a retired subparish Chief, claimed he was at Samalia Polling Station. He does not disclose his role which obliged him to stay at the Polling Station throughout. He admits the soldiers presence but says they never interfered. Barageine agrees with Mayombo that voting started at 1.30 p.m and went on after 6.00 p.m when RO Muhwezi went to the station and assisted the PO. This witness largely supports Mayombo on a several aspects of Mayombo's affidavit but only denies malpractices. His unexplained role at the station casts suspicion on his version. I accept the version given by Mayombo. While travelling with armed bodyguards is explainable, taking these armed military men to a polling station on a voting day was not explained satisfactorily by Hon. Mbabazi. On such voting occasions, one would expect plain cloth youths, supporters, to accompany a candidate rather than armed soldiers. S.42 of the Parliamentary Elections Act probibits the presence of arms close to polling station. So does S.43 of PEA. The intimidating presence of armed soldiers was undesirable and I think has effect on ordinary voters. There is no evidence suggesting any danger to the Minister so as to warrant moving with armed soldiers who hover around the polling station. This contravened the law.

In Kanungu District, many more witnesses in addition to Mayombo Dick deponed about intimidation. These include Asiimwe Ivan, Kasigarwe.

Let us look at what Mr. Abdu Katutu experienced in Iganga and Mayuge Districts in Eastern Uganda.

2. That I am the Chairman of Forum for Democratic Change in Bugweri County where I was the FDC Parliamentary Candidate in the February 2006 general elections.
3. That I am the FDC National Coordinator for Iganga and Mayuge Districts.
4. That in the capacities above I participated and supervised the FDC campaigns in both Iganga and Mayuge districts.
5. That I am well versed with what happened during the campaigns in both districts and more particularly Bugweri County.
6. That a group of armed men wearing NRM party colours camped at Busesa mixed Primary School and traversed Bugweri County campaigning for the 2nd respondent and Mr. Kirunda Kivejinja who was the NRM Parliamentary candidate.
7. That the said group was led by a one Lt. Mulindwa also known as Surambaya.
8. That they moved from village to village threatening and intimidating people who do not support the petitioner (sic) and Mr. Kivejinja.
9. That they assaulted a number of FDC supporters and several cases were reported to Idudi police post vide following references. SD/17/22/01/06, SD 18/22/01/06, SD 19/22/01/06, SD 15/31/01/06, SD 17/31/01/06, SD 31/01/06, SD 13/19/02/08 etc.
10. That on the 21st January 2006, they attacked Idudi trading centre and took away the effigy of the FDC presidential candidate who is the petitioner after assaulting a number of people. This matter was reported to Idudi police post.
11. That on the 22nd January, 2006, they again attacked Idudi trading centre assaulting many people who were being reported to them as FDC supporters.
12. That they occupied the town for 2 hours and thereafter left for Bugiri District.

13. That during the Idudi Siege, they continued shooting while others in their group were defacing the posters of the petitioner and myself.
14. That the group was armed with AK 47 assault rifles, pistols and sticks. Copies of photographs taken by myself are attached hereto and marked collectively as Annexture "A".
15. That I personally rang the Minister of Internal Affairs Dr. Ruhakana Rugunda complaining of the terror by this armed group.
16. That the minister promised to disarm them and ensure they leave Bugweri county.
17. That they temporarily left but returned about 10 days to the election date.
18. That they continued moving around in coaster vehicles but with covered number plates.
19. That on the eve of elections, they arrested two of the FDC campaign manager from Bukoteka village and detained them at their camp at Busese mixed Primary School.
20. That their camp or tents remained at Busese mixed Primary School even on voting day whereas it was also a polling station.
21. That on the eve of elections, they invaded Busembyata town council and arrested many FDC polling agents.
22. That the arrested FDC agents were tortured and maimed.
23. That the arrested FDC agents herein reported to me their story after elections.
24. That I make this affirmation in support of the petition to confirm that there was wide spread intimidation and torture of FDC supporters in Bugweri County, Iganga District.

S.26 PEA and and S.24 of the Parliamentary Elections Act were breached, obviously. These sections prohibit interference with electioneering activities of other persons.

Clearly Katuntu exposed the epitome of utter disregard and contravention of laws and principles on democratic elections.

As already noted, in Mbale District, a number of deponents swore affidavits in proof of the fact of intimidation, threats, violence and bribery and especially the use of military might to intimidate voters: The following sample of deponents swore affidavits in proof: Mulinda Robert, Mutonyi Juliet, Khaita Lofisa, Khaitsa Margaret, Mwayafa Deo and Mushebo Charles of Musoola TC in Bungokho County. According to these witnesses, during campaign and on voting day agents of the second respondent gave voters between shs 200/= and 1000/= urging voters to vote for him. That during January and February army vehicles moved around in their villages and this scared people. On 22/2/2006, there was frightening shooting in the villages. On polling day NRM district chairman, Mayatsa, moved with armed military police.

The respondents adduced evidence by affidavits of Mr. Kizindo Ibrahim Salum, Mbale District

Registrar/ Returning Officer to the effect that nobody reported any incidents of intimidation or bribery. Again Mr. Mayatsa Joram, Mbale District NRM Chairman, deponed that there was no intimidation by the army in Mbale as stated by Mutonyi Juliet and the others. As stated already he denied moving with soldiers but admitted moving with an armed police. He did not offer any explanation why, on polling day, he, as a politician, had to be escorted around by an armed police.

In Pallisa District, examples are Rev. Fr. Godfrey Okello, Mpima, Kafero Tanyebwa. According to Fr.Okello, he acted as a polling Assistant on 23/2/2006 at Buseta Subcounty. At 11.30 a.m a yellow pick up full of military men in Uniform came to his station and moved around the station. The men jumped out of the vehicle and beat up an agent of one parliamentary candidate. Fr. Okello was roughed up and was directed to tick ballot papers in favour of Lt. Kamba an NRM candidate. When he objected, the man of God was shoved aside and another polling Assistant was directed to tick the ballot papers. Other witnesses gave testimony to the same effect. Of course the respondent's evidence is that the results from seven polling stations in Pallisa were cancelled which is really an admission of what took place. The fact that military men brazenly roughed up a priest speaks volumes. Like his counterpart in Pallisa District, Rev. Phabiano Muduma was at Dunga Polling station, Sironko District. On the polling day, at 830 a.m, agents of the 2nd respondent and LCI chairmen, R.Gidudu and T. Kimasi, led groups of people who moved around polling stations violently chasing away both supporters and agents of other presidential candidates. Thereafter there was multiple voting.

James Birungi Ozo was an FDC Election monitor in the Districts of Kyenjojo and Kamwenge, in Western Uganda. In his long affidavit, he describes how he, agents and supporters of FDC, were harassed, threatened, roughed up in both districts by armed LDUs, GISO and NRM agents. Voters were threatened, intimidated, bribed and some agents of FDC were chased away. There were malpractices such as preticking and ballot stuffing and voting at night. He is supported by Mr. Charles Byaruhanga, an FDC candidate for Kabaale constituency in Kamwenge District. It seems the terror unleashed by NRM functionaries frightened voters. Both Byaruhanga and Barungi Ozo mentioned some names including those of NRM chairman in Kamwenge District who are said to have indulged in the electioneering and election excesses such as using security personnel like LDUs in harassing, intimidating and even assaulting FDC supporters and voters generally. Charles Byaruhanga and Ozo reported some of the incidents to the Police. The Kamwenge District Police Commander agrees that Byaruhanga made such reports and in two instances the perpetrators of assault were arrested. Byaruhanga and Ozo in their affidavits speak of NRM chairmen dishing out money. The two speak of ballot stuffing on voting day. Ozo implicated Bumbona, a GISO of Mahyoro subcounty and Katare LDU commander in Kamwenge District, Dan Byamukama and Abbas Mutesasira, a member of NRM Kamwenge District task force. Byaruhanga implicated Tumwebaze Frank (NRM Parliamentary candidate) Biryabarema (RDC), Rugumayo Moses, Byaruhanga.G. (NRM chairman) Karamagi (GISO) among others. Those implicated swore respective affidavits in which each denied any wrong doing. The GISO man, S. Karamagi, denied any wrong doing or bribing as did Mutesasira. Frank Tumwebaze, who was implicated in moving around Kabaale constituency accompanied by the RDC plus NRM Chairman Byamukama denied moving with these two. He blamed two FDC agents for assaulting Rugumayo, an NRM agent. Similary the RDC denied campaigning for NRM or moving with either Byamukama, NRM District Chairman nor with candidate frank Tumwebaze. He claimed that Byaruhanga's affidavit contains falsehoods. Rugumayo blamed two FDC supporters for assaulting him after a video presentation which showed the NRM achievements. Kamwenge NRM district Chairman Mr. Byamukama denied decampaigning the petitioner and denied any bribing. He swore that money given out was to facilitated NRM committees or agents. I have not read of any illmotive as to why they were implicated. They indulged in the malpractices and I so find.

At common law, a parliamentary election could be avoided on the grounds of irregularities by election officials, if the irregularities were so great as to prevent the election being a true election (Hackney case (1874) 2D.2 h.77 at page 81; Wood Ward Vs Sarsons (1875), L.R. 10 C.P. 733). This is in effect what the Solicitor-General contended. Later by statute, it was enacted in England that a Court, before declaring an election invalid on these grounds, must consider that the election was not conducted substantially in accordance with the elections law and the irregularities have affected the result: Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd Ed., P244. See especially page 261. When giving my reasons in support of the position I took in the Presidential Election Petition No.1 of 2001, I considered, among other authorities, the English Court of Appeal decision in Morgan Vs Simpson (1974) 3 ALL.E.R.722. Lord Denning, M.R., stated that the origin of the principle with which we are concerned here was introduced by an English statute of 1872. In the Morgan case, the English Court of Appeal discussed positions where number of votes matter and where they do not matter.

It is my considered opinion that neither decision of the Supreme Court of Zambia (supra) nor that of the Nigerian Court of Appeal in Obasanjo Petition (supra) are of help. In the Zambia petition the irregularities appear to have been negligible or trivial.

In the 2001 Presidential Election Petition, I expressed the opinion, which I would repeat here, that Courts and Advocates in this country who rely on the Tanzania case of Mbowe Vs Eliuffo (1967) EA. appear not to appreciate the following statement by Georges, CJ. It appears at page 243.

"We now come to allegations (a) and (b), which I shall deal with together, because they are closely related and they are the most serious allegations in the petition. Each of them would constitute an illegal practice contrary to the National Assembly (Elections) (Amendment) Act 1965. In particular as far as (a) is concerned, HAD IT BEEN PROVED TO OUR SATISFACTION IT WOULD HAVE GONE SO DEEPLY INTO THE ROOT OF THE WHOLE ELECTION THAT IT WOULD HAVE BEEN DIFFICULT, HOWEVER LARGE THE MAJORITY MIGHT HAVE BEEN, TO SAY THAT IT DID NOT AFFECT THE RESULTS OF THE ELECTION."

Here Chief Justice Georges was referring to allegations of threats by TANU youth wingers which the petitioner in that case failed to prove by evidence. That in my view is not the case in this petition. Here threats, intimidation and actual violence were meted out to the petitioner's supporters which was in some cases splashed out by the press as in the case of Lt. Magara killings at Mengo and that of assault by Lt. Col. Bugingo at FDC Headquarters in Najanankumbi as well as that of Mr. Fox odoi, the Legal Assistant to the 2nd Respondent. The first killed supporters of the petitioner. The second assaulted a very prominent member and official of the petitioner's party in full view of TV cameras. The third assaulted and fired a gun in the presence of supporters of the petitioner.

According to the affidavits of supporters of the petitioner,

Bushenyi District, is one of the districts in Western Uganda where various malpractices took place. Abenaitwe Ezra was the FDC District General Secretary. Though he made general statements in his affidavit, he deponed that he witnessed incidents of intimidation, overnight campaigns, by agents of the 2nd Respondent spreading war propaganda especially through war films that war will break out if the Petitioner was elected President. That the mobile film shows exhibited war scenes during which voters were told that war would break out if the petitioner was voted into power. That these shows were organised by Hon. T Kabwegyere, MP, Igara West, Dr. Ndahuura Richard, MP, Igara East and Hon. Karoro Okurut Mary, women MP for Bushenyi District. Abenaitwe deponed that he reported this matter to the District Police Commander, Bushenyi, and the Electoral Commission (1st Respondent) who caused the shows to stop. He deponed that one Basajjabalaba told voters that they should not vote for the petitioner because he suffers from AIDS and would collapse during the campaigns. Basaijabalaba confirmed this in para 8 of his own affidavit. Abenaitwe further deponed that supporters of the 2nd Respondent gave money to voters and asked them to vote for the 2nd Respondent and that (presumably on polling day), "Nkuruho staged himself at entrance of one polling station" telling voters to vote the 2nd Respondent. So Abenaitwe reported this to police whereupon the District Police Commander told Nkuruho to stop.

This witness does not name dates and places when and where he witnessed the various incidents. But he is supported by affidavits in reply. One of the Respondents' witnesses who reacted to Abenaitwe's affidavit is ASP Aguma Joel, the District Police Commander, (DPC) Bushenyi District. He was very cautious in his affidavit where he deponed that he had not seen or heard of any report regarding Nkuruho's activities as stated by Abenaitwe and he denied that he told Nkuruho to stop what he was doing. The DPC admitted, though, that one night he received a telephone call from a "General Secretary of FDC" complaining that there was campaign going on at night at a Taxi Stage in Bushenyi Town. The DPC went to the Taxi Stage in Bushenyi Town where he saw many people watching a film show but he "did not find there any known candidate either in the Presidential or Parliamentary elections addressing the gathering." As what follows illustrates, the DPC does not appear to be truthful in this.

On his part, Professor T. Kabwegyere, MP, deponed that part of Bushenyi Town is in his Constituency and that what Abenaitwe referred to as a film show was in fact a musical performance which was shown before election day. He attended and during the performance, members of the audience danced. According to Hon. Kabwegyere "the musical recording, inter alia, depicted pictures of Uganda's history, the NRA struggle during 1981 – 1985 period, economic and social developments by the Government since 1986". He denied addressing the audience nor did he urge the audience to vote the 2nd Respondent.

Dr. Richard Nduhura also deponed that part of Bushenyi Town is in his constituency of Igara East. Prior to election day, he attended "a show of the musical album by Kads Band" in Bushenyi Town from about 7:30 p.m. to about 8:15 p.m. During the show he danced to the music with the audience. He greeted a number of people in the audience but did not address the audience and did not urge the audience to vote for 2nd Respondent.

Hon. Mary Karoro Okurut was at the time contesting for Bushenyi Women District Parliamentary seat and was a sitting MP for the same. She was an agent of the 2nd Respondent during the Presidential election period. She denied intimidating any body or campaigning at night nor was she aware of any of the agents of the 2nd Respondent who did so in Bushenyi District. She never spread any propaganda that war would break out if the Petitioner won the Presidential elections. In paragraphs 8 and 9 of her affidavit, this is what she stated-

"8. The shows referred to in paragraph 10 of the said affidavit (of Abenaitwe) were staged by Mr. Willy Kamukama, the proprietor of Kads Band, which produced a musical album which was screened during the said shows.

9. That the said album which is recorded on a DVD is commercially available and among others it depicts the following:

(i) Uganda's turbulent past history

(ii) Achievements by the NRM Government which included schools, roads, electricity, e.t.c.

(iii) Mistreatment of civilians at Road blocks by armies of previous regimes

(iv) Episodes during the bush war between 1981 to 1985"

She denied that the shows were shown late at night. She attended one of such shows between 6:30 p.m. and 8:30 p.m. She did not address the audience.

The proprietor of the Kads Band, Mr. Willy Kamukama also swore an affidavit to the effect that the band is based in Kampala and from 2004 to October 2005 it produced a musical video under the Kads Band called KISANJA ALBUM. In paragraph 7 to 11 he deponed as follows:

"7. That message in the said album was to remind Ugandans of the past with the view that, they should avoid wars and maintain stability which the country has enjoyed since 1986.

8. That I have read an affidavit of Abenaitwe and understood its contents.

9. That the said band staged various shows of the said band at Ishaka and Bushenyi using a mobile van.

10. That it is correct that the said album depicts WAR SITUATIONS OF THE PAST AND THE MESSAGE WAS THAT UGANDANS SHOULD AVOID WARS IN THE FUTURE.

11. That it is correct that Hon. Professor Kabwegyere, Hon. Richard Nduhura and Karoro Okurut attended some of our shows. The said shows were staged under the sponsorship of my said band and not any of the said persons".

(It is well known in Uganda that KISANJA meant the third term, the subject of this petition).

What the affidavit of Abenaitwe and the four, who replied to it, reveal is that there were video shows. Although Professor Kabwegyere and Dr. Nduhura appear to imply that there could have been one show, Hon. Karoro Okurut and the proprietor of the Band suggest that there were several shows.

According to Kamukama, production of the video was concluded during October 2005. However neither himself nor any one else indicates the dates when the several shows were staged save that the MPs say the shows were staged before election date.

Reading through the affidavits of all the six deponents, it is clear that the shows were staged during the Presidential and Parliamentary campaigns. Although the three Honourable Members of Parliament deny that none of them addressed the audience, with respect I do not believe them. The objective of the shows was certainly to promote the campaign of the 2nd Respondent and since the shows were staged in the Constituencies of the three Members of Parliament who were contesting on the same ticket as the 2nd Respondent, the shows were really intended to promote each of these candidates. I doubt Kamukama's claim that nobody sponsored the shows since he said the Kads Band was commercial band.

I cannot believe that any of the Members of Parliament would lose the opportunity to address the audience which was readily available. The District Police Commander was obviously not candid about what he saw and whom he found in the shows.

Court did not watch any of the shows. I can only comment on what the affidavits revealed.

From the affidavit of Kamukama and that of Karoro Okurut one can draw the inevitable conclusion that the shows painted the image that if the 2nd Respondent was not elected there would be chaos if not war. Showing a film or video about the achievements of the 2nd Respondent during campaign period is legitimate. But showing NRA bush war films, has more to do with instilling or pumping into voters fear, fright and anxiety. In that regard, Abenaitwe is correct in saying that the shows were intended to frighten, intimidate voters and to show that the election of the Petitioner would lead to war. A similar situation is portrayed by Byarugaba from Kanungu District in respect of Kinkizi FM Radio. Kanungu and Bushenyi are in the same region of Uganda.

Anybody who has watched war films can draw their own conclusions. For an ordinary person I think that watching war situations in a film during campaign for presidential elections, he/ she cannot avoid being fearful of and afraid of what the future holds if any other person is elected except the 2nd Respondent. The effect on the voter is obvious. Would the provisions of the Constitution and S.23 and S.24 of Presidential Elections Act permit such an exercise in the name of freedom of expression? I think not.

Other aspects about what went on in Bushenyi are given by different witnesses. Tibatisana Ephraim was the Petitioner's agent at Kyeibare Parish Headquarters in Ruhinda County, the constituency of Hon. Kahinda Otafiire, MP. According to Tibatisana, on polling day, Hon. Kahinda Otafiire arrived at the station in the company of soldiers and ordered agents to leave immediately. After pleas, he allowed agents to sit 40 metres away from where the presiding officer was. I may point out here that in its interim statement (Annexture 3 to Dr Kiggundu's accompanying affidavit) the Commonwealth observer group noted that "To a targe extent, the party agents were too far away to observe the checking of the register and identity documents properly". This supports Tibatisana.

Later Tibatisana was refused to vote by a presiding officer because he was an FDC agent. Tibatisana moved closer to the presiding officer and noticed that the presiding officer gave several ballot papers to some voters to whom he paid shs 1,000/= and asked to tick the name of the 2nd Respondent. Hon. Kahinda Otafiire in reply deponed that he visited the station at 10:00 a.m to check on the progress of voting. He denied being in company of soldiers. He talked to a police constable and the presiding officer. He never chased away the FDC and other agents as claimed.

I find no reason to doubt what Tibatisana deponed. I believe Tibasana that the Minister arrived accompanied by 3 soldiers. The effect of soldier's presence on simple voters mind is obvious. In any case, the presence of armed persons at polling stations is out-lawed by both PEA (S.43) and Parliamentary Elections Act (S.42). The armed soldiers had no business at PS.

At this juncture I return to the facts in the Morgan case which concern numbers and when and where numbers matter.

At a local government election at which a total of 23.691 votes were cast, 82 ballot papers were properly rejected by the returning officer. Forty-four of those papers were rejected because they had not been stamped by polling clerks with the official mark as required by the local election rules. The 44 unstamped ballot papers had been issued at 18 different polling stations. Despite notices displayed at the polling stations, directing voters to see that ballot papers were stamped, the voters to whom the 44 papers had been issued had not noticed that the polling clerks had failed to stamp them. The returning officer himself had not been at fault. If the 44 ballot papers, had not been rejected, but had been counted, the petitioner, a candidate at the election, would have won the election by a majority of seven over the respondent. In consequence of the rejection of the 44 papers the respondent had a majority of 11 and so was declared to be the successful candidate. The petitioner sought an order that the election should be declared invalid under S.37(1) of a UK Act, the Representation of the People Act,1949, on the ground that it had not been conducted substantially in accordance with the law as to elections; alternatively that, even if it had been so conducted, the omissions of the polling clerks had affected the result.

The English Court of Appeal considered previous English decisions and facts of the case. It allowed the appeal and held that:

Under S.37 (1) an election court was required to declare an election invalid: -

(a) if irregularities in the conduct of the election had been such that it could not be said that the election had been "so conducted as to be substantially in accordance with the law as to elections," or

(b) if the irregularities had affected the result.

Accordingly, where breaches of the election rules, although trivial, had affected the result, that by itself was enough to compel the court to declare the election void even though it had been conducted substantially in accordance with the law as to elections. Conversely, if the election had been conducted so badly that it was not substantially in accordance with the election law it was vitiated irrespective of whether or not the result of the election has been affected.
(ii) Although the election had been conducted substantially in accordance with the law as to local elections, the omission to stamp the 44 ballot papers had affected the result of the election which would therefore be declared invalid.
Learned counsel for the respondents appear to rely on the difference of 1.5 million votes which appear to separate the petitioner and the second respondent to argue that even if the petitioner had proved non-compliance with the provisions of the PEA, the non-compliance did not affect the results in a substantial manner. The English court decision in Morgan case and part of Mbowe case (supra) are against that argument. The question that must be answered is the circumstances under which the 1.5 million votes were obtained. In this petition the non- compliance with the principles of the PEA was not trivial in the sense that it consisted of officials being ignorant of the law. I have already referred to evidence about wide spread intimidations, threats, violence, assault and harassment of supporters of the petitioner. I have referred to bribery. There is evidence from the 2nd Respondent himself in paragraphs 9 and 10 of his affidavit, sworn on 21st March, 2006, in reply to that of Salaam Musumba. I will reproduce these presently.

In my opinion the difference in the number of votes cannot be the only basis for deciding whether the election results have been affected in a substantial manner. Intimidation, frightening and instilling fear of war among voters cannot be measured, for instance, when it is widespread. These acts are wholly unlawful and forbidden by our laws and do affect voting results.

The European Union observers group, at page 6 of its preliminary report (R2), issued on 24/2/2006 explained how the second respondent enjoyed substantial advantage on the use of existing movement organs; this is how the report reads:
"Despite the adoption of a multi-party system, the movement structures remained intact, active and funded by the State throughout the election period. The President and his party (the National Resistance Movement Organisation) utilised state resources, particularly through the old movement structures, in support of their campaign, including use of government cars, personnel and advertising, and received overwhelming and positive coverage on State television and radio.

The NRMO and NRM with its organs share many of their senior staff. In many districts (for example Isingiro, Kyenjojo, Bundibugyo, Kamwenge, and Kabarole in the Western Region, all Buganda districts) they operate from the same offices. This situation occurred because the movement organs which had provided the organisational structure for the no-party-system were allowed to continue operations until the holding of the elections. Thus, through this existing Movement system the President and the NRMO candidates enjoyed substantial advantages over their opponents which went further than the normal advantages of incumbebcy."

And with regard to official media coverage this is how the observers report put it on the same page 6.

"The media monitored by the EU EOM, provided a variety of information and debate about the elections in general as well as the main candidates. This was reflected in a range of news coverage focusing on the main presidential candidates, which was complemented with talk show and discussion programmes broadcast on state and commercial radio and television.

However, in certain critical areas there were evident failings, most notably in the election coverage of the public broadcaster UBC TV and to a lesser extent UBC Radio. The incumbent candidate received 79.7 per cent of overall election related coverage on UBC TV, while the leading opposition candidate had 11.5 per cent and the remaining three presidential candidates received less than 9 per cent of coverage. UBC Radio's coverage accorded more airtime to opposition candidates, but the incumbent remained the candidate granted the largest percentage of access with 55 percent of coverage on the station. The limited resources, absence of production capacity in the news department and a reliance on programming supplied by the parties and candidates. Coupled with the wide access granted to the Presidential Press Unit, this resulted in coverage of the presidential elections that was highly imbalanced in terms of access to UBC TV in favour of the incumbent. Commercial broadcasters provided a far greater range of coverage of the elections and this is represented in far wider coverage of the main opposition candidates."

FUNDUNG AND BRIBERY ALLEGATIONS

The 2nd Respondent swore the affidavit first as Chairman of both the NRM political organisation and secondly as Chairman of the Central Executive Committee of NRM. He was sponsored by NRM to contest for the office of President. It is therefore logical to infer that it was in his interest that funds disbursed were to promote his campaign and his success at the elections. The second Respondents' statements in his affidavit and particularly the contents of Annexture R2 A1 appear to support Mrs. Musumba and other witnesses who deponed about bribery. She deponed in paragraphs

3 to 19 of her affidavit this way -

2. That I was a candidate in the recently concluded Parliamentary Elections (for the same seat).

3. That I am one of the Vice Chairpersons for the Forum for Democratic Change and was involved in the Presidential campaigns and also monitored the voting process.

4. That the whole Presidential campaigns and voting process was marred by bribery of voters facilitated by the funds released by the National Resistance Movement Central Executive Committee chaired by the second respondent.

5. That each NRM Village/Branch received Ushs.100, 000 paid in two instalments of Ushs. 50,000 each with the last one being paid on 17th day of February 2006 through Commercial Bank and received two days before polling day.

6. That there are 43,365 villages in Uganda and NRM released Ushs. 4,336,500,000.

7. That to each sub county task force NRM released Ushs, 400, 000 paid in two instalments of Ushs. 200,000 per instalment with the last instalment being received at the sub counties two days before polling day.

8. That there are 670 sub counties in Uganda and accordingly NRM central Executive Committee released Ushs.388, 000, 000.

9. That to each District task force the Central Executive Committee of NRM paid U Shs 4,000,000 in two instalments of Ushs. 2,000,000 each, the last instalment arriving at the District two days before polling day.

10. That there are 69 District and the central Executive Committee of the RNM dispatched Ushs, 276,000,000.

11. That to each NRM Parliamentary Candidate the party paid Ushs, 4, 000, 000 paid in two instalments each, the last instalment of Ushs, 2,000,000 being paid two days before polling day.

12. That there are 215 Constituencies and the central Executive Committee of NRM releases a total of Ushs. 860, 000, 000.

13. That each NRM candidate vying for the Woman District Parliamentary seat received Ushs.6,000,000 paid in two instalments of Ushs.3,000,000 each the last instalment being paid two days to polling day.

14. That there are 69 districts parliamentary seats and the NRM released Ushs.414, 000, 000 on its woman candidates.

15. That each NRM candidate vying for a municipality seat the Central Executive Committee of NRM disbursed to the thirteen (13) municipalities and five divisions in Kampala in two instalments the last being received two days to polling day.

16. That each NRM candidate vying for the local Council V seat received shillings 6,000,000 from the central executive Committee paid in two instalments of shillings 3,000,000 each with the last instalment received two days to polling day. With 69 district the party released shillings 414,000,000.

17. That each NRM candidate vying for a seat on the District Council received shillings 400,000 paid in two instalments of 200,000 the last such instalment being received two day before polling day.

18. That there 1340 council seats in the country and the central executive committee released a total of 536,000,000 shillings.

19. That to each NRM candidate vying for the sub county chairperson the central executive committee paid shillings 4000,000 in two instalments of 200,000 each with the last instalment being released two days to polling day. The committee released a total of shillings 268,000,000.

20. That to each NRM candidate vying for a sub county council seat the central Executive Committee of NRM released shillings 200,000 in two equal instalments with last instalment received two day to polling day.

21. There are two seats for each parish at the sub county and with 5314 parishes the central executive committee sent out shillings 2,125,600,000.

22. That to each NRM candidate for a municipality and city council seat the central executive committee released shillings 1,000,000 in two equal instalments with the last instalments received two days to polling say.

23. That there are eighteen municipalities and five divisions of Kampala city with varying number of seats."

Although Musumba's claims especially as to the amounts of money given out were rubbished by counsel for the respondents, she is substantially supported by Zedikiya Karokora, the LC5 Chairman elect for Rukungiri District. He swore an affidavit as witness of the 2nd respondent, to contradict the affidavit of Kamatenite Ingrid Turinawe who had sworn that there was bribery in Rukungiri District. In paragraph seven of his affidavit, Karokora wholly corroborates Musumba's paragraphs 16, 17, 18, 19 among others.

The second respondent replied this way to Musumba's affidavit.

3. That I am the Chairman of the National Resistance Movement (NRM), a political organisation, and the Chairman of its Central Executive Committee and I swear this affidavit in that behalf.

4. That neither I nor the NRM Central Executive Committee authorised or released any funds to bribe voters in the Presidential Elections held on the 23rd February, 2006 or any elections of whatever description as alleged in paragraph 4 of Musumba's affidavit.

5. That after I was nominated as a Presidential Candidate for the said Presidential Elections, I chaired an NRM Central Executive Committee meeting to plan out and put in place strategies for all NRM candidates' campaigns at national, district, constituency and local levels including the raising of resources for those campaigns.

6. That the Central Executive Committee, among other things, established a National Campaign Task Force chaired by the NRM Vice Chairman, AL Haji Moses Kigongo, to manage the overall strategies for the campaigns of all NRM candidates at national and lower levels, raise resources from our supporters and well-wishers, coordinate and generally supervise all activities relating to the campaigns.

7. That the main strategy for the campaigns was physical voter contact tasked to the NRM branch/village task forces throughout country.

8. That the primary responsibility of each branch/village task force was to persuade each voter in its area to vote for me and all NRM candidates from village to national levels, while the Parish, Sub-County, Urban, District and national Task forces would deal mainly with coordination and supervision activities.

9. That a national budget for facilitating all NRM candidates: campaigns was prepared and approved by the Central Executive Committee. The resources were handled at the Central Executive Committee level and disbursed to the level below through the districts by payment voucher documents. A copy of a typical sample of the said payment voucher is attached hereto and marked as Annexture R2A1.

10. That the figure indicated in paragraphs 6 to 23, 25 and 27 of Musumba's affidavit are not true. There was no such regular pattern of distribution. And disbursements depended on amounts received at Central Executive Committee level and the facilitation needs at the various levels.

11. That all funds raised by the NRM for the campaigns as deponed to herein were exclusively spent on facilitation of the campaigns as stated in this affidavit and no money was ever disbursed for the purposes of bribing voters as falsely alleged by Proscovia Salaam Musumba in paragraph 26 of her affidavit.

Thus although counsel for both respondents rubbished Musumba's affidavit as valueless basically because she did not disclose the source of her information, in this affidavit, especially the voucher, annexeture R2 A1, (post) the second respondent in reality confirmed the substance of Musumba's claim that NRM released a lot of money to all levels of its organs for campaigning.

The denial by the second respondent in para 10 of his affidavit that there was no such regular pattern of distribuation is contradicted by the affidavit of Zedekiya Karokora, LC5 Chairman elect of Rukungiri District. Karokora indicates in para 7 of his affidavit, that amounts reflected in R2 A1 are the amounts given out. The giving of money to voters has been confirmed in affidavits sworn by witnesses who received money, for example, several deponents from Musoola in Bungokho South constituency, in Mbale District, David Magulu in Kaliro District and also in Soroti and Tororo Districts. These are from the East of the country. There are deponents from the Districts of Kabale, Mbarara, Bushenyi, Kamwenge, Kyenjojo, Kanungu and Rukungiri (all in the West of the Country), Nebbi District in the North and Kampala in central. The various poll observers, especially Commonwealth and DEMGroup observers, all agree on the bribing and the giving of money during campaigning. The respondents tendered affidavits of witnesses challenging those of the petitioner's witnesses. In some instances the respondents' witnesses say they had money on polling day for facilitating their party agents.

The voucher R2 A1 says it all. This annexture was prepared on 17th February, 2006, just five days before the elections on 23/2/2006. It is not known when the intended disbursers received the money. But according to para 7 of Zedekiya Karokora's affidavit one of the receipients (Ruraka George) of such money received it on 20/2/2006, just 2 days before election. Even if it is assumed that the money was received on the same day,or few days after 17/2/2006, as in the case of Ruraka, releasing a colossal sum of Shs.81,850,000/= for mere facilitation (whatever that means) in a small urban District like Jinja is mind boggling. Of course Byarugaba, an agent of the petitioner in Kanungu, was arrested on 22/2/2006 while in possession of 687,500/= intended for allowances of agents of the petitioner. But as far as I know, nobody came out to swear that he was bribed with money or hoes by Byarugaba on behalf of the petitioner or of any other person.

I find it hard to believe that a political organization, like the NRM, which for all practical purposes has been in existence and had structures operating on the ground for many years, up to polling day, would find it necessary, at the eleventh hour, to rush such big sums of money to its various organs for mere "facilitation" of its functionaries. The money must have been intended to facilitate voters rather than NRM agents. That is what the second respondent implies in paragraphs 7 and 8 – by "physical voter contact" and the "responsibility of eachbranch/village task force was to persuade each voter in its area to vote for me."

The figures of Mrs. Musumba appear to be logical deductions from the information set out in the voucher. The core information is there.

The number of Districts, counties, constituencies, sub counties, parishes or villages are matters of which every one can take judicial notice.

On matters of payment of money, take the example of David Magulu from Kaliro. On 23/2/2006

Police hired his vehicle, so he could drive them on the election supervision work. According to him, on that day, Kaliro Police arrested Bwire Bakale P, the NRM District Treasurer, Musiba.S, an NRM agent, Basoga Saleh and Naizamba Wilber. According to this witness, these people who were giving money to voters were found with shs.800,000/= on arrest. Of course they swore affidavits denying that they were bribing voters. Magulu swore his affidavit which he signed on 18/3/2006. Strangely a second David Magulu (this time spelt as Maguru) swore another affidavit on 21/3/2006, which he thumpprinted, on behalf of the respondents attempting to disown the earlier affidavit, even though in para 4 of his latest affidavit he betrays himself by admitting that the names are his. However DPC Gerald Mbasa in his own affidavit, drawn by the same respondent's advocates admits, receiving a call reporting the buying of voters at Nawampiti mentioned by the first David Magulu. He hired an unnamed vehicled to take police to the scene. Police in fact arrested the four people mentioned by the first David Magulu. According to DPC, Bwire, the Treasurer was reported to be in possession of 329,000/= and police entered this in their CRB book. On his part Bwire admits the arrest and claims he was in possession of only 260,000/= from which he paid NRM agents, each 5000/=. Both Musiba and Basoga Saleh also admitted the arrest because of allegations that, they were giving out money to voters. The description of the vehicle driven by the first Magulu as a pickup is the same pickup as that driven by the second Magulu on same day and for the same mission. It was also a pick up though registration numbers differs a little. Surely in view of this what the original David Magulu said cannot be an invention. Where did the respondents get the second Magulu? Was the first Magulu forced to modify his views? The second David Maguru must be a liar and I reject his evidence.

As mentioned already, there are witnesses who deponed to the giving of money to voters. Candidate Charles Byaruhanga of Kamwenge District talks of this in Kamwenge District. Ozo talks of this in both Kamwenge and Kyenjojo Districts.

Exh. R2 A1 speaks it all and therefore, I must quote its contents:-

National Resistant

Central Executive

Plot 10 Kyadondo Road, Box 7778 K'la. Tel: 346295,346279 Fax 256363

PAYMENT VOUCHER No.DT1117

NAME: MZEE MUWUMBA SAMUEL

CHAIRPERSON JINJA DISTRICT

Date: 17-02-2006

Particulars	Amount
Facilitation to Village/Branch Task Force to procure pens, writing pads and refreshments during meeting to enhance the campaign effort. (395 villages in district x 50,000= per village)	19,750,000
Facilitation to Sub County Task Force to carry out campaign effort within their jurisdiction (12sub-counties in districts x 200,000= per sub-county.	2,400,000
Facilitation to District Task Force to carry out campaign effort within their jurisdiction	2,000,000
Party contribution to the NRM candidate for the seat of Member of Parliament 4 (constituency mp x 2,000,000=)	8,000,000
Party contribution to the NRM candidate for	3,00,0000

the seat of Member of Woman member of Parliament
Party contribution to the NRM candidate for the seat of Municipality Chairperson	2,000,000
Party contribution to the NRM candidate for the seat of LCV Chairperson	3,000,000
Party contribution to the NRM candidate for the sea of District Councillors (24 Councillors x 200,000)	4,800,000
Party contribution to the NRM candidate for the seat of Sub-county Chairperson (12 Sub-counties x 200,000=).	2,400,000
Party contribution to the NRM candidate for the seat of Sub-county County Councillors (149 sc/councillors x 100,000	14,900,000
Party contribution to the NRM candidate for the seat of	13,000,000

Municipality Councillors (26M/Councilors x 500,000)
Presidential Campaign rallies
Polling Agents (315) polling station x 8p'ple) x 5,000	12,600.000
Special Operations	0
TOTAL	87,850,000
REPARED BY: BERNADETTE DATE: 17-02-2006	AUTHORISED BY …… DATE:……..	PASSED BY …… DATE:……	RECEIVED BY …… DATE: ……

All these combined plus the use of money must surely have had substantial effect on the election results.

I accept that political parties are bound to use money in electioneering and this explains why the state gave some money to presidential candidates. But excessive spending commercialises elections which violates the electoral laws as to free and fair democtratic election.

There were other matters which impacted on the presidential election in 2006. The presence in many places during campaign and on polling day of military personnel and the use of NRM structures which had been in existence for years, during campaign and polling day; the use of Government resources and personnel like RDCs, as in Kamwenge, Kabale, Tororo and Butaleja Districts, GISO, DISO, money, shooting at supporters (at Mengo), conduct of officials of the second respondent such as Fox Odoi in Tororo and the use of Military in Iganga, Kabale, Bushenyi, Mbale, Kanungu, Ntungamo Districts, the use of tear gas to disperse supporters of opposition plus inadequate civil education all combined to affect the results.

It hardly requires a great stretch of imagination for a reasonable tribunal to conclude that the level of last hour spending of money alone or combined with other complaints such as proved intimidation, violence, or threats thereof would affect the election results in a substantial manner.

Mr.Wandera relied on the opinions of Dr. J.Odwee, an expert on statistics and contended that those opinions augment the case of the petitioner. The respondents in turn produced the opinions of Dr. Nazarius Mbona Tumwesigye to counter those of Dr.Odwee. I have gone through the reports and the affidavits of these two expert witnesses. They possibly would have been useful witnesses if clarifications of their respective reports were made orally in court. Time did not allow this to be made which is regrettable. Whatever the case I personally do not think that such clarification would have changed my opinion in this petition on this issue.

ISSUE No. 4.

INTERCESSIO SOCIAL AND LEGAL PRINCIPAL (THE ACT OF GIVING ANOTHER PERSON THE RESPONSIBILITY OF CARRYING OUT THE PEFORMANCE AGREED TO IN A CONTRACT)

WHETHER ANY ILLEGAL PRACTICES OR ANY ELECTORAL OFFENCES ALLEGED IN THE PETITION WERE COMMITTED BY THE SECOND RESPONDENT PERSONALLY, OR BY HIS AGENTS WITH HIS KNOWLEDGE AND CONSENT OR APPROVAL.

This issue arises from allegations in paragraphs 11 and 12 of the petition and the traversing of those allegations by the second respondent.

Mr. John Matovu opined, and later Mr. Wandera repeated this, that because the presidential election was held under multiparty politics under which four of the presidential candidates were sponsored by their respective parties, a candidate sponsored by a party is responsible, or liable, for the activities and actions of his party agents. Bribery or illegal practices and electoral offences committed by such party agents would be taken to have been so committed with the knowledge of and consent or approval of a candidate.

On the burden of proof in an election petition, counsel relied on the opinion of Odoki, CJ., in Presidential Election Petition No.1 of 2001 for the proposition that the standard of proof required in an election petition is proof to the satisfaction of the court. Indeed that is what the law states: See S.59 (6) of PEA. That was the general opinion of the Court in that petition. The Learned Chief Justice stated that it is a standard of proof that is very high ostensibly because the subject matter of the petition is of critical importance to the welfare of the people of Uganda and their democratic governance. Further, learned counsel cited Ss.102 and 103 of the Evidence Act. (These two sections really set out the obvious, namely, that whoever wants court to believe a fact, he/she must adduce evidence to prove that fact). This is what Georges stated in Mbowe Petition (supra) at page 241D. Counsel contended that the standard is not proof beyond reasonable doubt. As regards averments in para 11 of the petition, learned counsel contended that the PEA, 2005, created various categories of offences whose objective was to oblige presidential candidates focus on issues contained in their respective manifestoes rather than indulge in mudslinging each other. He referred in particular to the offences created by paragraphs (a), (b) to (g) of subsection (5) of S.24 of the PEA and opined that S.24 (5) (b) outlaws sectarianism, while the other paragraphs create criminal offences whose objective is to prevent candidates from promoting incitement and also to encourage discipline among candidates. He distinguished offences created by S.24 (5) (a) which, according to counsel, require proof of mens rea, from offences under S.24 (5) (b) to (e), which, according to him, are offences of strict liability.

In his view, a candidate who commits offence of strict liability cannot justify the commission by explanation, as did the 2nd respondent. These offences are alleged or pleaded by the petitioner in paragraph 11 of his petition. The 2nd respondent answered these allegations in paragraphs 8 and 13 of his answer to the petition. According to counsel the statements of the 2nd respondent contained in his answer were false and defamatory and derogatory of the petitioner and the known members of FDC.

Mr. Matovu argued that in paragraphs 12, 13, 15, 18 and 19 of the petitioner's affidavit accompanying his petition, the petitioner alleged that the 2nd respondent made statements maliciously at various rallies and that those statements breached S.24 (5) (b) of PEA. He relied on Black's Law Dictionary, (page 956), the intentional doing of a wrongful act, etc. According to learned counsel the replies by the second respondent set out in paragraphs 13, 16, 17 to 20, 23, 25 and 26 of his answer are admissions of the commission of the offences alleged in the petition and so they do not constitute defences.

Counsel dismissed the affidavits of Brigadiers Sam Kolo and Keneth Banya because each contains hearsay matters. Counsel argued that in paragraph 19 of his own affidavit, the second respondent set out a statement which is false, malicious and derogatory and contravenes S.24 (5) (d). Paragraph 22 shows that he wrote to the New Vision newspaper statements which, according to counsel, were malicious, derogatory, derisive, insulting and abusive. For the meaning of 'abusive' he again relied on Blacks Law Dictionary, page 417. And for the meaning of 'insult' he relied on Phrases Legally Defined. Counsel opined that under S.24 (5) paragraphs (b) to (g), the petitioner needs only to prove that the second respondent made statements contrary to those provisions, arguing that the 2nd Respondent admitted the commission of the electoral offences but gave explanations or motives which are no defences. Counsel contended (which is correct) further that proof of any one of these offences results in the annulment of the election.

BRIBES: Paragraph 12 of the Petition.

Mr. Matovu contended that both the 2nd Respondent and his agents gave bribes of two types, contrary to S.64 of PEA. He relied on paragraphs 2, 4, 5 of the affidavit of Umar Bashir (Kakoza) and the affidavit of Henry Lukwaya. According to counsel, the 2nd Respondent admits the giving of money in his affidavits. First, bribes were given through agents or his party functionaries: He relied on driver David Mugalu. Mugalu transported four agents of NRM who were allegedly bribing voters on 23/2/2006 in Kaliro to police station. The second types of bribes was given by vigilantes of the 2nd respondent on polling day.

Mr. Matovu relied on the affidavits of Salaamu Musumba, Kamateneti Ingrid Turinawe (Rukungiri) and Major Rubaramira (to which were annexed reports of election monitors or observers). Learned Counsel further contended that General Salim Saleh bribed voters. (Essentially, it was Major Rubaramira, who, in his affidavit deponed that he had information that General Caleb Akwandwanaho aka Salim Saleh and an army officer bribed voters and supporters of FDC). In turn the General swore that by the time of elections on 23/2/2006, he had retired from the army and never bribed voters. He admitted that he actively campaigned for the second respondent.

Mr. Matovu submitted that the offence of disenfranchisement was orchestrated by NRM functionaries. Voters were removed from registers. This contravenes S.26 (c) of PEA, (attempting and or interfering with free exercise of franchise). He argued that the petitioner's complaint to the Commission about this is sufficient proof. (The complaints are set out in a letter dated 28th January, 2006, which the petitioner wrote to the Secretary of the 1st Respondent and to the Officer – in – Charge, Electoral offences Squad, CID, Kampala. I have already reproduced the contents thereof in these reasons. That letter was annexed to the petitioner's affidavit and its authenticity has not been challenged).

Dr. Byamugisha, on behalf of the 2nd respondent, replied to Mr. Matovu's submissions on the 4th issue.

PARTICULARS OF OFFENCE

Dr. Byamugisha first contended that the accompanying affidavit of the petitioner especially para 10 does not set out the particulars of the offences of which the petitioner complained. He relied on Bullen, Leake and Jacobs, Precedents of Pleading and contended that the petitioner should have pleaded particulars of the offences. He criticised Mr. Matovu for failure to provide authority for his proposition that the alleged offences constitute strict liability. Dr. Byamugisha relied on the Australian case of He Kaw Teh Vs. R(1986) a LRC (Crim.) page 553, where the High Court of Australia held that "the presumption that Mens rea is required before a person can be held guilty of a grave criminal offence was not displaced in relation to [(S.233 B(1) (b) of the Customs Act, 1901 of Australia].

In other words Dr. Byamugisha is of the view that the provisions cited by Mr. Matovu do not create strict liability. He contended that because allegations in the petition, if accepted, are serious in that they result in nullification of the election, mens rea has to be proved.

CAUSE OF ACTION

Dr. Byamugisha contended also that the petition does not disclose a cause of action because it did not allege that there was malice. (I think that Para 11 (a) of the petition alleged malice). Counsel argued that it neither plead that the 2nd respondent was abusive nor that he called the petitioner a false prophet. Learned counsel relied on Order 6 Rule 2 of CP Rules and Charan Lal Sahu Vs Singh & Another (1985) LRC (const.) 31, a decision of the Supreme Court of India, where that Court discussed the need for precision in pleadings in election petitions.

Dr. Byamugisha submitted that paragraphs 10 to 20 of the petitioner's affidavit breached Order 6 rules 2 of the CP Rules in as much as they do not allege that the 2nd respondent made certain statements while campaigning in which case the allegations do not give the 2nd respondent a chance to respond to those allegations in a specific manner. He further contended that there is no evidence to support the allegation that the 2nd respondent contravened S.24 (5) of the PEA, because there was no evidence by affidavits read in court to support allegations in paras 10 to 20 of petitioner's affidavit, there was no cause of action.

May I observe here that the argument by learned counsel for the respondents that we should ignore affidavits supporting the petitioner which were not read or specifically referred to in court ignores the fact that the respondents' counsel never read out most of the affidavits of respondent's witnesses. He only produced an index of those affidavits and even then, some were not indexed. Should those be ignored, too? I don't think so.

FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

Dr. Byamugisha urged court to bear in mind that under section 23(2) of PEA, candidates enjoy unhindered freedom of expression when campaigning for the presidential office. He relied on the decision of this Court (the judgment of Mulenga, JSC) in Charles Onyango Obbo & Another Vs Attorney General ConstitutionalAppeal No.2 of 2002 (pages 16 to 17 in regard to the extent of freedom of expression). Learned Counsel contended that if both S.24 (5) and S. 23 (3) (b) of the PEA are to be preserved as law, they have to be read in conformity with the Constitution. He relied on the Bill of Rights Handbook 4th Ed. Para 3.7, headed Indirect Application of the Bill of Rights

To Legislation.

At page 70, the author states that: -
"Since the Bill of Rights binds all the original and delegated law-making actors, it will always apply directly to legislation. But, before a court may resort to direct application and invalidation, it must consider indirectly applying the Bill of Rights to the statutory provision by interpreting it in such a way as to conform to the Bill of Rights. The indirect application of the Bill of Rights to legislation has become known as "reading down."

Thereafter the author discusses, at page 71, the meaning of "Reading Down" in relation to certain sections of the Constitution of South Africa which are on the Interpretation of the Bill of Rights.
Dr. Byamugisha urged us to make liberal interpretation of Ss.24 (5) and 23 (3) (b) which allow candidate's right to campaign. He relied on Halsburys' Laws of England, 3rd Ed. Vol.14 pages 226 and 227, paragraph 394, as well as Election Laws 3rd Ed., byS. K.Gosh, pages 149/150. The latter book is a commentary on the India election laws, especially regarding proof of allegations of corrupt practices. Dr. Byamugisha replied in answer to a question from court that if one section of PEA contradicts another, Court should uphold the section which is in conformity with the Constitution. He referred to paragraph 8 of the affidavit of the 2nd respondent accompanying his answer and submitted that in sub- paragraphs (a) to (h) of that affidavit, the 2nd respondent had to counter all the petitioner's accusations, falsehood and misleading statements, contending that what his client stated were correct and honest statements during a political campaign for the Presidency. He cited Hibbs (Clerk) Vs Wilkinson IF & F 873 at para 610, a case decided in 1859 and which is a case of libel. (Here learned counsel contradicts, by implication, his earlier contention that allegations in the petition did not show that his client's statements were made during campaigning. In fact the petitioner alleged that the statements were made during campaigns by the 2nd respondent and in para 11(a) of the petition the petitioner alleged malice.

Dr. Byamugisha urged that the contents of paras 10, 11, 12 & 13 of his client's affidavit, show that paragraphs 10 to 20 of the petitioner's affidavits cannot be true. According to Counsel, there is nothing false in para 12 of his clients affidavit, because politicians use colourful language which description is borrowed from the opinion of the Supreme Court of India (supra). Counsel justified what his client said explaining the need for the 2nd respondent to state what is contained in his affidavit and in that of Hon. Daudi Migereko to explain away Musumba's second affidavit, as well as affidavits of Nandala Mafabi, Ekanya and other MPs. These MPs of the last parliament were blamed for being responsible for shortage of electricity and whether or not these MPs were FDC members at that material time. Dr. Byamugisha further contended that the supplementary affidavit of the petitioner in reply to the 2nd respondent's answer cannot be used to support the petition as the reply was filed out of time. Counsel cited Interfreight Forwarders Vs Uganda Development Bank (at pages 2068 & 216) and Norman Cameron Vs Sir Philip Fysh (1904) HC of A 314) page 55 of R) The latter case appears to support the proposition that a petitioner cannot be allowed to belatedly introduce new facts to be relied upon to invalidate an election after the time allowed by law for presenting a petition has elapsed.

B R I B E R Y

Dr. Byamugisha submitted that bribery was originally not pleaded in the petition, but it was raised after the time of pleading. He contended that his client denied the bribery allegations pleaded in para 12 of the petition. He contended that counsel for the petitioner did not canvass it neither was evidence adduced to prove the allegation of bribery. So bribery was unsubstantiated. He also contended that there are no affidavits to support allegations of the giving out of saucepans, water containers and other gifts.

Learned counsel contended further, in effect, that Salaamu Musumba's affidavit on disbursement of money is valueless because Musumba did not disclose the source of her knowledge and that in any case the second respondent answered the allegations in his own affidavit. Learned Counsel then arged that money given out was for facilitation as defined in S.64 of PEA, which is different from bribery as defined in the same section.

Counsel argued that money given out as stated in the affidavit of the second respondent was for the facilitation of NRM party functionaries/agents. He contended that there is no voter who has proved that he received money from the 2nd respondent. When counsel's attention was drawn to the affidavits of Zedekia Karokora who deponed about distribution of money by NRM task force in Rukungiri and of Umar Bashir, learned counsel contended that Bashir was only asked to cross over and campaign and that Bashir never claimed he was given money as a voter. Counsel rubbished the evidence of many witnesses (already mentioned in these reasons) who deponed that they were paid between 300/= and 500/= because, according to Dr. Byamugisha, this amount was miserable and not evidence of countrywide bribery within the scope of S.59 (6) (a) of PEA.

He made references to affidavits of Najjemba and of Henry Lukwiya and contended that shs 100,000/= paid on 24/12/2005 was not a bribe and that there was no evidence that Lukwiya was a voter.

In view of the provisions of S.64 (1) of the PEA, Dr. Byamugisha's views on this matter is with respect incorrect. Subs (1) of section 64 states as follows: -

"A person who, either before or during an election with intent either directly or indirectly to influence another person to vote or to refrain from voting for any candidate, gives or provides or causes to be given or provided any money, gift or other consideration to that other person, commits the offence of bribery……"

He relied on Gosh'sElection Laws (Supra), pages 348 and 354 which explains how the inference of guilt can be made and on corrupt practices generally. He prayed that we should answer the 4th issue in the negative.

Mr. Ogalo Wandera wound up on behalf of the petitioner. In effect he contended that the petition disclosed a cause of action and it satisfied Rule 4(2) of the Presidential Elections (Election Petition) Rules, 2001. He argued that affidavits filed subsequent to the lodging of the petition provided requisite facts and particulars and complied with the law.

I agree with the view that proof of commission of an electoral offence or a practice results in annulment of the election, as president, of a candidate proved to have personally or through any agent committed an offence. This is evident from the reading of S.64 (1) and S.59 (6)(c). The latter reads as follows:

" 59 (6) The election of a candidate as President shall only be annulled on any of the following grounds if proved to the satisfaction of the court-

(a)……

(b) ……

(c) that an offence under this Act was committed in connection with the election by the candidate personally or with his or her knowledge and consent or approval."

In the 2001 Presidential Election Petition, I had occasion to discuss S.58 (6) (c) of the Presidential Elections Act 2000 which is almost identical to the above quoted provision. At page 132, I said……

"In the case before us, learned counsel were content to say that the standard of proof should be to the "satisfaction of the Court," meaning that it is beyond the standard of the preponderance of probabilities and yet below the criminal law requirement of proof beyond reasonable doubt. This approach is about the same, as did Lord Denning in the Bater case (supra).

Draftsmen of legislation appear to be in the habit of sticking to well trodden paths. I say this because the expression of proof to the satisfaction of the Court is used in many legislations (both penal and non-penal) and yet when Courts are called upon to try criminal cases arising under penal enactments, those Courts require the prosecution to prove criminal charges under investigation beyond reasonable doubt. I know it is convenient and perhaps, a matter of practical draughtsmanship for legislative draftsmen to follow the old path of precedent. However I wonder why draftsmen of our election laws have avoided the inclusion of the commonly used expression of "proof beyond reasonable doubt" in the various enactments such as PEA. For this reason, I do not, with respect, subscribe to the view that the expression "proving to the satisfaction of the Court" inevitably means proof beyond reasonable doubt. I think it is safer to apply the words themselves and say that the standard of proof required to nullify an election of a President after a Presidential Election, must be proof to the satisfaction of the Justices trying the petition, namely proof so that the trial justices are sure that on the facts before them one party and not the other party is entitled to judgment."

Mr. Ogalo Wandera raised the important point about the agency relationship, in a multiparty politics election, between a presidential candidate and his or her agents who are party functionaries. Apart from making a passing reference on facilitation of party functionaries, Dr. Byamugisha did not, as far as I can recall, address us on the question of agency relationship between a candidate and his or her party's functionaries as regards responsibility or liability for acts of those agents in the conduct of electioneering under multiparty politics system elections.

Section 1 of PEA defines an agent as follows*:*
"Agent by reference to a candidate, includes a representative and polling agent of a candidate."
Under the Act a polling agent is an agent of a candidate. Obviously, a candidate would be bound by the acts of his polling agent such as the signing of declaration of results forms. The important question is how would a candidate be bound by such agent's offence(s) or illegal practice?
Under the law of agency, an agent is a person employed to act on behalf of another. An act of an agent done within the scope of this authority, binds his principal.
The definition in the Act does not say clearly whether party functionaries are or are not agents of a presidential candidate. However the affidavit of the 2nd Respondent explained aspects of this matter.
What about a representative? He/she is an agent. It is logical to infer from paragraphs 5 to 9 of the affidavit of the second respondent as to who would be an agent of a candidate. I reproduced these when I discussed the 3rd issue. Zedekiya Karokora confirms this in para 6 of his affidavit where he states that "the money I paid to Ruraka George and other sub county chairmen in Rukungiri District was received from the NRM National Task Force through the NRM task force for facilitation to the village or branch task forces to procure pens, writing pads, refreshments during campaign organization meetings to enhance the campaign effort and to contribute to the NRM candidates for various seats.

The obvious inference that flows from the contents of the said paras 5 to 9 of the affidavit of the 2nd Respondent is that in so far as NRM was concerned, members of the branch or village task forces and NRM functionaries were agents of party candidates at all levels of elections. In particular, they were agents of the second respondent for purposes of the Presidential election. It is thus clear from his own affidavit that the 2nd respondent and the NRM Central Executive Committee authorised their agents to carry out electioneering for the 2nd respondent in the presidential election. Those agents were to contact individual voters and persuade those individual voters to vote for the 2nd respondent. So if a member of the task force succeeded in persuading any body to vote for the 2nd respondent, the act of persuading a voter to vote for the 2nd respondent would be presumed to have been done with the knowledge and consent of or approval of the 2nd respondent because he and the Central Executive Committee knew or consented and approved the fact that the branch or village task force will have to make personal contact with individual voters to woo such voters to vote for the 2nd respondent for the office of President. That is why the Central Executive Committee set aside money to be paid to the task force, or party functionaries, at all levels for the purpose of furthering the task of physical contact with voters and persuading, voters to vote for the 2nd Respondent or for an NRM candidate for any office.

The question that arises then is: where a candidate and or his party have, as in this case, authorised agents to use physical contact to persuade voters, in what manner and to what extent can the physical contact and persuasion go? In other words what are the limits of the authority thus given? Can it be reasonably inferred that the candidate consented to or approved the giving of money or gifts to voters? What is that giving? Is it bribing? Should the 2nd respondent be exonerated from the act of any agent or party functionary who bribes voters? Mr. Ogalo Wandera has argued that the 2nd respondent is liable or responsible for acts of bribery by agents or party functionaries.

Dr. Byamugisha made three pronged reply to this. First he submitted that bribery was not pleaded and secondly that there was no evidence to support any bribery. Again learned counsel contended, in reference to Umar Bashir Kakoza and Henry Lukwaya, that there was no evidence that any of them was a voter. Third he argues that even if there is evidence of bribery, such evidence is not wide spread. Learned Counsel rubbished the evidence of witnesses such as those from Musoola in Mbale District or at Buseta (Janees Kiige) in Pallisa and Busia who deponed that the 2nd respondent's agents paid them between shs 300/= and shs 1000/= as being trivial. That a whole president could not pay shs 300/= as a bribe. Learned counsel does not seem to appreciate that to a peasant shs 300/= or 500/= at a given moment is money. Moreover that little money is not alleged to have been limited to only one location. There is evidence of this in Mbale, in Pallisa, in Nebbi, in Kabale, Palisa, and so on.

S.23 of the PEA relates to equality of treatment, freedom of expression by and access to information of a presidential candidate during campaign period. Similarly S.24 sets out what are called rights of a presidential candidate during the campaign period. On some aspects the two sections appear to contradict each other. Rights given to candidates in S.23 are whittled away by S.24.

I have no hesitation in accepting the view that Ss. 23 and 24 of PEA should be read together with the Constitution. But I would not accede to the argument that S.23 gives licence to candidates to say what they imagine or what they please without limitation.

In order to appreciate the contentions of the parties regarding offences alleged to have been committed by the 2nd Respondent, the context of both S.23 (3) (b) and S.24 (5) has to be set out. This means setting out the two sections.

S. 23 On equal treatment, freedom of expression and access to information of candidate reads this way –

"(1) During the campaign period, every public officer and public authority and public institution shall, give equal treatment to all candidates and their agents.

(2) Subject to the Constitution and any other law, every candidate shall enjoy complete and unhindered freedom of expression and access to information in the exercise of the right to campaign under this Act.

These above two sub sections together with S. 24 (1) and (2) (infra) or rights/entitlements of a candidate during campaign period.

Then subsection (3) states: -

(3) A person shall not, while campaigning, use any language-

(a) which constitutes incitement to public disorder, insurrection or violence or which threatens war; or

(b) which is defamatory or insulting or which constitutes incitement to hatred."

Relevant parts of section 24 on the rights of candidates reads this way. During campaigns –

24 (1) All presidential candidates shall be given equal treatment on the State owned media to present their programmes to the people.

(2) Subject to any other law, during the campaign period, any candidate may, either alone or in common with others, publish campaign materials in the form of books, booklets, pamphlets, leaflets, magazines, newspapers or posters intended to solicit votes from voters but shall, in any such publication specify particulars to identify the candidate or candidate concerned.

(3) A person shall not, during the campaign period print, publish or distribute, a news paper, circular or pamphlet containing an Article, report, letter or other matter commenting on any issue relating to the election unless the author's name and address, or the authors' names and addresses, as the case may be, are set out at the end of the Article, report, letter or other matter or, where part only of the Article, report, letter or matter appears in any issue of a newspaper, circular, pamphlet or matter at the end of that part.

As stated earlier, subs (5) of S.24 appears to whittle down what S.23 gives as rights to candidates.

24. (5) A candidate shall not while campaigning, do any of the following: -

(a) making statements which are false –

(i) knowing them to be false, or

(ii) in respect of which the maker is reckless whether they are true or false;

(b) making malicious statements;

(c) making statements containing sectarian words or innuendoes;

(d) making abusive, insulting or derogatory statements;

(e) making exaggerations or using caricatures of the candidate or using words of ridicule;

(f) using derisive or mudslinging words against a candidate; or

(g) using songs, poems and images with any of the effects described in the foregoing paragraphs.

My understanding of the provisions of [S.24 (5)] is that the provision prohibits a candidate from doing any of the things specified by the provisions which in effect whittle away the rights of expression given to candidates under S.23 (2).

In the Onyango Obbo case, we were concerned with a free and democratic society. Onyango and his co-appellant had been or were being prosecuted for publishing false news under S.50 of the Penal Code Act. That section read:

"50 (1) Any person who publishes any false statement, rumour or report which is likely to cause fear and alarm to the public or to disturb the public peace is guilty of a misdemeanour.

(2) It shall be a defence to a charge under subs (1) if the accused proved that, prior to publication, he took such measures to verify the accuracy if such a statement, rumour or report as to lead unreasonable to believe that it was true".

We held that the section was inconsistent with Article 29(1) (a) of the Constitution and was consequently null and void. The Article itself is one of the Articles which guarantee Fundamental Human Right. It guarantees the right of freedom of speech and expression which includes freedom of the press.

I do not think that any reasonable person can challenge the idea that freedom of expression is necessary for a democracy and more so during electioneering. But when Parliament enacted S.23 and S.24 of the PEA it must have been aware of the necessity of freedom of expression during campaign before parliament enacted the two provisions. Any one who has watched, or participated in, elections in Uganda would appreciate the necessity of curbing excesses during election period. But how far can one go to do the curbing?

PLEADING BRIBERY

Was bribery pleaded or not? I answer yes. Let us look at the petition. In paragraph 12, the petitioner pleaded bribery by the 2nd respondent himself or by his agents. In 12 (c) he alleged that agents procured votes of individuals by giving out tarplins, saucepans, water containers, sugar, salt and other beverages.

Dr. Byamugisha argued in connection with commission of offences that no particulars were given in the affidavit accompanying the petition and therefore, that no cause of action is disclosed. It is true that the accompanying affidavit did not specifically plead particulars of bribing any named individual voters. However, in paragraph 4 of that affidavit, the petitioner pleaded generally that the elections were full of malpractices, irregularities and electoral offences. And in the 3rd and 4th paragraphs of the petitioner's summary of evidence it was alleged as follows: -

"Further the petitioner shall lead evidence to show that the 2nd respondent personally committed illegal practices and offences connected to the elections including but not limited to bribery of voters, interfering with the free franchise of the voters, made malicious, abusive, sectarian, derisive and defamatory statements against the petitioner contrary to the law.

Further more the petitioner shall lead more evidence to show that the 2nd respondent's agents with his knowledge and consent procured votes by giving out valuables and that all the above acts affected the results of the election in substantial manner."

This summary of evidence is given under authority of Order 6 of Civil Procedure Rules as amended by Civil Procedure (Amendment) Rules 1998. In that respect they form part of the pleadings. In paragraph 12 of his answer to the petition, the 2nd respondent denied the allegations contained in paragraph 12 of the petition. May I also point out, if I may, that by virtue of subrule 5 of Rule 8 of the Presidential Elections (Election Petitions) Rules, 2001,

"Where the respondent requires further particulars of the petition, he or she shall apply for the particulars together with the answer"

Apparently, none of the two respondents, let alone the 2nd respondent, applied for any particulars. For if any had done so, according to sub rule (6) of Rule 8,

"The petitioner shall, subject to the directions of the Court, supply any particulars requested under sub rule 5 of this rule on or before the date set for trial of the petition".

The effect of this rule, as I understand it, is that more facts to support a petition are permissible after the lodging of a petition.

If this asking for particulars was not possible, the other course was for counsel for the respondents to ask, during the scheduling conference, for particulars to be provided. The respondents may reply to this by saying that they were not expected to build up the petitioner's case. However in the default of these two modes of seeking for particulars by the 2nd respondent, the petitioner filed affidavits of witnesses such Salaam Musumba, many from District of Mbale, Pallisa others from Districts of Ntungamo, Kabale, Bushenyi, Kamwenge, Kyenjojo, Rukungiri (Kamatenite Turinawe), Kanungu (Karokora) and Kampala District from Umar Bashir Kakooza, Mr. Lukwaya in support of allegations in his petition. As a result the 2nd respondent was personally able to swear affidavits on 21/3/2006 in reply denying the allegations as did many of his witnesses such as Francis Museveni Tuhimbisibwe Matia, Joram Mayatsa and James Wateya, Mbale and Washirekos.A.APC A.Bitwire. Hon. Amama Mbabazi, Muhwezi L, RDC Ben Rulonga and Apollo Nyagamehe in response to those affidavits.

In these circumstances, I do not agree that the case of Norman Cameron Vs Sir Philip Fysh (Supra), relied on by Dr. Byamugisha, supports his arguments. In the Cameron Case, an application to amend pleadings was made during the hearing of a petition to introduce a wholly new ground. That application was made belatedly. The writ appears to have been issued in accordance with the Australian Electoral Act. It had to be served on the respondent and apparently the petitioner had to file his facts (presumably a summary of evidence) in support of the petition within 40 days after the return of the writ. Facts of the petition were apparently filed in time but those facts did not contain the new ground for which the petitioner sought a belated amendment. Even then this application was made in the course of the hearing of the petition or before oral evidence was adduced. The position is clearly distinguishable from the present petition. In the present petition, evidence by way of affidavits alleging that there was bribery had been filed and so that evidence was on the record.

Dr. Byamugisha contended that no evidence was adduced to prove the bribery nor the giving of money or other gifts. I have indicated that there is evidence some of which Dr. Byamugisha rubbished as trivial because of the amount of money given. Again Dr. Byamugisha contended that the issue of bribery was not canvassed. I think, with respect, that bribery was canvassed.

First Mr. Ogalo Wandera asked court to refer to all the affidavits tendered in support of the petitioner. Some of those affidavits certainly depone about bribery. These include affidavits of Ensinikweri Godfrey, Twinomukago Vanice, Byaruhanga Johnson, Turyasingura Joseph (of Kabale),Ozi and Byaruhanga of Kamwenge, Salaamu Musumba, Musimbi Edward and Masaba Robert (of Mbale). Discussion about Mayombo.D of Kanungu District and Umar Bashir, Lukwaya, Esther Najjemba, an NRM mobilizer relating to shs 100,000/= of Kampala. Further in his closing address, Mr. Ogalo Wandera referred to Annexture C1 to Rubaramira's affidavit which report was hardly contradicted. That was a report by DEMOgroup of the election observers. Ogalo Wandera submitted that that report shows that there was rampant bribery both prior to and during the voting day. That was canvassing.

In my opinion, the petition and subsequent affidavits which were filed in support of that petition were sufficient to found a cause of action. I think that Rule 4 (7) was satisfied in as much as the subrule does not specify what particulars a petition must contain. I do not think that in the light of the said Rule 4 (7), Order 6 R2 of CPR was breached.

Consequently, there are three points for me to consider next namely: the people who did the bribing and who were bribed and whether if I believe the evidence, the 2nd respondent can be held responsible for any bribing.

Who did the bribing?

First let me begin with the law of agency in elections. In my reasons in the President Election Petition No. 1 of 2001 between these same present parties, I held that because of the Movement Act, all the NRM functionaries were agents of the NRM Presidential Candidate. I have already said as much in these reasons. I find support of this in S.9 of PEA which states -

"Under the Multiparty Political System, nomination of a candidate may be made by a registered Political Organisation or Political Party sponsoring a candidate …"

Further, under S.21 (3),

"… a candidate's agent may carry on campaign meetings on behalf of the candidate and otherwise carry on any campaign which the candidate is allowed to do under this Act".

This subsection clothes an agent with authority to do what a presidential candidate can do during campaign period. Naturally this has to take into account the provisions of S.59 (6) (c) which states "that an offence was committed in connection with the election by the candidate personally or with his knowledge and consent or approval."

There are a number of election petition cases decided from other jurisdictions which illustrate circumstances under which a candidate is bound, or is held responsible for or by the acts (or omissions) of his agents. In the ancient petitions of Stanley Bridge Election Petition (1869) 20 LT.75 and Bewdley Election Petition (1869) 19 LT. 676, corrupt practices of an agent's clerk were imputed on a candidate.

The effect of the decision in Stanley Bridge case, as a general proposition, is that whenever a candidate or his agent employs a person to bring up a voter and that person does corruptly what they intended should be done incorruptly; they must take the consequences. Can this stand the test set by S.59 (6) (c) of the PEA? I think it does.

In another ancient petition of the Borogh of Bodmin (1869) 20 LT 989, the conduct of a canvassar who was not appointed agent was treated as evidence of agency for the candidate because what he did was for the purposes of advancing the candidate's election. In this petition, the 2nd respondent has deponed that his party's task forces throughout the country were tasked to contact voters and ask voters to vote for him. That clearly is abroad authority.

In the Bewdley Election Petition, the court found that in a Borough where there was campaign for parliamentary election, nearly 20 Public houses (Bars) were habitually kept open and whoever chose to present himself was supplied with a drink. The court stated that where that was done, i.e; where bars were kept open and voters were given drinks, it would be a perfect mockery to suppose that it was done without any corrupt intention. In that case, the candidate, Sir Richard Glass, had given money to Crowther and Paradoe, his agents. These two agents employed other people to ensure the provision of the drinks which was provided to voters.

The court concluded that -

"It is quite true that Sir Richard Glass (candidate), in handing over money to Mr. Crowther, and in placing money in the hands of a person who was not returned as his agent for electioneering expenses, has infringed the Act of Parliament.

I cannot in the slightest degree doubt that where a fund is placed in the hands of an agent, and that agent expends the money in a corrupt manner, that that is evidence to show that the candidate intended that it should have been so spent.

I do not believe that at any corrupt election any candidate has been foolish enough ever actually to say, SPEND THIS MONEY IN BRIBERY."

Norwich Election Petition (1869) 19 LT 615 was a case of bribing voters. It was argued that even if an agent was proved to have bribed voters, or committed a corrupt practice or act, that could not be visited upon a candidate. It was argued further that there was a distinction between a person who committed the act on the part of the principal as an agent and the person who did so merely on his behalf. It was argued that before a candidate is made responsible for the act of a person who had been acting in his behalf, that act must be done with the privity and knowledge and consent of the candidate for whom it was done. When rejecting these arguments, Martin B., said -

"… any person authorised to canvass was an agent, and it does not signify whether or not he has been forbidden to bribe. If the candidate had told him honestly, "Do not bribe, I will not be responsible for it," and if bribery was committed, that bribery in my judgment would affect the candidate …

In Bradford Election Petition (1869) 20 LT 729, an election court held that excessive spending of money in a constituency can be and is properly treated as strongest prima facie evidence of corrupt practices.

Dr. Byamugisha relied on The Commentaries on the Representation of The People Act of India by Gosh, 3rd Edition, 1998, for the propositions that:

a) Particulars of offences or illegal practices must be pleaded in the petition in order for the petition to disclose a cause of action; and
b) that illegal practices or electoral offences must be proved strictly.

Learned counsel did not supply us with the actual text of the provisions of the two Indian Statutes and the accompanying rules which provided background for the commentaries. I have not been able to lay my hands on any.

As a general observation I ought to point out, though, that from what I have read from pages 149 to 157 of the extract of that book provided by the learned counsel, the courts in India hold a view that consequences of upholding an election petition are very serious since a candidate who is unseated because of the success of the Petition does not only loose the seat, he is, in the case of proof of corrupt practices, also disqualified from holding public offices.

Further, unlike here in Uganda, such a candidate also can be convicted of criminal offences and be sentenced to imprisonment by the same court,. The proceedings are therefore quasi-criminal in nature and the Indian Courts insist that because of that the charges in a petition must be properly pleaded and strictly proved as in a criminal trial, i.e., proof must be beyond reasonable doubt.

In Uganda, Subsection (7) of S.59 of the PEA [and S.63 (7) of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 2005, respectively] bar this Court and the High Court from convicting any person of a criminal offence when hearing an election petition. Again the two laws do not penalise any person who commits electoral offences by way of disqualifying the offender from holding public office for any period. Indeed even the basic law, the Constitution, is silent on this latter aspect yet the previous Ugandan Elections laws provided for disqualification. That is why I believe that the burden of proof in election petition trials is closer to a balance of probabilities. As I said earlier, this Court held in Presidential ElectionPetition No.1 of 2001 that the standard of proof of allegations in the petition are to the satisfaction of the court but not beyond reasonable doubt. That is in accord with S.59 (6) itself.

Furthermore, I think that at this stage the directive words of Article 126 (2) (e) must be born in mind when considering pleadings. Paragraph (e) of Clause (2) of Article 126 states -

"In adjudicating cases of both civil and criminal nature, the courts shall, subject to the law, apply the following principles –

e) Substantive justice shall be administered without undue regard to technicalities".

Dr. Byamugisha relied on Order 6 Rule 2 of the Civil Procedure Rules for the proposition that various particulars, e.g., dates when corrupt practices or electoral offences were committed and names of persons who received bribes should have been stated in the petition and or the accompanying affidavit.

The rule sates-

"In all cases in which the party pleading relies on any misrepresentation, fraud, breach of trust, wilful default or undue influence, and in all other cases in which particulars may be necessary, such particulars with dates shall be stated in the pleadings".

As I have stated the effect of this rule was modified by the introduction of the Civil Procedure (Amendment) Rules, 1998. The old rule 1 of Order 6 which preceded rule 2 was amend. The new 06 Rule 1 reads:-

"O.6 rule1

a) Every pleading shall contain a brief statement of the material facts on which the party pleading relies for claim or defence as the case may be ...

b) Every pleading shall be accompanied by a brief summary of evidence to be adduced, a list of witnesses, a list of documents and a list of authorities to be relied on ..."

I think that the effect of this amendment appears to me to modify rule 2 in that the summary of evidence to be adduced at the trial should normally provide the requisite particulars.

Interestingly an inquiry (a trial) of a Presidential Election Petition in Uganda is heard on the basis of evidence by affidavits, unlike conduct of Election Petition in India upon whose law Dr.

Byamugisha relied. (See Rule 14). There, the evidence is adduced orally.

Moreover, although the import of Rule 22 of the Presidential Elections (Election Petitions) Rules is yet to be expounded, it appears to me that the effect of that rule is to minimize formal objections to the contents of a Presidential Election Petition. The rule reads -

"22 proceedings upon a petition shall not be defeated by any formal objection or by miscarriage of any notice or any other document …"

It is helpful to note Rule 4 of Order 45 of C P Rules which states:-

"4 Any special rules of procedure not contained in these Rules which may have been or may be made by the High Court shall, where they conflict with these Rules, prevail and be deemed to govern the procedure in the matter therein mentioned."

The expression "by the High Court" is immaterial. The Presidential Election (Elections Petition) Rules are special rules and accordingly the above rule makes those rules prevail.

I have said, and I repeat it here, that the necessity for a petitioner to lodge a petition within 10 days after a declaration of presidential election results inevitably makes processing a petition problematic. This is made no better by the requirement to try the petition and conclude it within 30 days after the petition is lodged in court. The combined effect makes it pretty difficult for parties, especially a petitioner, to lodge a perfect petition. Dr. Byamugisha cited the Mwanawasa case (infra) of Zambia. It seems that the Zambia law relevant to the filing, the hearing and determination of a presidential election petition is far much more liberal than our laws. A petition is supposed to be filed and determined within 180 days. In that case, a consolidated presidential election petition which was filed in early 2002 and which should have been concluded within 180 days, took over three years before it was concluded.

My participation in the hearing of the 2001 and this present petition makes me conclude that the period prescribed by Article 104 of our Constitution and by the Presidential Election Act within which the petition must be heard and determined is practically too short. I believe that the dictates of democratic governance require that a dispute challenging the validity of a presidential election should be heard and expeditiously determined within a practically reasonable time. Such reasonable time should be such that parties are able to assemble relevant evidence, lodge a petition and an answer thereto, do research and have ample time to present their respective cases. Thereafter the court should have sufficient time to adequately consider materials presented by parties before giving its judgment. The election of the President involves the whole country as a constituency. Whereas in this petition, there were over 200 Parliamentary constituencies and nearly 20000 polling station, for a petitioner (or petitioners) who may not have been an incumbent, or who may have entered the presidential race for the first time, to be able to assemble all relevant material evidence within the prescribed ten days is obviously not easy. In saying so, I am not here condoning sloven preparations of any Presidential Petition or any other election petition, for that matter. The office of the President is the highest in the land. So contest for it in court should be properly done and the trial should follow procedures provided by the law. Although I do not share the opinion by my distinguished and learned brother, Dr.Justice Kanyeihamba JSC, that our current law provides for an inquiry rather than a normal full trial. That opinion could carry sympathy in view of the very short period provided for the institution, the hearing and determination of a presidential election petition. I am however not persuaded that the use of the word "inquire" in Art 104 (3) and (5) displaces a trial as known in court practices in this country which is adversarial in nature.

Article 104 stipulates that a presidential election is to be challenged by a petition to this Court. Normally almost all forms of petitions in courts are tried by courts.

The use of the word "Inquire" rather than "try" in clause (3) of Article 104 may be due to the draftman's interpretation of what the Constituent Assembly delegates agreed on or meant. The draftsman appears in other parts of the constitution to have used different other words to describe a trial. Thus in clause (4) (b) of Article 137 states:-

"……..the Constitutional Court may-

(b) refer the matter to the High Court to investigate and determine the appropriate redress."

And clause (7) of the same Article 137 states: -

"Upon a petition being made…… the Court of Appeal shall proceed to hear and determine the petition……."

Again in Articles 86(1) and 140(1) the Constitution empowers the High Court to "hear" and determine matters referred to it. Incidentally clause (3) of Article 86 anticipates that aggrieved persons seeking to challenge the election of a Speaker, Deputy Speaker or MP would apply to High Court.

In all these, I understand the use of the words "investigate" and "hear" to really mean to try the matter. The same should apply to the word "inquire" in Article 104. I have looked at the draft constitution which was debated by the Constituent Assembly resulting in the present Constitution. Clause 107 of the draft constitution anticipated the challenge to be by way of a petition presented to High Court which would hear and determine the same.

So a normal trial was anticipated. A decision of the High Court was appellable to this Court. This was to be the same procedure in respect of challenging an election of a member of parliament.

Be that as it may, I think that the petition, the accompanying affidavit read together with the petitioner's supplementary affidavits and the various affidavits sworn by other deponents, to some of which I have referred, in support of the petition, disclose a cause of action and give sufficient particulars of the alleged electoral offences and the alleged irregular practices. In fact the accompanying affidavit of the petitioner enumerated various dates on which the alleged various electoral offences were allegedly committed.

In my considered view, therefore, neither O.6 r.2 nor Bullen Leake, Jacobson Precedents nor Gosh's commentaries on Indian election laws are good authority for the proposition that the petition did not disclose a cause or causes of action.

Dr. Byamugisha referred to a passage in the judgment of the Zambia Supreme Court in Presidential Election Petitions No.1-3 of 2002 Anderson Kambela Mazoka & 2 Ors Vs Levi Patrick Mwanawasa (Supra). In a unanimous judgment, the Supreme Court of Zambia reiterated its earlier view, after referring to the judgment of Lord Denning in Bater Vs Bater (No. 2) (1950) 2 ALLER 458 the court approved what it had previously stated in Chiluba case thus:

"The bottom line however was whether, given the national character of the exercise where all the voters in the country formed a single electoral college, it can be said that the proven defects were such that the majority of the voters were prevented from electing the candidate whom they preferred; or that the election was so flawed that the defects seriously affected the result which could no longer reasonably be said to represent the true free choice and free will of the majority of the voters. We are satisfied, on the evidence before us, that the elections while not perfect and in the aspects discussed quite flawed were substantially in conformity with the law and practice which governs such elections; the few examples of isolated attempts at rigging only served to confirm that there were only few superficial and desultory efforts rather than any large scale, comprehensive and deep rooted "rigging" as suggested by the witness who spoke of aborted democracy.

Apparently there was evidence in the Zambia Supreme Court trial that the alleged rigging or defects or flaws complained of in the petitions were isolated. That distinguishes the Zambian petition from the present petition. In the preceding pages, I have referred to affidavits of witnesses who support the allegations that bribery, intimidation and violence were widespread, the principle of secret ballot was violated in many areas, and multiple voting was wide spread as was pre-ticking of ballot papers in favour of the 2nd Respondent.

If find it unnecessary to discuss most of the contentions about whether statements made by the second respondent were mudslinging, abusive, defamatory or delegatory.

UMAR BASHIR (KAKOZA) GROUP

On bribery I want to examine the evidence of Umar Bashir (Kakooza) and Lukwaya and compare it with that of Esther Najjemba. The allegations of bribery are set out in para 12 of the petition. The first two are witnesses of the petitioner while the last witness is of the 2nd Respondent who also himself swore an affidavit on the bribery question. It is pertinent to refer to that affidavit. Umar and Lukwaya deponed their affidavits on 18th March, 2006. According to Bashir's affidavit, a lady called Esther Najjemba addressed Bashir and a group of youths on the evening of 24th December 2005, at 7.30 p.m, at Sam Sam Hotel, in Bakuli, a suburb of Kampala. The group included Lumu, Fred and Iga Rashid. She expressed concern why Bashir group did not support the second respondent. During the meeting, the youths complained of poverty and unemployment. Esther took the group to State House, Nakasero, where they arrived at about 10.00 p.m. The group later met the 2nd respondent at about midnight. The 2nd 0respondent went through his manifesto with Bashir group and inquired why they did not support him. When they complained of poverty and unemployment, the 2nd respondent advised the group to form associations through which he would channel financial assistance to them provided they crossed from FDC to NRM and campaigned for him. The group agreed whereupon the 2nd respondent directed one of his AIDES to give each youth some money. Bashir was given shs 100,000/=.

The 2nd respondent promised to give more money if he proved they had crossed when he meets them again on 24/12/2005 (This must be 27/12/2005 because that is the date referred to by Lukwaya and by Esther Najjemba for the second meeting).

Because the AIDE who gave the money on 24/12/2005 warned Bashir and group that they would be trailed if they did not cross from FDC, Bashir crossed to NRM. He was thus perduaded by money not to vote for the petitioner. Bashir is corroborated substantially by Lukwaya who swore his affidavit on same day (18/3/2006) as Bashir. He was a chairperson of Lungujja parish youth group where he is a registered voter. Lungujja parish is in Rubaga North Constituency, Kampala. On 27/12/2005, Mugabi Robert an apparent supporter of 2nd respondent complained that Lukwaya had made it impossible to display President Museveni posters and told Lukwaya that the President wanted to meet all youths of the constituency who did not support him. Mugabi organised for the introduction of Lukwaya to Esther Najjemba who organised for about 40 youths to meet the 2nd respondent at State House, Nakasero. Among the youths who met the 2nd respondents were Umar Bashir Kakoza, Chief Mbowa of Lusaze, Lume Fred, Yunus Kasirye and Katende. They boarded a Coaster Bus from the same Sam Sam Hotel in Mengo. The group reached State House and were entertained to dinner up to 11.00 p.m. They held discussions with the 2nd Respondent for about one hour whereupon he advised them to form youth associations through which he would channel funds for then immediately. He asked the group to vote for him. Lukwaya deponed that on 24/12/2005 youths including Bashir had visited State House and each reported receiving shs 100,000/=. Among the youths were those mentioned above. Following this, Lukwaya reported the matter to Beti Kamya who apparently condemned the whole thing at a press conference.

Dr. Byamugisha had submitted that there was no evidence that Bashir and group were voters. The evidence of Lukwaya shows that he was a registered voter and he and Bashir had been campaigning for the movement since 1996. Najjemba corroborates him on this.

Najjemba, has been a supporter of and moboiliser for NRM and the 2nd Respondent since 1996. She knew Bashir as NRM supporter in 1996 and 2001. In her affidavit, she referred to Bahir, Lumu Fred and Iga Fred and continued as follows: -

(d) That through my coordination I invited the three persons, among others, to Sam Sam Hotel in Mengo for the purpose of mobilising them to vote for the NRM.

(e) That during our discussions, they raised problems of theirs which government had failed to solve as follows:

i. Youth unemployment

ii. High tuition fees.

iii. Very high taxes for businessmen.

iv. Poverty.

(f) That for the purpose of my mobilisation I had intended to meet the President to explain to him the problems the youth were facing which problems I had already received from various youth groups.

(g) That I telephoned the Principle Private Secretary requesting an appointment to meet the President and explain to him the concerns of the youth and she gave me the appointment.

(h) That I had collected the Youth aforesaid to go with me and present the President with their problems.

(i) That we arrived at State House at about 10.00 p.m but he could not see us until 1.00 a.m in the morning because of a busy schedule.

(j) That when we met him, four of us stated the problems we had come to discuss with the President, but they were not discussed because it was late and he was leaving for Rwakitura for Christmas.

(k) That he did not take us through his Manifesto or ask us why we did not support him.

(l) That however, before he left, he advised us to form Youth groups to fight poverty through the poverty eradication programme.

(m) That he did not say that he would himself channel financial assistance to those groups nor did he say that assistance from him would be provided on condition that we crossed over and campaigned for him.

(n) That before he left, he instructed the Principle Private Secretary to get the State House Legal Officer to assist them to register an Association. He also instructed her to make an arrangements for us to reach our homes.

(o) That finally, he promised to meet us after Christmas for full discussions of the problems but he did not promise to give us any money at the next meeting.

5. That I have also read the affidavit of Henry Lukwaya dated 18th March, 2006 and reply to it as follows:

i. That a subsequent meeting with the President was arranged for us by the Principle Private Secretary on the 27th of December 2005.

ii. That we travelled from Sam Sam Hotel in two motor vehicles (a Coaster and a Minibus).

iii. That when we arrived at State House, the President was busy and we were asked to go for dinner in the meantime and this was a normal routine for visitors at State House as I had been there and experienced this several times before.

iv. That we did not see the President until about 1.30 a.m and by that time, he was again too tired to discuss our problems with us.

v. That the President did not ask us whether we were FDC Youth or why we did not support him.

vi. That the President instructed the Principle Private Secretary to make us another appointment for after the Presidentialelections.

vii. That he did not conclude by asking us to vote for him nor did he give us any money."

Clearly in most material respects, Ms.Najjemba corroborates the testimony of both Bashir and Lukwaya. She naturally denies payment of money and the asking for these people by 2nd Respondent to vote for the second respondent which in the context of this petition is understandable and significant. Najjemba stated that the 2nd respondent instructed his principal private secretary to make arrangements for their transport home. On the facts I have no doubt that this was a euphemism for money payment.

If these people were not voters how could they be persuaded to mobilize for the NRM? If the 2nd respondent did not want the votes of this group what explanation is there for hosting them at State House on the eve of Christmas day and two days thereafter? What sound explanation is there why they had to see the President after a scheduled election? Was this not intended to thank them for crossing to NRM, mobilisation and for voting for him?

The second respondent replied to the affidavit of Bashir and Lukwaya on 21st March, 2006. In paragraphs 14,15,16 and 17 of his replying affidavit, which I quote earlier, the 2nd respondent answered Bashir and admitted meeting the group at Nakasero State House and holding some discussion with the youth group. The Youth raised the issues of unemployment, high school fees and taxes and general poverty. He advised the group to form group associations through which they could get funds. In paragraph 16, he deponed -
"As I was leaving for Rwakitura, I asked my Principal Private Secretary to get a State House Legal Officer to assist them in forming the associations. I also instructed her to arrange for their transport back home and promised to meet them after Christmas."
The instructions were given at night after mid-night.

In para 17 he denied going through his manifesto with the group and denied asking them for their support. He denied promising them financial support. He denied asking them to cross over and campaign for him because the group was taken to him as NRM mobilisers. He denied asking AIDES to give the group money for their support. But he admitted meeting them again on 27th December, 2005. He also admitted asking his Principal Private Secretary to arrange for another meeting after the elections. In paragraph 18, the 2nd respondent replied to the affidavit of Henry Lukwaya. He accepted hosting the Youths to dinner at State House, but denied asking whether they were FDC Youth or not, nor whether they would support or vote for him because they went to him as NRM mobilizers. Several matters come out of this evidence. By all accounts Najjemba acted as the agent of the second respondent because she was an NRM mobiliser. The Principal Private Secretary was obviously acting on instructions of the 2nd respondent and so she was his agent. Same with whoever was his legal assistant.

It is common knowledge that the President of Uganda has many advisors in different aspects of Uganda governance, politics and other public life. Further the 2nd respondent, as the leader of NRM must be having many advisors on same aspects within the NRM party. Among the obvious examples of advisors are Ministers, Ministers of State and Public Servants. In paras 5, 6 and 7of his replying affidavit to which I have just referred, the 2nd respondent deponed to the existence of Central Executive Committee of NRM and what it and its officials were tasked to do at National, District and Constituency levels during election campaigns.

I should think that in addition to special advisors like Ministers, Ministers of State, MPs, Public Servants, officials in the committees mentioned in paras 5 and 6 know and would advise the 2nd respondent on the perceived high level of unemployment among the youths, the high level of tuition fees, the high level of taxes and the prevalency of poverty. It therefore did not require some group of Youths (or FDC supporters) to get special appointment after the 2nd respondent had been nominated by his party as presidential candidate, for some surban Youths from Rubaga Division to visit the 2nd respondent at State House both on the eve of Christmas day and two days after Christmas, during festive period, in order for these Youths to inform the 2nd respondent about their concerns on the unemployment, high school fees and high taxes. I find the evidence of Bashir and Lukwaya credible. I believe them. These youths must have gone to State House to get money. Lukwaya deponed and he had proved that he was considered to be the one hindering the display of the 2nd respondent's posters. In other words, he and his group were hindering the campaign effort of the 2nd respondent and this has not been challenged by any other evidence. The real purpose of Najjemba leading the Youths to State House on 24th and 27th December, 2005 is not hard to find. It was to persuade the Youths by whatever means availed for them to abandon FDC leader and campaign for and vote for the 2nd respondent and I so find.

The price for the change over was money. If the Youths were poor and unemployed what better way of persuading them than giving them money on Christmas Eve. Then 2nd respondent promised to meet the same Youths after elections. The message is clear. Youths must have been told to work hard to ensure that 2nd respondent wins. Otherwise what was the objective of the message that he would meet the Youths after the elections??

The evidence as it is, does not prove that the 2nd respondent personally directly paid the money to the Youths. What Bashir proves and what can be inferred from the affidavits of Najjemba and the second respondent is that the Principal Private Secretary paid the money. From the evidence available so far, I think that any payment effected by that Principal Secretary was effected with the knowledge or consent and approval of the second respondent. That Secretary is the personal staff of the 2nd respondent carrying out his instructions. She is therefore his agent in this respect for the purposes of the PEA.

So for all purposes and intents it has been proved that the 2nd respondent breached S.64 (1) of the PEA. This brings the conduct of 2nd respondent within the ambit of section 59 (6) (c) of PEA.

S.64 (1) reads this way: -

"64 (1) A person who, either before or during an election with intent, directly or indirectly, to influence another person to vote or to refrain from voting for any candidate, gives or provides or causes to be given or provided any, money gift or other consideration to that other person, commits an offence of bribery……..”

It is unnecessary for me to elaborate on these provisions except to relate them to S.59 (6) which also reads as follows:

“59(6) The election of a candidate as President shall only be annulled on any of the following grounds if proved to the satisfaction of the Court.

(a) …….

(b) ……..

(c) That an offence under this Act was committed in connection with the election by the candidate personally or with his or her knowledge and consent or approval.”

It is significant that both on 24th and 27th December, 2005, it was Esther Najjemba, a self confessed NRM moboliser or agent who led the youths to meet the second Respondent. She led them not to the NRM offices or Headquarters but to the official residence of the second respondent. What is more, these youth were attended to by no less an official than, among others, the Principal Private Secretary to the President, i.e. one of the Senior Personal officials who attend to the personal affairs of the 2ndrespondent .That emphasises the importance attached to the two meetings and its purpose during night at the time of campaigning. These factors constitute very clear and unambiguous evidence of personal knowledge, consent and approval of whatever took place on the two days.

Although the evidence of Umar Bashir and his group is sufficient for me to answer the 4th issue in the affirmative, I shall allude to other incidents to illustrate bribing by agents of the 2nd Respondent. I have in mind Mr. Mayatsa the NRM party Chairman in Mbale District during the period of campaign and on the day of election. Witnesses such as Wataka James, Mutonyi Juliet, Khaitsa Lofisa, Timbukha Joseph, Musaki Eunice, Milton Watyekele and Nabalayo Mary, all depone to the fact that Mayatsa, the NRM, Mbale District Chairman and NRM election coordinator for same district bribed and intimidated voters. He simply denied this in his affidavit in response. I believe these witnesses. According to these witnesses, Mayatsa bribed and also intimidated voters by firing in the air and told voters to vote for the 2nd respondent. According to these witnesses, this made FDC supporters to change their mind and to vote for the 2nd respondent.

Mayatsa’s admission that he only got a policeman with whom he moved around on 23/2/2006, the voting day, tends to support these witnesses who deponed that he moved around with an armed military policeman intimidating voters and telling them to vote for 2nd respondent. It does not matter whether the armed man was military police or ordinary policeman. Further the presence of arms at polling station on polling day is out lawed. There was no explanation for the presence of armed policeman who was not on official electoral duty.

Earlier, I referred to the reply affidavit of the 2nd respondent in which he indicated how the National Executive Committee of NRM, of which he is the chairman, distributed money to NRM leaders at the District level to enable them conduct campaigns for voters to vote for him and other NRM leaders. Zedekiya Karokora, Chairman, LC5 Rukungiri corroborates this. In my opinion what Jorum Mayatsa did was in reality executing and carrying out election work for the 2nd respondent. In terms of S.59 (6) (C), the second respondent would be regarded as having consented to or approved what Mayatsa did.

There is the evidence of James Ozo and Byaruhanga in Kamwenge District implicating NRM chairman in that District. There is the evidence of David Magulu implicating the NRM District Treasurer, Mr. Bwire Bakale, in Kaliro District. He was an agent. There are other instances.

I also think that the conduct of Fox Odoi does make him an agent commiting electoral offences. I refer to the evidence of Geofrey Ekanya, the Member of Parliament for Tororo County. I have already summarised his evidence while discussing other issues especially the third issue. On the polling day (23/2/2006), Mr. Fox Odoi, a Legal Assistant to the 2nd Respondent (as President) terrorised voters in Tororo town. Mr. Odoi who according to Ekanya, was armed with a gun accompanied by gun weilding LDUs blocked Tororo/ Mbale Road, in Tororo town, and forced passengers out, undressed them and ordered the LDUs to beat them up. He took some of those people to Tororo police station. Some of these victims made affidavits substantially supporting Ekanya, although some of them subsequently denied being beaten by Fox Odoi. Mr. Fox Odoi has given his own version denying beating up people. But he admits being at the scene. I do not believe Mr. Fox Odoi that he was on floric of his own.

Mr. Odoi did not do all this on an election day to advance his own cause. As personal Legal Assistant to 2nd respondent, he must have been doing the respondent's work as Ekanya says.

In Para 23 of his affidavit accompanying his petition, the petition deponed that Mr. Fox Odoi, the Legal did to the President, 2nd respondent harassed, assaulted and intimidated his supporters in Tororo as deponed by Ekanya. As I pointed out earlier, a witness for the respondents called Epakasi Lawrence of Aukot village Tororo District claimed he voted on 23/2/2006. He deponed that on his way home about 2km on Tororo/Mbale Road, he and four other men were arrested by policemen at that place for no reason. He deponed that Mr. Odoi was at the scene with some policemen. He denies being assaulted by Fox Odoi. He swore that the following day the Monitor Newspaper published on the front page photographs of himself and the other people who were arrested. He denied reports in the news paper that he and the others had been assaulted by Fox Odoi. This man's evidence substantially corroborates the evidence of Ekanya and of the petitioner about harassment of voterssupporting the petitioner by Mr. Fox Odoi, on the day of voting. The other persons who were with Epakasi and also swore affidavits about the incident are Omalla Richard, Okware, and Kamu. The evidence of the two of them is almost identical with that of Epakasi Lawrence. They deny what the petitioner states in para 23 of his affidavit about their assault and intimidation by Mr. Odoi and being FDC supporters. They claim to have seen Odoi for the first time on 23/2/2006, the voting day when Odoi was in the company of armed policemen. Omalla was arrested when he was going to vote and he and his compatriots were taken to Tororo Police Station where they were released in the evening. The following day he saw a photograph of himself and the other men on the front page of Monitor Newspaper (showing that he and others were being tortured). Subsequently he made a statement at CID Headquarters denying he was assaulted by Mr. Odoi. Okware's affidavit made similar statements as that of Omalla except that one amplified on reasons for his arrest. In para 7 thereof he states: -

"7 That I was arrested with Epakasi, Omalla, and others for allegedly being ferried to vote".

I note the following.

- Whereas Epakasi claims he was arrested after he had voted and was on his way home, the others say, they had not voted yet.
- Second, if the incident happened in Tororo where there is an established police station and where they were detained initially, why did they make statements at CID Headquarters in Kampala, denying assault and harassment by Mr. Odoi after news papers reported the assault?
- Third, these deponents appear to be simple ordinary men. How is it that each of them, after being arrested and detained by the police in Tororo, were able to move about in Tororo town and fortuilously each saw their photographs on the front pages of the Monitor following which they were all ferried to CID Headquarters to make statements denying they were assaulted and harassed by none other than Mr. Fox Odoi?

These deponents swear that they were in Tororo Town on the voting day. They were at the scene where Monitor news paper apparently captured their pictures as persons who were being tortured under the supervision of Mr. Fox Odoi, the legal Aide to the 2nd Respondent. They suddenly appear at CID Headquarters in Kampala to deny that Mr. Odoi tortured them. This tells a lot of what must have happened.

Mr. Fox Odoi Oywelowo made his own affidavit. In paragraphs 5 to 12, he swore as follows-

"5 On the day of the Presidential Elections, I went to Tororo Central Police Station to report alleged acts of bribery of voters by Forum for Democratic Change Members in Tororo.

6. That while I was at CPS, I received a report from Apollo Ofwono, the Movement District Chairperson that FDC Supporters were ferrying people who were ineligible to vote in different polling stations in Tororo.
7. That I received the report when I was with the officer-in-charge CPS, George Abaho. He decided that the police should go to verify the reports and that I should accompany them.
8. That the police intercepted one of the vehicles carrying the said people along Mbale Road. Some of the passengers ran away while others including Omalla, Epakas and Okware were arrested by the Police.
9. That a crowd of people from the area formed with the apparent intention of lynching the suspects and I assisted the police in dissuading the crowd from assaulting the suspects.
10. That at no time whatsoever, did I intimidate, torture or assault any supporter of the petitioner or any person at all.
11. That at all times I was in Tororo in my personal capacity and not on official duty.
12. That I am not and have never been an agent of the second respondent or the National Resistance Movement."

This affidavit reveals that-

- There is conflict between the other three deponents on the one hand and Mr. Fox Odoi on the other about why on 23/2/2006 these people were arrested. Were they just walking as Epakasi claims? Where were they going to vote? Were they ineligible voters as Mr. Odoi depones?
- Were they supporters or not supporters of FDC? An inference can be drawn from Mr. Odoi's own affidavit that either these people were FDC supporters or they had been bribed by FDC to go and vote. The former appears to be a logical inference which made him punish them as he did.
- Although Mr. Fox Odoi claims that he was in Tororo on his own, he does not state what is it that took him to Tororo on that important voting day, when his boss was campaigning for the presidency.
- If Mr Fox Odoi was not an agent, on what grounds did he get reports of bribery by FDC?
- If he was not an agent of the 2nd respondent, why should a whole District Movement Chairman report to him about FDC ferrying ineligible voters? Why should he have accompanied the police rather than leaving the chairman going with the police to arrest suspected ineligible voters?

Considering the whole situation, I draw the following inferences:
Neither Mr. Odoi nor the three men are telling the whole truth why the men were arrested. It is most probable that these men were arrested for being supporters of FDC and were detained so as to be denied the opportunity to vote. The fact that they were whisked away to make statements at Police Headquarters in Kampala instead of Tororo Police Station suggests that because their mistreatment attracted media publicity, they were taken to Kampala to make statement at CID Headquarters exonorating Mr. Fox Odoi of beating them! They were probably forced to make these statements of half truths. This incident illustrates the subtle manner of harassing supporters of opponents of an incumbent and the urgent need to reform the law relating to conduct of trial of Presidential Election Petition.

Was Mr. Fox Odoi acting as a mere eccentric or a fanatic or as a legal aide to the president who is at one and the same time a candidate for the presidency?

The logical inference I can draw is that Mr. Fox Odoi Onywelewo was in Tororo on the voting day, 23rd February, 2006 to look after the voting interests of the 2nd respondent to whom he was a legal Aid. All his activities bring him within the armbit of an agent of the 2nd respondent and, therefore, the 2nd respondent can be held responsible for Mr. Odoi's conduct on the presidential election day.

Because of the reasons I have endeavoured to give I was among three Justices who answered issue 3 in the positive and the late Oder; JSC (RIP), and I answered the 4th issue in the positive.

Before I end I wish to make observations especially on the need for respect for Court and course of justice.

Mpiima Koloneria, Presiding Officer at Kobolwa Polling Station in Pallisa first swore an affidavit supporting the Petitioner. His affidavit was filed in Court. A few days later, the respondents prepared yet another affidavit which the same Mpiima swore in effect amending the first affidavit denying some activities which he had stated in the first affidavit.

Secondly, on 18th March 2006 the petitioner filed an affidavit supporting corruption sworn and signed by one David Magulu of Kaliro Town who was hired by police to take and did take police to Nawampiti. Four days later the respondents drew yet another affidavit in the name of "one David Maguru" also a driver and of same Kaliro Town. This David Maguru drove policemen to the same place called Nawampiti on the same mission apprarently. Although the "Maguru" offered by the respondents claimed he did not know how to write and he appears to have thump printed at the end of his affidavit, he was betrayed because whoever administered the oath to him wrote (by the thump print) the name "D. Magulu" and not "D.Maguru" which was typed in the affidavit.

What counsel for the respondents should have done in the case of Mpiima and Magulu is to ask for both Mpiima and Magulu to be produced in court for cross-examination rather than to produce another affidavit sworn by the same witness denying part of what he stated earlier to the opposite party. This is tantamount to preverting the course of justice.

The same can be said about the four voters who were arrested in Tororo having been tortured under the supervision of Mr. Fox Odoi, detained there and subsequently surfaced at CID Hesdquarters, Kampala to deny what took place in Tororo.
I wish to say that participating in the hearing of this petition is in effect participating in the trial of the president of my beloved country. I hope that views and opinions my learned brothers and I have expressed will help to advance the virtues of constitutional democracy in our motherland; at least in reforming the relevant laws.

On the basis of the evidence before me and for the reasons, I have set forth herein, I was satisfied that the petitioner established his allegations. I held that the petitioner's prayers (1) and (2) should be granted. I would annul the election and order a rerun.

I would order that because of the national importance of this petition, each party shall bear its own costs. I further order that if the petitioner deposited money as security for costs the same be returned to him.

Delivered at Mengo this 31st day of January 2007.
J.W.N.Tsekooko
JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT

EXEGESIS ACCORDING TO THE GOSPEL OF JUSTICE TSEKOKO

BACKGROUND

This Presidential Election Petition was brought by Rtd Col Dr Kizza Besigye, the Petitioner, against the Electoral Commission and Yoweri Kaguta Museveni, challenging the validity of the results of the Presidential election, held on 23 February 2006. The election was organized by the 1st Respondent. The Petitioner and the Mr. Museveni were among the five candidates who contested in the election under a multiparty dispensation.

On 25 February 2005, the Electoral Commission declared Mr. Museveni the winner of the election, having obtained over 50% of the valid votes cast. The Petitioner who was the runner-up, was dissatisfied with the declaration of results. On 7th March 2006, the Petitioner lodged the petition in this Court challenging the validity of the election results on various grounds.

FINDINGS AND POINT OF DISSENT OF JUSTICE TSEKOKO IN THE ELECTION PETITION.

Just like the rest of the Justices of the Supreme Court, Justice Tsekoko found that there were widespread violations of electoral laws, it held that these violations were not personally committed by President Museveni or with his knowledge or approval by his agent. His point of departure from the majority of the court was the failure to comply with the provisions and principles, as found on the first and second issues, affected the results of the presidential election in a substantial manner.

SUBSTANTIALITY TEST

In Uganda, the constitution under Article 104(5) authorizes parliament to make laws for the conduct and annulment of presidential election. Pursuant to such authority, the parliament enacted the Presidential Elections Act under which the parliament outlined the grounds for annulling presidential elections. Section 59(6)(a) of the Act provides that:

" non-compliance with the provisions of this Act if the court is satisfied that the election was not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in those provisions and that the non-compliance affected the result of the election in a substantial manner."

Justice Tsekoko further stated that Section 59(6)(a) of the Presidential Election Act, "appears to imply a license to a candidate to cheat or violate e law but do it in such a way that the cheating ought not to be so much as amount to creating a substantial effect on result". This view was welcomed by the public who seem to think that the courts are simply acting in favor of the ruling party when they uphold elections even if there had malpractice as long as such did not affect the results. This view was welcomed by the public who seem to think that the courts are simply acting in favor of the ruling party when they uphold elections even if there had malpractice as long as such did not affect the results.

"Cheating must be such as can be tolerated by the courts!! This notion of substantial effect is found in the English law from which we drive our own law. The notion of "substantial manner" could be a recognition of many things. It can be argued that an election exercise such as that of a President of a country involves a lot of preparations by many actors. It can be argued that preparation for election should end soon or that the exercise even though it is done once in every so many years, it is costly and, therefore, some violation of the law need not be treated as fatal. Therefore, a repeat of such an election is bound to cost the country more resources. As against these possible arguments, there are considerations of virtues of a free and fair democratic election.

If the principles enshrined in our laws, and especially the Constitution, are properly observed during a free and fair democratic election, losing candidates and their supporters will surely be satisfied and, therefore, allow the country to develop peacefully. But if a presidential election is won through fraud, cheating or through the flouting of the law and the constitution, dissatisfied candidates and their followers may create instability and disaffection among the population. Allowing candidates licence to cheat even as little as cannot affect results would render the election exercise a farce, a play thing or frivolous. Indeed, tolerating cheating and fraud in elections can imply that holding elections itself is not desirable or necessarily. Yet proper election should give legitimacy to winners.

The substantiality test has jeopardised the integrity of the electoral process across Africa as incumbent administrations have flouted electoral rules and engaged in illegalities in order to achieve the outcome that they desire. This view, which is based upon the misuse of the 'substantive effect rule', has been propounded by different African courts contrary to the concept of the rule of law and constitutionalism. The substantive effect rule entails that acts or omissions and illegalities committed during elections should not disannul an election unless these acts or omissions and illegalities are so extensive so as to affect the results.

The Supreme Court of Uganda has on all election petitions relied on the substantive effect rule to hold that although there had been illegal practices and irregularities, these would not have significantly reduced the numbers between the petitioner and respondent. A similar approach was taken following the 2001 Zambian and the 2012 Ghanaian presidential elections. In the former case, the 'substantial effect rule' was expanded beyond the numerical outcome to include the geographical spread of the irregularities, while in the latter case, although significant irregularities were committed contrary to the Constitution, the court went on to rule that the election was conducted substantially in accordance with the Constitution. The approach taken in each of these cases appears to endorse an approach that focuses on the numerical impact of irregularities and in so doing undermines the need to run elections in accordance with constitutionalism.

A LEAF TO PICK FROM THE RAILA AMOLO ODINGA & STEPHEN KALONZOMUSYOKA V INDEPENDENT ELECTORAL AND BOUNDARIES COMMISSION, CHAIRPERSON, INDEPENDENT ELECTORAL AND BOUNDARIES COMMISSION & UHURU MUIGAI KENYATTA.

DRAWING LESSONS FROM THE ODINGA 2017 DECISION[1113]

The petition following the outcome of the August 2017 election, presented an opportunity for the Supreme Court to explain the substantive ground upon which an election could be annulled. In this regard, the court laid out two tests. The first, the court held, was the constitutional requirement based upon the principles that the "the electoral process and results should be simple, yet accurate and verifiable." In their judgment, the Supreme Court concluded that "the presidential election of 8 August 2017, did not meet that simple test" and they were unable to validate it. The second test concerned the question whether there were illegalities and irregularities committed in the conduct of the elections. The court turned to examine the petitioner's allegations that the election process was not only conducted devoid of constitutional aspirations but that it was also marred with irregularities and illegalities that rendered its result unverifiable and thus indeterminate. The court dealt with both concepts separately, but first it sought to distinguish between an irregularity and an illegality.

The court defined illegalities as a breach of the substance of a specific law while irregularities denote a violation of specific regulations and administrative arrangements put in place. The petitioners in this context claimed that the presidential election of 8 August was characterised by systematic and systemic illegalities and irregularities that fundamentally compromised the integrity of the election. Some of the alleged illegalities included blatant non-compliance with the law, while irregularities included infractions of procedure, some of which were requirements of the laws and regulations relating to the election, while others, had been put in place by the IEBC, for the management of the elections.

[1113]RailaAmoloOdinga& Stephen KalonzoMusyoka V Independent Electoral And Boundaries Commission, Chairperson, Independent Electoral And Boundaries Commission & Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta

TIME TO CONSIDER THE QUALITATIVE NATURE OF ELECTIONS

The substantiality test is out of touch with the qualitative nature of election irregularities that it offends justice and brings the credibility of the court into disrepute. This is the time to adopt a qualitative test that considers the totality of circumstances and their effect on the quality of the election. A test that examines whether or not there was a level playing field, free and fair campaigns, fair use of state resources, transparency in printing election materials, transparency in tallying and reporting election results and whether the state took concrete steps to remove barriers that unduly restrict the exercise of the right to vote. Over emphasis of the quantitative effect of the election results assumes that everything can be adequately quantifiable but we all know that certain things cannot be adequately quantified.

Furthermore, the substantiality test is a deeply flawed requirement because, it transforms a question of law into a question of fact. Yes, the petitioner has the burden of proof to prove the irregularities and their magnitude but it is a question of law if those irregularities were substantial enough to render an election unfair. Of course the starting point is the quantitative analysis of those factors that can be sufficiently and credibly quantified. It is also true that non-serious irregularities should not annul an otherwise properly conducted election but grave and serious violations of election standards planned and executed by state agencies controlled by the incumbent should annul an election.

The case gave birth to the ill conceived burden on the petitioner to show that the irregularities he or she has proved would have substantially changed the outcome of the presidential election. The same requirement applies to other elections but lower court have been more relaxed in their application of the rule. In circumstances, where the irregularities in question are voter stuffing, or striking eligible voters off the register and similarly quantifiable irregularities it might be possible to predict the number of votes affected. However, when the irregularities are qualitative in nature, it is not possible to predict how many votes are affected by the irregularities. How do you predict the quantitative effect of let’s say a media blackout on election results? Obviously a candidate who is unable to campaign either in person or through the media is gravely disadvantaged but how do you determine the number of votes he or she lost by being unable to effectively campaign. How do you determine the quantitative effect of the use of state resources such as money, state media, public servants, state funded presidential pledges and many more by the incumbent candidate on the election results? Does it for example gain him or her a million votes or grant him or her an advantage of 40,000 votes.

After quantifying the quantify irregularities the court must examine the qualitative irregularities that cannot be adequately quantified. The test should be whether the qualitative irregularities were grave enough to render the election unfair and give the incumbent an unfair advantage. It should be relevant to the consideration of the incumbent gaining an unfair advantage from the irregularities that he failed to take reasonable steps to ensure that the other candidates have a fair playing field by putting in place measures to prevent and remedy any violations or irregularities that occur. The court should ask itself the following questions.

- If there was voter intimidation was it serious enough to stop a substantial number of eligible voters from voting or from casting their vote for their preferred candidate. Did the incumbent candidate take reasonable steps to ensure that security forces, state agencies and his or her supporters do not intimate voters.
- If there was voter suppression, was it such that it was difficult or unduly burden full for eligible voters to register to vote or vote without undue hardship. Did the incumbent take reasonable steps to ensure that eligible voters can easily register to vote or easily cast their vote without incurring high expense or exposure to infectious diseases or travelling long distances or making prohibitively long lines.
- If there was use of state resources by the incumbent was it such that it gave him or her a substantial advantage over the other candidates. Did the electoral commission and the incumbent candidate take reasonable steps to ensure a level playing field? Would the incumbent candidate have performed substantially less impressively if he or she had no access to state resources?
- If there was abuse of state power by for example intimidating media houses into refusing to air adverts of the opposition or turning off internet access was it of such a grave or serious nature as to have prevented the other candidates from campaigning or was it such that it gave the incumbent an unfair advantage.
- Did the incumbent candidate and the electoral commission put in place measures to ensure a level playing field, equitable access to resources? Were campaign rules fairly and equitably enforced. Did they put in place measures to ensure transparency in printing election materials and distributing them? Did they put in places measures to ensure transparent tallying of votes and transmission of election results? Did they put in place measures to ensure that citizens see the results as transparent and the election as fair?

This totality of circumstances test looks at the quality of the election and imposes an obligation on the state in line with the constitution to ensure that the election is free and fair. It disincentives abuse of power and misuse of State resources by the incumbent candidate and creates an incentive for him or her to ensure that the election is free and fair. If strictly enforced, it has the potential to strengthen the rule of law and strengthen the democratic processes. Imagine a world where the incumbent is actually advantaged by taking steps to promote a free and fair election and disadvantaged by abuses of power.

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JUSTICE PROF. DR. KANYEIHAMBA, J.S.C VERBARTIM

I will begin my findings on this petition with a reminder that the overriding constitutional dogma in this country is that constitutionalism and the 1995 Constitution of Uganda are the Alpha and Omega of everything that is orderly, legitimate, legal and descent. Anything else that pretends to be higher in this land must be shot down at once by this Court using the most powerful legal missiles at its disposal. The Constitution of Uganda is a binding contract between the people of Uganda and their successive governments. It was made by the people after some six years of protracted negotiations throughout the Country under the auspices of the Constitutional Commission and the Constituent Assembly. This Court is the last sanctuary for all people within Uganda who are challenging any violations of the Constitution or breach of any law. Consequently, this petition must be considered and resolved with the people's Constitution guiding this Court.

The Uganda Constitution which is the supreme law of the land provides in Article 103(1) that the election of the President shall be by universal adult suffrage through a secret ballot. It is also provided in clause 9 of that Article that, subject to the provisions of the Constitution, Parliament shall by law prescribe the procedure for the election and assumption of office by a President. Subsequently, Parliament enacted several Acts for this purpose which include the Presidential Elections Act, the Electoral Commission Act and the Parliamentary Elections Act under which Presidential and Parliamentary elections in Uganda are organized and conducted.

Article 104 which is headed, challenging a Presidential election, provides as follows:-

(1) Subject to the provisions of this Article, any aggrieved candidate may petition the Supreme Court for an order that a candidate declared by the Electoral Commission elected as President was not validly elected.

(2) A petition under Clause 1 of this Article shall be lodged in the Supreme Court registry within ten days after the declaration of the election results.

(3) The Supreme Court shall inquire into and determine the petition expeditiously and shall declare its findings not later than thirty days from the date the petition is filed.

(4) ----------

(5) After due inquiry under Clause (3) of this Article, the Supreme Court may:

(a) dismiss the petition

(b) declare which candidate was validly elected; or

(c) null the election

(2) Where an election is annulled, a fresh election shall be held within twenty days from the date of the annulment.

(3) If after a fresh election held under Clause (6) of this Article there is another petition which succeeds, then the Presidential election shall be postponed, and upon the expiry of the term of the incumbent President, the Speaker shall perform the functions of the office of the President until a new President is elected and assumes office.

(4) For the purposes of this Article, the provisions of Article 98(4) of the Constitution shall not apply.

(5) Parliament shall make such laws as may be necessary for the purposes of this Article, including laws for grounds of annulment and rules of procedure.

From the way they are worded, it is clear that the only respective purposes of Articles 103(9) and 104(9) are to empower Parliament to make laws and rules of procedure for the election and assumption of office of the President and the grounds for upholding or annulment of such an election. Parliament is not empowered to convert the said inquiry into a trial or limit the powers of the Supreme Court from considering and taking into account any evidence touching on the election of the President that may assist the Court in coming to the right decision. Thus, in the South African case of Ferreira v. Levin No. 1996 (1) S.A 984 (C.C), the court invited written submissions from professional bodies whose work could have been affected by the court's decision.

It is my view therefore, that this court's duty is to conduct an inquiry into the allegations contained in the petition and, after due consideration, declare its findings, give reasons thereof and make appropriate orders, if any. There is no provision in the Constitution for a trial and judgment by this court. The inquiry meant in the Constitution is radically different from an ordinary trial whether of a criminal, civil or administrative nature.

The implications of Article 104 are easily discernible. An inquiry into a Presidential election must be conducted, concluded and its findings and reasons given within the period prescribed by the Constitution. The idea that the Supreme Court can summarise its findings and give a decision and then give reasons outside the period fixed by the Constitution is indefensible. It could not have been the intention of the makers of the Uganda Constitution that if an election is annulled, a fresh one could follow immediately without regard to the reasons that may be given by all or any of the judges on the panel. To suggest that the Electoral Commission and the parties concerned could meaningfully carry out or participate in a fresh election, following the annulment of another by the Supreme Court and before the reasons for the decision of that Court are unknown is to indulge in speculation. It is only logical to expect the Electoral Commission and other actors in the Presidential election to act correctly and legally after reasons for the annulment of the previous election are known and publicised. To do otherwise could be putting the cart before the horse. It is imperative that reasons why one election is upheld and another is nullified, should be clearly spelt out and known before a fresh and new election is held. Only this way can the mistakes made in the previous election be known and subsequently avoided.

The other reason why a Presidential election should be inquired into and not regarded as a trial is to avoid delay. In fact, the reading of the provisions of Article 104 shows that not only must the inquiry into a Presidential election be conducted and concluded expeditiously but should the proceedings suggest further delays, the Constitution provides the answer in Clause 7 of the same Article which avoids further delays and complications in the ascertainment of a President, by providing that the Speaker shall perform the functions of the President.

It is thus very clear to me that the Constitution deliberately created a procedure for determining a Presidential election petition which is different from those designed to cater for trials. Nothing could be clearer than Article 104(3) which for, emphasis I repeat here, "the Supreme Court shall inquire into and determine the petition expeditiously and shall declare its findings not later than thirty days from the date the petition is filed." No trial or judgment are intended or implied. Under the Uganda laws and practices, a trial which is necessarily followed by a judgment is differently structured and conceived. A trial must be followed not only by the evaluation of facts and the applicable laws, but also by a judgment which must contain reasons for the decisions therein. In the majority of cases; whether of a civil or criminal nature, judgments are given on notice and may sometimes stretch to two months or more. Moreover, the pleadings, arguments and submissions tend to be confined to the evidence and facts presented by the parties or their counsel. The Oxford Standard Dictionary defines the word to inquire as "to find out through information or to investigate." H.W.R. Wade and C. F. Forsyth, the learned authors of the 8th edition of 'Administrative Law' published by Oxford University Press describe an inquiry as intended "to investigate into an objection by a citizen or a number of them and give that objection the fairest possible consideration." So, just as those authors speak of statutory inquiries in the context of administrative actions, one may speak of a constitutional inquiry into a Petition presented under Article 104 of the Uganda Constitution. Under Uganda laws, there is the Commissions of Inquiry Act, Cap. 166 in which the concept and purpose of an inquiry are clearly stated and where emphasis is placed upon the reasons leading to the findings and conclusion of such an inquiry. It follows that reasons for the decisions in an inquiry are integral parts of the findings and conclusions of the tribunal. One may not act on findings alone without knowing the reasons and rationale for such findings.

In my opinion, the delay to give reasons for the findings of the Supreme Court was never contemplated by the makers of the 1995 Uganda Constitution. Such delay is democratically and constitutionally unacceptable. In my view, it is imperative that the nation should be informed expeditiously why any disputed Presidential election was upheld or nullified by this court and this can only be discerned from the reasons given by the court. Trials of civil or criminal or other types are by nature subject to long and drawn out procedures. In many instances, such procedures and delays are determined or caused by the parties themselves or their counsel with possible indefinite adjournments. It is not unknown for cases to drag on for years, sometimes stretching to several or more years.

I investigated into the petition, compiled and assessed the evidence availed to the court, wrote my reasons, circulated the same to my colleagues of the Supreme Court in early May last year, that is 2006. I was guided and in some cases, compelled by the reasons I have so far advanced with regard to the necessity that Presidential election petitions be dealt with and concluded expeditiously. As a matter of fact, it is only in the second week of January of this year that my colleagues except one who did so earlier, released and circulated their own draft reasons. This is notwithstanding that had the court allowed the petition, a fresh Presidential election would have had to be held within twenty days from the date of the court's decision. It cannot have been the intention of the makers of the Constitution that a fresh election would be held by the Electoral Commission or allow others to participate in it without knowing the reasons why the previous election had been cancelled. Nor can it be suggested that findings and reasons for a dismissed petition are different from those advanced for an allowed petition and that whereas the latter must be disclosed immediately, the former can be delayed for an indefinite period. In light of this anomaly, I respectively suggest that this court, sooner rather than later might wish to revisit its decision in the Presidential election petition of 2001 under Article 132(4) of the Constitution which provides that:-

"The Supreme court may, while treating its own previous decisions as normally binding, depart from a previous decision when it appears to it right to do so."

If this court feels inclined not to do so, Parliament should be moved to do the necessary in clarifying this law.

The facts and circumstances leading to this petition were summarised in our majority decision which was read on the 6th, April, 2006. I will nevertheless summarise them for the purposes of my own findings. Dr.KizzaBesigye, the petitioner, was one of the Presidential candidates in the election that was held on 23rd, February, 2006, the results of which were declared by the 1st Respondent on 25th February, 2006 to the effect that the 2nd Respondent had emerged as the winner of the election. In that declaration, the 1st Respondent announced that the 2nd Respondent had obtained 59.28% of the total valid votes cast while the Petitioner was the runner-up with 37.36% of the votes cast, and as the 2nd Respondent had obtained more than 50% of the votes, he was declared by the 1st Respondent to have been duly elected President of the Republic of Uganda.

The Presidential election was held and conducted under a multiparty system unlike previous ones that had been held since 1996 under the monolithic National Resistance Movement Political System. The Petitioner ran for election as the candidate of one of the participating political organizations which is registered as Forum For Democratic Change (F.D.C), while the 2nd Respondent stood for election as the candidate of the National Resistance Movement (N.R.M). There were two other Presidential candidates representing political parties, namely, MiriaKaluleObote for the Uganda People's Congress (UPC) and John KizitoSebaana representing the Democratic Party (DP). There was a fifth candidate, Bwanika Abed who stood as an independent Presidential candidate.

In his petition, Dr. KiizaBesigye complains that the 1st Respondent failed to comply with several provisions of the Constitution, the Presidential Elections Act and the Electoral Commission Act and actually infringed some of the provisions of the Constitution and these Acts of Parliament. He also complains that section 59 (6) (a) of the Presidential Elections Act is contrary to the provisions of Article 104 (1) of the Constitution. The Petitioner further complains that the entire election process in 2006 Presidential election was characterized by acts of intimidation, lack of freedom and transparency, unfairness and violence and the commission of numerous offences and illegal practices. The petition makes further allegations of breaches of the law by the 1st Respondent in the disenfranchisement of voters by way of deleting them from the voters' register and failing to cancel results from polling stations where gross electoral multipractices had occurred. The petition complains of further malpractices allowed in the election by the 1st Respondent such as multiple voting, vote stuffing, failure to declare results in accordance with the law and the absence of freedom and fairness in the whole electoral process.

The Petitioner's allegations against the 2nd Respondent are listed to include the illegal practices and offences committed by him personally. The petitioner alleges that the 2nd Respondent used words or made statements which were malicious or which contained sectarian words or innuendos against the Petitioner and his party and, made abusive, insulting and derogatory statements against the Petitioner, FDC or other candidates. Additionally, the petition alleges that the 2nd Respondent made defamatory and derisive, mudslinging, insulting and false statements against the same parties. The Petitioner further alleges that the 2nd Respondent committed acts of bribery of the electorate personally or by his agents with his knowledge and consent or approval, before and during the elections designed to interfere or which interfered with the free exercise of the franchise of voters.

In support of the petition, counsel for the Petitioner, presented a number of affidavits with annextures, made submissions and cited authorities. In response, the Respondents, through their counsel denied all the allegations against them and their counsel presented affidavits together with various annextures, authorities and made submissions in support of their responses.

At the commencement of the proceedings of the inquiry, this Court framed five issues for the determination of the petition. These were:
Whether there was non-compliance with the provisions of the Constitution, Presidential Elections Act and the Electoral Commission Act in the conduct of the 2006 Presidential Elections.
Whether the said elections were not conducted in accordance with the principles laid down in the Constitution, Presidential Election Act and the Electoral Commission Act.
Whether if either issue 1 or 2 or both are answered in the affirmative, such non-compliance with the said laws and principles affected the results of the election in a substantial manner.
Whether the alleged illegal practices or any electoral offences in the petition were committed by the 2nd Respondent personally or with his knowledge and consent or approval.
Whether the petitioner is entitled to the reliefs sought.

The inquiry into the allegations of the petition proceeded partly under the Constitution and partly under the Presidential Elections Act and the Electoral Commission Act. Both the inquiry and the consideration and findings of the court must be constitutionally completed and the decision of the court pronounced publicly within a period of thirty days which reinforces my firm opinion that the framers of the Uganda Constitution intended petitions in Presidential elections to be expeditiously disposed of by way of inquiries.

At times during the hearing of the petition, a number of counsel for the parties tended to spend too much time on definitions, explaining and arguing about the meaning and implications of certain terms and expressions in the law even when they were submitting before Justices of the Supreme Court with all that it implies. In my opinion, the thrust and impact of an inquiry of this nature are best presented by maximum concentration upon what actually occurred before and during the election. Detailed facts and events and the actual circumstances implied by each allegation of such malpractices as bribery, intimidation and disenfranchisement need to be given with particulars and actual occurrences by credible witnesses, if possible, giving testimony produced or deponed to the satisfaction of the court because this is an essential and important inquiry that could have grave consequences for both the parties and the nation as a whole.

Be that as it may, the parties and their counsel managed to present evidence and submissions to enable court to deliberate on the petition. Within a few days of completing the hearing of the inquiry, the court rose to consider its findings and decision which as already noted, it delivered on the 6th of April, 2006.

On issue No.1, the court found unanimously that there was non-compliance with the provisions of the Constitution, the Presidential Elections Act and the Electoral Commission Act, in the conduct of the 2006 Presidential Elections by the 1st Respondent in the following instances:

(a) In disenfranchisement of voters by deleting their names from the voters' register or denying them the right to vote.

(b) In the counting and tallying of the results.

On issue No.2, the court found, again unanimously, that there was non-compliance with the principles laid down in the Constitution, the Presidential Elections Act and the Electoral Commission Act in the following areas:

The principle of free and fair elections was compromised by bribery, intimidation and violence in some areas of the country.

The principles of equal suffrage, transparency and secrecy were infringed by multiple voting, vote stuffing and incorrect methods of ascertaining the results.

On issue No.3, by a majority of four to three, the court found that it was not proved to the satisfaction of the court that failure to comply with the provisions and principles as found on the first and second issues, affected the results of the Presidential election in a substantial manner. I was one of the three dissenting Justices.

On issue No.4, by a majority decision of five to two, the court found that no illegal practices or other offences were proved to the satisfaction of the court to have been committed in connection with the said election, by the 2nd Respondent personally or by his agents with his knowledge and consent or approval. I was one of the majority Justices who made this finding.

I will be giving reasons for all the courts' decisions on all the issues. I will start with issue No.3. After perusing the affidavits, their annextures and heard counsel for the parties on the authorities and their application, the court was almost evenly divided as to whether to answer this issue in the affirmative or the negative. I dissented from the four members of the courts' panel who eventually decided to resolve the issue in the negative and dismissed the petition.

At the commencement of the inquiry's proceedings, counsel for the Petitioner made an application to stay the proceedings of the inquiry so that the Petitioner can first petition in the Constitutional Court for a declaration that section 59(6)(a) of the Presidential Elections Act is inconsistent with Article 104(1) of the Constitution. At the time and in our summary findings, I concurred in the courts' decision that it was inappropriate to have had that application while we were hearing the petition but in my opinion, the observation by the Court that there is no inconsistency between the section in question and Article 104(1) of the Constitution which we made hastily deserves further review. After Counsel made submissions on the provision, this Court rose and deliberated briefly and then gave its decisions immediately.

It is my opinion that by enacting section 59(b)(a) into the Presidential Elections Act, 2005, Parliament created a clog on Article 104 (1) of the Constitution. I am fully aware and I was acutely mindful of the fact that to hold that a Presidential election is in some way flawed, is not an easy thing to contemplate, for to do so may lead to serious consequences for both the winning candidate and the nation. For this reason, every judge and every court will not make such a decision lightly or without compelling evidence. Such a decision must be reached after careful consideration of substantial evidence that amply justifies the decision. In my opinion, there was sufficient evidence presented in this petition to enable the court to decide that the results of the Presidential election of 2006 had been so fatally affected by irregularities, malpractices and illegalities substantially as to affect the final results in a substantial manner and therefore those results ought not to be upheld by this court.

I now turn to the issues framed by the Court. In my opinion, having answered in the affirmative both the first and second issues framed by the court, it became imperative for me to answer issue No.3 in the affirmative also. To decide otherwise would, in my opinion, manifestly conflict with the unanimous findings of the court on issues No.1 and 2. Once a court finds that the Constitution, the supreme law of the land and other country's laws have been flouted, that court must do its bounden duty and grant the remedy sought. In my view therefore, I could not see any rational or defensible alternative to answering issue No.3 other than in the affirmative. I am fortified in my resolve by a decision of the Supreme Court of South Africa in the case of Speaker of the National Assembly v. De Like, 1999 (4) S.A. 863 (SCA) which emphatically declared that:

"The Constitution is the ultimate source of all lawful authority in the country. No Parliament, however bona fide or eminent its membership, no President, however formidable be his reputation or scholarship and no official, however efficient or well meaning, can make any law or perform any act which is not sanctioned by the Constitution. Any citizen adversely affected by any decree, order or action of any official or body, which is not properly authorized by the Constitution is entitled to the protection of the court".

The provisions of Article 1 of the Constitution on the sanctity and binding effect of the Constitution must be unconditionally applied and respected. Clause 1 of the Article provides that all power in Uganda belongs to the people who shall exercise their sovereignty in accordance with this Constitution. In the 2006 Presidential election, the people of Uganda were endeavouring to exercise their sovereign power which they had to do in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. It should be emphasized here that both the principle of people exercising their power through elections and the obligation for the same people to do so while complying with the Constitution are co-equal. Neither is subordinate nor superior to the other.

In my opinion, to find otherwise would be tantamount to holding that whenever any person or body is exercising powers derived from or delegated by the Constitution, such exercise can result in measures or acts which override the provisions of that same Constitution. A result of that kind cannot have been contemplated by the makers of the Uganda Constitution for this would be the effect if it were to be held that the purpose and effect of section 59(6)(a) of the Presidential Elections Act, 2005 is to direct the Supreme Court to ignore the consequences of what this court found unanimously in issues No.1 and 2 including violations and breaches of the Constitution and laws of the country provided that they did not affect the result in a substantial manner which holding would, in my opinion, be based purely on conjecture and personal inclinations of judges. In this particular petition, such an opinion would be grossly unfair to Ugandans because the 1st Respondent refused adamantly to produce the only evidence which could have assisted the Petitioner, Respondents and this Court to prove and be satisfied that the allegations that there were irregularities, malpractices and illegalities were justified or unjustified.

Section 56(2) of the Presidential Elections Act which is mandatory provides that;

(2) Upon completing the return under subsection (1), the returning officer shall transmit to the commission the following documents-

(a) the return form;

(b) a report of the elections within the returning officer's electoral district;

(c) the tally sheets; and

(d) the declaration of results forms from which the official addition of the votes was made.

The 1st Respondent either adamantly refused or was unable to comply with the request of counsel for the petitioner and the directive of this Court to produce returning officers reports from electoral districts.

The Constitution provides in Article 103(1) that the election of the President shall be by universal adult suffrage through a secret ballot. This court found unanimously, that this provision was violated. In my opinion, it matters not whether there was no additional evidence that these violations which affected many areas of the country did not spread to many more others. I have found no provision in the Constitution nor was any cited before this Court other than a similarly decided Presidential Election Petition No.1 of 2001, that in any election where breaches of the Constitution and laws have blatantly occurred, they should be ignored or tolerated by the Supreme Court provided the Court is satisfied that those breaches did not affect the result of that election in a substantial manner. In my view, if there were such a law it would deserve to be struck down because it would be existing as a clawback provision from the provisions of the Constitution which is the supreme law of this country.

The Constitution further provides in Article 59 that every citizen of Uganda of eighteen years of age and above has a right to vote, that he or she has a duty to register as a voter for public elections and referenda, and that the State shall take all necessary steps to ensure that all citizens qualified to vote, register and exercise their right to vote. Voting is not compulsory in this country. This is a good reason why those who have taken the trouble to be registered as voters should be given every encouragement and assistance to vote. Instead, either by design, bribery or intimidation and violence, many of them were prevented to freely exercise this right. Many who chose to turn up in possession of either their registration certificates or polling cards were denied the right to vote or in some instances, were chased away from the polling centres or simply told that they could not vote because their names had been omitted or deliberately deleted from the register of voters without their knowledge. This meant that the State or its agents, instead of assisting and ensuring that all citizens qualified and registered to vote did so, actually prevented many of them from exercising their constitutional right to determine who governs them. Volume 2(d) of the Petitioner's affidavit contains the testimonies of some forty deponents swearing to diverse acts and practices disenfranchising voters. Typical of such affidavits is one by Isaka Hire Saturday who depones as follows:

"That I am a male adult citizen of sound mind. That I am a registered voter having been duly registered and issued with a certificate No.0269498 (Annexture "A"). That on the 23rd February, 2006, I proceeded to old park polling station, Busia Town Council, SamiaBugwe North to vote for my candidate Dr. KizzaBesigye. That after lining up and reaching the presiding officer's desk, he informed me that my name was not on the register. That he returned my certificate after checking it and advised me to leave."

Much more damning of these illegal practices were reports of independent observers. Thus, Mr. Kiago Geoffrey of DEM Group swore and signed an affidavit in which he states:

"I was an election monitor with DEM Group at Kampala T/C. I reported to the polling station at 6.00 am and presented my credentials to the presiding officer and assumed my seat at the station. That before the voting begun, some people came with a yellow numberless pick-up and directed all the voters to vote only NRM candidates. ... saying that they would come back later to establish whether the voters had done so. I wrote a report to the country supervisor of DEM Group informing him what had happened. In the afternoon, the same group returned and ordered Kintu, the presiding officer to stop the elections, took over the polling station. A polling constable whose name I could not readily establish then ordered the presiding officer to hand over all the remaining ballot papers which the latter did. The group then began ticking the remaining ballot papers in favour of the NRM candidate and ordered polling officials to balance and sign the declaration forms, ---. Shortly afterwards, the police came and carried away the polling materials."

This court found unanimously that the provisions of Article 59 of the Constitution were violated.

Article 61(a) of the Constitution provides that the Electoral Commission shall ensure that regular free and fair elections are held and that the Commission shall organize, conduct and supervise elections in accordance with the Constitution. This court found that the provisions of this Article were violated nationwide.

The unanimous findings of this court indicate quite clearly that Article 1(4) of the Constitution which provides that all the people of Uganda shall express their will and consent on who shall govern them through regular, free and fair elections of their representatives was infringed in many instances, deliberately. There were several other malpractices such as multiple voting, vote stuffing, bribery, intimidation, violence and partisanship on the part of officials and security forces all supposed to be neutral in an election which was conceived on the basis of multipartism. In Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v. Greater Johannesburg Transitional Council, 1999(1) S.A.374 (c.c) the Constitutional Court of South Africa stated that:

"It is a fundamental principle of the rule of law, recognized widely, that the exercise of public power is only legitimate where lawful. The rule of law-to the extent at least that it expresses this principle of legality – is generally understood to be a fundamental principle of constitutional law. It seems central to the conception of our constitutional order that the legislature and executive in every sphere are constrained by the principle that they may exercise no power and perform no function beyond that which is conferred upon them by law. At least in this sense, then, the principle of legality is implied within the terms of the interim Constitution. Whether the principle of the rule of law has greater content than the principle of legality is not necessary for us to decide here. We need to merely hold that fundamental to the interim Constitution is a principle of legality. There is of course no doubt that the common law principles of ultra vires remain under the new constitutional order. However, they are underpinned (and supplemented where necessary) by a constitutional principle of legality. In relation to 'administrative action', the principle of legality is enshrined in s.24 (a)(1c). In relation to legislation and to executive acts that do not constitute 'administrative action', the principle of legality is necessarily implicit in the Constitution. Therefore, the question whether the various local governments acted intra vires in the case remains a constitutional question."

In my view, constitutionality and legality as provided for in our Constitution are matters on which compromise should never be permitted. Issue No. 3 which was framed by this court can be said on the face of it to be the most difficult to resolve because its determination depends on the consideration of matters beyond what is purely legal. The answer to this riddle is essentially governed by the words used in Section 59(6)(a) that the court must be satisfied that the result was not affected in a substantial manner. The provision transports the judge from the heights of legality and impartiality to the deep valleys of personal inclinations and political judgment.

In my opinion, it is implicit in the provisions of Section 59(6) (a) that before coming to a decision which complies with those provisions, a judge must be guided by much more than rules and principles of law. The provision appears to have been inserted in the Act to militate against decisions which arguably may be correct and constitutional but might appear to be awkward and unacceptable because of their possible consequences. Ultimately, the decision on issue No.3 will depend on the valour to consider and choose between a number of possible alternatives, each of which perhaps may be perfectly justified by findings on the facts and acts but whose consequences the decider is not certain. In my view, Section 59(6)(a) appears to have no other purpose than to force judges to consider and reflect on possible political consequences of their decision before making it. It creates a subjective test for the manner in which judges may use their discretion and personal conscience in reaching decisions that may result in controversial consequences. It was for fear of the use of such subjective discretion that in my reasons for the Courts' decision in Attorney General v. Paul Ssemwogerere& Hon. Zachary Olum, Const. Appeal No.3 of 2004, I observed that:

"In my view, Constitutional principles and rules should always be interpreted objectively and impartially without regard to consequences except in very exceptional circumstances which do not exist in this appeal. It would be an error to construe constitutional provisions on the basis of what that construction might lead to. It is untenable in a case of this nature to suggest that the Constitutional Court or any other court has or can exercise discretionary powers and decline or grant a remedy sought by a petitioner or litigant on the basis of some extraneous issues other than judicial and constitutional."

In these reasons, I have endeavoured to emphasise the supremacy of the 1995 Constitution of Uganda. Where Parliament is empowered to make a law to amplify a constitutional provision, it must do so, intra vires. It must not make bad law. In my considered opinion, section 59(6)(a) of the Presidential Elections Act which compels judges to operate in the near impossible circumstances and choices I have described, is bad law.

It is very important to bear in mind that in this Petition, this Court found that:

(1) There was non-compliance with the Constitution and Election laws.

(2) The principle of free and fair elections was compromised by bribery, intimidation and violence.

(3) The principles of equal suffrage, transparency and secrecy were infringed by multiple voting, vote stuffing and incorrect methods of ascertaining the results.

In my view, these findings were more than sufficient to compel a court to come to the conclusion that these substantial irregularities, malpractices and illegalities had the effect of affecting the results in a substantial manner without being subjected to the constraints of the provisions of Section 59(6)(a) of the Presidential Elections Act. Had the court found that the allegations were not well founded or were inadvertent or merely technical, it would equally dismiss the petition using its constitutional and legal powers. The unanimous findings of this court on framed issues Nos. 1 and 2 are compelling. The only final decision this Court can make is to order the holding of a fresh election. By such decision of this court, the political parties and candidates participating in the election as well as the Electoral Commission and its agents will have become more knowledgeable about what must and must not be done. This opportunity appears to have been lost to the nation of Uganda when by a majority of four to three, this court declined to nullify the Presidential Election of 2006.

Following the Presidential election in 2001, there was Petition No.1 of 2001, the first of its kind under the 1995 Constitution. The panel of this Court which heard and decided that petition also found that the provisions of the Constitution and the electoral laws of the country had been extensively violated. However, as in this petition, the court decided to dismiss that petition by a narrow margin of 3 to 2 because the majority felt as they have done in this petition that the offences they found to have occurred in that petition had not affected the results in a substantial manner. In my opinion, this Court in this petition and in petition No.1 of 2001, has raised the standard of proof required for an annulment of a Presidential election far beyond the capabilities of petitioners and the expectations of this nation to the extent that makes it impossible to predict what may happen in future.

It is my considered opinion however that for a result of a Presidential election to be flawed, the petitioner need only produce sufficient evidence to prove that the Constitution and laws of Uganda were violated in a substantial way and this finding alone should lead the court to hold that the results were affected in a substantial manner. There can be no mathematical formula to be used by Justices of the Supreme Court in reaching any decision on such petitions. There can be no justification for the view that since these illegalities, irregularities and malpractices were few and far in between, they did not constitute enough evidence. Such justification would, in my opinion, be fallacious. Judges cannot be expected to use speculative or doubtful mathematical calculations on the evidence presented and then turn round and say that their decision is an accurate and acceptable one. The only credible, constitutional and legitimate basis on which such a decision can be made is the extent to which, deliberately or otherwise, the Constitution and laws of Uganda were substantially violated. In my opinion, this should be the only concrete criterion upon which the court should safely act. The affidavits by Dr. Odwee and others, the experts in statistics were somehow helpful and assisted the court in understanding some of the issues. However, in my opinion, these reports were quite inconclusive and partial and did not convince this court to follow one or any of the routes suggested by those experts in order to come to any rational conclusion.

Incidentally, the Petitioner, his lawyers, the Respondents and their respective lawyers had little time in which to collect the evidence and materials in support or against the petition. It was especially more difficult for the Petitioner's team which was searching for relevant information much of which was in the possession of the 1st Respondent or its agents. Some of the affidavits and submissions indicated a reluctance and occasionally hostility towards the Petitioner's team as evidenced by the affidavits of Lucia Naggayi of Makindye West, Kamateneti, Ingrid Turinawe and her annexture "B" in Vol. 2 (c) of the Petitioner's affidavits and the replies by way of affidavits of George Maingo, James Were and Laban Muhwezi on behalf of the Respondents, to which I will refer later. The team was doing its work against partisanship exhibited by many public agents and institutions and supporters of the respondents. The Justices of the Supreme Court who shouldered the responsibility of pronouncing their findings on the petition had only thirty days from the date of its filing to consider and pronounce themselves on the matter. If the framers of the Constitution had intended the hearing of Presidential elections to be treated as ordinary civil or criminal trials and to use mathematical numbers in their verdict and decision, there would have been a provision for the necessity of collecting all the results in the whole country and giving more time to all concerned to analyse those materials. Certainly, there would have been need for all the reports of presiding officers at the election polling stations to be submitted and received by the parties and the Court before the hearing of the petition. This is one of the biggest handicaps that face parties and court in this kind of petition.

Despite this limitation, the Petitioner and his counsel managed to reveal many of the irregularities, malpractices and illegalities complained of in the petition which occurred in a number of areas they were able to investigate in the short period they had before filing the petition. In any event, the Petitioner's allegations were often supported by affidavits and reports of independent observers, some of which were recognized and fully accredited as observers in the election by the 1st Respondent. Significantly, as already noted, many of the allegations of illegal acts, malpractices and irregularities could have been proved or disproved by perusal of the reports of the election officials throughout the election exercise countrywide, but alas, as the court found, the 1st Respondent failed to produce them even though the law required it to do so. These same reports which are supposed to contain detailed information of what occurred before and during voting at polling centres throughout the country would have greatly assisted the parties to strengthen their submissions on some aspects of the petition. They would certainly have helped this court to get at the truth of some of the accusations.

In the absence of the reports, the petitioner and his counsel were entitled to rely on some other evidence which was also availed to this Court. The numerous affidavits filed by the parties contained much of the information needed for decision. The petitioner and his counsel filed some five volumes of affidavits while the affidavits of the respondents were covered in six volumes with a large number of deponents for each side. Equally important, were the various reports compiled during the election and filed for the purpose of hearing the petition. Several of these reports were made by respected and independent observers to whom I will revert later in these findings. Thus, it is revealed in the affidavits that whereas in some areas agents of the petitioner caught ferrying or bribing voters were arrested and detained, those doing exactly the same for the 2nd Respondent were either assisted or ignored by his agents and members of the security forces.

The report of the Foundation for Human Rights Initiative (FHRI) dated 25th February, 2006 contains numerous examples of irregularities, malpractices and intimidation. At P.3, it noted the following incidents:

"The EC split up some polling stations without notice to the voters. The FHRI, EOC noted that there were voters whose names appeared on registers in totally different parishes from those in which they thought they were registered and which were indicated on the voter's cards or on their voter registration slips. A number of voters shuffled between stations, in some cases for over 4 hours before they found their names or simply gave up. In Kikulu Zone in Kisasi College School polling station, in Kawempe North, one Kyakabale was arrested while giving out extra ballot papers to voters who are known NRM-O supporters at the polling station. In Kamukuzi M-Z polling station, Mbarara, one George Senzira, a polling assistant gave Pascal Nabasa, a voter, additional papers serial numbers 00170956 and 00170954. The incident was noted by the polling agents and the matter was reported to the Police.

In many areas, the FHRI, EOC noted that in some polling stations voters arrived to find that their names had been ticked already. It was noted that in Rubaga, Kampala at the West Church N-Z polling station, some candidates' agents were denied access to the voters' register by the presiding officers while other candidates' agents were given access and allowed to share desks with the presiding officers. In Mbarara, presiding officers refused to let people who were on the register to vote whereas in MakindyeGombolola polling station, people who were neither on the register nor held voters' cards were allowed to vote after being identified by the area LC Chairman. In Makerere, Mukwaya's polling station, the area LC3 Chairman was openly campaigning for the NRM Presidential candidate and the polling constable failed to stop him."

In Bungatira, Acwa, Gulu District, in Makindye, in Soroti and Kampala, the observers' reports contain several incidents of violence, intimidation and harassment by agents and members of the security forces against voters. They contain incidents of vote buying and bribery of voters.

Action for Development Observer Group monitored some districts which included Masaka, Tororo, Rukungiri, Pallisa, Kiboga, Lira, Soroti and Mbarara. Among its findings were that: omissions of names on the register were common. People feared the rumours that if people did not vote President YoweriMuseveni back into power, there was a possibility of war erupting. This fear was detected in the districts of Masaka, Kiboga, Rukungiri and Tororo. People whose names were not on registers would vote if they insisted but women would be turned away. In Nyanza, Kamonkoli and in Pallisa District, there were not enough election materials. At one polling station there was only one Presidential candidate, YoweriMuseveni with his photograph displayed. Other reports show that in some areas voting continued long after the constitutional closing time whereas in others, voting started very late. Multiple voting was very common in Mbarara barracks. In some areas such as Lubongi polling areas in Tororo District, persons under age had been registered and they were allowed to vote.

The report of the Democracy Monitoring Group which consisted of three civil society organizations namely: Uganda Joint Christian Council (UJCC), Action For Development (ACFODE) and Uganda Journalists Safety Committee (UJSC) noted that in Rwemiyaga, Rubaya, Kabale District,

"the elections were fair. However, there was general singing of all people and rejoicing that the money from Mr. Museveni camp will make him win. The money came in two batches (sic.) as follows: the first round they received 50,000/= cash and the second round they received 40,000/=. This money in general was distributed amongst all villages in the sub-county. In my opinion, this money induced most voters to vote for Museveni. The second issue was rampant threats that if people did not vote for NRM, there would be civil war and this forced people to vote for Mr. Museveni lest they are not (sic.) killed. So for these reasons, it seems that people did not vote according to their will."

The affidavit of the 2nd Respondent on the question of facilitation of NRM candidates and his agents, states, inter alia:

"7. That the main strategy for the campaign was physical voter contact tasked to the NRM branch/village task forces throughout the country.

8. That the primary responsibility of each branch/village task force was to persuade each voter in its area to vote for me and all NRM candidates from village to national levels …

9. That a national budget for facilitating all NRM candidates' campaigns was prepared and approved by the Central Executive Committee …. A copy of a typical sample of the said payment voucher is attached hereto and marked as Annexture R2A1.

10. That the figures indicated in paragraphs 6 to 23, 25 and 27 of Musumba's affidavit are not true. There was no such regular pattern of distribution, and disbursements depended on amounts received at Central Executive Committee level and the facilitation needs at the various levels.

11. That all funds raised by the NRM were exclusively spent on facilitation of the campaigns as stated in this affidavit and no money was ever disbursed for the purpose of bribing voters as falsely alleged by ProscoviaSalaamuMusumba in paragraph 26 of her affidavit."

The payment voucher bearing the name of Mzee Muwumba Samuel who is the NRM District Chairman of Jinja District reveals that for that District alone Shs. 87,850,000 was dispatched by the NRM for facilitation.

Affidavits in support of the petitioner and evidence of independent observers show that much of the money disclosed in the affidavits of the 2nd Respondent and the accompanying vouchers was actually spent in bribing voters. The 2nd Respondent and his supporters strongly deny the charge and depone that the money was used to facilitate agents and voters. In the case of Jinja District, the sum of Shs. 87,850,000 was released for the District on the 17th of February, 2006, several days before the election day. It is not disclosed when that money reached the constituencies in Jinja district and when it was actually distributed to recipients. Whatever the position, this is a colossal sum of money to effectively facilitate anyone within just a few days from voting. Under the circumstances, it is not easy to distinguish between the meaning of facilitation and that of bribery. However, what is crucially clear from all the evidence is that democracy and elections in Uganda have been truly monetized. It is no longer voting for the best candidate but the candidate who is the most able to facilitate or bribe voters. It is now the position that democracy in Uganda today depends on the wealth or financial capacity of candidates. In this kind of situation, it becomes a mockery to speak of freedom and fairness in the elections and voting system of Uganda. In my view, democracy and political power have almost been increasingly transformed into the exclusive property of the highest bidder in money terms and he or she who owns or controls the national purse is bound to be that highest bidder as aptly noted in the Commonwealth observers' Report (supra).

Jack Sabiiti, M.P for Rukiga County in Kabale District, and an FDC Parliamentary candidate, deponed that:

7. Most of the appointment letters were confiscated and as a result the petitioner did not have agents at most of the polling stations in time.

9. That on the eve of polling day there was widespread bribery of voters by the 2nd Respondent's agents who were escorted and protected by the police throughout Rwamucucu and Bukinda in Rukiga.

14. That at polling stations in Kamwezi and Bukinda sub-county, Kabale District, Charles Mayombo and Julius Ndihohabwe, agents of the 2nd Respondent openly distributed sugar and salt to voters while telling them to vote for the 2nd Respondent.

30. That the Chairman of LC3 Butanda Sub-county together with the GISO, Matiya, beat up FDC polling agents who ran away from the polling stations.

Hon. Sabiiti lists more than 20 other malpractices and illegalities allegedly committed by agents of the 2nd Respondent. In his supplementary affidavit, General MuntuMugisha of the FDC, lists a number of irregularities in the tally sheets and methods of verifying the results nationwide and called for a recount of all votes.

Mr. James Birungi of Kibaale County, Kamwenge District deponed that on the polling day, he was monitoring the voting process on behalf of the FDC when he met a pick-up carrying 15 LDUs/SPCs and moving in the area. The LDUs and SPCs would disembark from the pick-up from place to place and intimidate people shouting to people that if there were any supporters of the FDC amongst them, such people would be identified and punished and that he found FDC voters to be indeed very scared. He claimed that there were other malpractices such as allowing people to vote without verification, returning officers folding multiple voting cards and giving them to people to cast for the 2nd Respondent. He cites cases of serious vote buying and attempts by the agents of the 2nd Respondents in buying the agents of the petitioner and possible voters with sums of money ranging from Shs. 500,000 to 20,000. He cited the case of one Mr. Musise Rogers who operated a bodaboda between Kamwenge and Kabarole who was rejoicing that he had just received about Shs. 15,000 in bribery and he had then decided to vote for President Museveni because FDC had no money to offer.

Patrick Kitimbodeponed on events that occurred in Iganga District which he monitored for the FDC on the polling day. He stated that the 2nd Respondents' agents and supporters wearing yellow NRM T-shirts and holding guns, beat FDC supporters and blocked many of them from voting or moving anywhere near polling stations, that FDC agents were kidnapped and detained by the 2nd Respondents' agents who are also local council officials. He further deponed that the FDC agents were prevented from the voting table and were therefore unable to see what the presiding officers were doing. Hon. Augustine Ruzindana, M.P deponed on events in Ntungamo District on election day. He stated, inter alia, that soldiers and intelligence operatives were involved in effecting arrests and harassment of the Petitioner's supporters and agents. He further stated that there was widespread distribution of money and commodities such as blankets, bitambi, iron sheets, sugar and salt as inducements to voters to vote for the 2nd Respondent.

Abdu Katuntu who was Chairman for FDC in Bugwericounty also made a report on the 2006 Presidential elections. He deponed that, amongst other occurrences, a group of armed men wearing NRM party colours camped at Busese Mixed Primary School and traversed Bugweri County campaigning for the 2nd Respondent and Mr. KirundaKivejinja, who was the NRM Parliamentary candidate. The said group was led by one Lt. Mulindwa also known as Surambaya, that these men moved from village to village threatening and intimidating people who did not support the 2nd Respondent and Mr. Kivejinja. He further stated that these armed men assaulted a number of FDC supporters and several cases were reported to Idudi Police post vide the following references

SD/17/22/01/06, SD/18/22/01, SD/19/22/01/06, SD/31/01/06, SD/13/19/08, etc, that on 21st January, 2006, the same men attacked Idudi trading centre and shot in the air and thereafter occupied the town for 2 hours, shooting with Ak47 assault rifles, pistols and using sticks while some of them were defacing the election posters of the petitioner and those of the deponent.

The deponent claims that he reported these incidents to the Minister of Internal Affairs, Dr. RuhakanaRugunda and pointed out the terror that was being perpetuated by this group. Apparently, the Minister promised to have these men disarmed and forced to leave Bugweri County. This was temporarily done. However, they returned to the District and on the eve of the election, they arrested two of the FDC campaign managers from Bukoteka village and detained them at their camp at Busese Mixed Primary School. The deponent also alleges that these same group of men invaded Busembatya Town Council on the eve of the elections and arrested a number of FDC supporters whom they tortured and maimed. The deponent attaches two photographs showing men in yellow shirts, some of whom are carrying guns and sticks. These events were not denied or fully explained to the court by the Respondents or their counsel beyond the general denials that any of these irregularities, malpractices or illegalities took place. The denials are supported by the Respondents' own affidavits and those of many officials of the 1sr Respondent, army and police officers and supporters of the 2nd Respondent. For nearly every petition alleging these offences against them, the Respondents filed a counterpart or more deponed to confirm the denials. Typical of these affidavits are the following;

"That I was the Ag. Sub-County Chief of Rukoni sub-county and my role was to receive results after polling: That the allegations contained in the said affidavit are false, malicious and unfounded. That during the entire campaign and election period, I did not witness any extraordinary presence of the Presidential Protection Unit in Rukoni Sub-county apart from an occasional presence of a small contingent of escorts that were protecting the Parliamentary candidate for Ruhama County, Mrs. Janet Museveni"

Paul BakoleBwire from Busia District deponed that in the recently concluded Presidential, Parliamentary and Local Council elections, he was part of the NRM District team charged with the responsibility of overseeing and monitoring the conduct of the electoral process. He states that on the 22nd and 23rd February, 2006, he moved to various areas of the District to monitor the situation and to pay out to the NRM officials' money meant for polling agents for their transport and facilitation of the NRM and its candidates. There were 8 agents at each polling station and each agent was entitled to Ug. Shs. 5000 (Five thousand only) for the day's work. He further stated that later he, together with others in his group, were met by the police who arrested them (for bribery related offences). They were detained but later released on police bond. On search, the police found on his person a sum of Shs. 260,000 which was taken by the police as exhibit. This is one of the rare occasions deponed on when security forces acted properly upon allegations that supporters of the 2nd Respondent were breaking the law.

Mr. MasikoJoramdeponed on events which Hon. Jack Sabiiti had claimed occurred at Bubaare sub-county, Kabale District, and said that the contents of paragraph 7 of Sabiitis' affidavit were untrue and that the elections were conducted in a peaceful atmosphere and he did not receive any complaints of any malpractice. Mr. Obong Geoffrey of Mbarara Police Station deponed that he and a colleague by the name of Rwigyema, a Prison Warder No. 8741 were deployed at Kamukuzi M-Z polling station and polling commenced at 8:00 a.m in the morning and was closed at 5:00 p.m in the presence of all but one agent (UPC agent) and observers, and that he did not witness any form of chasing away of agents nor the distribution of pre-ticked ballot papers in favour of any candidate.

Kakaire Ahmed who was Chairman of the Idudi Parish tribunal, in Iganga, deponed that the allegations made by one KaboodeAbudu and Nafula Christine in their respective affidavits in favour of the petitioner are false. MasodoB.Abbey of Bulungule Parish, Buyanga sub-county, Iganga District was the presiding officer at Nakawala N-Z polling station during the Presidential elections, 2006, and he deponed that, contrary to the contents of the affidavits deponed by one MuwazaSulaimani whom he knows personally and that of Nabaja Sarah, the complaints they contain are not true. Robert Mugabi was the presiding officer at Kirungu outside Quarter Guard, M-Z polling station – Code 41 and having read the affidavit of Ssebowa Ibrahim, he himself deponed that there was no such polling station as "Omumahe Polling Station", and that it is not true as alleged that the FDC agents were chased away from the polling station over which he presided near the barracks in Kichwamba sub-county in Kabarole District.

A Mr. Fox Odoi, a Legal Assistant in the office of the President deponed that on election day of 23rd February, he went to Tororo Central Police Station to report alleged acts of bribery of voters by the FDC members in Tororo and that at no time whatsoever did he intimidate, torture or assault any supporters of the Petition or any other person at all. Mr. Francis Museveni of Kibale Village, Bufundi sub-county, Kabale District deponed that the allegations contained in the affidavits of TwinomukagoVanice and of Hon. Jack Sabiiti in support of the petition are false and malicious and that no NRM government officials and or LCs forced any voter to vote from the table as alleged and there was no intimidation, bribery, alcohol and open/forced voting as alleged at all. Mr. Onen David Michael deponed as Assistant District Registrar of Nebbi District with responsibility of updating and maintaining the District voter's Register. In his affidavit, he maintained that the allegations made by Samuel and RoselineAngom that they were prevented from voting are untrue. Many other deponents in support of the Respondents' denials swore that the election was free and fair and was not characterized by acts of bribery, disfranchisement, intimidation, harassment or violence as claimed by the petitioner and in the affidavits supporting him.

There is also evidence that acts of intimidation, bribery and breaches of the law were committed by agents or persons working for the election of the Petitioner. I am not persuaded by the arguments of one of the Petitioner's Counsel, Mr. Matovu, that a Petitioner is entitled to break the laws and violate the Constitution of Uganda provided that if at the end of the day, he or she is the loser, they cannot be affected by the provisions of the Constitution and laws of this country. In my opinion, this is a very cynical and unacceptable view of what true democracy and constitutionalism is all about. This kind of argument ignores the fact that one of the orders this court is empowered to give is that a petitioner may be declared as having won the election in which event he or she is expected to assume office as new President. If Mr. Matovu's ingenuous argument were to be accepted, the country would end up with a President who is equally or more tainted with illegalities which in my opinion would be a manifest absurdity. In consequence, Mr. Matovu's contention must be rejected as void of merit.

In my view however, it is not so much that any party or all of them who stood in the Presidential elections of 23rd February were guilty or innocent of the offences complained of as much as the fact that this court found them to be generally proved. What tainted this election is not the guilt of the parties but of the offences that were committed before and during its conduct. The violation of the Constitution and the laws of Uganda committed by diverse persons throughout the country is what is of crucial importance. For instance, section 23 of the Presidential Elections Act (Act 16 of 2005) provides that:

(1) During the campaign period, every public authority and public institution shall give equal treatment to all candidates and their agents."

Section 24(1) of the same Act obliges State owned media to give equal treatment to candidates to present their programmes to the people.

It is clear that these provisions were blatantly violated, with the 2nd Respondent getting the lion's share of both the public authorities support including that of the 1st Respondent and of the State media.

The report of the Independent Democracy Section of the Commonwealth Secretariat whose representatives monitored the Presidential election noted that:

"The NRM-O, taking maximum advantage of the existing and operational Movement structures, used government resources, vehicles and personnel and received overwhelming coverage on state television and radio. It was noted that the NRM-O and the Movement with its organs, share many of their senior personnel. This office-sharing arrangement has been note in Bundibugyo, Kamwenge and Kabarole in the Western Region."

Incidentally, the Commonwealth observer team appears to have been misinformed about the NRM-O. There was no such political party called the NRM-O participating in the 2006 elections. Following the NRM "conversion" to multipartism, its leaders decided that they too would participate in the forthcoming elections as a party called the National Resistance Movement Organisation (NRM-O). However, when it came to registration, the leaders of the party registered the National Resistance Movement (NRM) as the party participating in the 2006 elections. They also registered the NRM symbol of a bus and its colour of yellow as those of the same NRM party to participate in the 2006 elections. It is this party which participated in the 2006 elections. It is at this stage that other prospective participating political parties and others should have challenged this apparent deception. They did not, and have only themselves to blame.

Be that as it may, the Commonwealth observers Report states that:

"Notwithstanding those provisions of the Presidential and Parliamentary Elections Act that restrict the use of state resources for election campaigns, it was not uncommon to find that the NRM-O Presidential candidate and many NRM Parliamentary candidates availed themselves liberally of the facilities and resources which only government could provide."

On bribery and other inducements, the Commonwealth observers' report continues:

"During the campaigns, government pronouncements were routinely made at NRM-O platforms and in manifestos with government affairs in a way that was indistinguishable from bribery. Bribery is incompatible with free and fair elections. Our team in Mbale specifically observed the distribution of cash to voters on the eve of polling day. The NRM-O Presidential candidate spoke out against the practice of inducing voters with gifts of soap, sugar and salt. This practice was not restricted to anyone political party, although the most resourced party, was the most frequent offender."

DEMGROUP noted that cases of bribery were 'rampant' during the campaign and on polling day, although many cases were not reported to the police. On polling day, the incumbent MP in Arua district was arrested on allegations of vote buying as was the incumbent woman MP for Yumbe District.

The Commonwealth observer team report on violence, intimidation and harassment is equally damning. With all these grave reports, it would surely have been a little short of a miracle for anyone to expect the 2006 Presidential elections to be free and fair. In my view, had the Presidential elections of 2006 been organized and conducted in accordance with the Constitution and laws of Uganda, the 2nd Respondent would have obtained less votes and the petitioner would have got more than they received. There is no formula by which anyone can tell how much the difference would have been. The only sure way is to have a fresh election which complies with the Constitution and laws of the country. Only in that way, can Ugandans be certain about the results as to who won fairly and lost equally.

In my view, the illegalities, malpractices and irregularities reported and proved to the unanimous satisfaction of this court dug too deep in the foundations and legitimacy of the Presidential elections of 2006 and leave no shadow of doubt that that election was fatally flawed and a fresh one ought to be ordered and held. For these reasons my response to issue No.3 can only be in the affirmative. I find that the Presidential election results of 2006 were affected in a substantial manner.

I now turn to framed issue No.4. This issue concerns illegal practices and electoral offences allegedly committed by the 2nd Respondent personally or by his agents with his knowledge and consent or approval. The petitioner lists these malpractices and offences in paragraphs 11 and 12 of his affidavit as follows:

11. Your petitioner avers that the 2nd Respondent personally committed the following illegal practices and or offences, while campaigning.

(a) Used words or made statements that were malicious, contrary to S.24 of the Presidential Elections Act.

(b) ade statements containing sectarian words or innuendos against your petitioner and or his party and other candidates, contrary to S.24(5)(c) of the Presidential Elections Act.

(c) Made abusive insulting and or derogatory statements against the petitioner, F.D.C and other candidates, contrary to S.24(5)(c) of the Presidential Elections Act.

(d) Made exaggerations of the Petitioner's period of service in government and the reason why he moved from the several portfolios your Petitioner held in government and he also variously ridiculed the petitioner, contrary to S.24(5)(e) of the Presidential Elections Act.

(e) Used derisive or mudslinging words against the petitioner.

(f) Used defamatory and or insulting words contrary to S.23(3)(b) of the Presidential Elections Act.

(g) The 2nd Respondent made statements which were false either knowingly or recklessly at a rally namely,

(i) That the FDC frustrated the efforts to build another dam.

(ii) That I was working in alliance with Kony PRA and other Terrorists.

(iii) That I was an opportunist and a deserter.

12. The petitioner further contends that the 2nd Respondent committed acts of bribery of the electorate by his agents with either his consent and or approval.

(a) Bribery of voters just before and during the elections, contrary to S.64 of the Presidential Election Act.

(b) Attempting and interfering with the free exercise of the franchise of voters contrary to S.26 (c) of the Presidential Elections Act.

(c) By agents procuring the votes of individuals by giving out tarpaulins, saucepans, water containers, salt, sugar and other beverages and making promises of giving such beverages.

The 2nd Respondent denies each and every one of the above allegations. He deponed a lengthy affidavit containing many excerpts of what he said he stated on diverse places and times and giving explanations and reasons for his assertions. These detailed statements are contained in the affidavit of YoweriKagutaMusevenideponed at Kisozi on the 12.03.2006. He categorically denied a number of the allegations made in paragraphs 11 and 12 of the petition. On offences allegedly committed by persons who could be regarded as his agents, he deponed as follows:

27. That in reply to paragraph 21 of the Petitioner's affidavit, I did not authorize any interference with the free exercise of voters' franchise nor was what is alleged to have been done, done with my knowledge, consent or approval.

28. That the conduct of the person referred to in paragraph 22 of the Petitioners' affidavit in connection with the killing at Bulange was not with my knowledge and consent or approval. I am aware that the person has been charged before a court of law and due process of the law is taking its course.

29. That the alleged conduct by Fox Odoi in paragraph 23 of the Petitioner's affidavit was not authorized by me and was done without my knowledge and consent or approval and it is the subject of police investigations. Fox Odoi was not my agent and I was very displeased when I was informed about the incident.

In my view, SS.23 and 24 of the Presidential Elections Act which deal with the rights of a candidate and the possible offences he or she may commit during election campaigns are contradictory and therefore unhelpful to this court because the two sections first mix up a number of issues and then proceed to contradict each other.

Section 23(1) provides that;

"During the campaign period, every public officer, public authority and public institution shall, give equal treatment to all candidates and their agents."

Section 23(2) provides that;

"Subject to the Constitution and any other law, every candidate shall enjoy complete and unhindered freedom of expression and access to information in the exercise of the right to campaign under this Act."

The next set of rights and freedoms of candidates are to be found in Section 24 which provides that:

(1) All Presidential candidates shall be given equal treatment on the state media to present their programmes to the people.

(2) Subject to any other law, during the campaign period, any candidate may, either alone or in common with others, publish campaign materials in the form of books, booklets, pamphlets, leaflets, magazines, newspapers or posters intended to solicit votes from voters but shall, in such publication, specify particulars to identify the candidate or candidates concerned.

Subsequently, the two sections provide what may be described as clawback provisions. Section 23(3) provides that a person shall not, while campaigning use any language-which constitutes incitement to public disorder, insurrection or violence or which threatens war, or which is defamatory or insulting or which constitutes incitement to hatred.

Thus, sub-section 3(b) annihilates the unhindered rights and freedoms the Act appears to create for candidates in its other provisions. Similarly, section 24(5) derogates from the freedoms and rights already given by creating the seven so-called offences in the campaigns which it enumerates in its paragraphs (a) to (g).

It appears to me that the draftsmen of this Act failed to appreciate the serious nature of the contradictions they allowed to slip into the statute. Be that as it may, a court faced with these contradictions must utilise other sources of law including its own concept of what is fair and just in the particular case to resolve disputes.

In law, the allegations made by the Petitioner as having been committed by the 2nd Respondent have to be proved strictly as any other criminal charges under the Uganda Criminal Code and criminal proceedings. The reason for this high standard of proof is that a candidate found guilty of them may face serious consequences including criminal charges under section 59(9) of the Presidential Elections Act, 16 of 2005. Counsel for the Petitioner contended that with regard to the offences he enumerated and described as having been committed by the 2nd Respondent would, if proved, make the 2nd Respondent personally and strictly liable. If that be the case, in my opinion therefore, it is imperative then for the petitioner to prove those allegations beyond reasonable doubt. The burden on the petitioner becomes greater than the preponderance of proof on a balance of probabilities.

The authors of "The Election Laws of India" published by the Law Publishers (India) PVT.Ltd, 1998, observe that:

"The Supreme Court (of India) has indicated a note of caution that in election speeches, appeals are made by candidates of opposing political parties often in an atmosphere surcharged with partisan feelings and emotions. Use of hyperboles or exaggerated language or adoption of metaphors and extravagance of expression in attacking one party or a candidate are very common and court should consider the real thrust of the speech without labouring to dissect one or two sentences of the speech, to decide whether the speech was really intended to generate in proper passions on the score of religion, caste, community, etc. In deciding whether a party or his collaborators had indulged in corrupt practices regard must be had to the substance of the matter rather than mere form or phraseology.

I am persuaded that the above passage represents the proper balance when considering the effect of the wrongs complained of in this petition. In order to constitute an election crime or corrupt offence, the facts and circumstances of it must be such as are tainted with malice sufficient to constitute mensrea of the crime. The particular candidate who is accused of the offence and the person against whom it was committed must be so closely identifiable that a direct nexus is proved beyond reasonable doubt between the maker and the alleged victim or victims. A number of the allegations in this petition have been freely admitted by the Respondent who at the same time has given reasons and explanations in his defence which in my opinion are feasible and acceptable. Yet, these accusations have to be proved beyond reasonable doubt.

The statements complained of in this petition are nothing more than boasts, exaggerations and vulgarities typical of political insults intended to enhance the speaker's chances of success in an election and dampen those of his or her opponents in turn. For a political rival to call another a failure or an opportunist or a weakling does not, in my opinion amount to anything capable of being interpreted as an offence against the law, sections 23 and 24 of the Presidential Elections Act, notwithstanding. In consequence, my answer to issue No.4 would definitely be in the negative. I would absolve the 2nd Respondent of the charges and allegations made against him personally.

Finally, I come to issue No.5. In my opinion, the Constitution strictly prohibits any violation of any of its provisions or those of any legitimate law of Uganda. In my view, it is the solemn and bounden duty of Uganda courts to ensure that the sanctity and sovereignty of the Uganda Constitution and the legitimacy of its laws are respected and complied with, unconditionally. Once the Constitution is violated and Uganda laws flouted, there can be no other law or cause for which the appropriate remedy may be denied a party. That remedy must be granted. None of the candidates in the 2006 Presidential election has convinced me that they did not break the constitution and electoral laws of Uganda and therefore none deserves to be declared the winner of that election. I would therefore allow this petition.

It was because of the reasons I have given while discussing the framed issues that I agreed that a fresh election be held in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. I would make no order as to the costs of this petition. I would annul the Presidential election held on 23rd February, 2006 and order that a fresh election be held in accordance with the constitution.

Before concluding these reasons however, I am constrained to observe that the non-compliance with and violations of the principles of the Constitution, the Presidential Elections Act and the Electoral Commission Act, which this court has unanimously found to have occurred, were caused principally by the continued existence and sustenance of electoral structures created and personnel appointed originally to serve one political organization, being called upon and entrusted with, in 2006, to organize and conduct elections in which more than one political party including that one organization, were seriously and acrimoniously competing for power.

The partisan nature and behaviour of the national electoral agents, the security forces including the police, the UPDF and the government Press and other media to the extent of showing bias and, in some instances, open animosity while actively working for and favouring one set of candidates as was clearly shown in many affidavits, annextures and observers' reports during the hearing of this petition, can only be of the greatest national concern.

There can be no justification for the view that the irregularities, malpractices and illegal acts were few and far in between. Judges have the responsibility to pronounce themselves on a disputed matter guided only by the Constitution and laws of Uganda. In my view, to prove that the results of a Presidential election were affected in a substantial manner, all that a petitioner needs to show is that both the Constitution and the laws of the land were substantially violated. It is also my view that thereafter the court must come out bravely and vigorously protect the Constitution and legitimate laws of Uganda.

Failure to protect and defend the Constitution and Laws of the Country would tantamount to the abdication of the judicial function just as to travel outside them in search of an answer to a petition would be embarking on a voyage of discovery beyond the realm of constitutional and legal boundaries.

Dated at Mengo this 31st day of January 2007.

Dr. G.W. Kanyeihamba

JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT

EXEGESIS OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JUSTICE PROF. DR. KANYEIHAMBA, J.S.C

INTRODUCTION

Elections and the adjudication of disputes arising therefrom are embedded in constitutionalism and the rule of law. Constitutionalism in this sense speaks to the adherence of both the letter and spirit of a constitution; that is, the core values upon which a constitution is based (such as a democratic governance system, human rights, independence of the judiciary and the rule of law). Given the direct link between elections and the governance structures within a constitution, elections and the resolution of disputes emanating therefrom are of great importance since it is through elections that government is constituted and power distributed. Thus, the conduct of free and fair elections in an environment where political leaders are committed to constitutionalism contributes to quality governance. In the same vein, the independence of national institutions responsible for the elections (such as the electoral commissions) and adjudication of disputes that may arise thereafter (such as the judiciary) ought to be guided by similar ideals. It is these ideals of establishing a new dispensation of democratic governance in which the management of elections was undertaken in line with constitutionalism that formed the heart of the Constitution of Uganda, 1995.

JUSTICE KANYEIHAMBA

In a dissenting opinion, Justice Kanyeihamba, (2006, paras 1-24) found that there was sufficient evidence presented for the Court to decide as follows: that the presidential election was so badly conducted, and fatally affected by irregularities, malpractices and illegalities, as to affect the final results in a substantive manner; therefore, the result of the election ought not to have been upheld. He decried the fact that 'the Court, having unanimously found that the alleged contraventions of the electoral laws occurred, they were bound to annul the election, and to find otherwise would be based purely on the conjecture and personal inclination of the judges' (2006, para.19).

He went further, saying (2006, para. 20): Such an opinion would be grossly unfair to Ugandans because the 1st respondent refused adamantly to produce the only evidence which could have helped the petitioner, 2nd respondent, and this Court, to prove and be satisfied that the allegations that were irregularities, malpractices and illegalities were justified or unjustified.

In other words, according to Justice Kanyeihamba, where the Court found unacceptably widespread contraventions of electoral laws that affected the quality of the election, it should have annulled the election.

LEGAL PRINCIPLES FOR ANNULLING ELECTIONS

The legislative intent of s.59(6)(c) appears to be the need to prevent presidential candidates from committing electoral offences similar to those witnessed during the 1980 general elections. As discussed above, during the 1980 elections presidential candidate Milton Obote and his supporters intimidated voters and threatened their political opponents with death. This lawlessness disenfranchised the voters and also disadvantaged Obote's challengers in the elections. Despite this, Obote was declared president and his Uganda People's Congress the winner of the elections.

Under the current presidential electoral legal framework, similar acts are recognised as electoral offences and they are prohibited by the Presidential Elections Act and the Electoral Commission Act. Though the Supreme Court found violations of electoral laws it held that they were not committed by President Museveni, or with his knowledge or approval by his agent. Therefore, it could not invalidate the elections on the basis of s.59(6)(c). This suggests that the provision imposes an obligation on presidential candidates to conduct themselves in a manner that does not defeat or violate electoral laws. Sub section (c) also implies personal liability. Violations of electoral laws, even those from which a presidential candidate gains unfair electoral advantages, do not engage the candidate's liability if they are not committed by the candidate or by their agent with the candidate's knowledge or approval. Therefore, under s.59(6)(c), the Supreme Court may only invalidate elections where a presidential candidate fails to conform to standards of electoral conduct, or where the candidate's agent with the candidate's consent or approval, violates electoral laws. With regard to s.59(6)(b), this provision is designed to remedy the exclusion of persons who do not meet the constitutional criteria for the presidency. It is intended to preserve the calibre of presidential candidates from which the electorate can choose.

These legal principles are applied by the courts in the adjudication of electoral complaints in order to protect the will of the people. The danger, however, is that regardless of collusion in electoral laws and institutions in a country or jurisdiction, the legal principles for adjudicating electoral complaints assume that the outcomes of elections are pure and uncorrupted. They should only be invalidated in exceptional circumstances. In many countries electoral laws indicate that the complainant must prove that these irregularities changed the outcome of the election in a substantial manner. This is in instances where the validity of the election is challenged on the basis of irregularities. This is because elections are meant to give a voice to the will of the people and to provide governments with the authority to exercise power. Therefore, technical irregularities during elections should not affect the declared results unless they distort the will of the people by changing the election outcome. Courts in many jurisdictions have held that election outcomes should only be overturned in extraordinary circumstances, where evidence of illegality, dishonesty, unfairness, malfeasance or other misconduct is clear; and most importantly where such improper behaviour has distorted the will of the people.

THE SUBSTANTIALITY TEST V THE STRICT APPROACH TEST.

In deciding election petitions, two schools of legal thoughts have been adopted, One school of thought pushes for substantiality test. This was heavily supported by Justice Benjamin Odoki and Joseph Mulenga. On the other hand, the second school of thought which is the strict or qualitative approach was heavily supported Justice Professor George William Kanyeihamba and Wilson Tsekoko. The school of thought claims that noncompliance with the electoral laws automatically leads to nullification of the election. It looks at the quality of the election.

The Court has placed undue reliance on a quantitative test in interpreting the phrase 'affected the result of the election in a substantial manner', and set an extremely restrictive and nearly impossible standard for a petitioner to meet. The substantiality test states that numbers are important in assessing the effect of noncompliance with the law on the election result.

The Majority of the Court found that in applying PEA s.59(6)(a) to this matter, it was respecting the spirit of the law in the Constitution art.1(4). This deals with the sovereignty of the people and provides that 'the people shall be governed through their will and consent' (2016, para.19). It therefore opined that s.59(6)(a) enables the Court to reflect on whether the proved irregularities affected the election to the extent that the ensuing results did not reflect the choice of the majority of voters as envisaged inart.1 (4) of the Constitution, and in fact negated the voter's intent (2016, para.20).The Supreme Court have declared that although the mathematical impact of noncompliance is critical in determining whether or not to annul an election, its evaluation of evidence and resulting decision is not exclusively based on the quantitative test. Nevertheless, the court if not satisfied that noncompliance did not affect the result of the election in any substantial manner will not annul the election.

ELECTION RESULTS: A QUESTION OF QUALITY NOT QUANTITY

The legitimacy of a democratic government is established in large measure by credible elections. Credible elections occur in an electoral environment in which the citizenry can participate without fear or obstruction; political parties, candidates, and the media can operate freely; and independent state and democratic institutions function fairly and expeditiously. Also, electoral laws must be fair, they should be adhered to, and they should be capable of translating votes into the free will of the people in order to preserve the credibility of elections. It is therefore important that the law should seek to protect all aspects of the electoral process in order to preserve the credibility or quality of elections. In some jurisdictions, electoral laws seek to achieve this aim. Examples of these include the Election Act 173 1988, s.56(a) of South Africa which allows the Electoral Commission or the Electoral Court to declare elections invalid where a serious irregularity has occurred concerning any aspect of an election. Also the Electoral Act 2010, s.138 (b) of Nigeria provides that elections may be annulled by reason of corrupt practices or noncompliance with the provisions of the same Act.

Courts have also strived to protect the quality of elections. In the case of Valance v Rosier, the Supreme Court of Louisiana (1996, para. 32) held that:

"If the court finds that the proven frauds and irregularities were of such serious nature as to deprive the voters of the free expression of their will, or as to make it impossible to determine the outcome of the election, it will decree the nullity of the entire election even though the contestant cannot prove that he would have been elected but for such fraud or irregularities."

This case stands for the proposition that where widespread violations of electoral laws occur, they affect the quality of the elections because they distort the will of people and therefore the elections should be annulled.

Another example of where the court invalidated an election because it was conducted so badly that the credibility of the election could not be assured, is in the Hackney Case, Gill v Reed and Holms[1114]. In this case, only 2 of the 19 polling stations were closed; as a result, 5 000 voters could not vote. The court did not engage in the impossible exercise of determining which candidate would have benefited from 5 000 votes had they been cast. It annulled the election on the basis that it was badly conducted and in noncompliance with electoral laws. In this context, the term 'election result' is conceived of as a question of quality informing an election's outcome. It is seen as the entire electoral process not limited to only the votes tallied, because the outcome of the election cannot be guaranteed where the processes that deliver it are corrupted

Uganda's only post-independence attempt at conducting elections in 1980 was marred by electoral illegalities. Also, history indicates that unelected leaders have held political power at all costs. These factors, including the need to reverse the country's history of political and constitutional instability, (as expressed in the Preamble and art.1(4) of the Constitution) motivated the country's desire to hold free and fair elections in order to be ruled by consent. During the public debates on the Constitution, Ugandans demanded that 'electoral laws should be built into the new constitution in order for elections to be the mechanism for the smooth transfer of power from one administration to another'. In Presidential Election Petition No.1 2006, the Supreme Court found instances of ballot paper stuffing in at least 22 out of the 69 districts. Over 2000 ballot papers were stuffed at one polling station and more than 600 people voted at a sham polling station. It also found evidence of falsification of results by the Uganda Electoral Commission, and voter intimidation and voter bribes by persons associated with the president (2006, para.124). In PEP No.1 2016 the court criticised the Uganda Electoral Commission for late delivery of voting materials, which led to a substantial number of voters being unable to vote. The commission was also accused of failing to provide a credible explanation as to why the results of the election were delayed or missing in 1787 polling stations (paras. 97 and 123). It also noted that in some cases, the petitioner's agents were denied information to which they were entitled. Among other acts of electoral lawlessness, the police and other security agencies interfered with the petitioner's electioneering activities (paras 145-149).

[1114][1874] 2 O M & H 77 E.L.R 263

These widespread electoral malpractices violated core constitutional values in that they undermined the principles on which the new democratic dispensation in Uganda was founded. In doing so they affected the quality of elections as envisioned by the citizenry of Uganda and as provided for in the Constitution. The conclusion was that the election was not only noncompliant with domestic electoral laws but also disregarded core constitutional values. Thus the quality and result of the election were affected in a substantial manner, in terms of s.59(6)(a). The result of the elections is interpreted to mean the number of votes cast but not the quality of the electoral process, as has been preferred by the Supreme Court, fails to protect the quality of elections. It also defeats fair political contestation and it is inadequate in protecting the will of the people.

CONCLUSION

Despite the Supreme Court's findings of widespread violations of electoral laws, it held that these violations were not personally committed by President Museveni or with his knowledge or approval by his agent. The overall effect of such electoral offences was that they distorted the will of the people. The legislative intent of s.59(6)(c) is to prevent presidential candidates from both committing electoral offences similar to those witnessed during the 1980 elections, and benefitting from them. Given the Court's findings, it is reasonable to conclude that President Museveni acquired advantages in the elections as the result of electoral offences which also disadvantaged the electorate. The law should allow for elections to be annulled in instances where a candidate gains advantages over competitors, or disadvantages the electorate as a result of widespread violations of electoral laws. This should be regardless of whether the violations were personally committed by the candidate declared as president or with their knowledge or approval by their agent. Where electoral gains are a result of offences such as intimidation or bribing voters, the will of the people is distorted and this influences the outcome of the elections. The will of the people cannot be said to be protected where there is evidence of widespread and distorting electoral violations. The fact that these irregularities are ignored is largely because the violations were not committed by the victorious candidate, or by agents with the candidate's knowledge or approval. Perfect compliance with electoral laws in every instance is unlikely, and the Court should avoid nullifying an election for minor violations or technical requirements. However, the law should indicate whether the violated electoral laws are mandatory or directory. Mandatory provisions would include those that prohibit voter disenfranchisements, such as bribing voters and voter intimidation. Widespread violations of such provisions distort the will of the people and should form the basis of annulling an election regardless of whether or not they are committed by the victorious candidate, or by their agent with their knowledge or approval. Directory provisions would be those that require candidates to conduct themselves in a respectful manner towards each other, such as those which prohibit defamatory remarks among candidates. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the presidency's domination over all institutions of government and that President Museveni has gained an unfair advantage over his competitors through using state resources in the electoral Adopting a qualitative approach would mean moving away from a mathematical approach to the issue to an approach which assesses, in the words of Justice George Kanyeihamba, "... the extent to which, deliberately or otherwise, the Constitution and laws of Uganda were substantially violated."

A CRITICAL ANALYSIS OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT DECISION OF KENYA IN THE CONSOLIDATED PETITION NO E282 OF 2020.

Background of the petition

On 18th March, 2018, President Uhuru Kenyatta and Mr. Raila Odinga had what is now famously known as the "Handshake". The President and Mr. Raila Odinga had just come off a hard fought and intensely contested Presidential Elections in 2017 in which they were the main contenders. The first round of Presidential elections was held on 8th August, 2017 and was characterized by allegations of vote fraud leading to its overturning by the Supreme Court. The repeat elections were held on 25th October, 2017. Mr. Raila Odinga boycotted the repeat elections handing the victory to the President. These circumstances, however, hardly cooled the political climate which remained charged. It is on these grounds that the President started an initiative which he described as being "towards a united Kenya." After the famous "Handshake" with Mr. Odinga, the President appointed the Building Bridges to Unity Advisory Taskforce (hereinafter, "BBI Taskforce") comprising of 14 committee members and 2 joint secretaries through Gazette Notice No. 5154 of 24th May 2018. The key mandate of the BBI Taskforce was to come up with recommendations and proposals for building a lasting unity in the country.

The BBI Taskforce came up with an interim report in November, 2019. On 3rd January 2020, vide Gazette Notice No. 264, the President appointed the Steering Committee on the Implementation of the Building Bridges to a United Kenya Taskforce Report (hereinafter, the "BBI Steering Committee") comprising of 14 members and 2 joint secretaries.

The terms of reference of the BBI Steering Committee were stated in the Gazette Notice as follows*: The Terms of Reference of the Steering Committee shall be to:*

(a) conduct validation of the Taskforce Report on Building Bridges to a United Kenya through consultations with citizens, civil society, the faith-based organizations, cultural leaders, the private sector, and experts; and

(b) propose administrative, policy, statutory or constitutional changes that may be necessary for the implementation of the recommendations contained in the Taskforce Report, taking into account any relevant contributions made during the validation period.

There is some controversy on how exactly the Report of the BBI Steering Committee, after it was handed over to the President, became the Constitution of Kenya Amendment Bill, 2020 (herein after, "The Constitution of Kenya Amendment Bill"). However, it is not in dispute that the BBI Secretariat then put in motion the process to collect signatures in support of the Popular Initiative associated with the Constitution of Kenya Amendment Bill. Thereafter, the BBI Secretariat submitted the signatures to the Independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission (IEBC), for verification and submittal to the County Assemblies and Parliament for approval.

There were eight petitions originating from the above facts which the court consolidated.

THE ISSUES FOR DETERMINATION

i. Is the Basic Structure Doctrine of Constitutional interpretation applicable in Kenya?

ii. If the Basic Structure Doctrine applies in Kenya what are its implications for the amendment powers in Articles 255 to 257 of the Constitution of Kenya?

iii. What is the constitutional remit of amendment of the Constitution through a Popular Initiative? This issue further twins into two sub-issues:

(a) Who can initiate a Popular Initiative under our constitutional set up?

(b) Is the BBI process of initiating amendments to the Constitution in conformity with the legal and constitutional requirements?

iv. Should the President and Public Officers who directed or authorized the use of public funds for the BBI Constitutional Amendment Process be ordered to refund the monies so used?

v. Was the President in Contravention of Article 73(1)(a) of the Constitution for claiming authority and purporting to initiate constitutional changes through the BBI Process?

vi. Is there an adequate legislative framework in place to guide constitutional amendments through Popular Initiative; and if not, is that fatal for the on-going constitutional amendment processes?

vii. Is it permissible for County Assemblies and Parliament to incorporate new content into or alter existing content in a Constitution of Kenya Amendment Bill through a Popular Initiative following Public Participation exercises?

viii. Does the Constitution envisage the possibility of a bill to amend the Constitution by Popular Initiative to be in the form of an omnibus bill or must specific proposed amendments to the Constitution be submitted as separate and distinct referendum questions?

ix. Was it unlawful for the Promoters of Constitution of Kenya Amendment Bill to leave out the proposal for an Independent Constitutional Health Services Commission from the Constitution Amendment Bill?

x. Is it lawful for a Constitution of Kenya Amendment Bill to set a specific number of constituencies under Article 89(1) of the Constitution?

xi. Is it lawful for a Constitution of Kenya Amendment Bill to directly allocate and apportion the constituencies it creates without a delimitation exercise using the criteria and procedures as set out in Article 89 of the Constitution?

xii. Has the IEBC carried out nationwide voter registration? If not, can the Proposed Referendum be carried out before the IEBC has done so?

xiii. Is the IEBC Properly constituted to conduct the proposed referendum including verifying the minimum voter support required for the Popular Initiative and submitting the Constitution of Kenya Amendment Bill to the County Assemblies?

xiv. Is a Legal/Regulatory Framework to regulate the verification and other processes required under Article 257(4) and (5) of the Constitution? If so, does such a Legal/Regulatory Framework exist?

xv. Is it a violation of Article 43 Rights for the Promoters of the Constitution of Kenya Amendment Bill and the Respondents to be pursuing constitutional amendments in the midst of COVID-19 Pandemic?

xvi. Should an Order issue directing the President to dissolve Parliament pursuant to the Chief Justice's Advice issued pursuant to Article 261(7) of the Constitution?

xvii. What Reliefs, if any, should be granted?

ANALYSIS AND DETERMINATIONS BY THE COURT

This analysis focuses on the issues before the court that relate to the amendment of the Kenyan constitution and the power of the president in relation to the amendment of the constitution.

ISSUE 1

THE BASIC STRUCTURE DOCTRINE AND ITS APPLICATION TO KENYA

The Petitioners 'in this case argued that the Constitution of Kenya, 2010 contains essential features and fundamental characters and foundational values that enjoy transcendental existence, whose derogation is not contemplated in the Constitution by way of constitutional amendments. These, features, they argue, form the Basic Structure of the Constitution and includes the following chapters of the Constitution: Chapter One on Sovereignty of the People and Supremacy of the Constitution, Chapter Two on the Republic, Chapter Four on the Bill of Rights, Chapter Nine on the executive and Chapter Ten on the Judiciary.

The Petitioners further argued that while other parts of the Constitution can be subjected to improvements and modifications to meet the needs of all generations, the Basic Structure they have identified cannot be amended. The Basic Structure forms, they argue, eternity clauses or unamendable provisions of the Constitution. We can identify the Basic Structure, the Petitioners argue, by looking at the text, spirit, structure and history of the Constitution.

The Petitioners further argue that the Basic Structure can only be altered through the formation of a new Constitution by the people in the exercise of their Constituent Powers; not even a referendum subsequent to Parliamentary action can be used to change the Basic Structure of the Constitution.

The court agreed with their arguments and found that;

a) The text, structure, history and context of the Constitution of Kenya, 2010 all read and interpreted using the canon of interpretive principles decreed by the Constitution yield the conclusion that the Basic Structure Doctrine is applicable in Kenya.

b) As applied in Kenya, the Basic Structure Doctrine protects certain fundamental aspects of the Kenyan Constitution from amendment through the use of either Secondary Constituent Power or Constituted Power.

c) The sovereignty of the People in constitution-making is exercised at three levels:

i. The Primary Constituent Power is the extraordinary power to form (or radically change) a Constitution; the "immediate expression of a nation and thus its representative". It is independent of any constitutional forms and restrictions and is not bound by previous constitutional rules and procedures. In Kenya, the Primary Constituent Power is exercisable in four sequential processes listed in paragraph (e) below.

ii. The Secondary Constituent Power is an abbreviated primordial Constituent Power exercisable by the whole polity in an abbreviated process to alter the constituting charter (Constitution) in non-fundamental ways, that is, without altering the Basic Structure. In Kenya, the Secondary Constituent Power to amend the Constitution is exercisable through a referendum subsequent to public participation and Parliamentary process. It, also, can only be perfected by following the amending procedures in Articles 255-257 of the Constitution.

iii. The Constituted Power is created by the Constitution and is an ordinary, limited power; a delegated power derived from the Constitution, and hence limited by it. In Kenya, the Constituted Power is exercised by Parliament, which has limited powers to amend the Constitution by following the procedures set in Articles 255-257 of the Constitution.

d) The essential features of the Constitution forming the Basic Structure can only be altered or modified by the People using their Primary Constituent Power.

e) The Primary Constituent Power is only exercisable after four sequential processes have been followed:

i. Civic education to equip people with sufficient information to meaningfully participate in the constitution-making or constitution-altering process;

ii. Public participation and collation of views in which the people – after appropriate civic education – generate ideas on the type of governance charter they want and give their views about the constitutional issues;

iii. Constituent Assembly Debate, consultations and public discourse to channel and shape the issues through representatives elected specifically for purposes of constitution-making or constitution- alteration; and

iv. Referendum to endorse or ratify the Draft Constitution or Changes to the Basic Structure of the Constitution.

From a holistic reading of the Constitution, its history and the context of the making of the Constitution, the Basic Structure of the Constitution consists of the foundational structure of the Constitution as provided in the Preamble; the eighteen chapters; and the six schedules of the Constitution. This structure outlines the system of government Kenyans chose – including the design of the Judiciary; Parliament; the Executive; the Independent Commissions and Offices; and the devolved system of government. It also includes the specific substantive areas Kenyans thought were important enough to pronounce themselves through constitutional entrenchment including land and environment; Leadership and Integrity; Public Finance; and National Security. Read as a whole, these chapters, schedules and the Preamble form the fundamental core structure, values and principles of the Constitution. This fundamental core, thus, cannot be amended without recalling the Primary Constituent Power of the people.

IMPORTANCE OF THE DOCTRINE

The basic structure doctrine has become a more significance way beyond the view and expectation of its proponents. The idea that though parliament has wide powers to amend the constitution, its powers are unlimited and does not extend to the power to tamper or do away with clauses which are basic to the structure of the constitution has now become of more importance as a safeguard against the actions and interventions of a party that may be controlling majority in Parliament abusing its majority position to eradicate, erode and diminish the structure of the Constitution by doing away with vital provisions. This may be due to their view that such provisions are becoming a wall against their retention of power or performing their desires by introducing provisions that benefit their desires of entrenching in powers for long.

Though many of the Constitutions prescribe expressly provisions for their amendment by describing an elaborate procedure, many of these provisions are not enough to afford it protection. This can occur where the governing party or group of people or ruling party has majority of members of parliament which circumstance they can rely on to pass any amendment which circumstance they can rely on to pass any amendment. Therefore, in such a situation, the express provisions of the Constitution shall be insufficient to afford the Constitution protection. Sikiri, CJ in Kesavananda Bharat v State of Kerala[1115]explained the importance of the doctrine in guarding against the abuse of parliamentary majorities and warned about the likely consequences of such. He observed that;

"A political party with two thirds majority in parliament for a few years could so amend the constitution as to debar any other party from functioning, establish totalitarianism, enslave the people and after having effected these purposes make the Constitution un amendable or extremely rigid. This means that it would no doubt invite extra constitutional revolution."

Therefore, since that can be anticipated by the majority of the constitutional framers and the people, the need to protect the Constitution has driven the judiciary to apply the basic structure to protect and preserve the Constitution. In view, the basic structure is the only shield the people have through the judiciary to protect the spirit of the Constitution where it faces graduated stabbing by the majority members of the ruling party. Therefore, in circumstances where the separation of power doctrine has been violated where by the executive holds a root in the judiciary then the desires of the people to protect such entrenched provisions shall not succeed which may render the supreme law weak by losing its spirit.

Having considered that, it's the basis of the reasoning why the five justices of the Constitution

[1115] AIR 1973 SC

court and the seven supreme Court were unanimously in deciding that Article 102(b)[1116] of the Constitution is not part of the basic structure of the Constitution. In their finding, those that form the basic structure are those that are entrenched which were categorized and placed under the umbrella of Article 260.[1117]

It's on this point that I shall now deal with the limitations of the basic structure doctrine as a mechanism for clear understanding of the doctrine.

LIMITATION OF STATES OF EMERGENCY

Though the doctrine holds out to be an effective protection tool against the violation of the Constitutional spirit, it has its own limitations. Basically, these are hidden in the fact that the doctrine is not a rule of law, it is a philosophy of jurisprudence that can be adopted by the constitutional Court to determine whether the amendment goes to the root of the Constitution or not. The impact of this is that it at judge desertion to find out and determine whether it is so. Justice Mulenga as he then was stated that the "law is debatable". By this he meant that the you can rarely assert the exact legal position on any matter with the accuracy of geometry.

This explains why many of the judges of the Constitution Court failed to come to a consensus as to what provisions conform to the basic structure of the Constitution. As noted, it is because the doctrine is not a well-established principle in the jurisprudence of various countries. This largely affects and limits its application.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL REMIT OF POPULAR INITIATIVE

The constitutional court observed that; Popular Initiative being a process of participatory democracy that empowers the ordinary citizenry to propose constitutional amendment independent of the law making power of the governing body cannot be undertaken by the President or State Organs under any guise. It was inserted in the Constitution to give meaning to the principles of sovereignty based on historical past where the reservation of the power of amendment of the Constitution to the elite few was abused in order to satisfy their own interests.

Therefore, it is our finding that Popular Initiative as a means to amend the Constitution under Article 257 of the Constitution is a power reserved for Wanjiku. Neither the President nor any State Organ can utilize Article 257 of the Constitution to amend the Constitution.

[1116] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[1117] Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

LEGAL ISSUES ARISING FROM THE PRESIDENT'S INVOLVEMENT IN THE BBI PROCESS

The court on this issue observed that; While the President's efforts to unite the nation are to be lauded and, indeed it his obligation 'to promote and enhance the unity of the nation' he cannot initiate any move, disguised as a Popular Initiative to amend the Constitution, contrary to the means prescribed by the Constitution itself for such an amendment on the pretext that he is 'promoting and enhancing the unity of the nation.' Said differently, it is not within the President's power to initiate proposals to amend the Constitution, ostensibly as a Popular Initiative, under the pretext of promoting and enhancing the unity of the nation. The Constitution can only be amended as prescribed in Articles 255, 256 and 257 of the Constitution. It must be noted that according to Article 132(2) (a) the President is enjoined 'to respect, uphold and safeguard this Constitution' in exercising his authority.

In taking initiatives to amend the Constitution other than through the prescribed means, the President has, without doubt, failed to respect, uphold and safeguard the Constitution and, to that extent, he has fallen short of the leadership and integrity threshold set in Article 73 of the Constitution and, in particular, Article 73(1)(a) thereof. We so find.

It goes without saying that considering the illegitimate purpose for which the BBI Steering Committee was conceived, nothing legitimate can come out of that outfit. It is void ab initio and whatever it may want to consider as its achievements including the Constitution Amendment Bill are of no legal consequence.

This decision has a lot of significance and several lessons can be drawn from it in relation to Uganda's executive context.

Chapter seven of the constitution of the Republic of Uganda provides for the executive arm of government. And Article 98 states that 'There shall be a President of Uganda who shall be the Head of State, Head of Government and Commander-in-Chief of the Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces and the Fountain of Honour.'

Pursuant to Article 98 (5) the president of Uganda enjoys liability from court processes in his capacity as president however one lesson we can draw from the constitutional court decision of Kenya in the consolidated petition no e282 of 2020 is that;this blanket immunity should be limited so that, civil Court proceedings can be instituted against the President or a person performing the functions of the office of President during their tenure of office in respect of anything done or not done contrary to the Constitution.

Secondly, as observed in the constitutional court's ruling, Kenya has the POPULAR INITIATIVE as a mode of amending its constitution. This mode is intended to allow the common man to take part in amending a constitution they feel is no longer fitting their aspirations and from this decision it's clear that the president and any other government organs cannot imitate constitutional amendments under this mode. This is yet another lesson we pick from this decision

DEMYSTFYING THE DE MINIMIS NON CURAT LEX DOCTRINE (EMPHASIS ADDED)

DEMINIS NON CURAT LEX

While maxims play an important part in the development and growth pf the law, legists differ as to their merit. Some, in the past, have regarded them as being of the same force and effect as statutes, more critical writers consider them misleading, on the ground that they are not worth their face value, others take a middle ground, treating maxims as useful servants but dangerous masters.

Courts of law exist to enforce rights and redress wrongs, not to encourage litigation, hence they will not take jurisdiction of moot cases, nor take cognizance of vexatious suits. In general, it would be unnecessarily irksome and tedious, and beget a marked tendency to delay justice, if courts were to require the mathematical precision of a micrometer. Therefore, it is necessary and expedient that the law should not be concerned with trivial.

MAXIM, ITS ORIGIN AND FUNCTION

The maxim is variously stated and variously translated in treatises and reports. One of the earliest English collections of maxims. The maxim de minimis non curat lex translates to "The law doth not regard trifles." Later translations frequently use the verb "concern" instead of "regard." Although it may appear to be an unimportant distinction, it is believed that the subsequent discussion will show that the translation using the verb "regard" more truly expresses the real purpose and use of the maxim. The translation of the maxim using "concern" was a source of much humor to a writer in the Albany Law Journal' in I880 who discusses many cases in which the law obviously did very much concern itself with trifles, generally not mentioning the maxim. Cases are cited, for instance, where the issue hinged on the meaning of one word or upon the presence or absence of a punctuation mark, or, as he laughingly points out, "a hair from the head of the prophet Mohammed." Actually, in every case in which the de minimis maxim is cited or applied, the law is concerning itself with what is found to be or alleged to be a trifle. These trifles, however, are not regarded as being a worthy basis for a decision or other action by the court.

The maxim was not known as a maxim in the Civil Law until about the Fifteenth Century. Instances in which its principle has been applied to particular problems can be found as far back as Callistratus, and Ulpianus and Paulus, in writings compiled in Justinian's Digest; but in the list of rules in condensed form contained in the Digest neither de minimis nor a variation of it was included. One of its earliest appearances as a maxim was in I644 in Augustini Barbosa book of maxims, TractatusVarii, where it was stated as de minimis non curat Praetor and quod Praetor non curat de minimis. From these beginnings modern writers in Civil Law now state the maxim as we know it.'

The development of de minimis in the Common Law followed a similar pattern. Bracton, writing in the Thirteenth Century, discussed situations in which the principle of the maxim was applied, but the maxim was not stated as such.' Coke, writing in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, stated the principle in its present day form,' but he apparently did not yet regard it as a maxim.'5 In the Eighteenth Century Blackstone used the maxim as an independent principle of law, as it is now used.' The earliest collection found in which the maxim is included is by Thomas Branch, and was published in the United States in 1824. Since that time the use of the maxim has increased steadily in all courts and the field of its application has steadily broadened.

One of the earliest reported English cases in which the maxim was stated and applied is its present form is that of York v. York, digested in Viner's Abridgement as holding: "No action lies of a waste but to the value of a penny; for de minimis non curat lex."

FACTORS CONSIDERED IN APPLYING MAXIM

It is readily apparent that a principle which has reasonableness as its ultimate end cannot be easily defined. It cannot be said that six dollars, six inches or six minutes is de minimis, apart from a specific fact situation. The tolerances allowed in constructing a hand pump of the type often seen in farm yards cannot be used in making a syringe for use by a physician. As one author has said, "No precise criterion exists to determine what is the minimum the law will notice. The cases in which de minimis is used cannot, therefore, be readily reconciled, and, since identical fact situations rarely occur, there is seldom direct precedent to be applied in a new case."

It is for this reason that the historical origin and development of the maxim is important. In the absence of a controlling authority arising out of a similar fact situation, the only help that can be gotten from the many cases in which de minimis has been used is an indication of certain factors which have been considered by the courts in applying or refusing to apply de minimis.

THE DOCTRINE OF DEMINIS NON CURAT LEX IN KENYA

The doctrine of deminis non curat lex was discussed by Prof. PLO Lumumba during the Raila Amolo Odinga& another v Independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission & 2 others[1118]while discussing the impact of the irregularities on the integrity of the election. Prof. Lumumba submitted that elections are about numbers and that they are about who gets the largest number of votes. Such irregularities as complained of by the petitioners could not in themselves overturn the sovereign will of the people. Further, if the quantitative discrepancies are so negligible (in this case, allegedly slightly over 20,000 votes), they should not affect the election. Prof. Lumumba submitted that

"What you have before you is a petition replete with allegations, a petition that is dead on arrival…there is no case that has been proven. De minimis non curat lex (Of small things, the law knows no cure)," said Lumumba."

The Court however declined to consider only the numbers but rather chose look at the elections as a whole, as a process rather than an event. To look at, not just the numbers, but the entire conduct of the election. An election must at the end of the day, be a true reflection of the will of the people, as decreed by the Constitution, through its hallowed principles of transparency, credibility, verifiability, accountability, accuracy and efficiency.

The Supreme Court of Kenya asked the following questions; Where do all these inexplicable irregularities, that go to the very heart of electoral integrity, leave this election? It is true that where the quantitative difference in numbers is negligible, the Court, as we were urged, should not disturb an election. But what if the numbers are themselves a product, not of the expression of the free and sovereign will of the people, but of the many unanswered questions with which we are faced? In such a critical process as the election of the President, isn't quality just as important as quantity? In the face of all these troubling questions, would this Court, even in the absence of a finding of violations of the Constitution and the law, have confidence to lend legitimacy to this election? Would an election observer, having given a clean bill of health to this election on the basis of what he or she saw on the voting day, stand by his or her verdict when confronted with these imponderables?

Not every irregularity, not every infraction of the law is enough to nullify an election. Were it to be so, there would hardly be any election in this Country, if not the world, that would withstand judicial scrutiny. The correct approach therefore, is for a court of law, to not only determine whether, the election was characterized by irregularities, but whether, those irregularities were of such a nature, or such a magnitude, as to have either affected the result of the election, or to have so negatively impacted the integrity of the election, that no reasonable tribunal would uphold it.

Courts have to strived to protect the quality of elections. If the court finds that the proven frauds and irregularities were of such serious nature as to deprive the voters of the free expression of their will, or as to make it impossible to determine the outcome of the election, it will decree the nullity of the entire election even though the contestant cannot prove that he would have been elected but for such fraud or irregularities. This case stands for the proposition that where widespread violations of electoral laws occur, they affect the quality of the elections because they distort the will of people and therefore the elections should be annulled.

[1118][2017] eKLR.

The doctrine of deminis non curatlex should not be used as a leeway for electoral candidates to commit electoral offences but rather to ensure there are no trivial cases brought to Court for annulment of an entire election for trivial irregularities. The determination of what is trivial is always a case for court to determine on a case to case basis. While applying this doctrine to dismiss vexatious suits, Court should ensure its not used as an excuse to undermine quality of elections, it therefore appears the substantiality test would be the litmus test.

AMICUS CURIAE (A FRIEND NOT BEYOND)

Amicus curiae are a Latin word that means friend of court. However, its transition as a friend of court has caused confusion as to its present nature and scope and its true origins. Part of the uncertainty over the meaning of this term is the result of many different definitions of the ancient institution in various legal dictionaries and judicial pronouncements. Though a reference to a dictionary definition for the understanding of the meaning of the word amicus curiae beyond its literal English translation as a friend of court, may not be entirely helpful, it is important in apprehending the nature of the institution.

According to the modern law Lexicon that is inspired by old English Legal Commentaries, an amicus curiae is one who volunteers or on invitation of the court, instructs the court on a matter of law concerning which the latter is doubtful or mistaken or informs him on facts, a knowledge of which is necessary to a proper disposition of the case[1119].

The corpus Juris Secundum defined an amicus curiae as a friend of the court as one who, not a party, but, just as any stranger might, gives information for the assistance of the court on some matter of law in regard to which the court might be doubtful or mistaken rather than one who gives a highly partisan account of the facts.[1120]

The Mellinkoffs Dictionary of American Legal Usage, on the other hand, states that this friend of the court is someone not a party to the litigation but usually favoring one of the parties, and [1119] P. RamanathaAiyar, The Law Lexicon, 2nd ed. See also Wadhwa and Co. Naypur, 1997 at 102, with reference to 2 Co .Litt.178, considered by the Malaysian High Court in Tai Choi Yu v Ian Chin Hon Chong[2002] 5M.L.J.581(H.C) In Austria, according to the Macquarie Dictionary, an amicus curiae is a person not a party to the litigation who volunteers or is invited by the court to give advice to the court upon some matter pending before it David Hay, Words and Phrases Legally Defined.

[1120]ThompsonWest, 2003 vol.3B at 170.

permitted to make an argument to the court.[1121]

The definitions stated above tend to rise more questions us to who a friend of court is? Is he a friend to court or a friend of court? Is he a respected invitee, a mere volunteer or a stranger to court?

The Black's Law Dictionary tend to give a more seemingly clear definition as to who an amicus curia is though to my understanding, the institution may defer basing on the jurisdiction. It defines amicus curiae as a person who is not a party to a law suit but who petitions the court or is required by the court to file a brief in the action because that person has a strong interest in the subject matter.[1122]

From the above definition, it seems clear that amicus curiae can be a person who applies to court to be part of the suit or it can be a person required by court to apply to be part of the case simply because the court needs some expertise which is in possession of such a person. Many scholars have undermined the institution due to its limited relevancy in the modern situation and the lots of ambiguities rotating around it. Bell house and Lavers observed that there are few legal terms as unhelpful and as imprecise as the amicus curiae[1123]. To them the ambiguity of the concept coupled with the absence of rules governing the appointment, appearance and purpose of the institution in many jurisdictions although aiding its flexibility and development has nevertheless occasionally produced some strange results.[1124]For example in Exparte Lloyd, a lawyer who had accepted retainers from both parties found himself in a predicament. The Lord Chancellor hearing the case felt he had no authority to advise the lawyer as to which party he ought to represent. However by appointing himself as amicus curiae and then advising the lawyer on the matter, the court thus became its own friend.[1125] Important to note is that before appreciating its application in Uganda's jurisprudence, attention should be drawn to its origin.

ORIGIN OF THE INSTITUTION (AMICUS CURIAE)

Many scholars still hold debates in their hearts as to the origin of this institution. For years, the origin of amicus curiae has remained unclear and controversial. Though most of them present a view that the institution holds its origin from Common law despite its presence in civil law juridictions.[1126]Other scholars attribute it to a Roman law basing on their understanding and

[1121] David Mellinkott, Dictionary of American Legal Usage St Paul, Minn: West Publishing Co. 1992 at 27
[1122]Blacks L aw dictionary 9th Edition at page 98.
[1123]A Role in Arbitration; (2004) 23 C.J.Q.187.
[1124] MOHAN, S. Chandra. The Amicus Curiae: Friends No More? (2010).Singapore Journal of Legal studies, 2010;(2), 352-374, Research collectiom School of Law.
[1125] A 19th Century case reported in Exparte Brockman 1345. W 977, 233 Missouri. Reports 135 and referred by Samuel Krishou "The Amicus Curiae Brief :From Friendship to Advocacy (1963) 72 Yale LJ. 694 and 695.
[1126] Frank M. Covey .Jr "Amicus Curiae:Friend of Court"(1959-1960) a Defaul L. Rev. 30 at 34-35.

researched filled in their writings.[1127] But that said, Amicus Curiae is greatly an institution of common law. This can be traced from the old definitions, descriptions and the early cases recorded in the Year Books. In the Canadian case of Grice, Ferguson J observed that amicus curiae is one who was a bystander, where a judge is doubtful or mistaken in a matter of law may inform the court in its ordinary use the term. The term implies the friendly intervention of counsel to remind the court of some matters of law which has escaped its notice and in regard of which it is in danger of going wrong.

At common law, any person could appear before court as an amicus curiae to advise court. According to the Year Book cases from 1353, this was an accepted practice. [1128]This can be traced from the abridgement (1573), which had three known references to the amicus practices. There was a statement that in an improper indictment, any man as amicus curiae can inform court of error in order to prevent the court from suffering.[1129] Further in 1686 case of Horton and Ruesby, Sir George Treby informed the court that as a Member of Parliament he had been present in Parliament when it passed the statute of frauds and Perjuries and appears to have been allowed to enlighten the court on what he perceived to be the true intention of Parliament in enacting the Act.[1130]

It is worthwhile to note that such interactions of third parties could only be possible by amici who bystanders, although according to the statute of Hon. IV (1403), any stranger could move court as amicus curiae. This tradition included instructing, warning, informing and moving the court.[1131]This institution continued up to date "the honor of court" to deliver proper judgment in individual cases but also in the public interest to continue the rational development of the law. This was as a safeguard against judicial arbitrariness and for the preservation of free government.[1132]

REASONS FOR THE COMMON LAW ORIGIN OF AMICUS CURIAE

The long standing argument as to the origin of amicus curiae has led to a number of reasons posed by those from the common law corner. These are argued by different philosophers and scholars as explained herein under.

See also Alon Levy. "The Amicus Curiae: Another of Assistance to the court"(1972) Chitty LJ, 94.

[1127] As it has been traced back as far as the 14th Century and even to Roman Law. Williams, note 12 at 367.

1128 YB Hill 26 Edw.111. See Edward Ruffin Beckwirth and Rudolph Soberheim, "Amicus Curiae Minister of Justice"(1948) 17 Fordharm L.Rev.38."Notes on Amicus Curiae minister of Justice" (1920-1921) 34 Harv L found in the Walls Abridgement 200 and in 2 Viners Abridgement 475-476.

1129 Y.B.7 Edw.111.65.cited in Covey, Supra note 11 at 33.

[1130]Krislov, Supra note 2: Covey 34-35."The amicus curiae," note 12.In south Africa the amicus curiae has also been defined as a member of the bar, or other bystander, who advises the court regarding a point of law or fact upon which information is required.

[1131] See Baldwin note 16 at 69.

[1132]Johaness Chan, "Amicus Curiae and Non Party Intervention"(1997) 27 Hong Kong LJ 391 at 394.

THE INHERENT RIGHT OF COURT TO REQUIRE ASSISTANCE.

This argument is based on a construct of the common law based on the inherent jurisdiction of a court to require assistance from members of the legal profession to whom it had given special rights to practice their profession.[1133]

The Bystander theory. This theory has been proposed by one writer that it is another possible source from which the amicus curiae practice would have begun.[1134]He argues that this case rests on some secondary confirmation from early common lawpractice until the middle common law, a defendant in a serious criminal charge was not allowed counsel to represent him . The rationale for this was that the defendant had to answer the serious charge by himself and not through the lawyer. Harman Cohen explains that the resultant ritual of the accused being accompanied to court by his friends was partly to check on his accuser's entourage or ground against vengeance without law.[1135] Therefore, those bystanders that were not lawyers were then allowed to provide assistance to the court. Some support for this appears in Cokes Institutes and after the plea of guilty, the prisoner can have counsel assigned to him. Any learned man that is present may inform the court for the benefit of the prisoner of anything that may make the proceedings erroneous.[1136]It is therefore clear that the amicus curiae practice was brought into play to check on judicial errors and to thus ensure justice to those defendants that were not defended in criminal cases by allowing the litigants present in court to assist the judge.

HONOUR FOR COURT

This is the last but fundamental reason for amicus curiae. This was emphasized in the celebrated case of Protector v Geering 1656. It was stated that the purpose of amicus curiae was that it is for the honor of the court to avoid error in their judgments. Barbarism will be introduced if it be not admitted to inform the court of such gross and apparent errors in offices[1137].Further Justice Occonor of the Supreme Court of United States remarked that" the friends who appear today usually file briefs calling our attention to ponds of law , policy considerations or other points of view that the parties themselves have not discussed. These amicus briefs invaluably aid on decision making [1133] Williams, Supra note 12 at 366. See also JohannessChan,"Amicuscuriaeand Non Party Intervetion" (1997) 27 Hong Kong LJ 39-394.

[1134] Covey, supra note 11. Covey accepts that there is no direct confirmation or denial for this theory from the early common law practice.
[1135] Herman Cohen. A history of the English Bar and Anornatus to 1450 (London: Sweet and Maxwell Ltd ..1929 at 4, 12-13 citing the works of Latin writings known as LegesHenniciprimi attributed to a scholar known as Quadripartitus.
[1136] Cokes Institutes 29 Brooke 1779. See also Chittys description: 1 Chitty, criminal law 308, 2nd edtn, (1832), cited in Covey supra note 11.
[1137] 91656), Hardres 585,145 E.R 394 process and often influence either the result or the reasoning of our opinions[1138].

Having embarked and explained the brief origin of the institution, it is right to draw attention to its applicability in Uganda jurisprudence

APPLICABILITY OF THE INSTITUTION IN UGANDA

As already noted, amicus curiae means a friend of court from the English version. The maxim has a wide application in Uganda though we are alive to the fact that there are no clear legislative provisions on Uganda statute books governing Court in determining which person or organization qualifies to be amicus curiae in any proceedings before court.[1139] Amicus curiae briefs are mainly filed in appeals concerning matters of abroad public interest. S.98 of the Civil Procedure Act of 2010 gives courts inherent powers to make orders which are necessary for the ends of justice or to avoid abuse of court process. It is under this law that the courts are given mandate to allow an application in regard to amicus curiae.

Further Order 50 of the civil procedure rules gives the court officers general powers to carry out duties pertaining to it. The mode of making such an application is by way of notice of motion supported by an affidavit. The most outstanding g provision in absence of provisions in the statute books is section 39(2)[1140]and the principles developed by court. In Uganda, initially the application for amicus curiae was only permitted where court had invited an expertise in a particular field of law whose expertise court needed to give its verdict. This means that applications by anyone without the invitation of court could be null and void .In Attorney General v Silver Springs Hotel Ltd and Others[1141], the supreme court held that an appearance by amicus curiae had to be at the invitation of court and not by application of a party seeking that status. The court also further held that the friend of Court must be a person without interest in the suit.

This ruling was overturned by court changing the status of amicus curiae. In NSSF and Another v ALCON International Ltd[1142] court while relying on Article 132(4) which allows the supreme court to deviate from its previous decision considered an application for amicus curiae and only rejected it on ground that the applicant had not shown his expertise in the matter and had not demonstrated that he would be of assistance to the court in resolving the dispute before it. Further [1138] Hon Justice Sandra Day Oconnor while acceping Henry Clay Medallion from the Henr Clay Memorial Foundation on 4th October 1996.

[11391139] Justice Bert Katurebe in the application foe leave of court as afriend of court in AmamaMbabazi v Museveni Electoral Commission and Attorney General SC Civil Application N0 2 of 2016.

[1140] The Judicature Act cap 13 laws of Uganda.

[1141] SCCA No 1 of 1989

[1142] SCCA No 15 of 2009,

in Uganda v Thomas Kowyelo[1143], the application was made subsequent to courts hearing of the appeal. However, court declined to hear the application on grounds that the hearing had already been closed and judgment in the hearing had already been closed and judgment in the appeal reserved.

It is important on this point to note that the application of Amicus curiae in litigation is now a practice which is increasingly being entrenched not only across the common law and civil jurisdictions but also in domestic and international legal tribunals. Because of the wave in the application of the institution of amicus curiae, Uganda has also embraced the application of the legal maxim but because of the absence of clear constructive law for its application, Ugandan courts have adopted principles developed by courts in various jurisdictions in determining the admission of amicus curiae. The guiding principles were well established by Justice Bert Katurebe in Amama Mbabazi v Museveni , Electoral Commission and Attorney General[1144]and these include;

That participation of amicus curiae is purely at the discretion of court.

Amicus curiae can be important and relevant in matters where court is of the opinion that the matter before it requires some kind of expertise which is in the possession of a specific individual.

The ultimate control over what the amicus curiae can do lies exclusively with the court.

The amicus must be neutral and impartial.

Thee submission must be noted to give assistance to the court not otherwise employ.

Limited to engagement with matters of the law.

Submissions draw attention to relevant matters of law useful focused and principled legal submissions not favoring any of the parties.

The amici must have valuable expertise in the relevant area of law and general expertise in the law does not suffice.

The points of law to be canvassed should be novel to aid development of jurisprudence

The application must be in the wider interest of public justice.

The interest of the amicus is its fidelity to the law.

Whereas consent of the parties to the proposed amicus role is a factor to be taken into consideration, it is not the determining factor. Furthermore, objections raised by the parties are a factor to be taken into consideration but is not the determining factor.

The most important guiding principle is the principle of impartiality and neutrality. It is now a settled rule of practice of courts in various jurisdictions that for a person to be admitted as amicus curiae, they ought to preserve a status of neutrality and impartiality.

[1143] Constitutional Appeal No 1 of 2012

[1144]Application for leave of court as a friend of Court Civil Application No 2 of 2016 which application was made by the Makerere Law professors.

In Secretariate of the Joint UNAIDS Programme on HIV/ AIDs v Human Rights Awareness Promotion Forum (HRAPF) and Attorney General of Uganda[1145], it was observed that what court is called upon to do is balancing the wider interest of injustice and the benefit of the participation of the intended amicus to court against the risk of the amicus descending into the litigation between the parties. An amicus is a friend of court and the court can only take what it considers relevant and non-partisan from the amicus and the ultimate control over what the amicus can do is the court itself. Therefore, it is important for the court to address its self on the role of amicus curiae. The idea of neutrality can be justified by the principle that justice must not only be done but also been to be done.

THE ROLE OF AMICUS CURIAE

As already noted, amicus curiae should be a person without personal interest in the case and does not advocate a point of view in support of either of the parties to the suit. Despite the fact that amicus procedure has not been entrenched in Uganda, the point of emphasis in the few cases in Uganda has continued to emphasize that the amicus should have no interest in the matter. In Attorney General v Silver Springs Hotel Ltd and Anor[1146], court observed that one fundamental consideration for any amicus curiae to be admitted is that such a party must be independent of the dispute between the parties.

The role of an amicus in litigation, clearly distinguishes from other parties in litigation. The fundamental role of an amicus curiae can be drawn from the decision of the supreme court of Kenya in Mumo Matemu and Others v Kenya Section of the International Commission of Jurists[1147]when court observed that "the role of an amicus curiae is to draw the attention of the court to relevant matters of law and fact to which attention would not otherwise be drawn. In return for privilege of participating in the proceeding without having to qualify as a party, amicus curiae have a special duty to the court. That duty is to provide cogent and helpful submissions that assist the court. The amicus must not repeat the arguments already made but must raise new contentions and generally these new contentions must be raised on the data already before the court."

It should be emphasized that these amicus submissions were originally intended to provide the court with impartial information that was beyond its notice or expertise which is where the name amicus curiae or friend of court derived.

The adversarial system is often the given explanation for the preservation of an amicus curiae that it serves as a useful and convenient tool to overcome the shortcomings of the adversarial system which is essentially partisan or bi-polar.[1148].

[1145] Application No 1 of 2015
[1146] SCCA No 1 of 1989
[1147] Petition No 12 of 2013

Therefore amicus curiae intervention presents an opportunity for interest groups to advance their policy preferences by influencing the judiciary in key cases.[1149] One can argue that if the amicus curiae principle is well entrenched in Uganda legal system can help in checking on continued errors of the judiciary and presenting a well setting of hearings before courts. But it should not be undermined that though amicus briefs have been a practice accepted by the courts in Uganda, a number of challenges have come along with them. These briefs no longer provide court with impartial information. This is due to the fact that briefs are always filed by ideological allies of one or another party to the suit and most them file duplicate arguments due to the interests they possess in the suit.

[1148] George William. "The Amicus Curiae and Intervenor in the High Court of Australia: A comperative analysis" (200) 28 Federal law Review 365 at 367

[1149] Lorne Neudorf, PHD Candidate, Faculty of law, university of Cambridge, Barister and Solicitor (Canada) at 17.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

THE EXECUTIVE AND THE BUGANDA QUESTION

ABSOLUTE BUGANDA

For a very long time, the form of government in Buganda was of the first type, an absolute monarch, but with wide powers left to the aristocracy (Abakungu). The absolute power of the kings (baKabaka) in all fields was never questioned until the Europeans made a repartition of powers. When Buganda came under the protection of the British Government, the absolute power of the Kabaka came to an end, but he remained one of the governing body.

BUGANDA AND THE CENTRAL GOVERNMENT (A MYSTERY THROUGH THE RESTORATION PERIOD)

A lot has been said though little has been brought to paper about Buganda's question in Uganda. In a further highlighted form, the position of Buganda in Uganda. Being the most organized group, the British found light in utilizing Buganda to colonize the whole of Uganda. The British desire was not to see Buganda achieve independence but rather to achieve a Uganda with Buganda under its control. Oloka Onyango states that it is this that influenced events in the territory especially in the 1940s and 1950s. He argues that political events within Buganda seemed to eclipse those in the rest of the protectorate starting from late 1940s to 1950s where the relationship between the two begun to achieve prominence.[1150]

The political events saw reforms such as removal of some racial restrictions on trade, formation of co-operatives, trade unions and witnessed the establishment of nationalist political parties though these went tribalistic in nature in their ambitions to pursue and receive the independence instruments for Uganda. Indeed, the post 1945 and 1950s reform's marked the beginning of struggles to control post –colonial Uganda. It was within this end in view that groups defined their interests and prepared them for the moment of truth[1151].During this period, Buganda manifested its intentions of being declared an independent state under monarchism. Buganda never desired to be part of Uganda and it seemed well clear that the British didn't hold this in mind. To the Baganda, placing them under Uganda was to deprive them of their strength and political status as the strongest kingdom which they never desired.

The roots of Buganda's interests from the rest of the protectorate can be rooted from the year of

[1150] J. OlokaOnyango (1997) The question of Buganda in contemporary Ugandan Politics, Journal of Contemporary African Studies, 15:2, 173-189.
[1151] Uganda ConstitutionalCommmission 1993 at page 48

1953 which saw the exile of the Kabaka Edward Muteesa II following his disagreement with the British over the East African Federation[1152].As Stefan Lougren, sates , the exile was due to Muteesa's rejection of the proposal by the British to merge Buganda and Kenya to form the East African Federation: Buganda's fear was with the white settlers taking over their land following what they had done in the Kenya Highlands, the most outstanding point was the kings desire to be the top most leader in the kingdom and country of Buganda which couldn't be achieved under the Federation. Because of this, it proved evident that the Baganda were to work hard to achieve their independence. [1153]

The Baganda were left with no option but to stage riots everywhere in what is known as the Kabaka crisis to force the colonialists to return the King. Upon his return in 1955 and the signing of the Namirembe agreement, the Baganda became more hardened to achieve their interests at whatever expense and ended up indulging themselves in political activities as an easier way of achieving their interests. They formed and joined the political parties like Democratic Party which was a Buganda political Party and latter witnessed the Kabaka Yekka party to define and defend the interests of the kingdom through the king. Much has been said but less can be forgotten about the existence of other monarchies in Uganda. But of course Buganda being the strongest, it made headlines in Uganda's history. Indeed, the kingdom had been in place for a while even before the colonization of Uganda. Buganda enhanced its supremacy in relation to other monarchies and after independence in 1962, Buganda was to maintain its authority and the Kabaka was even to gain the right to veto federal legislation which was later to cause the 1966 crisis.[1154]

Indeed, their tireless efforts finally paid off. Though they did not acquire complete independence, following the Independence Uganda in1962, Buganda acquired a federal status and the Kabaka assumed the largely ceremonial post of president. This was to defend the relationship between him and Obote Milton who was the Prime minister of Independent Uganda. Perhaps the blame for this is pointed at the Lancaster Constitution which failed to establish the form of government Uganda was to adopt. The 1962 Constitution had a weakness of failure to distinguish and highlight the power of the president who was Edward Muteesa and Dr Apollo Milton Obote the prime Minister.[1155]

Muteesa found it hard to balance the interests of Buganda and the country as a whole. It was because of the mistake by the 1962 Constitution to allow the king of Buganda to be the president of Uganda. Kanyeihamba explains that the major clash of him and Obote was with the referendum of

[1152]See Morris and Read 1966; pp 63-64
[1153] Stefan Lougren, Power of the Buganda: Uganda's kings Return: July 11 1996.
[1154] Ibid
[1155]Kanyeihamba.G. W. Evolution of the Constitution and Governemnt.

1964 that saw Buyaga and Bugangaizi deciding to be back to Bunyoro.[1156]Being the president, he had the constitutional mandate or duty to sign the official transfer of the counties but this seemed difficult for him. Buganda's interests filled his understanding than the national interests. Sealing the issue of lost counties would be a betrayal of his subjects upon his decline, the Constitution vested power in the prime minister to complete the action. This he undertook as prime minister. It's this that created the confrontation between Mengo and the Central government. The president who was the Kabaka of Buganda objected the move by Obote of transferring the lost counties to Bunyoro. This led to the collapse of the UPC-KY alliance and subsequent attacks on the palace by the soldiers led by Gen Iddi Amin.[1157]

The collapse of the alliance culminated into political tension between the two. Obote with no shame ordered Amin to attack the palace in1966 forcing the Kabaka to have a lonely exile to London where he died in poverty on 19th November 1969. Indeed, it was the first serious clash between Buganda and the central government. This was to affect the future politics of Uganda unless a step was taken. The whole mistake as already noted lay in the 1962 independence Constitution.

Because of the misunderstandings that had culminated between Obote's party as some supported Buganda, followed by other pressures directed towards him by other political parties like DP and other cultural Institutions, Obote turned all and sundry, culminating in 1969 with the banning of all opposition political parties as dangerous societies that would adversely affect peace and order in Uganda. [1158] The banning of political parties and all kingdoms in Uganda acted as a conducive environment for the then leader Apollo Milton Obote to adopt the Pigeon Hole Constitution that saw him assume the executive powers and became the executive president of Uganda making Uganda a Republic in 1967.

Indeed, the Kabaka crisis saw the end of kingship in Uganda not until 1993 when they were restored. The Baganda became more nervous and hatred for Obote increased. Most of them supported and became more supportive to anyone who was willing to defeat Obote. Among the many that saw this opportunity was Amin.

THE CRISIS OF BUGANDA, 1953-55

The Kabaka crisis occurred in the Uganda Protectorate between 1953 to 1955, during which Kabaka Mutesa II pushed for Bugandan secession from the Uganda Protectorate and was ousted [1156]Kanyeihamba, G.W. Evolution of The Constitution and Governement.

[1157] Restoration of Kingdoms was a mistake Ugandans are paying for by AmonKatungulu Feb 14, 2019

[1158] Six organisations were banned . These included Democratic Party, Uganda National Union, Uganda Famers Voice, Uganda Conservative Party, Uganda National Socialist Party and the Uganda Vietnam Solidarity Party. Most of thereladerss however were arrested like Benedicto Kiwanuka and AbudallahNabudere.

and banished by British governor Andrew Cohen. Widespread dissatisfaction with the British government's actions forced the British government to retreat, culminating in the restoration of Mutesa as specified in the Buganda Agreement of 1955, which impacted the nature of Uganda's independence.

The Imperial British East Africa Company (IBEAC) gave the British Government administration rights over its holdings in modern-day Uganda in 1893. The IBEAC's territory at the time principally consisted of the Kingdom of Buganda, which had been annexed in 1892. The Uganda Protectorate was founded in 1894, and with Buganda's help, the territory was quickly expanded beyond Buganda's limits to an area that closely corresponds to modern-day Uganda. Buganda's status as a constitutional monarchy (headed by the Kabaka) inside the British-led Protectorate was formalized by the Buganda Agreement of 1900.

The Buganda Agreement of 1900 served as the foundation for the relationship between Buganda and the British colonial administration of the Uganda Protectorate for more than half a century. The deal was ostensibly reached between willing equal partners, with the British providing 'protection' to Buganda at Buganda's request. The granting of land to Baganda in a sort of freehold tenure known as 'mailo land' was a major component of the accord. As a result, European settlers were practically barred from purchasing land in Buganda. As a result, unlike what had transpired in neighbouring Kenya, Uganda had no white settlers. Buganda was also to be treated equally with any future provinces that would be added into the Uganda Protectorate, according to the agreement. Buganda was able to maintain an unparalleled level of internal autonomy within the Uganda Protectorate because to these provisions.

The British proposed a closer union between its East African possessions, Kenya, Uganda, and Tanganyika, in the 1920s and 1930s. Uganda, particularly Buganda, was adamantly opposed to the concept. The significant opposition stemmed from two factors that were intertwined. For starters, it was thought that an East African Federation would allow European settlers to settle in Uganda. The Baganda had no illusions about what would happen to their community if this happened, given how settlers treated indigenous Africans in neighbouring Kenya or further afield in Rhodesia and South Africa. Second, the Baganda believed that their ancient kingdom, with its valued customs and culture, would be eaten up by a much larger polity of an East African federation, which they were adamant about resisting. The British were forced to renounce the dream of an East African federation, albeit unwillingly.

Following the establishment of the Crown Colony of Kenya and the Trust Territory of Tanganyika, the British became more interested in providing 'common services' to the three territories. This led to the establishment of the East Africa High Commission and Central Legislative Assembly in 1948, which had jurisdiction over certain areas (such as integration of the various railway networks).

The nomination of Sir Andrew Cohen as Governor of Uganda in January 1952 sparked enormous optimism among those who supported quick African political progress. Sir Andrew's status as the "Whitehall Fabian" was solidified. Perhaps it was hoped that under his leadership, Uganda would not only move toward self-government, but also do so without the suspicion and racial hostility that has often preceded similar progress in other countries.[1159]

His influence was undeniably felt right away. He zealously pursued the Protectorate's economic development, despite commercial interests' complaints of his concern for the wellbeing of Africans. He promoted African cooperatives, tripled government education investment, and expanded social welfare spending. He used his social clout to fight racial prejudice with a tenacity that irritated many Europeans privately. Indeed, he appeared to be more at ease in the company of Africans than in the all-white company of Uganda's European clubs. Above all, he sparked political transformation by raising African participation on the Legislative Council and broadening the responsibilities of African local governments. On November 30, 1953, this Governor ordered the expulsion of Kabaka Mutesa II of Buganda.

Andrew Cohen was sworn in as the new Governor of Uganda in January 1952. He envisioned considerable reforms, such as increasing African participation in Uganda's Legislative Council and Governor's Executive Council. Following negotiations with Muteesa II, the Kabaka, several constitutional reforms for Buganda were proposed in March 1953, including having a majority of elected members in the Lukiiko and transferring a number of services from the Protectorate Government to the Buganda Government, such as education, health, and agriculture. Cohen advocated that the Protectorate devolve more powers to Buganda, but only if Buganda publicly accepted its role as a "component element" of the larger Protectorate. Kabaka Mutesa II accepted the offer, and in March 1953, a joint memorandum was produced.

However, the British colonies of Northern and Southern Rhodesia, as well as Nyasaland, were forming a federation at the same time. The Africans involved were opposed to the federation, but it did not stop the British, who were under pressure from the settlers in those territories, from pushing it through. Alarm bells rang off in Buganda when the Secretary of State for the Colonies proposed the concept of a federation for East Africa in a speech he gave in London in June 1953. Both the Lukiiko and the Kabaka raised significant objections. Indeed, the Baganda began to distrust the direction in which British administration was leading their kingdom, and significant calls for [1159] Pratt R.C., 1955. The Anatomy of a Crisis: Uganda, 1953-55, International Journal, Autumn, 1955, Vol. 10, No. 4 (Autumn, 1955), pp. 267-275.

Buganda's separation from the rest of Uganda began to emerge. Buganda wanted her independence and separate identity restored and honoured by the British after she had willingly gone into what she deemed a protection agreement with them in 1900. The British, however, refused. This resulted in a political deadlock.

Secretary of State for the Colonies Oliver Lyttelton made a "passing allusion" to the possibility "...of much larger measures of unification and possibly still larger measures of federation of the entire East African territory" in a speech in London on June 30, 1953. The East African Standard published Lyttelton's views on July 2 and 3, prompting the Bugandan Government's Ministers (led by Paulo Kavuma) to write to Cohen on July 6 to express their objection to the scheme. The concept of a bigger federation modeled after the Central African Federation worried the Baganda people, who have historically prized their autonomy and independence. They believed that such a step would lead to the merger of other civilizations, destroying and engulfing their own culture and way of life.

Cohen reassured the Baganda that they had nothing to worry about, and that no decision about the formation of an East African federation would be made without their input. However, there remained a lingering suspicion in Buganda that Lyttelton had let the cat out of the bag. The episode served to crystallize anger and seeming slights dating back to the 1900 Agreement, prompting widespread calls for Buganda independence as the primary safeguard against British expansion among the Baganda. The Secretary of State's response, attempting to reassure Mutesa and his Ministers that "the inclusion of the Uganda Protectorate in any such federation is outside the scope of practical politics at the present moment," merely added fuel to the fire. Bunyoro and Toro Bakamas, as well as the Omugabe of Ankole, wrote to Cohen to convey their own anxieties.

Cohen took a direct approach to resolving the spiralling problem, preferring to meet Mutesa in person. However, a series of six private talks at Government House failed to produce a resolution on the question of Bugandan independence, and political instability continued. Frustrated, Cohen warned Mutesa that continuing to oppose the British vision of a united Ugandan state was a breach of the 1900 Agreement and a betrayal of the March 1953 joint proclamation, and that he had five weeks to rethink.

Despite the seeming ultimatum, Mutesa continued to press for Buganda separation, with the support of the Bugandan Lukiiko (Parliament) and other neighbouring Kingdoms. Due to his obstinacy, Cohen presented him with a letter on 30 November 1953, confirming that the British Government was withdrawing its recognition of him as the lawful monarch of Buganda under the requirements of Article 6 of the 1900 Agreement.

Cohen proclaimed a state of emergency because he was afraid that the Baganda would retaliate violently. Mutesa was apprehended and deported to London, much to the surprise of the Baganda people. He would be free to live anywhere in the world, but he would not be allowed to return to Uganda. While Mutesa's supporters lobbied tirelessly on his behalf, he lived "like if on holiday," mostly at the Savoy Hotel.

Cohen had hoped for a new Kabaka to be placed right away, but that was not possible. Far from fixing the situation, exiling the Kabaka exacerbated it. Buganda's resistance was mostly peaceful, with public displays of "weeping, mourning, and collapsing in grief... Ganda, especially Ganda women, declared loyalty to the king and denounced Britain's betrayal of Buganda's alliance." This emotional response, which was based on the Kabaka's significance in Bugandan life rather than Mutesa's personal popularity, caught Cohen off guard, and the British struggled to find a method to counter it.

Following a well-received Bugandan delegation to London, new negotiations between Cohen and a constitutional committee chosen by the Lukiiko took place in Namirembe from June to September 1954, with Keith Hancock, then Director of the Institute of Commonwealth Studies in London, acting as the mediator. Despite the fact that an attempt to have the Kabaka's deportation declared ultra vires failed, the High Court in Kampala hinted that the employment of Article 6 was inappropriate. The British accepted Mutesa's return in exchange for a promise that he and future Kabakas would make a "solemn obligation" to abide by the 1900 Agreement. At the same time, a number of constitutional amendments were agreed upon inside the Government of Buganda and to the national Legislative Council, furthering Cohen's reformist ambitions. The Namirembe conference suggestions were adopted as the Buganda Agreement of 1955 after further discussions in London, and Mutesa returned triumphant to Buganda.

POSSIBLE CAUSES OF THE CRISIS

A DESPOTIC SOVEREIGNTY DEMYSTIFIED: THE POSITION OF 'KABAKA REDEFINED.

The 1953-55 Kabaka Crisis, a breakdown of relations between Governor Cohen and Kabaka Mutesa II was caused by a number of factors some of which were apparent whilst others were underlying as reported by different sources and renowned authors. The most striking and conspicuous reason for the crisis was an after dinner speech to the East African Dinner Club in London made by the Colonial Secretary, Sir Oliver Lyttleton, on 30th June 1953. He envisaged constitutional progress in terms of a federation of East African territories. This unguarded statement provoked deep fears of settler domination in East Africa, fears about which Baganda leaders had always been particularly vocal, ever since moves for 'Closer Union' (as it was called) had been mooted in the late 1920s by Kenya white settlers.[1160] On the other hand as written by Paulo Kavuma the then Katikiro (Prime Minister) of Buganda, it (the crisis) came about as a consequence of Enoch Mulira threatening a suit against the Kabaka.[1161] It should be recalled that in 1939, at the age of 15, Muteesa succeeded his father as Kabaka. He was a student at King's College, Budo, and the prime institution of the Anglican Church. After further studies at Makerere College, he was sent by the British authorities to Cambridge for 3 years. Returning in 1948, he announced his engagement to Damali, the daughter of a prominent Protestant landowner, C.M.S Kisosonkole. Traditionalists viewed the proposed marriage as ultra vires, because Kisosonkole belonged to the Nkima (Monkey) Clan, whose head, the Mugema, was the ceremonial "jajja" (grandfather) of the Kabaka. The Kabaka consequently did not marry from this clan. But a glance at the genealogy in M.S.M. Kiwanuka's History of Buganda shows that this was not entirely true because quite a number of royal wives from the Nkima clan are recorded. The point was that n son of such a union had ever become Kabaka. The grave impediment for a Christian Kabaka was that, since he was expected only to have one wife and that wife happened to be ow'enkima (from the monkey clan), only the sons of such a union would be legitimate and possible successors. Muteesa himself had only inherited the throne because he was the son of the Christian marriage; Cwa himself favoured an 'illegitimate' son, George Mawanda. Despite these criticisms, the wedding went ahead in Namirembe cathedral in November 1948. Damali was never really accepted in court circles at the Lubiri (palace), where the Nalinnya, Alice Zalwango, the kabaka's 'official' sister, held sway. The staunch Anglican Chief Ham Mukasa had nicknamed her 'setani'. The Nalinnya was said to have encouraged the Kabaka in his extra-marital affair with Kate Lukira, wife of Enoch Mulira, who was from a prominent Kiganda protestant family and a brother to E, M.K. Mulira a strong hold delegate in Buganda.

MULIRA SUES KABAKA FOR ADULTERY

By 1949 both the Nabagereka (the official title of the wife of the Kabaka) and Kate Mulira were pregnant, and Mulira was threatening to cite the Kabaka in a divorce case. The scandals of 1949 subsided somewhat. Enoch Mulira dropped the threat of divorce proceedings in which the Kabaka would have been involved. On the 2nd of June, 1953 while at the coronation of the new monarch Queen Elizabeth II after the death of her father George VI on 6th February 1952, Kabaka Muteesa II in attendance of the ceremony wasn't accorded any recognition (a prestigious honour) something very unusual and this was on moral grounds on the basis of having an extra marital affair with a married woman whose husband has threatened to cite him (the Kabaka) in the formers divorce petition.[1162] This obviously didn't go well with the Kabaka who 'felt undesired/rejected' at the time. Upon his return as cited by Kavuma Paulo (then Katikiro of Buganda) he agitated for the independence of Buganda from the rest of the protectorate as an underlying reaction/response to the events at the coronation of the Queen of England with the most outstanding reason being the fear for a federation of East Africa which would culminate into loss of status and recognition for the Baganda.

[1160]Kevin Ward, The Church of Uganda and the Exile of Kabaka Muteesa II, 1953 -55, university of Leeds.
[1161] Paulo Kavuma, Crisis in Buganda 1953: The Story of the Exile and Return of the Kabaka, Muteesa II, Rex Collings, London 1979.

The events that unfolded onto the Kabaka of Buganda were symbolic to the gradual succumbing autonomy of a 'king in his kingdom' to a point of almost appearing in a court of law as a defendant to a divorce petition. This was nevertheless amicably settled out of Court by the 'elders' in Buganda as an event very embarrassing to the Kabaka individually (in persona) and the entire Kingdom of Buganda (in rem). Measured against the past, the kabaka's despotic position bore a close resemblance to that of King David as interestingly noted by John Taylor, the principal of Mukono Theological College who was reckoned to have closer contacts with Ganda than any other any other member of the mission. Taylor's message to the colonial administration in England during the violent riots in Buganda was that although the British administration might think that monarchy was an institution that they understood, the Buganda model in fact bore a closer resemblance to that of King David that of Queen Elizabeth. He wrote, "I think it true, that the Kabaka is still the great husband figure to nearly all the women here, and one might almost say that from him all husband hood derives.... so every man feels that emotionally his authority in his home, and to a lesser degree in other spheres, derives from the person of the Kabaka.....In Buganda I doubt if there are a score of Africans who have really lost hope that the Kabaka will be restored to them. That is the gist of their prayers in the Churches"[1163]

POLITICAL CONCERNS

Sir Andrew finally presented the Kabaka with formal instructions from the Secretary of State that he pledge "that he would accept" to the Governor's plans for the unified and stable development of Uganda as a whole. Fearful of public order if the Kabaka openly defied the Secretary of State, and, one suspects, exhausted by the struggles with this young man who seemed to the Governor to be a major obstacle to his plans for the unified and stable development of Uganda as a whole, Sir Andrew had quite a situation. After Mutesa declined this obligation, recognition was revoked, a state of emergency was declared, and he was deported quickly. These actions could have been the result of an irritated Governor. However, it's possible that two sides of the scenario were overlooked.

[1162] Paulo Kavuma, Crisis in Buganda 1953: The story of the Exile and Return of Kabaka, Muteesa II, Rex Collings, London, 1979

[1163] Roland Oliver, In the Realms of Gold, pioneering in Africa History, Routledge Taylor & Francis Group

The first is a legal one. While Mutesa most likely contributed to the crisis by raising concerns that resulted in a dispute between the Governor and the people, the Kabaka was in an extremely impossible constitutional situation. He looked bound at some point to be faced with an issue over which he would have to choose between continuous recognition by the British Government and the confidence of the Baganda, as required by the Buganda Agreement and yet advised by a Lukiiko of increasing democratic composition. He chose to oppose the Governor and reflect and give voice to popular sentiment in Buganda, which was probably comprehensible and certainly politically clever.

The second point to consider is political. Overnight, Mutesa's expulsion united practically the entire Buganda community in support of Mutesa and strong opposition to the Governor. The causes of this vehement and practically universal reaction were numerous. It was partly a reaction to foreign meddling in a private tribal dispute. It was partly an outpouring of resentment toward Europeans, which was always present in a colonial society. Ambitious politicians fostered it to a certain extent. Above all, it appears to have originated from still-strong tribe traditionalism and a subsequent devotion to the Kabakaship as a traditional institution.

As a result, the deportation, which was supposed to remove an impediment to the Governor's aspirations for Uganda's stable and democratic development, now threatens to make such progress impossible.

THE CONSEQUENCE OF COHEN'S SANCTION

It provided an issue for the reckless and demagogic Uganda National Congress to gain popular support for the first time. It was extremely difficult to maintain constructive co-operative connections between Baganda and British officials. Worst of all, it sparked a resurgence of tribalism in Buganda. There were certain to be many in any colonial culture who could only fit themselves inadvertently to the enormous changes brought about by the effect of western ideas, industry, and trade, and who were so uneasy, befuddled, and generally unfriendly. As a result, the prospect of organized xenophobia was constantly present and it also revived tribalism.

The deportation of Ugandans bolstered the power of these nefarious elements in Buganda. There are numerous indicators of this. The fate of Christian churches was one of the most upsetting. The Baganda, who had been the most heavily evangelized African tribe, began to drift away from Christianity. Church attendance is estimated to have decreased by 85%. Whole districts reverted to pagan religion, and prophets claiming to be possessed by the spirit of the Buganda god of war rose to prominence. Despite being banned since the 1949 riots, the Bataka Party, the political expression of this tribalism, remained a considerable presence in this town. The Bataka and their ilk were, in many respects, the most frightening force of all, as a simply protest group fighting for nothing more than the resurrection of a bygone era.

Sir Andrew attempted to reclaim the initiative in the face of escalating animosity and dwindling cooperation. He encouraged the Great Lukiiko to appoint a commission to explore the constitutional reconstruction of Buganda under the unbiased chairmanship of the distinguished Sir Keith Hancock. This plan was on the verge of being rejected. However, after it was suggested that such proposals might hasten Mutesa's return, the Lukiiko elected an able all-Baganda committee that included several teachers, a headmaster, a university lecturer, two leading local government officials, a lawyer, a Bishop, two priests, and a Harvard Doctor of Philosophy who had flown in specially from New York where he had long resided. After three months of hard effort, this body, dubbed the Namirembe Committee, prepared a thorough constitutional reform plan for Buganda. They were able to win the Governor's consent to their ideas after some discussion. The hope rose that they would be accepted by the Lukiiko and that normal, peaceful political life might resume under the proposed arrangements, without Kabaka Mutesa II's potentially disruptive presence.

These hopes were dashed, however, when hearings in a case to determine the validity of Kabaka Mutesa II's withdrawal of recognition commenced in Kampala's High Court. Mr. W. K. Y. Diplock, Q.C., a great English barrister, and Mr. Dingle Foot, a talented Ugandan barrister, were sent to Uganda specifically to represent the plaintiffs.

Mr. Diplock created a picture of a Kabaka whose only crimes were his desire to consult his people's representatives and his insistence that he tell them truthfully that he personally found the Secretary of State's assurances unsatisfactory through a detailed examination of the records of the meetings between the Governor and the Kabaka. This had a massive political impact. This view was spread throughout Buganda by repeated and considerable attention in the vernacular press.

Feelings became more powerful once more, and the former worry with deportation was fully rekindled and amplified. By a sad misfortune, even the judgment itself contributed to the escalating issue. It was a lengthy and convoluted decision, as the case involved numerous legal technicalities. The Chief Justice essentially held that the withdrawal of recognition was not a justiciable issue: "It is my finding in this instance that the Crown can be and is the judge of its own case," he said. At least two noteworthy obiter dicta were contributed by him. "The Kabaka had evinced an intention to follow a disloyal policy," he claimed. Second, he added that the Secretary of State was erroneous in claiming that the deportation was justified under Article Six of the Agreement, in event his initial ruling was overturned on appeal.

The decision seemed incredibly complex for the enthusiastic audience waiting outside. The throng grasped hold of the one piece of the decision critical of the Government's action, confused, uncomprehending, and with an overpowering yearning to believe that the Kabaka would return. The recounting relied on exaggeration and simplification, and word quickly spread that the Government had been proven wrong and that the Kabaka would return. As the false rumour faded away, it left behind an unavoidable legacy of increasing suspicion and hatred.

The public's demand for the Kabaka's return grew louder and louder. The government started to rethink its determination that the deportation was final. As far as one can tell, Sir Andrew's senior advisers were practically unified in their opposition to Kabaka Mutesa II's return, fearing that it would weaken the Government's authority and inspire future agitation. Personal animosity and distrust of Mutesa II undoubtedly played a factor. Finally, they feared that if Mutesa II were Kabaka, the new constitutional provisions would be impossible to implement. “Do you bring back a George III if you want to start a constitutional monarchy?” one administrator wondered.

Despite this warning and his personal involvement in the previous judgment, Sir Andrew determined that the argument for the repatriation was stronger. Without some assurance of it, the Namirembe ideas would almost certainly be rejected, causing substantial, maybe irreversible harm to the formation of a stable constitutional order. Anti-European attitudes would become more entrenched. It would be impossible to administer in a constructive manner. Extremists and backward-looking traditionalists would be in charge. Finally, the Namirembe ideas provided a point at which the return might be described as a reaction to changing circumstances rather than a wholesale policy change.

On November 16, 1954, the British Government declared a fundamental shift in policy, whether for these reasons or not.

This announcement had major constitutional implications. To begin with, it made public the extensive government reforms advocated by the Namirembe Conference and already agreed by the government in Buganda. In a nutshell, these measures would replace tribal despotism with a contemporary representative government framework. The ministers would report to the Great Lukiiko rather than the Kabaka. They would establish a Civil Service Board, taking responsibility of the local administration away from the Kabaka. They would increase the judiciary's independence. The Kabaka would become "the emblem of the oneness of the people of Buganda and of the continuity between their past, present, and future," according to the suggestions. It was anticipated that by elevating him, he would avoid becoming embroiled in controversy and therefore prevent a repeat deportation.

Sir Andrew added a vow to implement fundamental reforms in Uganda's Executive and Legislative Councils to these suggestions. On the government side, seven members of the public, five African and two others, were to be added. Five of the seven would be ministers, three of whom would be African. The proportion of Africans to Asians and Europeans on the Council's representation side would be 3:1:1. When compared to Kenya's 1:1:2 ratio or Tanganyika's 1:1:1, Sir Andrew's innovations were clear winners. Finally, and most importantly, the Governor and Secretary of State promised that the Great Lukiiko would be able to pick a new Kabaka or secure Mutesa's return within nine months of the proposals being accepted. Hence, Lord Chandos' earlier "never" was reversed under the pretense of a new response to new circumstances.

The reorganization of the Buganda administration, the return of the Kabaka, the creation of a Ministerial system, the growth of African representation in the Legislative Council, and the securing of Bagandan participation in the Legislative Council were all part of these plans. This second argument was crucial because, in order for Uganda to evolve into a cohesive self-governing region, the Lukiiko's extreme tribalism in refusing to elect representatives to the Legislative Council would have to be overcome.

The Great Lukiiko formed a new committee of conservative, tradition-conscious men to investigate the Namirembe suggestions when it met. There was an unsettling political calm while the committee met. Many people were startled by their report's moderation when it was finally released. Despite some small changes suggested by the committee, the Namirembe suggestions were mostly accepted, as was Bugandan involvement in the Legislative Council. The Government, displaying greater political foresight than in the past, remained silent until the Great Lukiiko had decided on its position. The Lukiiko adopted the report on May 9, 1955, by a vote of 77 to 7, and initiated procedures to prepare the formal documentation. The Secretary of State agreed the next day that the report provided a good starting point for discussion and that a Colonial Office committee should meet with the Lukiiko group. As a result, an unexpected second chance to end the issue had been secured.

Regrettably, there were three more factors in the new situation that complicated and could have easily discouraged the new aspirations for a settlement. To begin, the Lukiiko appointed a second committee to travel to England and request the Kabaka's swift return. A breakdown was still possible if the government insisted on the new reforms being implemented before the Kabaka being returned.

Second, the Uganda National Congress kept trying to sabotage the chances of an agreement. They, too, had dispatched a delegation to London to demand speedy independence. They didn't have the numbers to pose a significant threat at the moment, but the possibility that a breakdown in negotiations would likely boost their support was a powerful motivator for both the government and Lukiiko members to achieve a deal.

THE UNTOLD STORY OF SUING THE KABAKA AND THE ORIGIN THIS IMMUNITY.

The deportation of the Kabaka was also a result of another incident. During the time of Sir Andrew Cohen as governor, the constituent assembly at the time had a member of parliament named Enoch Mulira. He served in the time between 1950-1962.It so happened that Kabaka Muteesa II had an affair with Mulira's wife. This did not sit well with Mulira and he sued the Kabaka for his actions in a court of law to which Kabaka Mutesa was found guilty for the same.[1164]

Prior to his conviction, there were a couple of incidents. There was a notion in the kingdom, which stands to date, that all the women in the kingdom belonged to the king. As such, the king was free to take whomever he liked. Secondly, the court that Mulira charged the Kabaka in was the one formed by the powers of the Kabaka, given that he would appoint the elders to sit in the same. He therefore argued that he could not appear before his own court.

Kabaka Muteesa was denied recognition on moral grounds in 1952 during the coronation of Queen Elizabeth, the then princess, based on a court case that stained him as an adulterous ruler. He was not pleased with this. When he returned to Uganda, he asked Sir Andrew Cohen to drop the concept of an East African Federation and to provide him a timetable for when Buganda would gain independence.

In answer to Muteesa's pleas, Cohen authorized Kabaka Muteesa II's deportation to England, which was carried out with immediate effect.

THE ORIGINS OF THE HIGH COURT OF ENGLAND

The Kabaka's unwillingness to appear before his own local court can be compared to the King's or Queen's Bench theory of the High Court of England. In England and Wales, the Queen's Bench Division, formerly known as the King's Bench Division (during a kingdom) and the Court of Queen's Bench, is one of three divisions of the High Court of Justice, the others being the Chancery Division (previously the Court of Chancery) and the Family.

Queen's or (during a kingship) King's Bench was once one of England's higher common law courts. It was so named because it descended from the English court held coram rege ("before the monarch") and hence traveled wherever the king went. The King's Bench heard trials involving the sovereign or cases involving eminent people who were privileged to be tried before him alone. It could also repair the errors and omissions of the other courts, and it mostly tried criminal or quasi-criminal cases after Henry III's civil wars ended (1216–72). It got its own chief justice in 1268, but it took a long time to lose its strong ties with the monarch and become an independent court of common law.

[1164] Paulo Kavuma, 1979. Crisis in Buganda 1953 the Story of the Exile and Return of the Kabaka Mutesa II, Rex Collings, London.

The Court of King's Bench, properly known as The Court of the King Before the King Himself in the English legal system, was a common law court. The King's Bench was originally formed from the curia regis in the late 12th to early 13th centuries to accompany the monarch on his journeys. In 1318, the King's Bench joined the Court of Common Pleas and the Exchequer of Pleas in Westminster Hall, and it remained there until 1421. The Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873 united the King's Bench with the High Court of Justice, making the King's Bench a division of the High Court. One Chief Justice presided over the King's Bench (now the Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales) and normally three Puisne Justices.

The development of the Court of Chancery and equitable doctrines as one of the two main common law courts, together with the Common Pleas, greatly challenged the King's Bench's jurisdiction and caseload in the 15th and 16th centuries. To reclaim its position, the King's Bench embarked on a radical reform program, replacing traditional writs with bills, which were less expensive, speedier, and more adaptable. While it did not immediately stop the flow, it did assist the King's Bench in recovering and increasing its workload in the long run. While there was a major drop-in activity from 1460 to 1540, once the new reforms took effect, the King's Bench saw a significant increase in business; between 1560 and 1640, it increased tenfold. The Court of Common Pleas became wary of the new developments when legal fictions like the Bill of Middlesex harmed its own business. In the 17th century, after fighting the King's Bench in a reactionary and progressively conservative manner, an equilibrium was reached until the merger in 1873.

The curia regis, one of the three core administrative bodies (together with the Exchequer and the Chancery) that composed the Court of Chancery, was originally the only "court." This curia was the King's court, made up of counselors and courtiers who accompanied the King on his travels across the realm. This was a descendant of the witenagemot, not a specific court of law. Eyre circuits, manned by itinerant judges and working in tandem with the curia regis, disbursed justice over the land on set routes at certain times. These judges were also members of the curia and presided over the "lesser curia regis," which heard matters on behalf of the King. Because the curia accompanied the King, it caused complications with the administration of justice; if the King left the country, or spent much of his career there, as Richard I did, the curia followed. To address this, a central "bench" was formed, with the Court of Common Pleas getting official recognition in Magna Carta so that common pleas might be heard in "some fixed place." The curia, which followed the King, and the Common Pleas, which sat at Westminster Hall, were therefore the two common law courts. The curia eventually became known as the King's Bench, and the court had to be presided over by the King himself.

There is some controversy over whether the original fixed court was the Common Pleas or King's Bench. In 1178, a chronicler recorded that when Henry II:

“learned that the land and the men of the land were burdened by so great a number of justices, for there were, eighteen, chose with the counsel of the wise men of his Kingdom five only, two clerks three and laymen, all of his private family, and decreed that these five should hear all complaints of the Kingdom and should do right and should not depart from the king's court but should remain there to hear the complaints of men, with this understanding that, if there should come up among them any question which could not be brought to a conclusion by them, it should be presented to a royal hearing and be determined by the king and the wiser men of the kingdom.”[1165]

The Court of Common Pleas did not exist until the signing of the Magna Carta, hence this was originally viewed as the creation of the King's Bench. The latter idea held that Henry II's order established the Court of Common Pleas rather than the King's Bench, and that the King's Bench later broke from the Common Pleas. The first evidence of an autonomous King's Bench dates from 1234, when separate plea rolls for each court were discovered. The King's Bench was established as a fully independent tribunal in 1234, according to modern academics, as part of the legal reform that took place between 1232 and 1234. The King's presence in the court became increasingly sporadic under Edward I, and by 1318, the court had become independent of the monarch. Its most recent journeys around the country were to Leicestershire, Staffordshire, and Shropshire in 1414, and to Northamptonshire in 1421. The King's Bench became a permanent court rather than one that accompanied the King from then on. The King's Bench, like the Common Pleas, sat in Westminster Hall until its dissolution.

During the 15th century, religious courts and the Lord Chancellor's equitable authority, exercised through the Court of Chancery, challenged the common law courts' historic primacy. Because of their informality and the simple way of arresting defendants, these courts were more appealing to ordinary lawyers. The Chancery's bills of complaint and subpoena sped up court proceedings, and there was a substantial drop in the number of cases in common law courts from 1460 to 1540, corresponding with a large increase in cases in the newer courts. This loss of business was swiftly recognized by the King's Bench, which was urged by Fairfax J to devise new remedies in 1501 so that "subpoenas would not be utilized as frequently as they are now." The King's Bench began restructuring in 1500 to expand its business and jurisdiction, and by 1550, the tide had turned in their favour.

[1165] Adams, George Burton (1920). "Origin of the English Courts of Common Law". Yale Law Journal. Yale University. 30 (1). ISSN 0044-0094, p. 798

The King's Bench was resurrected because to its employment of Chancery-like procedures, most notably the bill system. A writ would have to be issued first, with varying types of writs depending on the situation. If A wanted to sue B for trespass, debt, or detinue, the court would have to issue a separate writ for each action, incurring time and money for A, and then make sure B showed up in court. Bills, on the other hand, were typically used against court employees and inmates; as a result, the defendant was presumed to already be in the custody of the court and no appearance in court was required.[1166]

As a result, a legal fiction emerged: if A wanted to sue B for trespass, debt, and detinue, he would first get a writ for trespass issued. As a result, B would be arrested, and Bill would take covenant, detinue, and debt measures against him when he was jailed. It eventually became even more fictional; if A wanted to sue B for debt and detinue, a trespass order would be obtained and then discreetly dismissed when B was taken into jail. This was initially accomplished by obtaining a writ of trespass from the Chancery, but a quicker workaround was eventually employed: because the King's Bench retained criminal jurisdiction over Middlesex, the trespass (which was fictitious anyway) would be considered to have occurred there, allowing the King's Bench to issue a bill of arrest on its own. The Bill of Middlesex, as it was known, weakened the jurisdiction of the Court of Common Pleas, which would typically handle such civil matters.[1167]

The advantages to this method were that bills were substantially cheaper, and unlike writs did not tie the plaintiff down; once the case came to court the bill could be amended to include any action or actions the plaintiff wanted to enforce. In addition, by avoiding the Chancery writ, the case was substantially cheaper. The result was significant: the King's Bench's business increased tenfold between 1560 and 1640. The common law remedies were also significantly broadened during this time period. Action on the case was the primary remedy and method, which the justices expanded to include other things. It permitted the enforcement of parol promises in 1499, making Chancery subpoenas redundant; further advancements included debt collection, suing for defamatory statements (formerly an ecclesiastical affair), and action on trover and conversion cases. The majority of this reform occurred under Fineux CJ, who never lived to see the results of his efforts; it took more than a century for the reforms to fully reverse the business decline.

While these reforms were successful in establishing a balance between the old common law courts and the new courts, they were viewed with suspicion by the Common Pleas, which became extremely reactionary to the changes the King's Bench attempted to implement. While the King's Bench was more revolutionary, the Common Pleas became more conservative in its attempts to avoid granting matters to the King's Bench. The disparity between the reformist King's Bench and the conservative Common Pleas was exacerbated by the fact that the three Common Pleas prothonotaries couldn't agree on how to cut costs, leaving the court both expensive and malleable, while the King's Bench became faster, cheaper, and more varied in its operations.

[1166] Baker, J. H. (2002). An Introduction to English Legal History. Butterworths. ISBN 0-406-93053-8, p. 41
[1167] Ibid, p. 42

Slade's case illustrates the difficulties during this period. In the Medieval Common Law, only a debt writ in the Common Pleas, problem-stricken and archaic process, would endeavours for the repayment of debts or other matters. By 1558, by using assumptions which were technical for deceit, the lawyers had succeeded in creating a new approach, implemented by the Court of King's Bench.

The legal fiction used was that a defendant had committed deception and was liable to the complainant by failing to pay after he was promised to do so. The conservative common pleas began to overrule the decisions of the King's Bench on assume by the Court of Appeals, the Court of Exchequer, which led to friction between the courts. In Slade's case, John Popham, the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, deliberately motivated Common Pleas to take an assumption that the judges of the King's bench could vote in a higher court, allowing them to dismiss the Common Pleas and make assumptions the principal contractual action. The more activist Francis Gawdy became the Common Pleas Chief Justice after the death of Edmund Anderson and led shortly to less reactionary and more revolutionary Common Pleas.

Even after this point, the fight continued. In 1660, however, the fines were restated and "the common lawyers bumped at them and took all their finites to the king's bench." The Inter Regnum granted some repair to the Common Pleas which remove fines from original writings and harmed the King's bench. In 1661, by pressing a law of the Parliament to abolish the latitats based on legal fictionen, the Common Ploys attempted to reverse this by prohibiting "special bail" where there was no expression in that process of "the true cause of action.” In the 1670s the King's Bench was not told that the process had to be true, so the court kept using lawful fictions simply to ensure that the true cause of action was taken, regardless of whether this was true or not. In compliance with 1661 statute, Bill of Middlessex revealed the real motive for action but did not need a valid complaint. The result was serious friction within the court system, and then, by allowing for the legal fiction in the Common Pleas, as well as in King's Bench, Francis North, Chief Justice of the common plains, came to a compromise.

The unintended outcome was that all three common law courts, with similar proceedings, were equally competent to hold common pleas by the end of Charles II. By the 18th century it was common to speak and not differentiate of the "twelve judges" of all three courts, and the cases of assisted parties were also divided. He complained in 1828 that Henry Brougham:

“the jurisdiction of the Court of King's Bench, for example, was originally confined to pleas of the Crown, and then extended to actions where violence was used – actions of trespass, by force; but now, all actions are admissible within its walls, through the medium of a legal fiction, which was adopted for the purpose of enlarging its authority, that every person sued is in the custody of the marshal of the court and may, therefore, be proceeded against for any personal cause of actions. Thus, by degrees, this court has drawn over to itself actions which really belong to...the Court of Common Pleas. The Court of Common Pleas, however...never was able to obtain cognizance of – the peculiar subject of King's Bench jurisdiction – Crown Pleas... the Exchequer has adopted a similar course for, though it was originally confined to the trial of revenue cases, it has, by means of another fiction – the supposition that everybody sued is a debtor to the Crown, and further, that he cannot pay his debt, because the other party will not pay him, – opened its doors to every suitor, and so drawn to itself the right of trying cases, that were never intended to be placed within its jurisdiction.”[1168]

Brougham's speech was intended to demonstrate that three courts with identical jurisdiction were superfluous, and that doing so would result in a situation where the best judges, attorneys, and cases would all end up in one court, overburdening that body and rendering the others nearly useless. In 1823, the King's Bench received 43,465 proceedings, the Common Pleas 13,009, and the Exchequer of Pleas 6,778. The judges of the King's Bench were "immoderately overburdened," the judges of the Common Pleas were "completely employed in term, and greatly engaged in vacation also," while the Barons of the Exchequer were "comparatively little occupied either in term or holiday."

The Judicature Commission was established in 1867 in response to this and the findings of a commission reviewing the slow speed of the Court of Chancery. It was given a broad remit to investigate reform of the courts, the law, and the legal profession. From March 25, 1869, until July 10, 1874, five reports were released, with the first (on the construction of a single Supreme Court of Judicature) being the most consequential. The report disposed of the previous idea of merging the common law and equity, and instead suggested a single Supreme Court capable of using both. In 1870 the Lord Chancellor, Lord Hatherly, attempted to bring the recommendations into law through an Act of Parliament, but did not go to the trouble of consulting the judiciary or the leader of the Conservatives, who controlled the House of Lords. Lawyers and judges, particularly Alexander Cockburn, were vocal in their opposition to the bill. Following Hatherly's replacement by Lord Selborne in September 1872, a second bill was introduced after consultation with the judiciary; while it followed the same lines as the first, it was far more detailed.

[1168] Manchester, A. H. (1980). Modern Legal History. Butterworths. ISBN 0-406-62264-7, p. 130

The Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873 consolidated the Common Pleas, Exchequer, Queen's Bench, and Court of Chancery into a single body, the High Court of Justice, but maintaining the differences between the courts. The Queen's Bench ceased to exist on July 6, 1875, with the exception of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court. The existence of the same courts as divisions of one undivided body was a constitutional oddity that prohibited Chief Justices from being forced to retire or be demoted. As a result, all three Chief Justices remained in office (Lord Chief Justice Sir Alexander Cockburn, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas Lord Coleridge, and Chief Baron of the Exchequer Sir Fitzroy Kelly). Kelly and Cockburn died in 1880, allowing the Common Pleas and Exchequer Divisions to be abolished by Order in Council on December 16, 1880. The High Court was reorganized into three divisions: Chancery, Queen's Bench, and Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty.

Academics believed for a long time that the King's Bench was primarily a criminal court due to a misunderstanding by Sir Edward Coke in his Institutes of the Lawes of England. This was false; no indictment was tried by the King's Bench until January 1323, and no record of the court ordering the death penalty was discovered until halfway through Edward II's reign. With a royal ordinance in 1293 directing conspiracy cases to be brought to the King's Bench and the court's judges acting in trailbaston commissions across the country, the court did have some criminal jurisdiction. The early King's Bench jurisdiction was defined by A. T. Carter in his History of English Legal Institutions as "to correct all crimes and misdemeanours that amounted to a breach of the peace, the King being then plaintiff, for such were in derogation of the Jura regalia; and to take cognizance of everything not parcelled out to the other courts."

By the end of the 14th century, much of the criminal jurisdiction had waned, though the court retained criminal jurisdiction over all cases in Middlesex, the county in which Westminster Hall was located. The King's Bench had primary jurisdiction over "pleas of the crown," or cases involving the King in some way. The King's Bench had exclusive jurisdiction over these cases, with the exception of revenue matters, which were handled by the Exchequer of Pleas.

The Court of King's Bench did hear appeals from the Court of Common Pleas, eyre circuits, assize and local courts, but it was not a court of last resort; its own records were sent to Parliament for approval. The creation of the Court of Exchequer Chamber created a court to which King's Bench decisions could be appealed, and when the Exchequer Chamber's jurisdiction was expanded in 1830, the King's Bench ceased to be an appellate court. The King's Bench inherited much of the Common Pleas' jurisdiction as a result of the Bill of Westminster and other legal fictions, though the Common Pleas remained the only place where real property claims could be brought.

It therefore goes without saying that the aspect of justice was a creation of the king with the formation of the King's bench. This can be argued to be the origin of modern-day sovereignty which exonerates the king (sovereign) from any proceedings against him in his own court. In an ancient sense, sovereign immunity was the forerunner of state immunity, based on the classical notion of sovereignty, which said that a sovereign could not be subjected to the jurisdiction of another without his or her consent.

Sovereign immunity, also known as crown immunity, is a legal doctrine that states that a sovereign or state cannot commit a legal wrong and is immune from civil or criminal prosecution in its own courts, strictly speaking in modern texts. State immunity is a similar, stronger rule that applies to foreign courts.

In the United Kingdom, the general rule has always been that the Crown cannot be prosecuted or sued in either criminal or civil cases. Civil actions could only be brought by way of a petition of right, which required the grant of the royal fiat (i.e. permission); suits against the Attorney General for a declaration; or actions against ministers or government departments where immunity had been specifically waived by an Act of Parliament.[1169]

The Crown Cases Act of 1947, which made the Crown (when acting as the government) liable as of right in proceedings where it was previously only liable by virtue of a grant of a fiat, changed the situation dramatically. With a few exclusions, this effectively allowed tort and contract actions against the Crown to be brought. Because ministers' activities are based on the royal prerogative, proceedings to seek writs of mandamus and prohibition were always possible against them.

Criminal proceedings against Her Majesty's Government are still illegal unless the Crown Proceedings Act expressly permits it.[1170]

Because the Crown Proceedings Act only applied to activities taken out by or on behalf of the British government, the monarch is still free from criminal and civil liability. Civil actions can still be brought in theory through the two fundamental processes indicated above: a petition of right or a suit against the Attorney General for a declaration.[1171]

This therefore begs a serious question on the independence of the judicial system. As we shall see later on in this book, it has increasingly become futile to declare a complete independence of the judiciary arm of government in most of the countries that were colonised by Britain.

The Origins of the High Court of England

The Kabaka's unwillingness to appear before his own local court can be compared to the King's or Queen's Bench theory of the High Court of England. In England and Wales, the Queen's Bench

[1169] Halsbury's Laws of England, volume 12(1): "Crown Proceedings and Crown Practice", paragraph 101
[1170] Sunkin, Maurice (2003). "Crown immunity from criminal liability in English law". Public Law (Winter 2003): 716–729.
[1171] Halsbury's Laws of England, volume 12(1): "Crown and Royal Family", paragraph 47, 56

Division, formerly known as the King's Bench Division (during a kingdom) and the Court of Queen's Bench, is one of three divisions of the High Court of Justice, the others being the Chancery Division (previously the Court of Chancery) and the Family.

Queen's or (during a kingship) King's Bench was once one of England's higher common law courts. It was so named because it descended from the English court held coram rege ("before the monarch") and hence traveled wherever the king went. The King's Bench heard trials involving the sovereign or cases involving eminent people who were privileged to be tried before him alone. It could also repair the errors and omissions of the other courts, and it mostly tried criminal or quasi-criminal cases after Henry III's civil wars ended (1216–72). It got its own chief justice in 1268, but it took a long time to lose its strong ties with the monarch and become an independent court of common law.

The Court of King's Bench, properly known as The Court of the King Before the King Himself in the English legal system, was a common law court. The King's Bench was originally formed from the curia regis in the late 12th to early 13th centuries to accompany the monarch on his journeys. In 1318, the King's Bench joined the Court of Common Pleas and the Exchequer of Pleas in Westminster Hall, and it remained there until 1421. The Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873 united the King's Bench with the High Court of Justice, making the King's Bench a division of the High Court. One Chief Justice presided over the King's Bench (now the Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales) and normally three Puisne Justices.

The development of the Court of Chancery and equitable doctrines as one of the two main common law courts, together with the Common Pleas, greatly challenged the King's Bench's jurisdiction and caseload in the 15th and 16th centuries. To reclaim its position, the King's Bench embarked on a radical reform program, replacing traditional writs with bills, which were less expensive, speedier, and more adaptable. While it did not immediately stop the flow, it did assist the King's Bench in recovering and increasing its workload in the long run. While there was a major drop-in activity from 1460 to 1540, once the new reforms took effect, the King's Bench saw a significant increase in business; between 1560 and 1640, it increased tenfold. The Court of Common Pleas became wary of the new developments when legal fictions like the Bill of Middlesex harmed its own business. In the 17th century, after fighting the King's Bench in a reactionary and progressively conservative manner, an equilibrium was reached until the merger in 1873.

The curia regis, one of the three core administrative bodies (together with the Exchequer and the Chancery) that composed the Court of Chancery, was originally the only "court." This curia was the King's court, made up of counselors and courtiers who accompanied the King on his travels across the realm. This was a descendant of the witenagemot, not a specific court of law. Eyre circuits, manned by itinerant judges and working in tandem with the curia regis, disbursed justice over the land on set routes at certain times. These judges were also members of the curia and presided over the "lesser curia regis," which heard matters on behalf of the King. Because the curia accompanied the King, it caused complications with the administration of justice; if the King left the country, or spent much of his career there, as Richard I did, the curia followed. To address this, a central "bench" was formed, with the Court of Common Pleas getting official recognition in Magna Carta so that common pleas might be heard in "some fixed place." The curia, which followed the King, and the Common Pleas, which sat at Westminster Hall, were therefore the two common law courts. The curia eventually became known as the King's Bench, and the court had to be presided over by the King himself.

There is some controversy over whether the original fixed court was the Common Pleas or King's Bench. In 1178, a chronicler recorded that when Henry II:

“learned that the land and the men of the land were burdened by so great a number of justices, for there were, eighteen, chose with the counsel of the wise men of his Kingdom five only, two clerks three and laymen, all of his private family, and decreed that these five should hear all complaints of the Kingdom and should do right and should not depart from the king's court but should remain there to hear the complaints of men, with this understanding that, if there should come up among them any question which could not be brought to a conclusion by them, it should be presented to a royal hearing and be determined by the king and the wiser men of the kingdom.”[1172]

The Court of Common Pleas did not exist until the signing of the Magna Carta, hence this was originally viewed as the creation of the King's Bench. The latter idea held that Henry II's order established the Court of Common Pleas rather than the King's Bench, and that the King's Bench later broke from the Common Pleas. The first evidence of an autonomous King's Bench dates from 1234, when separate plea rolls for each court were discovered. The King's Bench was established as a fully independent tribunal in 1234, according to modern academics, as part of the legal reform that took place between 1232 and 1234. The King's presence in the court became increasingly sporadic under Edward I, and by 1318, the court had become independent of the monarch. Its most recent journeys around the country were to Leicestershire, Staffordshire, and Shropshire in 1414, and to Northamptonshire in 1421. The King's Bench became a permanent court rather than one that accompanied the King from then on. The King's Bench, like the Common Pleas, sat in Westminster Hall until its dissolution.

[1172] Adams, George Burton (1920). "Origin of the English Courts of Common Law". Yale Law Journal. Yale University. 30 (1). ISSN 0044-0094, p. 798

During the 15th century, religious courts and the Lord Chancellor's equitable authority, exercised through the Court of Chancery, challenged the common law courts' historic primacy. Because of their informality and the simple way of arresting defendants, these courts were more appealing to ordinary lawyers. The Chancery's bills of complaint and subpoena sped up court proceedings, and there was a substantial drop in the number of cases in common law courts from 1460 to 1540, corresponding with a large increase in cases in the newer courts. This loss of business was swiftly recognized by the King's Bench, which was urged by Fairfax J to devise new remedies in 1501 so that "subpoenas would not be utilized as frequently as they are now." The King's Bench began restructuring in 1500 to expand its business and jurisdiction, and by 1550, the tide had turned in their favour.

The King's Bench was resurrected because to its employment of Chancery-like procedures, most notably the bill system. A writ would have to be issued first, with varying types of writs depending on the situation. If A wanted to sue B for trespass, debt, or detinue, the court would have to issue a separate writ for each action, incurring time and money for A, and then make sure B showed up in court. Bills, on the other hand, were typically used against court employees and inmates; as a result, the defendant was presumed to already be in the custody of the court and no appearance in court was required.[1173]

As a result, a legal fiction emerged: if A wanted to sue B for trespass, debt, and detinue, he would first get a writ for trespass issued. As a result, B would be arrested, and Bill would take covenant, detinue, and debt measures against him when he was jailed. It eventually became even more fictional; if A wanted to sue B for debt and detinue, a trespass order would be obtained and then discreetly dismissed when B was taken into jail. This was initially accomplished by obtaining a writ of trespass from the Chancery, but a quicker workaround was eventually employed: because the King's Bench retained criminal jurisdiction over Middlesex, the trespass (which was fictitious anyway) would be considered to have occurred there, allowing the King's Bench to issue a bill of arrest on its own. The Bill of Middlesex, as it was known, weakened the jurisdiction of the Court of Common Pleas, which would typically handle such civil matters.[1174]

The advantages to this method were that bills were substantially cheaper, and unlike writs did not tie the plaintiff down; once the case came to court the bill could be amended to include any action or actions the plaintiff wanted to enforce. In addition, by avoiding the Chancery writ, the case was substantially cheaper. The result was significant: the King's Bench's business increased tenfold between 1560 and 1640. The common law remedies were also significantly broadened during this time period. Action on the case was the primary remedy and method, which the justices expanded to include other things. It permitted the enforcement of parol promises in 1499, making Chancery subpoenas redundant; further advancements included debt collection, suing for defamatory statements (formerly an ecclesiastical affair), and action on trover and conversion cases. The majority of this reform occurred under Fineux CJ, who never lived to see the results of his efforts; it took more than a century for the reforms to fully reverse the business decline.

[1173] Baker, J. H. (2002). An Introduction to English Legal History. Butterworths. ISBN 0-406-93053-8, p. 41
[1174] Ibid, p. 42

While these reforms were successful in establishing a balance between the old common law courts and the new courts, they were viewed with suspicion by the Common Pleas, which became extremely reactionary to the changes the King's Bench attempted to implement. While the King's Bench was more revolutionary, the Common Pleas became more conservative in its attempts to avoid granting matters to the King's Bench. The disparity between the reformist King's Bench and the conservative Common Pleas was exacerbated by the fact that the three Common Pleas prothonotaries couldn't agree on how to cut costs, leaving the court both expensive and malleable, while the King's Bench became faster, cheaper, and more varied in its operations.

Slade's case illustrates the difficulties during this period. In the Medieval Common Law, only a debt writ in the Common Pleas, problem-stricken and archaic process, would endeavours for the repayment of debts or other matters. By 1558, by using assumptions which were technical for deceit, the lawyers had succeeded in creating a new approach, implemented by the Court of King's Bench.

The legal fiction used was that a defendant had committed deception and was liable to the complainant by failing to pay after he was promised to do so. The conservative common pleas began to overrule the decisions of the King's Bench on assume by the Court of Appeals, the Court of Exchequer, which led to friction between the courts. In Slade's case, John Popham, the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, deliberately motivated Common Pleas to take an assumption that the judges of the King's bench could vote in a higher court, allowing them to dismiss the Common Pleas and make assumptions the principal contractual action. The more activist Francis Gawdy became the Common Pleas Chief Justice after the death of Edmund Anderson and led shortly to less reactionary and more revolutionary Common Pleas.

Even after this point, the fight continued. In 1660, however, the fines were restated and "the common lawyers bumped at them and took all their finites to the king's bench." The Inter Regnum granted some repair to the Common Pleas which remove fines from original writings and harmed the King's bench. In 1661, by pressing a law of the Parliament to abolish the latitats based on legal fictionen, the Common Ploys attempted to reverse this by prohibiting "special bail" where there was no expression in that process of "the true cause of action.” In the 1670s the King's Bench was not told that the process had to be true, so the court kept using lawful fictions simply to ensure that the true cause of action was taken, regardless of whether this was true or not. In compliance with 1661 statute, Bill of Middlessex revealed the real motive for action but did not need a valid complaint. The result was serious friction within the court system, and then, by allowing for the legal fiction in the Common Pleas, as well as in King's Bench, Francis North, Chief Justice of the common plains, came to a compromise.

The unintended outcome was that all three common law courts, with similar proceedings, were equally competent to hold common pleas by the end of Charles II. By the 18th century it was common to speak and not differentiate of the "twelve judges" of all three courts, and the cases of assisted parties were also divided. He complained in 1828 that Henry Brougham:

“the jurisdiction of the Court of King's Bench, for example, was originally confined to pleas of the Crown, and then extended to actions where violence was used – actions of trespass, by force; but now, all actions are admissible within its walls, through the medium of a legal fiction, which was adopted for the purpose of enlarging its authority, that every person sued is in the custody of the marshal of the court and may, therefore, be proceeded against for any personal cause of actions. Thus, by degrees, this court has drawn over to itself actions which really belong to...the Court of Common Pleas. The Court of Common Pleas, however...never was able to obtain cognizance of – the peculiar subject of King's Bench jurisdiction – Crown Pleas... the Exchequer has adopted a similar course for, though it was originally confined to the trial of revenue cases, it has, by means of another fiction – the supposition that everybody sued is a debtor to the Crown, and further, that he cannot pay his debt, because the other party will not pay him, – opened its doors to every suitor, and so drawn to itself the right of trying cases, that were never intended to be placed within its jurisdiction.”[1175]

Brougham's speech was intended to demonstrate that three courts with identical jurisdiction were superfluous, and that doing so would result in a situation where the best judges, attorneys, and cases would all end up in one court, overburdening that body and rendering the others nearly useless. In 1823, the King's Bench received 43,465 proceedings, the Common Pleas 13,009, and the Exchequer of Pleas 6,778. The judges of the King's Bench were "immoderately overburdened," the judges of the Common Pleas were "completely employed in term, and greatly engaged in vacation also," while the Barons of the Exchequer were "comparatively little occupied either in term or holiday."

The Judicature Commission was established in 1867 in response to this and the findings of a commission reviewing the slow speed of the Court of Chancery. It was given a broad remit to investigate reform of the courts, the law, and the legal profession. From March 25, 1869, until July 10, 1874, five reports were released, with the first (on the construction of a single Supreme Court of Judicature) being the most consequential. The report disposed of the previous idea of merging the common law and equity, and instead suggested a single Supreme Court capable of using both. In 1870 the Lord Chancellor, Lord Hatherly, attempted to bring the recommendations into law through an Act of Parliament, but did not go to the trouble of consulting the judiciary or the leader of the Conservatives, who controlled the House of Lords. Lawyers and judges, particularly Alexander Cockburn, were vocal in their opposition to the bill. Following Hatherly's replacement by Lord Selborne in September 1872, a second bill was introduced after consultation with the judiciary; while it followed the same lines as the first, it was far more detailed.

[1175] Manchester, A. H. (1980). Modern Legal History. Butterworths. ISBN 0-406-62264-7, p. 130

The Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873 consolidated the Common Pleas, Exchequer, Queen's Bench, and Court of Chancery into a single body, the High Court of Justice, but maintaining the differences between the courts. The Queen's Bench ceased to exist on July 6, 1875, with the exception of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court. The existence of the same courts as divisions of one undivided body was a constitutional oddity that prohibited Chief Justices from being forced to retire or be demoted. As a result, all three Chief Justices remained in office (Lord Chief Justice Sir Alexander Cockburn, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas Lord Coleridge, and Chief Baron of the Exchequer Sir Fitzroy Kelly). Kelly and Cockburn died in 1880, allowing the Common Pleas and Exchequer Divisions to be abolished by Order in Council on December 16, 1880. The High Court was reorganized into three divisions: Chancery, Queen's Bench, and Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty.

Academics believed for a long time that the King's Bench was primarily a criminal court due to a misunderstanding by Sir Edward Coke in his Institutes of the Lawes of England. This was false; no indictment was tried by the King's Bench until January 1323, and no record of the court ordering the death penalty was discovered until halfway through Edward II's reign. With a royal ordinance in 1293 directing conspiracy cases to be brought to the King's Bench and the court's judges acting in trailbaston commissions across the country, the court did have some criminal jurisdiction. The early King's Bench jurisdiction was defined by A. T. Carter in his History of English Legal Institutions as "to correct all crimes and misdemeanours that amounted to a breach of the peace, the King being then plaintiff, for such were in derogation of the Jura regalia; and to take cognizance of everything not parcelled out to the other courts."

By the end of the 14th century, much of the criminal jurisdiction had waned, though the court retained criminal jurisdiction over all cases in Middlesex, the county in which Westminster Hall was located. The King's Bench had primary jurisdiction over "pleas of the crown," or cases involving the King in some way. The King's Bench had exclusive jurisdiction over these cases, with the exception of revenue matters, which were handled by the Exchequer of Pleas.

The Court of King's Bench did hear appeals from the Court of Common Pleas, eyre circuits, assize and local courts, but it was not a court of last resort; its own records were sent to Parliament for approval. The creation of the Court of Exchequer Chamber created a court to which King's Bench decisions could be appealed, and when the Exchequer Chamber's jurisdiction was expanded in 1830, the King's Bench ceased to be an appellate court. The King's Bench inherited much of the Common Pleas' jurisdiction as a result of the Bill of Westminster and other legal fictions, though the Common Pleas remained the only place where real property claims could be brought.

It therefore goes without saying that the aspect of justice was a creation of the king with the formation of the King's bench. This can be argued to be the origin of modern-day sovereignty which exonerates the king (sovereign) from any proceedings against him in his own court. In an ancient sense, sovereign immunity was the forerunner of state immunity, based on the classical notion of sovereignty, which said that a sovereign could not be subjected to the jurisdiction of another without his or her consent.

Sovereign immunity, also known as crown immunity, is a legal doctrine that states that a sovereign or state cannot commit a legal wrong and is immune from civil or criminal prosecution in its own courts, strictly speaking in modern texts. State immunity is a similar, stronger rule that applies to foreign courts.

In the United Kingdom, the general rule has always been that the Crown cannot be prosecuted or sued in either criminal or civil cases. Civil actions could only be brought by way of a petition of right, which required the grant of the royal fiat (i.e. permission); suits against the Attorney General for a declaration; or actions against ministers or government departments where immunity had been specifically waived by an Act of Parliament.[1176]

The Crown Cases Act of 1947, which made the Crown (when acting as the government) liable as of right in proceedings where it was previously only liable by virtue of a grant of a fiat, changed the situation dramatically. With a few exclusions, this effectively allowed tort and contract actions against the Crown to be brought. Because ministers' activities are based on the royal prerogative, proceedings to seek writs of mandamus and prohibition were always possible against them.

Criminal proceedings against Her Majesty's Government are still illegal unless the Crown Proceedings Act expressly permits it.[1177]

[1176] Halsbury's Laws of England, volume 12(1): "Crown Proceedings and Crown Practice", paragraph 101
[1177] Sunkin, Maurice (2003). "Crown immunity from criminal liability in English law". Public Law (Winter 2003): 716–729.

Because the Crown Proceedings Act only applied to activities taken out by or on behalf of the British government, the monarch is still free from criminal and civil liability. Civil actions can still be brought in theory through the two fundamental processes indicated above: a petition of right or a suit against the Attorney General for a declaration.[1178]

This therefore begs a serious question on the independence of the judicial system. As we shall see later on in this book, it has increasingly become futile to declare a complete independence of the judiciary arm of government in most of the countries that were colonised by Britain.

SUING ROYALTY TODAY

I have laid out the history and consequences that have happened before when there has been an attempt to sue a king. It has proven futile in history, but it seems to have had a slight change in the recent developments.

Male Mabirizi Hassan Kiwanuka sued the Kabaka of Buganda Ronald Muwenda Mutebi II in 2016 after the Buganda Land Board, which controls the Kingdom's land, ordered all bibanja holders to be registered in order to receive lease land titles.

The Kabaka is venerated by the Baganda. Ssabasajja, Magulu Nyondo, and Bbaffe, which mean Man among Men, Legs of Steel, and Our Husband, respectively, all allude to the king of Buganda's invincibility.

Despite this, one man, a Muganda, dared to sue the Kabaka. Male Mabirizi Kiwanuka, who accused the Kabaka of illegally collecting land fees (obusulu) through the Buganda Land Board, met with lawyers representing the king in the High Court deputy registrar Alex Ajiji's chambers on August 29, 2016.

Anyone attempting to sue the Kabaka was unprecedented. Many people were taken aback by this maneuver, but it was all too familiar to Mengo officials. Mabirizi had also sued the Kabaka in 2015 for refusing to follow a traditional court judgement [Kkooti ya Kisekwa] that said the Kkobe clan's head was occupying the seat illegally.

Mabirizi's father was the leader of one of Kkobe's sub-clans. Mutebi allowed the enforcement of Kisekwa's judgement, which replaced the clan leaders of Ngeye Nakinsige, KKobe, in order to avoid a court decision.

These events lifted the veil on the long known and set norm that the Kabaka was untouchable. It struck intimidation to the heart of the executive of the kingdom and therefore made people realise that the king is not by anyway above the law.

[1178] Halsbury's Laws of England, volume 12(1): "Crown and Royal Family", paragraph 47, 56

This is particularly important in the national politics because it spurs confidence in the citizens to sue the executive of the state if and when they have grievances. The head of the executive has majorly been sued in election petitions and nothing more. Such incidences might open the people's eyes to possibilities of severing an individual from the person of the president.

1953-55 CRISIS BUGANDA AGREEMENT

For more than half a century, the Uganda Agreement, 1900; formed the basis of the relationship between Buganda on the one hand, and the British colonial administrators of the Uganda Protectorate on the other hand. The agreement was ostensibly made between willing equal partners - the British having first given 'protection' to Buganda at Buganda's own invitation. A key element of the agreement was the allocation of land to Baganda in a type of freehold tenure that came to be known as 'mailo land'. This effectively excluded European settlers from acquiring land in Buganda. Consequently, there were no white settlers to speak of in Uganda unlike what had happened in neighboring Kenya. The agreement also called for Buganda to be on an equal footing with any future provinces that might be incorporated into the Uganda Protectorate. Because of these provisions, Buganda was able to maintain an unprecedented degree of internal autonomy within the Uganda Protectorate.

During the 1920s and 1930s, the British floated the idea of closer union between their colonies in East Africa, namely: Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika. This idea was resisted strongly in Uganda and especially Buganda. There were two closely related reasons for the strong opposition. First, it was feared that an East African Federation would open the doors for European settlers in Uganda. The example of how settlers treated the indigenous Africans in next door Kenya, or further afield in Rhodesia and South Africa, left the Baganda under no illusions about what would happen to their society if this came to pass. Second, the Baganda feared that their ancient kingdom, with its cherished customs and culture would be swallowed up in the much larger polity of an East African federation and this they were determined to resist. However reluctantly, the British were forced to abandon the idea of an East African federation.

In January 1952, Andrew Cohen took the reigns as the new Governor of Uganda. He had major reforms in mind including measures such as expanding African representation in Uganda's Legislative Council and the Governor's Executive Council. After negotiations with Muteesa II, the Kabaka; several constitutional reforms were proposed for Buganda itself in March 1953 including having a majority of elected members in the Lukiiko, as well as transferring a number of services such as education, health, and agriculture from the Protectorate Government to the Buganda Government.

It was at this same time however that the British colonies of Northern and Southern Rhodesia as well as Nyasaland were being formed into a federation. This federation was opposed by the Africans concerned but this did not stop the British, under pressure from the settlers in those territories, from forcing through the federation. When the Secretary of State for the Colonies floated anew the idea of a federation for East Africa in a speech he gave in London in June 1953; alarm bells went off in Buganda. There were strong protests from both the Lukiiko and the Kabaka. Indeed, the Baganda begun to mistrust the direction that British rule was now taking their kingdom and strong calls started emerging for Buganda to be separated from the rest of Uganda. Since Buganda had willingly entered into what she considered an agreement of protection in 1900, she now wanted to have her independence and separate identity restored and honored by the British who however resisted. This led to a political impasse.

A series of negotiations between the Kabaka and the Governor failed to break the stalemate. Although the Governor gave assurances that an East African federation would not be pursued without consulting Buganda, Buganda was now more anxious to protect her position by separating from the rest of Uganda. The Governor then proceeded to invoke the 1900 Agreement and demanded that the Kabaka accept specifically the British policy of developing Uganda as a unitary state. This would of course be a betrayal of the aspirations of the vast majority of the Baganda who wanted to maintain a Buganda identity and the Kabaka would not do it. On November 30, 1953; the Governor signed a declaration withdrawing British recognition from Muteesa as the Native Ruler of Buganda under clause 6 of the 1900 Agreement. The Kabaka was immediately deported and by the time the news broke in Buganda, Muteesa was already under custody in Britain. This was an unimaginable shock to all the Baganda and it led to a full-blown constitutional crisis. The Baganda refused to elect a replacement king and instead started a vigorous and effective campaign to have Muteesa restored to his throne.

Eventually a Constitutional Committee was selected by the Lukiiko which with the help of Sir Keith Hancock as mediator, undertook negotiations with Governor. Negotiations were carried out in 1954 at the premises of the Anglican cathedral at Namirembe. The final results of the negotiations are contained in the Agreed Recommendations of the Namirembe Conference. These formed the basis of a new agreement between Buganda and the British which was signed in 1955, on the Kabaka's triumphal return from exile.

THE KABAKA CRISIS OF 1966

The history of Uganda is widely known and has been taught over the years. The most important books of the country were built upon this history[1179] and most of the decisions made today are inspired by the same. This history holds ever close to the hearts of the Ugandans and defines who they are. It has been intimated before; for one to know where he is going, he must know where he is coming from. In the status quo of this country, its history has never played a greater role in informing its course than it can now.

Uganda's independence in 1962 was a symbol of hope and freedom, but it also represented an opportunity for this East African country to become a sovereign nation and for all Ugandans to compete on an equal footing with their former political opponents both within the country and in the changing global arena. Beyond that, self-determination promised peace, stability, and a united nation; nevertheless, these dreams were destroyed four years later.

The year 1966 was a particularly difficult one in Uganda's history. In that year, there was a violent attack on the palace that had a long-term consequence, as well as the overturning of the 1962 Independence Constitution. A series of disasters struck the country, disrupting not just the calm and security it had experienced during its first four years of independence, but also resulting in the loss of lives. This time had repercussions for the country, whose roots are shrouded in mystery and have resulted in conflicting historical accounts.

The Political upheaval of 1966.

Uganda was declared independent in the year 1962. The government that took over power then bestowed the then king of Buganda; Mutesa II as the first president of the independent republic. The president of the Uganda People’s Congress; Dr. Milton Obote was the Prime Minister at the time. In 1966, the two leaders were muddled in a political conflict in Buganda that led to the president’s exile. This political turmoil is what is famously known as the 1966 Buganda Crisis in Uganda’s History today.

Milton Obote aided in the formation of the Uganda People's Congress, a political party in Uganda, in 1960. (UPC). The UPC's goal was to weaken the "Mengo Establishment," a group of orthodox Baganda who ruled the Buganda sub-national kingdom. The Mengo establishment was riven by rivalries and infighting, but most of its members, who were Protestant Christians, were united by their loathing of the Catholic-dominated Democratic Party (DP).

In Uganda's first democratic national elections in 1961, the DP earned a majority and formed a government. Both the UPC and the conservative Baganda despised the DP's Catholicism, but their principles were fundamentally opposed. Despite this, the UPC tasked Grace Ibingira, a conservative member of its ranks, with contacting the Baganda in order to form an alliance to depose the DP. He was chosen for the post by the UPC because he was personally acquainted with Mutesa II, the Kabaka (King) of Buganda. Following numerous rounds of negotiations, the UPC and Baganda leaders met for a summit and struck an accord. The Kabaka Yekka (KY), a traditionalist party that allied with the UPC, was formed soon after by the Baganda.

[1179] The preamble of the Constitution of Uganda, 1995, as amended

Obote was tasked with creating a government after the UPC won the national elections in April 1962. He was named Prime Minister of a coalition government led by the UPC-KY. Obote took control of the security services and armed forces, while the KY held mostly minor positions. Ibingira was appointed to the position of Minister of Justice. On October 9, 1962, Uganda gained independence from the United Kingdom. Mutesa was elected President of Uganda in 1963, a mostly ceremonial position. Obote backed him in the election in order to appease the Baganda people.

In 1964, Ibingira began a battle for control of the UPC, with the eventual goal of deposing Obote as party president. He ran for the UPC secretariat-general against the John Kakonge at a party conference in April. He persuaded Obote that Kakonge was a threat to the UPC's leadership. Ibingira defeated Kakonge by two votes with Obote's help. He utilized his new position to expel a lot of lefties from the party. Meanwhile, Mutesa grew increasingly concerned that the UPC would strip his kingdom of its traditional autonomy, and he realized that in order to keep power, he would need to gain clout in national politics. He then proceeded to encourage Baganda members of the legislature to join the UPC in order to strengthen Ibingira's position and unseat Obote, allowing for a reorientation of the UPC-KY alliance that would be more beneficial to Buganda. Ibingira gathered a coalition of non-Baganda southerners known as the "Bantu Group" as his working relationship with Mutesa developed. Meanwhile, Obote began pleading with DP MPs to defect to his party and join him in Parliament. He was able to persuade several people to do so, including the DP floor leader. With the UPC securing a majority in Parliament, Obote proclaimed the alliance with KY disbanded on August 24, 1964.

In December 1964, Ibingira came to the United States under the guise of checking on his ranch in Ankole and raising cash for anti-socialist groups. When he returned, he successfully used the funds to grow his fan base. By 1965, it was clear that the UPC had split into two wings, one commanded by Ibingira and the other by Obote. The police prevented Ibingira from convening a UPC conference in his capacity as party secretary general.

The 1962 constitution provided Buganda federal autonomy, but it did not resolve a territorial issue between the Buyaga and Bugangaizi counties. With the permission of the United Kingdom, Buganda seized the two districts from the Kingdom of Bunyoro around the turn of the twentieth century. Before independence, Bunyoro had sought the restitution of the "lost counties," but this did not happen. On August 25, 1964, Obote introduced a bill in Parliament that called for a referendum to be held on the issue. Mutesa and Obote took conflicting positions on the matter, with the former wanting the areas to remain in Buganda and the latter wanting them returned to Bunyoro. Mutesa organized for huge numbers of his subjects to settle in the counties in an attempt to manipulate the vote. Obote thwarted his idea by stipulating that only those who had registered for the 1962 elections in the area could vote in the referendum. Mutesa then tried unsuccessfully to bribe the electorate. The referendum was held on November 4, 1964, and the voters decided to return to Bunyoro by a large margin.

The vote's outcome reinforced Obote's support in Bunyoro while infuriating Buganda. Baganda rioted and attacked government politicians in their kingdom. Michael Kintu, Buganda's Kattikiro (Prime Minister), resigned on November 9 and was succeeded by Jehoash Mayanja Nkangi. Mutesa was progressively pushed to resist Obote by conservative Ganda leaders like as Amos Sempa. Mutesa declined to sign the requisite forms for the transfer of authority when Obote brought them to him as President, saying, "I can never give away Buganda land." The ordeal strained relations between the two men, so Obote signed in his stead. The transfer became effective on January 1, 1965.

On February 24, 1966, Obote declared Mutesa's removal from office as President, citing his reaction to the referendum on the lost counties, his ordering of troop movements without ministerial input, and his request for foreign military help (Mutesa later admitted to "sounding out" an ambassador for assistance). Mutesa condemned Obote's actions, ordering him to leave Buganda territory and pleading with UN Secretary-General U Thant to intervene.

On the 22nd of May, Obote called a conference in the presidential lodge in Kampala with the Ministers of Defense, Interior, and the Inspector General of Police. Following a consideration of the crisis, Obote declared that military intervention was required. After the conference, Obote called Amin and asked him to report to the lodge. When Amin arrived, Obote told him to attack Mutesa's palace first thing the next morning.

Thousands of monarchists attempted to build up blockades to hamper Amin's forces and engaged in ongoing street fights after the Kabaka called for his subjects to defend him. However, in comparison to army units, the Kabaka's bodyguards were poorly equipped with hunting rifles, and the palace was overrun and burned ablaze two days after it was encircled. During a cloudburst in the middle of the conflict, Kabaka Mutesa II managed to flee the compound.

The King was caught off guard when Obote instructed his men to deliver Mutesa to him "death or alive." It was a lost battle, with only 120 guards confronting the Uganda Army's Lee–Enfield rifles, three carbines, six Sterling machine guns, and six automatic rifles. The [royal] guards recognized that the only way to safeguard the King was for him to depart. Rain aided the royals because it hindered the assailants' progress. Mutesa and 20 royal soldiers jumped over bodies as they escaped, hauling each other over the palace's six-foot-high masonry walls. Kabaka Mutesa, however, landed in a perilous position, injuring his back bone. But the King was free, and that was most important.

Mutesa then flagged down a passing taxi. The driver led him to the Rubaga Cathedral, where the priests were enjoying breakfast (including Emmanuel Wamala and Emmanuel Nsubuga). They gave him clerical robes and arranged for a car to transport him to Busiro County after he described what had happened. Over 200 bodies of slain Baganda were taken to the morgue by volunteers, while the military buried untold thousands in mass graves. Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere, who backed Obote and despised Mutesa, stationed a sizable force along the border to prevent the Baganda from reorganizing and launching a counter-offensive.

The Kabaka and two of his bodyguards were able to flee to Burundi and exile within a few days. He was granted asylum in the United Kingdom after brief spells in Nairobi and Addis Ababa, where he remained until his death in 1969, amid unknown circumstances. Various Baganda leaders, royal family members, and others believed to be devoted to the Kabaka were imprisoned.

During the fighting and looting that followed, the Lubiri Palace was nearly completely destroyed. The Mujaguzo drums were among the historic items and royal regalia seized and destroyed. For many Baganda, the desecration was viewed as an apocalypse, and they suffered greatly as a result. Kabaka Mutesa II died in exile, but a new ruler, Idi Amin, allowed him to be buried in Buganda. Amin pushed the story of a Muslim child from the country's poor periphery against Uganda's ruling tribe's Christian chief. At least in some sub-populations, the mystique surrounding this event gave him more legitimacy.

Suits were filed against Obote's government as a result of the crisis. Members of the Mengo establishment who had been imprisoned by the new regime filed a lawsuit seeking their freedom. In his decision for Uganda v Commissioner of Prisons, Ex Parte Matovu, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Sir Egbert Udo Udoma, gave it to them. When the Buganda administration asked the court to declare Obote's actions illegal, Udoma concluded that Obote had staged a coup, which was a legal manner of gaining power under international law. As a result, he pronounced Obote's government to be valid and the new constitution to be in effect.

Former cabinet ministers were deported to Karamoja under a colonial ordinance known as the Deportation Ordinance, which allowed for the imprisonment and expulsion of "undesirable" individuals. They then requested a warrant of habeas corpus from the courts. A Ugandan High Court judge considered the detention legal and refused the petition in Grace Ibingira & Others v Uganda, but the East African Court of Appeal decided that the ordinance infringed a Ugandan citizen's fundamental right to freedom of movement and ordered a writ of habeas corpus to be issued. Under the colonial Emergency Regulations, the ministers were released and then promptly re-arrested outside the Buganda courts, and the administration passed the Deportation Act to cover its conduct. The ministers filed a fresh lawsuit, but the court upheld the new law's validity after a hearing. The cabinet ministers were imprisoned until Amin's takeover of power in 1971, when he released them.

Following the crisis, Obote sought to consolidate his authority by expanding his military appeal through patronage, including increased defence spending in the 1966 budget. Soldiers who had remained faithful throughout the crisis were awarded for their dedication.

A. Criticisms to the Origins of the Crisis.

i. The indirect rule system

Although it is true that Obote's strong approach toward Buganda and Buganda's regionalism had a part in the emergence of the 1966 Ugandan Constitutional crisis, several academics have questioned whether it was mostly due to the foregoing. They re-examine the underlying social and political forces that contributed to the pandemic, as there is clear evidence that colonialism's residual impacts played a part. The 1966 constitutional coup is engrained in Ugandans' memories and history, and is thus frequently mentioned; nonetheless, the lack of an official commission of inquiry into the triggering circumstances that led to the crisis means that the basic causes are unclear.

While some political participants, such as Mayanja-Nkanji, a former Katiikiro (prime minister) of Buganda, blame the crisis on Milton Obote's hostile approach against the kingdom of Buganda, others, such as Akena Adoko, blame the problem on Buganda's regionalism. In this book, I argue that, with or without the above, the crisis was bound to happen due to the existence of permanent impacts brought about by the colonial legacy, which played a larger role than has previously been acknowledged.

The effects of the 68-year British rule and their impact on Uganda's post-colonial internal dynamics are at the root of the 1966 constitutional issue. The 1966 crisis was principally the result of a simmering colonial legacy that ultimately erupted into physical violence as the struggle for power came to a head.

The dispute over colonialism's legacy as a source of strife across the African continent is never-ending. Several academics claim that colonialism wreaked havoc on Africa, and that most of the continent's ongoing crises have their roots in colonial history.[1180] This line of thought is supported by Muddoola, 1996, and Karugire, 1980, who argue that due to preferential treatment of the Kingdom of Buganda, redrawing of borders, and the indirect rule system, the Ugandan state had not been emancipated from the impact of such colonial policies by 1966.

The employment of the indirect rule method was one of the most common features of British authority in Uganda. The British preferred built indigenous government structures to run colonies on Britain's behalf under this arrangement.[1181] The Baganda became Uganda's primary source of colonial agents. They were used to carry out the colonial agenda while executing the indirect rule system, which benefited both the British colonialists and the Baganda. As a result, according to Lonsdale (1983), the British were given a strong foundation from which to expand throughout the remainder of Uganda, and the Baganda were also used as first administrators in various sections of the protectorate outside of the Kingdom of Buganda. The Kingdom of Buganda rose to prominence as a result of this approach, frequently at the expense of the protectorate's other provinces. Baganda subjects were employed in the Kingdoms of Bunyoro and Toro, as well as in the province of Kigezi, in the west of the country. Baganda administrators oversaw the areas of Teso, Budama, Bukedi, Busoga, and Bugishu in the east, and the territory of Lango in the north.[1182]

As beneficial as the British-Baganda collaboration was to the Buganda, it also marked the start of anti-Baganda attitudes in many sections of the country outside of the Kingdom of Buganda, where the Baganda were employed at the expense of locals. The Baganda imposed their centuries-old political system and administrative institutions in newly colonized areas as the British favored administrators in the process of spreading colonial power, causing animosity among other ethnic groups.[1183]

The chiefs nominated to fill the newly imported Buganda structures, as well as Baganda or residents of the area, were instructed to use the Buganda titles in these newly colonised areas, causing animosity against Buganda. This became a source of discontent, and the 1903 Badama revolts in eastern Uganda against British colonial control illustrate the frustration with the Baganda, who were perceived as British henchmen.[1184]

Anti-Buganda sentiments spread throughout the protectorate as a result of what colonized people outside Buganda Kingdom saw as cultural imperialism. The Baganda colonial agents, for example, had insisted on the adoption of the Luganda language as the official language in many of these

[1180] Musisi F., Herbst R.O., & Mahajubu A., 2018, Unlocking The Mysteries Of The Origins Of The 1966 Ugandan Constitutional Crisis, Global Journal of Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences Vol.6, No.3, pp.14-25.
[1181] Ibid
[1182] "Uganda Protectorate, Secretariat Minute Paper No 322", Eastern Province, Entebbe National Archives, A46/133,
[1183] "Uganda Protectorate, Secretariat Minute Paper No 2", the Kakungulu Estate Entebbe National Archives, C2588
[1184] Ibid

districts. The use of Luganda became one of the most infuriating features of Buganda's governance for these people. When Buganda entrenchment through Baganda bureaucrats began to affect other local customs, these feelings were exacerbated.[1185]

Furthermore, Baganda agents are accused of being involved in corruption, which has resulted in individuals acquiring riches in the areas under their control. The letter from the Provincial Commissioner, Eastern Uganda, to the Hon Chief Secretary finest exemplifies this personal aggrandizement.[1186] He reminds out that Kakungulu and his associates seized control of Mbale County, which covers 80 square kilometers. In addition to land expropriation, Kakangulu and his followers made a significant profit by levying an annual fee of 11 shillings on individuals who lived on the land. The Bagishu, who made up the majority of the population in the area, saw paying rent for what they saw as communal tribal territory as a grave injustice. The Bagishu were enraged even more by the fact that the taxes they had paid had not been used for their advantage.

The Baganda took use of the Protectorate's indirect control structure to dominate and exploit others, but this, too, would have bad consequences for them in post-colonial Uganda.

ii. The Kingdom of Buganda received special treatment.

Another feature of British colonial control in Africa was the preferential treatment of one ethnic group over another. In the case of Uganda as a protectorate, the British gave this preferential status on the Kingdom of Buganda at the expense of the neighbouring kingdoms and chiefdoms throughout the colonial period. This preference for the Monarchy of Buganda is understandable, given that Buganda had been an autonomous kingdom for about 500 years prior to the arrival of the British. As a result of the lengthy British history of favouring existing monarchy, kingdom states like Buganda would be given preference, which, combined with its size and central location in the protectorate, explains why Buganda was chosen.[1187]

Unlike many other sections of the Uganda protectorate, the Kingdom of Buganda was controlled by legal agreements with the colonial overlord throughout the colonial period as a result of this cooperation. Notably, treaty rights that prioritized Buganda interests over those of other ethnic groups in the country were included in these agreements.[1188] The kingdom received special treatment in the colonial era which positioned the region above the others and revealed a special relationship between Buganda and the British that lasted 68 years.

The foregoing relationship paved the way for an adversarial relationship between Buganda and the rest of Uganda's ethnic groups. Notably, the Kingdom of Buganda maintained a degree of autonomy in the administration of its affairs, allowing its kings and chiefs to govern while also [1185] "Uganda Protectorate, Secretariat Minute Paper no 898", Buganda, Entebbe National Archives, A46/16.

[1186] "Letter to Hon Chief Secretary from the Provincial Commissioner", Eastern Entebbe National Archives, C2577
[1187] Gingyera-Pinchwa. (1978), Apollo Milton and his Times. Nok.
[1188] Supra note 14

preserving Buganda's political institutions. According to Johannessen[1189], this gave Buganda a distinct and privileged position in both the colonial and post-colonial eras in comparison to other Ugandan kingdoms and tribal areas. In essence, the other kingdoms were administered more directly as districts, similar to how the protectorate's tribal lands were governed. This was clearly preferential treatment for Buganda, which engendered resentment in the other territories. After the British left, opportunistic politicians took advantage of this resentment to rally other ethnic populations against Buganda, resulting in the political chaos of 1966.

iii. The adjustment of colonial lines

Uganda, like many other African countries, was clearly created during the colonial period, with its physical borders mostly established by administrative convenience and economic concerns, as well as natural boundaries such as mountain ranges and river beds, rather than by people. When it came to the establishment of internal boundaries, British colonial interests did not align with Ugandan ethnic trends. As a result, numerous different ethnic groups were grouped together in territories that did not reflect their ethnic diversity, resulting in increased ethnic tensions. The transfer of the counties of Buyaga and Bugagainzi from the kingdom of Bunyoro to the kingdom of Buganda, subsequently known as the lost counties, was one such incident in Uganda. The majority of the people in this area were Banyoro, who had been enslaved by their traditional adversaries, the Baganda.[1190]

According to Bunyoro's telegram to the Resident, Buganda, the loss of territory to Buganda was viewed as a punishment for fighting British colonialism.[1191] Furthermore, they were enraged that this lost area was a prize for the Buganda collaborators, whom they perceived to be their traditional foe. As a result, tensions between the two prominent Ugandan ethnic communities grew even stronger. This was a clear testimony that the redrawing of boundaries had not only irrevocably altered ethnic realities in Uganda but also strengthened ethnic rivalry in Uganda. J.R.P. Postlethaite, the British District Commissioner of Bunyoro in 1927 and 1928 noted that "the inclusion of this area in the Kingdom of Buganda is considered to be one of the greatest blunders we committed."[1192] According to Kenneth[1193], indeed the attempt to solve this problem in postcolonial Uganda unleashed one of the most fervent political struggles Uganda has known.

The alteration of the borders of colonial rule were not only interior. Uganda as a country was also shaped as a trade between colonial powers. Originally, Uganda as it is defined today, had bigger

[1189] Johannessen, C. The Restoration of Kingship in Uganda: A comparative study of Buganda and Ankole, p.18
[1190] Supra note 22
[1191] "Bunyoro Lost counties, Preliminary correspondence between the Mubende-Banyoro Committee and the Resident", "Buganda early in the 1920's" Entebbe National archives, REL/s/121
[1192] Lwanga-Lunyiigo, S. (2007). The Struggle for Land in Buganda: 1888-2005. Wavah Books.
[1193] Ingham, K. (1994). Obote: a political biography. Psychology Press.

outreaches into modern Kenyan territory. The eventual shaping of Ugandan borders was by an agreement between the colonial masters.

As with the lands being colonized by Rhodes at this same period in southern Africa, the British government is unwilling to take direct responsibility for the region of east Africa which is now its acknowledged sphere of interest. Instead, it delegates to a commercial company the right to administer and develop the land. In 1888, the Imperial British East Africa Company was founded, a year before Rhodes' British South Africa Company.

The corporation is responsible for a territory that runs from the east coast to the kingdom of Buganda on Lake Victoria's northwest bank.

Everyone recognizes that the prosperity of this region hinges on the construction of a railway from the coast to Lake Victoria, but circumstances conspire to place this undertaking much beyond the East Africa Company's capabilities. Buganda is a recurring ache that drains their energy and finances.

Because Germany lies in a sense beyond Lake Victoria, it can argue that this region, Uganda's most powerful kingdom, is not protected by the territorial agreement with Britain. Furthermore, the unstoppable Karl Peters has forced the issue. He arrives in Kampala in 1890 and convinces the kabaka to sign a contract admitting German protectorate over his country.

When the British prime minister, Lord Salisbury, presents a solution that Berlin, surprisingly, approves, a potentially dangerous confrontation between the imperial powers is averted. In exchange for German recognition of British protectorates in Zanzibar, Uganda, and Equatoria, Salisbury offers the tiny and seemingly useless island of Heligoland (in British ownership since 1814). (the southern province of Sudan). Germany, on the other hand, benefits from the agreement. Heligoland goes on to serve as a vital naval station during two world wars.

Meanwhile, in Buganda, a civil war breaks out between factions commanded by British Protestant missionaries and their French Catholic opponents.

Heavy gunfire erupts between and among the four hills that make up Kampala in January 1892. The kabaka's palace sits atop one of the hills. The French have finished a Catholic cathedral made of wooden poles and reeds on another. Protestants are constructing their church on one-third of the land. On the fourth is Frederick Lugard's fort, which he built for the company because he is the only warrior with a Maxim machine gun.

Lugard is victorious. However, the loss of life and property in this unseemly European quarrel demonstrates that the East Africa Company is incapable of carrying out its responsibilities.

In 1894, the British government makes Buganda a protectorate. Two years later, British control is extended to the western kingdoms of Ankole, Toro, and Bunyoro, becoming the Uganda

Protectorate with Buganda.

In the meantime, the much bigger region of Kenya has remained reasonably tranquil, despite the East Africa Company's lack of success there. However, before taking over Uganda, the British authorities must ensure that the new protectorate has access to the sea. As a result, the company's charter is revoked in 1895 (with a £250,000 compensation). As the East Africa Protectorate, Kenya becomes yet another additional obligation for the British government.

iv. The flaws in the independence constitution of 1962

The 1962 Constitution was the culmination of a lengthy and perilous constitutional route that began during the colonial period, and its promulgation in 1962 is considered part of the colonial heritage. The independence constitution had various flaws that contributed significantly to post-colonial Uganda's political troubles. In the first case, the 1962 Constitution failed to rein in Buganda's power: under Article 74 (1), (2), and schedule 7 of the Constitution, Buganda's federal powers and responsibilities were vast.[1194]

Buganda was also allocated independent and important sources of revenue, including money from progressive tax and entertainment tax, in order to enable it to effectively implement its federal autonomy. In addition, Buganda was entitled to 50% of the annual statutory contribution from general revenue and 50% of assigned revenue from the Kingdom of Buganda. In addition, the report of the London Constitutional Conference to further strengthen this autonomy, Buganda was granted its own police force, legislature and judiciary which had the same status as other institutions in the rest of Uganda.

In other words, the 1962 Constitution devolved power to the Kingdom of Buganda, leaving it as a strong unit inside Uganda with nearly the same status that it had during the colonial era. As Nsibambi[1195] points out, the 1962 Constitution contributed to Uganda's political challenges by failing to redistribute power evenly among the country's minor ethnic groups. It had endorsed the historical inequality in treatment between Buganda and the rest of Uganda, a fact that enraged Ugandans in other parts of the country. As a result, anti-Buganda attitudes from the colonial period were carried over into the post-colonial period, which was a prescription for catastrophe, as opportunist politicians took advantage of the situation to foment the 1966 upheaval.

Buganda's federal powers, as stated in the Independence Constitution, had also hampered the National Assembly's ability to function. The National Assembly lacked the jurisdiction to legislate on the Kabaka's powers, responsibilities, and obligations. Furthermore, Article 73 gave the Lukiiko the supreme authority to make laws for the kingdom of Buganda's peace, order, and good government. The Independence Constitution, by prioritizing regional interests over national ones and elevating regional leaders above national leaders, stressed divisiveness rather than unity, and the system was doomed to fail. Indeed, Kanyeimba[1196] correctly points out that no administration, no matter how capable, could have controlled the country's development without infringing on the component states' reserved and residual rights.

[1194] "Independence Constitution, Schedule 7", pp.10-13 Entebbe National Archives, C10736/ DGc 230 III.
[1195] Nsibambi, A. R. (2014). National integration in Uganda 1962-2013. Fountain Publishers.

Furthermore, state authority had been eroded by the establishment of other centers of power, and it was these seeds of conflict sown in the constitution that sowed the seeds of the subsequent years' crises. Land ownership, education, and administrative personnel issues were all delegated to regional assemblies like the Lukiiko.[1197] This would render the central government nearly powerless in areas where it would have needed to reform and modernize in order to achieve national unity. In other words, while the central government was charged with planning efficiently for the country, the instruments to do so were out of reach.

v. The government's weak coalition

Uganda's first post-independence government was a coalition formed by an agreement between the Kabaka Yekka (KY) and the Uganda People's Congress (UPC) (UPC). Prior to 1962, such an alliance had never been envisaged because each of these parties held opposing viewpoints and political objectives on practically every topic imaginable, aside from their ethnic differences.[1198] The UPC was founded to challenge Buganda's regionalism, and it served as a vehicle to gather opposition to Buganda's power before independence. It was predominantly a northern-dominated party. On the other hand, the Baganda's isolationist attitudes were embodied by the KY, which was launched on June 10, 1961. It was established to safeguard the Kabaka's and Mengo's Protestant establishment's threatened positions.[1199]

The British and the Mengo Establishment formed the coalition in order to prevent Catholic Ben Kiwanuka, the head of the Democratic Party (DP) and Uganda's first Chief Minister, from succeeding them. As a result, the British persuaded Obote and Muteesa, the Kabaka of Buganda, who had been bitter enemies, to put their differences aside and work together. This helps to explain Obote's rapid shift from an ardent anti-Buganda stance to a pro-Buganda stance.[1200]

The construction of this coalition administration, on the other hand, has been regarded as one of the most dishonest political enterprises ever attempted by Ugandan officials. Because Obote and Muteesa had opposing agendas, neither the KY nor the UPC had any illusions about the alliance's

[1196] Kanyeheimba, G.W. (2002). Constitutional and Political History of Uganda from 1894 to present. Centenary Publishing House.
[1197] Supra note 28
[1198] Jorgensen, J. J. (1981) Uganda: A Modern History. Croom Helm Limited.
[1199] Mutibwa, P. M. (1992). Uganda since independence: a story of unfulfilled hopes. Africa World Press.
[1200] Supra note 14

long-term viability.[1201] The main goal of UPC was to use the alliance to gain power by denying the DP of support in Buganda, but the Mengo establishment wanted to keep their privileges. As a result, disparities between the two returned as soon as the DP was defeated.[1202] Although Muteesa's status was mostly ceremonial, the new post provided him with dual loyalty as Kabaka of Buganda and Head of State.[1203] As a result, he would have conflicting functions as a head of state and Obote as Prime Minister, and Obote's objectives would be at odds with those of Buganda.

vi. The Consequences of the Uganda People's Congress Control Battle in Buganda

Uganda's political stability was dependent on the UPC's strong united leadership as the ruling party; nevertheless, the UPC was formed by a loose coalition of ethnic groups who came together to transform their marginalized status and eliminate Buganda's dominance.[1204] As a result, the organization's leadership became factionalized, with each faction leader representing a local constituency that was often ethnically distinct from the others. For example, Obote's power base was among the Langi in the north of the country, George Magezi's was among the Bunyoro in the west, and John Babiha's was among the Tooro in the mid-west. W.W. Rwetsiba's support base was in the southwestern Ugandan district of Ankole, whereas William Nadiope's was in the eastern Ugandan region of Busoga. Felix Onama hails from Uganda's west Nile area, whereas Cuthbert Obwangamoi hails from the country's far east.[1205]

Each of these regional leaders was an independent leader who did not need the party's or president's backing to be elected in their areas. These factions, along with John Kakonge, the UPC secretary general, were fighting for control of the party. By 1964, considerable realignment of political forces along regional and racial lines in the North and South had begun to take shape. Grace Ibingira commanded the southern monarchist Bantu group, while Obote led the northern Nilotic republican group. Control of UPC was critical because whomever had it would eventually have control of the country. The Bantu faction accused Obote of betraying his own aim of promoting national unity by demonstrating favouritism toward northern Uganda's ethnic groups.

As a result of the growing ethnic rift within the party, a number of Bantu ministers and prominent Baganda figures began preparing to depose Obote in mid- 1965 in order to reverse the cabinet's perceived northern dominance.[1206] The battle for control of the UPC had reached a breaking point.

[1201] Kasozi, A. B. K. (2013). The Bitter Bread of Exile. The Financial Problems of Sir Edward Mutesa II during his final exile, 1966-1969: The Financial Problems of Sir Edward Mutesa II during his final exile, 1966-1969. Progressive Publishing House.
[1202] Supra note 32
[1203] Mittelman, J. H. (1975). Ideology and politics in Uganda: from Obote to Amin. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
[1204] Ssemwanga Kivumbi. (2013). Ssekabaka Muteesa II Eyeerabirwa. Grapet Traders.
[1205] Karugire, S.R. (1980). A political History of Uganda. Heinemann Educational Books
[1206] Ingham, K. (1994). Obote: a political biography. Psychology Press.

The competition between Obote and Ibingira for the party's leadership, and, by extension, the leadership of Uganda, raged on, with the outcome determining who would dominate Uganda's political progress.

The infighting in the UPC and the threat from Buganda, which had stayed solid in its opposition to Obote's reign, were now the two greatest threats to his power as the country's prime minister. He used violence against his opponents, and rather than containing the problem, his actions just pushed it to a critical level, culminating in a crisis in May 1966. If he was to survive as both the leader of UPC and the Prime Minister, Obote knew he had to stay one step ahead of his political opponents. The existence of these dangers established in Obote a deep-seated fear of both his opponents in the party and in Buganda, which meant that he had to block any dissent for the sake of his own political life.

vii. The Dictatorial Tendencies of Obote

Obote's dictatorial behavior originated from the colonial legacy's structural flaw, which was already mentioned. While forming the new superstructure of independent Uganda's political administration, the British did not abandon the oppressive colonial system; rather, they emphasized autocracy by transferring the autocratic executive and political powers that had previously been vested in the British Governor and his British Chief Secretary to the office of the Prime Minister of an independent Uganda. As a result of inheriting the colonial instruments of authority, like as the police and the King's African Rifles, Obote accumulated enormous influence (viz. the Uganda Army). This did not imply that he had to abuse his position; rather, he chose to be an authoritarian and dictatorial leader because he couldn't deal with criticism and disagreement.[1207]

Obote treated individuals who resisted him with contempt and blatant disregard for human rights and the rule of law, using the northern dominated army and a spy service under the innocent name of the General Service Department, headed by his first cousin Adoko Nekyon.[1208] Five cabinet officials, including Ben Kiwanuka, the first Chief Minister, and Brigadier Shaban Opolot, the leader of the armed forces, were all held indefinitely, while five members of parliament who refused to acknowledge and accept the 1966 constitution lost their seats.

Between 1962 and 1966, Obote imposed his Ugandan principles on the Buganda by taking a hostile position toward the monarchy, claiming that this was part of the process of forging a national identity in the newly formed Uganda.[1209] Obote's outbursts appear to arise from his dissatisfaction with the fact that regional governments had become a microcosm of the national government rather than its local outpost.[1210] Obote gradually suffocated the kingdom's institutions and weakened its status within the country. In 1964, for example, he established legislation limiting the KY's activities to Buganda alone. In this sense, Obote's concerted and ultimately futile efforts to destabilize Buganda had made the Baganda into the most vociferous opponents, heightening tensions between Buganda and Obote.[1211] In 1966, Obote launched a violent attack on the kingdom of Buganda with the help of northern troops and ministers.

[1207] Supra note 14
[1208] Supra note 33
[1209] "Speech by the Prime Minister the Hon DR.AM Obote, MP," on Thursday 3rd March 1966, Uganda National Assembly Archives.

viii. The 1960s avaricious political system

Uganda was also plagued by extensive corruption at many levels of government in the 1960s, owing to the lack of strong institutions that should have acted as checks and balances for the administration. As a result, leaders like Obote were able to take advantage of these flaws in order to stage a constitutional coup in 1966.

To begin with, bribing of members of the national assembly severely weakened the institution's independence and its ability to control central government excesses. Within the ruling UPC, the Obote government used patronage and the promise of future rewards to carry out schemes that would strengthen his dictatorial powers. Similarly, opposition members of the national assembly from both the DP and KY who crossed the floor to join the UPC on the offer of government posts and salary were similarly affected. Following his conversion to UPC, opposition leader Basil Bataringaya was appointed Minister of Internal Affairs. James Ochola, Vincent Rwamwaro, and Stanslaus Okurut were among the DP members who followed him. Several DP members of the national legislature from the Kingdom of Bunyoro opted to join the UPC after Obote promised to hold a referendum to return to Bunyoro the lost counties that had previously belonged to Buganda.[1212] Minister of Finance William Kalema, who led a group from Kentucky, was appointed. Ironically, the UPC was a member of the coalition government, but it bribed members of the KY, its coalition partner, to switch sides. Furthermore, all of the aforementioned persons joined the UPC without informing their electorates, which amounted to treason and a loss of democratic values, thereby producing a dictator, namely Obote.

Furthermore, those who joined the government allowed the UPC to acquire an artificial majority with dire consequences. By 1966 the National Assembly had 74, 9, 8 and 1 member(s) of the UPC, the DP, the KY and the Independents respectively. This was not a reflection of the true strength of UPC in the country. Without this artificial majority, it is unlikely that Obote could have achieved what he did in 1966; the abrogation of the 1962 constitution, acting decisively against Muteesa and

[1210] Sathyamurthy, T. V. (1986). The Political Development of Uganda, 1900-1985 (Vol. 1). Gower.
[1211] Hansen, H. B. (1977). Ethnicity and military rule in Uganda: A study of ethnicity as a political factor in Uganda, based on a discussion of political anthropology and the application of its results. Nordiska Afrikainstitutet.
[1212] "Parliament Hansards", 3rd Session 1966, Vol. 67, Uganda National Assembly Archives.

Buganda.

Those who joined the government also helped the UPC gain a false majority, which had disastrous implications. The UPC, the DP, the KY, and the Independents each had 74, 9, 8, and 1 members in the National Assembly by 1966.[1213] This was not a genuine picture of UPC's overall strength across the country. Without this fictitious majority, Obote would not have been able to accomplish what he did in 1966: abrogating the 1962 constitution and striking decisively against Muteesa and Buganda.

He also disregarded resolutions passed by the legislature. When parliament passed a resolution ordering Idi Amin's suspension and an investigation into his bank account, which contained 17,000 pounds sterling in cash in the form of gold bars stamped with the Belgian Congo government's stamp, Obote ignored it and later promoted Amin to the rank of Major General and Army Commander. On February 24, 1966, he would arrest five cabinet ministers: Grace Ibingira, the Party Secretary General at the time, Balaki Kirya, George Magezi, Dr.S.B Lumu, and Mathias Ngobi, who had urged a probe into the gold issue. This provides strong proof that Obote was a benefit of the gold affair rather than an innocent bystander, and that his actions exacerbated political tensions in the country.

Additionally, venal politicians also existed at Mengo, which was one of the power centres in the newly independent nation. For instance, although Buganda had GBP 1 million in its coffers by 1958, by 1960 this had dwindled to a mere GBP 465,000 and 1963, it was in the red by GBP 226,863.

By 1965, the Kabaka's government was on the verge of collapse; unfortunately, the Kabaka's ministers were the biggest offenders, with nepotism and insensitivity reaching new heights. Despite the fact that they were operating a deficit budget in 1965, these officials took out a personal loan of GBP 200,000.

The above acts by Mengo's leadership resulted in a significant political impasse between the central government and Mengo. Obote was concerned about the Mengo establishment's financial misdeeds, which resulted in protracted wranglings between the central government and Buganda, exacerbated already strained relations between the two parties, and inevitably contributed to the explosive atmosphere that culminated in the attack on the Kabaka's palace on May 24, 1966.

[1213] “Parliamentary Hansards”, 3rd Session 1965 to 1966, Uganda National Assembly Archives.

CRITICISMS TO THE ORIGINS OF THE CRISIS.

i) The indirect rule system

Although it is true that Obote's strong approach toward Buganda and Buganda's regionalism had a part in the emergence of the 1966 Ugandan Constitutional crisis, several academics have questioned whether it was mostly due to the foregoing. They re-examine the underlying social and political forces that contributed to the pandemic, as there is clear evidence that colonialism's residual impacts played a part. The 1966 constitutional coup is engrained in Ugandans' memories and history, and is thus frequently mentioned; nonetheless, the lack of an official commission of inquiry into the triggering circumstances that led to the crisis means that the basic causes are unclear.

While some political participants, such as Mayanja-Nkanji, a former Katiikiro (prime minister) of Buganda, blame the crisis on Milton Obote's hostile approach against the kingdom of Buganda, others, such as Akena Adoko, blame the problem on Buganda's regionalism. In this book, I argue that, with or without the above, the crisis was bound to happen due to the existence of permanent impacts brought about by the colonial legacy, which played a larger role than has previously been acknowledged.

The effects of the 68-year British rule and their impact on Uganda's post-colonial internal dynamics are at the root of the 1966 constitutional issue. The 1966 crisis was principally the result of a simmering colonial legacy that ultimately erupted into physical violence as the struggle for power came to a head.

The dispute over colonialism's legacy as a source of strife across the African continent is never-ending. Several academics claim that colonialism wreaked havoc on Africa, and that most of the continent's ongoing crises have their roots in colonial history.[1214] This line of thought is supported by Muddoola, 1996, and Karugire, 1980, who argue that due to preferential treatment of the Kingdom of Buganda, redrawing of borders, and the indirect rule system, the Ugandan state had not been emancipated from the impact of such colonial policies by 1966.

The employment of the indirect rule method was one of the most common features of British authority in Uganda. The British preferred built indigenous government structures to run colonies on Britain's behalf under this arrangement.[1215] The Baganda became Uganda's primary source of colonial agents. They were used to carry out the colonial agenda while executing the indirect rule system, which benefited both the British colonialists and the Baganda. As a result, according to

[1214] Musisi F., Herbst R.O., & Mahajubu A., 2018, Unlocking The Mysteries Of The Origins Of The 1966 Ugandan Constitutional Crisis, Global Journal of Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences Vol.6, No.3, pp.14-25.
[1215] Ibid

Lonsdale (1983), the British were given a strong foundation from which to expand throughout the remainder of Uganda, and the Baganda were also used as first administrators in various sections of the protectorate outside of the Kingdom of Buganda. The Kingdom of Buganda rose to prominence as a result of this approach, frequently at the expense of the protectorate's other provinces. Baganda subjects were employed in the Kingdoms of Bunyoro and Toro, as well as in the province of Kigezi, in the west of the country. Baganda administrators oversaw the areas of Teso, Budama, Bukedi, Busoga, and Bugishu in the east, and the territory of Lango in the north.[1216]

As beneficial as the British-Baganda collaboration was to the Buganda, it also marked the start of anti-Baganda attitudes in many sections of the country outside of the Kingdom of Buganda, where the Baganda were employed at the expense of locals. The Baganda imposed their centuries-old political system and administrative institutions in newly colonized areas as the British favored administrators in the process of spreading colonial power, causing animosity among other ethnic groups.[1217]

The chiefs nominated to fill the newly imported Buganda structures, as well as Baganda or residents of the area, were instructed to use the Buganda titles in these newly colonised areas, causing animosity against Buganda. This became a source of discontent, and the 1903 Badama revolts in eastern Uganda against British colonial control illustrate the frustration with the Baganda, who were perceived as British henchmen.[1218]

Anti-Buganda sentiments spread throughout the protectorate as a result of what colonized people outside Buganda Kingdom saw as cultural imperialism. The Baganda colonial agents, for example, had insisted on the adoption of the Luganda language as the official language in many of these districts. The use of Luganda became one of the most infuriating features of Buganda's governance for these people. When Buganda entrenchment through Baganda bureaucrats began to affect other local customs, these feelings were exacerbated.[1219]

Furthermore, Baganda agents are accused of being involved in corruption, which has resulted in individuals acquiring riches in the areas under their control. The letter from the Provincial Commissioner, Eastern Uganda, to the Hon Chief Secretary finest exemplifies this personal aggrandizement.[1220] He reminds out that Kakungulu and his associates seized control of Mbale County, which covers 80 square kilometers. In addition to land expropriation, Kakangulu and his followers made a significant profit by levying an annual fee of 11 shillings on individuals who

[1216] "Uganda Protectorate, Secretariat Minute Paper No 322", Eastern Province, Entebbe National Archives, A46/133,
[1217] "Uganda Protectorate, Secretariat Minute Paper No 2", the Kakungulu Estate Entebbe National Archives, C2588
[1218] Ibid
[1219] "Uganda Protectorate, Secretariat Minute Paper no 898", Buganda, Entebbe National Archives, A46/16.
[1220] "Letter to Hon Chief Secretary from the Provincial Commissioner", Eastern Entebbe National Archives, C2577

lived on the land. The Bagishu, who made up the majority of the population in the area, saw paying rent for what they saw as communal tribal territory as a grave injustice. The Bagishu were enraged even more by the fact that the taxes they had paid had not been used for their advantage.

The Baganda took use of the Protectorate's indirect control structure to dominate and exploit others, but this, too, would have bad consequences for them in post-colonial Uganda.

ii) The Kingdom of Buganda received special treatment.

Another feature of British colonial control in Africa was the preferential treatment of one ethnic group over another. In the case of Uganda as a protectorate, the British gave this preferential status on the Kingdom of Buganda at the expense of the neighbouring kingdoms and chiefdoms throughout the colonial period. This preference for the Monarchy of Buganda is understandable, given that Buganda had been an autonomous kingdom for about 500 years prior to the arrival of the British. As a result of the lengthy British history of favouring existing monarchy, kingdom states like Buganda would be given preference, which, combined with its size and central location in the protectorate, explains why Buganda was chosen.[1221]

Unlike many other sections of the Uganda protectorate, the Kingdom of Buganda was controlled by legal agreements with the colonial overlord throughout the colonial period as a result of this cooperation. Notably, treaty rights that prioritized Buganda interests over those of other ethnic groups in the country were included in these agreements.[1222] The kingdom received special treatment in the colonial era which positioned the region above the others and revealed a special relationship between Buganda and the British that lasted 68 years.

The foregoing relationship paved the way for an adversarial relationship between Buganda and the rest of Uganda's ethnic groups. Notably, the Kingdom of Buganda maintained a degree of autonomy in the administration of its affairs, allowing its kings and chiefs to govern while also preserving Buganda's political institutions. According to Johannessen[1223], this gave Buganda a distinct and privileged position in both the colonial and post-colonial eras in comparison to other Ugandan kingdoms and tribal areas. In essence, the other kingdoms were administered more directly as districts, similar to how the protectorate's tribal lands were governed. This was clearly preferential treatment for Buganda, which engendered resentment in the other territories. After the British left, opportunistic politicians took advantage of this resentment to rally other ethnic populations against Buganda, resulting in the political chaos of 1966.

[1221] Gingyera-Pinchwa. (1978), Apollo Milton and his Times. Nok.
[1222] Supra note 14
[1223] Johannessen, C. The Restoration of Kingship in Uganda: A comparative study of Buganda and Ankole, p.18

iii) The adjustment of colonial lines

Uganda, like many other African countries, was clearly created during the colonial period, with its physical borders mostly established by administrative convenience and economic concerns, as well as natural boundaries such as mountain ranges and river beds, rather than by people. When it came to the establishment of internal boundaries, British colonial interests did not align with Ugandan ethnic trends. As a result, numerous different ethnic groups were grouped together in territories that did not reflect their ethnic diversity, resulting in increased ethnic tensions. The transfer of the counties of Buyaga and Bugagainzi from the kingdom of Bunyoro to the kingdom of Buganda, subsequently known as the lost counties, was one such incident in Uganda. The majority of the people in this area were Banyoro, who had been enslaved by their traditional adversaries, the Baganda.[1224]

According to Bunyoro's telegram to the Resident, Buganda, the loss of territory to Buganda was viewed as a punishment for fighting British colonialism.[1225] Furthermore, they were enraged that this lost area was a prize for the Buganda collaborators, whom they perceived to be their traditional foe. As a result, tensions between the two prominent Ugandan ethnic communities grew even stronger. This was a clear testimony that the redrawing of boundaries had not only irrevocably altered ethnic realities in Uganda but also strengthened ethnic rivalry in Uganda. J.R.P. Postlethaite, the British District Commissioner of Bunyoro in 1927 and 1928 noted that “the inclusion of this area in the Kingdom of Buganda is considered to be one of the greatest blunders we committed.”[1226] According to Kenneth[1227], indeed the attempt to solve this problem in postcolonial Uganda unleashed one of the most fervent political struggles Uganda has known.

The alteration of the borders of colonial rule were not only interior. Uganda as a country was also shaped as a trade between colonial powers. Originally, Uganda as it is defined today, had bigger outreaches into modern Kenyan territory. The eventual shaping of Ugandan borders was by an agreement between the colonial masters.

As with the lands being colonized by Rhodes at this same period in southern Africa, the British government is unwilling to take direct responsibility for the region of east Africa which is now its acknowledged sphere of interest. Instead, it delegates to a commercial company the right to administer and develop the land. In 1888, the Imperial British East Africa Company was founded, a year before Rhodes' British South Africa Company.

[1224] Supra note 22
[1225] “Bunyoro Lost counties, Preliminary correspondence between the Mubende-Banyoro Committee and the Resident”, “Buganda early in the 1920’s” Entebbe National archives, REL/s/121
[1226] Lwanga-Lunyiigo, S. (2007). The Struggle for Land in Buganda: 1888-2005. Wavah Books.
[1227] Ingham, K. (1994). Obote: a political biography. Psychology Press.

The corporation is responsible for a territory that runs from the east coast to the kingdom of Buganda on Lake Victoria's northwest bank.

Everyone recognizes that the prosperity of this region hinges on the construction of a railway from the coast to Lake Victoria, but circumstances conspire to place this undertaking much beyond the East Africa Company's capabilities. Buganda is a recurring ache that drains their energy and finances.

Because Germany lies in a sense beyond Lake Victoria, it can argue that this region, Uganda's most powerful kingdom, is not protected by the territorial agreement with Britain. Furthermore, the unstoppable Karl Peters has forced the issue. He arrives in Kampala in 1890 and convinces the kabaka to sign a contract admitting German protectorate over his country.

When the British prime minister, Lord Salisbury, presents a solution that Berlin, surprisingly, approves, a potentially dangerous confrontation between the imperial powers is averted. In exchange for German recognition of British protectorates in Zanzibar, Uganda, and Equatoria, Salisbury offers the tiny and seemingly useless island of Heligoland (in British ownership since 1814). (the southern province of Sudan). Germany, on the other hand, benefits from the agreement. Heligoland goes on to serve as a vital naval station during two world wars.

Meanwhile, in Buganda, a civil war breaks out between factions commanded by British Protestant missionaries and their French Catholic opponents.

Heavy gunfire erupts between and among the four hills that make up Kampala in January 1892. The kabaka's palace sits atop one of the hills. The French have finished a Catholic cathedral made of wooden poles and reeds on another. Protestants are constructing their church on one-third of the land. On the fourth is Frederick Lugard's fort, which he built for the company because he is the only warrior with a Maxim machine gun.

Lugard is victorious. However, the loss of life and property in this unseemly European quarrel demonstrates that the East Africa Company is incapable of carrying out its responsibilities.

In 1894, the British government makes Buganda a protectorate. Two years later, British control is extended to the western kingdoms of Ankole, Toro, and Bunyoro, becoming the Uganda Protectorate with Buganda.

In the meantime, the much bigger region of Kenya has remained reasonably tranquil, despite the East Africa Company's lack of success there. However, before taking over Uganda, the British authorities must ensure that the new protectorate has access to the sea. As a result, the company's charter is revoked in 1895 (with a £250,000 compensation). As the East Africa Protectorate, Kenya becomes yet another additional obligation for the British government.

iv) The flaws in the independence constitution of 1962

The 1962 Constitution was the culmination of a lengthy and perilous constitutional route that began during the colonial period, and its promulgation in 1962 is considered part of the colonial heritage. The independence constitution had various flaws that contributed significantly to post-colonial Uganda's political troubles. In the first case, the 1962 Constitution failed to rein in Buganda's power: under Article 74 (1), (2), and schedule 7 of the Constitution, Buganda's federal powers and responsibilities were vast.[1228]

Buganda was also allocated independent and important sources of revenue, including money from progressive tax and entertainment tax, in order to enable it to effectively implement its federal autonomy. In addition, Buganda was entitled to 50% of the annual statutory contribution from general revenue and 50% of assigned revenue from the Kingdom of Buganda. In addition, the report of the London Constitutional Conference to further strengthen this autonomy, Buganda was granted its own police force, legislature and judiciary which had the same status as other institutions in the rest of Uganda.

In other words, the 1962 Constitution devolved power to the Kingdom of Buganda, leaving it as a strong unit inside Uganda with nearly the same status that it had during the colonial era. As Nsibambi[1229] points out, the 1962 Constitution contributed to Uganda's political challenges by failing to redistribute power evenly among the country's minor ethnic groups. It had endorsed the historical inequality in treatment between Buganda and the rest of Uganda, a fact that enraged Ugandans in other parts of the country. As a result, anti-Buganda attitudes from the colonial period were carried over into the post-colonial period, which was a prescription for catastrophe, as opportunist politicians took advantage of the situation to foment the 1966 upheaval.

Buganda's federal powers, as stated in the Independence Constitution, had also hampered the National Assembly's ability to function. The National Assembly lacked the jurisdiction to legislate on the Kabaka's powers, responsibilities, and obligations. Furthermore, Article 73 gave the Lukiiko the supreme authority to make laws for the kingdom of Buganda's peace, order, and good government. The Independence Constitution, by prioritizing regional interests over national ones and elevating regional leaders above national leaders, stressed divisiveness rather than unity, and the system was doomed to fail. Indeed, Kanyeimba[1230] correctly points out that no administration, no matter how capable, could have controlled the country's development without infringing on the component states' reserved and residual rights.

[1228] "Independence Constitution, Schedule 7", pp.10-13 Entebbe National Archives, C10736/ DGc 230 III.
[1229] Nsibambi, A. R. (2014). National integration in Uganda 1962-2013. Fountain Publishers.
[1230] Kanyeheimba, G.W. (2002). Constitutional and Political History of Uganda from 1894 to present. Centenary Publishing House.

Furthermore, state authority had been eroded by the establishment of other centers of power, and it was these seeds of conflict sown in the constitution that sowed the seeds of the subsequent years' crises. Land ownership, education, and administrative personnel issues were all delegated to regional assemblies like the Lukiiko.[1231] This would render the central government nearly powerless in areas where it would have needed to reform and modernize in order to achieve national unity. In other words, while the central government was charged with planning efficiently for the country, the instruments to do so were out of reach.

v) The government's weak coalition

Uganda's first post-independence government was a coalition formed by an agreement between the Kabaka Yekka (KY) and the Uganda People's Congress (UPC) (UPC). Prior to 1962, such an alliance had never been envisaged because each of these parties held opposing viewpoints and political objectives on practically every topic imaginable, aside from their ethnic differences.[1232] The UPC was founded to challenge Buganda's regionalism, and it served as a vehicle to gather opposition to Buganda's power before independence. It was predominantly a northern-dominated party. On the other hand, the Baganda's isolationist attitudes were embodied by the KY, which was launched on June 10, 1961. It was established to safeguard the Kabaka's and Mengo's Protestant establishment's threatened positions.[1233]

The British and the Mengo Establishment formed the coalition in order to prevent Catholic Ben Kiwanuka, the head of the Democratic Party (DP) and Uganda's first Chief Minister, from succeeding them. As a result, the British persuaded Obote and Muteesa, the Kabaka of Buganda, who had been bitter enemies, to put their differences aside and work together. This helps to explain Obote's rapid shift from an ardent anti-Buganda stance to a pro-Buganda stance.[1234]

The construction of this coalition administration, on the other hand, has been regarded as one of the most dishonest political enterprises ever attempted by Ugandan officials. Because Obote and Muteesa had opposing agendas, neither the KY nor the UPC had any illusions about the alliance's long-term viability.[1235] The main goal of UPC was to use the alliance to gain power by denying the DP of support in Buganda, but the Mengo establishment wanted to keep their privileges. As a result, disparities between the two returned as soon as the DP was defeated.[1236] Although Muteesa's status was mostly ceremonial, the new post provided him with dual loyalty as Kabaka of Buganda

[1231] Supra note 28
[1232] Jorgensen, J. J. (1981) Uganda: A Modern History. Croom Helm Limited.
[1233] Mutibwa, P. M. (1992). Uganda since independence: a story of unfulfilled hopes. Africa World Press.
[1234] Supra note 14
[1235] Kasozi, A. B. K. (2013). The Bitter Bread of Exile. The Financial Problems of Sir Edward Mutesa II during his final exile, 1966-1969: The Financial Problems of Sir Edward Mutesa II during his final exile, 1966-1969. Progressive Publishing House.
[1236] Supra note 32

and Head of State.[1237] As a result, he would have conflicting functions as a head of state and Obote as Prime Minister, and Obote's objectives would be at odds with those of Buganda.

vi) The Consequences of the Uganda People's Congress Control Battle in Buganda

Uganda's political stability was dependent on the UPC's strong united leadership as the ruling party; nevertheless, the UPC was formed by a loose coalition of ethnic groups who came together to transform their marginalized status and eliminate Buganda's dominance.[1238] As a result, the organization's leadership became factionalized, with each faction leader representing a local constituency that was often ethnically distinct from the others. For example, Obote's power base was among the Langi in the north of the country, George Magezi's was among the Bunyoro in the west, and John Babiha's was among the Tooro in the mid-west. W.W. Rwetsiba's support base was in the southwestern Ugandan district of Ankole, whereas William Nadiope's was in the eastern Ugandan region of Busoga. Felix Onama hails from Uganda's west Nile area, whereas Cuthbert Obwangamoi hails from the country's far east.[1239]

Each of these regional leaders was an independent leader who did not need the party's or president's backing to be elected in their areas. These factions, along with John Kakonge, the UPC secretary general, were fighting for control of the party. By 1964, considerable realignment of political forces along regional and racial lines in the North and South had begun to take shape. Grace Ibingira commanded the southern monarchist Bantu group, while Obote led the northern Nilotic republican group. Control of UPC was critical because whomever had it would eventually have control of the country. The Bantu faction accused Obote of betraying his own aim of promoting national unity by demonstrating favouritism toward northern Uganda's ethnic groups.

As a result of the growing ethnic rift within the party, a number of Bantu ministers and prominent Baganda figures began preparing to depose Obote in mid- 1965 in order to reverse the cabinet's perceived northern dominance.[1240] The battle for control of the UPC had reached a breaking point. The competition between Obote and Ibingira for the party's leadership, and, by extension, the leadership of Uganda, raged on, with the outcome determining who would dominate Uganda's political progress.

The infighting in the UPC and the threat from Buganda, which had stayed solid in its opposition to Obote's reign, were now the two greatest threats to his power as the country's prime minister. He used violence against his opponents, and rather than containing the problem, his actions just pushed [1237] Mittelman, J. H. (1975). Ideology and politics in Uganda: from Obote to Amin. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

[1238] Ssemwanga Kivumbi. (2013). Ssekabaka Muteesa II Eyeerabirwa. Grapet Traders.
[1239] Karugire, S.R. (1980). A political History of Uganda. Heinemann Educational Books
[1240] Ingham, K. (1994). Obote: a political biography. Psychology Press.

it to a critical level, culminating in a crisis in May 1966. If he was to survive as both the leader of UPC and the Prime Minister, Obote knew he had to stay one step ahead of his political opponents. The existence of these dangers established in Obote a deep-seated fear of both his opponents in the party and in Buganda, which meant that he had to block any dissent for the sake of his own political life.

vii) The Dictatorial Tendencies of Obote

Obote's dictatorial behavior originated from the colonial legacy's structural flaw, which was already mentioned. While forming the new superstructure of independent Uganda's political administration, the British did not abandon the oppressive colonial system; rather, they emphasized autocracy by transferring the autocratic executive and political powers that had previously been vested in the British Governor and his British Chief Secretary to the office of the Prime Minister of an independent Uganda. As a result of inheriting the colonial instruments of authority, like as the police and the King's African Rifles, Obote accumulated enormous influence (viz. the Uganda Army). This did not imply that he had to abuse his position; rather, he chose to be an authoritarian and dictatorial leader because he couldn't deal with criticism and disagreement.[1241]

Obote treated individuals who resisted him with contempt and blatant disregard for human rights and the rule of law, using the northern dominated army and a spy service under the innocent name of the General Service Department, headed by his first cousin Adoko Nekyon.[1242] Five cabinet officials, including Ben Kiwanuka, the first Chief Minister, and Brigadier Shaban Opolot, the leader of the armed forces, were all held indefinitely, while five members of parliament who refused to acknowledge and accept the 1966 constitution lost their seats.

Between 1962 and 1966, Obote imposed his Ugandan principles on the Buganda by taking a hostile position toward the monarchy, claiming that this was part of the process of forging a national identity in the newly formed Uganda.[1243] Obote's outbursts appear to arise from his dissatisfaction with the fact that regional governments had become a microcosm of the national government rather than its local outpost.[1244] Obote gradually suffocated the kingdom's institutions and weakened its status within the country. In 1964, for example, he established legislation limiting the KY's activities to Buganda alone. In this sense, Obote's concerted and ultimately futile efforts to destabilize Buganda had made the Baganda into the most vociferous opponents, heightening

[1241] Supra note 14
[1242] Supra note 33
[1243] "Speech by the Prime Minister the Hon DR.AM Obote, MP," on Thursday 3rd March 1966, Uganda National Assembly Archives.
[1244] Sathyamurthy, T. V. (1986). The Political Development of Uganda, 1900-1985 (Vol. 1). Gower.

tensions between Buganda and Obote.[1245] In 1966, Obote launched a violent attack on the kingdom of Buganda with the help of northern troops and ministers.

viii) The 1960s avaricious political system

Uganda was also plagued by extensive corruption at many levels of government in the 1960s, owing to the lack of strong institutions that should have acted as checks and balances for the administration. As a result, leaders like Obote were able to take advantage of these flaws in order to stage a constitutional coup in 1966.

To begin with, bribing of members of the national assembly severely weakened the institution's independence and its ability to control central government excesses. Within the ruling UPC, the Obote government used patronage and the promise of future rewards to carry out schemes that would strengthen his dictatorial powers. Similarly, opposition members of the national assembly from both the DP and KY who crossed the floor to join the UPC on the offer of government posts and salary were similarly affected. Following his conversion to UPC, opposition leader Basil Bataringaya was appointed Minister of Internal Affairs. James Ochola, Vincent Rwamwaro, and Stanslaus Okurut were among the DP members who followed him. Several DP members of the national legislature from the Kingdom of Bunyoro opted to join the UPC after Obote promised to hold a referendum to return to Bunyoro the lost counties that had previously belonged to Buganda.[1246] Minister of Finance William Kalema, who led a group from Kentucky, was appointed. Ironically, the UPC was a member of the coalition government, but it bribed members of the KY, its coalition partner, to switch sides. Furthermore, all of the aforementioned persons joined the UPC without informing their electorates, which amounted to treason and a loss of democratic values, thereby producing a dictator, namely Obote.

Furthermore, those who joined the government allowed the UPC to acquire an artificial majority with dire consequences. By 1966 the National Assembly had 74, 9, 8 and 1 member(s) of the UPC, the DP, the KY and the Independents respectively. This was not a reflection of the true strength of UPC in the country. Without this artificial majority, it is unlikely that Obote could have achieved what he did in 1966; the abrogation of the 1962 constitution, acting decisively against Muteesa and Buganda.

Those who joined the government also helped the UPC gain a false majority, which had disastrous implications. The UPC, the DP, the KY, and the Independents each had 74, 9, 8, and 1 members in the National Assembly by 1966.[1247] This was not a genuine picture of UPC's overall strength across the country. Without this fictitious majority, Obote would not have been able to accomplish what he did in 1966: abrogating the 1962 constitution and striking decisively against Muteesa and Buganda.

[1245] Hansen, H. B. (1977). Ethnicity and military rule in Uganda: A study of ethnicity as a political factor in Uganda, based on a discussion of political anthropology and the application of its results. Nordiska Afrikainstitutet.
[1246] "Parliament Hansards", 3rd Session 1966, Vol. 67, Uganda National Assembly Archives.
[1247] "Parliamentary Hansards", 3rd Session 1965 to 1966, Uganda National Assembly Archives.

He also disregarded resolutions passed by the legislature. When parliament passed a resolution ordering Idi Amin's suspension and an investigation into his bank account, which contained 17,000 pounds sterling in cash in the form of gold bars stamped with the Belgian Congo government's stamp, Obote ignored it and later promoted Amin to the rank of Major General and Army Commander. On February 24, 1966, he would arrest five cabinet ministers: Grace Ibingira, the Party Secretary General at the time, Balaki Kirya, George Magezi, Dr.S.B Lumu, and Mathias Ngobi, who had urged a probe into the gold issue. This provides strong proof that Obote was a benefit of the gold affair rather than an innocent bystander, and that his actions exacerbated political tensions in the country.

Additionally, venal politicians also existed at Mengo, which was one of the power centres in the newly independent nation. For instance, although Buganda had GBP 1 million in its coffers by 1958, by 1960 this had dwindled to a mere GBP 465,000 and 1963, it was in the red by GBP 226,863.

By 1965, the Kabaka's government was on the verge of collapse; unfortunately, the Kabaka's ministers were the biggest offenders, with nepotism and insensitivity reaching new heights. Despite the fact that they were operating a deficit budget in 1965, these officials took out a personal loan of GBP 200,000.

The above acts by Mengo's leadership resulted in a significant political impasse between the central government and Mengo. Obote was concerned about the Mengo establishment's financial misdeeds, which resulted in protracted wranglings between the central government and Buganda, exacerbated already strained relations between the two parties, and inevitably contributed to the explosive atmosphere that culminated in the attack on the Kabaka's palace on May 24, 1966.

GONORRHEA " ENDWADDE YA BAZIRRA" UNTOLD KABAKA SAGA

Several unjustified assertions by Baganda since time in memorial behind Buganda kings are logically estimated to have continuously led their historical kings and subsequent kings into trauma, i.e., all wives in Buganda belong to the Kabaka alone germinated enough havoc. in an article in history in Africa about the Ganda Monarch, Richard Reid argued that Mutesa likely suffered from Syphilis (painful sexually transmitted disease). John Rowe in one of his Articles concluded that the disease from which Mutesa suffered was Gonorrhea (painful sexually transmitted disease). While on the surface similar both sexually transmitted, neither particularly describe the diseases are actually different. Popular biographies often offer gossip about individuals' medical histories, but there can be legitimate reasons to investigate the medical history of past leaders, two of which are pertinent here. First the medical conditions from which they suffered may have affected their lives and their decisions as leaders. Reid's addressees this point, speculating that Mutesa's Syphilis may have progressed to an extent that it affected him mentally. Reid suggests that this might help explain Mutesa's erratic behavior towards the later years within his reign, as he shifted his favor from one court group and foreign delegation to another. Rowe raises a similar point about Mutesa's health and competing groups, though in a different way, Rowe shows how Mutesa's health illness became a point of competition between foreign missionaries and indigenous religious specialists as each sought to win his favor by curing is illness. The Baganda also equated the health and well being of the Kabaka with the health of the kingdom, and Mutesa's extended illness and bedridden state would not have been a positive attribute.

In fact, so erratic was the kabaka's behavior that he persuaded his subjects to willingly engage in potential sexually I'll gornoreah infected women so as to prove their "braveness" he having suffered the same and felt the pain willingly encouraged his subjects to go through the same fate, hence the disease acquiring the name "endwadde ya baziira" disease of the brave.

THE NNAMASOLE CRISIS

"…Muteesa II narrates that her mother remained young and requested him to get married against the culture of Buganda which is saying Nnamasole do not get married. The Kabaka of Buganda is the one that implements the norms and is the one who removes them. Let my mother get married and she got married to common Kigozi this led to a one Ssenkatuka to gun Katikkiro Nsibirwa…"

This was the Nnamasole crisis in Buganda. Irene Namaganda (Nnamasole) was a baptized Christian and a daughter to a clergyman in Buganda. She studied from Gayaza a church missionary society's prestigious girl's school before her 1914 Christian marriage at the age of eighteen to Kabaka Daudi Chwa.[1248]

At that time of the marriage, Kabaka Daudi Chwa had and recognized children that he had from other women. Their marriage proved neither monogamous nor companionate. In 1924, Irene Namaganda gave birth to Muteesa and Daudi Chwa recognized him as his son. Important to note is that Muteesa did not become his first recognized son nor his favorite.[1249] Daudi Chwa accepted [1248] Nakanyike Musisi. "A Personal Journey into custom. Identity. Power and Politics: Researching and Writing the Life and Times of Bugandas Queen Mother Irene Namaganda (1896-1957)." History in Africa 23 (1996). 369-85.

[1249] Provincial Commissioner to Governor, 25-2-37. CO536/194/40080.NAGB. A Copy of Daudi Chwas will. Dated3 March 1935.Lists at least 34 Children. "Excerpts from Daudi Chwas will." Initiated WY2, Lloyd Fallers Paper Box 32 folder 2, University of Chicago Special Collections.Chicago USA.

Mutesa as his son at the time of his birth. Mutesa, on the other hand, was neither his first nor his favorite son. George Mawanda, Chwa's older son, was widely viewed as a logical successor even at the time of his death. By the 1950s, top Ganda men had publicly said that Daudi Chwa had named George Mawanda as his heir before his death, and denied Mutesa's paternity.

When Kabaka Daudi Chwa died, most of the Ganda regarded his son George Mawanda as a logical successor. One of the traditional men presented an argument that Daudi Chwa had designated George Mawanda as his heir and declared to accept paternity of Muteesa. Martin Luther Nsibirwa, the katikkiro of Buganda presented Muteesas name before the Lukiiko and it was debated and accepted that Muteesa was the next king of Buganda. He was therefore presented to the Ganda people as the new Kabaka. Many were surprised and wondered how it could happen. They all knew George Mawanda to be the next heir.

As Muteesa succeeded Daudi Chwa, Irene Namaganda was sworn in as the Nnamasole (Queen mother) on January 1940. But remarkable is the fact that at that time she was a mulokole (born again Christian) awkwardly suited to her ritual and ceremonial roles.[1250] Her life could later cause her problems. In Buganda, the Nnamasole is the second big office in the leadership of the kingdom compared to that of Lubuga (the queen sister who took a coronation oath alongside the Kabaka). Nnamasole was an important mother. She was a powerful symbol and had historically been important to the stability of Buganda. Being the biological mother of the king; she was the center of morality and good government for the kingdom.[1251]

The Nnamasole was considered the mother of the country being the fact that she gave birth to a king. She was supposed to offer guidance to the king, espionage and personal defence of the king. She was the highest ranking commoner in the kingdom, Estates and subordinate office holders, as well as the clan of her birth, supported and benefitted from her official position.[1252]

The Nnamasole was respected and treasured. During the reign of Kimera, the Nnamasole was regarded the Kabaka in absence of the king. She could make orders at various angles. For instance, if a man was arrested the Nnamasole had the power to order his release. Another thing is that in the absence of the, for a person to become chief, she had to be consulted. The Nnamasoles complementary status as the Kabaka's equal and guardian was enough to make her potentially the single most significant check on the reckless Kabaka's actions.[1253] . She could moderate the monarch's excesses without losing her job due to insufficient displays of loyalty because she was perceived as structurally devoted to the king, without whom she would be without any office. The kabaka's function could be described as that of Buganda's principal patron and owner.

[1250] Juliet Kiguli. "Gender, Ebyaffe, and Power Relations in the Buganda Kingdom: A study of Cultural Revivalism." (Ph.D, Thesis, Cologne University, 2001) 179-81.

[1251]"Transformation of Buganda Women: From the Earliest Times to the Demise of the Kingdom in1966." (Ph. D. Thesis, University of Toronto 1991) 81-83, and especially the concise discussion of the role of Nnamasole BY Holly Hanson, "Queen Mothers and Good Government in Buganda: The Less of Women's Political Power in Nineteenth century East Africa." In J.Allman. S Geiger and N. Musis, eds. Women in Africa Colonial Histories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press 2002), 219-32.

[1252]Hanson, "Queen Mothers and Good Government, 219-32.

She was the mother of the country, as Holly Hanson has argued, with the concept that motherhood came with power, independence, and a responsibility to discipline and advise her son, the kabaka. Her job was not one of secrecy. She was the kingdom's highest-ranking commoner. Her formal status was supported and benefited by estates and subordinate officeholders, as well as the clan of her birth.

That and many more, were the duties to be faced by Namaganda a young mulokole Nnamasole. Truth be told, the duties could over weigh her age. She was still young and a lot of events taking place in her understanding. Under Christian marriage, becoming a widow or widower could make her qualify for another marriage. But this was not permissible in the Ganda culture. The Nnamasole is not allowed to get married again.[1254]

In February of 1941, the born again Nnamasole Irene Namaganda informed the Katikkiro (Prime minister) of Buganda, Uganda Bishop and eventually British administrators of the protectorate that she was six months pregnant and intended to marry her lover. There is no doubt that the father of the baby was Simon Kigozi a young commoner and former school teacher.[1255] Simon Kigozi was only slightly older than Muteesa II her teenage son who had been made the king of Buganda in 1939.

Despite their doubts, the kingdom's prime minister and his allies in Buganda's protestant elite collaborated with Ugandan officials to make the marriage possible. Namaganda's Christian marriage, on the other hand, was a huge controversy, as it went against all the expectations that come with marriage and royal authority. The controversy sparked a political crisis that saw Buganda's prime minister removed, his senior friends pushed out of office, the queen mother deposed, her husband exiled, and the country's political landscape transformed. The incident ushered in a new age of popular mobilization and protest in Buganda, taking the country's politics beyond the sphere of oligarchy-British elite dealings and into the realms of public gossip, newspapers, and, finally, the streets.[1256]

[1253] Rhiannon Stephens, A History of African Motherhood: The case of Uganda. 700-1900. (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2013), 169-72.
[1254]Tamale Mirundi during a television interview.
[1255] Bishop Stuart to Archbishop 16-6-41, Lang Volume 184; 327-38, Archbishop of Canterburys Papers LambethPalce Archives, London, UK.
[1256] Carol Summers, 2018. Scandal and Mass Politics: Buganda's 1941Nnamasole Crisis, International Journal of African Historical Studies 51, no. 1 (2018): 63-83.

The Nnamasoles belated acknowledgement of pregnancy suggests that she knew this. Besides, the Ganda official's consultation with the Bishop before informing the British Resident or Lukiiko and the Bishop Stuarts defensive letter of explanation to the Archbishop of Canterbury indicates that the situation was sensitive.[1257]

Having announced her pregnancy, the British advised her to conceal it with a trip to South Africa but she was not willing. Her demand was to marry Kigozi a commoner and father of her child. This was confirmed by Kigozi's declaration and affirmation that he was the father and loved Namaganda and was willing to marry her. This left the British challenged. It forced them to get a license from the Uganda British governor to allow the couple to avoid any public banns. At the time, Kigozi was fifteen to twenty year's young than Namaganda. The Bishop counseled Kigozi that marrying to legitimize the child was a bad idea. Even the Liturgical calendar created problems as it discouraged marriage during lent.[1258]

Indeed, the marriage took place at Nnamasoles residence with the two sleeping together as husband and wife. The marriage was to be kept a secret and the pro-government newspaper carried no coverage at all of the small wedding. Later, rumors about the marriage circulated. The immediate popular reaction was throwing stones and shouting "Kivve" (abomination) that hit the couple as they left the ceremony. This was followed by the Lukiiko's formal prosecution and banishment of the couple for breaking the customs and of Buganda. Irene Namaganda was stripped off her title of Nnamasole, ashamed and deprived of her property and office of Nnamasole.

Thrown stones and screams of "kivve" [translated as "abomination" in contemporary accounts] were hurled at the couple as they exited the ritual. Following the Lukiiko's formal trial and banishment of the pair for breaking Buganda's conventions, Namaganda was stripped of her position as nnamasole, as well as its rank and belongings. The problem resulted in Katikkiro Martin Luther Nsibirwa's forced departure, which the Lukiiko blamed on him for enabling the marriage and so fostering the kingdom's degeneracy. The Lukiiko appointed Namaganda's sister Perpetua Nnaabawesi, a woman Bishop Stuart considered immoral (and nominally Catholic), as the new nnamasole. Her subsequent influence, either on the young kabaka or on the kingdom, was apparently negligible. The British Governor supported the Lukiiko's decision and signed the letter of expulsion, which barred Kigozi from entering Buganda and restricted Namaganda's movements. The protectorate's Judicial Advisor and High Court declined to intervene in the Lukiiko's actions, establishing a precedent that "where a Native Court has held that a certain act is contrary to custom, [1257] Summers, Carol. " Scandel and Mass Politics: Bugandas 1941 Nnamasole Crisis." International Journal of Africa Historical Studies 51,no 1 (2018) 63-83.

[1258] While it is not clear that this was a factor for British officials, it was later mentioned as an indication of church hypocrisy and violation of its own rules by Christian activists.

an appellate Court should, I think, be reluctant to hold otherwise," even in the absence of any evidence of said custom.

The crisis saw the resignation of katikkiro Martin Luther Nsibirwa and the Lukiiko denounces him for facilitating the marriage and thus sponsoring the degeneracy of the kingdom. Namaganda's sister Perpetua Nnaabawesi was appointed by the Lukiiko as the new Nnamasole.[1259]The British Governor accepted the Lukiiko's decision and signed a letter of banishment of Kigozi from Buganda and restricted Namaganda's movements. The kingdom's bigger issues, on the other hand, were generational and factional. During Daudi Chwa's rule, Buganda's political institutions were frozen by the 1900 Uganda Agreement and the alliance it cemented between Britain and Buganda's oligarchs. The oncoming war had distracted Britain by 1939. The colonial elite was undercut by age and the rise of ambitious junior men trained under colonial control. As the governing elite began to falter, older discontents enlisted the help of educated and unemployed young. During the first big Bataka movement in the 1920s, petitions by clan leaders permitted certain elders to regain territory. Following that achievement, the kingdom's critics tried even more. By September 1939, a group of men calling themselves the "Descendents of Kintu" had filed a petition against the leaders they described as egotistical and unscrupulous abusers of the people.

Despite these tensions, a smooth and seemingly uncomplicated transition from one kabaka to his successor was possible because by 1939, the kingdom's rulers saw succession as almost a private matter—from Daudi Chwa to the sole son of his Christian marriage—rather than something that everyone in the kingdom had the right to agitate about as clans sought to enthrone their own candidates. As people remembered the expenses of the civil war, paid lip respect to imported concepts of Christian marriage, and acknowledged that the kingdom's status as a British protectorate meant that armed conflict was unlikely to succeed, the old fractious politics of party and clan had vanished.

Despite this stifling of kingdom politics, the tensions that had been suppressed by Mutesa's quick enthronement were very real, and they were expressed in subsequent years as activists criticized kingdom leaders' behaviour, making private practices public and political. Activists used a variety of tools to criticize leaders, including rumour, threat, character assassination, and slander prosecutions, as well as newer media, organizing, and lobbying. Mutesa II's reign became a time for the emergence of a new hybrid politics that drew on a system of political thinking rooted in real and metaphorical family life and relationships, but deployed ideas of inheritance, relationships, stewardships, inheritance, and loyalty in thoroughly modern, public ways, despite his quick and sedate inauguration. Buganda's elite politics were transformed from private negotiations over royal succession and patronage to a public realm open to new political actors using new methods.

[1259] Bishop Stuart to Archbishop of Canterbury, 3-11-41, Lang V. 184: 327-38. See also Stephens. A History of African Motherhood, 175-80.

According to veterans of the process, the Nnamasole affair of 1941 marked the beginning of the shift from private factions to public debate. Tensions that had been hidden in the 1939 succession became apparent as a result of the controversy, which led to the rejection of Irene Namaganda as nnamasole and Martin Luther Nsibirwa as katikkiro.

The 1941 Nnamasole crisis was a fiasco. Contemporary accounts, on the other hand, stressed politics. Salacious details became a tactic for involving a larger audience in ethical and political morality debates. In a ground breaking analysis of scandals, British historian Anna Clark claimed that one of their most crucial characteristics is that scandal blurs the lines between private and public life, potentially inciting widespread political mobilization around moral issues.

The Nnamasole issue in Buganda provided an opportunity for Baganda—from a besieged katikkiro to stone-throwing youth—to experiment with views about the country's future and voice and act on moral judgements of the country's leadership. Public discontent that had been suppressed during the interregnum, when it should have been open and violent in accordance with historical patterns, simmered until the crisis offered a story and an audience.

According to E.M.K. Mulira, a young political analyst, and his father-in-law, Hamu Mukasa, an elder statesman, the controversy surrounding the Nnamasole affair and marriage both launched a decade of tumultuous politics in Buganda and demonstrated to the country's young and discontented that they could bring down governments and make demands on the country's institutions by the end of the crisis. Buganda's late colonial politics were initially clearly oriented around abstractions of social order, loyalty, and connection, rather than the issues of autonomy from Britain, land, labor, cotton prices, and business prospects that would become significant concerns over the next two decades. The structure of the Nnamasole crisis mapped out social order, loyalty, and connection, partly through violations and inversions.

Pregnancy and marriage for Irene Namaganda are less intriguing as isolated events than as the catalyst for a public outcry that destroyed a government and reshaped Buganda's politics. However, it is critical to investigate the connection between the events and the uproar. Why did people react in such a spectacular way? Extramarital sex and pregnancy in the royal family were not novel occurrences. They were so common that Church officials sympathized with Namaganda, whom they characterized as a pious and Christian wife and widow who had been ignored for a long time. Despite the ramifications of a Christian queen's out-of-wedlock conception and her designation of a man only slightly older than her son as her lover, the controversy was not about sex.

The first British response to the problem sparked by Namaganda's pregnancy concluded that the situation was a simple sex scandal—a pregnancy that unmistakably showed a female official's sexual behavior outside of matrimony. As a result, Namaganda's reaction of concealing her pregnancy was understandable.

The Lukiiko criticized Irene Namaganda and removed her from office, not for sex or even for the pregnancy that made her sexual behavior public, but for her answer to the situation: a Christian marriage that violated Ganda norms for private and public partnerships. The marriage supplied direct proof for the trespass allegation that resulted in Kigozi's exile. Locals accepted the idea that a powerful nnamasole might have sex, and in the past, sexual connections could have been one of the options accessible to a nnamasole trying to convince officials or attract Buganda's factions to support her son.

The Lukiiko and Ganda people were outraged, and they condemned Namaganda and her spouse for the treachery and treasonous nature of a marriage that turned a private relationship into a public one, so opening an official royal area to an outsider. In doing so, the marriage transgressed local notions of suitable partnerships, providing Baganda with a model for misaffiliation and disorder rather than appropriate family life. The Nnamasole's deceased husband's standing was further harmed by sex, pregnancy, and marriage to a commoner.

Ssegwanga (cock) was one of the kabaka's praise titles, a specific celebration of his sexual status and dominion over the kingdom. Namaganda was unable to remain in sadness. She accepted another sexual partner who was capable of having a child and chose to marry that new partner. As a result, she clearly prioritized commoners over kings. Furthermore, by abandoning her authority, Namaganda exposed her son to risk and left her people vulnerable to a young kabaka who was expected to "devour" the kingdom as part of acquiring power.

The marriage had a different connotation in Buganda than it might have looked to British spectators on the surface. It did not restore order by binding a wayward widow to a new husband, providing a stepfather for the young monarch, and a family for the unborn baby. Instead, it inverted the key assumptions of Ganda relationships in a chaotic way. Critical observers warned that this would jeopardize Ganda society's structure.

KING HENRY'S SCANDAL

We have already seen the impact the scandal of the Nnamasole had on the status of the kingdom and the aspect of Christianity in Buganda. Interestingly, almost similar circumstances had transpired in the Kingdom of England in the time of King Henry VIII.

Henry VIII was raised in a strict Catholic household. He had a prayer scroll with illuminations of the Trinity, the crucified Christ, the Instruments of the Passion, and various martyred saints in his possession before he became king. On each side of the images, there were Latin prayers and English rubrics (instructions) explaining how the prayers could provide protection from earthly threats or a reprieve from Purgatory time. Sacred texts of this type were common in late-medieval England's devotional rituals. Owners of the scrolls said the prayers, gazed at the images, and touched the physical thing in order to draw closer to the divine and win a celestial reward in the afterlife. Henry's inscription on the prayer scroll indicates that he utilized it for these sacred reasons and embraced the theological teachings that accompanied it.

Henry's devotion to the Catholic Church was typical of the time. He also believed, along with the prayer scroll, that buying papal indulgences might forgive sins and decrease time in Purgatory, which was a popular practice at the time. In 1521, Pope Clement VII granted him and Katherine of Aragon a 'plenary indulgence,' which was conditional on them making an annual trip to a prominent shrine. In his rejoinder, ‘Defense of the Seven Sacraments,' Henry defended the practice when Martin Luther's protest against the sale of indulgences ignited the German Reformation.

When Protestant Reformation leader Martin Luther expressed dissatisfaction with the Catholic Church in 1517, King Henry VIII took it upon himself to personally refute Luther's ideas. Henry was given the title of Fidei Defensor, or Defender of the Faith, by the Pope. Only a decade later, Henry VIII would declare war on the Catholic Church, accept the post of Supreme Head of the Church of England, and abolish the country's monasteries, absorbing and dividing their vast fortune as he saw fit.

Despite the fact that anticlericalism had begun to emerge in England by the 1520s, Catholicism continued to enjoy widespread public support. According to Andrew Pettegree, history professor at the University of St. Andrews, Henry VIII "had no wish and no need to break with the church" (U.K.). “He didn't need it because he already had significant control over the English church and its finances... And he had no desire because he was a devout Christian.”

By 1527, however, Henry faced a major challenge: his first marriage to Catherine of Aragon had failed to produce a son and male heir to the crown. Henry was also smitten with Anne Boleyn, one of his wife's ladies-in-waiting, whose sister Mary had been his lover previously. Anne encouraged the king's interest in her, but she wisely declined to become his mistress, preferring to focus on a greater aim.

Today, there is a Book of Hours with secret notes scrawled in the margins between Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn. The use of Books of Hours was prevalent among laypeople. The ‘Office of the Virgin Mary,' a sequence of prayers addressed to the Mother of Christ and chanted daily at eight regular hours, was at the heart of the volumes as compendia of prayers and devotional literature. It was anticipated that Mary would function as a mediator between the owner and God. The best artists of the day often brilliantly decorated the pages. Those for the elite were lavishly embellished with lapis lazuli and costly gold leaf. However, Anne and Henry used his work for non-spiritual purposes around the year 1528. Henry penned a lover's letter for Anne in French at the foot of the folio depicting the Man of Sorrows: 'If you recall my love in your prayers as fiercely as I adore you, I shall rarely be forgotten, for I am yours.' Forever, Henry R.' Anne opted to write her response on a sheet depicting the Annunciation, implying her desire and authority to give the king a son. ‘Be daly proof you shalle me fynde to be to you bothe lovynge and kynde,' she wrote in English.

As a result, Henry petitioned Pope Clement VII for a divorce from Catherine. He said that the marriage was against God's will because she had married Henry's late brother, Arthur, for a short time.

It would not have been difficult for England's king to obtain a papal dispensation to divorce his first wife and marry another in order to create a male heir in other conditions. According to Pettegree, “there was a clear understanding among the royal houses of Europe that the ruler's number one objective was the continuation of the dynasty.”

Henry's timing, however, was not on his side. The Holy Roman Empire's imperial forces stormed and devastated Rome the same year, forcing Pope Clement VII to evacuate the Vatican through a secret tunnel and seek refuge in the Castel Sant'Angelo. King Charles V of Spain, Catherine of Aragon's loving nephew, held the title of Holy Roman Emperor at the time.

Clement VII was hesitant to give Henry a divorce from the emperor's aunt because the pope was nearly fully under imperial control. But he didn't want to entirely reject Henry, so he dragged out negotiations with the king's minister, Cardinal Thomas Wolsey, for several years, despite Henry's growing frustration.

Thomas Cranmer, a Protestant cleric, and Thomas Cromwell, the king's powerful adviser, established a compelling argument that England's king should not be subject to the pope's jurisdiction. Henry appointed Cranmer as Archbishop of Canterbury in order to marry Anne, and Cranmer immediately granted Henry's divorce from Catherine. Anne Boleyn, who was significantly pregnant at the time, was crowned queen of England in a spectacular ceremony in June 1533.

The Act of Supremacy, passed by Parliament in 1534, formalized the break from the Catholic Church and established the king as the Church of England's Supreme Head. With Cranmer and Cromwell in power and a Protestant queen by Henry's side, England began to accept "some of the teachings of the continental Reformation," including a Bible translation into English, according to Pettegree.

From 1536 to 1540, the Crown attempted to dismantle England's monasteries and seize the Church's huge property holdings, in what Pettegree describes as "the greatest redistribution of property in England since the Norman Conquest in 1066." All of the land was returned to the Crown, and Henry used the money to reward his loyal advisors, both Protestant and conservative. “Even Catholics are enticed by the prospect of expanding their land holdings with this former monastic property,” Pettegree explains.

Of course, Anne Boleyn would not bear Henry the anticipated boy (though she did give birth to a daughter who would become Elizabeth I), and by 1536, Henry had fallen for Jane Seymour, another lady-in-waiting. Anne was executed in May of that year, after her erstwhile ally Cromwell assisted in her conviction for adultery, incest, and conspiracy against the king.

Jane Seymour gave birth to Henry's first male heir, the future King Edward VI, in October 1537, but died two weeks later from problems related to childbirth. Evangelical and conservative forces fought for power for the rest of Henry's life, even to the point of murder, but after Henry's death in 1547, his son's brief reign would be dominated by evangelical Protestant advisors, who were able to bring a much more radical Reformation to England.

However, Edward died young in 1553, and during his reign, his Catholic half-sister, Queen Mary I, reversed many of these measures. It would be up to Queen Elizabeth I, Anne Boleyn's daughter and England's ruler for over 50 years, to finish what her father had started.

Despite the revolutionary reforms made on his behalf, Henry VIII remained a staunch Catholic for the remainder of his life, with a personal dislike of Martin Luther.

Sacred things, such as saints' relics and shrines, were under attack during Henry VIII's Reformation. Some sacred books, particularly those honoring popes or St Thomas Becket, who had defied King Henry II, were also disfigured or burned. During the dissolutions, many manuscripts and volumes in monastic libraries were destroyed or dispersed, though antiquarian John Leland was able to collect and preserve a substantial amount for the king. Sacred texts, despite this, remained a significant element of English religious culture. As a result, more of them began to emerge in English, and multiple English Bibles were available. For evangelicals and Protestants, however, the writings did not reference purgatory and should not be treated as holy items in and of themselves. Archbishop Cranmer and Lord Protector Somerset were laying the groundwork for full-fledged Protestantism to be introduced after Henry's death.

Pettegree says, "The divorce is clearly at the heart of the matter." “I'm very positive there would have been no English Reformation if there had been no marital troubles, at least during Henry's lifetime.”

THE MYTH THAT THE KABAKA BELONGS TO HIS MOTHERS CLAN

"…the King belongs to the mother's clan because the Baganda wanted that let every clan produce the king…"

In the Ganda culture, the king does not belong to the mother's clan. This misconception that the Kabaka of Buganda takes his clan from his mother an extra mile that the royal family is matrilineal is not right. This is because the Kabaka has his own clan which is known as royal clan "olulyo olulangira"and the members of this clan are known as "abalangira" if they are male and "abambejja" when they are female.

The misconception rose because the royal clan had no totem which all other clans had. But a totem was just a symbol and a clan is a matter of genealogy. The royal clan has its genealogy traced way back from the patrilineal line of Kintu.

It is majorly traced from the fact that the king used to rotate around the different clans. The theory was that since the king took his mother's clan but could not take a wife from that same clan; his off springs would be by women of other clans. Each clan had a chance to present wives to the king and potentially get royal offsprings. Ostensibly, those offsprings would belong to their mother's clans and this ensured that the throne would go to another clan on the next succession.

This was intended to avail an opportunity to every clan to provide a king. Actually, this so called chance for all clans to be able to provide wives to the king, is in fact no different from the chance that any other clan may have of marrying into other clans[1260].

In Buganda, the Queen mother holds a very powerful place as does the king's sister. As an expression of their love for their mothers, new Kabaka's frequently took a name derived from their mother's name their official name. This became part of the pool of names in the royal clan. So Kabaka Ssuuna was the son of Nassuna of the mamba clan, Kabaka Jjemba was the son of Najjemba of the Ngonge clan and Kabaka Nakibinge was son of the Nababinge of Ngonge clan. What happened is that the mother would build her own palace and never met her son again. By the kings taking names related to their mothers, the Kabaka automatically gained an ally in their mother's clan.[1261]

Unfortunately, Kabaka Muteesa perpetuated the error. In his book "Desecration of my Kingdom" he claimed that he was of the Nte clan. But this was a mistake made by the king.

If Muteesa belonged to the Nte clan, this would mean that he had to be subordinate or answerable to Katongole the head of Nte clan or that he himself would have to become the head of the Nte clan. In other words, in Buganda, no one is supposed to be above the Kabaka. He is the Ssabasajja, Ssebataka, and Ssegwanga and so on. This means that there is no way he could be subordinate or answerable to Katongole.

[1260] Bugandas Royal Clan available on https://www.buganda.com

[1261] Grace, Christine. Were Bugandas Kings really matrilineal? Ddembe musings 2011 available at https://www.dembe.wordpress.com

Guidance to this can be sought from the fact that when prince and princesses die, the funerary rites are not presided over by members of the deceased person's mother's clan which is a clan manifestation that they are not considered to be members or absorbed into the clans of their mothers unlike people whose funerary rites are conducted by people from their clan.

Generally, it must be noted that the genealogy of Buganda kings clearly traces ancestry of the kings through the paternal line not the maternal line in other words; becoming king depends on who your father is not who your mother is[1262]. The kings of Buganda have never been matrilineal, but their mothers and mother's clan hold very important positions in the kingdoms affairs.

BUGANDA AND AMIN'S REGIME.

The Baganda had developed hatred over Obote. Their desire was to see Obote out of Buganda soils. Many of them were willing to give financial, moral and social assistance to any one that could kill Obote or force him out of Buganda. This was seen as an opportunity to Amin whose relationship with Obote was souring every day.[1263]In 1971, Idi Amin Dada the then military commander overthrew Milton Obote. Indeed, as expected of him, he obtained the support of the Baganda. Jubilations were in every part of Buganda and congratulatory messages came in from every part of Buganda to Amin.

However, history has it that he retained the proscription of the kingdoms mandated by the 1967 Constitution hence Buganda remained simply one of the provinces of Uganda under the central administration. The Baganda still had hope in Amin's government of restoring their kingdom. In his efforts to appease them and win more of their support, Amin allowed the return of the dead body "enjole" of Sir Edward Muteesa II soon after taking over power in early 1971 to be given an official state burial in Buganda ancestral tombs. In a further development, Oloka Onyango asserts that Amin allowed the installation of Ronald Mutebi (the late Kabaka's heir) as Ssabataka (chief of all Baganda clan heads), but not as Kabaka (king)[1264]. This raised more hope among the Baganda. Ofcourse Amin knew that to be able to lead Uganda, all possible steps had to be taken to control and appease the Baganda by getting their support.

[1262] Michael B. Nsimbi. " Amannya Amaganda nennono Zaago." Nsimbis credentials regarding the clan histories and naming conventions.
[1263] See Henry Kyemba. A State of Blood.
[1264] J. Oloka –Onyango (1997) The question of Buganda in contemporary Ugandan politics, Journal of contemporary African studies 15:2, 173-189

Amin must have learnt from the history. He must have appreciated the effect of traditional institutions and political parties in the administration of Uganda. He passed the political Parties decree number 14 of 1971 banning all the political parties in Uganda. The question that still challenged him was the restoration of kingdoms in Uganda. He understood that these parties could seek equal opportunities in the administration of Uganda following the semi-autonomous nature initially granted by the1962 Independence Constitution. The kingdoms remained in abeyance to throughout Amin's regime. Though they did not see the restoration come, the Baganda were convinced that one day Amin could completely restore their kingdom. Unfortunately, their wishes were not to be granted by the president. Amin's relationship with the Baganda was to become hostile soon due to land. Indeed, the long support of him by the natives reduced. The relationship became hostile when he made the land reform decree in 1975 that saw the nationalization of land by the government.[1265]

One can arguably say that from the time of independence in 1962, the central governments were always at loggerheads with the kingdom and basically the head of states due to the kingdoms interests that conflicted with the government interests. Naphtali Akena once stated that "no dead man has any right to rule over the living directly through this own ghost or indirectly through heirs…Justice, love of common men, rule by representatives were the ultimate values treasured most by Obote. Hence Milton and Sir Edward could not get along at all"[1266]But the questions among the natives were on the resurrection and restoration of their cultural institutions which were centers of unity among the natives. This answer was to be given later by a group of fighters under National Resistance Army (NRM) led by Yoweri Kaguta Museveni in the early 1990s.

THE RESTORATION OF BUGANDA (SECOND BIRTH OF THE KINGDOM)

From the late 1980s, there was a renewed internal disagreement in Buganda about how to conceive and articulate the relations between culture, politics and kingship. The group that emerged in the early 1990s as the prominent voice of the kingdom consisted of younger urban professionals who held more pragmatic views than their elder culture oriented, clan based competitors.[1267]But because political parties and traditional authorities were condemned for having contributed to sectarianism, political divisions along ethnic, regional and religious lines, Political parties were to remain banned but traditional authorities like kingdoms were to be restored in 1999 on the condition that they [1265] The land reform decree of 1975 was to the effect that all the land belonged to the government and other most impotant institutions like Makerere University, ,ulao hospital owned land on99 year lease. Amins intention was to hasten on service delivery.

[1266] Naphtali AkenaAdoyo, 1969.
[1267] The Cultural Kingdom in Uganda: Popular royalism and restoration of th Buganda kingship. Jun 1999 by Mikacel Karlstorm.

would not engage in political activities.[1268]

Upon the completion of a five-year guerilla war fair staged by the former defense minister and presidential candidate; Yoweri Kaguta Museveni following his allegations that the 1980 election had been rigged by Uganda People's Congress. The war was ragged in the northern district of Buganda (Luwero) and it was highly supported by people in the area who had hope in Museveni of restoring their kingdom and besides he was getting rid of Obote Buganda's lasting enemy from the time of independence.[1269]Indeed the natives comprised signified proportion of the Peoples Resistance Army that he founded. Yusuf Kironde Lule, a prominent muganda with monarchist sympathies, became the political umbrella for the armed struggle by the NRA. The issue of Kabakaship became active and the revival of kiganda ethnicity became a song.

According to Tidemand "a song Agawalangana mu nkola [struggle in the wildness], became popular during the war among the Baganda. The song has been interpreted as evidence of a wide spread wish among the Baganda of reinvigorating their old cultural institutions at large. A number of older Baganda definitely saw the guerilla war in Luwero as a contribution of the hostilities between Obote and the Baganda which started in 1966." Many members of the royal family of Buganda got involved in the struggle. It's said that prince Jjuko (Mutebi's cousin) occupied a prominent administrative post and was an active combatant in the war and ended up rising to the rank of captain.

Further history puts it forward that Kabaka Ronald Muwenda Mutebi as well was seen visiting the NRA areas liberated from Obote's regime.[1270]There is nothing behind the alliance of Buganda with NRA than the restoration of the monarchy as Kasfir remarked, the restoration of the monarchy and the return of "ebyaffe" led to the unlikely tacit alliance between kingdom supporters and the NRM.[1271] Upon the completion of the war, Kabaka Ronald Mutebi returned to Uganda in1986. A lot of his Baganda strongmen like Samson Kisseka and Abu Mayanja had been inculcated into the central government as vice president and Attorney General. Oloka Onyango remarks that these were later to play a pivotal role in the politics of the eventual restoration of the Kabakaship.

However, the restoration of the monarchy was to be a challenge to Museveni. Drawing attention to the political history of the country, a lot of challenges were faced by him on how to restore the kingdom as well as controlling its activities in administration of Uganda. Attention had to be drawn on the exact nature of regime or system the restored Kabaka was to operate. It was Cleary not that [1268] The restoration of the Buganda Kingdom Government 1986-2014: Culture, contingeacies, constraints. Nelson Kasfir. The Journal of Modern African Studies.

[1269] See Karugire 1988, pp76-77
[1270] Ibid
[1271] See Kasfir 1995 at p.154.

which had been created under the abrogated 1962 Constitution like under Article 20 which provide that at least 68 members of the Lukiiko would be directly elected[1272] and yet at that time the Lukiiko had been already restored performing its functions.

The other question that the government faced was on how the monarch would fit into the overall operation and governance of the country and how to raise funds to support its activities. But NRM was to stand its point that the kingdom was not to indulge in the political activities if it were to be restored but rather was to be a constitutional monarchy that would be purely cultural. This was a tactical move to ensure that political instabilities could not re occur in Uganda following the fact that the traditional institutions had been the major clash between the central government and them due to the fact that they had gone political. The restoration of the monarchy was to be by condition that it was not to indulge in political matters. Museveni once remarked that "I have been emphasizing to them that it would be better if they confined their activities to culture without trying to get involved in politics or administration. Some have listened but others have not"[1273]

Indeed, the restoration of the kingdom was to be a fulfillment of the promise by Museveni of the once abolished monarchies. Because of the history where they competed with the government for power, the restored monarchies were to be constitutional monarchies only concerned with cultural issues. However, Buganda being the largest of the four kingdoms appears to have become a major political force once again and the restoration prompted some people to wonder if Africa demonstrations, such as Uganda could successfully contain traditional institutions under modern political systems.[1274]

CORONATION OF THE KING (KABAKA RONALD MUWENDA MUTEBI II)

Abu Mayanja was appointed co-chair of the Kabaka's coronation and the coronation was announced. The process of restoration nevertheless did not pass without challenge. In in a bid to stop the coronation, a Kampala based lawyer sought an injunction arguing that the provisions of 1967 Constitution would be violated if it took place.[1275]It stated that when Museveni returned from the trip that he had made oversees, he requested the National Resistance Council to amend the coronation to allow the coronation. Because of the role played by the chief actors on both sides of the issues that is Abu Mayanja, vice president Samson Kisekka and foreign minister and DP Chief,

[1272] Schedule 1 of the 1962 Constitution of Uganda(the Constitution of Buganda)
[1273] Yoweri Museveni Kaguta 1993.
[1274] Stefan Lougren. Power of the Buganda: Ugandas Kings Return July 11 1996.
[1275] Miscellaneous Application No 74 of 1993.aslo See Mutebi Coronation Hit by Injunction New Vision 29th May 1993

Paul Ssemwogerere. The coronation was a success and the Kabaka Ronald Muwenda Mutebi was coroneted as king at Nnagalabi. However, the question that arose was on the relationship that could stand between Buganda and the central government. This was to remain a story to be narrated upon witnessing the events after.

The central government failed to understand that culture cannot easily be separated from politics given the status of Buganda in Uganda. Buganda was to continue influencing the politic of Uganda. As Oloka Onyango asserts, the issue of Buganda has clearly returned to a position of pre-eminence in the politics of the country and become deeply entrenched in the machinations for political power. Indeed the kingdom has continued to be a critical importance in the political evolution of the Pearl of Africa.[1276]Many events have been witnessed as a result of the silent political interests of the Baganda and the central government. Though the two continue to pretend, there actions can no longer be hidden. Buganda's continued demand for federation has challenged the central government. The two have been clashing in various ways.

TALES FROM AN EAGLE VIEW: THE SECOND AND THE THIRD KABAKA CRISIS: THE UN EXCORCIBLE BUGANDA GHOST QUESTION HAUTING UGANDA.

THE 2009 KABAKA CRISIS (THE KAYUNGA CRISIS)

Since the so-called "third wave"[1277] spread across Eastern Europe, Latin America, Asia and Africa, there has been a growing frustration over the slow pace of democratic progress within the sub-Saharan Africa. In spite of the growing struggles for democracy, the rule of law and independent political institutions, the region still faces a "crisis of governance". Most the sub-Saharan African countries remain under the dominance of personalized or neo-patrimonial political systems[1278]. The nature of governance structures under personalized regimes has become a concern attracting the attention of many scholars and developments experts. For instance, Daniel Compagnon observed that most governments under such a system tend to be characterized by "authoritarian rule, low levels of institutionalization of political processes (including decision making). Although a significant number of countries are affected by various degrees of personal rule, this system has particularly been so common and the debate particularly significant for Uganda where, throughout the 1990s, the donor community expected that President Yoweri Museveni, who had embraced the

[1276] supra
[1277] Huntington, S.p., The Third wave: Democratization in the late Twentieth Century, Norman, University of Oklahoma press, 1991
[1278] Bratton, M. Van De Walle, N., Democratic experiments in Africa, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1997

neo-liberal economic reforms, would turn the country into Africa's Model of democratic success[1279]. Two decades later, the evidence suggests otherwise, as Museveni's leadership continues to evolve towards one-man rule. Thursday 10th September 2009 that marked the beginning of three dark days of riots within Kampala city and other parts of Buganda brought back the memories of the 1953 and 1966 post-colonial Kabaka riots which followed a respective course and beginning in two different ambits, i.e., the 1953 Kabaka crisis had a historical cause following the tears of Ugandans that said their words to Sir Andrew Cohen in January 1952 as Governor of Uganda. Its Cohen's Constitutional reforms that became incidental and paramount to the on set of the 1953 Kabaka crisis. Cohen tremendously increased African representation within the Ugandan Legislative Council and the Governor's Executive Council followed by negotiations with Muteesa II, several constitutional reforms were proposed for Buganda itself in March 1953 having a majority of elected members in the Lukiiko as well as transferring a number of services from the protectorate government to Buganda government. It was at this point that the secretary of state for colonies floated a new idea of a federation for East Africa in a speech he made in London in June 1953. The speeches gave bells of alarm that went viral within Buganda and escalated into strong protests from both the Lukiiko and the Kingdom. This reactive decision by the Buganda kingdom caused the Governor on 30th November 1953 to sign a declaration withdrawing the British recognition from Muteesa as the native ruler of Buganda under clause6 of the 1900 agreement and this immediately came with the interim deportation of the Kabaka something that caused rapid and unstopped riots, protests and hatred of the British among the Buganda and consequently led to the signing of the 1953 Namirembe agreement as an estoppel to the 1953 Kabaka crisis. It should also be noted that dramatic years between 1962 with the unpracticable independence constitution and 1966 with an interim constitution greatly increased worry coupled with agony among the Baganda within Buganda Kingdom that eventually ushered in the 1966 Kabaka crisis. The 1966 crisis can therefore be traced way back to the growing animosity between Buganda government and the central Government in the aftermath of the 1964 referendum on the lost counties and this was also reflected in the disputes before the courts in 1964 and 1965, further the growing suspicions and conspiracies during the period of 1965 and 1966 (including the Kabaka's relations with the P.M, the power struggles in UPC between Ibingira and Obote and the crossing of the floor by opposition MPs ensured that the country had by 1966 become a powder keg ready to explode. That the 1966 crisis occurred was the inevitable consequence of a series of events commencing in early 1960s. In January 1966, during a session of the National Assembly, a KY member of Parliament Daudi Ocheng alleged that the PM, Obote and his ministers Adoko Nekyon and Felix Onama and Idi [1279]Mwenda, A., "personalizing power in Uganda", Journal of democracy, Vol.18, N0.3, 2007. Page 23.

Amin were involved in illegal gold trading in the Congo (Zaire). This allegation was made while the PM was on tour in Northern Uganda and upon his return to Kampala, he caused the appointment of a judicial commission of inquiry into the matter. In February during a cabinet meeting in Entebbe, the P.M ordered the arrest of 5 ministers including Ibingira (resulting in the Ibingira and others case). In the same month of February 1966, the P.M suspended the 1962 independence constitution, citing that the country had lost stability and that certain individuals intended to overthrow the lawful government of Uganda. The role of cultural royalty such as the Kabaka in Uganda has been the source of debate historically. President Obote outlawed all cultural leaders in 1966, but Museveni permitted their return in 1995, under the constitution, cultural leaders are barred from politics, but they still wield influence over their communities. The Kabaka is the King of the Buganda Kingdom, the largest ethnic group in Uganda and a key constituency in the country to which many Buganda political leaders have argued that Buganda should a federal state within Uganda.

Ideally, it seems that both sides learnt nothing and forgot nothing from the history of the Pearl. The questions that emanate from the whole issue of the return of Buganda to prominence continue to haunt Uganda and Buganda partially. As usual, business was at a normal point in the country. Day for Buganda Youth Celebration was almost clocking. The Kabaka had portrayed interest in his ambition to celebrate the day from Bugerere a county of Buganda that settles in Kayunga District. Some members of the minority Banyara ethnic group led by a recently retired UPDF captain Kimezze declined the visit of the Kabaka alleging that he had to seek permission from them.[1280]

Their idea was that the Kabaka had no control over Bugerere and it seems quite clear that these people wanted to secede from Buganda. The history about the Banyara has it that they were as a result of intermarriages between the Baganda and the Banyoro supported by the British. Their history or origin is traced from the wars of Buganda against Banyoro before 1900. Namuyonjo late king Kamurasi's son rebelled against his father in 1800 and allied with the Kabaka of Buganda king Mwanga II. Because Buganda was at loggerheads with Banyoro, Mwanga welcomed him. As a token of appreciation, Kabaka gave Namuyonjo control over the captured county of Bugerere which had been previously occupied by Bunyoro. But due to the flies known as "embwa", he didn't occupy the region not until the British flushed out flies.

The Banyara had no kingship. They were organized into clan's system led by the head of a clan. It's the clan heads who chose among themselves one person to lead them who was known as the "Omugabe" who represented the Banyara in Bunyoro. These Banyara are in three types. The "Bagele" who were under Bunyoro in Bugerere. The "Bagambayi" who came to Bugerere with [1280] Charles Juuko. Uganda : Banyara choose army officer as king. New Vision.

Namuyonjo when Bugerere became part of Buganda and the last are the "Batumbugulu" that came to Bugerere long after Namuyonjo had overthrown Mukongo.

The Baganda found no convincing reason why the king had to seek permission in order to visit his region. Indeed, the long hidden silent conflict between the kingdom and the NRM government was to explode into a high intensified riot that saw many lose their lives and others facing imprisonment. On the 10th of September 2009, the Katikiro of Buganda (the prime minister of Buganda) Owek. J.B. Walusimbi was blocked by security from proceeding to Kayunga district to organize a "bulungibwans" function where the Kabaka was to be the chief guest.[1281]

According to the central government, the Kabaka had not sought permission from the king of the Banyara, Major Baker Kimezze and this came at a time when the president complained that the Kabaka was not picking his calls and as well as NRM accusing Mengo of hosting mainly opposition politicians on CBS radio to undermine the government. The Baganda saw this as an attempt by the central government to undermine the institution of the Kabakaship by sponsoring breakaway kingdoms.[1282]

This simmering friction between the central government and the kingdom exploded into a bloody violence. The Kabaka's supporters took to the streets to protest the government action of undermining the kingship, they burned debris in the roads, blocking traffic and throwing rocks.[1283]The Mengo royalists opened battles with the military and it's said that a number of people around 40 of them lost lives. There were also targeted beatings by the loyalists to the people who looked like westerners because they could not sing the Buganda anthem or pronounce some Luganda words correctly like omufaliso (mattress).

Indeed, violence intensified in every part of Buganda. The government shut down the kingdoms radio station CBS and three others in a major clamp down. The riots spread to Kampala, Mukono, Mpigi, Kayunga and Masaka. On the night of September 12th 2009, the army occupied and surrounded the Kabaka's palace in Kireka upon information that the Kabaka was determined to visit Bugerere come what may. Ideally it was hard to believe how a mere army serving military personnel in Uganda National Army could raise a claim to be the king of the Banyara. Surpringly, his claim was complicated by the fact that his own family disowned him and re-asserted that they were Baganda Buganda refused to recognize him as the king since they had various channels through which it recognizes the Banyara.

An emergency report from Buganda portrayed the long hidden hatred between the two factions. In their report, the committee stated that the conflict was due to the government's intent to completely

[1281]AmonKatungulu. Restoration of Kingdoms was a mistake Ugandans are paying for. Feb.14th 2019
[1282]"Kampala Hit by Renewed violence BBC news" Retrieved 25t May 2021. Also see www.news.bbc.co.uk.
[1283] Uganda: Investigate 2009 Kampala Riots killings. Sept 10th 2010 find it on www.hrw.org

monopolise the oil and other mineral resources over the rights of the native communities that live on the ground. In their report, they claimed, they claimed that the Ugandan government strategy is to have complete political control over the land and minerals including weakening or usurpation of the claims made by native communities.[1284]In their report, they stated that the government has proceeded to create by ceremonious recognition, claims to chieftaincy by any person no matter how remote in the region of Buganda and that once the claim is recognized, the eternally grateful chiefdom will then be more than willing to allow government access to its resources. To them this was intended to weaken the strong kingdom by the government as well as taking over Buganda's land for the benefit of the big fish in government. The violence was not to end until the meeting was held between Kabaka and the president at state house Entebbe on condition that the Kabaka was to visit Bugerere upon complete end of the meeting.

Indeed, this was the first hostile test of the unachievable separation of culture from politics. Buganda was the centers for the independence of Uganda; its contribution is greatly recognized therefore its roots had been fixed in politics. It therefore seems hard to separate it from politics and a failure to maintain a balanced wheel was to escalate into increased misunderstandings between Buganda and the central government. The Baganda continued to demand for federal from the central government. But this has remained impossible since the central government is settled in the region of Buganda. No one can determine when the silent conflict may be culminated following other events then later occurred.

CAUSES & EFFECTS OF THE UNQUENCHEABLE BUGANDA QUESTION

In his press release as earlier on discussed and entitled 'Katikkiro's press release' by ENG.J. B Walusimbi, he clearly postulates the two major causes were the Banyalas' leader rejection of the Kabaka's authority, police blockage of a delegation representing the Buganda kingdom from visiting Kayunga District &effects of the 2009 Kabaka crisis were vividly made visible that President Museveni and his allies within the military played a key role in the suppression of the 2009 Buganda riots. On 10th September 10, 2009, the police blocked a delegation representing the Buganda king (Kabaka) from visiting Kayunga district, a contested land between the Buganda kingdom and the Banyala (a small minority tribe). Because of historical tensions between the tribes, the leaders of the Banyala vehemently opposed the Kabaka's visit, President Museveni whose government has for long been at loggerheads with the Buganda kingdom, issued a decree banning the kin from visiting the contested district. This provoked anger from the King's followers who took on the streets to protest, attracting a backlash from security forces. The president once more deployed the special Forces under the command of his son Lt.Col. Muhoozi Kainerugaba and his cousin Maj. Sabiiti Magyenyi. During the two-day protest, the military frequently used unnecessary lethal force, killing 40 people indiscriminately, at times in areas where there were no signs of riot activities. The Central government's intervention to block the Buganda King from visiting his people consequently led to the violation of his fundamental right of liberty as enshrined under Article 23 that guarantees the right to personal liberty and illustrated within the case of Ochieng Vs Uganda (1969) E.A.1, in which the high court of Uganda that failure to give a substantial explanation for denial or detention amounts to infringement of a person's right to liberty.

[1284] Buganda Emergency Response Committee Friday, September 11th, 2009. Also find it at www.Buganda.com

The violation of the Kabaka's right to liberty was resultantly followed by an intense violation of people's right to life as envisaged under Article 22(1) of the 1995 Ugandan Constitution that no person shall be derived of life intentionally except by execution of a sentence passed by a fair trial by court of a competent jurisdiction in respect of a criminal offence under the laws of Uganda and the conviction and sentence have been affirmed by the highest appellate court. This was a settled position of the law under the case of Susan Kigula & 416 ors Vs AG Constitutional Petition N0.6 of 2003, in which court affirmed that no other person or arm of government has the capacity except court with a conviction execution order. Its therefore evident from the course of the 2009 Kabaka crisis that during the two-day protest, the military frequently used unnecessary lethal force, killing 40 people indiscriminately, at times in areas where there were no signs of riot activities. This was a testimony within the words of then Inspector of Police, Kayihura who said that seven of the 27 reported killed during the riots weren't involved within the riots at the time of their deaths, and they hit by "stray bullets". He told the Human Rights Watch that the deaths were unfortunate and regrettable, but that the security forces had shown restraint in their response to the unrest. He that two Policemen had been arrested for shooting in the air in Kasubi (the arrests appear unrelated to the death of Kababsinguzi one of the victims).It's also evident from Articles written by different eye witnesses that when the Kabaka's determination to visit Kayunga no matter the odds got expressly manifested, the Army surrounded his palace in Kireka on the night of September 12 & over 500people were arrested I various parts of Buganda, a police station was burnt to ashes and a police officer got shot and injured in the leg while a female police officer got sexually assaulted. A journalist Kalungi Serumaga was abducted by state agents as he left WBS TV talk show where he had disclosed the riots. His host Kibaazo was consequently suspended from the station. Kyaddondo south MP Issa Kikungue was arrested on suspicion that he was a ring leader of the riots. During the 2009 Kayunga Crisis, most of the 88people injured and were admitted to Mulago Hospital had gunshot wounds. There were many more admitted to other hospitals. This is what sources talking to

Human Rights Watch (HRW) say masiro burning during the 2009 Kabaka crisis

The 2009 Kabaka crisis also exposed the incompetence of various government organs and agencies. Along with the promises by public officials in the days following the riots to investigate the deaths, on September 30, 2009 the deputy speaker of parliament ordered the parliamentary Committee on Defense and internal Affairs to investigate the unrests and issue a report within two weeks. Committee members scheduled visits to affected neighborhoods, but ultimately no such visits took place. Committee members interviewed by Human Rights Watch said that their efforts were deliberately frustrated by government officials who wanted to avoid further discussion of what had transpired. One year later, the committee hasn't summoned a single witness to give evidence and no report was issued. This consequently exposed the incompetence of investigating parliamentary committees and intensified the influence of the executive arm of government into other arms of government.

The military and Police blockage of the Kabaka from accessing his people in Kayunga provoked anger from the King's followers who took on the streets to protest, attracting a backlash from security forces. This in turn intensified the 2009 Kabaka crisis as it led to the massive destructive of property within Kampala and in other parts of Buganda. This included destruction of economic & administrative structures ranging from Petrol Stations to Police stations. This followed the suppression of the press within Buganda i.e., the closure of its radio station CBS FM, something that has heightened to the unnecessary chaos and tension was implication and clear infringement of the people's right to freedom of speech and expression as enshrined under Article 29 of the 1995 Uganda Constitution. Such fundamental human rights as enshrined under charter4 of the Constitution as inherent and not provided for by the state. This was anonymously emphasized and stressed by the Ugandan Courts under the case, Charles Onyango Obbo & Andrew Mujjuni Mwenda Vs Attorney General Constitutional Appeal N0.2 of 2002, in which the petitioners challenged the legality of Section 50 (1) of the Penal Code Act, which the appellants claimed in the petition as being unconstitutional, that provides that any person who publishes any false statement, rumor or report which is likely to cause fear and alarm to the public or disturb the public peace is guilty of a misdemeanor. The learned Justices recognized the Constitutional protection of that freedom under Article 29 (1) and the limitation placed on that freedom by Article 43 (1) but, again, with respect they were more concerned with the limitation under Article 43 (1) than with the provisions of Article 43 (2) (c). The learned Commissioner put it rightly that clauses (1) and (2) of Article 43 should be read together with Article 29 (1), but with respect, court was unable to accept his argument that the test of what is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in free and democratic society must be a subjective one. And to their mind, the justices contended that the test must conform with what is universally accepted to be a democratic society. Secondly, the preamble to the Constitution recalls the history of Uganda as characterized by political and constitutional instability; recognizes the people's struggle against the forces of tyranny, oppression and exploitation and says that the people of Uganda are committed to building a better future by establishing, through a popular and durable constitution based on the principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and progress. There is no slightest doubt that when the framers of the Constitution committed the people of Uganda to building a democratic society, they did not mean democracy according to the standard of Uganda with all that it entails. Court therefore wasn't satisfied that the respondent established that the limitations placed on the enjoyment of the freedom of expression and the press, guaranteed by Article 29 (1) (a) of the Constitution by section 50 of the Penal Code Act is not beyond what is acceptable and demonstrably justified in a democratic society. Consequently S.50 of the PCA was at the level of its inconsistency struck down in promotion of people's expression of the right of speech and therefore the 2009 Kayunga that involved killings of rioters and blocking of the Kabaka to access his people was a prominent& incidental violence of fundamental Human rights enshrined under Charter4 of the 1955 Ugandan Constitution.

The historical fragile relationship between the central government and Buganda kingdom also greatly contributed the 2009 Kabaka crisis. Following former years of 1960- 1966, Buganda had had wanted federal position within Uganda and boasted over the privileged recognition by the colonialists. It was therefore not long when the British left the issues of Uganda to be governed by Ugandans, something that ushered in the independence constitution of 1962 in which Buganda celebrated a lot attachments and benefits causing the then prime minister Obote as the ruler to abolish the constitution, this caused anger among most Buganda and consequently led to the 1966 Kabaka crisis. Prior to 1966, in 1953, Buganda had protested over the federation arrangements with the central government that sought Uganda to combined with other East African countries, this was through a speech made by the governor of colonies within London. This consequently led to the withdraw of the Kabaka's recognition that was granted by the 1900 agreement with the British and result into the deportation of the Kabaka. This tigered anger among the Baganda and led the 1953 Kabaka crisis. Thus, Because of historical tensions between the central government the tribes, the leaders of the Banyala vehemently opposed the Kabaka's visit, President Museveni whose government has for long been at loggerheads with the Buganda kingdom, issued a decree banning the king from visiting the contested district. This provoked anger from the King's followers who took on the streets to protest, attracting a backlash from security forces. The president once more deployed the special Forces under the command of his son Lt.Col. Muhoozi Kainerugaba and his cousin Maj. Sabiiti Magyenyi thus intensifying the 2009 riots.

C O U R S E

President Museveni and his allies within the military played a key role in the suppression of the 2009 Buganda riots. On 10th September 10, 2009, the police blocked a delegation representing the Buganda king (Kabaka) from visiting Kayunga district, a contested land between the Buganda kingdom and the Banyala (a small minority tribe). Because of historical tensions between the tribes, the leaders of the Banyala vehemently opposed the Kabaka's visit, President Museveni whose government has for long been at loggerheads with the Buganda kingdom, issued a decree banning the king from visiting the contested district[1285]. This provoked anger from the King's followers who took on the streets to protest, attracting a backlash from security forces. The president once more deployed the special Forces under the command of his son Lt.Col. Muhoozi Kainerugaba and his cousin Maj. Sabiiti Magyenyi[1286]. During the two-day protest, the military frequently used unnecessary lethal force, killing 40 people indiscriminately, at times in areas where there were no signs of riot activities. Further examples of the above were statements of Lt. Col. Muhoozi, the President's son, regarding the 2011 presidential election, in which he warned the opposition through the government owned newspaper, the New Vision, "that he is ready to clash with any opposition groups that want to destabilize the country during the polls". His warning followed that of the then chief Defense Forces Gen. Aronda Nyakairima who had that the army isn't ready to accept "bad characters" to take over power from president Museveni and that the UPDF would "step in to crush opposition politicians" who engage in demonstrations[1287]Thursday 10th September 2009 that marked the beginning of three dark days of riots within Kampala city and other parts of Buganda is therefore one of the consequential uprisings within Buganda against the central government and thus, the fiction which had been simmering between the Kabaka of Buganda Ronald Mutebi, the central government and the leader of the Banyala in Kayunga who was trying to 'secede' from Buganda, exploded into a bloody violence when Buganda' Prime Minister John Baptist Walusimbi was blocked by armed police officers and the army from accessing Kayunga, the prime Minister's major objective within Kayunga seemed clear to the point of organizing and preparing for the Kabaka's scheduled visit to mark the kingdom's annual youth day. In his press release entitled 'Katikkiro's press release' by ENG.J. B Walusimbi, he clearly postulated that in the year 2008 the kingdom of Buganda decided to hold the annual Youth Day celebrations for 2009 in Bugerere County following the successful celebrations held in Kyaggwe County. The objective of the celebrations, which are presided over by SsaabasajjaKabaka, is to rally the youth to engage in social and economically developmental activities as well as to promote cultural values. He also noted saying, "the kingdom regrets that this year's celebrations have been unduly politicized", he further claimed that Kabaka's visit to Bugerere is lawful and constitutional and the reasons being given for blocking the Kabaka and the Katikkiro from accessing Bugerere are completely unfounded. The kingdom recognizes the cultural and ethnic diversity of its people which is clearly demonstrated within the composition of its cabinet and Lukiiko, he added stating that the county of Bugerere comprises of several ethnic communities including the Bakenye, Basoga, Bagishu, Baluuli, Baganda, Japadhola, Iteso, Sudanese & the kuku to which all ethnicities have been living harmoniously until the recent creation of the institution of the "Sabanyala". The kingdom of Buganda deeply regrets the loss of life and destruction of property that followed the refusal of the Katikkiro to access Bugerere, abhors the closure of its radio station CBS FM, something that has heightened to the unnecessary chaos and tension. The Kingdom of Buganda remains committed to fostering peace, justice and the harmonious co-existence of all the people of Uganda, remaining very resolute in our peaceful and democratic quest for the realization of our legitimate aspirations for a federal system of governance for the whole of Uganda and the unconditional return of our expropriated properties. The Kingdom has always been willing to engage in principled, transparent and constructive dialogue with the government and all other communities of Uganda to ensure our peaceful co- existence for the future and to which dialogue ought to be structured, time bound, free of intimidation and based on mutual respect.

[1285]Ssekika.E., "Museveni to Mengo: I will cut off your", The Observer, Kampala, 14th June 2010
[1286] Ibid.
[1287]Byenkya. A "Army to work with police to quell poll violence- Muhoozi, New Vision, February 2011.

A lot has changed since the September 10, 2009, Buganda riots, yet the shadow of what led to the deadly incidents still looms large. The riots, exactly eight years ago, happened when state machinery was deployed to block a Buganda kingdom delegation led by the then Katikkiro (prime minister) JB Walusimbi from visiting Bugerere County (Kayunga district). Kabaka Muwenda Mutebi II was due to visit the area, a move that had been opposed by sections of the Banyala, the incident was the peak of a very bad relationship characterized by distrust between Buganda's Mengo based government the president Museveni-led government. While the 2009 events happened during his reign, Mr. Walusimbi's appointment had, observers opine that it was a try to calm down the flaring tempers on both ends. His predecessor Daniel Muliika had openly been anti Museveni to the point of backing Dr. Kizza Besigye's 2006 presidential bid.

Its therefore vividly clear from Katikirro Walusumbi's press release that the 2009 Kabaka crisis was a clash between the central government and the Buganda Kingdom that escalated and exploded into a bloody violence leading to a siege and shut down of the Kingdom's Radio Station CBS to which protests and riots spread to Kampala, Mukono, Mpigi, Kayunga and Masaka. It's also evident from Articles written by different eye witnesses that when the Kabaka's determination to visit Kayunga no matter the odds got expressly manifested, the Army surrounded his palace in Kireka on the night of September 12& over 500 people were arrested I various parts of Buganda, a police station was burnt to ashes and a police officer got shot and injured in the leg while a female police officer got sexually assaulted. A journalist Kalungi Serumaga was abducted by state agents as he left WBS TV talk show where he had disclosed the riots. His host Kibaazo was consequently suspended from the station. Kyaddondo south MP Issa Kikungue was arrested on suspicion that he was a ring leader of the riots. During the 2009 Kayunga Crisis, most of the 88 people injured and were admitted to Mulago Hospital had gunshot wounds. There were many more admitted to other hospitals. This is what sources talking to Human Rights Watch (HRW) say. HRW complains in its September 10, 2014 report titled "Uganda: 5years on, No Justice for protest killings" that the Uganda government has failed to deliver justice for it victimized during the Kayunga crisis. Maria Burnette, Senior HRW Researcher, says that this a serious disregard for the rule of law and a government unconcerned about people's lives. HRW says it investigated 13cases in which Police and the military shot through closed doors with clear knowledge that there were occupants on the other side and killed the occupants. Ndeeba is one area where HRW documented repeated cases of such indiscriminate shootings. HRW interviewed many victims and relatives one of who was Magidu Kayizzi. Kayizzi's older son died of a gunshot wound and government forces beat his younger son to death to which Kayizzi filed a civil law suit against Kale Kayihura, Police Inspector General and Uganda's Attorney General. He sought compensation for the wrongful deaths of his sons. "Deplorable", said the judge regarding the Police actions, damages were awarded money to Kayizzi but the Uganda Government never paid to the victim.

In contrast, according to the HRW, the Police response to protesters alleged wrongdoing was overwhelming. Over 850 protestors were charged with such crimes as unlawful assembly, inciting violence and dramatically others were charged with terrorism. They were later acquitted, but not before spending three maximum security prison thus, while dismissing the terrorism charge, the judge labeled the Police investigation "incurably tainted, rendering the prosecution a nullity."

THE POLICE EXPLANATION:

The then Police Inspector General, Kayihura told Human Rights Watch that the Police lacked capacity to respond to the speed geographical breadth of the events of September 10. Unrests in previous years had centered on Kampala's Central Business District and hadn't extended into populous residential neighborhoods. He said that Uganda's military police, the presidential Guard Brigade and regular army units had both the equipment and the mobility to respond to the unrests. He said that the military Police like the civilian Police, have had training in riot control and that the armored personnel carriers were deployed to help move units around the suburbs where riots were taking place. He said the Uganda military possesses four of these vehicles; two Gila and two mamba anti-riot vehicles, which can also be used for "fighting terrorism and insurgency".

Kayihura said that seven of the 27 reported killed during the riots weren't involved within the riots at the time of their deaths, and they hit by "stray bullets". He told the Human Rights Watch that the deaths were unfortunate and regrettable, but that the security forces had shown restraint in their response to the unrest. He that two Policemen had been arrested for shooting in the air in Kasubi (the arrests appear unrelated to the death of Kababsinguzi one of the victims). He said that investigations would be conducted into the circumstances of all the deaths during the riots, but also cited S.69 of the Penal Code Act which states that the police may use all such forces as is reasonably necessary for overcoming a riot and Police shall not be liable in any criminal or civil proceeding for having, by the use of such force, caused harm or death to any person.

According to statements quoted in the New Vision newspaper by the army spokesman, Lt. Col. Felix Kulayigye, military units were deployed under Article 209(b) of the constitution, which states that the Uganda Peoples Defense Forces shall cooperate with the civilian authority in emergency situations and that once deployed, they act under orders of the Inspector General of Police. Kulayige contended that the situation was "a war" and that the riots had had genocidal tendencies. He placed the blame for the deaths on the alleged organizers of the riots but admitted that the moment the bullet leaves the barrel, anything could happen beyond there. Human Rights Watch also contended and deeply got concerned that Kulayige's statements could encourage members of the security forces to use unnecessary and unlawful lethal force during future encounters with demonstrators. Museveni told an emergency session of parliament on September 15 that the government will compensate those who lost their properties and vehicles and it will assist those who lost family members, however, the Human Rights Watch did recommend that the government of Uganda should publicly acknowledge and condemn recent shootings of unarmed people by members of the security forces, undertake an independent and impartial investigation into the actions of all soldiers and police alleged to have perpetrated human rights abuses during the September riots, prosecute those against whom there is sufficient evidence in accordance with international fair trial standards, issue clear public instructions to all government forces involved in policing to use lethal force only when strictly unavoidable to protect human life, seek out non-lethal options for police and military responding to demonstrations and protests, and ensure those options are standard issue for police stations.

PUBLIC OPINION:

In 2013, long before the Kasese clashes that left more than 100 people dead, Rona Peligal, then Africa Director at Human Rights Watch, had warned of future consequences if those who killed people weren't brought to justice. No member of the security forces that included Police, military Police, regular army and special Forces Command (then presidential Guard Brigade) who deployed on the streets during the three days of unrest has ever been prosecuted for their role in the killings. A parliamentary investigation too was scuttled or to say the least, never took off. Reflecting on the eight years since, he scoffs at an idea of the report on the killings saying the perpetrators are known. "if you have a dishonest leader like [president] Museveni all you can do is to tread with caution and wait for him to go", he said in an interview. Attempts have been made since the rots to mend fences between the central government and particularly President Museveni one hand, the Mengo establishment, and Kabaka Mutebi on the other. The appointment of Charles Peter Mayiga as Buganda Katikkiro in May 2013 was misread by many who thought he would take a radical stance that he had been perceived to take when he was the kingdom information minister, they were wrong. He has instead taken over from where his predecessor stopped and moved to further diminish the tensions between Mengo and the Central government, at least publicly. Shortly after Mr. Mayiga's appointment, a memorandum of understanding was signed between President Museveni and Kabaka Mutebi at state house, Entebbe. Several other initiatives between government and Mengo happened on the positive but not without any glitches. Katikkiro Mayiga says the issues that led to the 2009 conflict have been partially resolved. He cites the example of the Kabaka being able move freely in his kingdom without hindrance by the state. On the 2009 incident, specifically, he cites the thorny issue in Bugerere which he says the central government must take active steps to resolve. "Baker Kimeze purports to have a chiefdom in Bugerere, which whereas it is farcical, creates unnecessary acrimony. He occasionally lays claim to administrative headquarters and parcels of land", Mr. Mayiga says. "So far, the tragic events of September 2009 stand to symbolize entrenched impunity and the curtailment of free expression in Uganda" Peligal said as Uganda heads into elections in early 2011, the government needs to transparent investigations into official misconduct and to free speech. The demand for fundamental human rights is therefore an international drastic campaign as envisaged in The Supreme Court of Canada which upheld the view in R vs. Zundel (1992) 10 C.C.R. (2rd) 193. McLachlan J., as she then was, writing the majority judgment, had this to say,

"Tests of free expression frequently involve a contest between the (majority) view of what is true or right and an unpopular minority view. As Holmes J. stated over 60 years ago, the fact that the particular content of a person's speech might "excite popular prejudice" is no reason to deny it protection for "if there is any principle of the Constitution that more imperatively call for attachment than any other it is the principle of free thought not free thought for those who agree with us but freedom for the thought that we hate ". Thus, the guarantee of freedom of expression serves to preclude the majority's perception of truth or public interest from smothering the minority's perception."

And similarly, in Rangarajan vs. Jagjivan Ram and Others; Union of India and Others vs. Jagvan Ram and Others (1990) LRC (Const.) 412, the Supreme Court of India put the point this way, at page 427

"There does indeed have to be a compromise between the interest of freedom of expression and social interest. But we cannot simply balance the two interests as if they were of equal weight. Our commitment to freedom of expression demands that it cannot be suppressed unless the situations created by allowing the freedom are pressing and the community interest is endangered. The anticipated danger should not be remote, conjectural or farfetched. It should be proximate and (have) direct nexus with the expression. The expression of thought should be intrinsically dangerous to the public interests. In other words, the expression should be inseparably locked up with the action contemplated like the equivalent of a 'spark in a powder keg'. "

This was anonymously emphasized and stressed by the Ugandan Courts under the case, Charles Onyango Obbo& Andrew Mujjuni Mwenda Vs Attorney General Constitutional Appeal N0.2 of 2002, in which the petitioners challenged the legality of Section 50 (1) of the Penal Code Act, which the appellants claimed in the petition as being unconstitutional, that provides that any person who publishes any false statement, rumor or report which is likely to cause fear and alarm to the public or disturb the public peace is guilty of a misdemeanor. The learned Justices recognized the Constitutional protection of that freedom under Article 29 (1) and the limitation placed on that freedom by Article 43 (1) but, again, with respect they were more concerned with the limitation under Article 43 (1) than with the provisions of Article 43 (2) (c). The learned Commissioner put it rightly that clauses (1) and (2) of Article 43 should be read together with Article 29 (1), but with respect, court was unable to accept his argument that the test of what is acceptable and demonstrably justifiable in free and democratic society must be a subjective one. And to their mind, the justices contended that the test must conform with what is universally accepted to be a democratic society. Secondly, the preamble to the Constitution recalls the history of Uganda as characterized by political and constitutional instability; recognizes the people's struggle against the forces of tyranny, oppression and exploitation and says that the people of Uganda are committed to building a better future by establishing, through a popular and durable constitution based on the principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and progress. There is no slightest doubt that when the framers of the Constitution committed the people of Uganda to building a democratic society, they did not mean democracy according to the standard of Uganda with all that it entails. Court therefore wasn't satisfied that the respondent established that the limitations placed on the enjoyment of the freedom of expression and the press, guaranteed by Article 29 (1) (a) of the Constitution by section 50 of the Penal Code Act is not beyond what is acceptable and demonstrably justified in a democratic society. Consequently S.50 of the PCA was at the level of its inconsistency struck down in promotion of people's expression of the right of speech and therefore the 2009 Kayunga that involved killings of rioters and blocking of the Kabaka to access his people was a prominent& incidental violence of fundamental Human rights enshrined under Charter4 of the 1955 Ugandan Constitution. Thus, the year 2009 wasn't all that gloomy for monarchists. The people of Rwenzori celebrated when the government allowed their king, Wesley Mumbere, to be crowned a traditional ruler of the Rwenzururu on October 19 after more than four decades of waiting.

However, it should be noted that the use of the army to suppress and control social dilemmas and fight political opponents is a common practice under the Museveni regime. 1999, President Museveni responded that the army will have no role to play once the country moves to embrace multiparty politics. In Museveni's view, army representatives in parliament were there as "listening posts for the army in the world of politics. He further argued that they aren't supposed to take part in "controversial issues, parliament being the center of controversies". Museveni then explained that this situation was only possible under the movement one party system of governance because I multiparty politics it would involve the army in partisan politics. The discussion covered in the previous section has already shown that this has not been the case. This is further developed below.

In Uganda, several incidents have shown that the military apparatus has been used to arrest opposition members and human rights activists. In some instances, military officers' carryout the "arrest wearing civilian clothes with no identifying insignia and do not inform suspects of the reasons for their arrest. The agents force suspects into unmarked cars, blindfolded and handcuffed, and take them to the Joint Anti-Terrorism Task Force(JATT) headquarters in Kololo, a rich suburb of Kampala. Many are taken to military intelligence headquarters in Kiante for further brutal interrogations", the use of the military to intimidate and harass those opposed to the president was captured by a select committee of parliament of the Republic of Uganda in 2002. The committee issued a report accusing the military of being the lead agent of poll violence.

One of the ways in which the president was able to implement a repressive electoral regime against the opposition was through family members serving in the security forces, which played a key role in politicizing the military. For instance, on April 11, 2010, a group calling itself Activists for change (A4C) organized a demonstration, which was quickly joined by opposition politicians-keen to exploit it for their political motives. The demonstration was sparked off by concerns over rising motives. The demonstration was sparked off by concerns over rising commodity prices. With speculation circulating that it could turn into an Egypt-style kind of revolution, the president deployed the special Forces commanded by his son. This elite unit considered the engine of the Uganda military relied on extreme force to suppress the protest, resulting in the death of over ten people. Second, Museveni and his allies in the military also played a key role in the suppression of the 2009 Buganda riots. On September 10, 2009, the police blocked a delegation representing the Buganda king (Kabaka) from visiting Kayunga district, contested land between the Buganda kingdom and the Banyala (a small minority tribe). Because of historical tensions between the two tribes the leaders of the Banyala vehemently opposed the Kabaka's visit. President Museveni, whose government has for long been at loggerheads with the Buganda kingdom, issued a decree banning the king from visiting the contested district. This provoked anger from the king's followers who later took to the streets to protest, attracting a backlash from security forces. The president once more deployed the special Forces under the command of his son Lt.Col. Muhoozi Kainerugaba and his cousin Maj. Sabiiti Magyenyi. During the two-day protest, the military frequently used unnecessary lethal force, killing 40 people indiscriminately, at times in areas where there were no signs of riot activists.

Further examples of the above are the statements of Lt.Col. Muhoozi, the President's son, regarding the 2o11 presidential election, in which he warned the opposition through the government-owned newspaper, the New Vision, that he is ready to clash with any opposition groups "that want to destabilize the country during the polls" His warning followed that of the then Chief of Defense Forces Gen. Aronda Nyakairima who had had stated that the army isn't ready to accept "bad characters" to take over power from President Museveni and that UPDF would "step in to crush opposition politicians" who engage in demonstrations. Any serious discussion on the role of security agencies in perpetuating incumbency cannot go short of analyzing the role intelligence networks play for Museveni's political survival. Building on the categorization of surveillance under low-intensity coercion, I delve into how such surveillance acts and intelligence networks that are spread throughout the country monitor opposition party activities and utilize information for regime political survival. At the national level, such intelligence agencies include Internal Security Organization (ISO), External Security Organization (ESO), Chieftaincy of military Intelligence (CMI) among others. These three are counter-intelligence agencies established under an Act of parliament-The Security Organization Act 1987. Their functions include assessing internal and external security threats, military intelligence gathering, espionage among others. These intelligence organizations have in the past been headed by army historical and regime loyalists like Gen. Elly Tumwine, Gen. David Sejusa, Lt. Gen. Henry Tumukunde, Maj. Gen. Jim Muhwezi and others that fought the guerrilla war. They are thus, crucial for regime protection and monitoring all actors that pose a threat to Museveni incumbency.

In the guise of national security, security agencies have been used to spy, obtain information and curtail activities of actors that challenge Museveni's incumbency. The mandate of obtaining information for national security can be used for regime political mileage. Human rights report in recent years have implicated these intelligence agencies in for example using treason to isolate political opponents. Even before the passing of the Regulation of Interception of Communications Bill 2010 (popularly known as the phone tapping law), the government admitted tapping phones of prominent Ugandans. Although the law was intended to enable intelligence and security officials access private communication for security purposes, it has been used for curtailing political space, personal and non-security purposes. At the district level, Resident District Commissioners (RDCs) and their deputies are appointed by the regime in each district to oversee security, gather intelligence and monitor other government programs. Some of these RDCs are ruling party cadres and war veterans some of whom former fighters in the struggle that brought Museveni to power. RDCs are assisted by District Internal Security Officers (DISOs), also appointed by the ruling party. RDCs & DISOs oversee security, gather information using informants and volunteers and are also on record of deliberate sabotage of opposition party activities like denying opposition figures access to local radio stations in the districts where they're posted.

Regime intelligence structures in Uganda are also spread to the lowest Parish and village levels. At sub county or Gombolola level, there are Gombolola Intelligence Security Officers (GISOs) who are local natives and therefore understand the dynamics their regions. At Parish level, there are Parish Internal Security Officers (PISOs) who assist the regime in security and intelligence gatherings. Final at the bottom of the local government structure is Local Councils (LCI and II). These maintain law and order, gather and disseminate security information. LCs also recommend to the army and police potential recruits. In discussing ways through which security forces in Uganda sustain the Museveni regime and consolidate power, I discuss three major events/ issues that have in the recent past threatened Museveni's incumbency and explain how high and low-intensity coercion has been used by the security forces to protect the regime. These events are first, elections, second walk-to-work protests of 2011 and third Buganda riot demonstrations of 2009. These events not only offer great insight on the security forces' willingness to clamp down on any opposition to incumbent rule but also, they help answer one central questions. I.e., How do security agencies in Uganda sustain the Museveni regime and grip on power? Finally, I now discuss the 2009 Buganda riots which were sparked off by Police blockage of Buganda kingdom officials led by premier John Baptist Walusimbi. The Buganda kingdom officials planned to visit Kayunga. The Uganda riots in away re-opened an old rivalry of the central Government versus Buganda that dates back to the first post-independence government of executive prime minister Milton Obote and ceremonial president Edward Mutesa II. This culminated into the 1966 invasion of the king's palace by the military and his subsequent fleeing to exile in London. The state's reaction to the riots that took place in Buganda strongholds and Kampala specifically (the administrative and commercial heart of the country) fits into the description of high-intensity coercion were police, military police and the army worked jointly to suppress the rioters. State employed its repressive machinery including Special Forces using lethal and indiscriminate force. The riots promoted a violent crackdown by the government, leaving at least 27 dead, 100 injured and 560 arrested. Drawing on the literature of incumbency advantages, other institutions in Uganda have aided security agencies in the regime protection agenda. For example, the passing of the controversial Public Management Act 2013 is a good example. Law making in Uganda, as some scholars have shown is used for regime survival purposes depending on the political climate of the time. The Public Order Management law empowers the police to regulate public meetings and in fact, several opposition party activities throughout the country have been blocked using the law. From the three illustrations above, my argument is that the regime has combined high and low intensity coercive measures to deal with actions that threaten Museveni's incumbency. In so doing, Ugandan elections since 2001 have recycled Museveni in power and even opposition protests have been dealt with using the regime's coercive capacity.

THE POLICE EXPLANATION

The then Police Inspector General, Kayihura told Human Rights Watch that the Police lacked capacity to respond to the speed geographical breadth of the events of September 10. Unrests in previous years had centered on Kampala's Central Business District and hadn't extended into populous residential neighborhoods. He said that Uganda's military police, the presidential Guard Brigade and regular army units had both the equipment and the mobility to respond to the unrests. He said that the military Police like the civilian Police, have had training in riot control and that the armored personnel carriers were deployed to help move units around the suburbs where riots were taking place. He said the Uganda military possesses four of these vehicles; two Gila and two mamba anti-riot vehicles, which can also be used for "fighting terrorism and insurgency".

Kayihura said that seven of the 27 reported killed during the riots weren't involved within the riots at the time of their deaths, and they hit by "stray bullets". He told the Human Rights Watch that the deaths were unfortunate and regrettable, but that the security forces had shown restraint in their response to the unrest. He that two Policemen had been arrested for shooting in the air in Kasubi (the arrests appear unrelated to the death of Kababsinguzi one of the victims). He said that investigations would be conducted into the circumstances of all the deaths during the riots, but also cited S.69 of the Penal Code Act which states that the police may use all such forces as is reasonably necessary for overcoming a riot and Police shall not be liable in any criminal or civil proceeding for having, by the use of such force, caused harm or death to any person.

According to statements quoted in the New Vision newspaper by the army spokesman, Lt. Col. Felix Kulayigye, military units were deployed under Article209(b) of the constitution, which states that the Uganda Peoples Defense Forces shall cooperate with the civilian authority in emergency situations and that once deployed, they act under orders of the Inspector General of Police. Kulayige contended that the situation was "a war" and that the riots had had genocidal tendencies. He placed the blame for the deaths on the alleged organizers of the riots but admitted that the moment the bullet leaves the barrel, anything could happen beyond there. Human Rights Watch also contended and deeply got concerned that Kulayige's statements could encourage members of the security forces to use unnecessary and unlawful lethal force during future encounters with demonstrators. Museveni told an emergency session of parliament on September 15 that the government will compensate those who lost their properties and vehicles and it will assist those who lost family members, however, the Human Rights Watch did recommend that the government of Uganda should publicly acknowledge and condemn recent shootings of unarmed people by members of the security forces, undertake an independent and impartial investigation into the actions of all soldiers and police alleged to have perpetrated human rights abuses during the September riots, prosecute those against whom there is sufficient evidence in accordance with international fair trial standards, issue clear public instructions to all government forces involved in policing to use lethal force only when strictly unavoidable to protect human life, seek out non-lethal options for police and military responding to demonstrations and protests, and ensure those options are standard issue for police stations.

THE KASUBI TOMBS CRISIS

In the aftermath of the 2009 Bugerere crisis, another shocking event that weakened the Baganda was witnessed. On March 16th 2010 at around 8:30pm, the Kasubi tombs were destroyed by fire.[1288]As already noted, the event occurred during the awkward relationship between the central government of Uganda and the kingdom particularly in light of the September 2009 riots. These tombs have deep spiritual political and religious significances for the Baganda. They hold or act as the burial grounds for the kings of Buganda.

The burning of 128-year-old tombs was a crisis for the Baganda. Immediately, following the unfortunate fire at the tombs, Kampala city was abound with questionable versions of the cause of the fire and some circles went on to speculate on the motive that the tombs had been set on fire by the government in a way of revenge following the 2009 riots. [1289]President Museveni hurried to make a move on a national television and issued a stern warning to those maligning his government and accusing it of being behind the fire at the tombs. But this seems to have confused the natives the more as to who actually torched the tombs. Most of them started to object the president's submissions.

On the 17th of March 2010, when the president visited the tombs, riots sprung in Kampala and in Kasubi. The rioters were expressing their dissatisfaction with the fact that the president was behind the whole issue. Two people were shot dead by the security forces in trying to end the riot. Majority sustained injuries others were arrested.[1290] In order to settle the matter, the kingdom called upon the masses to end the demonstrations. A commission of inquiry was set to investigate the fire outbreak which made a report that was handed over to the government in March 2011 but as of April 2012 it had not been released to the public[1291]. The government promised funds to finance the reconstruction but it is not clear whether they were delivered following Buganda construction of the tombs basing on the funds raised through the famous "Ttofaali" a fund rising mission created by the kingdoms prime minister.

Buganda's relationship with the central government has been rising into soures though it is silent, it remains in words among the natives. It can be justified as to whether everything that occurs to Buganda is as a result of the move by the central government but that has remained the saying due to the conflict between the two majorly upheld by the natives of Buganda.

THE THIRD KABAKA CRISIS

The third Kabaka crisis was an arousement of the masses in Buganda in reference to Uganda and was characterized with notions of both political, social and economically in nature but the all [1288] "UgandasKasubi Royal Tombs gutted by fire" BBC News 17th March 2020 . Retrieved 25th March 2021.

[1289]Katende. R.B. Kasubiburning:The untold story: The Independent March 30, 2010.
[1290] Fire burns Kasubi Royal Tombs again. Thursday July 25 2013. Daily Monitor.
[1291]Lubwama, Siraje.(15th April 2012) "Lawyers sue government over Kasubi Tombs Fire." The Observer (Uganda) Retrieved 25th May 2021.

situations was sparked off following the attributed presentation of the king of Buganda Kabaka Ronald MuwendaMutebi ii to the public is the vegetative state at his 66th birthday celebrations of Tuesday 13th April, 2021 at Bulange Mengo palace, Kabaka seemingly not to be fine with reference that he looked frail, and seemed to have lost weight that he even struggled so as to keep his eyes open and worth noting that his throat also looked struggling to take anything with the note of fact that even his speech was slurred with reference that was seen struggling to breath properly and also the noting in the cutting of his cake that made round on various social media platforms all seemed the fact that called for public attentions both in Uganda and the outside world but most especially Ugandans in the diaspora thus periods of anger among many Ugandans but most especially his subjects the Baganda.

But the lighting flames starting from way back of the indifferences between the kingdom of Buganda and the central government which was characterized with the demands of worth shs.20 billion but however living in a devastating state between the two, the attribute abs ensure of the king on the Masaza tournament cup finals and this for over a period of 28 years reign the king of Buganda Kabaka Ronald MuwendaMutebi ii had never missed presiding over at any premier kingdom's event that was the first time missing the ending of the Buganda sports tournament that's being referred to as the Masaza cup which finals were celebrated at St. Mary's Stadium Kitende, his absence at the kingdom's function portrayed the aspect that all was not well for this served the first time for the king himself to miss presiding over the ceremony an aspect which called upon public attention thus creating challenging periods within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

However, the third Kabaka crisis not to be confused with the earlier Kabaka crisis these including the 1953 and 1955 in which a period evolved and developed into a political and constitutional crisis in the Uganda protectorate where the king of Buganda pressed for Buganda secession from Uganda as a protectorate and therefore his attributes were subsequently deposed and exiled by the British governor Andrew Cohen. That was therefore followed by the Kabaka crisis, the 1966 Kabaka crisis that was stormed by the political differences and grievances that existed between the then king of Buganda Kabaka Mutessa II and the then prime minister of Uganda Dr. Milton Obote. The 1966 Kabaka crisis is also known by a number of attributes the including the 1966 Buganda crisis, the Mengo crisis of 1966 or the battle of Mengo hill and its actual root cause was the recognized falling out between Kabaka Mutesa and Obote the prime minister following the issue of the return of the lost counties these including Buyaga and Bugangaizi back to Bunyoro from Buganda thus situations leading to the culmination in the military assault.

Within the same aspect that history need be proved, by 1960 Milton Obote established political party named the Uganda people's congress which was aimed to enrich the powers and influence of the 'Mengo establishment' thus a group of well-organized and strong nationalists with Buganda that eventually led to the sub-nation kingdom of Buganda. The Mengo establishment was plugged by rivalries and infightings, but most of its members were proved to be the recognized protestant Christians and thus they were united by their approved dislike of the democratic party which was a broad based dominated by the recognized catholic society thus living in a political difference between the political parties with their different motives, aims and party goals.

As an astonishing political party, the Democratic Party (DP) worn a majority seats in Uganda's first free national elections in 1961 and thus formed the first recognized government. However, living in a discontent with the democratic party, the Uganda people's congress UPC together with the national traditional both living in state not to like the DP due to their catholic orientation measures, but were diametrically opposed to each other's ideas but quite an aspect that despite their different attributes politically, the (UPC) gave grace Ibingira, a believed conservative member of its ranks the responsibility of making contact with the Buganda for an alliance to so as to possibly unseat the DP political party. Being personally acquainted with the king of Buganda Kabaka mutes ii for both lived a respectable and friendly life thus favoring the attributed aspects to grace Ibingira.

However, following the astonishing misconceptions among political parties, following the several negotiations UPC and Buganda leaders agreed and held a conference were upon an agreement was reached and this afterwards created the known challenging party of Kabaka YEKKA a traditional party that entered an alliance with the UPC.

Its thus also worth noting that following the Uganda people's congress's UPC victory in the april 1962 general elections, Obote was tasked with forming the government and with this seeing him becoming the prime minister of the UPC-KY coalition government. The Kabaka YEKKA (KY) held mostly insignificant portfolios, while Obote as prime minister obtained control of security services and the armed forces too. Then one grace Ibingira became the recognized minister of justice and the prevailing aspects was followed by the attainment of the independence of Uganda from the colonial masters the United Kingdom dated on 9th October, 1962. In achieving the party success, by 1963 Kabaka Mutesa II was elected president of Uganda thus gained attributes of a legally ceremonial post and then Milton Obote was in support of his election with the back intentions of appeasing the Baganda population of which he scored luckily enough. This therefore put to light the attributes of Obote the prime minister and john Kakonge the then recognized leader of the Uganda people's congress UPC party.

Living in support by 1964, grace Ibingira initiated a struggle to gain control of the Uganda people's party (UPC) with the goal of deposing Obote from the party presidency and this was followed by the party conference in April in which he challenged john Kakonge for the secretarial general of the Uganda people's congress and convinced Obote that the one John Kakonge passed a threat to his leadership of the UPC and thus Grace Ibingira being sided by Milton Obote he succeeded with the majority votes (2 votes) thus out sitting John Kakonge and used his position to purge. However not forgetting the fact that politics was at its booming time, Kabaka Mutesa II feared that the DPC would deny his kingdom its traditional autonomy and concluded that to retain power he would have to retain the influence in national politics and hence proceeded to instruct Buganda members of parliament to join the UPC party so as to boast Ibingira's position and thus unseating Obote hence the re-orientation of the UPC-KY alliance thus improving his working relationship with KabakaMutesa II. This led Ibingira to a coalition of non-Baganda thus the southerners, dubbed the bantu group and within the same aspect Obote began appealing to DP members of parliament to defect and join his party in parliament of which he successfully did and by 24th august 1964 Obote together with upc having consolidated majority seats in parliament and declared that the coalition with the Kabaka YEKKA (KY) was dissolved.

By December 1964, grace Ibingira under the cover checking on his reach in Ankole, traveled to the united states so as to raise funds for his support in the Anti-socialist causes and upon his realm he expanded his opinions and by 1965 the apparent UPC had divided into an Ibingira-led wing and the other was the Obote-led wing and when Ibingira attempted to convince a UPC conference to his capacity as party society general, the aspect was shut down by the police.

It's also worth noting that Buganda kingdom was granted a federal autonym by the 1962 constitution but however not resolving the territorial disputes among the counties of both Buyaga and Bugangaizi both having annexed by Buganda kingdom from Bunyoro and that's around the 20th century with the attributed consent of the United Kingdom. However, Bunyoro aimed back her lost glories of the two lost counties thus Buyaga and Bugangaizi which were unfortunately had never been granted which was followed by the sparkling politics within Uganda in which Obote sought for support from the Bunyoro and his attributes were supported by his submitting of his bill on 25th august 1964 that was scheduled calling for the matter of lost counties to be settled through an organized referendum. Both Mutesa II and Obote having opposing attributes to each other in which the former held the two counties to be held by Buganda kingdom and the latter urged for taking back of the two counties back to Bunyoro kingdom and in order to sway the matter, Kabaka Mutesa ii organized his subjects to settle in the two counties and this was responded by Obote through decreeing that only persons registered for the 1962 elections could participate in the referendum.

The referendum was organized dated on 4th November, 1964 and the said county members chose by wide margin to return back to Bunyoro. However, the results of votes bolstered Obote's support in Bunyoro and even created an outrage in Buganda which was followed by Buganda's riot and attack of minister of their kingdom's government. In the same aspect on 9th November the one Michael Kintu, the then Katikiro the prime minister of Buganda resigned from his duties and was therefore replaced by the one Jehoash Mayanja Nkangi. Being a steady kingdom in all aspects one Amos Sempa a conservative Ganda chief increasingly advised Kabaka Mutesa II to resist Obote in all his different attributes towards the political move within the state and this is seen when Obote presented the necessary documents officiating transfer of jurisdiction for Mutesa to sign as president, of which the latter refused declaring that;

'I can never give away Buganda land'

And Obote signed in his place but the relationship between the two thus Kabaka Mutesa II and Milton Obote was strained by the ordeal but latter transfer of the two lost counties thus Buyaga and Bugangaizi took its effect back to Bunyoro kingdom on 1st January 1965.

Within the same aspect, recruiting back the instance of the gold scandal of the late 1964 in which the Uganda government aid to Christopher Gbenye leading a rebellion in the establishing portion of Democratic Republic of Congo sharing a boarder with Uganda and assistance also included the Uganda army and this sparked off the political motives within Uganda cabinet and thus divisions in cabinet following the policy taken towards rebels as it restrained relations with the Congolese government together with the ..United States…

As per Daudi Ochieng KY Member of Parliament, in February 1965 Colonel Idi Amin a high ranking officer in the army appeared on count with, Ottoman Bank and within a period of 24 days it's noted that worth 340,000 East African Shillings had been deposited in the ottoman bank account. This within a meantime, Ochieng accused Amin during a parliament session of having received money illegally obtained gold, ivory and coffee from Congo a matter in which government promised to make investigations about and latter in September Ochieng seeing no effect introduced a motion urging government to act on the accusations and with this Obote assured legislature that progress was being made on the same but by January 1966 Ochieng was frustrated by the wait in the publishing of a report on the investigation but however he reintroduced his motion urging government to take effect on the matter.

Following Obote's leave for a tour far to the north, shortly on 4th February parliament session was convened, cabinet hurriedly met without him and most members present were sympathetic to Ibingira following the decision that all upc members of parliament should live in support with the resolution. However, following the out growing political differences, according to lawyer and intelligence officer Akena Adoko, the meeting and decision was taken by Ibingira's initiative on advice from one Mutesa who reportedly told him;

'Let us join forces right now'. Obote and ministers royal to him are all out, you are cabinet boss, let cabinet meet now and reverse the decision not to support my motion. This has given me much pains. You and I can do wonders working together and therefore Ochieng's motion was seen thereafter tabled in parliament and debated by its members and it read';

'That this house does urge government to suspend from duty colonel Idi Amin of the Uganda army forth with pending conclusion of police investigations into allegations regarding his bank account which should then be passed on to the appropriate public authority whose final decision on the matter shall be made public'.

During the speech in which the motion was presented, Ochieng accused Obote, Onama together with minister of planning and community development Adoko Nekyon being complicit in administration's alleged activities and this was followed by the intense debate of foreign minister Sam Odaka. Referencing previous dubious corruption allegations made by Ochieng and accused Ochieng of abusing his. Parliamentary immunity, attack the standing of government minister and failing to reinforce his claims with adequate evidence. This only one dissenting vote from Kakonge because the rest of the upc members of parliament were correctly informed of the cabinet's decision to accept the motion only when the debate opened.

However on Obote's return around 15th February, was unable to disregard his ministers from proceeding with all investigations following the appointment of minister of internal affairs Basil Bataringaya to investigate on the matter and within the same aspect cabinet attempting for new appointments that on 22nd may Obote swiftly placed five members under arrest these including Grace Ibingira, Emmanuel Lumu, Balaki.K.Kirya, George Magezi and Mathius Ngobi but all were detained by men of special forces and taken to separate locations, the latter four all parties to Ibingira's wing as far as cabinet is concerned and all had attended the 4th February meeting and upon noting of the eventual arrests of the political lads the vice president William Nadiope for his survival fled to Kenya where he remained for a period of 3 weeks and following the attribute Obote decided to consolidate Ibingira's position by deprecating his ex-rival's allies specifically Mutesa thus announced that Mutesa was involved in a military coup which aided to overthrow his government and on 23rd February moved Opolot to chief of defense staff and Amin chief of army and air force staff and also investigating on the gold scandal Obote appointed three judges to his own commission.

On 24th February 1966, Milton Obote announced his suspension of Mutesa from his official duties as president citing his attributed reaction to the aspect of the lost counties referendum, his ordering of troops movements without ministerial consultations and his seeking of foreign military support, Mutesa however protested Obote's actions, ordering Obote to leave Buganda land and proceeded by appealing to the United Nations secretary general U-Thunt to intervene in the matter.

On 22nd may, Obote convened a meeting at the presidential lodge in Kampala of which attendance was only for the recognized and respected high ministers these including the minister of defense, minister of interior, and the inspector general of police and after the discussion of the crisis Obote declared situation necessitated military intervention or involvement and thus proceeded by telephoning Amin to report to the lodge and on his arrival Obote instructed him to prepare and launch an attack on Kabaka Mutesa's palace the following morning.

The aspect was followed by Kabaka Mutesa's call for protection from his subjects to defend him a call which was responded to by many natives the Baganda and thus acts of sabotage throughout Buganda, while thousands of monarchists attempted to set up blockades with role to hinder Amin's troops and engage in running streets skirmishes. But despite the case, Kabaka's royal body guards only armed with hunting rifles, especially as compared to the heavy blooded and intelligent army units and after the 2 days' palace was already surrounded, overrun and set a light but luckily enough the Kabaka Mutesa II managed to escape the compound during the cloud burst in the middle of the battle;

'that was seen when Milton Obote sent his troops to fetch him dead or alive, the king was unprepared, and outnumbered with only 120 guards hence could not defeat the well organized and well trained and equipped Uganda army with its lee-Enfield rifles, three carbines, six steering machine guns and six automatic rifles thus losing battle by Buganda together with the king Kabaka Mutesa ii and thus the royals in determining to protect the kingdom knew the only way for the king could survive was to flee him outside Uganda, rain connived with the royals, set it slowed the attacker's advancements, jumping over dead bodies as they fled, Mutesa and 20 body guards hauled each other over the six feet high brick walls of the palace but unfortunately the Kabaka landed in a precarious angle which left his back bone injured but flee and that's all what mattered by then hence escaping to Rubaga Cathedral using a passing taxi cab where priests gave him clerical robes and arranged for the drive to take him into Busiro county. Leaving a mark as to people's lives, situations left over 200 dead bodies of fallen Baganda while he military buried uncounted members in mass graves'.

However within a few days the Kabaka and two of his body guards were able to cross the boarders to Burundi and exile where he stayed in Addis Ababa and latter given an asylum in the united kingdom where he stayed until his eventual death, under mysterious circumstances in 1969bvarious Buganda chiefs, members of the royal family who thought royal to the Kabaka, were imprisoned and the Lubiri Palace was almost completely destroyed in the course of the fighting and the rooting which resulted into stealing of the historical artifacts and royal regalia were also stolen and others destroyed including the Mujaguzo Drums. This discretion caused immerse psychological sufferings and miseries for the Baganda who regarded the event as an apocalypse. Latter the king died in exile, but was allowed to be buried in Buganda by the new then president Idi Amin thus giving the king a state burial and this action granted him greater legitimacy at least in some sub-population in Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The crisis led to the emerging of law suits brought against Obote's government and also members of Mengo establishment that were failed sued for release and Sir Egbert Udo Udoma Chief Justice of the Supreme Court granted it to them in that in his decision for Uganda v Commissioner of Prisons, Ex parte Matovu when Buganda government petitioned court to declare Obote's actions invalid, Udoma ruled that Obote had orchestrated the coup, which according to international law was a legitimate means of assuming power. He thus urged that 0bote's government was legal and that the new constitution was in force. The other former cabinet ministers that had been arrested were transferred to Karamoja as a colonial law.., the deportation ordinance, which allowed for the detention and revival of 'undesirable person' thus they subsequently petitioned to court for a writ of habeas corpus however following Case of Grace Ibingira and others v Uganda, Uganda high court judge found detention legal and detained the petition but then the East African court of appeal Ruled that the ordinances violated a Uganda citizen's constitutional rights to freedoms of movement and ordered the writ of habeas corpus be granted and released them and then immediately re-arrested outside court house in Buganda under the colonial emergence regulations, and government passed the deportation act to cover its actions but the ministers filed new suit but in a hearing court affirmed the legitimacy of new law and thus cabinet ministers remained incarcerated until Amin released them following his seizure of power in 1971.

However despite the first Kabaka crisis, there also existed the second Kabaka crisis which was also termed the Kayunga saga and this was sparked off by the eventual riots in the capital, Kampala dated 10th September, 2009 when the delegate representing Buganda kingdom was blocked from visiting (Esaza) Kayunga of Buganda kingdom. This was ousted out by an aspect of which the Kabaka of Buganda Ronald MuwendaMutebi II planned to have a visit upon his subjects in Kayunga on National Youth Day, however two days later, his subject's visit was challenged by the leader of the Banyala Ethnic group in Kayunga who rejected Kabaka's authority and this ousted out Kabaka's subjects and supporters who went and sprung on streets protesting the police action, and violence began from afterwards.

The period was characterized by massive killings of innocent and unarmed civilians within the Buganda region in reference to Uganda that's during and after riots on the streets dated 10th and 11th September, 2009. However, research was proved by the Human Rights Watch Investigation which found out that at least 13 people were short by government forces in situations where lethal forces was unnecessary. This was aligned with the reports from the minister of internal affairs who reported to parliament that 27 had died during the riots and 7 were un involved in riot activity an aspect that was proved by an aspect 'shooting in self-defense is one thing, but it was also found that some armed soldiers shot at bystanders and others shot through locked doors'.

With reference to the outcomes of the Kayunga saga, sources at Kampala's main hospital, Mulago indicated that 88 victims of the violence were admitted during the period and most were suffering from gunshot wounds. However, victims were also taken to other hospitals as well and also minister on internal affairs proved the fact that around 846 protesters were arrested during the riot of which among these 24 of the alleged rioters were charged with terrorism for destroying government property and many others were charged with unlawful assembly and inciting violence.

It's also worth noting that within the same attribute, several outbursts were recognized in the areas including the destruction of economic facilities for example the burning of petrol station in Nateete, and other riots sprung over the Buganda kingdom in reference to Uganda but more especially on the streets of Kasubi, Busega, Ndeeba, Bwaise, Bunga, the Salaama Road at Nakinyuguzi zone and Mpigi town and following the eventual riots some rioters do appear to have employed parallel tactics such as burning of tires to block roads in several areas of the city of Kampala that was more registered on the afternoons of 10th September,2009.

Living the challenging life attributes, despite the riots, several serious questions were raised following several fatal and non-fatal shootings by security forces on 10th and 11th September, 2009 which was followed by the heavy deployments in which more forces were deployed in response to the riots following the fact research proved it that these officers went on shooting even innocent civilians who were not threatening and not inciting violence an aspect which left the whole public challenged to the view that live ammunition was only fired into the air to clear streets off protesters.

History thus proves it right that 10th September.2009 marked the beginning of the three dark nights and days on the streets of Kampala and other parts in Buganda an aspect which called the old memories of the lost glories of 1966 in Which eventual death, under mysterious circumstances in 1969bvarious Buganda chiefs, members of the royal family who thought royal to the Kabaka, were imprisoned and the Lubiri Palace was almost completely destroyed in the course of the fighting and the rooting which resulted into stealing of the historical artifacts and royal regalia were also stolen and others destroyed including the Mujaguzo drums as a result of the fictions that had been simmering between Kabaka of Buganda Mutesa II and the then prime minister Milton Obote. Within the same instance the central government in relation with the leader of the Banyala in Kayunga who tried to secede from Buganda an aspect in which the Buganda prime minister John Baptist Walusimbi who was blocked an attribute aimed his accustomed tours of the kingdom in line to prevent him from proceeding to Kayunga to take royal duty organizations in which the King Kabaka Ronald MuwendaMutebi II was to preside as the guest of honor on the recognized national youth day hence in storm to prevent the king's visit upon his subjects in Kayunga on the kingdom's annual youth day celebration.

Throwing more lights as to the effects that saw the kingdom of Buganda following the Kabaka crisis of Kayunga 2009, following the outgoing aspects in Buganda the government shut-down the kingdom's broadcasting medial channels radio thus radio CBS and three others in a major clump-down riots but conditions were aroused when it appeared that Kabaka was more determined to visit Kayunga in such a challenging time an aspect which also invited public notices and that was responded by central government by letting the army surround his palace in Kireka on the night of 12th September,2009 an aspect which aroused masses within Uganda but more especially his subjects the Buganda people and thus around 500 people were arrested in various parts of Buganda in which a police station was burnt to ashes and several officers injured within the aggrieved protests of the angry and uncontrollable protesters of Buganda.

Another aspect in reference to historical facts that raised the masses in Buganda was the third Kabaka crisis in which it also being referred to as the 66th birth day which took its effect dated on Tuesday 13th April, 2021 in which his highness the Kabaka of Buganda Ronald MuwendaMutebi sewed up upon the demand of the masses in Buganda in reference to Uganda but research proves it right that the masses more in demand of the Kabaka was the most recognized group of the angry Baganda by tribe who lived to uplift all the standards of Buganda thus living in their beliefs both in terms of political, social and economic in nature but all these aimed for basing on Kiganda cultures, customs and beliefs of Buganda. This was hampered by the Kabaka's ill health which spilled up into a public view when he arrived at Bulange Mengo palace in company of his beloved wife the queen Mama Nabagereka Silvier Nagginda but the king/s lighting from his car became an obvious marking point to many in the crowd attendance and others that were streaming online live on televisions these included BBS TV that all with the Kabaka of Buganda was not well an attribute which left more questions on both the public and the outside world thus describing the situation worse for the king of Buganda Ronald MuwendaMutebi II thus many attributed audience and those watching busting into tears and conditions acted as a cold blood aspect that the situation raised tension thus leading to more fears and tension within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The Kabaka's birthday saga was also named the third Kabaka crisis with view that it created periods of strong deployments of well-armed and combatted both police and army brocades thus leading to periods of tension, fear, public outcry within the whole Uganda but more especially among the Buganda Being a challenging time of the astonishing, wide spreading, and mass killings registered due to the attack of covid-19 disease which has led to massive deaths in both more developed countries like the united kingdom, united states of America, Russia, India and all other countries on the African continent, this left the situation quite challenging that the king's 66th birthday Ronald MuwendaMutebi II an acronym that left the birthday celebrations only being celebrated in the scientific kind of way to an aspect that only a recognized group of people were allowed to attend the function but more tensions was sparked off by the health challenges of the king on his appearance for his birthday celebrations at Bulange Mengo palace.

Many on sight of their glory that's the king of Buganda Kabaka Ronald MuwendaMutebi II at his 66th birthday celebrations at Bulange Mengo palace, Kabaka seemingly not to be fine with reference that he looked frail, and seemed to have lost weight that he even struggled so as to keep his eyes open and worth noting that his throat also looked struggling to take anything with the note of fact that even his speech was slurred with reference that was seen struggling to breath properly and also the noting in the cutting of his cake that made round on various social media platforms all seemed the fact that called for public attentions thus periods of anger among the Baganda tribes men and women who claimed to know the king's health conditions to the fact that he had missed serious culture functions within Buganda and were he appeared still left masses in a devastating state hence worried for the health of the health of the king of Buganda and this serious made an arousement in Buganda in reference to Uganda but more especially the accustomed Baganda who together claimed for what had really happened to their beloved king.

The king's 66th birthday celebrations of Tuesday 13th April, 2021 at Bulange Mengo sparked the questions among the public in Uganda but more especially from the staunched angry Baganda to they saw no reasons as to why the king Ronald MuwendaMutebi II was allowed to attend the birthday event with an aspect that his health condition did not favor anything like public exposure for his face looked frail and intense prove that the debate emerged as to whether he should come out to the face of his subjects following his conditional health in such a state to the fact that even the recognized and attributed Buganda officials were still worried about the fallout from his appearance and this note also raised tensions within Buganda in reference to Uganda and the condition bitterly aroused masses in Buganda followed by their demand to know the king's health statistics of which his representative in his abs ensure the prime minister Katikiro Charles peter Mayiga quoted saying;

"The rumors that the Kabaka was poisoned are totally false….they are baseless and they should totally be disregarded. The Kabaka's condition is being managed by requisite expertise and we hope and pray that he will achieve soon''.

And as he was asked why a frail Kabaka was allowed to attend a public event, Mayiga said they were in a catch-22 situation where he mentioned:

'If he doesn't appear, they say you are hiding him; if he appears, they say, why did you bring him while how is sick? But I want to tell you that the Kabaka is not very sick as he properly got out of his car without being supported by anyone or using a walking stick and therefore there was no reason for him to remain at the palace and also added that the Kabaka's coming out in public is one of the ways in which we celebrate him. There was nothing to stop him from coming to the public especially when we are celebrating such an important function like his birthday. We cannot go into the specifics of his health complications because those are private matters that should be left to him and his doctors".

With the storm ranging online and offline rumors about the king's health which aroused masses in Uganda most especially the Baganda for the fear that the kingdom might lose its king and following the measured political attributes that ranged between Buganda kingdom and the central government to the fact that even government never bothered in flying out the king for some improved medical attention an aspect which paved way for the notion in demand from many Ugandans most especially the Baganda, following the mass demand on Kabaka's health, the prime minister of Buganda Katikiro Charles peter Mayiga came out to press and addressed a press conference where he admitted that his boss the king Ronald Muwenda Mutebi II had health issues and added that Kabaka is just like any ordinary person gets health challenges from time to time that need to be effectively managed. On uttering this, many Baganda were left in questions as to why the king could not be taken abroad for best medications following the prime minister mentioning that the Kabaka's health challenges are caused by allergies, which trigger breathing difficulties especially when he has a mask on or a shield over his face.

However, the Kabaka of Buganda Ronald MuwendaMutebi ii being one of the most popular figures in this country, being a symbol of humanness, civility and course he is the custodian of the Buganda kingdom in reference to the heritage of the kingdom of Buganda. He is therefore not an cordially person with the fact that is one of the most loved public figures in Uganda and thus following his status in which people saw him called his subjects and mass concern within Uganda and the world at large following the fact that many Uganda's are living in the diaspora thus following news speculation on the recognized social media platforms these including twitter, what sup, Facebook among other platforms which got filled up with the challenging health pictures and astonishing miserly videos of the Buganda king an attribute that aroused masses hence leading to the public outcry and demand for the king from the astonishing, misery, sad and angry Buganda together with some other tribes within Uganda hence a challenging period to the kingdom.

A day after the Kabaka's health became a public discussion which was followed by a fake latter that appeared on social media purporting to be relieving the prime minister of Buganda Katikkiro Charles Peter Mayiga of his duties as the katikiro of Buganda and that supported by the negative commentary about the prime minister accusing him of a litany of issues. This was elaborated that some people in Uganda most especially the angry Baganda believing that the Katikkiro should refrained the Kabaka from appearing in public while others think that the reason was that the Kabaka has not sought more specialized medical attention abroad and was also accused of trying to cover-up the issue from the astonishing Ugandans most especially the angry Baganda an aspect that aroused up the masses to bitterness thus demanding for their king's health conditions from the prime minister.

Another aspect was the speculations that some rumors emerged on the attribute that the issue of failure of the king to address or even attend culture scheduled important days was due to the political indifferences which existed between the kingdom and the central government to the factual mentioning's of the king which aided that most arrests and most deaths that were being registered during the challenging political times of 2021 general presidential elections an aspect which created mass awareness that despite the political attributes and differences within Buganda and the king's welcome to all political party candidates acted a spark thus leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

It's also worth noting that for over a period of 28 years reign the king of Buganda Kabaka Ronald MuwendaMutebi II had never missed presiding over at any premier kingdom's event that was the first time missing the ending of the Buganda sports tournament that's being referred to as the Masaza cup which finals were celebrated at St. Mary's Stadium Kitende, his absence at the kingdom's function portrayed the aspect that all was not well for this served the first time for the king himself to miss presiding over the ceremony an aspect which called upon public notice that all with the king seemed not to be fine and this attributed led to many Ugandans but more especially the Baganda tribal men and women in which even many busted into cries thus the period was characterized with misery and sadness among the angry astonishing and uncontrolled Baganda thus leading to their demand with effect to know all what concerned with the king's health and on hearing all these aspects many Baganda allover Uganda and all over the globe went on rampage demanding for the best attributes of which the kingdom could aid it best for the improvement of the king's health thus leading to the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda in reference to Uganda.

Noting Kabaka's long awaited visit upon his subjects as it was organized by the Buganda sports tournament locally referred to as the Masaza cup which is being enjoyed by all the Masaza of Buganda aided with the note to promote Buganda to its heights, promote peace among them despite their differences in totems of which the tournament is best and more importantly aimed to call upon all Baganda to believe in the oneness of their beloved Kabaka Ronald MuwendaMutebi II and also hold and promote all the recognized Kiganda cultures, customs and beliefs among the Baganda. However being a celebration of the winning teams turned to be a sad story to tell that despite the prime minister promising all the Baganda the presence of the king at the ceremony, this however did not happen leaving the prime minister Katikkiro Charles Peter Mayiga to handle the ceremonial attributes of handing over to the winning team Gomba but this sparked off the angry Baganda hence demanding the conditions of their king following Katikkiro's empty promises for his presence thus the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The attribute of the Tuesday 13th april,2021 king's 66th birthday cake also aroused masses within Uganda and the outside world especially those Ugandans in the diaspora in which its designs and coffin looked shape tarnished masses hence leading to the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda in reference to Uganda. Following the 66thKabaka's birthday cake which was coffin shaped and designed with yellow color on its nature turned to be looked at as a merchant and a distinguished political move for the political differences among the Ugandans at large. This left many questions to be answered on the cake decisions and as per research in reference to the cake, the cake was designed by the one Kenneth Nsibambi of which urged that he only followed the given prescriptions from the organizers and it was thus made to the orders but back to the masses the cake was ranked mostly negative which aroused masses in Uganda most especially the angry Buganda with dues that it was aimed for political connotations and thus inquired why it was also made in a rectangular shape like format to other aspects an acronym which called upon massive commentaries to utter that a more neutral color could have been used so as the king to be seen not being politically divisive hence leading to the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The attribute when the Kabaka failed to showcase upon the ending of the Masaza tournament following the empty promises of the prime minister Charles peter Mayiga who promised the king's presence just within a cup of days to the finals of the Buganda cup tournament thus leading to the outward third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda. However the aspect was attributed when he failed to show up on the Buganda ceremony in which was to premier as the guest of honor, on his absence and being represented by his prime minister the Katikkiro of Buganda Charles peter Mayiga who informed the masses that his absence was due to his visit for friends in Kenya, his absence fed a rumor mill that started gaining traction on social media platforms that the Buganda monarch king was critically ill and his tours to Kenya were not for recreation but rather for medical treatment for the fact he even looked to have lost weight and his body looked peril to he might have been suffering from a serious skin disease that his skin looked light when he last appeared at the Masaza cup opening and in December 2020 during the opening of the 28th Buganda Lukiiko on January 11th where he looked a bit different with probably small skin complications thus an aspect that soaked off masses hence leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The other attribute that led to the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda with reference to Uganda was the astonishing pressure from the angry Baganda both within Uganda and the outside world thus in the diaspora sparked by the challenging photos on the various social media platforms of seemingly dearer Kabaka of Buganda Ronald Muwenda Mutebi II meeting with the Kenyan president Uhuru Kenyatta and former prime minister Raila Odinga an attribute where the katikiro mentioned that he had moved for friendly visits, on hearing this, many astonishing Baganda resorted back to the Buganda cultural beliefs and customs in which it was proved that the king can never move for friends but rather friends move for him and this made the communications from his prime minister Charles peter Mayiga irrelevant and being regarded rubbish to he was lying to the kingdom an aspect where many angry Baganda resorted to disregard his as impartial and asked him vacate his position of the office of the katikiro hence a challenging attribute within the kingdom thus leading to the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The aspect of the emerging rumors which stated that way back in September 2020 that claimed that the now 66th year old king of Buganda Kabaka Ronald MuwendaMutebi II had been poisoned and had been rushed to Kenya for treatment also fed a rumor mill hence leading to the spread of the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda in reference to Uganda. This falling into the ears of the already astonished, demanding, angry, miserable people of Uganda most especially the Baganda these both within and those in the diaspora aided in demand of their king for this looked clear when he turned up for his Tuesday 66th birthday of 13th April and his critical condition that his facial looked lightened a bit probably with a skip complications, he had lost weight and this was connected to his absence at the ending of the Masaza tournament an attribute which fed a rumor mill that started gaining traction on social media platforms that the Buganda monarch king was critically ill and his tours to Kenya were not for recreation but rather for medical treatment for the fact he even looked to have lost weight and his body looked peril to he might have been suffering from a serious skin disease that his skin looked light when he last appeared at the Masaza cup opening and in December 2020 during the opening of the 28th Buganda Lukiiko on January 11th where he looked a bit different with probably small skin complications thus an aspect that soaked off masses hence leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

Another astonishing attribute that led to the third Kabaka crisis of 2021 within Buganda in reference to Uganda was an aspect of long time demand of Buganda's independence as issue in which Uganda as a nation has never acted upon also is proved to have sparked off the angry masses of Buganda. The long time demand for Buganda's independence since the early 1953, which was also connected to the 1966 crisis which is also known as the Buganda crisis in which tribal conflicts of Buganda aimed for attain back the lost glory of the two lost territories that's Buyaga and Bugangaizi which Buganda lost back to Bunyoro through an organized referendum which was organized on 4th November 1964 in which the said county members chose by wider margin to return to Bunyoro but the process being pushed by the then prime minister Milton Obote with the intent to bolster Obote's support in Bunyoro and even created an outrage in Buganda an aspect in which the king replied by ordering Obote to live the Buganda land and also sought for Buganda's independence from the motioned Uganda but has never been granted till date even when his highness Kabaka Ronald Muwenda Mutebi II urged for the same with effect there are more other smaller countries than Buganda for example the Swaziland but still is being recognized by the united nations of which an attribute the central government has never lived to grant it independence thus leading to the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The other attribute that sparked off the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda is the intentional aid in which the king of Buganda Ronald MuwendaMutebi ii during the 66th birthday celebrations of 13th April, 2021 he folded his hands back an acronym which called upon public notice to the effect that all was not well with the king to the fact that looked to have lost weight and his body looked peril to he might have been suffering from a serious skin disease that his skin looked light when he last appeared at the Masaza cup opening and in December 2020 during the opening of the 28th Buganda Lukiiko on January 11th where he looked a bit different with probably small skin complications. On the interpretations of the king's act of folding his hands according to the Kiganda culture, customs and beliefs the king cannot fold his hands back unless is under captivity and this on its interpretation many Baganda sensed the captivity an attribute which led to public outcry and misery within Uganda but more especially his subjects the Baganda hence the rising of masses against the effect hence the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The attributed aspect of the repeated excuses from the prime minister of Buganda katikiro Charles Peter Mayiga on the king's health and absence on the scheduled and respected Buganda cultural and recognized ceremonies these including his missing of the ending of the Masaza tournament in which his prime minister played or stepped up for the king's role to hand over the trophy to the winning team which most Baganda disregarded and never lived in support an act which had never occurred during his reign of 28th year period in which his prime minister mentioned that the king had traveled for a friends visit to Nairobi two to three days an aspect which aroused masses for kings do not travel for friends visits so it acted an excuse but masses referred the note that he was extremely sick that's leading to missing his attendance at the kingdom event which fed a rumor mill that started gaining traction on social medial platforms the monarch king was critically ill and his eventual tours to Kenya where not for recreation but, rather a treatment journey thus lighted the spark thus leading to the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The other attribute that sparked of the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda was the heavy and combated brocades that was deployed within Buganda and at BulangeMengo palace on the king's 66th birthday celebration also led to the questioning of the attribute in which conditions were more characterized with fear, misery and tension within Buganda and this aroused more masses in Uganda but more especially the king's subjects the Baganda to the situations challenges and thus all streets filled with combated armed officers both police and the army an acted which left Buganda in cold for the worsening situations of their king which was all challenging and its proved many Baganda were keeping in wait to see what's next but tensions and fears raised high in the kingdom thus the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The other attribute which also led to the outward spread of the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda was the immunization against covid-19 that injecting him of the vaccine control of the disease despite his clerical and critically ill king of Buganda in which it was already approved the king's health was not in line with that of a normal person and the eventual immunization of the already sick Kabaka aroused masses within Uganda and those in the diaspora but most especially the Baganda being his subjects, the issue of the king's immunization was mentioned to be an attribute in which more other medical complications were being carried out than the attribute aiding for his normal health and on this many Baganda's urged for the king to be taken abroad for proper and approved medication but however the Buganda prime minister came in and advised the angry Baganda that the ‘‘that the king was being worked on accordingly and also mentioned that the king was responding to his medication positively and thus saw no need to fly the king outside Uganda for some further treatment and this alone aroused masses and many called upon him to resign his office duties of being the prime minister of Buganda thus leading to the outburst tensions within the kingdom hence the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda''.

The attribute of most arrests which was characterized to be brutal and this affected the king's subjects most that most imprisoned and most registered killings were Baganda by tribe an aspect in which many of the subjects called upon the Buganda board to talk on the matter so as to control the eventual astonishing arrests and detentions which were brutal in nature to the fact that those in custody were not being presented to courts for their writ of habeas corpus and also claimed for their right to be heard but this was never granted of which many remained in custody despite the 24 hour rule and many torture chambers were proved to being Buganda for where many Baganda were being mistreated and that was followed by the aspects of the zero number plate vehicles which were named drones in which many civilian citizens more especially the Baganda were being arrested without notifying their families and other never been seen to date an aspect which even the police representative mentioned to parliament about the said lost personalities and some police confirmed their detentions and also mentioned they were serving their different charges an attribute that called upon public worries, fear and tension hence leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The other aspect that led to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda was the was the attributed aspect in which the king of Buganda Kabaka Ronald MuwendaMutebi II was left to cut his 66th birthday cake of Tuesday 13th April 2021 alone with the factual presence of his queen the beloved wife Mama Nabagereka Silvier Nagginda following the challenging times of the king's life which fed a rumor mill that started gaining traction on social medial platforms the monarch king was critically ill and his eventual tours to Kenya where not for recreation but, rather a treatment journey thus lighted the spark, the king of Buganda Kabaka Ronald MuwendaMutebi ii at his 66th birthday celebrations at Bulange Mengo palace, Kabaka seemingly not to be fine with reference that he looked frail, and seemed to have lost weight that he even struggled so as to keep his eyes open and worth noting that his throat also looked struggling to take anything with the note of fact that even his speech was slurred with reference that was seen struggling to breath properly and also the noting in the cutting of his cake that made round on various social media platforms all seemed the fact that called for public attentions thus periods of anger among the Baganda tribes men and women who claimed to know the king's health conditions to the fact that he had missed serious culture functions within Buganda he public worries, fear and tension hence leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The other aspect that led to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda was the deployment of the armed man in casual who was well covered that even his face could not be identified on camera at the palace gate an attribute that called upon public awareness and it eventually aroused the miserable, angry and devastated Baganda into demanding of their king's health conditions. The situation also called upon massive questions as to why the deployment was made to scare away the king from getting out his palace thus threatening his life too. This was followed by the eventual utterance from the katikiro of Buganda Charles Peter Mayiga who informed the masses that his absence was due to his visit for friends in Kenya, his absence fed a rumor mill that started gaining traction on social media platforms that the Buganda monarch king was critically ill and his tours to Kenya were not for recreation but rather for medical treatment for the fact he even looked to have lost weight and his body looked peril to he might have been suffering from a serious skin disease that his skin looked light when he last appeared at the Masaza cup opining and in December 2020 during the opening of the 28th Buganda Lukiiko on January 11th where he looked a bit different with probably small skin complications thus an aspect that soaked off masses hence leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The other attribute that led to the eventual outbreak of the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda and the outside worlds especially Ugandans in the diaspora was the eventual utterances of the prime minister of Buganda katikiro Charles Peter Mayiga in which he informed the press that the monarchical king was suffering from allergies and also admitted that his boss the king Ronald MuwendaMutebi II had health issues and added that Kabaka is just like any ordinary person gets health challenges from time to time that need to be effectively managed. On uttering this, many Baganda were left in questions as to why the king could not be taken abroad for best medications following the prime minister mentioning that the Kabaka's health challenges are caused by allergies, which trigger breathing difficulties especially when he has a mask on or a shield over his face an aspect which called upon public notice that all with the king seemed not to be fine and this attributed led to many Ugandans but more especially the Baganda tribal men and women in which even many busted into cries thus the period was characterized with misery and sadness among the angry astonishing and uncontrolled Baganda thus leading to their demand with effect to know all what concerned with the king's health hence the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The other attribute that led to the astonishing third Kabaka crisis is the brutality and mistreatments of the captives and the eventual massive arrests and detentions that that was followed by the registered tortures and cruelty from the torture chambers which had been registered rampant within Buganda in reference to Uganda which created conditions of fears, misery, suffering and many deaths were also registered that many sought for the standup to rise against the forces which was followed by the heavy deployments within Uganda but more especially in the areas of Buganda situations which caused a public outcry worsening situations of their king which was all challenging and its proved many Baganda were keeping in wait to see what's next but tensions and fears raised high in the kingdom thus the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The other aspect of the eventual bringing of the king to the public notice in the situation that looked all too challenging in reference to his health conditions also aroused masses within Uganda but more especially his subjects the angry and astonishing Baganda thus leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda. The ideal practice in which the king was brought to public notice in such a challenging health condition was referred to many that it was aimed to put the king's worse health conditions to light an aspect which was aimed to challenge and ashamed Buganda as a kingdom and others referred the matter that it aimed to invite public outcry among the astonishing and uncontrolled Baganda with view that Kabaka's health challenges are caused by allergies, which trigger breathing difficulties especially when he has a mask on or a shield over his face an aspect which called upon public notice that all with the king seemed not to be fine and this attributed led to many Ugandans but more especially the Baganda tribal men and women in which even many busted into cries thus Kabaka seemingly not to be fine with reference that he looked frail, and seemed to have lost weight that he even struggled so as to keep his eyes open and worth noting that his throat also looked struggling to take anything with the note of fact that even his speech was slurred with reference that was seen struggling to breath properly and also the noting in the cutting of his cake that made round on various social media platforms all seemed the fact that called for public attentions thus periods of anger among the Baganda thus the period was characterized with misery and sadness among the angry astornishing and uncontrolled Bagandathus leading to their demand with effect to know all what concerned with the king's health hence the third Kabaka crisis in Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The other attribute is the immeasurable and eventual death of the religious leaders within Buganda in reference to Uganda but this more affected Kabaka's subjects more especially the Baganda for which it eventually aroused masses hence leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda. The immeasurable death of religious leaders in Uganda but most especially king's subjects the Baganda of which around 6 supreme religious deaths were registered Just in a period of 6 months these including Archbishop Cyprian KizitoLwanga the head of catholic church in Uganda aged 68 years in the capital of Kampala who was found dead in his bedroom Saturday 3rd April 2021, the others include Bishop Kaggwa in mass, Owobushobozi Bisaka, Sheik Nuhu Muzaata, Dr. Anas Kaliisa who was a renowned scholar and Pastor Yiga and their death also created periods of tension, fear and misery within Buganda in reference to Uganda for it was registered a great loss to the lord's community in the country and the world at large thus living a regrettable that deprived to the east African region thus leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda and the world at large.

The other attribute is the eventual practicing of the burning of the Masiro on the occasional basis an aspect that sparked off masses both within Buganda in reference to Uganda and those in the diaspora but most especially king's subjects the Baganda. The Kasubi tombs in Kampala, Uganda having been recognized as site of burial grounds for four Kabaka's and other members of the Buganda royal family remains an important spiritual and political site for the Ganda people as well as an important example of traditional architecture, living in reference with the burning of the Masiro on the army attack during the reign of Kabaka Mutesa II living in the disagreement with the prime minister Obote, the tombs have continuously suffered from serious fire outbreaks these include the march 16th 2010 followed by the recent burnings of June 5th, 2020 in which the spiritual Buganda royal twins caught fire and aspect which called up history reminding Baganda of the sad mysterious fires which even led to the collection of the locally known Etofali both within Uganda and the outside world living the untold story which left heart warming moments between Buganda kingdom and the central government in which the government in restoration promised shs.5 billion to Buganda in restoration and this sparked off the angry, terrified, living a miserable life of the Baganda hence leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda and the outside world most especially Ugandans in the diaspora.

The other aspect of central government failure to pay the rent arrears to the kingdom of Buganda an attribute which has created massive awareness thus the raise of more questions as to why the central government could not pay the Buganda arrears thus creating a thread line relationships between Buganda and the central government thus leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda. This breathed attributes to the fact that central government owes Buganda large amounts of money in reference to rent arrears an aspect in which the katikiro mentioned that Buganda demands large sums of money these worth shs.20 billion with effect that the government occupies several properties that belong to the Buganda kingdom including the Kigo prison and the supreme court building in Mengo, with the central government living in no payment to Buganda and this has even led to economic difficulties within Buganda projects thus leading to slow or no developments hence sparking off masses in Uganda but most especially the king's subject the Baganda thus leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to the state Uganda.

The other aspect was the massive killings, arrests and torture within Buganda in reference to Uganda which called massive awareness following the brutal arrests within Buganda and Uganda at large thus leading to the third Kabaka crisis. These eventual killings were characterized with brutal arrests within Uganda but more especially king's subjects the Baganda taking in note an example where the country registered 6 deaths caused by the army officer Dennis Owino who killed six innocent civilians and four were registered injured in the trading center of ganda, Nansana Municipality in Wakiso district on the outside skirts of the capital of Kampala an aspect which became a public notice of the use of fire arms by the trained officers thus raising of the public outcry of many Ugandans but most especially the Baganda who even called upon the outside worlds to intervene in the matter due to the aspect that Buganda was registering eventual deaths these included the immeasurable death of religious leaders in Uganda but most especially king's subjects the Baganda of which around 6 supreme religious deaths were registered Just in a period of 6 months these including Archbishop Cyprian Kizito Lwanga the head of catholic church in Uganda aged 68 years in the capital of Kampala who was found dead in his bedroom Saturday 3rd April 2021, the others include Bishop Kaggwa in mass, owobushobozi Bisaka, Sheik NuhuMuzaata, Dr. AnasKaliisa who was a renowned scholar and Pastor Yiga and their death also created periods of tension, fear and misery within Buganda in reference to Uganda for it was registered a great loss to the lord's community hence public worries, fear and tension hence leading to the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

However, in reference to the causes of the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda these in the notions as both social, political and economically in nature are all explained in the above ways and despite the causes explained, the third Kabaka crisis also created challenging periods within Buganda in reference to Uganda thus effects which are both positive and negative in nature as explained in the ways as hereafter.

The third Kabaka crisis led to eventual loss of lives among Uganda's but more especially the king's subjects the Baganda for more deaths were registered which created periods of public outcry against the central government this is explained where the country registered 6 deaths caused by the army officer Dennis Owino who killed six innocent civilians and four were registered injured in the trading Centre of ganda, Nansana municipality in Wakiso district on the outside skirts of the capital of Kampala an aspect which became a public notice of the use of fire arms by the trained officers thus raising of the public outcry of many Ugandans hence an effect of the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The third Kabaka crisis also registered a period of misery and suffering among king's subjects that's the Baganda in reference to the whole Uganda hence an effect of the crisis. The sufferings, tensions, miserable periods for many had lost their loved ones and family friends an aspect explained by the eventual deaths these included the immeasurable death of religious leaders in Uganda but most especially king's subjects the Baganda of which around 6 supreme religious deaths were registered Just in a period of 6 months these including Archbishop Cyprian kizitoLwanga the head of catholic church in Uganda aged 68 years in the capital of Kampala who was found dead in his bedroom Saturday 3rd April 2021, the others include bishop kaggwa in mass, owobushobozi Bisaka, Sheik Nuhu Muzaata, Dr. Anas Kaliisa who was a renowned scholar and Pastor Yiga and their death also created periods of tension, fear and misery within Buganda in reference to Uganda for it was registered a great loss to the lord's community thus an effect of the third Kabaka crisis.

The third Kabaka crisis also raised an aspect of tribal conflicts hence an effect to the notion that masses more in demand of the Kabaka was the most recognized group of the angry Baganda by tribe who lived to uplift all the standards of Buganda thus living in their beliefs both in terms of political, social and economic in nature but all these aimed for basing on Kiganda cultures, customs and beliefs of Buganda. This was hampered by the Kabaka's ill health which spilled up into a public view when he arrived at Bulange Mengo palace in company of his beloved wife the queen mama Nabagereka Silvier Nagginda but the king's lighting from his car became an obvious marking point to many in the crowd attendance and others that were streaming online live on televisions these included BBS TV that all with the Kabaka of Buganda was not well an attribute which left more questions. The notion was in line with the eventual deaths registered within Buganda include Bishop Kaggwa in mass, Sheik Nuhu Muzaata, Dr. Anas kaliisa who was a renowned scholar and pastor Yiga and their death also created periods of tension to led to more questions as to why more deaths were registered within Buganda thus living an effect of the third Kabaka crisis.

The third Kabaka crisis also spilled up massive arrests within Buganda in reference to Uganda hence an effect of the crisis. This attribute of massive arrests within Buganda and Uganda in which the eventual astonishing arrests and detentions which were brutal in nature to the fact that those in custody were not being presented to courts for their writ of habeas corpus and also claimed for their right to be heard but this was never granted of which many remained in custody despite the 24 hour rule and many torture chambers were proved to being Buganda for where many Baganda were being mistreated and that was followed by the aspects of the zero number plate vehicles which were named drones in which many civilian citizens more especially the Baganda were being arrested without notifying their families and other never been seen to date an aspect which even the police representative mentioned to parliament about the said lost personalities and some police confirmed their detentions and also mentioned they were serving their different charges an attribute that called upon public worries, fear and tension hence an effect of the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The third Kabaka crisis also created periods of emergency within the state following the heavy deployments which was vested within Buganda in reference to Uganda an aspect that raised more periods of tension and fears within Buganda and the attribute was referenced to the astonishing existing relationship that existed between Buganda as the kingdom and the central government which was aroused masses following the central government failure to pay the rent arrears to the kingdom of Buganda an attribute which has created massive awareness thus the raise of more questions as to why the central government could not pay the Buganda arrears thus creating a thread line relationships between Buganda and the central government and the other aspect was the public sight of their glory that's the king of Buganda Kabaka Ronald Muwenda Mutebi ii at his 66th birthday celebrations at Bulange Mengo palace, Kabaka seemingly not to be fine with reference that he looked frail, and seemed to have lost weight that he even struggled so as to keep his eyes open and worth noting that his throat also looked struggling to take anything with the note of fact that even his speech was slurred with reference that was seen struggling to breath properly all conditions created more terifications, fears, tensions thus lived a threat to many Ugandans but more especially king's subjects the Baganda hence an effect of the third Kabaka crisis.

The situations also still left the Buganda economic situations in misery to the effect that the economic conditions became worse following the eventual burning of the Masiro on the occasional basis an aspect that sparked off masses both within Buganda in reference to Uganda and those in the diaspora but most especially king's subjects the Baganda. The Kasubi tombs in Kampala, Uganda having been recognized as site of burial grounds for four Kabaka's and other members of the Buganda royal family remains an important spiritual and political site for the ganda people as well as an important example of traditional architecture, living in reference with the burning of the Masiro on the army attack during the reign of Kabaka Mutesa II living in the disagreement with the prime minister Obote, the tombs have continuously suffered from serious fire outbreaks these include the march 16th 2010 followed by the recent burnings of June 5th, 2020 in which the spiritual Buganda royal twins caught fire and aspect which called up history reminding Baganda of the sad mysterious fires which even led to the collection of the locally known Etofali both within Uganda and the outside world hence an effect of the third Kabaka crisis.

The third Kabaka crisis also raised more tensions between the Buganda kingdom and the central government with respect that the periods created back the lost glories of Buganda that were lost during the earlier Kabaka crisis of 2009 the Kayunga saga the situation in which the kingdom's broadcast media were being curtailed since September 2009 and this was characterized by the closure of four radio stations on the orders of the central government among these was radio cbs that remained off the air Kimeeza a popular open air broadcast from which could comment on the events in Buganda most especially the crisis but on closure government aided it was temporary and up to date not restored to its functions and this still on minds of the angry Ugandans most especially Kabaka's subjects with effect that even following the king's health at his 66th birthday celebrations at Bulange Mengo palace, Kabaka seemingly not to be fine with reference that he looked frail, and seemed to have lost weight that he even struggled so as to keep his eyes open and worth noting that his throat also looked struggling to take anything with the note of fact that even his speech was slurred with reference that was seen struggling to breath properly and also the noting in the cutting of his cake that made round on various social media platforms all seemed the fact that called for public attentions thus periods of anger among the Baganda tribes men and women thus massive fears and periods of tension within the kingdom thus an effect of the third Kabaka crisis.

The crisis also created challenging periods within Buganda in reference to the native cultures, customs and beliefs thus the situation living a threat to Buganda natives living in reference to Uganda hence an effect of the third Kabaka crisis. The notion in line with Kiganda cultures, customs and beliefs were put to light when for over a period of 28 years reign the king of Buganda Kabaka Ronald Muwenda Mutebi II had never missed presiding over at any premier kingdom's event that was the first time missing the ending of the Buganda sports tournament that's being referred to as the Masaza cup which finals were celebrated at St. Mary's stadium Kitende, his absence at the kingdom's function portrayed the aspect that all was not well for this served the first time for the king himself to miss presiding over the ceremony and this was reflected with the Tuesday 66th birthday of 13th April and his critical condition that his facial looked lightened a bit probably with a skip complications, he had lost weight and this was connected to his absence at the ending of the Masaza tournament an attribute which fed a rumor mill that started gaining traction on social media platforms that the Buganda monarch king was critically ill and his tours to Kenya were not for recreation but rather for medical treatment for the fact he even looked to have lost weight and his body looked peril to he might have been suffering from a serious skin disease that his skin looked light when he last appeared at the Masaza cup opining and in December 2020 during the opening of the 28th Buganda Lukiiko on January 11th where he looked a bit different with probably small skin complications thus arousing masses creating periods of challenge within Buganda kingdom hence an effect of the third Kabaka crisis.

The other aspect is that the third Kabaka crisis also undermined the glorified acronyms of Buganda thus the burning of the more treasured and respected Buganda attributes at both Kasubi and the earlies Mengo 1966 crisis in which the royal drums and other aspects were stolen, this today is explained in the situation of the burnings of the Kasubi tombs of June 5th, 2020 in which the spiritual Buganda royal twins caught fire and aspect which called up history reminding Buganda of the sad mysterious fires which even led to the collection of the locally known Etofali both awithin Uganda and the outside world hence periods of tension and misery among Ugandans but most especially the king's subjects the Baganda for which period was characterized with challenging moments for the loss of the Buganda royal attributes end created room for tensions and fears among Ugandans but more especially king's subjects the Baganda hence an effect of the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The situations of the third Kabaka crisis created a period where the tragic symbolize entrenched impunity and the curtailment of free expression in the attribute due to the heavy deployments within Buganda in reference to Uganda hence an effect of the third Kabaka crisis. Within this aspect following the heavy deployments that were seen within Buganda towards the king's 66th birthday of Tuesday 13th April, 2021 and also towards the presidential general elections of 2021 in Uganda which was also characterized with the heavy and brutal arrests with mistreatments from the deployed armed that lived in line with the fatal and non-fatal shooting, combated and the well trained and equipped army men together with the police and attribute that called upon public outcry for fear of people's rights an aspect that lived a threat to human life together with their rights of expression hence an effect of the third Kabaka crisis within Buganda in reference to Uganda.

The third Kabaka crisis also created a back fire period of thoughts within Uganda but more especially among the king's subjects the Baganda and situations went rooming when the king of Buganda Kabaka Ronald Muwenda Mutebi II was presented to the public in such a vegetative state at his 66th birthday celebrations at Bulange Mengo palace, Kabaka seemingly not to be fine with reference that he looked frail, and seemed to have lost weight that he even struggled so as to keep his eyes open and worth noting that his throat also looked struggling to take anything with the note of fact that even his speech was slurred with reference that was seen struggling to breath properly all conditions created more terifications, fears, tensions thus lived a threat to many Ugandans but more especially king's subjects the Baganda hence an effect of the third Kabaka crisis.

THE KABAKA BIRTHDAY CRISIS "AN UNTOLD STORY OF 2021"

For a period of over 28 years of his reign on the throne, Ronald Muwenda Mutebi the king of Buganda had not missed out on any serious occasions of the kingdom such as opening of Buganda Parliament (Lukiiko), coronation anniversary, general community cleaning, opening and closing of Masaza cup and his birthday. Surprisingly, in March 2021, he was conspicuously absent at the closure of the annual Masaza cup final an event that was at St Mays Stadium Kitende.

He was represented by Katikiro Charles Peter Mayiga the kingdom premier who remarked that he was not to turn up reason being he had an urgent meeting with some visitors in Kenya. This increased the presumption that the rumor going round on social media that the Buganda monarch is critically ill might be true. The rumour had started in early September 2020 that the king had been poisoned and rushed to Kenya for treatment.

Due to the pressure from the natives, the kingdom rushed and released photos of the king with the president of Kenya Uhuru Kenyatta and former Prime Minister Raila Omolo Odinga.

Previously, when he appeared for the opening of the Lukiiko and the Masaza cup, the Kabaka seemed not to be in a good condition. His facial skin had lightened a bit-probably a small pointer to a skin complication. When eventually he failed to light up as usual for the Masaza tournament closure, the rumour of his ill health gained more attraction and some online bloggers pronounced him dead something that put Buganda on Tenterhooks about their king.

On the 13th of April 2021, the Kabaka celebrated his 66th birthday but surprisingly, he was presented before the Baganda in such a nasty health condition. Many of the natives started allegations that he had been poisoned by the central government[1292]. The occasion was graced by a few dignitaries including the vice president Mr. Edward Kiwanuka Ssekandi, the state minister for higher education, Mr. John Chrysestom Muyingo, Deputy Supreme Mufti Muhamood Kibaate and mengo ministers among others. As usual, the king turned up with his family including the queen Nnabagereka Sylvia Nagginda.

When he arrived for this ceremony, the audience in attendance realized something was not well. Some actually started to shed tears on seeing the frail Kabaka who could not maintain his breath. His eyes were not in proper condition. The king was indeed struggling for his breathe a situation the weak hearted could not explain at the moment.

When questions arose about his health, an unclear source from the palace stated the there was an intense debate on whether he should come out in the public. “If he didn’t then this would confirm the rumour that he was very sick or actually dead like some people had pronounced. So it was agreed that he should come out because surely no one would believe anything if the person celebrating his birthday didn’t attend the party in person.”[1293]

What annoyed most of the masses is the fact that the Katikiro Charles Peter Mayiga kept on deceiving them that the king was well something they referred to as an insult to them.

Following this, a lot of them were seen shading tears and others blamed the “Katikiro” for being an ally of the central government working towards the destruction of the kingdom which the prime minister rubbished. In his defense, he informed the public that the king had been battling allergies andwas to get well. This was however rubbished by the populance who started to demand for his resignation[1294].

[1292] James Kabengwa. Stop Speculating about Kabaka’s health-Mengo.Daily Monitor. Retrieved on 25th May 2021
[1293] The source stated while having an interview with The Observer a newspaper based in Uganda.
[1294]The Bridge. Too many unanswered questions as Kabaka Appears in Public sick and frail.April 14th 2021 by Sourced. Many started to throw postesinfront of Mengo palace demanding for the resignation of the Prime Minister

It seems the conflicts and clash between the two shall not end. Upon the completion of the2021 general elections, many of the leaders from the ruling party of NRM were seen pointing figures in Buganda being the major reason why NRM lost the majority seats of Parliament in Buganda or central region[1295].

One can arguably say that the clashes between the central government and Buganda may not end due to the increased differences between the two factions despite the continues call for unity among them. The Baganda seem to be serious on the matter of achieving federalism in Uganda which idea does not manifest in the programs of NRM government. It is now clear that the kingdom cannot be separated from politics as it eyes the Buganda politicians as its own way for achieving federalism.

THE CONFRONTATION OF KATIKIRO

After the birthday, a fake letter appeared on social media which attracted attention. In this letter, its content was relieving the Katikiro of his duties as the Prime Minister of Buganda. Besides, there were some significant comments about Mayiga accusing him of a litany of issues.

Opinion from the masses increased that he was responsible for the mess. Some stated that he would have refrained the Kabaka from appearingbefore the public and others that he was the reason the Kabaka had not sought more specialized medical attention abroad. Many amplified their voices that he would have informed the public of his health other than hiding his condition.

This saw some of the officials torn. Some blaming the Katikiro and others supporting his move. "The problem with some of our people is that they think the Katikiro is the boss of the Kabaka. He is not; therefore, hecan't order him on what to do or what not to do. Imagine him speaking out about something as sensitive as one's health without first getting clearance to do so. Surely, like any other person, he might have made mistakes as Katikiro but most of the attacks on him are unreasonable"[1296]

Many people both within and abroad were demanding for his resignation. Many posters were thrown at the entrance of mengo palace demanding for the katikiros resignation alleging that he was a servant of the central government working towards the weakening of the kingdom.[1297]

The loyalists decoded to make unsubstantiated allegations against Katikiro in relation to the Kabaka's worrying health. "Katikiro is working with the enemies of he kingdom to end the king's life" Through the various social media, they expressed their anger against him arguing that it was

---

Charles Peter Mayigawhich he declined.

[1295] Minister Kiwandasuubi had a press conference where he remarked that the kingdom had supported the National Unity Platform headed by Robert Kyagulanyi Ssentamu a muganda. He also blamed it to religious leaders in Buganda.

[1296] A source from mengo informed the press.

[1297]The Observer. Who to blame when Kabaka is sick? Retrieved 8th June 2021.

wrong for Mayiga to keep them in dark about the king's health. Unknown to them, the Mayiga cabin was not willing to resign. Though the situation lasted for long, it was short lived and he continued to reign as the kingdom premie.

"…when Mayiga failed to communicate that the Kabaka was sick and deceived the masses that he was well, he was supposed to resign. In 1953 crisis, there was Katikkiro who was called Paul Kavuma. The moment Muteesa was deported Kavuma was made to resign because he failed to handle the crisis…"

Just like his predecessors, Mayiga is faced public outcry from the public that he should resign. Some alleging that he is a mole to the kingdom by allying with the central government to weaken the kingdom. Why would he deceive the masses that the Kabaka was well yet bed ridden? Some allegations concerned self-enrichment just like what happened to J.B.Walusimbi.[1298]

For long, any katikkiro who made any mistake concerning the health, custom and culture or leadership of Buganda had to resign regardless of the achievements made for the kingdom. Mayiga would have resigned had he existed in the 40s and 60s where people were serious about independence of Buganda. He could not have survived from resignation following his conduct about the health of the King. What and how would it be if the Kabaka had passed on? He is a lucky man!! Indeed, he is.

In 1964, Katikkiro Michael Kintu was showed his exit. When a young and gentle Legislator Milton Obote was first presented before SseKabaka Muteesa II by some of his old friends of Buddo in his palace in Bamunaanika, and asked him to bless UPC with an alliance of KY. Katikiro Kintu stood up and declined these entreaties. He suspected a ruse and would not bring himself to trust the unknown Obote trying as much to dissuade the Kabaka from committing.

This was not known by many Baganda that Kintu never liked such treaties but the king ignored him. When they had gone for the Lancaster Conference, he continued to demand for complete independence of Buganda though he was unlucky that he never achieved this.

Important to note is that it did not take long for his premonitions to come true. After independence, events started to fall out one by one. The biggest event was the referendum for the return of the lost counties. When Buganda had lost the two counties following the referendum, whom do you think was blamed? A mob quickly descended upon the Lukiiko and demanded Katikkiro Kintus immediate resignation. The Kabaka does not make a mistake. Once it happens it's the Katikkiro responsible. The Katikkiro has to always find way out for weakening and ashaming Buganda.

Katikkiro Michael Kintu had succeeded Katikkiro Paul Kavuma who was also shown the exit for failing Buganda in one way or another. In the 1950s, the Katikkiro faced unpleasant challenge when the British decided to depot the Kabaka Muteesa II who was opposed to the East Africa Federation a proposal by the British. Many people started spreading rumors that he had a hand in the plot during the Kabaka crisis and demanded for his resignation.[1299]

[1298] New Vision April 2021. The Assault on Mayiga and the trials of Bugandas Katikkiro. Dr Martin M. Lwanga. Also available on https://www.newvision.co.ug.

In his memoir, he states that, "he felt it was better to continue holding on to the reign of government." [1300]Though his efforts to stay in power later paid off when the king was returned in 1955, he was shown exit by the Baganda due to continued allegations that he had been part of a scheme with the British to rob the king of his power.

Paul Kavuma had as well succeeded the son of Apollo Kagwa, Kawalya Kagwa who too had been pushed out like his father. His case was based on weakness. He had failed to secure support in his battles with the British for supremacy of Bugandas region. The "beer permits" where Katikkiro Kagwa felt he had the final say on who to license permits which the British deferred, ultimately led him to quit his 33 years old on to the premiership.

Kagwa had done so much for Buganda. He welcomed the introduction of cash crops in Uganda like cotton and coffee. It was him that prevented the whites from invading and taking over land like what they had done in Kenya. He inspired the construction of schools like Kings College Buddo which has given the nation three heads of state. He welcomed the missionaries that built hospitals like Mengo hospital and the construction of St Paul's Cathedral Namirembe. Despite all these achievements, one mistake led to his dismissal. Indeed, he died a sad man in Nairobi.

The most resisted Katikkiro of Buganda was Martin Luther Nsibirwa. He was a protégé of katikkiro Kagwa who had mentored him into the Buganda government service. He was shown doors for promoting immorality contrary to the Ganda culture.[1301] Nsibirwa supported the Nnamasole to remarry which earned him the ire of many traditionalists. This was against the customs. It was an act of equating the man to Kabaka Daudi Chwa yet the Kabaka is considered Ssegwanga and Ssabasajja.

When you fall out of favor among certain Baganda, they start questioning your ancestry. Katikiro Nsibirwa signed off 200 acres of land to the British to expand Makerere University. This was a great move and a brave of a man at a time. But it could not be noticed. After this, in the early morning while about to enter Namirembe Cathedral for morning prayers, Nsibirwa was shot dead by a one Ssenkatuka.

[1299] The 1953 Kabaka Crisis was as a result of deportation of Kabaka Muteesa II following his decline to the East African Federation.

[1300]Michael Kintu in his memoir "Crisis in Buganda."

[1301] Summers, Carol. " Scandal and Mass Politics: Bugandas 1941 Nnamasole Crisis." International Journal of Africa Historical Studies 51, no 1 (2018); 63-83..

He was replaced by Katikiro Samuel Wamala but his administration was short-lived. He was also shown exit in a shameful way due to outcry by the Baganda following 1945 riots for sponsoring. He along with other chiefs of Buganda were arrested and taken to Seychelles, written off as a mad man and it was from there that he died. Surprisingly, despite his fight against British domination, he is not so much remembered, mentioned and honored among the Katikkiros Buganda has ever had. That is how Katikiros in Buganda lose offices in case of a small mistake that is taken to cost the Kingdom.

THE BIRTHDAY CAKE

The controversies about the cake arose about its shape that was coffin like in nature and its color as well. This cake raked mostly negative reviews on social media as some complained about the color of choice which was deemed to have political connotations. This cake was made in a rectangular shape with yellow decorations something that left many commentators questioning about this color choice. It painted a certain picture in the view of many that indeed it was a political move.

In his defence about the cake, Kenneth Nsibambi the baker came out to clarify on this cake amidst rising threats from the Baganda about this theorem that had been adopted where he stated that he only followed the specifications provided by the organizers. "It's not the baker that decides on the color and shape of the Kabaka's birthday cake. The Royal family does and this time round that was the shape and color that was preferred. Sorry for all those that have been negatively affected long live the king of Buganda."[1302] No one best understands why this was opted for though some speculate that it was a political move adopted by the kingdom to insinuate violence.

Most of the Baganda raised eyebrows concerning their Kabaka's birthday cake. They connected the dots to the already mysterious health whereabouts of their ruler. They had taken long since they last saw the king in public and when they finally set focus on him, he was in an ill condition that did not attract attention. There were reports developed that the Kabaka was in and out for months treating throat cancer whereas other unconfirmed reports suggested that he was poisoned.[1303]

This had come in a period of political tension that was created by the 2021 general elections where NRM has won but with a defeat in Buganda. NRM had lost most of the Parliamentary seats that saw NUP win in the great divisions of Buganda. Misunderstandings had developed between NRM and Buganda where most of the officials in the party were blaming their defeat to the kingdom claiming that it had sidelined with NUP and religious leaders to defeat NRM.

But nonetheless, this view cannot be undermined for Buganda has for long demanded for its property that is in possession of the central government and it had proven beyond doubt that the NRM government could not raise its eyebrows to witness Buganda's demands. Perhaps this [1302] Nsibambi while explaining about the coffin like cake tainted with yellow.

[1303] Baron Kironde. I was ordered by the Kingdom. Kabaka Mutebis "CASKET" birthday cake maker Nsibambi. "Makes some things clear" Grapevines Uganda News.

underlines the untold truth in NRM assertions.

It's for this reason that the kingdom hides behind a few opposition political parties in the struggle against Musevenis government in the view that upon success, Buganda can revive and receive its property. When this fails, many times Buganda continued to raise its voice to the elected MPs of Buganda region to demand for its property and work on its demands.

Because of this tension and internal feud between the kingdom and the central government, many spectators of the birthday believed that perhaps the Kabaka might have been poisoned by the government as a move to weaken the kingdom. The kingdom had gone through a lot ever since it started to raise demand for its property. In 2009, there were riots that were spearheaded by the central government where it deployed heavy security machinery to block the Kabaka and Katikiro from heading to Bugerere.

These riots led to loss of lives and destruction of property. Many Baganda vowed not to support the central government for this seemed to be an insult to the Kabaka. In 2010, when the "Masiro" "kasubi tombs" were torched to flames, the Baganda pointed this blame to the central government claiming that it was responsible for this. Though the president warned about such allegations, the Baganda were still not convinced.

Ideally, no one up to now can vehemently explain the reasoning believed the presentation of the Buganda king for his birthday in such a condition. They had demanded that the king should say something to the people having heard rumours that went viral on social media that the Kabaka had passed on. When he was traced in Kenya, the royal family including the Katikiro alleged that he had gone to Kenya to meet the president Kenyatta over certain matters. Reports from unclear sources stated that he had been taken for treatment.

EXORCING THE BUGANDA GHOST

In my conclusion therefore, The third Kabaka crisis was an arousement of the masses in Buganda in reference to Uganda and was characterized with notions of both political, social and economically in nature but the all situations was sparked off following the attributed presentation of the king of Buganda Kabaka Ronald MuwendaMutebi ii to the public is the vegetative state at his 66th birthday celebrations of Tuesday 13th April, 2021 at Bulange Mengo palace, howeverthe third Kabaka crisis not to be confused with the earlier Kabaka crisis these including the 1953 and 1955 in which a period evolved and developed into a political and constitutional crisis in the Uganda protectorate where the king of Buganda pressed for Buganda secession from Uganda as a protectorate and therefore his attributes were subsequently deposed and exiled by the british governor Andrew Cohen. That was therefore followed by the Kabaka crisis, the 1966 Kabaka crisis that was stormed by the political differences and grievances that existed between the then king of Buganda Kabaka Mutessa II and the then prime minister of Uganda Dr. Milton Obote and all the a mentioned attributed are explained in their different notions an above.

NUP 2021 STUNNING POLITICAL VICTORY IN BUGANDA

"…the Baganda who failed to pass through, they failed because they stuck to Museveni they feel offended. In Buganda it was a wave and if Mzee continues that theory it will not end if he remain blaming those that ignored things which are preferred by the Parliament…. if America Kyambadde had accompanied Museveni and crossed to NUP she would have stayed in power…"

In a stunning wave of results, all the 13 cabinet ministers from Buganda were defeated by opposition candidates in particular those from Kyagulanyis NUP. The humbling ended NRMs dominance of the key strategic strong hold of Buganda. Most of them alleged that the continued brutalization of Kyagulanyi and his supporters on the campaign trail swayed the electorate to vote against them. One of the biggest eye openers in Buganda was that president Museveni lost at the polling stations in Buganda.[1304]

Truth be told, that was an expression of the Baganda hatred towards the central government of NRM following its continued neglect of Buganda's grievances and demands. The Baganda had hope that perhaps if Kyagulanyi a muganda won the elections, they would have their demands catered for. Buganda has for long demanded for federo, its property that was taken by the central government after the 1966 Kabaka crisis, rent from the central government for utilizing its property and many more but all this has been always turned down by the government.

What hurt most of the electorates in the region was having their own friends, relatives, children and grandchildren working for the NRM government and secondly using them to challenge Buganda and silence its demands yet the region actually benefited nothing from them. Many of these ended up losing the elections. These included America Kyambadde, Vincent Ssempijja, Nakiwala Kiyingi, Edward Ssekandi, John Chrysestom Muyingo, Ronald Kibuule and others. These were strong holds of NRM.

Buganda had always demanded for Federal to return to its position where it was in 1966. Speaking at Kabaka Ronald Mutebis 27th coronation anniversary, Mr. Charles Peter Mayiga, the kingdom prime minister told the Kabaka that there was growing demand within the kingdom for the government to address their quest for federal status. He said this is because of the milestone the kingdom has achieved amid difficulties, to re-revamp institutions which had collapsed and establishing new ones which are restoring the status the kingdom enjoyed before its abolition in 1966.[1305]

The decline to this had been due to government desire to distance Buganda from Uganda's politics alleging that it shall draw the Pearl back to political instability while relying on history mappings. When the government came to power in 1986, one of the challenges it faced was the position of Buganda in contemporary Uganda. The restoration of the kingdoms had been a promise by [1304] The Observer Jun 22, 2021. Brutality on Bobi cost us in Buganda-defeated. By Observer Team.

[1305] Daily Monitor Aug 2, 2020. Buganda tasks government on Federal system. Stephen Otage.

Museveni to the Baganda during the bush war but unsolved was how the kingdom of Buganda was to operate.

Perhaps this explains the return to kingdom system but on condition that the kingdoms do not involve in politics. The government ended up making them Constitutional monarchs that were only concerned with customs and not to involve in political activities of Uganda. Yes, returning the kingdom was welcomed by the Baganda but denying them the autonomy was never to leave their hearts. They continued to demand for their Autonomy as it was at independence.[1306]

The demand for Federal system would be a return to the past according to the government. Secondly, the central government is settled on Buganda soils and perhaps the heart of Uganda is in Buganda. This posed a big question as to what would happen when Buganda was returned to its position of 1962. This left the Baganda hurt. Most of them stared at Museveni as a betrayer. He had betrayed his promise towards them of returning the kingdom to its height which to them meant having their autonomy.

This accompanied by the September 2009 riots, burning of the Kasubi tombs poor service delivery in Buganda, unemployment among the youth and increased rumors that the government was working towards weakening the kingdom left many Baganda in hatred towards NRM.

In September 2009, we saw an explosion of rioting in Kampala which is part of the kingdoms historical territory as thousands of young people took to the streets to protest a symbolic power play by the Ugandan government against the king of Buganda. The immediate cause was the central governments denial of the king to go Bugerere. [1307]This was an insult to the Ganda people. A year after this, the kasubi tombs were put on fire. The rumors started to spread throughout Buganda that Museveni and his government was behind all this.

The demands of Buganda created misunderstandings among people. At one end are the people of Buganda who hunger for the degree of autonomy for the ancient kingdom remains undiminished and there are those who wonder if the binaries are too extreme. The government went nervous about what they see as the risks of having a kingdom with political power thriving within a country whose Constitution defines it as a republic. To it the question had to be settled once and for all.

Ideally it could not make sense for them to vote for NRM in their region that had for long neglected their desires. How could they vote the NRM Baganda that they considered to be betrayers of the region by working with their long enemy president Museveni? If they had deserted Museveni and his NRM in that election and perhaps crossed to NUP, they would have won the elections.

[1306] Mikael Karlstrom. Imagining Democracy: Political Culture and Democratization in Buganda.Journal of the International African Institute Vol. 66, No 4 (1996).Pp 485-505. Cambridge University Press.

[1307] Fredrick Golooba-Mutebi. Settling the Buganda Question. Transition No 106, side B: Reflections from Contemporary Uganda. A selection of writing at work and photography (2011), pp.10-25.Indiana University Press.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

THE EXECUTIVE AND RELIGION

This chapter explores the complexities of the church and state relations with keen focus placed on Uganda. Uganda's religious heritage comprises of indigenous religions such as Islam and Christianity. About four-firths of the population is Christian, primarily divided between Roman Catholics and Protestants.

The constitution of Uganda[1308] provides for the right to freedom of religion under Article 29(1) (c) which states that;

Every person shall have the right to-freedom to practise any religion and manifest such practice which shall include the right to belong to and participate in practices of any religious body or organisation in a manner consistent with this constitution.

This right is also rooted in UN international law. Article 18 of the universal declaration of Human rights[1309] provides that;

"Everyone has the right and freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes the right to change one's religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance."

Furthermore, the international covenant on civil and political rights, a UN treaty which Uganda is signatory to also contains a similar provision on the right to freedom of religion.

Article 18 (1) of the ICCPR states that;

"Everyone shall have the right and freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right shall include freedom to have or adopt a religion or belief of his choice, and freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance."

Other regional treaties such as the European convention on human rights and the African charter on human and people's rights also contain provisions for the right to religion.

The right to the freedom of religion is indispensable for pluralism; it is one of the foundations of a democratic society. As noted by the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), this freedom undoubtedly is, in its religious dimension, one of the most vital elements that go to make up the identity of believers and their conception of life, but it is also a precious asset for atheists,

[1308] 1995 constitution of the Republic of Uganda as ammended
[1309] Universal Declaration of human rights, Article 18

agnostics, sceptics and the unconcerned. The pluralism in dissociable from a democratic society, which has been dearly won over the centuries, depends on it. That freedom entails, inter alia, freedom to hold or not to hold religious beliefs and to practise or not to practise a religion.[1310]

The European court of human rights in the case of Francesco Sessa v Italy[1311], the right to freedom of religion is one of the most vital elements which go to make up the identity of believers and their conception of life; as well as a precious asset for Atheists, agnostics, sceptics and the unconcerned. Respect of freedom of religion is also a marker of a free society.

In the case of R vs. Big M Drug Mart Ltd[1312] it was observed that; "a truly free society is one which can accommodate a wide variety of beliefs, diversity of tastes and pursuits, customs and codes of conduct. A free society is one which aims at equality with respect to the enjoyment of fundamental freedoms and I say this without any reliance on the charter."

Having addressed the legal frame work around the right to religion, I proceed to look in to the relationship between religion and the state.

The Most rev. Archbishop Joseph Kiwanuka, d.d., Archbishop of Lubaga (Uganda) in his pastoral letter[1313] observes that "I believe that some are irritated and do wrong to others because they do not understand the changes that are taking place in the government, and neither do they understand the relation between Church and State. In fact, Church and State should have good relations with one another and work together for the common good."

The three forms of government found in the world up to this day were described long ago by a Greek philosopher, Aristotle.

i. The first form is the Absolute Monarchy. In that form of government, the power to make laws obliging the whole country (legislative) and the power to judge trials and punish (judiciary), are all vested in the king.

ii. The second form is that of Aristocracy (Bakungu) sharing in government. Then the power of ruling is in the hands of such chiefs.

iii. The third form is that in which all citizens take part, and the government is that of the people (democracy). The people themselves elect their representatives.

However, in certain countries these three forms have been joined together so that the government is formed of a king with the chiefs, and the representatives elected by the citizens. England has such a government.

[1310]Kokkinakis v. Greece, 260 Eur. Ct. H.R. (ser. A) ¶ 31; Buscarini v. San Marino, 1999-I Eur. Ct. H.R. 605, ¶ 34.

[1311]Francesco Sessa v Italy application number 28790/08

[1312]R vs Big M Drug Mart ltd [1985]1 R.C.S 295

[1313]Pastoral letter of the most rev. archbishop joseph kiwanuka, d.d., archbishop of lubaga(uganda) church and state Guiding Principles November 1961

STATE VERSUS RELIGION EXECUTIVE MANDATE

Speke's route traced old Arabic trade routes that carried ivory and slaves to Sultan Majid's Zanzibar. He drove inland and then curled up and along the western shore of Lake Victoria into the Buganda kingdom. Arabic traders had a toehold for Islam among the Baganda elite by the mid-1800s.[1314] Islam occupied a privileged place in Mutesa's court by the time of Speke's arrival, though he appeared not to notice its influence.

When the Christian missionaries retraced Speke's red-lined route to Buganda, they found Islam the state religion under the Kabaka. Islam would lose much ground to Protestants and Catholics in the coming decades, but it remained a defining characteristic for many inhabitants of the future Uganda state. Only the Marriage and Divorce of Mohammedans Act of 1906 explicitly addressed Muslims and their laws. Like the other marriage statutes, the law provided procedures for registering and dissolving marriages, though according to Islamic principles. While it clearly applied to Muslims of Arabic, Somali or Indian origin, it also applied to the not insubstantial African Muslim minority. The major legal instruments from the Uganda Order in Council of 1902 to the Judicature Act of 1962 were silent on whether Islamic law was a valid source of law. A series of High Court judgments would fail to build a coherent position on this question.

Islamic law cases were a rarity in the High Court's first six decades. The few cases that did reach the courts invariably dealt with marital issues. An early case in 1921, Bibi v. Bibi, disputed the High Court's jurisdiction and valid sources of law in child custody cases Justice Guthrie held that the High Court could make orders for the custody of Muslim children according to received English law. However, a judge might follow the special customs of community so long as it was not "so inhuman as to deprive the mother of her custody of an infant child. The High Court would invoke the repugnancy clause to limit the use of lslamic custom in a 1928 case, Satardin v. Mahomed. The Court annulled a marriage contracted by a girl's father against her will, stating "parents in Uganda have no authority to contract for the marriage of their children whether Muhammadans or not.[1315] This decision prohibited jabr, a father's right to make a marriage contract that compelled his daughter to marry under some interpretations of shari'a law. By the 1930s, the High Court applied first the Marriage and Divorce of Mohammedans Ordinance, then received English law and finally Islamic "customs" not repugnant to English morals.

[1314] S. 2 of the Marriage and Divorce '! Mohammedans Ordinance states: "The Marriage Ordinance and the Marriage of Africans Ordinance, shall cease to apply to the celebration of marriages between persons both of whom profess the Mohammedan religion". See J.N.D. Anderson, "The Isma'ili Khojas of East Africa" (1964) 1 Middle Eastern Studies 21.

[1315] S. 2 of the Marriage and Divorce '![Mohammedans Ordinance states: "The Marriage Ordinance and the Marriage of Africans Ordinance, shall cease to apply to the celebration of marriages between persons both of whom profess the Mohammedan religion". See J.N.D. Anderson, "The Isma'ili Khojas of East Africa" (1964) 1 Middle Eastern Studies 21.

In 1956, the High Court heard an application from a woman to separate from her alleged husband. The woman had married the man, also an Isma'ili Khoja, when she was 15 years old under the Marriage Act, unaware that it did not apply to Muslims. The Court decided her purported marriage was invalid because it was registered under the wrong law and dismissed her claim. In Mohamed v. BhilliJi, an appeal to the East African Court of Appeal, the judges referred to the "Constitution, Rules and Regulations of His Highness the Aga Khan Isma'ili Councils of Africa," which set 16 as the minimum age of marriage to a woman[1316]

The Court characterized the "Uganda Isma'ili Khojas as a whole" as a "tribe or sect". Since this "tribe" was "bound by rules or customs which precluded marriage" of women under 16, then the appellant's marriage was invalid. The Court continued, however, to posit a "normal Shia law" that takes puberty as the minimum age for marriage. Thus the Aga Khan's Rules must "be read in conjunction with the general Shia law", which trumps them in this case. This conclusion directly contradicts the testimony of two expert witnesses -the President of the Kampala Provincial Council and a member of the Uganda Supreme Council of the Isma'ili Community- who both said that a marriage was invalid if the woman was under 16.[1317] Yet the Court made a "correct construction" and concluded that "the [Aga Khan's] Rules do not modify the Sharia, either by imposing a new age limit ... or by defining new forms. ..essential to the validity of a marriage."[1318] A contemporary British expert on Islamic law observed that many variations and schools of shari'a existed in Uganda and no ideal or pure shari'a existed.[1319] The Court in Mohamed v. Bhimji thus seemed to create an ideal Islamic law in the mould of the more familial customary law.

The Succession Act of 1906 did not explicitly deal with Islamic law, [1320]this oversight left the High Court with a tricky question of what law applied to the property of deceased Muslims in Uganda. In an early High Court decision, Re Habash: Valisa v. S. 2 of the Marriage and Divorce '! [Mohammedans Ordinance states: "The Marriage Ordinance and the Marriage of Africans Ordinance, shall cease to apply to the celebration of marriages between persons both of whom profess the Mohammedan religion". [1321]

Sophia, Justice Smith found that the Succession Ordinance did not include Muslims.[1322] He continued: There is no room anywhere for the application of Mohammedan law to land and it

[1316]JN.D. Anderson,"Muslim MarriagesandtheCourtsinEastAfrica"(1957)1JAfr.L.14at20
[1317]Id.
[1318]Id.
[1319]Id.
[1320]Cap.139.
[1321] See J.N.D. Anderson, "The Isma'ili Khojas of East Africa" (1964) 1 Middle Eastern Studies 21.
[1322] (1920)3 U.L.R.

would lead to hopeless confusion if the course of descent of land depended both of tribe and religion. The conclusion is that this case falls to be determined according to the English rules of succession.[1323]

Justice Smith's reasoning revealed his unwillingness to accept that multiple legal orders might apply to an individual. In this case, the deceased had no customary law attached to him since as a non-African he had no tribe. Given the bifurcated legal system discussed above, Smith decided that the deceased must be subject to civil laws by default. And since the Succession Ordinance did not apply to Muslims, the only valid law available to him was English rules of succession.

Two decades later in 1941 the High Court again found the Succession Act did not apply to Muslims in Re Alibhai[1324] Rather than fall back on English law, Gamble Ag. C.J. held that the widow should receive the share of her husband's estate provided for Islamic law. In a 1949 decision, the High Court confirmed that cases of intestacy for foreign Muslims, who were also exempted from the Succession Act, should be decided "according to the rules of Muhammedan law governing intestacy"[1325] In both judgments, "Islamic law" had become a term for a fixed set of rules interpreted by judges. Muslims were thus treated as a distinct tribal category governed by an idealized Islamic law.

The High Court's interpretation of Muslim marriage and succession was shaped by its experience with customary law. Its early decisions rejected shari'a as a valid source of law. But the Court later accepted it in the guise of custom influencing their use of English law, so long as it was not morally repugnant. By the late 1950s, however, the High Court had postulated a rarefied "normal Shia" law universally applicable to all Muslims. While not territorially defined, it mirrored the development of customary laws into "an idealized version of traditional marriage" unique to each tribe. All Muslims were forced into the same "tribe" even at the expense of abandoning the repugnancy principle. In Mohamed v. Bhimji, for example, the Court upheld their shari'a construction, which permitted marriage at puberty for women, rather than accept a multitude of interpretations for each of the diverse, overlapping Muslim communities in Uganda.

"Islamic law" thus became the latest customary law attached to members of the newly created, though geographically dispersed, Muslim tribe. The civil courts' changing view on Islamic laws' applicability to marriage and succession had little direct impact on shari'a in practice since a vast majority of disputes never even reached them. If a father made a jabr marriage contract with which his daughter disagreed, for example, the parties would first appeal to local Imams, then the Isma'ili [1325]&DinEstate (Deceased) (1949), Admin. Cause No .36(H.C.) [unreported) cited in J.N.D. Anderson,"The Law of Succession in Uganda: An Unreported Case"(1963)7J.Afr.L. 201at206.

[1323] Emphasis added.
[1324] (1941) 6 U.L.R. 89 (H.C).

Councils or the Muslim Religious Council in Kampala. The Kampala Council, for example, "had certain nebulous functions", that included applying Islamic law in Buganda.[1326] But the Council was no binding court of law and unhappy individuals could always take their disputes to the High Court. Respected experts trained in shari'a most often applied Islamic law, like two Imams in Bomba who married people regularly. Yet they refused to sanction jabr marriages for fear of government disapproval even though they believed it was a correct reading of shari'a law.[1327] Although historical evidence is scarce or tangential, it appears that the colonial state influenced Islamic laws most by having religious councils or individual Imams modify their interpretation of shari'a to avoid having their adherents appeal to the colonial courts.

Islamic laws occupied an ambivalent place in the legal history of Uganda. The colonial government treated it at different times as statutory, customary or an idealized "sharia" law. And at yet other times it was treated as local custom or simply ignored! Since Uganda's small Muslim population was scattered throughout the country, it did not fit into the indirect rule scheme that presumed a unique customary law for each geographically discrete "tribe". When faced with individuals like Abu Mayanja, the attorney for Matovu, who was Baganda, Muslim and a minister in both the Kabaka's Lukiiko-, and Obote's, cabinets, it was unclear what law applied-Islamic or customary.[1328] In addition to indigenous converts Muslims represented a diverse group of Somali and Arab visitors and long-time residents of Asian origin. Administrators and especially judges used to customary law had trouble with egocentric Islamic laws. Some chose village Imams to interpret shari'a, while those part of transnational communities like the Isma'ili Khoja relied on foreign authority of the Aga Khan. In between there were countless shari'a variations. Since courts did not have a ready-made tribe for Muslims, they invented one that took its final form in Mohamed v. Bhimji. When the state tried to coerce a geocentric projection from egocentric laws, most Muslims responded by avoiding civil courts and thus disappeared from the state law map.

Idi Amin's rise seemed a blessing for Uganda's Muslims who had lost out to Christian and Protestants in the religious wars of the 1880s. Before joining the army, he had studied at an Islamic school and excelled in reciting the Qur'an. Amin seemed to cement his relationship with African Muslims in 1972 by clearing the hilltop ruins of Lugard's fort to start building a 15,000 seat mosque. But that same year he expelled "Asians" from Uganda, most of whom were fellow Muslims. Amin's deepening atrocities eventually drove Muslim leaders away and after his fall Muslims had again become a marginal force in Uganda. In 1993, George Kanyeihamba, a former

[1326] Anderson 1970, at 154.
[1327] ld. at 153
[1328] Nganda, supra

Supreme Court judge, chaired the International Conference on Uganda Muslim Unity and Reconciliation in Kampala to bring together the country's fractured leadership. His effort failed, however, and the Muslim community remained divided along political, not religious, lines of Baganda and non-Baganda.

While Islam was fractured at the national level, a local "clergy" developed from the Islamic schools, like the one Amin attended, "to lead prayers, to interpret the law and to guide the faithful". These experts, half-monk and half-priest, were unique to Uganda and even received the prestigious title of sheik upon graduation Sheiks give opinions on shari'a, including the fiqih (Islamic jurisprudence) and tafsir (commentary on the Qu'ran and other holy books). Without the title sheik, however, no Muslim can lead prayers or run a mosque in Uganda. This informal consecration of sheiks began in with Sheik Ssemakula graduating his two top students as sheiks. These pioneers dispersed to rebuild Islam in Uganda after its near death in the 1880s religious wars.

Today about 10 per cent of Ugandans are Muslims, and so conduct their family and inheritance affairs with the help of certified sheiks in the penumbra of the state legal regime. Islam began an institutional resurgence not seen in the days of Amin or Mutesa. In 1990 Parliament established the Islamic University in Uganda, only the country's second public university, with a dedicated law faculty. Moreover, Article 129(1)(d) of the 1995 Constitution provided for "qadhis' courts for marriage, divorce, inheritance of property and guardianship". Despite trained Islamic lawyers and this constitutional provision, no such qadhis' courts exist currently. The Domestic Relations Bill, however, promised to create them for applying Islamic laws within a larger domestic law framework and would override the century old Marriage and Divorce of Mohammedans Act. As under the old law, two Muslims could marry according to Islamic customs provided they register with the District Registrar of Marriages. More controversially, the law condoned polygamy only if a husband received permission from his existing wife (or wives) before marrying another woman. It also ensured an equitable division of matrimonial property. The law thus represented a concerted attempt to bring Islamic laws within the state legal hierarchy.

When details of the Domestic Relations Bill first came out, it caused a furore in Uganda's Muslim communities. Protestors in Kampala claimed the bill violated Islamic law by constraining polygamy and overruling Qu'ranic rules of inheritance. Many protesters that day were women, despite the law's claims to protect women's rights. Members of women's advocacy groups, like MP Sheila Mishambi, countered that polygamy was rare before colonization and "increased women's servitude and marginalisation". The fierce debate forced the government to plunge the Domestic Relations Bill back into committees where it remained for a long time.

The protesters and the law's advocates both overstated the dangers of the Domestic Relations Bill to Islamic laws in Uganda. Since the 1995 Constitution came into force, no recorded cases involving Islamic law made it to the magistrates' or High Court. Few Muslims registered their marriages under the old law and most preferred to settle domestic disputes outside state laws and courts. When Idi Amin died in 2003, his 54 children rushed to divide the spoils of his considerable estate. Rather than appeal to the Ugandan courts, however, they decided to follow Islamic law as interpreted by "religious elders to distribute the wealth and chose the heir". Ismail Icum, the Secretary for Education of the Uganda Muslim Supreme Council (a body created by Amin in 1971), reported that the "Council and the children have appointed a panel that will deal with the whole issue of inheritance".

Muslims have been remarkably perspicacious at evading state law and its courts. And for good reason (in the past at least). Uganda's judiciary has proven itself a poor interpreter of shari'a's multiple forms since it insists on likening it to customary law. Yet by existing in the shadow of the 1995 Constitution, some women cannot access the formal courts to challenge shari'a interpretations, like jabr, that might harm their interests. Given the fractured nature of Uganda's Muslim polity, this is a constant likelihood. Both protesters and supporters of the Domestic Relations Bill have valid arguments. The real sticking point is a judicial ideology that is blind to the egocentric projections of shari'a. Until formal courts can shed this, Muslims will continue to resist attempts to pull their laws into the full light of the state legal order.

RELIGION DISGUISED BY THE EXECUTIVE

THE FIRST SLAVE SHIP WAS NAMED ‘JESUS”

“Jesus” was the name of the slave ship captained by sir John Hawkins in 1564 by appointment of the queen of England, what has come to be referred to as ‘ The Good Ship Jesus” was in fact Lubeck a 700 tonne ship purchased by King Henry VIII from the Hanseatic League, a merchant alliance between the cities of Homburg and Lubeck in German twenty years after its purchase the ship in disrepair was leant to Sir John Hawkins by Queen Elizabeth, Hawkins s cousin of Sir Francis Drake was granted permission from Queen Elizabeth for his first voyage in 1562, he was allowed to carry Africans to the Americas “ with their own free consent” and he agreed to this condition. Hawkins had a reputation for being e religious man who required his crew to serve God daily and to love one another, Sir Francis Drake accompanied Hawkins on this voyage and subsequent others, Drake was himself devotedly religious services were held on board twice a day, off the coast of Africa near sierra Leone. Hawkins captured 300 to 500 slaves, mostly by plundering Portuguese ships but also through violence and subterfuge promising Africans free land and riches in the new world, he sold most of the slaves in what is now known as the Dominican Republic, he returned home with a profit and ships laden with ivory, hides and sugar, then this was the official beginning of slave trade disguised under religion.

VOX POPULI VOX DEI (THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE IS THE VOICE OF GOD): THE HIDDEN STRENGTH OF RELIGION IN THE HEART OF STATES

Biblically and theologically, whatever is said about the origin of state and its leadership is entirely a version of what started as religion and religious leadership and perhaps the confrontation between the religious leaders and the secular rulers in the early centuries. It's this notion that kept smelting to the modern days when religion was separated from the state. In that sense it is remarkable that religion gave birth to state and therefore the state cannot undermine religion because of its influence in society based on its history.

The notion of leadership is historically traced from the Bible. As Paul the Apostle remarked, everyone must submit himself to the governing authorities, for there is no authority except that which God has established. Roman 13:1 clearly states that every person is to be in subjection to the governing authority. Indeed, God was the first leader and authored the first leadership book called the Bible. God therefore supported the right of a government to govern and protect people from harm.

Biblical paradigms of leadership suggest that leadership is a response to a divine call to be in the service of God's love and justice. The paradigm reveals a theology of leadership which focuses on a pattern of God calling leaders to one mission enterprise-to be in the service and restoration of Gods image in everyone and everything.[1329]

Abraham, Moses, Saul, David, Nehemiah, the Hebrew prophets and Jesus are Biblical models of leadership from which the church drew its inspiration and commitment to the dream of God which was later manipulated to form the idea of modern states. In that sense leadership comes from God and every one ought to obey the state authorities for they are Gods ministers to execute justice. 1Peter 2:13-14 says, submit yourselves for the Lords sake to every human institution, whether to a king as the one in authority or to governors who are sent by him to punish those who do wrong and to praise those who do right.

[1329]Verna Dozier.(1991). "The Dream of God."

HOW IT ALL STARTED

The attitude of the first generations of Christians towards the existing political order was determined by the imminent expectation of the kingdom of God whose miraculous power had begun to be visibly realized in the figure of Jesus Christ.[1330] The importance of a political leader was thus negligible as Jesus once remarked that, "My kingship is not of this world." This brought about tension among the Christians whose orientation about the coming kingdom of God contradicted the demands placed on them by the state since the two were directly in conflict. The state was in conflict with faith.

This contrast was developed most pointedly in the rejection of the emperor cult and of certain state offices above all that of judge to which the power over life and death was professionally entrusted.

Despite their long waiting for the kingdom of God, the early Christians recognized the pagan state to be the holder of order and authority in the world. This can be traced from the Pauline missions who presented an idea that the ruling body or then political order of Roman Empire was from God and therefore every native of the land or any Christian was to be subject to the governing authority.[1331]

In the 4th Century, many emperors were noticed taking over century leadership of the Church. Emperor Constantine granted himself as Bishop of foreign affairs certain rights to church leadership. In the Byzantine Empire, the secular ruler was called priest and emperor and exercised authority as head of the Church.

The emperor held jurisdiction over ecclesiastical affairs which symbolically expressed directly that his authority was from God. This can be well noticed from both his anointing and crowning. In Russia's hemisphere or realms, the Tsardom maintained the same and claimed authority over the church and the area.[1332]

THE CHURCH AND THE WESTERN STATES

When the German tribes invaded the west, they brought about a political vacuum but despite all this, it is notable that only the Roman Church preserved and remained the single institution that preserved in its episcopal dioceses the Roman provincial arrangement. Concern must be drawn on how it administered justice largely depending upon the old imperial law. During the periods of legal and administrative chaos, the Roman administration was viewed as the only guarantor of order. Between the years of 590-604 was the reign of St Gregory I a pope who assumed the decadent imperial bureaucracy.

[1330]The history of church and state. The Church and the Roman Empire available on https://www.britannica.com
[1331]E.P. Sanders.St Paul the Apostle. Christian Apostle. Duke University.
[1332] John. L. Teall. Byzantine Empire.Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Massachusetts. (1968-79).

His wisdom drove him into negotiations with the Lombard kings of Italy, oversaw public welfare and was the soldiers pay master. It was his administration that laid a foundation for the Papal States which emerged in the 8th Century. Supporting the Papal claims and responsibilities was the Petrine theory which high lightened the idea that the pope was the representative of Christ and the successor of St Peter.[1333]

EMERGENCY OF THE PAPAL STATES

The states emerged out of the quarrel between the Holy See and the imperial government at the time of the controversy over iconoclasm. In 725-726 Gregory II put himself at the head of regional Italian resistance to the taxation of the emperor Leo II.

It all started from the Bishops of Rome acquiring lands around the city in the 4th Century which came to be known as the Patrimony of St. Peter. In the 5th Century, there was collapse of the Western Empire and the influence of the Eastern (Byzantine) Empire in Italy weakened. This increased the power of the Bishops, who were often called the "Papa" or "Pope" as the populace turned to them for aid and protection.

During his reign, St Gregory I helped many refugees from invading Lombards and even managed to establish peace with the invaders at the time. He went ahead to consolidate the papal holdings into a unified territory.

In the 8th Century, the Eastern Empire increased taxation and failed to protect Italy, and more especially the emperor's views on iconoclasm, Pope Gregory II broke with the empire and his successor, Pope Gregory III upheld the opposition to the iconoclasts. When the Lombards had seized Ravenna and were on the verge of conquering Rome, Pope Stephen II turned to the king of the Franks, Pippin III. Pippin promised to restore the captured lands to the pope; he then succeeded in defeating the Lombard leader, Aistulf and made him return the lands the Lombards had captured to the papacy ignoring all Byzantine claims to the territory.

Pippins promise and the document that recorded it in 756 are known as the Donation of Pippin and provide the legal foundation for the Papal States.[1334]

Gregory desired to improve the Christian life of the people especially from the west. His efforts strengthened the church of Spain, Gaul and the northern Italy which eventually saw England convert to Roman Christianity. In the 6th century, the Frankish (Germanic) kingdom had an alliance that saw them becoming the new protectors of Papal States when Byzantine emperor was no longer

[1333]Supra.

[1334] Melissa. Snell.The Origin and Decline of the Papal States. Feb 11th 2019 also available on https://www.thouhtco.com able to protect Rome. This brought together religious and secular leaders though it brought into play tension between them as to the nature of relationship between them.

Between the periods of 492-496, new powers emerged that saw the Carolingian rulers claim that they had special rights and duties to protect the church and so continued to have influence in the church through the continued appointments of Bishops of the empire who increasingly involved in political affairs.

In the 10th Century, many emperors maintained the status quo and the result of this was that the bishops in their empires also at times were princes of their dioceses which made them more political than conducting spiritual affairs. Eventually struggles emerge between the popes and secular leaders or rulers. This was followed by new definitions of sin of clerical marriage and simony by St. Peter Damian and Humbert of Silva Candida which virtually eliminated and checked on secular interference in episcopal and Papal succession.[1335]

One of the strong supporters of these reforms was King Gregory VII who was prompted to ban the principles and practices of lay investiture of Bishops and challenged the traditions of sacral kingship. However, his assertion of the Papal authority was opposed by the German ruler Henry IV. The conflict between the two led to the investiture controversy which became a center for the struggle for supremacy between the church and the monarchy. In the end, the resolution left the emperor in a weakened format and boosted the influence of secular rulers.

Despite its resurrection in the 12th century, it faced another challenge during the 13th Century from the rise of European Nation States. It's worth noting that the Papal ideology had been formed to challenge or deal with emperors who meant that it was not suited to challenge them or deal with kings of the nation states.

For instance, there arose a conflict over matters of ecclesiastical independence and royal authority. The Papal fortunes continued to decline during the subsequent Babylonian captivity of the Church, when the papacy resided in Avignon (1309-77) and was perceived as being dominated by the French monarchy.

From 1378-1417, there was increased secular control over the church during the period of Great Schism to the extent that even after this period, the status quo was maintained in Europe. This schism was a result of the growing demand for the return of Papacy's to Rome.

When he came into leadership, Pope Urban VI in Rome alienated a number of cardinals who returned to Avignon and elected a rival pope, Clement VII. This brought about concern of the validity of the consecration of Bishops and the sacraments administered by the priests ordained in Avignon. As a result, this was perpetuated by the European politics as rival rulers supported either the pope in Rome or the pope in Avignon to assert greater authority over the church in their realms. The growth of state power brought in a new normal especially during the reign of King Henry VIII of England. During his reign, there was church dissociation from the Papal Supremacy. Further, in the German territories, the reigning princes became in effect the legal guardians of the Protestant churches (a movement already in the process of consolidation in the late middle ages). The Protestant churches had come into existence as a result of the breakaway of the English church from the Roman Catholic Church doctrines. Protestant was a word derived from "Protestantism" which referred to all groups opposed to the Roman Catholic Church that arose into fame in what came to be known as the "Protestant Revolution."

[1335] Daniel Fancis Callahan. Saint Peter Damian. Italian Cardinal. University of Delawar.Network Delaware.

THE PROTESTANT REVOLUTION / REFORMATION

This revolution started from Winterburg, German on October 31, 1517 when Martin Luther, a teacher and monk published a document called the "Disputation on the Power of Indulgences" or "The Ninety-Five Theses." It contained ninety-five ideas about Christianity that he invited people to debate with him. The ideas contradicted those of the Catholic Church's teachings.

His ideas challenged the Catholic Church's role as intermediary between people and God. He was specifically against the indulgence system which in part allowed people to purchase a certificate of pardon for the punishment of their sins.[1336]Luther argued against the practice of buying or earning forgiveness, believing instead that salvation is a gift God gives to those who have faith. He advocated for the printing of the Bible in the language of the reader rather than in Latin. To him the Catholic churches practices focusing on works such as pilgrimages, the sale of indulgences to obtain forgiveness and prayers addressed to saints were immoral.[1337]

This criticism posed a big threat to the Catholic Church and its doctrines throughout Europe for instance John Calvin in France and Huldrych Zwingli in Switzerland proposed new ideas about the practice of Holy communion and a group called Anabaptists rejected the idea that infants should be baptized in favor of the notion that baptism was reserved for adult Christians.

In fact, most of the challenges to the Catholic Church revolved on the broad notion that believers should mostly dependent on the Catholic Church and its pope and priests for spiritual guidance and salvation. For the Protestants, they believed that people should be independent in their relationship with God, taking personal responsibility in faith and referring directly to the Bible, the Christian Holy book for Spiritual wisdom.

[1336] Peter, J. Manning. A History of the Protestant Reformation.Journal of the History of Cobbets.University of Pennyslvania press.

[1337]Kranz, Nickie. (2005). "Martin Luther stands in History as a leader of th Protestant Reformation," Journal of Undergraduate Research at Minnesta State University, Mankato. Vol 5, Article 13. Available at https://cornerstone.lib.mnsu.edu/jur/vols/iss1/13.

These Protestant reforms all started in England during the reign of Henry VIII when the Pope declined to grant him a marriage annulment. This left him bothered and declined the Popes authority hence creating and assuming authority over the Church of England. This led to religious turbulence throughout England especially during the reign of Queen Mary (1553-1558) who reinstated Catholicism and many Protestants were seen persecuted and others flee to exile.

It was only during the Reign of Queen Elizabeth I that Protestants gained some peace as she strived to restore Protestantism.[1338]

Therefore the Protestant reformation that started in the sixteenth brought an end to the ecclesiastical unity of medieval Christianity in Western Europe and profoundly shaped the course of modern history[1339]. This was soon to appeal to the founders of the United States and some of its concepts of individualism and free expression or religion were incorporated into the first Amendment. Its reason that marks the freedom of religion that the natives should not be forced to be under the captivity of one religion.

These developments so occurred throughout the Catholic states such as Spain, Portugal, France and Others.[1340]

In the 17th Century, a national law conception of relationship between the state and church begun to develop. The result of this was evidenced in the Protestant Countries where state sovereignty was increasingly emphasized visa-vis the churches. This continued to influence the establishment of the right to regulate educational and marriage concerns as well as administrative affairs of the church. Such developments also happened in the Roman Catholic areas. In Austria, it was after Joseph II leadership.

THE HISTORY OF RELIGION IN UGANDA

Christianity came late to Uganda compared with many other parts of Africa. Missionaries first arrived at the court of Kabaka Muteesa in 1877; almost a century after the missionary impetus from Europe had begun. And yet within 25 years Uganda had become one of the most successful mission fields in the whole of Africa.

Any discussion of Religion in Uganda–the creation of colonialism at the end of the 19th Century–must begin with Buganda–the ancient independent kingdom on the northern shores of the lake which the Baganda call Nalubaale (the home of the balubaale gods) and which the British christened "Victoria." Over the centuries Buganda had evolved a complex system of government

[1338]The Protestant Reformation. By National Geographic Articles available on https://www.nationalgeographic.org
[1339]Robb. S. Harvey. Protestant Reformation.The First Amendment of Encyclopedia.Prsesnted by the John Seignenthaler Chair of Excellence in first Amendment studies.
[1340]Owen.W. Chadwick. The Protestant Herritage. University of Cambridge,1968.

under a Kabaka (king), a system unusual for its high degree of centralization and internal cohesiveness. Another feature of Kiganda society, of importance in explaining the eventual success of religion, was its remarkable adaptability and receptivity to change.

In 1856 Kabaka Muteesa inherited a kingdom which was already the strongest in the region. During his long reign of 28 years he consolidated and enhanced that power. A major part of Muteesa's strategy as rubber was to open up Buganda to the outside world. Swahili and Arab traders from Zanzibar were encouraged to trade their cotton cloth, guns and luxury items for ivory and slaves. But outside influences did not stop at trade; Islam was soon exerting a profound religious and cultural influence on Buganda. By the time Christianity arrived, the impact of Islam had already been felt for a generation.

CHURCH AND STATE IN COLONIAL UGANDA, CATHOLICS VERSUS PROTESTANTS

Protestants and Catholics [1341]

First forward to the colonial times; The Anglican Church was never an official established church in colonial Uganda. But it approximated to an established church, with the Bishop of Uganda standing third in order of precedence at official functions, after the Governor and the Kabaka of Buganda. The Catholics had no such political role in the colonial state, and in fact they felt it better to eschew politics altogether and to concentrate on their religious tasks. At times they could legitimately complain of discrimination, at least in the early years. But, by and large they felt reasonably content with the official British policy of religious neutrality. This allowed them to evangelize freely throughout the country, whatever the denomination of the local ruler or chief.

At times the British authorities preferred the non-political role of the Catholics to the gratuitous advice or criticism of the CMS.

The Church and Nationalism [1342]

The Protestant schools were the breeding ground for the rising nationalism of the 1950s. In Uganda, nationalism was complicated by the conflicting claims of Buganda nationalism and Ugandan nationalism. It was, by and large, the Protestants who made the running in both kinds of nationalism. But the hierarchy of the Anglican Church was often attacked for identifying itself too closely with the colonial authorities. It was widely believed that the new bishop of Uganda, Leslie [1341]H.B. Hanson, Mission, Church and State in a Colonial Setting, Uganda 1890-1925, London, 1984.

Leslie Brown, Three Worlds: One Word, London, 1981.
[1342]. F.B. Welbourn, Religion and Politics in Uganda 1952-62, Nairobi, 1963.
J. Waliggo, "Ganda Traditional Religion and Catholicism," J. Waliggo, "Ganda Traditional Religion and Catholicism," in E. Fashole-Luke (editor), Christianity in Independent Africa, London, 1978.
M. Twaddle, "Was the Democratic Party a Confessional Party?" in Fashole-Luke op. cit.

Brown, was involved in one way or another with the deportation of the Kabaka in 1953, though he has always strenuously denied any such involvement. The Anglican Church lost a lot of support in those years when Kiganda traditionalist sentiment was running high.

But Catholics too were under attack in these years from the traditionalists. After long years of being passive in political matters, as Independence approached, the Catholic hierarchy increasingly saw the Democratic Party as a suitable party for Catholics to support, more acceptable than either Buganda's traditionalism (as finally embodied in Kabaka Yekka) or the secular and left with ideology of the Protestant dominated nationalist parties (which finally coalesced into the Uganda Peoples' Congress).

D.P. was headed by a Muganda Catholic, Benedicto Kiwanuka; but D.P.'s commitment to a unitary Uganda alienated Buganda. In the political maneuverings of the early 60s D.P. lost out to an alliance of Obote's U.P.C. and Kabaka Yekka (a strange and incompatible alliance). But it did ensure that the Catholics entered Independence still denied any real share in political power.

THE CHRISTIAN FAITH IN UGANDA

The arrival or Christian missionaries, 1877 [1343]

Stanley's famous letter to the Daily Telegraph painted a much romanticized picture of Muteesa. He represented the Kabaka as a great enlightened despot eager to hear the Gospel and speedily to propagate it throughout his kingdom. The reality was different as the missionaries were soon to discover once they reached Buganda. But the letter did produce a speedy response in Britain. The Anglican Church Missionary Society (CMS) hastily assembled a band of enthusiastic missionaries. The first two representatives of this group arrived at the court of Muteesa on June 30, 1877, having travelled from Zanzibar on the route pioneered by the Swahili traders. Eighteen months later, on February 17, 1879, a group of French Catholic White Fathers arrived, also by the East Coast route.

The presence of these rival versions of Christianity was immediately a matter of controversy. CMS understandably felt that this was a deliberate attempt to sabotage the Protestant missionary effort. The Catholics on the other hand, and equally understandably, could point to the fact that they had been planning the evangelization of the lake region of Eastern Africa for many years and were not to be out-staged by the superficial emotions aroused in Britain by Stanley's misleading letter. They could also point to the flimsy and insubstantial nature of the CMS presence in those early years.

[1343]Both the Centenary publications describe the coming of missionaries: T. Tuma & P. Mutibwa, A Century of Christianity in Uganda, Nairobi, 1978.
Y. Tourigny, So Abundant a Harvest, London, 1979.
For the rivalry between Mackay and Lourdel, see Mackay of Uganda, By his Sister, London, 1898; and K. Ward, "Catholic-Protestant Relations in Uganda: An Historical Perspective," in African Theological Journal, Makumira, Tanzania, 1984.

The rivalry has to be understood against the background of centuries of controversy and warfare between Catholic and Protestant in Europe. In these years (1877 -1890) the rivalry was embodied in two individuals: Alexander Mackay and Fr. Simeon Lourdel ('Mapera'). Both were young men in their 20's when they arrived in Buganda; and neither was the head of his mission. Both were passionately prejudiced, and both delighted in the vigorous cut and thrust of theological debate or rather polemic. The confrontation was a "scandal to the Christendom" (Kiwanuka). But the spectacle was also much appreciated by those in court, who applauded the dialectical skill with which each missionary defended his version of the faith. It should also be noted that the rivalry between the two religious groups fitted well into the traditional factionalism of court life. It was to encourage competition and zeal among the Baganda converts and is one factor in the success of Christianity in Buganda. For the Christian believer this is the first of many 'contradictions' in the success of Christianity in Uganda: that zeal for the Gospel should be fuelled by prejudice, partisanship and polemic. Even more scandalous aspects of the rivalry emerged later, with the "wars of religion" and the cut-throat scramble for political power in the 1890s.

CHRISTENDOME IN BUGANDA

A "Christian Revolution"[1344]

The events of this violent period in Buganda's history are sometimes characterized as a "Christian revolution"–by which is meant the fact that a fundamental change occurred in Buganda in which Christianity was the motivating force and the chief beneficiary. It was a revolution with several phases: a revolution of the 'new dini' (1888), a 'Muslim revolution' (1888-9), a 'Christian counter revolution' (1889), a 'Protestant seizure of power' (1892), and finally the consolidation of the revolutionary changes by the British take-over and loss of Buganda's sovereignty (1894/1900).

Christianity came to dominate the political arena of Buganda; and Islam was relegated to an under-privileged minority. But the Christian chiefs have also been called 'conservative modernizers'. They had a strong sense of Buganda's history and traditions. They wanted to graft Christianity onto these traditions, to use the literacy which Christianity had brought to preserve these traditions. Kaggwa wrote a history of the Kings of Buganda in Luganda. He also wrote a history of his clan. The institutions of the Kabaka'ship and the clans were the two fundamental pillars of Buganda. Christianity (in its two forms) was now added as a third pillar. This meant that the balubaale cults (especially the large shrines) were displaced by Christianity. But the national gods did re-emerge in times of national crisis, such as the deportation of the Kabaka in 1953. And the basic thought patterns and practices of Kiganda religion remain strong to this day.

[1344]The concept of a "Christian Revolution" is discussed in: C. Wrigley, "The Christian Revolution in Buganda," Comparative Studies in Society and History, II, l, 1959, pp. 33-48.
D.A. Low, Buganda in Modern History, London, 1971, pp. 13-53. M. Twaddle, "The Muslim Revolution in Buganda," African Affairs, 71, pp.54-72.

MOHAMEDAN FAITH IN UGANDA

The Impact of Islam [1345]

In the 19th Century two "world" religions–Islam and Christianity–were both making significant advances in Africa. Often they were in serious competition; and this indeed was the case in Buganda. But this should not disguise the fact that both Islam and Christianity were in many ways complementary. Both were called "dini" in contradistinction to the traditional African religious heritage. Both offered a "worldview," a universal explanation of life with all its opportunities and problems. Such systems seemed increasingly relevant to societies, like Buganda, which were being drawn into a larger world. In this sense, Buganda, Islam, despite its rivalry, prepared the way for Christianity in a number of ways. In fact, Christianity arrived at a strategic time–when Islam had awakened among Baganda certain needs and aspirations, but before Islam had become entrenched in society that Christianity failed to find a foothold. Islam had, for example, created a thirst for literacy, especially among the young pages (bagalagala) at court. Christianity was able to build on this interest, and with its printing presses and distribution of cheap books in the vernacular or Swahili, was able to satisfy that interest to a much greater extent than Islam was able to do.

But Islam had prepared the way in other ways. The idea of a holy book, of a holy day, of a God above all gods who was interested in the affairs of this life and in the moral life of the individual, the expectation of the resurrection of the body and of a judgment after death–these were concepts pioneered by Islam which received further emphasis from the Christian missionaries.

SSEKABAKA MUTESA II ISLAMIZATION

"…secondly SseKabaka Muteesa II entered the Muslim and he got qualified with Quran and also carried out fasting but he refused to be circumcised. The king of Buganda is not allowed to pure blood in his country…."

Ahmed Katumba remarks that, "Muteesa encouraged Islam as part of his political association with the Arabs and with the Sultan of Zanzibar." [1346]These were periods of trade boom at the coast and the Arabs had made an impact on Muteesa having given him instructions in Islam and Arabic.

According to Sheikh Abdullah Ssekimwanyi, Muteesa II changed his name from the fierce-sounding Mukanya to Muteesa which was more in accord with Islamic ideas of kingship. "He [1345]For the impact of world religions on Africa in the 19th Century, see the pioneering essay by Robin Horton, "African Conversion" in Africa, XLI, 1971. pp 85-108.

---

For the relevance of Horton's ideas for East Africa, see J. Iliffe, A Modern History of Tanganyika, London, 1979.
For an important discussion of Kiganda traditional religion, see F.B. Welbourn, "Some Aspects of Kiganda Religion," Uganda Journal, 1962, pp. 171-182; and F.X. Kyewalyanga, Traditional Religion, Custom and Christianity in Uganda, Freiburg im Breisgau, 1976.
[13461346]Ahmed Katumba and F.B. Welbourn. Writing in Vol 28 of the Uganda Journal of 1962.

ordered mosques to be built throughout the kingdom and read and explained the Quran to the chiefs. He became so much devoted to the Islamic religion that he ordered his subjects to greet, pray in Islam and not to eat any meant not killed in the Islamic way."[1347]

But what spoilt the soup, was that he refused to be circumcised. Ashe said, "Muslim martyrdom took place before Stanley visit." [1348]While J. W. Harrison, another missionary, writes that "by persecuting the Muslims, Muteesa had put himself in a dangerous dilemma. He had risked the anger of both Egypt and Zanzibar. He would therefore, be all the more ready to embrace Stanley's offer of help with its implied acceptance of Christianity."[1349]

The Muslims asked Muteesa I to call a meeting at which they instructed the Muslims of Buganda never to eat meat killed by an uncircumcised person and never to be led in prayer by such people. They insisted that circumcision was essential and central to Islam and an uncircumcised man could not claim leadership in the community.[1350]

As Ham Mukasa rightly says, everybody knew that the Kabaka led prayers in Lubiri but the question was whether he was circumcised. The Quran forbade the uncircumcised to lead in prayer and this law had to be followed in Lubiri. The Kabaka failed to comply to this text reason being he could not admit to any authority but his own and that all Baganda were subject to him. He had supreme authority in his palace and his mosque and none could prevent him if he chose to lead the prayers.

The Muslims especially those from Egypt insisted that everybody was to remain in respect to the Book of Allah and the norms of their religion and that the Kabaka's authority only was operative in state affairs. [1351]The impact of this as that many Muslims turned away from prayers in Lubiri which used to be led by Muteesa I and decline d any meat that came out of the palace.

This was an act of rebellion against the king's authority and those that had not converted tried to show some loyalty to the king. These were natives that feared forceful conversion by the Kabaka. Many chiefs and their followers started to make allegations against Islam claiming and denouncing Islam. In their allegations, they stated that Islam had turned away many Muslims from the Kabaka because he was not circumcised calling him a kaffir who could not lead prayers in a mosque and accusing him of eating pork.

These allegations were later to cause persecution. Disobedience to the Kings orders in trying to respect Allah annoyed Kabaka Muteesa. It was an act of belittling the king. Then all the matters of [1347]AbdallahSekimwanyi. (1953). Ebyafaayoebitonotonokuddini ye Kiyisiramu.Luganda Publication.

[1348]P.Ashe. Chronicles of Uganda 1984.
[1349] J. W. Harrison. (1890) Mackay of Uganda.
[1350] T.W. Gee. A Century of Muhammedan influence in Buganda. 1852-1951.
[1351] Daily Monitor Jan 7, 2017. How Muslims fell out with Muteesa I. also available on https://www.monitor.co.ug.

that sort went on adding wrath to wrath until was full of the palace. Because of this, many young Muslims were seen flocking out to eat meat from the nearby Muslim communities since that of the palace was in the prohibited centers of Islam.

The Muslim pages also started disobeying Muteesa's orders in the name of following what the Quran was teaching. To Muteesa, this was a rebellion in making and challenging his authority. T.W. Gee remarks that, "shortly after the pages stopped eating palace meat, Muteesa was in the mosque with a group of pages when three boys entered well dressed in white tunics and the rest of the boys turned their attention to the new corners."[1352]

This annoyed the Kabaka who decided to move out and summoned the Prime Minister "Katikkiro" and ordered him to arrest the boys and all those that were disobedient. These were handed over to Mukajanga to have them persecuted at Namugongo. This was the Muslim martyrdom at Namugongo. The persecution of Muslims put Muteesa at loggerheads with Muslims in Egypt and Zanzibar. He would therefore be all the readier to embrace Stanley offer of help with its implied acceptance of Christianity.

As Harrison remarks, by the time of publishing of the letter inviting missionaries in London, the news of the Muslim martyrdom was not yet known and in calling for the Missionaries Muteesa was looking for protection against the angered Arab Muslims and the Egyptians.[1353]

MUTEESA'S LAST YEARS AND THE SUCCESSION OF MWANGA

By 1897 Muteesa had come to realize that a complete alliance with one of the Christian groups was neither practicable nor desirable. (The insistence of both on monogamy was a fundamental obstacle, but there were other factors.) Muteesa decided that he should identify with none of the new 'dini', while allowing them to stay and extracting what advantages he could from each, without letting any one group get too much power in the country. Muteesa was a consummate master at this political balancing act His successor, in the much more difficult international climate of the late '80s, prove incapable of keeping things under control.

Mwanga succeeded his father in October 1884. He was 18 years old. Mwanga seems to have lacked strong religious convictions–he was a skeptic in an age of faith. Like all Kabaka's at the beginning of their reign, Mwanga needed to assert his authority over all elements and factions within the country, including the foreign missionaries (the White Fathers had not yet returned and so at first this meant the Protestants). This general need to assert his authority and the personal antagonisms with the three missionaries in the country (especially with Ashe) led to the death of the first three

[1352] Ibid.
[1353] J.W. Harrison. (1890). Mackay of Uganda.

Baganda Christians on January 31, 1885. The young protestant martyrs, Makko Kakumba, Nuwa Serwanga and Yusuf Lugalama, were all members of the mission household. The missionaries were being warned against becoming a focus of political power or political discontent against the young Kabaka.

UGANDA MARTYS AND DEATH OF BISHOP HANNINGTON

The deaths of Bishop Hannington and the Uganda martyrs[1354]

Whatever may have been his personal attitudes to Christianity, Mwanga, like his father, was of necessity primarily concerned with the political implications of the new religions. By 1885 this was causing very grave anxieties. The Muslim threat from the north had receded with the Mahdist rebellion in the Sudan in 1881. But a new and greater threat to Buganda's independence quite suddenly emerged from the East African coast with the intrusion of German imperialism early in 1885. It was fear of a European invasion which principally caused the death in Busoga on October 29, 1885 of the 37-year-old Anglican Bishop, James Hannington. Hannington was either ignorant of, or chose to ignore, the precarious position of the Christian community within Buganda and the dangers, in the international climate, of approaching Buganda by the politically sensitive 'back-door' of Busoga. Hannington was killed on the orders of the Kabaka. His death is often blamed on a fickle and revengeful young king; but this is very unfair to Mwanga, who was certainly acting on the advice of his great chiefs–including the normally friendly Kulugi. Hannington's death, from the Kiganda point of view, was a legitimate act of state, designed to ward off a potential invasion.

Nevertheless, it was politically a mistake. Hannington had not been heading an invading army–on the way up from the coast his caravan had been ridiculed for its puny size. Hannington's death had repercussions within Buganda. It led to further killings of Christians. Only 2 weeks later, on November 15, 1885, Joseph Mukasa BaIikuddembe was brutally killed for daring to criticize the Kabaka for the murder of the Anglican bishop. Balikuddembe became the first Catholic martyr.

In May and June 1886 a large massacre of Christians, both Catholic and Protestant, took place. Many were executed at Namugongo, the traditional execution site also used for the Muslim martyrs of 1876. The immediate cause for the killings was the Kabaka's anger at the disobedience of his Christian pages. Charles Lwanga, the Catholic head of the pages in the king's private apartments, had been particularly vigilant in protecting the Christian boys under his charge from the advances [1354]. The deaths of the three boys and the circumstances of Hannington's death are well described in the contemporary account of the CMS missionary Robert Ashe. R. Ashe, Two Kings of Uganda, London, 1890.

The now classic work on the Catholic martyrs (but with attention to the Protestants too) is J.F. Faupel, African Holocaust, London, 1962. (Reprinted in paperback by St Paul's Publications, Africa, 1984.)
L. Pirouet, Strong in the Faith, Kisubi, Uganda, 1969, is a good, popular account, with particular attention to the Protestant martyrs.

of the Kabaka and some of the chiefs.

But, in addition 10 young pages, quite a number of the victims were minor chiefs: men such as Andrew Kaggwa and Matthias Mulumba for the Catholics; and Robert Munyagabyanjo, Nuwa Walukaga and Freddie Kizza for the Protestants. The youngest page, Kizito, was about 14 years; some of the chiefs were in their 50s. Some of these chiefs were the victims of particular grudges by their seniors- (for example Katikkiro Mukasa, the Prime Minister), jealous that these up and coming young men would soon be ousting them from power.

MOSLEM, PROTESTANTS, AND CATHOLICS MARTYRS KILLED AT NAMUGOGONGO

The history of the Uganda Christian martyrs is a well-known tale of intrigue and murder. It tells the story of about 45 young men, mostly from Buganda's eminent families, who willingly surrendered their lives for the sake of their religious beliefs.

We are told that they defied their king by refusing to denounce Christianity, a religion that had been newly introduced to Buganda by Catholic and Anglican missionaries.

We are further told that the Kabaka, Mwanga II, construed it as treachery and had them arrested. In all, a total of about 45 Christians made the long trip to Namugongo, where they went up in flames on a funeral pier.

Ten years before the Christian martyrs, men had made the same long tortuous journey to Namugongo where they were burnt in an inferno on the orders of Kabaka Mutesa I. Their exact number is not known, but some historians have put the number to more than 70.

Events leading to their death begun in 1857 when Kabaka Mutesa I ascended the throne after the death of his father, Kabaka Suna. By the time of Suna's death, Islam had started taking root in Buganda. It had been introduced by Arabs and Swahili traders from the coast.

Like his father Suna, Mutesa was fascinated by Islam and took great pride in studying the Quran and its teachings. Although the king did not impose the new religion on his subjects, it is said that normally once something took the king's fancy, all his subjects were naturally expected to adopt it. And so it was with Islam.

Before long, many people started learning the new religion. Reverend Batulimayo Musoke Zzimbe, writes in "Buganda Nne' Kabaka" that Mutesa was so committed to Islam, he even ordered a mosque to be built at his palace in Kasubi, then known as Nabulagala.

Such was his devotion that five times a day, a Muezzin, would summon the faithful for prayers, led by the king himself.

A brilliant man, Mutesa had by then learnt to read and write Arabic and bestowed upon himself the title of Imam. “He was very well loved by his subjects. Because he was unusually intelligent, his Katikkiro (prime minister) Kayira called him Mutesa which means the one who is wise in council”, writes Sir Apollo Kaggwa, a regent of Kabaka Daudi Chwa.

But just as he was much loved, he was equally loathed, for his cruelty and soon, the new king came to be also known as Mukabya, which means “one who makes others cry”.

History records reveal that Mutesa maintained at least four punishment sites in Buganda where insubordinate subjects would be carted to be punished for real and imagined crimes.

A subject could be killed for something as ‘small” as not properly addressing the Kabaka by his rightful titles. Surprisingly, for one schooled in Islam Mutesa did not completely fulfil all that was required by the Quran.

Katende, a former eminent Buganda judge and current leader of the Olugave clan writes in one of his unpublished memoirs that the king continued to eat meat from animals slaughtered by non Muslims. He also refused to be circumcised, on the advice of his powerful chief administrative officer, Katikkiro Mukasa.

Mukasa, a former Saaza chief, was renowned for his cruelty and was said to exert much influence over the king. J.F. Faupel writes in the “African Holocaust”, Mukasa contrived to render his position almost unassailable by means of a blood pact with Mutesa, which made him both blood brother to the reigning monarch and ‘father’ to his future successor”.

Katende writes further that Mukasa was afraid that if the king accepts to be circumcised, he would compel the rest of the Muslim subjects including him to do likewise.

In those days, circumcision was carried out using sharpened reeds. It was a long and slow painful surgical procedure that would sometimes last a whole day. Back then there was no anaesthesia to dull the pain, as it is today. It is not surprising therefore that the katikkiro was fiercely opposed to circumcision.

Katende writes that Mukasa sought audience with the king and told him that Buganda traditional royal custom forbade the king to shed his blood. The king, therefore, could not be circumcised, as demanded by Islamic law.

This meant that religious observances that had been led by the king under a more easygoing Muslim regime, including the slaughter of animals could no longer be accepted as being carried out by a true Muslim.

At about this time, a group of Muslim fundamentalists from Egypt visited the Kabaka's court at Kasubi. However, whereas they were impressed by the spread of the new religion, they were unhappy at the king's un-Islamic conduct and reluctance to be circumcised.

The visitors reportedly started criticising the king and very soon, they incited the rest of the king's subjects to rebel against the Kabaka.

It was not long before the Kabaka's subjects started challenging him openly about his lifestyle. Where once hundreds would turn up for prayers, only a few would now show up. Most found excuses to be away from the palace while others simply decided to pray on their own.

Mutesa noticed the dwindling number of worshippers and decided to investigate. It is said that one day the Kabaka summoned one of his most loyal servant, nicknamed Muddu Awulila (the obedient servant) to inquire why he was not turning up for prayers.

Muddu Awulila answered: "My Lord, it's because we feel you should not lead the prayer because you are not circumcised". "But I am your King. You are supposed to obey everything I tell you to do", argued the Kabaka.

"My Lord, our actions are not meant to disobey you, but in this case, we are not looking at you as our king but as a fellow Muslim worshipper".

Katende writes that Mutesa was so angry at his servant's casual and almost insolent response. He stayed in a foul mood for the rest of day. Several weeks later, Mutesa held a grand feast to celebrate the opening of a new mosque. Several cows, goats and chicken were slaughtered for the occasion.

It is said several of the Muslim courtiers ate just the food and refused to touch the meat, because uncircumcised Muslims had slaughtered the animals.

Angry, the Kabaka construed it as an act of treason and ordered all those who had refused to eat the meat to be arrested. The group was rounded up and taken to jail in Bukeesa, near Nakulabye where they were confined for four days without food.

On the fourth day, the Kabaka sent them some food and meat. They ate everything except the meat. When the King's officers inquired why they had not touched the meat, they told them to go back and ask the king to send them a live cow and goat so that they could slaughter it themselves.

The Kabaka had them transferred to another jail in Nansana, hoping they will come to their senses sooner or later. On the fourth day, Mutesa again sent them food and meat. It was the same story. They were then relocated to Bukoto where again they were given a last chance to repent but again, they ate everything else apart from the meat.

When they refused to budge, the Kabaka ordered his chief executioner to kill them. The exact date and month of their martyrdom is not known but it said, they were marched to Namugongo and killed in 1877.

More than 70 martyrs were burnt to death that day. Only three of them; Yusuf Sebakiwa (Elephant clan), Amulane Tuzinde (Mushroom clan) and Musirimu Lwanga escaped the inferno. It is said they died of natural illness, a result of the long trek to Namugongo.

While the both the Ugandan Catholic and Anglican churches mark June 3, in pomp and prayer in commemoration of the death of the martyrs, hardly anything is held to remember the Muslims.

It's only after Idi Amin Dada came to power in 1971, after overthrowing Milton Obote that the history of the Muslim martyrs started to come to light.

It is said that president Amin was typically irked that it's only the Christians martyrs who had been honoured and ordered a memorial to be erected in recognition of the Muslims as well.

Land was acquired just opposite the present Anglican Church Martyrs, and a foundation was laid for a mosque. A small mosque made of mud and iron sheets was reportedly built at the site, to coincide with the Christian martyr's celebrations that year.

It is said Amin had planned to build a huge mosque later but he was ousted before he realised his dream. In 1979 after the fall of Amin, soldiers of the Obote II regime reportedly occupied the mosque and desecrated it by slaughtering several pigs in it.

The mosque was knocked down and another was built a few meters from the original site. "The mosque has never been officially opened due to various wrangles.

Kivumbi alludes, the original foundation stone laid by Amin was dug up by mercury prospectors. The stone's bronze plaque that contained the inscription was stolen too.

"They completely uprooted the stone, hoping to find mercury underneath, but there was nothing," recalls the Imam. The present mosque is a small affair, seating about 200 worshippers. Over the years however, it has slowly become dilapidated and is a painful eye sore in the surrounding community. A few old dirty mats lay inside of the mosque carelessly strewn all over the cement floor. But despite its dilapidated state, the mosque is not short of daily worshippers.

The Imam says about twenty or more worshippers come to the mosque to pray, mostly in the evenings. But the numbers increase during the Muslim holy month of Ramadhan. There has not been any special celebrations for the Muslim martyrs since the ouster of Idi Amin, in part because of lack of funding and also because unlike Christians, Muslims do not ordinarily mark such days.

Undoubtedly these Uganda martyrs who are argued to have been of majorly three faiths, MOSLEMS (more than 70 Muslims martyrs burnt to death on orders of Kabaka Mutesa 1 in 1877) PROTESTANTS (26 in number killed on 3, 1886 on orders of Kabaka Mwanga), and CATHOLICS (22 in number kicked on orders of Kabaka Mwanga) there were Bunyoro and Basoga as well as Baganda) died under the orders of Kabaka Mwanga of Buganda in 1885 and 1887 believing and trusting in their faiths. They sang hymns on the way to their deaths, preached to their persecutors, strongly believed in a life after death, and their courage and fortitude made a great impression on those who saw them die. But naturally, secular historians have been cautious about accepting wholesale the simple pieties of hagiography. The deaths of these faithfuls must be put in the context of the traditional precariousness of life at court, and the deeply ingrained habits of obedience which made Baganda generally face death philosophically if the Kabaka so wished.

It is also argued by other secular historians that all these religions have martyrs' at Namugongo not because of religious issues but because they were spies working for the white man to gain influence in the country during The Kabaka's reign. So in act of tainting this act of mass killings, the white man spread rumours that they, "the martyrs had been sodomized and killed on religious grounds" to alienate the Kabaka.

We therefore see Religion working for the executive and for the colonial invaders in his quest to conquer Uganda, no wonder the first ship to ferry slaves off Africa was called Jesus.

ANTI-TERRORISM AND ISLAM IN UGANDA.

It is vital to comprehend the influence of anti-terrorism legislation, programs, and practices on community cohesiveness, equality, and human rights. There have been concerns that anti-terrorist legislation and policies are alienating Muslims, particularly young people and students, and that anti-terrorism measures may feed and prolong terrorism.

The constitution forbids religious discrimination and declares that no governmental religion exists. It guarantees freedom of thought, conscience, and belief, as well as the right to practice and propagate any religion and to join and participate in the practices of any religious group or organization in accordance with the constitution. The government may also limit these rights by taking actions that are "reasonably justifiable for dealing with a case of emergency," according to the constitution. The formation of political parties based on religion is prohibited by the constitution.

Religious organizations must register with the government in order to receive legal entity status. The government requires faith-based organizations to register as non-profit organizations with the Uganda Registration Services Bureau and then obtain a five-year operating license from the Ministry of Internal Affairs, according to the Uganda Registration Services Bureau. Although there is no formal process for requesting an exemption from the requirement to obtain an operating license, larger religious organizations, such as the Catholic, Anglican, Orthodox, and Seventh-day Adventist Churches, as well as the UMSC, are de facto exempt, and the government does not require them to obtain one.

Religious instruction in public schools is optional, according to the constitution. Separate curriculum has been produced for a variety of world religions, including Christianity and Islam. Public primary and secondary schools have the freedom to pick which religious studies to include in their curricula, if any at all; nonetheless, they must follow the state-approved curriculum for each religion they teach.

There have been allegations that the government has maintained a policy of discrimination and persecution towards Muslims, and that it continues to do so when appointing senior and lower-level officials. Former Minister of Security Henry Tumukunde accused the Uganda Police Force (UPF) of victimizing Muslims in its effort to investigate a series of unsolved killings on May 21, 2018, according to local media.

According to reports, the UPF detained at least 116 people, 106 of them were Muslims, in connection with high-profile homicides between 2010 and 2018. According to local media, the state has only convicted 13 Muslim individuals since 2010, with no convictions in 2018. Authorities, according to the Uganda Muslim Supreme Council (UMSC), do not grant Muslim detainees the same rights to bail and visitor access as other detainees.

The UPF denied ever victimizing Muslims, but stated that if it had convincing evidence of a crime being committed or planned, it would not hesitate to arrest Muslim suspects for fear of offending Muslims.

President Yoweri Museveni has been fighting a half-dozen rebel factions since coming to power in 1986 through armed insurrection. The president has reacted to calls from civil society, particularly religious leaders, to pursue peace talks with rebel groups, in addition to creating and equipping the Uganda People's Defence Force (UPDF).

However, this strategy did not succeed with some of the rebel factions, whose ideologies were incompatible with Museveni's. The ADF was fighting for the establishment of a sharia-ruled Islamic state. To weaken the group, Museveni used a carrot-and-stick strategy, offering amnesty, financial gifts, and government employment to scores of ADF commanders who decided to end the conflict.

One of them was Maj. Kiggundu. He was granted an undisclosed amount of money as a "resettlement allowance" after he left the revolt. He was assigned to the military intelligence branch of the UPDF and promoted to major. Those who remained angry with the decision of some ADF leaders to leave their rebellion in return for money and jobs, accusing the defectors of abandoning the cause.

Sheikh Jamil Mukulu, the ultimate rebel leader, issued a fatwa ordering the execution of all defectors at the end of 2010. Sheikh Abdul Karim Sentamu, Uganda's recognized authority on Islamic hadith and Quran interpretations, was the first victim. He was assassinated in 2011, just months after leaving the ADF. Sheikh Abdul Muwaya, Uganda's Shia Muslim leader, was assassinated a few months later in the Lake Victoria Mayuge district.

The main source of concern for Ugandans is that the rebel group, which was formerly limited to the jungles, appears to have evolved into an urban-based terrorist organization. The ADF has evolved from a conventional rebel army into a terrorist outfit with no frontlines, according to a senior military intelligence officer who declined to be named. The ADF has been subjected to relentless military attacks on its positions in Eastern DRC by the UPDF.

The insurgents have dispersed over East Africa. According to the officer, the ADF currently has hundreds of operators operating throughout Uganda, particularly in Kampala, where plans to assassinate their victims have been meticulously carried out.

Ugandan police reported the arrest of multiple suspects in the assassination of Assistant Police Chief Kaweesi in late March 2017. They were apprehended all around the country, but particularly in Kampala, Busia, Kenya's border town, and Kasese, DRC. All of the people detained are Muslims.

According to reports, Kaweesi's death was intended to send a message to the government that the rebel organization is still alive and well despite the arrest of their commander, Jamil Mukulu, in Tanzania last March and his extradition to Uganda.

Mukulu is being imprisoned in the Luzira jail in Kampala. He is accused of terrorism, murder, and torture, among other things. General Kale Kayihura, the police head, claims that the killers of Kaweesi had previously sent a message threatening to inflict "pain deep in the police heart." Following a police raid on a Kampala mosque, scores of Muslim leaders were arrested on suspicion of collaboration in the assassinations of senior Muslim leaders who had repudiated and opposed the ADF.

The police also claim to have seized guns and ammunition during the raids, which the Muslim leaders categorically deny. Al Hajj Abdul Nadduli, a government minister, criticized the police raid on Kampala's Nakasero Mosque and denied police charges of guns and ammunition as a lie.

“The alleged guns are the police's attempt to demonstrate that they are doing something to stop the killings. Engineer Abdul Maganda, a renowned Tablighi sect supporter, said, "They planted the firearms in the specified mosques." Sheikhs Yunus Kamoga, the Tablighi sect's leader in Uganda, and Yahaya Ramadhan Mwanje, who took over the sect's leadership when Kamoga was incarcerated, have both been arrested on charges of participation in Maj. Kiggundu's murder.

Kaweesi, the assassinated cop, was a rising star in the force and was generally projected to become the next police chief. His assailants accuse him of being behind the mosque attacks and the arrests of preachers.

The High Court in Kampala, Uganda's capital, found five of the 13 suspects guilty of murder and terrorism in July 2016. Three of them were given life sentences, one was sentenced to 50 years in prison, and the other was given a community service sentence.

On June 1st, 2021, another top government official; Gen. Katumba Wamala was attacked and jis car shot. His daughter and driver did not survive the scuffle. The perpetrators are alleged to have been following Katumba for days, and when his security detail took a detour from him on the Kisaasi-Kyanja Road, leaving him at the mercy of his bodyguard and driver, the gunman pounced.

During a search for three suspects in the attempted assassination of Gen Edward Katumba Wamala, a joint security force lead by Police Crime Intelligence personnel sealed down three zones in Kawempe Division for more than six hours.

Ismael Hussein Sserubula and Siraji Yusuf Nyanzi, two suspects, were eventually captured and accused in court with the murders of Nantongo and Kayondo, as well as the attempted murder of Gen Katumba. According to Crime Intelligence sources, the suspects were traced down using new technological skills acquired as part of the smart city initiative.

When the five defendants who were apprehended after the incident were brought to court, they had severe marks on their bodies. They alleged that the marks on their bodies were caused by police abuse. Muhammad Kagugube, Siriman Kisambira, Abudallah-Aziz Ramadhan Dunku, Kamada Walusimbi, and Habib Ramadhan Marjan were all remanded in government custody in Kitalya. After Sheikhs Yasin Nyanzi and Hussein Serubula were remanded the previous week, this brought the total number of suspects formally charged in the attempted murder of Gen Katumba to seven.

Some of the suspects apprehended were later slain by their captors. Security operatives shot and killed the first suspected assassin, Hussein Lubwama, after he allegedly resisted capture. Security forces are believed to have killed three more suspects. On this note, the court ordered security services to present death certificates or images of Lubwama and the other three individuals murdered by police.

The continuing murder of prominent people has exposed the inability of the country’s security forces to deal with the crime. Since the first killing in 2011, the police have not made any significant arrests, triggering fears that more killings of a similar or greater magnitude are in the offing, since the perpetrators of the murders are at large. For many Ugandans the question is: If top officials can be attacked in this way, how safe is an ordinary Ugandan?

STATE AND CHURCH

Let us turn to the second part of this letter in which I shall speak of the relations between the forms of government explained above and the Church.

Time and again, I have heard such things as "keep religion out of politics, leave religious ideas out of politics and take religion out of schools." Among those who speak like that some do it out of pure hatred of religion. It could not be explained otherwise since in fact religion strives to remind people of their duty to serve God, which in no way harms politics on the contrary it is a real help to it. But there are others who are induced to say that they don't want religion to be mixed with politics by the mere fact that they are afraid of the truth and justice inherent in religion. They would like to deceive people in order to bring them to their side, but religion helps people at the time of choosing a government to see objectively what is right and to choose a good government.

There are finally many people who repeat "keep religion out of politics" without any understanding whatsoever of what it is all about.

SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE

The separation of church and state is largely attributed to the American and French revolutions that took effect towards the end of the 18th Century.[1355] It was majorly achieved through ideas arising out of opposition to the English episcopal system and English throne as well as from the ideals of Enlightenment. In France, it was circulated due to the opposition raised against the wealthy ecclesiastical hierarchy due to social-revolutionary criticism and because of the desire to guarantee freedom to the church.

This saw the French state taking over all the civil nature activities, education and other state functions that previously lay in the hands of the church. The church was not to deal with all the activities of a civil nature but to practice its religion without interfering in state affairs.[1356]

In the morning of the 18th Century, two fundamental attitudes were developed relating to the idea of state separation from the church. One of it was witnessed in the United States Constitution which was to set the church free from state supervision as well as leaving the church with freedom in the realization of its spiritual, moral and educational tasks.[1357]

The separation of church from state that resurrected from the French revolution finally spread diagonally and horizontally in various corners of Europe among many other countries. Specifically, it started from Soviet Union and later to all other countries that were under her sphere of influence.

[1355]French Revolution 1789-1799 by Encyclopedia Britannica Editors.Also available on https://www.britannica.com.
[1356]Josephs.Szyliowicz: Education.University of Denuer, Colorado.
[1357]Constitution of the United States of America.United States Government.The Editors of Encyclopedia Britannica.

But unique about to their system was not only to prohibit or restrict public role of the church but also work towards its gradual disappearance.[1358]

In Germany, under the leadership of Hitler, the National Socialism was contradictory in nature. It was indeed difficult to analyze and understand. On one hand, the Nazi ideology prohibited public role of the church and its teaching. On the other hand, Hitler was concerned with the idea of not causing a confrontation with the church. The neutrality of this was settled by the Concordat agreement in 1933 between Germany and the Roman Catholic Church.[1359]

Its noteworthy that by 1918, the old state-church tradition was eliminated following the establishment of the Weimer Republic that saw the abolition of the monarchical system of administration which in the end saw the churches being deprived of the episcopal heads. The Weimer Constitution called for the total separation of the church from the state.

Thus through state agreements, special rights, primarily in the areas of taxes and education, were granted to both Roman Catholic Church and the Evangelical churches of the individual states. This continued up to date seeing religious or clergy exempted from military service and privilege from taxation.

John Dickinson one of the founding fathers wrote a statement in 1768 on the advent of the American Revolution. In his writing, he remarked that, "Religion and Government are certainly very different things instituted for different Ends; the design of one being to promote our temporal Happiness; the design of the other to procure the favor of God, and thereby the salvation of our souls. While these are kept distinct and apart, the peace and welfare of society is preserved and the Ends of both are answered. By mixing them together, feuds the world in Blood and disgraced human Nature."[1360]

He was a Pennsylvanian and this being the case, his statement was not because of the religion of his colony but rather he was concerned with the relationship between religion and government in society. In early 1800s, the separation of church and state became part of the nation's legal and cultural nomenclature Judges, politicians, educators and even religions leaders have embraced church-state separation as central to church-state relations and cornerstone of American democracy. In 1879, the Supreme Court of USA for the first time employed the term "separation of church and state" as a shorthand for the meaning of the First Amendments religious clauses, stating, "It may be accepted almost as an authoritative declaration of the scope and effect of the amendment." This has been supported by many Americans up to date considering it as one of the hall marks of American government.[1361]

[1358] Robert Conquest. Soviet Union historical state, Eurasia.Hoover Institute on war, Revolution and Peace, Stanford University California.
[1359] Michael. David Knowles. Roman Cathlicism. University of Cambridge 1954-63.
[1360] John Dickinson, Pennsylvania Journal, May 12,1768, reprinted in The Founders on Religion,ed. James H.Huston (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2005, 60-61.

Although the phrase is not found in the Constitution, no organizing theory has a greater impact on the way Americans conceptualize the intersection of religion, culture and politics than the principle of church-state separation.[1362]

The important note to take is that though the idea was included in the democratic virtues, it did not become constitutional canon until the mid-twentieth century when incorporation of Bill of rights to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment took effect.

The Court in Everson v Board of Education remarked through Justice Hugo Black that, "The establishment of religion clause of the First Amendment means at least this: Neither a state nor the Federal Government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions or prefer one religion over another. No tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion. In the words of Jefferson, the clause against establishment of religion by law was intended to erect "a wall of separation between church and state."[1363]

From then onwards, separation of church and state became the center for the church-state jurisprudence, endorsed by liberal and conservative justices like particularly in the earlier years, Justices opined that the separation must be "Absolute" "uncompromising," "high and "impregnable" and complete and permanent." This is basically embedded in the freedom of religion.

That said, it should be remarked that the idea of separating the functions and powers of the sacred and the profane reaches far back into Western History. In his writings in the fifth century, Augustine of Hippo distinguished the authority and duties of the sacred and temporal worlds. However, the church-state separation can be traced chiefly to the Protestant Reformation, the enlightenment and Whig politics.

It's from that far, that separation of the church and state was given a worldwide welcome to respect and halt would be conflicts between the state and church given the fact that its religion that nurtured and shaped states. The idea spread to various countries and was adopted in the jurisprudence of various jurisdictions mainly recognizing the freedom of religion.

Religion is so paramount to the extent that the whole world affords it respect. No leader can [1361] Steven K. Green. The Separation of Church and State in the United States. Oxford University Press 2014.

[1362]Reynolds vUnited States 98.US.145 (1879); Mariana.Servin-Gonzalez and Oscar Torres-Reyna, "The Polls-Trends: Religion and Politics," Public Opinion Quarterly 63 (Winter 1999): 592-621,603.
[1363] Everson,330 U.S at 1; McCollum v Board of Education,333 U.S 203 (1948); Zorach v Clauson, 343 U.S 306 (1987) peacefully enjoy his tenure without having respect for religion. That is how deep religion goes in state administration. Indeed, all states have remained observant of the freedom of religion. In most democratic countries, the notion of religious freedom has been observed with Constitutions prohibiting state religion given its history of religion.

In the U.S, The First Amendment of the US Constitution says that everyone in the United States has the right to practice his or her own religion or no religion at all. The Establishment clause of the First Amendment prohibits government from encouraging or promoting religion in any way. "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof…"[1364] Religious autonomy is thus respected by the state. In United States v Ballard, court noted that; "judicial intervention into religious questions is similar to the doctrine of a political question, wherein, it can be understood that just like it is expected that political branches are more opposite to decide the political question, religious bodies are suitable to decide questions about religion."[1365]

Further in Serbian Eastern Orthodox Diocese for the United States of America and Canada et al v Milivojevich, court noted that, "whenever the questions of discipline or of faith or ecclesiastical rule custom or law have been decided by the highest of the church adjudications to which the matter has been carried the legal tribunals must accept such decisions as final and binding." It further remarked that; "Religious freedoms encompass the power of religious bodies to decide for themselves free from state interference matters of church government as well as those of faith and doctrine."

In Uganda, the status quo has been maintained. Article7 and 29(c) have granted the freedom of religion. This is strong observation of the Church Autonomy. Article 7 prohibits the adoption of state religion and Article 29(c) mandates everybody to practice a religion of their choice. In this sense, the law cannot compel a citizen adherence to a religious belief and must always protect the privilege of infidelity.

The legal tribunals have continued to uphold these provisions and avoid state conflict with religion. Justice Stephen Mubiru in Rev Father Cyril Adiga Nakari v Right Reverend Ocan Odoki and Registered Trustees of Arua Diocese observed that, "This is a suit in which difference to organs of governance with the religious community of the Church ought to be observed. This court should use restraint and be slow to intervene in internal affairs of the church whenever it is still possible for the church to correct its errors with in its own Constitutional means." The mere adjudications of such questions would pose grave problems for religious autonomy. This kind of second guessing of ecclesiastical decisions would constitute a clear affront to rights of religious autonomy.

[1364]First Amendment of the US Constitution.
[1365] 322 U.S 78 (1944)

The state only intervenes in religious affairs when checking on the legality of the Church laws to ensure that they are not against the principles of equity, justice and good governance especially when they destabilize the Constitutional fabric. Guidance is sought from the variety of decisions by Uganda's judiciary. In Dimanche Sharon V Makerere University[1366]wherein the appellants were staunch members of the Seventh day Adventist Church that were opposed to the University policies of teaching and organizing exams on Saturday claiming it was in contravention with their religion and depriving them of their right to education. The Court observed that the University principles policies did not in any way violate their freedom of religion and education reason being upholding such would not be in line with fairness and natural justice as other religions could also seek for such reforms.

Religion is thus a strong shareholder in state governance whose respect should be highly respected for peace to prevail by upholding the Church autonomy doctrine. It's for this reason that Justice Musa Ssekaana in Rev Charles Oode Okonya v The Registered Trustees of the Church of Uganda remarked that, "the courts generally have extracted the prohibition against litigating religion from the Church autonomy doctrine which require judicial deference to religious institutions." [1367] Therefore, it seems clear in this modern world that religion is stronger and superior than states despite its silence with religious affairs.

INDISCRIMINATE RULE

As I said above, religion and state are distinct powers, the difference lies in the power itself and not in the person in whom it is vested. All people, the ruler as well as those he/she governs, have the obligation to abide by the sound principles given by the Church, the ruler being the head since he has to lead the others; as our own proverb goes: "The road is opened by the elder."

Therefore, if civil authorities behave as if God is not their Ruler, they incur the very serious guilt of being a scandal to their country and such people do not deserve to be elected as rulers. This is not all, a ruler who is concerned with religion only at home and in the church where he / she is seen worshiping but who, when he/she is engaged in his political activities tries to give the impression that he/she does not worship God, is in grave error.

For that reason, rulers who really concern themselves with religion, those who set an example to their neighbour by their practice of religion, are those who would really be useful to the country: they are the ones who deserve to be elected.

[1366]Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No 2 of 2004.
[1367] HCCS No 305 of 2020

Therefore, all those who suggest throwing all religion out of politics, those who strive to withdraw denominational schools and to change into state schools, those who say they do not care about religion, are dangerous to our country, Buganda and Uganda, because they want to take away from us an indispensable element of good government: that is religion.

THE LEGAL FRAME WORK ON RELIGION

The constitution of Uganda[1368] provides for the right to freedom of religion under Article 29(1) (c) which states that;

Every person shall have the right to-freedom to practise any religion and manifest such practice which shall include the right to belong to and participate in practices of any religious body or organisation in a manner consistent with this constitution.

This right is also rooted in UN international law. Article 18 of the universal declaration of Human rights[1369] provides that;

"Everyone has the right and freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes the right to change one's religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance."

Furthermore, the international covenant on civil and political rights, a UN treaty which Uganda is signatory to also contains a similar provision on the right to freedom of religion.

Article 18 (1) of the ICCPR states that;

"Everyone shall have the right and freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right shall include freedom to have or adopt a religion or belief of his choice, and freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance."

Other regional treaties such as the European convention on human rights and the African charter on human and people's rights also contain provisions for the right to religion.

The right to the freedom of religion is indispensable for pluralism; it is one of the foundations of a democratic society. As noted by the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), this freedom undoubtedly is, in its religious dimension, one of the most vital elements that go to make up the identity of believers and their conception of life, but it is also a precious asset for atheists, agnostics, sceptics and the unconcerned. The pluralism in dissociable from a democratic society, which has been dearly won over the centuries, depends on it. That freedom entails, inter alia,

[1368] 1995 constitution of the Republic of Uganda as ammended
[1369] Universal Declaration of human rights, Article 18

freedom to hold or not to hold religious beliefs and to practise or not to practise a religion.[1370]

The European court of human rights in the case of Francesco Sessa v Italy[1371], the right to freedom of religion is one of the most vital elements which go to make up the identity of believers and their conception of life; as well as a precious asset for Atheists, agnostics, sceptics and the unconcerned. Respect of freedom of religion is also a marker of a free society.

In the case of R vs. Big M Drug Mart ltd[1372] it was observed that; "a truly free society is one which can accommodate a wide variety of beliefs, diversity of tastes and pursuits, customs and codes of conduct. A free society is one which aims at equality with respect to the enjoyment of fundamental freedoms and I say this without any reliance on the charter."

Having addressed the legal frame work around the right to religion, I proceed to look in to the relationship between religion and the state.

The Most rev. Archbishop Joseph Kiwanuka, d.d., Archbishop of Lubaga (Uganda) in his pastoral letter[1373] observes that "I believe that some are irritated and do wrong to others because they do not understand the changes that are taking place in the government, and neither do they understand the relation between Church and State. In fact, Church and State should have good relations with one another and work together for the common good."

The three forms of government found in the world up to this day were described long ago by a Greek philosopher, Aristotle.

i. The first form is the Absolute Monarchy. In that form of government, the power to make laws obliging the whole country (legislative) and the power to judge trials and punish (judiciary), are all vested in the king.

ii. The second form is that of Aristocracy (Bakungu) sharing in government. Then the power of ruling is in the hands of such chiefs.

iii. The third form is that in which all citizens take part, and the government is that of the people (democracy). The people themselves elect their representatives.

However, in certain countries these three forms have been joined together so that the government is formed of a king with the chiefs, and the representatives elected by the citizens. England has such a government.

[1370]Kokkinakis v. Greece, 260 Eur. Ct. H.R. (ser. A) ¶ 31; Buscarini v. San Marino, 1999-I Eur. Ct. H.R. 605, ¶ 34.
[1371]Francesco Sessa v Italy application number 28790/08
[1372]R vs Big M Drug Mart ltd [1985]1 R.C.S 295
[1373]Pastoral letter of the most rev. archbishop joseph kiwanuka, d.d., archbishop of lubaga(uganda) church and state Guiding Principles November 1961

In Buganda

For a very long time, the form of government in Buganda was of the first type, an absolute monarch, but with wide powers left to the aristocracy (Abakungu)

The absolute power of the kings (baKabaka) in all fields was never questioned until the Europeans made a repartition of powers. When Buganda came under the protection of the British Government, the absolute power of the Kabaka came to an end, but he remained one of the governing body.

DUTY OF STATE

The State should do its best to make the country to progress in temporal matters and to establish order and peace, and good morals.

The State must also leave the Church free to fulfil her duties and even defend her against her enemies.

Indeed, like Archbishop Joseph Kiwanuka points out that the church has superior jurisdiction on spiritual matters as compared to the state; the church has come out on different occasions to take a stand in controversial matters

Take for instance the anti-homosexuality act, 2014. This act was passed by parliament on 20th December 2013, which prohibited sexual relations between persons of the same sex. The greatest supporters for the passing of this law were the church that was strongly against relations between persons of the same sex and the reason for this stand was based on religious convictions.

In a letter addressed to the archbishops of Canterbury, Archbishop Stanley Ntagali said that "homosexual practice is incompatible with scripture." He further said that the church of Uganda had been encouraged that the country's parliament had amended the Anti-homosexuality bill to remove the death penalty, and make other provisions of the bill less severe. All amendments which he said the church had recommended.

In my view and in support of the views expressed by Archbishop Joseph Kiwanuka in his pastoral letter, the state and church authority should live together harmoniously while complimenting or working with one another.

There have been different instances where the authority of the church has been recognised by the state take for instance; in the case of kakaire sadiki and Suleiman isotah magumba vs Uganda National Examination board UNEB and Fagil Mandy.

WHAT THE STATE MUST DO FOR THE CHURCH

The State must recognise that it is also bound by the laws of God. Civil rulers have a duty to remember that God has the authority above them, that He rules over everybody on earth and in heaven. They must relate all their activities to Him and in the exercise of their government duties; God is the Rule which they have the obligation to follow. (Immortale Dei)

Therefore, if a ruler, even when engaged in State duties, neglected to concern himself with religion, he would be openly violating God's law and would thus refuse to achieve the end for which God created him as well as that for which He created the country that the ruler is governing.

WHAT ARE THE POWERS OF THE CHURCH AND THOSE OF THE STATE?

Whatever is consecrated to God, all matters concerning souls, religious and moral matters, are governed by the Church who judges them. On the other hand, whatever concerns the government of people in temporal matters belongs to the realm of the State (Immortale Dei).

WHAT THE CHURCH CAN AND MUST DO

I wish here to clarify for you this question of what the Church can and must do in relation with politics and what is outside of her domain. Also you must understand what the State can and must do in relation to the Church. God Almighty has appointed the charge of the human race to two powers: The Church and the State. These two powers are distinct; each in its kind is supreme. In other words, neither the Church nor the State interferes with each other; each has what it needs to attain its end.

Each one is a domain of its own whose limits are defined by the nature and special object of the province of each. (Pope Leo XIII, Immortale Dei)

BUT WHAT IS THIS ORDER?

The teaching of the Church to her people has always been: "In all temporal matters in which no religious principle in involved, the State is supreme." The Church does not merely say this but goes further and defends the State and promotes its rights.

See what the Pope says to his brother Bishops: "Lord Bishops, instruct your people very often on the duty to keep away from forbidden societies and to mix with rebels who plot against the State and breed sedition. Instruct your people to obey their legitimate rulers in what is right, are achieving something excellent." (Diuturnum illud, Leo XIII).

It is clear that the Church recognizes the authority of the State and its rights, and she does not interfere with them, indeed more she helps the State in its duties. The same duty applies to the State: it has the duty to recognise that religious and moral matters, the Church is also supreme and independent in the government of her own affairs. The Holy Father explains in this way: "The Church is a society responsible exclusively to God who established her and gave her the authority in all that she needs to attain her end. Her Founder has placed in her whatsoever is needed to stand firm and to fulfil her duties. The jurisdiction of the Church over man is much higher in dignity than that of the State, since the Church works in the supernatural order for the eternal welfare of souls. The state works in the natural order for the temporal welfare of its citizens. Therefore, the authority of the Church is far above that of the State. The authority of the church must have precedence over that the State; no one can say, that the Church can be subject to the State in the fulfilment of her duties. Jesus Christ gave his Church all the authority she needs, absolutely all, in religious and moral matters, to make laws, to exercise her juridical power and the authority to punish." (Immortale Dei, 5) 8

THE STRUGGLE FOR SUPREMACY BETWEEN THE EXECUTIVE AND CHURCH

Let us turn to the second part of this letter in which I shall speak of the relations between the forms of government explained above and the Church.

Time and again, I have heard such things as "keep religion out of politics, leave religious ideas out of politics and take religion out of schools." Among those who speak like that some do it out of pure hatred of religion. It could not be explained otherwise since in fact religion strives to remind people of their duty to serve God, which in no way harms politics on the contrary it is a real help to it. But there are others who are induced to say that they don't want religion to be mixed with politics by the mere fact that they are afraid of the truth and justice inherent in religion. They would like to deceive people in order to bring them to their side, but religion helps people at the time of choosing a government to see objectively what is right and to choose a good government.

There are finally many people who repeat "keep religion out of politics" without any understanding whatsoever of what it is all about.

THE CHURCH AND THE STATE, WHICH IS MORE SUPERIOR ?

This is a question often asked but has not been clearly answered. In this part of this paper we analyse the concepts proposed by modern scholars studying the relationship between the church and the state. The relationship between secular and ecclesiastical authorities, the state and the church throughout the development of the state and statehood is one of the most pressing problems. The Article emphasizes the importance of spiritual revival for the further development of statehood. From a more historical perspective, the church had always had a more superior position or say in important affairs.

During the middle ages, in Europe, the Christian religion determined the position of the state as well as the position of the church. Religion gave state authorities and the state power its legitimacy, and government was the protector of the Christian faith.

However nowadays religion is no longer that fundamental; and the starting points are democracy and the rule of law.

This development shows the secularization of the state and constitutional theory. The position and meaning attributed to religion in several European states no longer has a religious basis.

To an extent it can be argued that the position now is that of the state verses religion. But from different scenarios it's evident that the state authority overrides religious sentiments.

In the famous American decision in the case of Roe v. Wade the court was faced with this kind of complex situation of deciding between whether the rights ordained by God are more superior to the authority of the state.

Facts of the Case were that; In 1969, Texan Norma McCorvey was a poor, working-class 22-year-old woman, unmarried and looking to end an unwanted pregnancy. But in Texas, abortion was illegal unless it was "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother." She was eventually referred to attorneys Sarah Weddington and Linda Coffee, who were looking for a plaintiff to challenge the Texas law. On their advice, McCorvey, using the pseudonym Jane Roe, filed a lawsuit against the Dallas County district attorney Henry Wade, an official responsible for enforcing criminal laws, including antiabortion statutes. The suit said the law was unconstitutional because it was an invasion of her privacy; she sought the overturn of the law and an injunction so she could go ahead with the abortion.

The district court agreed with McCorvey that the law was unconstitutionally vague and violated her right to privacy under the Ninth and 14th Amendments but refused to issue an injunction. McCorvey appealed and the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case, along with another case called Doe v. Bolton, lodged against a similar Georgia statute.

The Supreme Court case filing occurred on March 3, 1970, when McCorvey was six months pregnant; she eventually gave birth and that child was adopted. She said she wanted to continue with the case to support other women's rights. Arguments for Roe v. Wade began on December 13, 1971. Weddington and Coffee were the plaintiff's lawyers. John Tolle, Jay Floyd, and Robert Flowers were the defendant's lawyers.

Constitutional Issues

The Roe v. Wade case was argued for the plaintiff Jane Roe on the grounds that the Texas abortion law violated the 14th and Ninth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. The due process clause of the 14th Amendment guarantees equal protection under the law to all citizens and, in particular, required that laws be clearly written.

Previous cases challenging abortion laws usually cited the 14th Amendment, claiming that the law was not specific enough when a woman's life might be threatened by pregnancy and childbirth. However, since attorneys Coffee and Weddington wanted a decision that rested on a pregnant woman's right to decide for herself whether abortion was necessary, they based their argument on the Ninth Amendment, which states: "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." The framers of the Constitution had recognized that new rights might be developed in years to come and they wanted to be able to protect those rights.

The state prepared its case primarily on the basis that a foetus had legal rights, which ought to be protected.

The Arguments

The argument for the plaintiff Jane Doe stated that, under the Bill of Rights, a woman has the right to terminate her pregnancy. It is improper for a state to impose on a woman's right to privacy in personal, marital, familial, and sexual decisions. There is no case in the Court's history that declares that a foetus—a developing infant in the womb—is a person. Therefore, the foetus cannot be said to have any legal "right to life." Because it is unduly intrusive, the Texas law is unconstitutional and should be overturned.

The argument for the state rested on its duty to protect prenatal life. The unborn are people and, as such, are entitled to protection under the Constitution because life is present at the moment of conception. The Texas law was, therefore, a valid exercise of police powers reserved to the states to protect the health and safety of citizens, including the unborn. The law is constitutional and should be upheld.

Majority Opinion

The Supreme Court handed down its ruling, holding that a woman's right to an abortion falls within the right to privacy protected by the 14th Amendment. The decision gave a woman a right to an abortion during the entirety of the pregnancy and defined different levels of state interest for regulating abortion in the second and third trimesters.

- In the first trimester, the state (that is, any government) could treat abortion only as a medical decision, leaving medical judgment to the woman's physician.
- In the second trimester (before viability), the state's interest was seen as legitimate when it was protecting the health of the mother.
- After the viability of the foetus (the likely ability of the foetus to survive outside of and separated from the uterus), the potential of human life could be considered as a legitimate state interest. The state could choose to "regulate, or even proscribe abortion" as long as the life and health of the mother was protected.

Siding with the majority were Harry A. Blackmun (for The Court), William J. Brennan, Lewis F. Powell Jr., and Thurgood Marshall. Concurring were Warren Burger, William Orville Douglas, and Potter Stewart

IN MIXED MATTERS

In “mixed matters”, where both State and Church have jurisdiction, the Church is the higher authority; such is the case, for example, in questions concerning marriage and education. Then, the State’s decision must be subordinated to the decision of the Church, since the State works in the temporal order and the Church in the supernatural order. Temporal matters must be subordinated to spiritual matters. When there is need to defend spiritual matters and Christian morals among people, the Church has the obligation to stand firm. Pope Leo XIII writes: “God entrusted to the Church the duty to exert herself firmly if the State tries in any way to do harm to religion; the Church has been given the duty to strive to improve the impact of religion in all laws and commands ruling people” (Sapientia Christiane, 16).

WHEN COURTS DISTANCE FROM RELIGIOUS AFFAIRS:

“Whenever the questions of discipline or faith or ecclesiastical rule custom or law have been decided by the highest of church adjudications to which the matter has been carried the legal tribunals must accept such decision as final and as binding.”[1374]

The statement natures lots of uncertainties and questions concerning the thin line hidden in its reasoning. Does it mean that the highest church adjudications are an equivalent of the Supreme Court? Doesn’t this outrage the supremacy of the Constitution? Doesn’t this affect the Constitutional Spirit embedded in Article 126[1375] and if not where does it leave the constitutionality of Article 129[1376]?

The Supreme law of the land is the Constitution which underlines the fact that it’s from it that other laws derives their validity. Besides, this connotes that everything done in the state must be in the same breath with the supreme law followed by the notion that no one is above the law. For effective operationalization of its supremacy, the Constitution puts forward the Courts of Judicature. These courts are clothed with mandate to exercise judicial power.

[1374] Justice Musa Ssekaana, in Rev. Charles Oode Okunya v The Registered Trustees of The Church of Uganda HCCS No 305 of 2020
[1375] The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda as amended.
[1376] Ibid

Article 126 establishes that judicial power is derived from the people and shall be exercised by the courts in the name of the people and in conformity with the law and with the values, norms and aspirations of the people. [1377]One of the aspirations of the people is obtaining justice whenever they appear before these courts. Perhaps this marks the rationale for Article 126(2) (e) which emphasizes that substantive justice shall be administered without undue regard to technicalities.

Therefore, courts always have to intervene and shape the public discourse. They are the custodians of the law and neglect of which may beat the primary aim of justice.

Justice Musa Ssekaana in Rev. Charles Oode Okonya v The Registered Trustees the Church of Uganda[1378] remarked "the court has to understand that they are ill-equipped to deal with religious beliefs and practices because of remoteness and lack of familiarity hence should only interfere when any practices seriously damage the Constitutional fabric. This makes it the main reason for prohibiting courts from litigating religion because they lack the ability to address religious questions."

My concern is on where this leaves the courts of law yet his remark means that the decisions of these highest church adjudications cannot be appealed anywhere in any courts simply because they lack ability and are ill-equipped.

Isn't this neglect of the court duties? How are those aggrieved by the decisions of these highest church adjudicators aided yet it's the courts to ensure justice.

In my understanding, conflicts involving religious issues pertain to questions of civil rights which should be decided by civil courts of law. For instance, the right to a religious office is in the nature of property which in my view is a civil right that civil courts have full jurisdiction to decide on the matter.[1379] A suit in which a right to an office is contested is a suit of a civil nature not withstanding that such right may depend entirely on the decision of question as to religious rites or ceremonies. In this regard such decisions should be appealable to the court and should be resolved in the case of discontent by the plaintiff.

Why should the modern courts neglect the modern society? Isn't there need to check on the laws, ecclesiastical rules, and faith to ascertain whether there in consonant with the principles of natural justice fairness and good governance when put in operation by the church in disciplining and deciding who should be in a particular office? Such customs and laws may not be constitutional and need not be operationalized and accepted in the countries affairs which role is supposed to be played by the courts. The decisions of these of adjudications should be observed analysed to understand whether they are fair or not and whether they are not against the rules of fairness and equity. This cannot in any way be analysed when courts distance themselves from the religious affairs.

[1377] The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda as amended.
[1378] HCCS No 305 of 2020
[1379] Raj Kali Kuer v Ram Rattan Pandey, Supreme Court of India, on April 1995.(1995 AIR 493)

Besides, are courts not neglecting the coercion, undue influence and duress that fill the corners of these adjudications of the church? How are those aggrieved by such decisions able to receive justice if they cannot appeal their decisions? Besides, doesn't this affect Judicial Review simply because the courts have no ability and are ill-equipped with the historical beliefs? Courts are taken to be the only source of justice on earth and therefore must avail a solution to every problem.

To my understanding, judicial non –interference with religious affairs defeats the Constitutionality of Article 126 and 129 of the constitution which eradicates the primary role of courts, after all the constitution is the voice of the people and the voice of the people is the voice of God. (VOX POPULI VOX DEI)

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JUSTICE SSEKAANA MUSA (VERBATIM) IN THE HIGH COURT OF UGANDA AT KAMPALA (CIVIL DIVISION) CIVIL SUIT NO. 305 OF 2020 REV. CHARLES OODE OKUNYA(PLAINTIFF) VERSUS THE REGISTERED TRUSTEES OF THE CHURCH OF UGANDA(DEFENDANT)

BACKGROUND

On 19th November 2019, the Plaintiff was duly elected as the Bishop elect of Kumi Diocese after a thorough process of vetting and nomination. Subsequently, by letter dated 16th December 2019, the Archbishop of the Church of Uganda communicated to the Plaintiff that there were complaints raised against him and issues concerning his first relationship with the mother of his children a one Dinah for which the Plaintiff was to respond to in writing.

The said letter also informed the Plaintiff that his consecration and enthronement as the 2nd Bishop of Kumi Diocese scheduled for 29th December 2019 was postponed till further notice.

The Plaintiff made a response in regard to the allegations in writing to the Archbishop of the Defendant. The said lady in question Dinah Amongin and her father Mr. Onyait Stephen also wrote to the Archbishop in respect of the allegations against the Plaintiff.

The House of Bishops sitting at Boroboro appointed a select committee of three bishops to investigate the matter. That among the issues that came before the Select Committee was the issue of the Bishop Elect's age. The Select Committee picked up the issue of age upon which the plaintiff was allowed to explain the discrepancy in his age and especially the date of birth of 1975 or 1970.

The Select Committee made a report to the House of Bishops sitting at Mityana on the 01st day of February 2020. The House of Bishops accordingly proceeded to revoke the plaintiff's election on grounds that he falsified his age by way of statutory declaration and had not attained the age of 45 years by the time he was elected.

The defendant in their defence contended that the plaintiff's assertion that he was born on 23rd November 1970 is fraudulent given the over eight documents from different Government and Educational Institutions where the plaintiff passed where he personally submitted information that he was born 23rd November 1975. He fraudulently altered his year of birth to 1970 to meet the requirement for the office of the Bishop which at the time he had not attained.

The plaintiff in his plaint sought the following reliefs;

(a) A declaration that the impugned decision of the House of Bishops revoking the election of the plaintiff as the 2nd Bishop of Kumi Diocese is illegal and unlawful.

(b) A declaration that the impugned decision of the House of Bishops barring the plaintiff's name from ever coming up among any future candidates is illegal and unlawful.

(c) A permanent injunction restraining the Defendant, its agents, servants and or employees from further conducting the search and subsequent appointment of another Bishop of Kumi Diocese until the determination of the suit.

(d) An Order directing the defendant to consecrate and enthrone the plaintiff as the 2nd Bishop of Kumi Diocese.

(e) General Damages.

(f) Exemplary Damages.

(g) Costs of the Suit.

The parties filed a joint scheduling memorandum where the following issues were agreed for court's determination;

Issues

(i) Whether the Plaintiff had attained the age of 45 as required by the Provincial Constitution and Canons by the time of his purported election by the House of Bishops;

(ii) Whether the Defendant illegally and unlawfully revoked the election of the Plaintiff as second Bishop of Kumi Diocese;

(iii) Whether the Defendant's decision in barring the Plaintiff's name from ever coming up among candidates for electoral office with the Defendant was lawful;

(iv) Whether the Defendant plays any role in the election of \Bishops in the Church of Uganda;

(v) Whether the Plaintiff is entitled to the reliefs claimed in the pleadings.

The plaintiff lined up 5 witnesses while the defendant presented 2 witnesses who filed witness statement which were admitted as their examination in chief.

I have decided to redraft issue no. 4 so as to make it wide enough to capture the broad issue of; Whether the plaint discloses a cause of action against the defendant. It appears from the pleadings of the defendant that it disputed the claims against the defendant.

Whether the plaint discloses a cause of action against the defendant.

The defendant in paragraph 4(d), 25 and 27(d) of the defence contended that;

- ✓ The defendant shall aver and contend that it does not enthrone or consecrate a Bishop in the Church of Uganda.
- ✓ The defendant plays no role in the appointment and election of Bishops.

- ✓ The defendant does not consecrate the Bishop and hence a Court cannot make an order capable of being enforced.

Analysis

As held in Auto Garage vs Motokov [1971] EA 514 the three essential elements to support a cause of action are where the plaintiff enjoyed a right, that the right has been violated, and finally that the defendant is liable.

The main consideration in this matter is the appreciation of the nature of right the plaintiff enjoyed in this matter and whether such right is justiciable in the ordinary civil courts. The plaintiff is claiming a right to be consecrated as a Bishop of Kumi Diocese after the House of Bishop sat on 1st February 2020 and revoked the plaintiff's election as the 2nd Bishop of Kumi Diocese.

The nature of the plaintiff's case is a religious dispute and therefore religious issues arise out of this dispute since it involves the revocation of the plaintiff's election as a 2nd Bishop of Kumi Diocese. Generally, Religion is deemed by our culture to be a matter of persuasion. The law cannot compel a citizen's adherence to a religious belief, and must always protect the privilege of infidelity.

Countless are the times when courts have said that religious disputes are not within the jurisdiction of civil suits. This sweeping statement gets limited to read that a 'purely' ecclesiastical or doctrinal issue is outside the scope of civil jurisdiction, thereby enabling them to assume decision-making function over factions whose property squabbles are inextricably interwoven with doctrinal undertones. Or to put it the other way, a judge may say that religious disputes which involve property or civil dispute are within the scope of court.

In the case of United States v Ballard 322 U.S 78 (1944) the court noted that;

"Judicial intervention into religious questions is similar to the doctrine of a political question, wherein, it can be understood that just like it is expected that political branches are more opposite to decide the political question, religious bodies are suitable to decide questions about religion."

The court is basically ignorant of the historical beliefs and the reasoning behind it; hence they apply the judicial mind to check the veracity of faiths and beliefs because of which their interpretation is different from the beliefs of devotees. The court has to understand that they are ill-equipped to deal with religious beliefs and practices because of remoteness and lack of familiarity hence should only interfere when any practices seriously damage the constitutional fabric. This makes it the main reason for prohibiting courts from litigating religion because they lack the ability to address religious questions. There is 'limited jurisprudential competence' to decide such religious matters.

Therefore, courts generally have extracted the prohibition against litigating religion from the 'church autonomy doctrine' which requires judicial deference to religious institutions ''whenever the questions of discipline, or of faith, or ecclesiastical rule, custom, or law have been decided by……church judicatories."

Justice Stephen Mubiru in Rev Father Cyril Adiga Nakari vs Right Reverend Ocan Odoki and Registered Trustees of Arua Diocese HCCS No. 002/2017 High Court Arua had this to say on Church/religious disputes –

> "This is a suit in which deference to organs of governance with the religious community of the Church ought to be observed. This Court should use restraint and be slow to intervene in internal affairs of the Church whenever it is still possible for the Church to correct its errors within its own institutional means."

He went on further –

> "On the other hand, the determination of who is morally and religiously fit to conduct pastoral duties or who should be excluded for non-conformity within the dictates of the religion falls within the core of religious functions. Civil Courts will defer to a religious organisation good faith understanding of who qualifies as its Minister where resolution of the dispute cannot be made without extensive inquiry by the Civil Court into religious law and policy, the court will not intervene.
>
> The mere adjudication of such questions would pose grave problems for religious autonomy. This kind of second guessing of ecclesiastical decisions would constitute a clear affront to rights of religious autonomy. The Church must be free to choose who will guide it on its way."

Similarly, the other reason to prohibit courts from this decision making stems not from skepticism regarding judicial ability to resolve religious questions, but rather from concerns that judicial resolutions of such questions will be interpreted as an endorsement of one religious view over another or importing practices not conforming to spiritual and religious teachings.

The non-justiciability of some issues would mean that one cannot seek remedy elsewhere and thus leaving them without any options to vindicate their rights. The court is such circumstances should be open to address the issue before hand. However, where the religious institutions which have dispute resolution mechanism must be upheld. As a matter of constitutional law and sound policy, courts should wade in the waters of disputes turning on religious doctrine or practice so as to afford parties access to an adjudicative forum to provide redress for legal wrongs.

It bears emphasis, that whenever the questions of discipline, of faith, or ecclesiastical rule, custom, or law have been decided by the highest of these church judicatories to which the matter has been carried, the courts must accept such decisions as final, and as binding on them, in their application to the case before them. This is premised on the view that courts lack capacity to litigate religion and it stems in large part from worry that religious claims lack objectivity and empirical bases. Thus, "In contrast to ordinary questions of fact, religious questions are understood to lie beyond judicial competence because they do not depend on the logic of law. Instead, religious questions may be answered on the basis of faith, mystical experiences, miracles, or other non-rational sources." In the case of Ballard v United States (supra) The Supreme Court noted;

"Men may believe what they cannot prove-They may not be able to put the proof of their religious doctrines or beliefs. Religious experiences which are as real as life to some may be incomprehensible to others. Yet the fact that they may be beyond the ken of mortals does not mean that they can be made suspect before the law….when triers of fact undertake that task, they enter a forbidden domain."

The selection of a Bishop is a religious function in my view and the plaintiff's claims that are under adjudication would invite court to get involved in the resolution of religious question that involves the interpretation of the church constitution and the provincial canons that govern the appointment process. The United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in the case of Petruska vs Gannon University noted:

"The process of selecting a religious Minister is per se a religious exercise."

Article 4(2) of the Provincial Constitution provides;

No person shall be allowed to administer as Bishop, Priest or Deacon in the Church of Uganda unless he or she has been licensed by the Archbishop in the case of Bishops or Diocesan Bishop in other cases.

The House of Bishops which is the highest organ responsible for selecting a Bishop has made a religious decision in their view that the plaintiff is not best suited to serve in that position as a leader of the Church in Kumi Diocese. The decision to certify the plaintiff or not is a religious one based on qualifications set out in the Provincial Constitution and Provincial Canons of Church of Uganda. This mandate as discussed earlier cannot be brought to question in courts of law and it must be respected for harmony in the Church management and administration. The intervention by courts would bring the Church and the State in direct conflict over the religious question contrary to doctrine of Ministerial Exception.

The doctrine of Ministerial exception is drawn from the USA where the First amendment guarantees freedom of religion and forbids Congress from enacting state religion. It is the equivalent of Articles 7 and 29(1) of the Ugandan Constitution. This doctrine has been applied in several American cases and which cases are of persuasive authority as they discuss constitutional provisions which are in pari-materia with those of the Ugandan Constitution.

In Petruska vs Gannon University the United States Court of Appeal for the Third circuit had this to say –

> "First, like an individual, a Church in its collective capacity must be free to express religious beliefs, profess matters of faith and communicate its religious message, unlike an individual who can speak on her own behalf. However, the Church as an institution must retain the collaray right to select its voice. A Minister is not merely an employee of the Church: she is the embodiment of its message. A Minister serves as the Church public representative, its ambassador, its voice to the faithful. Accordingly, the process of selecting a Minister is perse a religious exercise. The Minister is the chief instrument by which the Church seeks to fulfill its purpose. Matters touching this relationship must necessarily be recognised as of prime ecclesiastical concern. Consequently, any restriction on the Church's right to choose who will carry its spiritual message necessarily infringes upon its full exercise to profess its beliefs."

In Hossana Tabor Evangelical Lutheran Church and School vs Equal Opportunities Commission, the Supreme Court of the United States had this to say on the matter –

> "A religious organisation right to choose Ministers would be hollow, however if secular courts would second guess the organisations sincere determination that a given employee is a 'Minister' under the organisations theological tenets."

It went further to state –

> "When it comes to the expression and inculcation of religious doctrine there can be no doubt that the messenger matters. Religious teachings cover the gamut from moral conduct to metaphysical truth and both the content and credibility of a religious message depend vitally on the conduct and character of its teachers. A religion cannot depend on someone to be an effective advocate for its religious vision if that person's conduct fails to live up to the religion percepts that he / she espouses. For this reason, a religious body's right to self-governance must include the ability to select and to be selective about those who will serve as the very embodiment of its message and its voice to the faithful."

These cases though decided by the Supreme Court of the United States of America are relevant because they discuss constitutional provisions which are similar to these in the Ugandan Constitution. The First Amendment in the US Constitution provides that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion. This is at times referred to as the Establishment Clause.

This is similar to Article 7 of the Uganda Constitution which states "Uganda shall not adopt a state religion."

The Free Exercise clause in the American Constitution protects the right of citizens to freely exercise their religious rights and beliefs and is similar to Article 29 (1) (c) of the Ugandan Constitution which provides:

> "Every person shall have the right to freedom to practice any religion, and manifest such practice which shall include the right to belong to and participate in the practice of any religious body or organisation in a manner consistent with the Constitution."

Justice Steven Mubiru in Rev.Fr. Cyril Adiga Nakarivs 1. Rt. Rev. SabinoOcanOdoki and 2. The Registered Trustees of Arua Diocese – Civil Suit No. 0002 of 2017 (supra) made reference to the American case of Petruska vs Gannon University and went on to say:

> "That statement underscores the fact that a religious organization's fate is inextricably bound up with those whom it entrusts with the responsibilities of preaching its word and ministering to its adherents. These are difficulties in separating the message from the messenger. I am persuaded by the interpretation and application given to the First Amendment by the Courts in the United States to hold that Articles 7 and 29(1)(c) of the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda 1995 protect the roles of religious leadership worship ritual and expression.
>
> The freedom of religious groups to engage in certain key religious activities (including the conducting of worship services and other religious ceremonies and rituals as well as the critical process of communicating the faith.
>
> He went on further:
>
> Religious autonomy means that religious authorities must be free to determine who qualifies to serve in positions of substantial religious importance. Accordingly, religious groups must be free to choose the personnel who are essential to the performance of these functions. If a Church believes that the ability of a priest to conduct worship services or important religious ceremonies or rituals, or to serve as a messenger or teacher of its faith or perform such other key functions has been compromised, then the constitutional guarantee of religious freedom protects the Church's right to remove the priest from his position. The Constitution creates a private sphere within which religious bodies are free to govern themselves in accordance with their own beliefs. "forcing a group to accept certain members may impair its ability to express those views, and only those views, that it intends to express" (Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U. S. 640, 648 (2000). The Constitution leaves it to the collective conscience of each > religious group to determine for itself who is qualified to serve as a teacher or messenger of its faith. In the result, all church offices ought to be filled by the exclusive decision of the church concerned. No state body (including the courts) is entitled to rule over the canonical aspects of church offices.

The same position was adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States which held in the case of Serbian Eastern Orthodox Diocese for The United States of America and Canada et al vs. Milivojevich as follows:

> "whenever the questions of discipline or of faith or ecclesiastical rule custom or law have been decided by the highest of the Church adjudications to which the matter has been carried the legal tribunals must accept such decision as final and as binding*".*

and went on further to say;

> "Religious freedoms encompass the power of religious bodies to decide for themselves free from State interference matters of Church Government as well as those of faith and doctrine".

Therefore, the House of Bishops has made a decision that the Plaintiff is not the right messenger to disseminate its message and its beliefs given the Plaintiff's fraudulent engagement in changing his age and date of birth from 1975 to 1970. The decision must stand and should not be interrogated by courts as discussed earlier since the court is not best suited to handle religious question disputes or it is an affront on the 'doctrine of ministerial Exception'.

The actions of the plaintiff involving change of date of birth is contrary to the Provincial Canons and the Constitution of Church of Uganda Canon 3.9.1 (Page 78) - A Bishop shall strive to be an example of righteous and Godly living ……"

If the House of Bishops has determined that the Plaintiff does not meet such a standard, it would not be open to the Court to order the Archbishop to forcefully consecrate him. That would amount to forced inclusion and would run counter to the Ministerial exception doctrine which gives religious institutions residual power free from the Courts in determining who should be entrusted with the governance of its institutions.

The rights that the plaintiff enjoys are derived from the Provincial Constitution of the Church and the Provincial canons and the same must be ably enforced through the existing adjudication mechanisms instead of running to the civil court which is not very competent to resolve the same in ignorance of applicable regulations and guidelines as derived from the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament as being the ultimate standard of faith, given by inspiration of God.

Church of Uganda as a religious institution with a constitution and provincial canons maintains internal ecclesiastical bodies tasked with resolving religious disputes or litigation. Therefore, Church of Uganda has primary authority over such matters involving religious questions. Article 16 of the Provincial Constitution provides;

The Provincial Assembly shall by Canon provide

a) That any Bishop, Clergy or Laity of the Church of Uganda shall not seek redress in any external adjudicatory body unless all the dispute resolution mechanisms provided under this Constitution and Provincial Canons have been fully exhausted.

Article 17 provides that:
The Provincial Assembly shall provide by Canons for the following tribunals-

a) Diocesan Tribunals;
b) A Provincial Appeals Tribunal; and
c) A Provincial Tribunal

The Plaintiff conceded in his examination-in-chief that as a Clergyman in the Church of Uganda, he is governed by the Provincial Constitution and Provincial Canons.

Article 21 (4) of the Provincial Constitution provides as follows –

> "Any person who is subject to this Constitution by virtue of being a member of the Church of Uganda shall not seek redress in any external adjudicatory body in connection with a matter that can be handled before he or she has exhausted all dispute resolution mechanism under this Constitution."

Article 4(5) of the Provincial Constitution provides as follows –

> "Any dispute regarding the formal qualification of any person to Minister as a Bishop, Priest or Deacon in the Church shall be decided by the House of Bishops."

The plaintiff failed to exhaust the available remedies with the church and this court would decline to handle the religious question which as discussed earlier is non-justiciable in this court. This matter stands dismissed on this ground.

Wrong Party

The plaintiff brought this suit against the defendant as "The Registered Trustees the Church of Uganda".

The defence counsel submitted that this suit was instituted against the wrong party; - the Registered Trustees of the Church of Uganda, because the Registered Trustees of the Church of Uganda is not a body that plays any role in the election of Bishops in the Church of Uganda. The two bodies; The Registered Trustees and the House of Bishops are different and play different roles.

The plaintiff's counsel submitted that According to Article 18 (1) of the Church of Uganda provincial constitution 1972 as amended in 1994 and 2016 marked as DEX 19 provides that there shall be a board of the registered trustees of the church of Uganda which shall be incorporated under the Trustees Incorporation Act.

Under the same Article 18(3) of the same constitution provides for the composition of the registered trustees of the church of Uganda who shall consist of:

1. the Archbishop who shall be the chairman of the Board of Trustees.
2. dean of the province who shall be the vice chairman and
3. All other Diocesan Bishops of the church of Uganda who shall be members of the Board of trustees.

Under the Church of Uganda provincial canons marked as DEX 18, Canon 3.6.1 on election and consecration of Bishops provides that in case of a vacancy for a bishop, the diocesan nomination committee shall on behalf of the Diocesan Synod forward two names to the Archbishop for consideration for appointment to the office of the Diocesan Bishop by the House of Bishops.

According to counsel in harmonization of the two provisions above, the Archbishop and the office of the Diocesan Bishop play a role in the election process and together are members of the Board that constitute the Registered Trustees of the Church of Uganda.

He prayed that this honorable court confirms and finds that the Archbishop and all other Diocesan Bishops are members of the Registered Trustees of the church of Uganda which is a legal person answerable to matters concerning and touching the pleadings before this Court.

Analysis

This court finds the submission of counsel for the plaintiff totally misleading and incomprehensible. The plaintiff as a member of the church is fully aware of the different organs of the church and the different roles they play in the Church administration and management. They are both established under different Articles under the Provincial Constitution as well as under the Provincial Canons.

The Provincial Constitution Article 18 provides for Registered Trustees of the Church of Uganda as follows;

(1) There shall be a Board of the Registered Trustees of the Church of Uganda which shall be incorporated under the Trustees Incorporation Act.

(2) The Registered Trustees of the Church of Uganda shall have perpetual succession and shall sue and be sued in its corporate name.

(3)

(4)

(5) The functions of the Registered Trustees of the Church of Uganda shall be as follows:-

(a) To hold all lands, property, funds and endowments of the Church of Uganda as may lawfully be entrusted to it for any specified purpose or for the general benefit of the Church of Uganda.

(b) To give effect to this trust, attaching to any land, property or endowment being held pursuant to the provisions of this Article.

In addition, Canon 1:6 of the Provincial Canons also provides for The Registered Trustees of Church of Uganda;

1.6.3; All Church land and property shall be vested in the Board of Registered Trustees who shall be empower to hold them upon any trust which is approved and accepted by the Provincial Assembly.

1.6.4 All business of the Board of Registered Trustees of Church of Uganda shall be executed through the Directorate of Land Management at the Provincial Secretariat.

It is clear from the above instruments that the Registered Trustees of Church of Uganda was established for a specific purpose and the capacity to sue or be sued is confined strictly to the functions for which it was created and established. There is nothing within their functions which provides for the election of Bishops and the different roles cannot be swapped or interchangeable as the plaintiff's counsel would wish this court to believe.

The highest organ of the Church of Uganda is the Provincial Assembly which consists of three Houses namely that of the Bishops, that of the Clergy and that of the Laity (Article 5(6) of the Provincial Constitution)

The appointment of Bishops is provided for in Article 13 of the Provincial Constitution and Canon 3.7.5 which provides for forwarding names of candidates to the House of Bishops for consideration for appointment as a Bishop.

The plaintiff throughout his pleadings complains against the House of Bishops and the Registered Trustees of Church of Uganda are not mentioned anywhere as being responsible for any wrongdoing or being involved in the appointment and revocation of the plaintiff's appointment as the 2nd Bishop of Kumi.

It could be deduced from the Provincial Constitution that creation of the Registered Trustees of Church of Uganda as a body corporate was purposely done to hold their property and indeed they could hold the same in their names. The creation of the body corporate was not to allow them take over liability or responsibility of the entire Church of Uganda administration. It is indeed true that the areas like appointment of Bishops or Clergy or Laity were left out without 'corporate status of suing or being sued' is not justiciable in courts and the existing system of dispute resolution under Article 17 of the Provincial Constitution is conclusive.

As a general rule, all appropriate parties should be involved in the proceedings so that a proper and complete determination of all issues and comprehensive adjudication of all affected interests. A suit against a wrong party is incompetent and cannot be sustained in any court of law. A cause of action can only be sustained against a proper party against whom court can give orders. A court cannot give any orders affecting a person who was not a party to the suit or who was not heard by court.

The plaintiff sought an order against the defendant and yet the defendant is not involved in the election of Bishops in Church of Uganda. "An Order directing the defendant to consecrate and enthrone the plaintiff as the 2nd Bishop of Kumi Diocese."

The Bishop is consecrated and enthroned by the Archbishop; therefore, any order made otherwise would be directed to a wrong party.

The plaintiff clearly sued a wrong party and this suit cannot be sustained against the Registered Trustees of Church of Uganda whose mandate and function under the Provincial Constitution as shown earlier is very different.

This suit would be dismissed on this ground alone. But for completeness the pertinent issue of age should be resolved.

Whether the Plaintiff had attained the age of 45 as required by the Provincial Constitution and Canons by the time of his purported election by the House of Bishops;

The plaintiff's counsel submitted that the plaintiff at the Second sitting of the Nominations Committee presented a Statutory Declaration with an attachment of Certificate of Birth No.23076 issued by Tauter Sub-county chief on the 18th March 1971 and a ministry of Health Young child clinic Immunization Card No.8251. The documents presented in the statutory declaration throughout the entire proceedings of court have never been in contention and the same have been adopted in the plaintiff's witness statement.

The purpose of the plaintiff to swear a statutory declaration was to correct an error that was not of his own making the birth certificate and immunization card hadn't been in his custody and it would be improper for this honorable court to overlook this glaring evidence on the face or record.

The defendant's counsel submitted that the requirement for the office of Bishop for one to have attained the age of 45 is both a legal requirement under the Provincial Constitution and Provincial Canons. Article 13(6) of the Provincial Constitution and Canon 3.6.2 of the Provincial Canons. The Plaintiff himself agreed that as a priest in the Church of Uganda he is governed by both the Provincial Constitution and the Canons.

The Issue here is whether Rev. Charles Okunya (hereinafter the Plaintiff) was born on the 23rd of November 1970 or 23rd November 1975 and had attained the age of 45 on the 30th day of October 2019 on the date of nominations.

It is the contention of the Defence that he was born on the 23rd day of November 1975 and our reasons for the said submission are the following:

The following documents which the Plaintiff conceded were his own, some in his own writing indicate that he was born on 23rd November 1975.

These documents are:

1. Application form to Uganda Christian University; DEX 11
2. Admission Application to Uganda Christian University; DEX 11
3. Application to Uganda Management Institute; DEX 10
4. Curriculum Vitae presented to Bishop Illukor Girls' Secondary Schol, where the Plaintiff was a teacher; DEX 9
5. The Plaintiff's Passport; DEX 5
6. The Plaintiff's Electoral Commission Record. DEX 7
7. The Plaintiff's Diocesan Records to the Provincial Secretariat; DEX 8
8. The Plaintiff's Academic Transcript from Uganda Christian University; DEX 12
9. The Plaintiff's Driving Permit Spread from 2011 – 2019; DEX 14
10. The Plaintiff's application form for National Identity Card; DEX15
11. The Plaintiff's National Identity Card. PE 11

These documents cover a period of 2003 – 2019 from the time he applied to go to Uganda Christian University to his last driving permit that was issued in 2019. That is a period of 16 years where the Plaintiff consistently indicated to various Organisations that he was born in 1975.

It should be noted that when he wanted to stand for election as a Bishop, only three (3) days before the election, he swore a statutory declaration to indicate that he made a mistake when he was registering for his National Identity Card. (Exhibit PE II)

It should however be noted that in paragraphs 21, 22, 23 of the Plaintiff's witness statement, the Plaintiff stated that the adoption of the year 1975 as his year of birth was because he wanted to maintain consistency due to a mistake that had been made in 1991 when his uncle the late Apedel registered him in Senior Three.

Analysis

The main issue for consideration is whether the plaintiff was qualified to stand at the time he was nominated for election to the position of Bishop. The main criterion for nominating a person to the office of Diocesan Bishop is set out in the Provincial Constitution Article 13(6) and Provincial Canons 3.6.2.

Article 13(6) and Provincial Canon 3.6.2provides:

No person shall be elected to the office of Bishop unless he or she has attained the age of forty-five (45) and is a holder of at least a Bachelor's degree in Theology, or a first degree in any other field with an additional Diploma in Theology from a Theological Institution recognized by the Church of Uganda, provided that a Bishop shall retire after serving for a period of fifteen (15) years or upon attaining the age of sixty five (65) years, whichever comes first.

Provincial Canon 3.7.23 provides:

The Diocesan Nominations Committee shall evaluate every candidate whose name is proposed for consideration for nomination on the basis of the following criteria-

a) Age;
b) Academic qualification;
c) Experience in pastoral ministry;
d) Spiritual life and personal testimony;
e) Family life;
f) Social standing;
g) Integrity; and
h) Experience in administration.

It can be deduced from the above that the issue of age is so paramount and is the first major consideration for one to become a Bishop.

The plaintiff's life within the Church of Uganda as a clergy was premised on information he availed at the time joining and this was categorically reflected as 23rd November 1975. This fact is not in dispute but the plaintiff now wishes to alter his date of birth by claiming that the actual date of birth earlier indicated on all his personal documents was a mistake or an error.

The act of altering the date of birth three days to being nominated as a Bishop becomes very suspicious and it is not an innocent act by the plaintiff and I would agree with the defendant's counsel that it was indeed fraudulent. The plaintiff during cross examination confirmed that a Bishop should be a person of Integrity.

The Church was forced to carry out an investigation into the plaintiff's school background and it was established that he was consistently indicating the date of birth as 23rd November, 1975. It was also established that the plaintiff is some of the application forms to Uganda Christian University made some lies like denying having children and yet he had.

The official documents issued by the Government of Uganda like the Passport, National Identity Card, Voter's Card, Driving Permit and all academic testimonials clearly show that the plaintiff was born on 23rd November-1975. A statutory declaration could not suffice to make such a correction without changing the particulars in the National Data Base (National Register).

The plaintiff during cross examination stated that he wanted to maintain consistency in the date of birth well aware it was wrong. In the current legal regime under the Registration of Persons Act any person who wishes to change information must make an application to National Information Registration Authority. The information given in the National Register cannot be changed by statutory declaration but rather through a process set out under section 4 and such notification is in a particular form in Schedule 2.

Section 4 provides;

(1) The notification of the Authority of a change in the information contained in the Register shall be made by the person to whom the information relates within ninety days from the time the change in the information occurs.

(8) Where a change of particulars includes a change in the name, date of birth, place of birth, sex, the notification shall include a request for a new national identification card or alien's identification card, and in such a case the person shall surrender the old card to the Authority.

The plaintiff's date of birth could not change through statutory declaration as he claims to have done but rather through a process by process as set out in Section 4 and in particular on a form provided for under the Schedule. Otherwise, the National Register should not be changed at will without following the due process.

A party who has changed his particulars has a duty to notify the different institutions like former schools or Institutions of learning about the changes made to the particulars in order to avoid future issues about identity. Otherwise, any person who wishes to know about the plaintiff from his former schools or higher institutions may become confused with the change of the date of birth if such institution is not notified about such major changes to his identity. See Achola Catherine Osupelem v Electoral Commission Election Petition No. 02 of 2018

The plaintiff according to the official documents issued from different government institutions like NIRA & EC his date of birth is still 23rd November 1975 and this date still binds him until it changed in accordance with the law. The plaintiff at the time of his nomination was not qualified to be elected a Bishop of Kumi since he had not yet made the mandatory age requirement of 45 years.

The House of Bishops was right and justified to revoke the election of Plaintiff as the second Bishop of Kumi Diocese.

For reasons stated herein this suit is dismissed with costs to the defendant.
I so order.

SSEKAANA MUSA
JUDGE
30th June 2021

EXEGESIS OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JUSTICE SEKANA MUSA

Briefly the Judge Discussed and Ruled On THREE Issues:

1) The "Jurisdiction" & Competence of Civil Courts in Adjudicating Ecclesiastical Disputes....And He Says: ```

"The rights that the plaintiff enjoys are derived from the Provincial Constitution of the Church and the Provincial canons and the same must be ably enforced through the existing adjudication mechanisms instead of running to the civil court which is not very competent to resolve the same in ignorance of applicable regulations and guidelines as derived from the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament as being the ultimate standard of faith, given by inspiration of God."

2) The Registered Trustees of the Church of Uganda as Defendant Party in The Case....And He Says the Plaintiff Sued a Wrong Party....And That``` *_"A court cannot give any orders affecting a person who was not a party to the suit or who was not heard by court."

3) The Age Issue....Whether The Plaintiff Had Attained the Age of 45 As Required by The Provincial Constitution and Canons by The Time of His Purported Election by The House of Bishops....And He Ruled That: ``` _*The plaintiff according to the official documents issued from different government institutions like NIRA & EC his date of birth is still 23rd November 1975 and this date still binds him until it changed in accordance with the law. The plaintiff at the time of his nomination was not qualified to be elected a Bishop of Kumi since he had not yet made the mandatory age requirement of 45 years.

KAKAIRE SADIKI AND SULEIMAN ISOTAH MAGUMBA VS UGANDA NATIONAL EXAMINATION BOARD UNEB AND FAGIL MANDY.

The background of the petition

The petitioner’s general allegation against the respondents was that their acts, in organising national examinations to be written on days coinciding with Idd Adhua, and idd el fitr Muslim religious holidays were inconsistent with and in contravention with the constitution.

While agreeing with the petitioners Justice Musoke observes the significance of this Islamic holiday to all that profess the Muslim faith and is celebrated in honour of prophet Ibrahim for his willingness to sacrifice his son Ismail and the son's acceptance to be sacrificed as an act of submission to Allah's command to do so. The holiday also marks an end to the Muslim fasting period.

The court therefore observed that the organisation of examinations to be conducted on the relevant Muslim holiday of Idd el Fitr by the respondent infringed upon the religious freedom rights of Muslims to manifest their religion through observance of those religious holidays and this is because the Muslims consider their religious holiday to be sacred days on which they are supposed to partake only in faith related activities.

THE IMPACT OF ROE V. WADE

The Texas statute was struck down as a whole, and further, Roe v. Wade legalized abortion in the United States, which was not legal at all in many states and was limited by law in others.

All state laws limiting women's access to abortions during the first trimester of pregnancy were invalidated by Roe v. Wade. State laws limiting such access during the second trimester were upheld only when the restrictions were for the purpose of protecting the health of the pregnant woman.

In this land mark decision, we see the court taking on a more "Godly" role by legalizing abortion which is a matter of moral complexity.

Just of recent on 24th June, 2021. The European parliament adopted a report describing abortion as "essential health care" and a "human right" this is despite of the fact that European bishops denounced the report while insisting that the "unborn child has a human right to life."

The bishops declared that it is "ethically untenable" to classify abortion as an essential health service, an attempt that degrades the unborn child. They also lamented that the resolution negates the fundamental right to conscientious obligation and the corresponding right not to participate in a morally evil action such as abortion.

In Uganda's context, this conclusion is evident from the court's decision in the case of Dimanche Sharon and others v. Makerere University

DIMANCHE SHARON AND OTHERS V. MAKERERE UNIVERSITY

This case involved three appellants — Seventh Day Adventists — who were undergraduate law students at Makerere University (the respondent). They challenged the constitutionality of a policy and certain regulations of respondent university. The university required them to attend scheduled lectures and sit examinations on Saturday, their Sabbath, contravening their belief that God's commandments require complete rest on that day. 38 The appellants asserted that to do any work on the Sabbath amounts to sin, for which they would be condemned to hell. For Seventh Day Adventists, the Sabbath begins at sunset on Friday evening and ends at sunset on Saturday. The university policy and regulations, distributed in advance to students, stated: Students are informed that University Programs may run seven days a week. Since the University has students and members from various religious backgrounds, the University may not heed the interests of a particular group, particularly in the crucial areas of attendance of lectures and do all your work, but the seventh Day is a Sabbath to the Lord your God. On it, you shall not do any work, neither you, nor your son or daughter, nor your man servant, nor your maid-servant, nor your animals nor the alien within your gates. For six days the Lord make the heaven and the earth, the sea and all that is in them, but he rested on the seventh day. Therefore, the Lord blessed the Sabbath Day and it is holy."

The appellants contended that they could not attend lectures or sit examinations on Saturdays as this amounted to performing work on the Sabbath. Accordingly, they claimed, the respondent's policy and regulations violated their constitutional right to freedom of religion.

The respondent contended that Makerere University, as a secular public University did not favour any particular religion. To carry out its legal mandate of expanding university education and making it available to as many students as possible at the lowest cost possible, the university had formulated a policy of conducting its core activities, such as teaching and examinations, on any day of the week, including Saturdays and Sundays.

The Constitutional Court, after considering the affidavits and evidence filed by both parties, dismissed the petition by unanimous decision of the five Justices of Appeal. The decision of the Constitutional Court was upheld by the Supreme Court. Although each justice of the Constitutional Court issued a separate judgment, all five unanimously found that the respondent's policies and regulations were not inconsistent with, and did not violate, the appellants' freedom of religion and the right to education under Uganda's 1995 Constitution.

Deputy Chief Justice Mukasa Kikonyogo, in the lead judgment, held that, as a public and secular institution, the respondent had "no duty to accommodate some beliefs based on religious tenets."

Second, the Constitutional Court accepted that the policy of the respondent pursued legitimate aims, that it was non-discriminatory, and did not require the appellants to forego a chief tenet of their religious belief, namely, that they must not work on the Sabbath. Third, the Court noted, without giving specific content to the general right to education as articulated in the Constitution, that the right to education protected by Article 30 "does not

In any way mean the right to attend the respondent University at the students' own terms." The applicants had the option of taking courses scheduled on days other than the Sabbath. They had many choices, including transferring to other universities or institutions.

Finally, one of the five justices, J. A. Twinomujuni, went so far as to challenge the appellants' beliefs, opining that "there are exceptions to God's commandment on Sabbath" that may permit attending lectures or examinations on the Sabbath.

The appellants appealed to the Supreme Court, which dismissed their claim. As found in the Constitutional Court, the central issue in the Supreme Court was whether the respondent's policy and regulations contravened the appellants' freedom of religion and the right to education as guaranteed by the Constitution. While the Supreme Court did not question the sincerity of the appellants' beliefs, it held that the respondent's policies and regulations were not inconsistent with and not in contravention of Articles 20, 29(1) (c), 30, and 37 of Uganda's Constitution as they pertained to the appellants.

LET CHURCH AND STATE HELP ONE ANOTHER IN HARMONY

God himself made and established these two authorities and commands all people to obey both powers. Doing this God did not intend to embarrass His creatures by commanding obedience to two rulers. It is true that both authorities, church (religion) and state, govern the same people, but they can do this in harmony: indeed, it is their duty to do so. On this point, Pope Leo XIII writes: "Each of these two powers has authority over the same subjects, and as it might come to pass that one and the same thing might belong to the jurisdiction of both, therefore God, who foresees all things, and is the Author of these two powers, has marked out the course of each in right connection with the others." If each authority follows the order set up by God, there is no trouble whatsoever.

HARMONIZATION OF THE CHURCH AND STATE

God himself made and established these two authorities and commands all people to obey both powers. Doing this God did not intend to embarrass His creatures by commanding obedience to two rulers. It is true that both authorities, church (religion) and state, govern the same people, but they can do this in harmony: indeed, it is their duty to do so. On this point, Pope Leo XIII writes: "Each of these two powers has authority over the same subjects, and as it might come to pass that one and the same thing might belong to the jurisdiction of both, therefore God, who foresees all things, and is the Author of these two powers, has marked out the course of each in right connection with the others." If each authority follows the order set up by God, there is no trouble whatsoever.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

NOT A MERE CHANGE OF ARMS BUT A FUNDUMENTAL CHANGE A REALITY OR MYTH

THE EXECUTIVE BEFORE 1986:

Under the 1962 Constitution, Executive authority was split between the Prime Minister and the President. The latter was also the head of state and Commander in-Chief of the Armed Forces. The Constitution provided for the establishment of the offices of the President and Vice President as well as the procedure for electing persons to these offices.[1380] Article 61 further provided, among others, that "the Executive authority of Uganda shall vest in the President and shall be exercised in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution."[1381]

Article 77 provided thus: "The Executive authority of Uganda shall extend to the maintenance and execution of this Constitution (other than Schedules 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 of the Constitution) and to all matters with respect to which Parliament has for the time being power to make laws." On the other hand, Article 62 established the Office of Prime Minister to be appointed by the President[1382] and "other offices of Minister of the Government of Uganda as may be established by the President, acting in accordance with the advice of the Prime Minister."[1383]

The 1967 Constitution resulted into the final dissolution of the 1962 constitutional dispensation by creating a central authority of government founded on an Executive President. The Office of Prime Minister was abolished and the President became the head of state, head of government and Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces.[1384]Under the constitution, the President had unlimited powers to appoint and dismiss constitutional and many other government officers.[1385] He therefore had limitless powers to create and appoint new Cabinet Ministers as well as other positions.

[1380]Constitution of Uganda, 1962; Articles 34, 35 and 36
[1381]The Constitution of Uganda, 1962, Article 61 (1). The 1962 Constitution also made specific provisions regarding the exercise of Executive authority in Buganda and other federal states. See Article 71 (2), (3) & (4).
[1382]Although the Prime Minister was to be appointed by the President, Article 36(2) provided, inter alia, that the Prime Minister could move a resolution for the removal of the President by the National Assembly.
[1383]Article 62(2);this is one of the longest Articles of the 1962 Constitution and in fact represented the basis of the 1966 constitutional crisis.
[1384]Republic of Uganda (1967);the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1967, Revised Edition 1990. Article 24
[1385]Republic of Uganda (1967);the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1967, Revised Edition 1990. Article 66

However, as discussed later in this paper, it is important to note that Milton Obote did not use those powers to create a bloated Cabinet. The 1971 military coup by Idi Amin against President Obote changed the 1967 Constitutional dispensation in dramatic ways. By Legal Notice No. 1 of 1971, Idi Amin suspended chapters IV and V of the 1967 Constitution regarding Executive and legislative powers. All powers, privileges, functions and prerogatives enjoyed by the President under the 1967 Constitution were concentrated in the President as Idi Amin became Commander-in-Chief and assumed all Executive and legislative authority in the country.

As such, Amin had powers to appoint any number of cabinet ministers as he wished. Amin's first cabinet was made up of 18 Ministers.[1386] The idea of a Defense Council which could have increased the size of the Executive was never implemented. From the time Amin was overthrown in April 1979 to the general elections in December 1980, Uganda had a succession of short-lived governments. Yusuf Kironde Lule, who was the Chairman of the Uganda National Liberation Front, assumed the presidency on April 12, 1979. Under the Uganda National Liberation Front government, Executive Authority was established under Legal Notice No. 1 of 1979 which nullified Legal Notice No.1 of 1971, suspended parts IV and V of the 1967 Constitution and vested executive powers in the President.

The Instrument also empowered the President to appoint Cabinet Ministers in consultation with the National Consultative Council which was the legislative organ of the Uganda National Liberation Front government.[1387] In a space of two months after his swearing in, the National Consultative Council removed Lule and replaced him with Godfrey Lukongwa Binaisa. However, the Constitutional Instruments constituting the Executive Arm of the government did not change. In May 1980, Binaisa's government was overthrown by the Military Commission of the Uganda National Liberation Front government led by Paulo Muwanga.

The Military Commission collectively exercised the powers of head of government under Muwanga's Chairmanship. A Presidential Commission composed of two high-ranking Judges, one from the High Court and the other from the Court of Appeal, and a senior civil servant was appointed to act as the head of state with full powers and privileges of the President as provided for under the 1967 Constitution.[1388] In reality, Executive powers rested with the Military Commission and its Chairman. The Commission had powers to appoint Ministers and Deputy Ministers who [1386]Data as at September 1971.

[1387]Yusuf Lule was removed from power by the NCC after a conflict over the powers regarding the appointment of ministers. See Museveni, Y.K (1997). Sowing the Mustard Seed: The Struggle for Freedom and Democracy in Uganda; Macmillan Publishers Ltd, London and Basingstoke;Pg. 110.

[1388]The three Commissioners were: Saulo Musoke, Polycarp Nyamuchoncho and Yoweri Hunter Wacha-Olwol.

functioned under its direction.[1389] In December 1980, Uganda had its first Presidential and Parliamentary Elections since Independence. The Elections, whose legitimacy was contested by the Uganda Patriotic Movement, were won by the Uganda People's Congress and resulted into what is now commonly referred to as the Obote II Government.[1390] With the exception of the appointment of a non-Executive Prime Minister, the Executive arm of the government functioned under the 1967 Constitution.

As such, the President had powers to appoint all Cabinet Ministers, Deputy Ministers as well as other Public Officers. In the immediate period after the overthrow of the Obote II Government and before the taking over of power by the National Resistance Army/Movement of Yoweri Museveni, the composition of the Executive was based on the 1967 Constitution and the Nairobi Peace Accord.[1391] For its part, the Nairobi Peace Accord provided for the establishment of The Military Council made up of the different fighting factions.[1392]

Article 4 of the Agreement vested Supreme Executive and Legislative Authority in the Military Council. The Nairobi Peace Accord also provided for the Head of State to exercise the Legislative and Executive Powers of the Council "in exceptional circumstances" where such circumstances were determined by a two thirds majority vote of the Council.[1393]The Accord did not contain any specific provisions limiting specific appointments to key positions within the Executive. In any case, the Military Council never became functional as the National Resistance Army never took up its positions and, pushed its fight towards Kampala finally overthrowing Tito Okello's military junta on January 26, 1986.

Under the National Resistance Movement Government as regards the "Ethnicity and the Size of the Executive" It is important to recognize from the outset that a discussion on the role of ethnicity in constituting government under the National Resistance Movement administration, especially at the Executive level, can be a highly contested and even controversial matter. From its founding documents, President Museveni as the head and chief ideologue of the National Resistance Movement declared the organization's mission to work towards national unity and chastised previous leaders for using tribalism as a way of governing the country. However, over the last

[1389]See Ofcansky, T. (1996). Uganda: Tarnished Pearl of Africa. Westview Press. Boulder, Colorado. Pg.39-58

[1390]For the full results of the December 1980 elections, see Commonwealth Secretariat (1980). Report of the Commonwealth Observer Group; Commonwealth Secretariat; London;

[1391]See Republic of Kenya (1985). The Uganda Peace Talks Agreement for the Restoration of Peace to the Sovereign State of the Republic of Uganda; Nairobi, 1985

[1392]The Council was to be made up of a Head of State/Chairman, UNLA (7 members), NRA (7 members), UFM (1 member), FEDEMU (2 members), FUNA (1 member) and UNRF (1 member). Ibid, Article 2.

[1393]Supra, note 32. Article 3(3) & (5) of the Agreement made provision for General Tito Okello Lutwa to become the Head of State and the Chairman of the Military Commission and Yoweri Museveni the Vice Chairman of the Military Commission by virtue of their positions as head of the junta and head of the rebel NRM/A respectively at the time.

decade, ethnic considerations have emerged to play a dominant role in the way the Executive under the National Resistance Movement is constituted. Ethnic consideration, which requires that key tribal constituencies be given Ministerial positions, is perhaps the single most important reason that accounts for the increasing size of the cabinet. As a result, the role played by tribalism in constituting the Executive, the associated costs and the governance implications become important matters of public policy and debate.

From the outset, it is important to credit the National Resistance Movement government in general, and President Museveni in particular, for articulating very clear positions and taking specific actions to mitigate the scourge of tribalism in Ugandan politics during the first 10 years of coming to power. Indeed, at a theoretical level, the National Resistance Movement declared early enough its offensive against sectarianism. In its Ten Point Programme, it stated thus: "Politics in Uganda has been manipulated by past politicians along sectarian, religious and tribal cleavages.

The National Resistance Movement asks: What enmity can there be between a Muganda peasant and a Lango peasant? Or between a Christian peasant and Muslim peasant;[1394]On his part, while declaring a "fundamental change" in his inaugural swearing-in address on January 29, 1986, President Museveni stated: "Past regimes have used sectarianism to divide people along religious and tribal lines. But why should religion become a political matter? Religious matters are between you and your God: politics is about the provision of roads, water, drugs in hospitals, and schools for children.

Don't you see that people who divide you are only using you for their own selfish interest? Our Movement is strong because it has solved the problem of tribal and religious divisions."[1395]In his speech at the first anniversary of the National Resistance Movement administration in 1987, Museveni declared that "The National Resistance Movement is totally opposed to tribalism …"[1396]

While castigating the use of tribalism to achieve political objectives by the past leaders, Museveni thus said: "Take the road from here, Parliament Building, to Republic House.

This road is so bad that if a pregnant woman travels on it, I am sure she will have a miscarriage! Now, does that road harm only Catholics and spare Protestants? Is it a bad road only for Muslims and not Christians, or for Acholis and not for Baganda? That road is bad and it's bad for everyone. All the users of that road should have one common aspiration: to have it repaired. Don't you see that people who divide you are only using you for their own selfish interest – interests not connected with that road? They are simply opportunists who have no Programme and all they do is work on cheap platforms of division because they have nothing constructive to offer."The striking thing about this political narrative on tribalism is that similar declaratory statements were made by Milton Obote and Idi Amin.[1397] Indeed, the key question is whether the practice of the National Resistance Movement government under President Museveni has been different from that of the previous regimes and Presidents on the issues of tribalism and religion and their influence on the composition of the Executive.

[1394]NRM Ten Point Programme – reproduced in Kabwegyere, T. B. (2000). People's Choice, People's Power. Fountain Publishers; Kampala; Appendix 1 at pp. 157-164.

[1395]Museveni, Y. (1992). What is Africa's Problem? Speeches and Writings on Africa by Yoweri Kaguta Museveni; NRM Publications; Kampala; pg. 21-25

[1396]Ibid, pg. 41; January 26, 1986.

Clearly, like the failed attempts by the Uganda People's Congress Government in the late 1960s, the National Resistance Movement made positive steps to tone down on the ethnic polarization that had been creeping into Uganda's politics for decades. Two major efforts may be cited as part of the evidence. First, during its first five years in power, the National Resistance Movement sought to reinforce national unity by bringing the various contending political forces into the government. By 1989, major political forces such as the Uganda People's Congress and the Democratic Party had been brought into cabinet hence accounting for the first major increase in the size of the Executive.

The number of full Ministers increased from 25 in February 1988 to 34 in 1989, State Ministers from 13 to 16 while Deputy Ministers increased from 25 to 27. To the credit of the National Resistance Movement Government, the expansion of the Cabinet at the time was undertaken more as a means of accommodating major political and fighting groups in the political process rather than the direct appeasement of tribal and religious constituencies. As early as 1990, the National Resistance Movement reported progress on the issue of national unity citing, among others, the creation of a broad-based government integrating all the political parties and military factions, establishing regional political schools for the army and civilians, enacting the anti-sectarianism legislation and the process of formulating a new constitution.[1398]

However, as the contestation for political power increased around 1990, the narratives of political accommodation began to expand to include tribal accommodation. In 1993, the Traditional Rulers (Restitution of Assets and Properties) Act was enacted guaranteeing the return of properties of the former Buganda Kingdom.[1399] This is in spite of the fact that there are some accounts suggesting that Buganda Kingdom was fully paid compensation when its properties were expropriated in 1966.[1400]Indeed, it is tenable to argue that the enactment of this legislation was a turning point in

[1397]See supra, note 39 and 42

[1398]NRM Achievements 1986-1990. NRM Secretariat; Kampala;seealso, NRM Secretariat (Undated); Political Programme of NRM: Two Years of Action. NRM Secretariat; Kampala; pg. 25;

[1399]Republic of Uganda (2000); Traditional Rulers (Restitution of Assets and Properties) Act, Cap 247, Laws of the Republic of Uganda, Revised Edition, 2000. Also see Traditional Rulers (Restitution of Assets and Properties) Act 1993.

[1400]In his account of the compensation payments, Ken Davey notes as follows: "… the various assets taken over by the

the political narrative of the National Resistance Movement and President Museveni regarding tribal politics in the composition of the Executive and other areas of political appointment. By circumventing the constitution-making process, Buganda emerged as the center of ethnic construction in the post-1986 Ugandan politics. Like Idi Amin who attempted to exploit the Baganda discontent with Obote, President Museveni sought to build an alliance with the Buganda monarchy and made appeasement of the Baganda a central element in subsequent political strategy and calculation.

During the Constituent Assembly debate, the discussions on the composition of the Executive and in particular the cabinet focused more on creating an efficient and cost-effective government. The Constituent Assembly sought to create constitutional restraint to ensure that subsequent Presidents did not abuse their authority to appoint a huge cabinet that could compromise efficiency while placing an undue burden on the taxpayer. By the time of the first Elections under the 1995 Constitution, the political landscape had already shifted.

After the elections, President Museveni was looking to building his own tribal and religious alliances and saw Executive appointments as one of the key platforms for executing this political strategy. Like Obote and Amin before him, tribal alliances were seen as an important vehicle for mobilizing political loyalty. Unlike the first 10 years of his Presidency where he sought to create national unity by bringing the political opposition into the political process, in the post-1996 dispensation, President Museveni sought to mobilize tribal and religious interests as a bulwark for political consolidation.

In effect, securing the alliances of various tribal and religious groups rather than the political opposition has become the cornerstone for a new political broad-baseness and hence made an oversize Executive inevitable.

THE FUNDAMENTAL CHANGE SPEECH (a mere change of guards)

On the 29th of January 1986, Mr. Museveni arrived in a gleaming black Mercedez Benz dressed in jangle military fatigues and polished combat boots for his swearing in after a success in a five-year guerilla war against the government of Tito Okello. He had seized power after commanding the National Resistance Army (NRA) in a rebellion against the military regime that succeeded Obote.

Uganda Government, including the Bulange and the Lubiri, were valued at market worth, and payment made to a trust account from which liabilities were met, including Buganda Government debts and retirement benefits for redundant staff. The balance was distributed to the four successor district administrations in ratio to population, the cheques being handed over personally by the Minister of Regional Administration in front of TV cameras and large, ebullient crowds. The sums were substantial enough to fund the construction of new headquarters buildings and staff housing in each district." In Brown, Douglas and Brown, Marcelle (Eds.), 1996; Looking Back at the Uganda Protectorate: Recollections of District Officers; Douglas Brown; Dalkeith, Western Australia;Pg. 332

He finally captured the capital city Kampala in January 1986. The ceremony witnessed by thousands of jubilant Ugandans was held on the steps of the Parliament building where some of the fiercest fighting erupted in the battle for Kampala.[1401]

The world went silent to hear the words of the country's war lord. Indeed, most of the Ugandans were jubilant. Museveni had saved them from the hands of the power hungry and blood stained men of Obote and Tito Okello and perhaps his existence was hope for many. In his speech, Museveni delivered a fundamental change message "No one should think that what is happening today is a mere change of guards. It is a fundamental change in the politics of our country. In Africa, we have seen so many changes that change, as such, is nothing short of mere turmoil"[1402]

He continued and remarked that while they could have wrong elements in the National Resistance Movement; their objective was primarily to improve the country's politics. He majorly focused on building a disciplined security force, unity and regional co-operation that would boost market for home made products. He also hinged his reign on restoring democratic practices and ensuring security. [1403]These were the hidden objectives in the fundamental speech.

This speech raised hope for many Ugandans who had experienced nasty events in the post-independence regimes and perhaps were tired of such crisis. It was because Uganda's post-independence period just like other African states was afflicted by authoritarian rule which had led to continuous crisises.[1404] In their desperate search for remedies, many of the natives found his speech a source of light for the future. Many praised God for blessing them with such a leader. Indeed, it created a lot of expectations from the war lord which he was to achieve through his movement system known as NRM.

William Muhumuza remarks that Museveni's promise of fundamental change took cognizance of the fact that Ugandans had lost trust in the state and subsequently denied it legitimacy.[1405]His major option was first to restore hope among the many reason being at the time of the war, his young government lacked support especially among the regions where it didn't fight from. The fundamental change he remarked was to be achieved through the "Ten Points Programme of NRA." These were to be used to achieve the populist reforms as shall be discussed later.

THE NRM TEN POINTS PROGRAM

The ten points programme was written during the guerilla campaign to assist them once in power.

[1401] Micheal Ntezza. "Musevenis speech on Fundamental change" 1986 . Chimprepoints. Jan 26th 2015.
[1402] Mr. Museveni in 1986 at the steps of Parliament during his swearing in ceremony.
[1403] Daily Monitor. Key Issues in Musevenis past five years inaugural speech by Patience Ahimbisibwe. Retrieved Jun 14th 2021.
[1404] Karugire (1980). Also see Karugire (1988).
[1405] William Muhumuza. "From Fundamental Change to No Change." NRM and Democratization in Uganda 2009.

These reflected the principles with which the NRA was to create a disciplined army, organize popular support through RCs and in particular to develop a coherent political and economic explanation of why the NRA was fighting against the Ugandan government. According to the guerilla fighters, Uganda's post-independence leaders greatly exacerbated the problems of economic distortion introduced by British colonial rule and the only solution to thus was through the ten points programme where they agreed that Uganda required a new political and economic strategy.

In other words, these were proposals for political programs that could form the basis for a national wide coalition of political and social forces that could usher a new and better future for the natives of Uganda drafted and formed by the National Resistance Council under of the National Resistance Movement together with the members of the High Command and other senior officers of NRA under the chairmanship of President Yoweri Kaguta Museveni.

The first was democracy. According to the fighters, this had to be organized at all levels from the villages created by the RCs up by elections to "people's committees" by elections to parliament and on the basis a decent standard of living in that the natives could resist the blandishment of unprincipled politicians. Democracy had been kept in darkness for a long period and perhaps it was as a result of the unconstitutional mans of accessing power that saw the country being in the hands of power thirst men that never wished to have political competition.

The second was security. Ugandans had undergone and lived under insecurity therefore there was need to improve security. The government of Obote and Amin had killed over 800000 people in the period after independence. The natives were apprehensive about security remembering the tyrannical rule of the pre-colonial days. This was to be achieved through building of a strong army and police to oversee security of Uganda.

Consolidation of national unity and elimination of all forms of sectarianism. Uganda had been dominated by sectarianism which was based on tribe and religion. This was witnessed by the various political parties formed like DP which was for the Catholics, UPC mainly for Protestants outside Buganda and KY for Protestants in Buganda. Besides, in the army, there were opportunistic factions merging according to opportunistic politics and manipulation of the day. Therefore, there was need to ensure national unity once in power by NRA.

Defending and consolidation of national independence. Uganda acquired its independence on 9th October 1962 from the British. It being independent, there was need to protect this independence. This independence must be viewed from the circumscribed boundaries. That is being free from any order or influence from other countries. But this seems to have failed after independence.

In 1971, Amin staged a coup against Obote and some leading circles in the west lauded him with eulogies about his move. It was because Obote had gone socialist. The socialist continued to influence Obote's decisions to give him a second chance. When Amin had a misunderstanding with the imperialists, he decided to turn to the Soviet-Libyan camp. This was not justifying about independence. There was need to protect it by the NRA.

Building an independent, integrated and self-sustaining national economy. This was probably the most important point of the whole program. Uganda was economically backward at the time of independence. A lot of resources were flowing from the country to the outside world in from of cheap raw agricultural materials in return for consumer products that were highly priced. The fundamental solution developed by NRA was to make efforts to build an independent integrated, self-sustaining economy.

This meant a shift from the pseudo modern export-import sector that exports cheap raw materials and imports mainly consumer goods at exorbitant prices. This was the target of the NRA fighters by diversifying agriculture, building industries and construction of basic infrastructures to aid industrialization.

Restoration and improvement of social services and the rehabilitation of the war ravaged areas. The UNLF that overthrew the government of Amin and many other civil wars had left many people without the health incentives. There was no clean water, hygienic housing, literary adequate levels of calories or protein intake and doctors to treat the natives. The NRA therefore aimed at sensitizing the masses about health and sanitization, providing essential social services to everybody. Elimination of diseases like malaria, syphilis, worms, gastro-enteritis and others. This was to be through the creation of the ministry of health, establishment of health centers, and construction of schools to reduce on the literacy skills once they acquired power.

Elimination of corruption and misuse of power. It was noted by NRA that perhaps one of the dilemmas in Africa is corruption and misuse of power to enrich personal interests. This had been the reason for the law development levels not only in Uganda but Africa. In the urge to make Uganda a unique one, they were to embark on creation of the Inspectorate of Government (IGG) to inspect the operation of different state agencies and check on corruption.

A lot of funds had been swindled by Obote and Amin. They had misused their power to enrich their selves. The best example can be traced from the gold scandal of Obote and Amin where they amassed a lot of wealth.

Redressing errors that have resulted into the dislocation of sections of the population and improvement of others. This was to be under the three points raised which included;

1) People that have been displaced from their lands by illegal land grabbers of erroneously conceived development projects.

2) The long suffering karamajong people.
3) The salaried people that had been impoverished by inflation of the 70s and 80s were to be dealt with once NRA came to power.

Co-operation with other African countries in defending human and democratic rights of our brothers in other parts of Africa. One of the weaknesses of Africa is its balkanization into small and sometimes uneconomic units in that you hardly find an individual African country with resources that would match those of USA, USSR, Canada or South Africa. There was need to join and make strong economic integrations for NRA saw them as a basis for many opportunities to Uganda such as employment opportunities, market and improved relationships to weaken white influence and dominance.

Following an economic strategy of mixed economy. In order to achieve the above mentioned ideas, NRA was to follow an economic strategy of mixed economy which means allowing majority of economic activities being carried out by private entrepreneurs, small medium and even big –with the state owning some projects. This could perhaps allow in private investors to increase investment as a way of aiding government to raise revenue, create employment and improve on social services. This was welcomed by majority of the fighters of NRA.

Therefore, the fundamental change was to be achieved through putting the above ideas into operative. Indeed, some have been achieved by the regime and others have failed. To make it worse even those that were achieved are being tarnished due to over stay in power by the incumbent and policies developed to favor personal interests.

Resistance Councils (later Local Councils)

After his swearing in, Museveni embarked on a number of populist reforms as enshrined in the NRM ten points programme. One can argue that one of the fundamental policies was the grassroots structure known as the participant structure (Resistance Councils) (RCs). This was intended to motivate and encourage participation of the people in administration.

These Resistance Councils were hierarchical in nature ranking from RC5, RC4, RC3, RC2 and RC1. These were later turned into local councils (LCs) in 1993. This saw RC1 forming the village Council, Parish Council (RC2), Sub County Council (RC3), County Council (RC4) and District Council (RC5). These were later to influence democratic ideas in Uganda as well as rebuilding trust in the young NRM government. They were ideally a gear towards the achievement of a fundamental change.

The critical point of observance is that members of the village councils were directly elected by citizens at the grassroots levels while those in other councils indirectly elected.[1406]

It reduced doubt and attracted applause from the international community that praised Museveni and his war comrades. He was at one time ranked among the new breed of African leaders by US Secretary of State Madeline Albright.[1407] The adoption of RCs increased a reflection of hope for the future. They were a mirror indeed and helped to rebuild the administrative structure of the collapsed state as they provided democratic climate for the citizens to actively participate in public decision making.[1408]

The other populist reform that followed this was the adoption of decentralization of power to local governments, election of people's representatives to the national legislature, affirmative action for women and the other categories of marginalized groups. These have indeed remained in existence being protected and availed to them by the Constitution.[1409]This was a good start for the government indeed the journey for the fundamental change had started to accelerate. No one expected or at one time dreamt of betrayal by the incumbent not until the 2000s when he changed the modus operendi.

THE BIRTH OF NATIONAL RESISTANCE MOVEMENT (NRM)

The center for the strongest party in Uganda is underpinned on the success of a five-year guerrilla war fair that was lodged in 1981. Indeed it was after Yoweri Museveni taking over power in 1986 when the National Resistance Army guerillas reached Uganda's capital Kampala after a five year civil war.[1410]The party started its officially in 1996 when its chairman Yoweri Museveni won the 1996 general elections. It has held itself in power since the up to date. During his swearing in ceremony at Parliament on 29th January 1986, Gen Yoweri Museveni promised Ugandans a fundamental change "No one should think that what is happening today is a mere change of guards; it is a fundamental change in the politics of our country."[1411] This raised hope for many Ugandans who had experienced the past nasty events and perhaps were tired of crisis's.

This was because Uganda's post-Independence period like in other African countries or states was afflicted by authoritarian rule which had led to continuous crisis's[1412]. In the desperate search for remedies, many of the natives had found Museveni ideologies as the best canopy against such [1406] Villadsen and Lubanga (1996).

[1407] William Muhumuza. From Fundamental Change to No Change. NRM and Democratization in Uganda 2009.
[1408] Ddungu (1989)
[1409] Article 32,33 and 34 of The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.
[1410]Giovanni.M.Carbone. Populism Visits Africa: The case of Yoweri and No party Democracy in Uganda. New Dheli, 13-17 December 2004.
[1411] Gen Yoweri Museveni Kaguta 1997.
[1412]Karugire, Samwiri. R (1980).A Political History of Uganda. London: Heinemann. Also see Karugire, Samwiri.(1988). Roots of Instability in Uganda.Kampala Fountain Publishers.

events in the success of the civil. Indeed, it created a lot of expectations from the war lord which he was to achieve through his movement party known as NRM/NRA. Because of the nasty history from the period of 1966-1986 where the country had experienced unprecedented authoritarian rule characterized by institutional decay and political insecurity.[1413] Museveni found it wise to give hope to the peace desiring populace. William Muhumuza remarks that Museveni's promise of fundamental change took cognizance of the fact that Ugandans had lost trust in the state and subsequently denied it legitimacy.[1414]

His major option was first to restore hope among the many reason being at the time of the war, his young government lacked support. Perhaps, this can be seen from the 1980 elections which he claimed had been rigged by Obote's Uganda People's Congress (UPC).

During the elections, his Uganda Patriotic Movement (UPM) had only acquired one seat in Parliament and Democratic Party (DP) that had won the elections was deprived of its success by Obote through duress posed on the electoral chairman. Truth be told, his political party was young when he lodged the 1981 guerilla war. Few people understood him from a political perspective. It's this reason why he promised a fundamental change from the onset in order to win the support for his young government through hope given to the natives.

THE FISRT TEN YEARS OF NRA/NRM "THE REFORM PERIOD"

Majority of the guerilla war lords had been witnesses of the post-independence administration of Uganda. They had been political exiles and others victims of the harsh regimes. To manifest their desire for a safe and peaceful Uganda as a way of fulfilling their fundamental change speech, Museveni through his NRA political wing NRM embarked on a number of populist reforms as outlined in the NRM Ten Points Programme. The ten points programme had been written by the guerilla war lords in 1981 to be guidance to them once in power.[1415]

One can argue that one of the fundamental policies was the grassroots structure known as the participant grassroots structure that was known as the Resistance Councils (RCs). This was intended to motivate and encourage participation of the people in administration. The Resistance Councils were hierarchical in nature ranking from RC5, RC4, RC3, RC2 and RC1. These resistance councils were later turned into Local Councils (LCs) in 1993.This saw RC1 becoming Village Council, Parish Council (RC2), Sub County Council (RC3), County Council (RC4) and District Council (RC5). These were later to influence democratic ideas in Uganda as well as rebuilding trust [1413]Wiebe, Paul D. & Dodge Cole P. eds. (1987), Beyond Crisis: Development issues in Uganda Kampala: Makerere Institute of Social Research.

[1414] William Muhumuza. From Fundamental Change to No Change: The NRM and Democratization in Uganda 2009
[1415] Watson (994)

in the young NRM government.

The critical point of observance is that members of the village councils were directly elected by citizens at the grassroots levels while those in other councils were indirectly elected.[1416]This was a successive move by the NRM government .It reduced doubt and attracted approuse from the international community that praised Museveni. He was at one time ranked among the "new breed" of African leaders and the country considered beacon of Hope in Africa by US Secretary of State, Medaline Albright.[1417]Ddungu remarks that the adoption of the RCs helped to rebuild the administrative structure of the collapsed state[1418] as they provided democratic climate for the citizens to effectively participate in public decision making a thing that they had not gotten used to.

Indeed it was a cheerful moment in the political scene of a young nation. Other populist reforms adopted included the decentralization of power to local governments, election of people's representatives to the national legislature, affirmative action for women and the other categories of marginalized groups. It was followed by allowing civil societies to organize freely and the most outstanding was the writing of a new Constitution following the creation of the Odoki Commission. The idea of drafting a constitution was made easier following the organization created at the grassroots.

The Constitution making process was commenced in 1989 at the time unsurpassed in Africa in terms of civic participation from citizens, institutions and local councils but as I shall later discuss, by the adoption of the constitution in 1995, the process had been manipulated by NRM to entrench its leaders to hold on power. This can be traced in the Fact that the president was invested with significant powers of appointment.[1419]On the side of local administration, the whole setup was shut or settled through the 1993 Local Government Statute which was arguably an outstanding promising reform.[1420]

The wide spread atrocities that were committed during Obote's regime and Idi Amin represented traumatic past which the leaders of NRM and Uganda at large wished to avoid repeating which influenced the government to adopt Institutional reforms that were majorly fostered towards the observance of human rights. In May 1986 after he had taken an oath of allegiance, the NRM government established a commission of inquiry into human rights violations that was charged with investigating the human rights record of all governments that it had replaced since independence

[1416]Villadsen.S &Lubanga Francis.eds (996). Democratic Decentralisation in Uganda: A New Approach to Local Governance Kampala Fountain Publishers.
[1417]From Fundamental change to No change: NRM and Democratisation in Uganda 2009.
[1418] See Ddungu, Expedit (1989). Popular Forms and the Question of Democracy: The case of Resistance Councils in Uganda. Working Paper 4 Kampala: Center for Basic Research.
[1419] ARI Interview with Nicholas Opiyo, 29th January 2016
[1420] African Research Institute. Steady Progress? 30 years of Museveni and NRM in Uganda 5th Feb 2016.

until the seizure of power by NRM government.

The commission was to make recommendations on the clear observance of human rights. Although it lacked adequate funding, it was able to carry out extensive hearings throughout Uganda and increased on the rate of human right rights awareness in Uganda. Among its recommendations was the appropriate punishments for human rights violators, the inclusion of human rights culture and education in the general curriculum and the training of army and security forces as well as the establishment of permanent human rights commission.[1421]

Following it recommendations, the Uganda Human Rights Commission was to be established. Its establishment was amplified by Odoki Constitutional Commission that defined the proposed functions and powers in significant detail.[1422] Its recommendations were later adopted in the 1995 Constitution of Uganda and implemented through the Uganda Human Rights Act of 1997.[1423] The next question was on the appropriate administration the Commission. This question was answered by the NRM government through its chairman and president Yoweri Kaguta who appointed Margret Ssekagya and seven members to chair and head as well as overseeing the effective observance of Human rights in Uganda to break away from the previous government as a gear towards achieving the fundamental change a promise by the incumbent to the citizens.

Unknown to many. This was to be overturned by the regime it's self in trying to pursue its interests. Indeed, the Human rights were observed in the initial administration of NRM government. Justice Odoki once remarked that "there is a great improvement in the general human rights situation in Uganda. You no longer see restrictions on basic freedoms and a state of anarchy in this country. But we underplay political freedoms in light of these advances.[1424]

The semblance of legal democratic reforms created an impression that perhaps Uganda was taking a right path to democratic rule. Indeed during their first ten years, the NRM leadership or government appreciated and embraced participatory politics and divergent political views which are exemplified from Museveni's first cabinet which was all embracing and broad based. His government sorted out the issue of sectarianism and divisions that had been created in the initial stages of after independence. He drew members from NRM, traditional political parties and other shades of political life. It tried to accommodate Uganda's religious leaders, regional and ethnic social diversities.

His major ambition for these reforms was to unify and stabilize the country especially after many [1421]Commission of inquiry into violation of Human Rights Final Report.Entebbe UPPC. 1993.

[1422]Uganda Constitutional Commission. Report of the Uganda Constitutional Commission (Entebbe: UPPC, 1993. PP185-188)

[1423] The 1995 Constitution , Articles 51-88. See also Uganda Human Rights Commission Act 1997.

[1424] Human Rights Watch Interview with Justice Benjamin Odoki, chair Constitutional Commisssion, Kampala April 4th, 1998.

years of political dislocation. One can easily assert that the first ten years of NRM were its great achievements in Uganda. This is evidenced by the variety of reforms the government opted for in trying to set a platform for the long awaited ideology of democracy in Uganda. Many of the reforms adopted by the regime were later to be undermined and destroyed by its administration in a bid to hang on power for a long period viewing its self as the only capable political movement to administer Uganda. It is therefore worth noting that the grassroots participatory structure is the reason for the strength of NRM regime especially in the rural areas. Though this is slowly reducing on the ground that majority of the population in Uganda is a youth population that desires change.

REASONS FOR NRM REFORMS

Museveni's desire to pursue populist reforms from the aftermath of his swearing in can be attributed to a number of factors which ought to be short run and long run in nature.

First and foremost, his democratization reforms and efforts are embedded in his need for international recognition and support. He had a view that there was need to attract donor support in order to fish the economy from the long and deep economic and devastated status and condition.[1425] African countries had been filled with civil unrests, political crisis and heavy misunderstandings to the effect that even those that were stable had been painted with darkness implying no hope for Africa. Hence Museveni had to demonstrate to both the local people and international community that his regime had democratic credentials.

Although Museveni had pursued the Marxist ideas during his studies and had been entrenched much in Marxist ideas especially having bias toward the world Bank and IMF policies, he had to abandon his position by May 1987 and embraced western sponsored market and democratic reforms.[1426] Indeed it was necessary for him to take a move for he had inherited a failed state and shattered economy that needed successful reconstruction which required heavy donor support.

Perhaps, the other factor is rooted in his desire to weaken the traditional political parties in Uganda. Majority of Ugandans before and after independence had subscribed to two political parties that is UPC and DP. His new National Resistance Movement (NRM) was not recognized at all especially at the grassroots levels which proved a threat to the party's holding of power. In his wisdom, he found it wise that for NRM to penetrate the political scene and win mass support, he had to adopt the populist reforms that could attract grassroots support. Besides, two traditional parties had been formed on a tribal basis which made them sectarian. There was need to unite people at all levels and introduce them to new ideas like democratization, women emancipation and others as an engine to rise power support for NRM.

[1425]BayertJean-Francois (1993).The State in Africa: The Politics of Belly .London: Longman.
[1426]William Muhumuza. From Fundamental change to No Change.The NRM and Democratization in Uganda.

This was to be achieved through RCs which were popular participatory and non-sectarian. These RCs attracted tremendous popular support having been witnessed as a uniting forum for a nation torn by many ears of social divisions and strife.

Lastly is the fact that NRM had been able to capture power because of its popular appeal to the rural areas where the guerilla fighters stayed or habited. Indeed, the NRA had support among the masses in areas it had libereated from Obotes forces. His ideas or populist reforms had worked out well in such liberated centers. This acted as a millor for him to adopt such for the general Uganda. These people had been organized into RCs which gave material and political support to NRA. Others reforms such as affirmative action policy also won NRM support from the women, youth and the disabled. It's this that attracted him to adopt such policies throughout Uganda. His plan was indeed a success.

It improved his image as a liberator and the father of the new Uganda. Throughout the country, he was being praised as the true definition of a leader. It won international recognition and support.

That said, it is worth noting that Museveni did not implement such populist reforms because he subscribed to democratic ethos but because he desired to hang himself on power. Uganda did not undergo an election from 1986 not until 1996 when the general elections were organized. By this time, he had spread the NRM ideologies in all points of the economy. It was indeed hard for him to lose the election because of these reforms that had manifested a sign of success in him.

MULTI-PARTYISM (A QUEST FOR NEW POLITICAL LIFE)

Political parties play an essential role in the functioning of every modern democracy and consensus almost exists that the concept of democracy is indivisibly linked to the concept of multi partyism in which effective participation and competition should be guaranteed. [1427] According to Sartori, they perform several roles critical to the functioning of a democracy as they are the central means to aggregate interests and thereby translate "mass preferences into public policy"[1428] Therefore it is now settled that in democratically restored nations, its political parties that provide fertile ground upon which participation of individual citizens in the political arenas is assured.[1429]

Political parties in Uganda were adopted during the colonial era by the elite natives at the time though interesting to note is that they were natured on a religious and tribalistic basis which made [1427]Kuenzi, Lambright (2005). The State of Multi party democracy in Uganda Konrad Adenauer, ISBN.

[1428]. Sartori, Giovanni, Ne présidentialisme, ne palamentarismo, in Juan J. Linz and Arturo Valenzuela (eds) II fallimentodelpesidenzialism, Bologna : II Mulino,1995, pp81-200

[1429]See Perry .G,MoyorG 1994. "More Participation, More Democracy?" in Beetham, D (ed.) Defining and measuring Democracy, Sage Publication, London.

then sectarian in nature. But it must be credited that these earliest political parties had the spirit of championing people's interests. The earliest political organizations included the Uganda African Farmers Union whose primary concern among other things was to champion government policy particularly processing and marketing cash crops. Besides this there existed the Bataka Party which focused its interests on Buganda's land settlement. It had been formed by the Bataka to fight and protect their land interests.[1430]

In 1952, the Uganda National Congress was formed by Musaazi and became its first president. This party was mainly aimed at championing people's interests. However, interesting to note is that it was later to be a ground for the formation of Uganda People's Congress that later received the independence instruments in 1962. Indeed the misunderstandings between the UNC members caused a dislocation. This saw a section of the party merging with the Uganda Peoples Union a purportedly anti-Buganda political party whose main priority was to address the challenges of Buganda sub-nationalism and Buganda dominance in the independent Uganda.

The merging of the two parties led to the development and creation of Uganda People's Congress which was headed by the late Dr Apollo Milton Obote in 1960[1431]. The other political party to consider was the Democratic Party which was formed in 1954. This party was formed by the Catholic Baganda though it was mainly filled by students from Kings College Buddo. But because of its leader's neglect of some of the interests of Buganda, the Kabaka formed the Kabaka Yekka (KY) party to struggle for the interests of Buganda. Unknown to them, the alliance was soon to fail due to the tribalistic nature of two political parties and the region based formation of the parties.

These political parties remained in existence up to 1967 when they were finally banned by Dr Apollo Milton Obote. There is no doubt that the fact that these parties were Balkanized along regional, ethnic and religious lines was the rationale behind Obote halting their activities. The parties had made it difficult to achieve peace because of their anxiety to achieve the pursued interests.

When Idi Amin came to power in 197, he never had the urge to resurrect the spirits of the banned parties. Indeed he had been in Obote's government and had witnessed everything including the disastrous nature of the political parties. Besides, he was a militant who never wished to have competitive politics. His desire was to lead the country without opposition. This explains the reasoning behind the imprisonment of majority of the opposition leaders and those from the various areas that criticized his administration.

Even though in his initial stages released the political prisoners like Abu Mayanja, Grace Ibingira, [1430]Kasozi ABK (1994). Social Violance in Uganda, Fountain Publishers, Kampala Monitor newspaper, Friday, January 2nd 2009.

[1431] Ibid

Benedicto Kiwanuka which was a step towards the observance of human rights, Prof Kanyeihamba asserts that after two years, the same people had been arrested and political persecutions had become worse. He suspended the political party activities through the political party decree number 14 of 1971.[1432]Indeed, no one had hope of witnessing democratic governance motivated by the multiparty system of politics in Uganda not until 1980 when the provisional government of Paul Muwanga allowed the parties to resume activities and participate in the 1980 general elections.

As mentioned earlier, political parties provide a linkage between government and its citizens as they present candidates for competitive elections as a manifestation of reforms and need to divert from the past experience, the provisional government organized elections based on political parties. The strong parties of UPC and DP were to compete strongly at all levels. But because of what and how Obote had treated the Baganda and acted during his reign, he had lost support at grassroots levels.

Many expected DP to win the 1980 general elections. Interesting to note is that DP won the elections but because of Obote's strength, he managed to coerce the electoral chairperson and manipulated the results declaring Obote the president of Uganda. This left many aggrieved and among these was the presidential candidate for UPM Yoweri Museveni who decided to wage a war against the Obote government for election rigging.

Perhaps it explains why he obtained a lot of support from the Baganda who had developed hatred for Obote basing on his nasty relationship with the kingdom. During this period, it was hard for political party activities to continue due to the civil or guerilla war that was lodged by Museveni in1981. It was not until the NRA took over power that the restoration of political parties was addressed by Museveni under the NRM government. Though it was hard to have them revived, the idea was finally achieved which has seen may new political parties rising to fame in the political arena such as Forum For Democratic Change (FDC), Federal Alliance, National Unity Platform (NUP) and others as will be discussed in the next chapter.

MULTI PARTYISM UNDER NRM GOVERNMENT

Oloka Onyango asserts that after taking over power, the National Resistance Movement (NRM) proclaimed an era of fundamental change based on a ten point's programme whose principles had been elaborated during the bush war. [1433]The president promised an interim period of four years for restructuring the system and creating democratic institutions and was able to initially base his rule on broad popular support. On the installation of democratic governance in Uganda in 1996, a lot of [1432] Prof Kanyeihamba. G.W. Constitutional and Political History of Uganda.

[1433] Oloka Onyango

attention was placed on the nature and forms of political institutions that would construct a strong democratic government in the country.

Just like the previous years, on attaining political power in 1986, NRM placed a complete ban on the operation of political parties in Uganda and ended up adopting the no party political system of governance bringing about a coalition government comprising of officials from various political parties.[1434] Due to the fact that NRM government was in the restoration period of Uganda, reviving political parties would make it hard to rebuild the economy that had undergone a political dislocation, social and economic strife. The NRM government just embarked on resistance councils on the grassroots which were core in building up the NRM and core in winning it mass support.[1435]

Interesting to note is that these political parties were not completely banned but rather it was their political activities that were restrained or prohibited. The parties were allowed to stay in existence but worth to note is that they were not to hold meetings, carryout campaigns, rallies and were not to participate in elections. As already noted, this was justified by an interpretation of Uganda'spost-independence history as a spiral of violent conflicts prompted by ethnically based political parties.[1436]

This was to weaken the traditional political parties of UPC and DP which was to affect them upon revival of multipartyism. For one to contest for any office, it was through individual merit or running as an independent candidate and not rallying support basing on the political parties. Uganda ended up adopting the movement system as governing point for politics in Uganda. The question of adopting multipartyism still haunted the government and consideration was on how the state was to be after revival of the party system.

A movement Act was passed in 1997 that established country wide party like structures at different levels. But the no party thinking and the underlying notion of atomized or weekly organized politics affected the development of the new arrangement and the movement's political organization never functioned properly.

According to Muhamood Mamdan, while expanding its reach and inclusiveness, the movement evolved a very centralized and leadership oriented modus operendi that kept it heavily dependent upon its leader's personal charisma and patronage linkages. Museveni appeared to be scrupulously avoiding organization.[1437] With the process of elaboration of the new Constitution being delayed, [1434]African Journal of Political Science and International Relations Vol. 4(3). Pp109-114; March 2010. Multi party politics dynamics in Ugnada by Kakuba Sultan Juma.

[1435]Hartmann (1999) 234
[1436]Giovanni M. Carbone, Developing Multi party Politics: Stability and Change in Ghana and Mozambique((November) 2003.
[1437] Comment made by MahmoodMamdani in 2002, quoted in GunnhildEriksen "from Opposition movement to governing party. An organizational analysis of the National Resistance Movement in Ugnada. Degree Dissertation there was no option apart from extending the transitional period of the NRM regime and because of the uncertainties and constitutional Commission, the NRM decided to hold direct elections for a Constitutional Assembly which saw individuals run as independent candidates but not representing political parties.

Even after the adoption of the Constitution in1995, the question of the future political system was not explicitly answered in the Constitution. This meant that there was no majority in the Assembly and besides the fixation of the movement system would also not be agreed upon and because of this, it meant that there was ideally no consensus on the political system of no party government for another five years. It's after this that a referendum is organized to decide the political system in Uganda. This meant that the status quo remained making the movement system the official political system.

When the first direct elections were held in 1996, no political parties were allowed to be involved in the elections in any form. Museveni contested under the movement and the opposition consisted of DP, UPC and National Liberation Party (NLP). The opposition formed the inter-party committee and appointed Paul Ssemwogerere, chairman DP as their candidate. Museveni won the election with 74.2. This was contested by opposition and condemned Museveni for rigging elections but this was validated by the election observers.[1438]

After this success, pressure was mounted on Museveni to allow political party activities adopting the multi-party system. It's true that Museveni feared competitive politics though he stood the test of the wide support. Indeed, political parties being a veritable institution in many democracies kept being a serious subject of analysis by critical individuals and groups in the country compelling the NRM government to hold a referendum about the 2000. The 1995 Constitution had fixed a term limit of two terms which meant that Museveni would not contest for presidency in the 2006 general elections

But because he had the enthusiasm to lead the country, he prepared a referendum for the return of political parties or what is known as multiparty system as a measure for him to acquire much support from the natives. He went ahead and planned another referendum for the removal of term limits to enable him come back in 2005. In 2000, the first referendum about the future political system was upheld and over 90 percent of the poll or the majority voted for the movement system which the NRM and Museveni had massively promised.

After the general election of 2001 that saw Museveni come back to office, the situation started changing. An internal debate was started on whether to return the country to multipartyism. A decision was finally reached to by the NRM in 2003 to open up the political system and transform the movement into a political party. As Conrad Adenauer remarks, a second referendum was organized in 2005 spearheaded by Museveni himself in favor of multipartyism and again over 90 percent voted or opted for the introduction of a multiparty system.

.Department of Comparative Politics, University of Bergen, 2003 pp120.

[1438]Leefers 2004: 168)

For the first time after over 2 decades, political parties were allowed to resume activities in Uganda. This saw a number of political parties participate in 2006 general elections. These included the newly created Forum for Democratic Change (FDC), the traditional political parties of UPC, DP, Conservative Party (CP), Progressive Party (PP), and others. But because of the NRM grassroot structures, the traditional parties had lost grassroot support and declined in the 2006 elections that saw FDC forming the strongest opposition against NRM.

THE EXECUTIVE AFTER 1986

Besides the practice that has informed and guided the composition of the Executive under the National Resistance Movement government, there have been major constitutional developments on this issue. The constitutional legitimacy of the National Resistance Movement Government from January of 1986 was established by Legal Notice No. 1 of 1986.[1439]By this Legal Notice, the National Resistance Movement government accepted the authority of the 1967 Constitution but suspended portions that granted Executive and legislative powers to the president and parliament.[1440]With regard to Executive powers, Legal Notice No. 1 declared that the National Resistance Council "shall have the supreme authority of the Government," including the power to pass laws and to choose the National President.[1441] Consequently, the Executive and legislative powers were fused into the National Resistance Council which acted as the political organ of the National Resistance Movement.

In reality, Legal Notice No.1 created the Office of the President who exercised all Executive Authority. Under Section 2, the National Resistance Council consisted of the following members: Chairman of the National Resistance Movement; Vice Chairman of the National Resistance Movement; Representatives of the National Resistance Movement; Representatives of the National Resistance Army; the National Political Commissar; the Administrative Secretary of the National Resistance Movement, and the Director of Legal Affairs of the National Resistance Movement.[1442]

[1439]Legal Notice No.1 of 1986 as Amended by Legal Notice No.1 of 1986 (Amendment) Decree, 1987 and by Legal Notice No.1 of 1986 (Amendment) (No. 2) Statute, 1989 (Statute No.9 of 1989).
[1440]Ibid, Section 1
[1441]Ibid, sections 2, 6 and 7
[1442]Section 2 also provided for the ministers, deputy ministers and assistant ministers to be members of the NRC when the Council was sitting as the Legislature. Although the proclamation provided for the representation of various "political forces or groups" and districts, it never specifies whether these would sit in the meetings of the Council when constituted as the Executive.

Legal Notice No.1 also provided room for the further expansion of the Executive and the Legislature. The proclamation provided, among others, that the size of the National Resistance Council would be increased "from time to time" by adding members from other "political forces and districts." The proclamation also empowered the President to appoint a Prime Minister, Ministers, Deputy Ministers or Assistant Ministers "after they have been vetted by the National Resistance Council or its Committee." Consequently, in addition to the National Resistance Council, the proclamation provided for the constitution of a Cabinet of Ministers comprised of the President, the Prime Minister and Ministers appointed to the Cabinet.

Like all the previous instruments, no limits were put on the optimum size of the Executive or Cabinet appointments leaving the President with an open ended mandate in this regard. Given the fusion of Executive and Legislative Authority under the 1986-1995 National Resistance Movement government, it is difficult to estimate with certainty the cost of the Executive on the public purse during this period. However, what is clear is that in 1986, the National Resistance Council had a membership of 77 people.[1443] At the same time, there was a cabinet of 48 Ministers– 30 Ministers, 6 State Ministers, and 12 Deputy Ministers.[1444] In a space of three years, the NRC had expanded by 260% to reach 277 members. On the other hand, the cabinet had expanded to 77 members – 34 ministers, 16 ministers of state and 27 deputy ministers, representing an increase of 60 per cent. By 1989, there were already concerns about the size and efficiency of the entire public service. Consequently, under Legal Notice No. 2 of 1989,[1445] the Minister of Public Service and Cabinet Affairs appointed a commission to review and reorganize the public service.[1446]

The major motivation for the reorganization of the Public Service was the concern that the service "hard become inefficient, ineffective, irresponsible and demoralized."[1447] Although the Commission focused its review on the mainstream Public Service, it made a series of significant recommendations that are directly relevant to political administration and the size of the Executive arm of the government today. The commission, for instance, observed: "… In connection with government having grown over-sized, our view is that the present number of Ministries is too large; and we recommend that the whole ministerial line up should be streamlined and reorganized to bring down the total to 20 or 21 Ministries altogether.

[1443]For the full list of the members, see Kabwegyere, Tarsis (2000). People's Choice, People's Power: Challenges and Prospects of Democracy in Uganda. Fountain Publishers, Kampala; [1444]Ministers include the Prime Minister.
[1445]Published on 15th May 1989;
[1446]The 10 member Public Service Review and Reorganization Commission was comprised of the following persons: Nicholas T. Clerk (Chairman), Robert K. Kitariko (Vice Chairman), Sam Tulya-Muhika (Member), Joseph W. Okune (Member), Irvin D. Coker (Member), Chief Jerome Udoji (Member), James Katorobo (Member), H.K. Bigirwenkya (Member), Joseph S. Musisi (Member) and Colin Sentongo (Secretary).
[1447]Republic of Uganda (1990); Report of the Public Service Review and Reorganization Commission 1989-1990: Main Report, Vol. 1.

We also believe that the present array of Ministers (at different levels) is largely superfluous and inconsistent with efficiency. In our view, it should not be necessary to have more than one or two ministers in a ministry." The commission also noted the difficulties created by what it referred to as the "attempt at using a hybrid of a Presidential and Parliamentary System of Government." The commission was of the view that the weaknesses inherent in such hybridization can be avoided by adopting a straight presidential form of government, "with ministers picked by the president on merit and from outside parliament."

According to the Commission, "the intention is to professionalize government at that level of cabinet, undeterred by considerations of party and constituency loyalties." The reforms that followed the publication of the Commission's report not only led to some significant changes in the entire Public Service but also in the down-sizing of the Cabinet. The size of the Cabinet, then at 77 Ministers, was cut to 42.[1448]

THE NRA BUSH WAR: A TRAGEDY OR SALVATION?

From 1980 to 1986, the Ugandan Bush War, also known as the Luwero War, the Ugandan Civil War, or the Resistance War, was a civil war in Uganda fought by the Ugandan government and its armed wing, the Uganda National Liberation Army (UNLA), against a number of rebel groups, the most notable of which was the National Resistance Army (NRA).

General Idi Amin overthrew unpopular President Milton Obote in a coup d'état in 1971, establishing a military government. Amin was deposed in 1979 after the Uganda-Tanzania War, but his supporters began the Bush War in 1980 by establishing an insurrection in the West Nile region. Following subsequent elections, Obote was re-elected in a UNLA-led government. Several opposition parties alleged the elections were stolen, and on February 6, 1981, they formed the National Resistance Army (NRA) under the leadership of Yoweri Museveni to launch an armed revolt against Obote's administration. During the latter months of the war, Obote was deposed and replaced as President by his general Tito Okello. Okello formed a coalition government with his supporters and a number of armed opposition groups that agreed to a cease-fire. The NRA, on the other hand, refused to compromise with the government and, between August and December 1985, seized much of western and southern Uganda in a series of offensives.

In January 1986, the NRA took Kampala, Uganda's capital. It went on to form a new administration with Museveni as President, while the UNLA disbanded completely in March 1986. Okello and [1448]For a detailed discussion on the changes in the public service as a result of the public service reform process, see Mwenda, A. and Tangri, R., (2005). Patronage Politics, Donor Reforms, and Regime Consolidation in Uganda; African Affairs, 104/416, 449-467. Oxford University Press; London;

Obote were exiled. Despite the civil war's ostensible end, anti-NRA rebel organizations and militias remained active and would continue to battle Museveni's administration for decades.

General Idi Amin of the Uganda Army overthrew Ugandan President Milton Obote in a coup d'état in 1971. Obote had been President since Uganda gained independence from the United Kingdom in 1962, and throughout his tenure, the country's living conditions deteriorated significantly, with extensive corruption, terrorism, and ethnic persecution. Obote's growing unpopularity led him to fear that his opponents, particularly Amin, were plotting against him, and he planned a purge while he was out of the country. The planned purge was foreshadowed by Amin, who acted first, seizing the presidency and exiling Obote to Tanzania. Despite his initial popularity, Amin swiftly devolved into authoritarianism and formed a military dictatorship, hastening Obote's downfall and damaging the country's economy and political structure.

Amin launched the Uganda–Tanzania War, declaring war on Tanzania and annexing part of the Kagera Region, in response to growing resistance to his dictatorship, anxiety that Milton Obote would return to destroy him, and conflict with Tanzanian president Julius Nyerere. Tanzanian troops and the Uganda National Liberation Front (UNLF), a political coalition created by exiled anti-Amin Ugandans led by Obote, whose military branch was known as the Uganda National Liberation Army, destroyed Amin's men and their Libyan allies (UNLA). Amin was deposed and fled Uganda after the fall of Kampala, and Tanzania installed the UNLF to take his place. From April 1979 to December 1980, the country was ruled by the insecure UNLF government. Meanwhile, Amin loyalists who had fled to Zaire and Sudan reorganized and planned to fight again to reclaim control of Uganda.

Meanwhile, Uganda's northeast was destabilized by large-scale banditry and communal violence. Karamojong gangs, Uganda Army remnants, and foreign raiders leveraged the political instability to attack cattle and other food stock. Famine broke out in Karamojong Province as a result of these occurrences.

The Amin loyalists, who staged a rebellion against the UNLF administration in the autumn of 1980, were the first to start fighting. Their 7,100-strong group was never given an official name, but was commonly referred to as the "Uganda Army" because it was mostly made up of former Uganda Army men (it was also known as "West Front" or "Western Nile Front").

The rebels were not completely united, but were divided into many gangs loyal to officers such as Emilio Mondo, Isaac Lumago, Isaac Maliyamungu, Elly Hassan, Christopher Mawadri, and Moses Ali, who had previously served under Amin. Amin arranged for the group to get funds from Saudi Arabia in advance of a large-scale attack on the West Nile sub-region across the border.

About 500 rebels crossed the border and attacked the town of Koboko on the 6th of October, one week before the invasion was to begin. The UNLA garrison, which numbered 200 men and was unarmed at the time, was killed by the rebels while on parade. Other UNLA garrisons in West Nile learned of the invasion and fled to the Nile River, leaving the Uganda Army's advance unchallenged. The local people, which had strained relations with the UNLA, greeted them warmly. The rebels largely retreated back into Sudan with a considerable amount of loot after a few days since they recognized they couldn't hold the gained region against a complete UNLA counter-offensive.

On the 12th of October, the UNLA launched a counter-offensive, backed up by Tanzanian forces. Six Tanzanians were slain in Bondo, the only substantial resistance they met. Lieutenant Colonel Elly Aseni was one of the Uganda Army fighters killed in the operation. The UNLA forces, believing the local population to be hostile, went on a destruction and looting rampage across the West Nile, despite Tanzanian authorities' best efforts to control them. They destroyed Arua, killing over 1,000 civilians and forcing over 250,000 people to flee to Sudan and Zaire. The UNLA's brutality sparked more discontent, with peasants and ex-soldiers taking up guns to defend their farms against government forces.

In December 1980, just before Uganda's national elections, the Uganda Army started its next offensive. The rebels ambushed Obote as he was touring the West Nile region in one of their most daring actions. They were on the verge of assassinating him and Tito Okello, a high-ranking UNLA leader. After retaking Koboko, the Uganda Army controlled the regions it had taken in West Nile and established a rival administration. After a month of fighting, the insurgents had taken control of the majority of West Nile, leaving only a few towns under UNLA authority. Many rebels, on the other hand, were more concerned with looting the area and transporting the booty to Zaire and Sudan than with fighting the UNLA.

Internal splits in the Uganda Army hindered the West Nile insurrection, as some soldiers stayed loyal to Idi Amin while others sought to separate themselves from the unpopular old ruler. The remaining Amin loyalists were known as the "Ugandan Army" until becoming known as the "Former Uganda National Army" after the latter part of the insurgent army split off and formed the "Uganda National Rescue Front" (UNRF) under Moses Ali, whereas the remaining Amin loyalists were still known as the "Ugandan Army" until becoming known as the "Former Uganda National Army" (FUNA). The West Nile insurgents quickly began fighting one another.

In addition, the Rwenzururu movement, which sought self-determination for the Konjo and Amba peoples, resurfaced in southwestern Uganda. The movement had been largely dormant since the 1960s, but as Amin's administration fell apart in 1979, it managed to seize control of weapon stockpiles that had been left unprotected. As a result, they began their insurgency, and the security situation in the southwest's mountainous border territories rapidly deteriorated in 1980.

Meanwhile, the UNLF government was riven by internal strife. The various political factions worked to ensure that their own loyalists would be present and dominant in the new military as the UNLA was turned from a loose alliance of numerous anti-Amin rebel organizations into a formal army. Obote outmanoeuvred his competitors, including Yoweri Museveni, and established his 5,000-strong Kikosi Maalum group as the UNLA's nucleus. Only 4,000 of Museveni's 9,000 FRONASA warriors, on the other hand, were allowed to join the new army, and they were split among different battalions. FRONASA was also ordered to hand over its own weapons. Simultaneously, the UNLA grew dramatically, with the majority of new members coming from ethnic groupings who supported Obote. As a result, pro-Obote factions in the administration and army gained power.

Milton Obote's Uganda Peoples Congress won the December 1980 elections, effectively re-electing him as President of Uganda. Other candidates, however, vehemently disagreed with the results, escalating the conflict. Several political factions claimed electoral fraud, and when Obote initiated a campaign of political persecution, they believed they had been proven true. Because a coup was impossible because the UNLA was dominated by pro-Obote forces, the opposition turned to armed rebellions against Obote's government: Museveni's Uganda Patriotic Movement formed the Popular Resistance Army (PRA), Yusuf Lule formed the Uganda Freedom Fighters (UFF), and Andrew Kayira armed his Uganda Freedom Movement (UFM).

Hostilities in the south began on February 6, 1981, with a PRA attack on an army facility in the center Mubende District. Although the operation failed to capture the armoury, Museveni's force of 34 militants did manage to take a few firearms and six trucks before retiring. During a series of raids on police stations over the next few days, the PRA had more success. Regardless, UNLA and TPDF counter-insurgency operations put pressure on the small rebel organization, which still lacked a solid base. Museveni had fought with the Mozambican Liberation Front in Mozambique and was familiar with guerilla warfare. He also led his own Front for National Salvation against the Amin dictatorship, continuing to campaign in rural areas hostile to Obote's government, particularly in central and western Buganda, as well as the western regions of Ankole and Bunyoro. As a result, to keep his little troop engaged, he used people's war tactics. The PRA was successful in this sense, as it won over many locals in the Kampala area who saw Obote's government as a regime that only serviced the northerners. Museveni's army would have been easily crushed in 1981 if they hadn't had widespread support from sympathetic locals during their early insurrection.

Foreign backing for the PRA was likewise minimal. Some speculated that Museveni was supported by his former Mozambican connections, causing a rift between Obote's government and Mozambique. The majority of Museveni's attacks were carried out by tiny mobile groups known as "coys," which were headed by Steven Kashaka, Joram Mugume, and Pecos Kuteesa and were under the command of Fred Rwigyema and Museveni's brother, Salim Saleh. The Lutta Unit, which operated in Kapeeka, the Kabalega Unit, which operated in Kiwoko, and the Nkrumah Unit, which operated in the Ssingo districts, were the three small zonal troops. Many of the PRA's early members, including as Rwigyema and Paul Kagame, were Rwandan exiles in Uganda. Later, they formed the Rwandan Patriotic Front.

Andrew Kayira's UFM, in contrast to Museveni's army and the West Nile rebels, was largely made up of well-trained ex-soldiers and focused on high-profile urban operations. According to historians Tom Cooper and Adrien Fontanellaz, the group aimed to undermine Obote's regime through direct attacks, a plan that "doomed it to fail from the start." The UFM lacked the strength to take on the UNLA head-on, suffered from leadership disputes, had a solid organizational structure, and was vulnerable to pro-government spies.

Foreign backing became increasingly important as the war progressed, ensuring Obote's government's survival. Through the presence of roughly 10,000 Tanzania People's Defence Force soldiers and 1,000 policemen, Tanzanians initially assisted in defending his government and maintaining some order. Despite this, Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere gradually withdrew most of his troops from Uganda due to the unsustainable costs of these troops. Only 800 to 1,000 Tanzanian advisors remained in the country by June 1981. These advisors remained vital to the UNLA, but Obote's position was severely undermined by Tanzania's exit. To compensate, he attempted to attract more foreign assistance: he hired a British private military company and persuaded the Commonwealth of Nations and the US to send small teams of security experts.

North Korea was one of Obote's most important allies. In late 1981, Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni paid a visit to the country and signed a cooperation pact that included military support for his regime. At least 30 North Korean officials were then dispatched to Gulu, Uganda's northernmost city, to train UNLA soldiers and maintain military equipment. By 1984, the number of North Koreans serving as security, intelligence, and military consultants had climbed to around 50. Museveni stated that the UNLA used around 700 North Koreans, but Obote said that only roughly 170 were present in Uganda. According to one study, the North Korean officers actively participated in counter-insurgency operations for Obote, even leading them. However, according to a report from the Central Intelligence Agency, the North Koreans declined to go to the front lines. Some Ugandan officers and non-commissioned officers were also deployed to North Korea for additional training. Obote's government also put together a number of paramilitary units to help the UNLA. The "People's Militia," which was largely loyal to UNLA chief of staff David Oyite-Ojok, was made up of Langi, Acholi, and Teso tribesmen. It grew in strength and gained a reputation as a ruthless and merciless army. The "National Young Army" (NYA), several tribal militias, and the UPC youth paramilitaries were also present.

In the meantime, the violence in the south escalated. Another rebel group, the so-called "Uganda Liberation Movement," arose, threatening to kidnap and kill UN employees if they supported Obote's efforts to restore stability in Uganda. The threats were effective, and the United Nations' training program for Ugandan police officers was halted. The PRA also maintained its hit-and-run operations, with mixed results: on 5 April 1981, it overran a UNLA station at Kakiri and acquired critical armament, but had to escape quickly when a TPDF unit retaliated. As a result, Tanzanian forces launched a counter-insurgency operation, catching a PRA column led by Elly Tumwine off guard and recapturing some of the captured firearms. Despite this, the PRA was able to recruit more volunteers, bringing the total number of fighters to over 200 by early May. Museveni traveled to Nairobi the following month to meet with Lule, and the two agreed to merge the PRA and the UFF into a single opposition party. The "National Resistance Movement" (NRM) was the umbrella organization, while the "National Resistance Army" was the armed side (NRA). Lule was named NRM Chairman in general, while Museveni was named Vice-Chairman of the National Resistance Council and Chairman of the NRA's High Command. Both sides benefited from the merger: the UFF was incredibly weak, and Lule finally obtained a true armed support, while Museveni earned vital legitimacy, as Lule was still well-liked among Uganda's southern populace. This was especially critical because Baganda dominated a strategically important region near Kampala known as the Luwero Triangle. The PRA had primarily been made up of non-Baganda until Lule gave the newly established NRA Baganda support, allowing Museveni to broaden his envisioned "people's war." The Luwero Triangle became the NRA's main operating location as a result, however the group's recruitment base remained in Ankole in the west. Museveni developed a stringent code of conduct for fighters soon after the merger, allowing the NRA to stay highly disciplined and focused despite gradually increasing in size and absorbing other insurgent organizations. The NRA had risen to roughly 900 militants by December 1981. Muammar Gaddafi, Libya's leader, also chose to assist the NRA, despite the fact that it was made up of forces that had toppled his old buddy Amin. Gaddafi believed that with the NRA, Libya might obtain more influence in Central Africa than it had previously with Amin. However, Libyan assistance was minimal, with the NRA receiving roughly 800 weapons, a few machine guns, and land mines in August 1981. To acquire more substantial support, Gaddafi asked that the NRA consolidate with the UFM and UNRF, but the rebels remained rivals and refused to unite. As a result, Libya withdrew its support for the NRA in 1982.

While the southern rebellion grew in strength, the majority of the West Nile region remained under rebel control. The surviving UNLA garrisons had significant difficulty holding out as a local administration began to develop. The militants proved to be better-trained and more efficient combatants, seizing supply convoys from the south on several occasions. Furthermore, the UNLA garrisons were plagued by indiscipline and internal rivalries, which led to clashes in their barracks. Despite these advantages, infighting, excessive corruption, and a lack of clear strategy among the rebel leadership hampered the West Nile rebellion. As the UNRF and FUNA fought each other, the former gained the upper hand and by July 1981 had mostly ejected the latter from West Nile. Elly Hassan, the commander of the FUNA, fled to Sudan, where he was apprehended by local authorities. Regardless, the insurgents in West Nile were weakened as a result of the inter-rebel conflict. By 1981, four different guerrilla factions were operating in northeastern Uganda, all claiming no direct ties to Idi Amin. Felix Onama, a former disciple of Obote, founded the so-called "Nile Regiment" (NR), a West Nile rebel force. The UNRF progressively lost the support of local population as a result of its inability to curb corruption or establish true stability. From 1981, the Ugandan government took advantage of the rebels' divisions and confusion by mounting counter-offensives into Western Nile, where its regular troops and "People's Militia" committed several crimes. The UNLA had retaken much of West Nile by December 1981, with little resistance. In reaction to the UNLA onslaught, tens of thousands of civilians fled to Sudan. The UNLA, on the other hand, was unable to permanently evict the West Nile insurgents.

With the Rwenzururu movement, on the other hand, Obote took a more conciliatory attitude. The Ugandan government reached a peace accord with the rebel group's leadership after months of negotiations in exchange for cash and other advantages. In addition, Obote allowed the Rwenzururu region some autonomy.

The UNLA was already in a precarious position by late 1981. Because of its quick growth to over 15,000 troops by December 1981, the majority of its personnel were inexperienced, poorly armed, and frequently unpaid. Corruption became widespread, and major divisions formed among UNLA troops. Some, such as those operating in northern Uganda, were given special treatment and developed a reputation for being dependable. The Central Brigade, on the other hand, was primarily made up of untrained militias who opposed the NRA. Their own leaders referred to these troops as "cannon fodder." As a result, counter-insurgency operations against the West Nile insurgents fared far better than those against the NRA. Overall, the UNLA was already showing symptoms of strain at this point, and without Tanzanian backing, it would have most likely disintegrated by the end of 1981. Despite this, the UNLA managed to keep the rebels at bay and even gained a few key wins. UNLA fended off a large-scale raid by UFM on Kampala on February 23, 1982, and eventually managed to inflict heavy casualties on the routed militants. The UFM attempted to reconstitute but was forced to retire into NRA-controlled territory. It sought to persuade Museveni's supporters to defect. Instead, a UFM commander defected to the NRA with a large stockpile of weapons, greatly weakening the UFM.

As UNLA troops pursued rebels across the Sudanese border, fighting in the West Nile region periodically spilled over into Sudan. The first time this happened was in April 1982, when UNLA troops crossed the border near Nimule and opened fire on a Sudanese Army unit, detaining roughly 20 Ugandan soldiers. Unlike other belligerents in the region, the Sudanese Army garrisons in southern Sudan were generally well-behaved and avoided attacking civilians.

The National Resistance Army, Uganda Freedom Movement, Uganda National Rescue Front, and the Nile Regiment created the "Uganda Popular Front" in November 1982. (UPF). Godfrey Binaisa, an exiled politician, has been named the UPF's new leader. Binaisa decided to prepare an invasion from Zaire to overthrow Obote while based in London. He sought to enlist the help of white mercenaries for this plot, but his plans were foiled when he was unable to pay for the operation. Binaisa's reputation was tarnished by the entire plan. John Charles Ogole was named the new commander of the UNLA's 11th Battalion in Arua in December 1982. Ogole reformed his forces, improved morale and discipline, and launched a new counter-insurgency operation against the West Nile insurgents. Ogole's tactics were extremely effective, and most insurgents were driven out of the West Nile Region within months. Barnabas Kili, the rebel leader, was also apprehended. The UNLA, on the other side, perpetrated severe destruction and killings, prompting 260,000 people to flee the area for Zaire and Sudan. As a result, UNRF and FUNA's "insurgent infrastructure" was destroyed, further weakening them. Following Ogole's offensive, the UNRF was mostly destroyed and transferred from West Nile. The group relocated its headquarters from southern Sudan to northern Uganda, where it attempted to enlist the support of the Karamojong people. In the south, the UNLA's counter-insurgency operations against the NRA in the Luwero Triangle resulted in the "genocidal killings" of thousands of Baganda people, according to UNLA chief of staff Oyite-Ojok. Many of the government forces stationed in the Luwero Triangle were Acholi, a group that were despised by the southerners.

In 1983, the Obote government launched Operation Bonanza, a massive UNLA military operation that killed tens of thousands of people and evicted a large percentage of the population. The people of northern Uganda were blamed for the atrocities because they supported the NRA's actions, which exacerbated the country's already high regional tensions. During a synchronized counter-insurgency campaign in 1983, the UNLA also crushed the UFM, demolishing its main camps. In July 1983, the UFM's exiled leadership was dispersed during a crackdown in Kenya, and its leader, Kirya, was deported to Uganda and imprisoned. The group was never able to recover. The Federal Democratic Movement of Uganda was created by remnants of the UFM, maybe a few hundred militants strong (FEDEMU).

Thanks to the efforts of Obote's chief of staff David Oyite-Ojok, Obote's government remained relatively secure and in control of most of Uganda until late 1983. The military was able to contain the NRA despite not being able to vanquish it. Despite this, tribalism, corruption, and internal strife plagued Obote's army. In an attempt to quell the rebellion, the UNLA and its allied militias had grown too quickly: by 1984, Obote had 35,000 to 40,000 men under arms, but only 15,000 had received basic training. As a result of the lack of sufficient pay and supplies, the soldiers became undisciplined, unreliable, and prone to harassing, stealing from, and murdering civilians. Despite the fact that the Ugandan government knew it couldn't even feed its enormous army, let alone adequately train or arm it, Obote refused to demobilize troops for fear of the soldiers behaving even worse if they weren't employed.

With Oyite-death Ojok's in a plane crash under dubious circumstances in December 1983, the situation began to shift. People initially suspected that the chief of staff had been assassinated by insurgents, who then took blame. The loyal forces of Oyite-Ojok, particularly the People's Militia and National Youth Army, retaliated by murdering suspected rebel supporters. However, within a week, rumors began to circulate among the military that Obote had orchestrated the death of his chief of staff due to growing rifts between them. Despite the fact that Obote's guilt could not be established, the rumors harmed Obote's military reputation. According to the CIA, Oyite-Ojok was instrumental in keeping Uganda's administration afloat, as well as "maintaining some semblance of security and order" in the country. The UNLA began to fall apart when he left. A growing number of Acholi soldiers suspected Obote of exploiting them as cannon fodder while instilling Langi in the country's leadership. At the same time, the NRA improved its propaganda distribution and attracted disgruntled Acholi army commanders to their cause. Obote's international support had also dwindled. Apart from the ongoing North Korean assistance, just 50 Tanzanian, 12 British, and six American advisors remained in the nation.

However, the government was initially effective in combating the insurgents. With Oyite-Ojok no longer alive, Obote named Ogole as the new commander of anti-NRA activities in the Luwero Triangle. Ogole enhanced his troops' training and expanded his anti-rebel campaign to encompass other security and civil institutions. He mostly drove the NRA out of the region in a series of operations, forcing it to retreat west into the Rwenzori Mountains and Zaire. However, in June 1985, when Acholi troops mutinied in Jinja and other locations, the UNLA's turmoil became more serious. Rifts arose in the government as a result, and certain political parties, such as the Democratic Party, attempted to take advantage of the disarray by seizing control of the military. Lieutenant General Bazilio Olara-Okello, an Acholi, was stationed in Gulu when the news arrived. He revolted because he was afraid that a new government in Kampala would eradicate the Acholi. Olara-Okello recruited an army headed by Acholi rebels, as well as ex-Amin supporters from the West Nile and Sudan. He took Lira and then marched on Kampala with his men. In July 1985, the city fell after a brief struggle, although Obote had already escaped to Tanzania. Later, he moved to Kenya and then ZambiaGeneral Tito Okello was installed as President following the successful revolution; this was the first time in Uganda's history that Acholi had acquired governmental power. The UNLA suffered devastating effects as a result of the coup. The new Acholi leadership quickly used their new status to marginalize and exploit other ethnic groups, especially the Langi, causing many military units to lose discipline and order. The UNLA gradually deteriorated into "marauding bands" after that, and by late 1985, its ranks had dropped to around 15,000 troops. Some commanders, such as Ogole, were forced to flee the country. The UNLA's 196 North Korean military advisers were flown out of Uganda on August 23.

Regardless, Okello's government was successful in beginning talks with a number of rebel factions, claiming that Obote, their mutual foe, had been deposed. The FUNA, UNRF (I), FEDEMU, and the revitalized UFM all achieved an accord with the administration. These rebel factions agreed to join the new National Unity administration, with their militias being officially absorbed into the government army and their commanders becoming members of the ruling military council. Despite this, the ex-insurgents retained their independence. The governing coalition split Kampala into three parts: UNLA in the center, FEDEMU in the south, and FUNA in the north. As a result, the situation remained turbulent, with the government proving frail and troops and other insurgents operating freely in the capital. Furthermore, Okello's government was despised by Uganda's elite, as the majority of his members were ignorant and ill-prepared to run the country.

Unlike the other insurgents, the NRA refused to make concessions to Okello's regime due to ideological differences. It only agreed to peace talks in Nairobi as a result of international pressure, but it had no intention of following through on any ceasefire or power-sharing agreement. The NRA acquired full control of the Luwero Triangle, as well as most of Uganda's west and south, taking advantage of the instability that followed Obote's demise. Fresh arms shipments from Libya and Tanzania were also received. Museveni's group was thus in a strong position, and it took advantage of the Nairobi peace talks to buy time. It even appeared to agree to a power-sharing arrangement. The NRA, on the other hand, had readied their force for a decisive onslaught.

The NRA launched a coordinated onslaught in August 1985 that resulted in the conquest of considerable territory in central and western Uganda. The UNLA was severely weakened after it besieged and seized the key garrison cities of Masaka and Mbarara. The NRA grew significantly as a result of these activities, recruiting new fighters in seized territory and integrating defected government soldiers. It enlisted over 9,000 warriors in a matter of months, bringing the total number of troops to around 10,000 by December 1985. Okello's government and the NRA signed a peace agreement that month, but it fell apart almost immediately when both parties broke the truce. The UNLA was beginning to crumble by January 1986, as the rebels gained ground in the south and south-west. When the NRA conquered Kampala on January 26, 1986, Okello's rule came to an end. On 29 January, Yoweri Museveni was sworn in as president, and the NRA became Uganda's new regular army. Tito Okello took refuge in Sudan. Despite this humiliating defeat, the UNLA attempted to regroup and defend its residual holdings in northern Uganda.

Bazilio Olara-Okello, the leader of the holdouts, commanded a large mobilization in Gulu and Kitgum. Women and girls, as well as everyone else who could wield a weapon, were equipped and given impromptu training. Meanwhile, the NRA kept pushing forward, taking Jinja in late January and Tororo in early February. The UNLA attempted one last time to halt the rebel advance at this location. It launched a counter-offensive at Tororo, but was repulsed. The NRA then attacked the Nile's defended crossings, encountering particularly fierce resistance from the UNLA and allied West Nile militias at Karuma and Kamdini. The NRA defeated the UNLA's fortifications after a bloody battle, inflicting "catastrophic losses" on the Acholi men. The UNLA collapsed when effective resistance became impossible, and its survivors, along with many former government leaders, withdrew into exile. In March 1986, the NRA took Gulu and Kitgum, while the defeated Acholi soldiers generally withdrew to their villages. The conflict appeared to be coming to an end.

The Ugandan Bush War is thought to have killed between 100,000 and 500,000 people across the country, including both fighters and civilians. Overall, Obote's administration was far more cruel than Amin's, killing more people.

The NRM's ascension to power was initially greeted with apprehension and perplexity by a huge segment of Uganda's people. Most people had never heard of the NRM, and it was feared that the new administration would be just as inept and chaotic as the previous ones. After a few months, however, many Ugandans began to approve of the NRM, as the party had genuinely succeeded in restoring stability and order in many parts of the country. Museveni's government, however, rapidly encountered substantial armed opposition. Despite the fact that the NRA had formally won the civil war, fighting continued in the north. Various anti-NRA rebel organizations and UNLA remnants remained active, wreaking havoc in Acholiland and West Nile in particular. The Acholi troops of the UNLA had never been disarmed, and many of them had become accustomed to life as soldiers. They were no longer willing to live as peasants, and they were unhappy with both the new government and the tribe elders' customary rule. Many were impoverished, and in the aftermath of the Bush War, economic and political turmoil reigned supreme in northern Uganda. Ex-soldiers began to band together as bandits as time went on, and warfare in the north became increasingly violent. The problem was mishandled by some NRA garrisons in the region, who reacted with severe brutality. The army's unruly members harmed Museveni's government's credibility, despite the fact that many NRA personnel acted honorably. Rumors began to circulate that the government intended to execute all male Acholi. Many Acholi believed the NRA was seeking vengeance for the horrific murders committed in the Luwero Triangle during the Bush War. In fact, many southerners blamed the Acholi for not just the carnage of the Bush War, but also the terrible government of Idi Amin — despite the fact that Amin had ostracized the Acholi. This disturbance aided in the resumption of open warfare in northern Uganda. Over time, the NRM-led government would confront more rebellions than both the Amin and Obote governments combined, but it would survive them all.

Despite frequent allegations that he planned to return to Ugandan politics after his second ouster and exile, Milton Obote never did. Shortly before his death on October 10, 2005, in South Africa, Obote resigned as leader of the Ugandan Peoples Congress and was succeeded by his wife, Miria Obote. Tito Okello lived in exile in Kenya until 1993, when Museveni awarded him amnesty and allowed him to return to Uganda, where he died in 1996 in Kampala.

North Korea swiftly established friendly relations with Museveni's government, despite its support for Obote during the civil war. Cooperation was re-established as early as 1986, and the new Ugandan military got hardware and training from North Korea as a result. However, North Korean engagement in the Bush War had additional long-term consequences, as the country became a symbol of magical military prowess in northern Uganda. As a result, rebel organizations such as the Holy Spirit Movement claimed that North Korean spirits supported them in their fight against Museveni's regime.

Many ethnic Acholi and Langi were among the UNLA's ranks, having been victims of Idi Amin's genocidal purges in northern Uganda. Despite this, Obote's UNLA, like Amin's, targeted and abused civilians. The forced transfer of 750,000 residents from the then-Luweero District, which encompassed present-day Kiboga, Kyankwanzi, Nakaseke, and other areas, was one of these injustices. They were relocated to military-controlled refugee camps. Outside the camps, in what became known as the "Luweero triangle," several citizens were repeatedly humiliated as "guerrilla supporters." According to the International Committee of the Red Cross, the Obote dictatorship was responsible for more than 300,000 civilian deaths in Uganda by July 1985.

The NRA was also guilty of atrocities, such as the use of land mines against civilians and the presence of child soldiers in the ranks of the NRA, which persisted even after the NRA became the regular Ugandan army.

THE OLD GHOSTS IN CONTEMPORARY UGANDA

Introduction.

On October 9th, 1962, Uganda declared independence. Since 1894, she has been a British protectorate made up of well-organized kingdoms and chieftaincies that occupied central Africa's lake regions. Dr. Milton Apollo Obote, the first Prime Minister and head of the government, was also the leader of the Uganda People's Congress (UPC) at the time of independence.

The Republican-leaning UPC came to power through a "unholy" coalition with the Kabaka Yekka (KY), a pro-mornarchy party whose stated goal was to protect the kingdom of Buganda's institution and authority. The UPC had previously lost the first ever general election to the Democratic Party (DP) one year before independence, and now needed the strategic alliance of allies to avert another setback.

In November 1963, Kabaka Mutesa II King of Buganda was elected ceremonial President of Uganda thus seemingly solidifying the political coalition of UPC and KY. However, this marriage of political convenience was short lived since both Obote and Mutesa and their following had differing agendas.

In 1964, Obote championed a motion in Parliament that called for a referendum on the ownership of the counties of Buyaga, Bugangaizi, and Buwekula, which were once part of Buganda but are now claimed by Bunyoro. Two of the counties chose to secede from Buganda and return to the Bunyoro Kingdom as a result of this. Sir Edward Mutesa II, as Kabaka of Buganda and President of Uganda, was placed in the unenviable position of signing the two statutes concerning the "lost counties." On February 22, 1966, Obote suspended the 1962 constitution and assumed all state powers, sparking the 1966 Crisis.

On the 15th of April 1966, in a Parliament surrounded by troops, Obote announced a new constitution without warning, which was to be adopted on the same day. It was passed without debate, and the Prime Minister told MPs that their copies will be waiting for them in their pigeonholes. The Pigeonhole Constitution was the name given to this constitution. The federal constitutional status of kingdoms was abolished, the Prime Minister's office was amalgamated with that of the President, and all executive powers were transferred to Obote. Uganda has been designated as a republic.

The Kabaka and his kingdom establishment at Mengo refused to acknowledge the new constitution's supremacy, insisting on the 1962 version instead. The Uganda army, under the direction of General Idi Amin, stormed Kabaka's palace on the 24th of May 1966, on the instructions of Obote. Despite his escape, the Kabaka was deported to Britain, where he died later.

All monarchies were abolished by Obote in 1967. Except for the UPC, Parliament was renamed the Constituent Assembly, and all political parties were outlawed. Uganda became a one-party state in a leftward shift.

Idi Amin led a disaffected portion of the army to depose Obote on January 25, 1971, against this backdrop. This coup was greeted with much joy, but it was to usher in a period of horror and enormous misery for the Ugandan people. This gloomy time would linger for eight years. All Asians, primarily Indians, were also expelled from Uganda during this time. As a result, Uganda's economy was severely harmed. The subsequent financial mismanagement and insecurity did not help the issue.

During Idi Amin's reign, an estimated 300,000 Ugandans were killed in indiscriminate extrajudicial killings. In April 1979, a coalition of Ugandan exiles led by the Uganda National Liberation Army (UNLF) and the Tanzania Peoples Defense Force (TPDF) toppled Idi Amin's administration.

The UNLF was founded at the Moshi Conference under the sponsorship of Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere. It brought together a diverse mix of Ugandan groups and individuals who shared the goal of overthrowing the Amin administration. Prof. Yusuf Lule served as President of the UNLF's first government, which lasted only 68 days despite being well-liked.

President Lule was succeeded by President Godfrey Binaisa and subsequently Paulo Muwanga, who chaired the ruling Military Commission that oversaw the general elections in December 1980. The UPC was declared the winner of those elections, despite the fact that they were marred by numerous irregularities and were widely seen as manipulated. Obote was elected President of Uganda for the second time.

During Obote's second tenure as president, Ugandans went through a very trying period. Insecurity, fuelled by the government's own security organs as well as an ongoing liberation struggle devastated the country. An estimated 500,000 Ugandans lost their lives in just 5 years of Obote's reign. The economy was shattered and so was the people's faith in government.

Yoweri Kaguta Museveni, then Vice Chairman of the Military Commission and President of the Uganda Patriotic Movement, launched a liberation movement in direct response to the tainted 1980 elections. The independence war began on February 6th, 1981, with only 26 countrymen formed under the flag of the National Resistance Army (NRA).

On July 26th, 1985, sections of the UNLA deposed Obote in a bid to find stronger negotiating ground as the NRA made startling advances into Kampala, having already divided the country off into two administrative zones. Obote II's government was ousted by the Military Junta of Generals Bazilio and Tito Okello. By February 26th, 1986, the "Okellos Junta" had fallen, and the NRA had taken control of the entire country.

For the first time in post-colonial Africa, a homegrown insurrection with no rear bases in a neighboring country and little external help was ultimately victorious. It was primarily a revolt of Ugandans who had been oppressed.

President of the Republic of Uganda Yoweri Kaguta Museveni was sworn in. The arduous process of completely rebuilding the country and its human fabric began. Political parties were suspended and Uganda was ruled by an all-inclusive Movement system to enable this mission. Over the next eight to ten years, a lot was expected to be accomplished.

A new constitution was adopted in 1995, establishing a non-partisan, all-inclusive Movement System of governance. Political parties remained dormant under this regime. The majority of political posts were elected by universal suffrage. Women, the disabled, the youth, and workers, among other marginalized groups, were given specific slots in all government administrative units. The military was also given a seat in the legislature. The feature of preserving this system was that it would be revisited every four years by referendum.

Under the Movement System, general elections were held in 1996, and Yoweri Museveni was re-elected President of Uganda. He was the first Ugandan to be directly elected to the position by universal suffrage in this election. In 2001, he was re-elected to the presidency by popular vote for the second time.

A countrywide referendum was held in July 2005, in which Ugandans decided to return to multi-party politics. The referendum votes effectively put an end to the Movement System of government. Multi-party elections for both the presidency and parliament were conducted on February 23, 2006. The National Resistance Movement (NRM) President's Yoweri Museveni won the presidential election, while the NRM won the most seats in parliament.

THE SEED OF THE 20TH CENTURY TAKING ROOT IN THE 21ST CENTURY.

Introduction.

The NRM government reinstated kingdoms with the promulgation of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.[1449]

For decades, Uganda's political organization was centered on the regional kingdoms of Buganda, Toro, Bunyoro, and Ankole. The Buganda kingdom was regarded as the most powerful and important of all. When the institution of kingship was abolished in the 1960s, the kingdoms' political strength was stripped away. Soon after, the Baganda people of Buganda demanded the restoration of their traditional monarch and the restoration of the kingdom's political status. When the current National Resistance Movement (NRM) administration decided to reinstall traditional rulers in 1993, their demands were partially met. As a result, the Buganda kingdom was the first to be rebuilt. The restored institution of kingship was defined to cultural functions, as opposed to the political character of the institution in the past. This meant that the institution transitioned from being a functional state within the Ugandan state to becoming a separate entity from the political realm and formal state structure. Nonetheless, Uganda's political discourse has been dominated by the kingdom's demand for a federal state structure with executive powers.[1450]

Long before the actual restoration in 1993, the process of reinstating the Buganda kingdom began. The five-year guerrilla struggle waged by the NRM against the second Obote regime was particularly significant. The guerrilla war was fought mostly in Northern Buganda, in the Luwero Triangle, close to the capital Kampala. Despite the fact that the NRA's leadership came from Western Uganda, the NRA was able to create a positive rapport with the local community, resulting in the recruitment of soldiers from Buganda.[1451]

One of the terms of the Baganda's aid throughout the war was that if the NRA won, the institution of kingship would be reinstated.[1452] The call for the return of the monarchy, on the other hand, left the NRA in a difficult position. The NRA required Baganda support, but if the NRA reached an arrangement with the Baganda, it risked alienating the army's non-Baganda members. Museveni agreed to reinstate the monarchy in a speech during the conflict, according to unsubstantiated [1449] Article 246 of the Constitution of Uganda, 1995, as amended.

[1450] Kayunga, Sallie Simba. 2001. The no-party system of democracy and the management of ethnic conflicts in Uganda. Ph.D. thesis, Graduate School of International Development Studies, Roskilde University, Roskilde.
[1451] Karlström, Mikael Bo. 1999. The cultural kingdom in Uganda: popular royalism and the restoration of the Buganda kingship. Ph.D. thesis, Department of Anthropology, The University of Chicago, Chicago, Illinois.
[1452] Johannessen, Cathrine. 2003. The Restoration of kingship in Uganda: a comparative study of Buganda and Ankole. MA thesis, Department of Comparative Politics, University of Bergen.

accounts.[1453] Buganda's voices requested that Museveni and the NRM keep the promises made during the guerrilla struggle and restore the monarchy shortly after the NRM took power. As a result, the NRM denied making any commitments to restore the monarchy, stating that the NRA did not fight to restore the monarchy. As a result, the NRM denied making any commitments to restore the monarchy, stating that the NRA did not fight to restore the monarchy. The NRM's hostility to monarchy was reflected in the Ten Point program, the party's ideological underpinning, which emphasized the importance of preserving national unity by eradicating sectarianism.[1454] As a result, the NRM maintained that the return of kingship would exacerbate sectarianism by removing politics based on religious, linguistic, and ethnic factional concerns.

During the battle, the NRA received backing from more than only Buganda's peasants. Professionals in Uganda, as well as those in exile, contributed financially to the guerrilla movement.[1455] In addition, numerous proclaimed royalists and members with ties to the Buganda royal family were NRA activists. The involvement of Prince Mutebi, the heir to the Buganda kingdom, was particularly significant. Prince Mutebi, who was living in the United Kingdom at the time, visited Uganda and the liberated districts of Buganda near the end of the war.[1456] Proponents of monarchism contend that Prince Mutebi's visit reinforced the NRA's support in Buganda and boosted military morale at a time when the NRM was in a win-or-lose situation. On the other side, Museveni claims that the NRA would have won the war with or without Mutebi's help. Nonetheless, Mutebi's journey to the liberated areas signified some recognition of Mutebi's role in bolstering and legitimizing the struggle among his people, and the visit highlighted the NRM-Buganda relationship.

Once in power, the NRM's challenge was to keep Buganda's political support without becoming overly reliant on it, while also expanding the NRM's social base outside of Buganda and the Western area. As a result, the NRM included a number of well-known Buganda royalists in the first NRM administration to assure support for the new authority.[1457] A number of people who had backed the NRM during the war were also promoted to top civil service positions. The Baganda once again had high hopes that the NRM would reclaim Buganda's position.

[1453] Kasfir, Nelson. 1976. The shrinking political arena. Participation and ethnicity in African politics, with a case study of Uganda. Berkeley, California: University of California Press.
[1454] Museveni, Yoweri Kaguta. 1997. Sowing the mustard seed: the struggle for freedom and democracy in Uganda. London and Oxford: Macmilla Education Ltd.
[1455] Sathyamurthy, T. V. 1986. The political development of Uganda 1900-1986. Aldershot: Gower Publishing Ltd [1456] Oloka-Onyango, J. 1997. The question of Buganda in contemporary Ugandan politics. Journal of Contemporary African Studies 15 (2):173-189.
[1457] Englebert, Pierre. 2002. Born-again Buganda or the limits of traditional resurgence in Africa. Journal of Modern African Studies 40 (3):345-368

The reinstatement of the institution of kingship and the restitution of the properties confiscated by the central government when the kingdoms were abolished were the two most important demands that dominated the public agenda. Second, the restoration of Buganda's post-independence federal status, which would provide the kingdom with significant administrative authority. The royalists also requested the administrative unity of Buganda's nine districts, as well as the restoration of the country's old administrative framework. The royalists began to seek the first goal since it posed less of a threat to the NRM than the call for federalism, or 'federo' as it became known.

The political elite calling for restoration was split into two groups: moderates and radicals. During the early years of the NRM's leadership, the first faction called for the restoration of a cultural institution, while the latter requested a king with constitutional powers. Kirimuttu was founded by the extremist faction of the pro-monarchists. However, immediately after the NRM took power, numerous Baganda cabinet members and other Democratic Party (DP)-affiliated Baganda officials, all of whom were linked to Kirimuttu, were arrested and charged with treason for advocating for the restoration of the kingdom. Since then, the hardline branch of the Buganda monarchists has been linked to a group known as Bazzukulu ba Buganda, or The Grandsons of Buganda. The group was small, with just about 40 members, and it did not attract any well-known politicians. Despite this, the organization was able to set the tone for a large portion of the public discourse. The organization wanted a full restoration of the Buganda kingdom's federal status, which was granted in the 1962 independence constitution, as well as the appointment of a Kabaka with constitutional powers. The Bazzakulu ba Buganda argued that restoring a cultural king would be pointless, and they opposed the idea of Ssabataka serving as a cultural leader who was not involved in politics. They were gradually marginalized by a more moderate set of monarchists as time went. The group, however, still exists today, and its adherents have consistently wanted a monarch with political authority.[1458]

In contrast to the radicals, the moderate pro-monarchists emphasized that the institution should play a cultural role in order to avoid disputes like the ones that existed in the 1960s between the central government and the Buganda kingdom. Some clan elders, Members of Parliament from Buganda, some lawyers, and university faculty members were among the moderate monarchists who attracted more people than the radicals.

The demands of the monarchists were strengthened in the early 1990s as more people openly backed the agenda, and the demands became more radical in general. Increased unhappiness with the NRM government as a result of economic hardship prompted this development. The NRM's unwillingness to contemplate the restoration of kingship in Buganda added to the dissatisfaction. During this time, Prince Mutebi came to Uganda and established a permanent residence in 1990. Soon after his return, Mutebi enlarged the monarchical pressure group by appointing an executive committee and a Supreme Council to serve as his official counsellors. As the connection between the NRM and the DP deteriorated, the monarchists consolidated even more. The two parties had originally agreed to prohibit political parties for a four-year transition period. When the interim period came to an end, the NRM attempted to extend it, and as a result, numerous members of the DP joined the royalists.

[1458] Cathrine Johannessen, 2006. Kingship in Uganda: The Role of the Buganda Kingdom in Ugandan Politics, Working Paper 2006:8

The royal problem became entwined with the NRM's desire to prolong the Movement system when the NRM wanted to extend the initial interim period. The NRM opposed the establishment of multipartyism since a continuation of the Movement system indicated a continued restriction on political party activity. The role of political parties was designated as one of the matters to be considered in the Constituent Assembly (CA), and the NRM need support in the CA in order to maintain the ban on party politics. The NRM contacted Buganda, the area with the highest percentage of voters, in search of a collaborating force in the CA. The question of kingship was the most major factor that could aid the NRM in gaining increasing support from Buganda in the CA. As a result, when considering why the NRM changed its stance on the kingship problem, the NRM's desire to maintain power as well as the NRM's views on political parties must be taken into account.[1459] By examining the CA's debates, it becomes clear that by yielding to the Baganda and allowing the restoration of kingship, the NRM was able to create a collaborating force against the Movement's opponents.

The Uganda Constitutional Commission, or Odoki-commission, was founded in 1989 with the goal of drafting a new constitution for Uganda. Traditional rulers, the role of political parties, and the future structure of government were among the constitutional problems highlighted, and they dominated public debate and CA debates. When the problem of traditional rulers was argued in the CA, it was largely linked to the topic of the future form of government. The royalists argued that a federal government was the best way to accommodate restored traditional authorities. As a result, the royalists began to pursue their second ambition, and federalism became a hot topic in the CA.

The royalists now possessed the organizational foundation they needed to demand the rebirth of a federal system of government, thanks to the successful restoration. Federalism, they contended, would provide the restored kingdom with a political role as well as a financial foundation. Despite the government's willingness to allow the coronation, the NRM stood to lose more in the dispute over the future system of government. Despite this, monarchists believed that the NRM would reconsider restoring Buganda's former federal status, and their hopes were bolstered by the government's cooperation on the restoration problem and the NRM's need to maintain support in Buganda.

[1459] Oloka-Onyango, J. 1996. Thirthy years after the (B)Uganda crisis: are we heading for another? Paper read at The annual Faculty of Law symposium, at Makerere University, Kampala.

When political parties such as the Uganda People's Congress (UPC) and the Democratic Party (DP) endorsed the notion of a federal system in front of the CA, the campaign for a federal system took a new turn. In the general election of 1980, the CP took a federal stance and advocated the restoration of traditional institutions, whereas the DP and the UPC argued for a unitary, republican government. In addition, new political parties, such as the Fe-party, have developed that want federalism (Federalist Party). The DP's leader, Paul K. Ssemogerere, confirmed that the UPC and the DP had formed the Caucus for Multiparty Democracy (CMD) before the CA. They made two demands at the same time: political pluralism and federalism. The monarchists and proponents of multipartyism now joined forces in calling for federalism, putting pressure on the NRM. The NRM believed that the two groups would form a pact and vote for a federal system over the Movement system, jeopardizing the NRM's viability. As a result, an alliance between monarchists and proponents of multipartyism could put the NRM's position in jeopardy. In this sense, the fight between Movement supporters and multiparty politics proponents made the third group, Buganda's monarchists and pro-federalists, a logical ally for both. As a result, Buganda re-emerged as a major player in national politics.

The NRM formed an alliance with the monarchists because the parties were too weak to pursue their goals on their own. As previously stated, the Buganda monarchy has long resisted political parties, which explains why the NRM and monarchists formed an alliance. The NRM promised that the restored Buganda kingship would be awarded federalism in exchange for Buganda's support in the CA for the continuation of the prohibition on political party activity and the Movement system for another five years. In this view, Buganda's antipathy toward political parties meant a participating force in the CA to ensure the prolongation of the NRM authority, and it became an opportunity for the royalists to achieve federalism. When the royalists proposed that party politics be banned for at least five years after the new constitution took effect, the NRM had secured the sufficient majority in the CA to overcome any objections. The NRM modified their position in the dispute over the future structure of governance after the extension of the Movement system was secured in the CA. They called for a unitary government with decentralization rather than federalism, which was a prerequisite of the alliance with Buganda. Decentralisation, according to the NRM, would ensure the transfer of authority to communities and that power would be transferred to the people.

The royalists felt betrayed when the NRM advocated for decentralisation in a unitary system as the future system of governance, and as a result, alliances shifted. Monarchists collaborated with multiparty proponents to put pressure on the NRM. The argument for federalism gained a stronger territorial footing as a result of the new coalition. Buganda had initially pushed for federalism, but the new alliance broadened support and expanded the demand for national character. The fight for hegemony between federalism and multipartyism, on the other hand, resulted in the disintegration of both groups. In this way, the new partnership served the NRM's interests by diminishing threats to the Movement's system.

So far, I've argued that the NRM used Buganda's long-standing desires for a restored kingship and a federal state structure in order to avoid the adoption of multipartyism and earn Buganda's support. This action, however, ran counter to the NRM's anti-monarchical and anti-federalist stance.

Despite the fact that traditional rulers were re-instated in their individual capacities, the Buganda kingship has gone a long way in re-constructing its prior organisational structures. Although the power vested in the institution has changed significantly after the restoration of the institution, the organisational structure of the post-restored institution of kingship in Buganda remains more or less identical with the institution before its dissolution. Buganda has rebuilt itself as a quasi-state since the restoration, suggesting that the restored cultural kingdom has put in place effective institutions, financial methods, and policy tools. The restored Buganda king created a parliament consisting of clan chiefs and delegates from each district shortly after the restoration in 1993. A government with a chief minister and ministers, similar to those of a modern cabinet, was established. A network of county and sub-county chiefs has also been re-established as part of the local administrative structure. This system overlaps the formal state structure, which is based on districts and local councils, to a great extent. The overall impression of the institutional rebuilding is that of a modern governmental entity.

The Buganda kingdom has a shaky economic foundation. Traditional rulers are prohibited from levying taxes under the 1995 constitution, and there are currently no regular transfers from the central government. The institution is heavily reliant on public support in the form of donations. To support the kingdom's expenses, the institution now relies on rental money from properties, corporate donations, and citizens being pushed to buy certificates. One of the key reasons why supporters of the restored kingship have demanded a federal status for the institution, anticipating that the institution will be granted fiscal powers, is the kingdom's shaky economy.

In 1996 and 2001, presidential and legislative elections refocused attention on federalism and Buganda's aspiration for autonomy. Despite their cultural roles, numerous members of the royal family and a segment of the Buganda government's ministries campaigned for the opposition candidate, Paul K. Ssemogerere (DP), in the 1996 election to help him defeat Museveni. In the 2001 presidential election, ministers in the Buganda government officially endorsed Col. Dr. Kizza Besigye's candidacy. This was seen by the media as a sign that the Buganda administration, including the king and chief minister, supported the opposition and hence encouraged Baganda voters to vote against Museveni. The region's aspiration for federalism was a prominent campaign issue emphasized by opposition candidates in order to attract support from Buganda in both the 1996 and 2001 elections. In this way, federalism was a tool used by the opposition to overthrow Museveni. They were not successful, and Museveni won the elections in Buganda in 1996 and 2001.

Museveni's Constitutional Review Commission (CRC), which he established prior to the presidential election in 2001, helped to bring federalism to the forefront of public debate. Federalism, traditional leader funding, and traditional leader's future position were among the subjects the commission outlined for consideration. The executive leaders of the restored kingships of Toro, Bunyoro, Busoga, and Buganda convened in reaction to the CRC's founding to build a common stance on problems connected to traditional institutions and federalism. Following this, the Buganda kingdom organized a procession that drew a crowd of almost 200 000 people to deliver their proposal to the commission, which demanded a federal system of rule. Outside of Buganda, this increasing focus on federalism has sparked worry. Although many people favoured the idea of increased regional autonomy, many were concerned that granting Buganda federal status would allow it to control the rest of the country. There was also concern that a federal state would keep a large portion of the national revenue, depriving other regions access to growth.

The cabinet issued a white paper presenting suggested constitutional revisions based on the CRC's work. In response to Buganda's desire for autonomy, the cabinet recommended a regional tier system, which means that instead of adopting a federal state structure, districts can form regional governments. Following this, representatives from the federal government and the government of Buganda met to examine the country's stance. According to Ugandan newspapers, the meeting resulted in an accord in which the monarchy agreed to establish a regional government based on districts. As previously stated, one of the key arguments for federal status has been Buganda's demand for fiscal authority. In light of this, the proposed regional government has a number of flaws. The regional government, for example, will be financially dependent on the federal government, and it is unclear how the regional government will interact with municipal governments. As a result, hard-line federalists have criticized the Buganda government, claiming that the accord is another hollow promise from the central government. On his side, the chief minister asked the Baganda not to reject the accord, calling it as a first step toward true federalism. Later, the Buganda government argued that they should have the authority to create their own laws without the consent of parliament. However, the MPs' support for regional governance means that Buganda's demand for federalism would-be put-on hold for the time being.

The attempt to reach an agreement with Buganda has been regarded in the media as a strategy by Museveni to solidify his largest vote bloc ahead of the 2006 elections, as well as a way to prevent the opposition from using one of their most popular campaign techniques to attract support from Buganda. Museveni has also been accused of enticing the Baganda with a form of federalism in order to get support for a third term. The suggestion to change the constitution to remove presidential term limits was the most contentious subject in the white paper. Museveni would be able to run for a third term as a result of this. Some opposition parties urged the Buganda kingdom to sign an agreement with the government in exchange for support for a third term, and the kingdom finally decided in a closed meeting that it would not support President Museveni for a third term, even if the cabinet changed its mind and promised Buganda federalism. The lifting of presidential terms was approved by a public referendum on July 28, 2005, and a vote of Parliament in August 2005. As a result, Museveni is eligible to run for re-election in the 2006 presidential election.

WHAT THE NRM HAS DONE IN TERMS OF GUARANTING PRESIDENTIAL MANDATE VERSUS CONSTITUTIONAL MANDATE

The National Resistance Movement (NRM) has been the ruling political party in Uganda since 1986. The party’s leader, Yoweri Museveni was involved in the war that disposed Idi Amin, ending his rule in 1979, and in the rebellion that subsequently led to the demise of the Milton Obote regime in 1985; however, parallels have been drawn between the NRM and its predecessors. For instance, the NRM sponsored public order management bill is strikingly similar to the 1967 public order and security Act, codified by the Obote regime, in that both bills “seek to gag dissenting views” Museveni’s statements are also reminiscent of Uganda’s dictatorial past: “whoever tries to cause problems, we finish them. Besigye [an opposition leader] tried to organize Kampala and we gave him a little tear gas and he calmed down. He didn’t need a bullet, just a teargas.” Further, as he once stated that “the problem of Africa in general and Uganda in particular is not the people but leaders who want to overstay in power,” some have viewed his move to abolish presidential term limits as hypocritical. In the past, the NRM has been praised for bringing relative stability and economic growth to a country that has endured decades of government mismanagement, rebel activity, and civil war; however, with an unemployment rate of 62 percent among the youth, his economic effectiveness has seriously come into question. His tenure has witnessed one of the most effective national responses to HIV/AIDS in Africa.

In the mid-to-late 1990s, Museveni was lauded by the west as part of a new generation of African leaders. His presidency has been marred, however, by invading and occupying Congo during the second Congo War (the war in the Democratic Republic of the Congo which has resulted in an estimated 5.4million deaths since 1998) and other conflicts in the Great Lakes region. Recent developments, including the abolition of presidential term limits before the 2006 elections, Museveni's confirmation of the NRM- sponsored public order management bill- a bill which severely limits freedom of assembly- NRM media censorship and the persecution of democratic opposition (i.e. general intimidation of voters by security forces; arresting opposition candidates; extrajudicial killings) have attracted concern from domestic and foreign commentators. Most recently, indicators of an alleged succession to the president's son, Muhoozi Kainerugaba, have increased tensions.

Allegations regarding significant corruption have also shaped criticism of the NRM government. According to the U.S state Department's 2012 human rights report on Uganda, "the World Bank's most recent worldwide Governance Indicators reflected corruption was a severe problem" and that "the country annually loses 768.9 billion shillings to corruption."

Understandably, Uganda was ranked 140th out of 176 nations on the corruption perceptions index. A specific scandal, which had significant international consequences and highlighted the presence of corruption in high level government offices, was the embezzlement in donor funds from the office of the prime minister in 2012. These funds were "earmarked as crucial support for rebuilding northern Uganda, ravaged by a 20-year war, and Karamoja, Uganda's poorest region." This scandal prompted the E.U., the U.K., Germany, Denmark, Ireland and Norway to suspend aid. What may compound this problem- as it does in many developing nations (resource curse) – is an abundance of oil.

The petroleum bill-passed by Ugandan Parliament in 2012- which was touted by the NRM as bringing transparency to the oil sector has, failed to please domestic and international political commentators and economists. For instance, Angelo Izama, a Ugandan energy analyst at the U.S. -based open society foundation said the new law was tantamount to "handing over an ATM (cash) machine" to Museveni and his regime. According to Global witness, an international law NGO, Uganda now has "oil reserves that have the potential to double the government's revenue within six to ten years"

Other contentious bills have been sponsored, passed and confirmed by the NRM government during his tenure. For example, the non-governmental organizations (Amendment) Act, passed in 2006, gas stifled the productivity of NGOs through erecting barriers to entry, activity, funding and assembly within the sector. Burdensome and corrupt registration procedures (i.e. requiring recommendations from government officials; annual re-registration), unreasonable regulation of operations (i.e. requiring government notification prior to making contact with individuals in NGOs, area of interest), and the precondition that all foreign funds be passed through the Bank of Uganda, among other things, are severely limiting the output of the NGO sector. Furthermore, the sector's freedom of speech has been continually infringed upon through the use of intimidation, and the recent Public Order Management Bill (severely limiting freedom of assembly) will only add to the government's stockpile of ammunition.

THE EXECUTIVE UNDER THE 1995 CONSTITUTIONAL FRAMEWORK

At the time the Public Service Review Commission was doing its work, a separate process of formulating a new national constitution was underway.[1460] The Uganda Constitutional Commission which commenced its work in 1989 sought to review Uganda's constitutional framework and make proposals for a new constitution. It carried out countrywide consultations and addressed a range of issues including the structure, composition and size of the Executive.[1461] An analysis of the Commission's conclusions is important in understanding the outcomes of the Constituent Assembly debates and, the trends in the size and cost of the Executive in the post1995 constitutional order.

One of the key issues that dominated the work of the Constitutional Commission was how to strike a balance in the powers exercised by the three traditional arms of the State: The Executive, the Legislature and the Judiciary. As the Commission generally observed, a central focus of the discussions throughout the consultation process was on the President's powers and how they should be exercised. Scholars, commentators and politicians alike attribute Uganda's political crisis and its attendant outcomes to the ambiguity in the powers of the President and the Prime Minister under the 1962 Constitution on the one hand, and the excessive constitutional powers granted to the President under the 1967 Constitution.[1462] [1462]See for example, Okello, G. (1991). The 1967 Constitution and the Contemporary Political Problems of Uganda (Unpublished presentation available at the ACODE Library of Law and Public Policy;

[1460]The Constitutional Commission under the Chairmanship of Justice Benjamin Odoki was established under the Uganda Constitutional Commission Statute, No.5 of 1988. The Commission presented its report to the President of Uganda on December 31, 1992 and a final constitution was discussed by a Constituent Assembly and promulgated on October 8, 1995.

[1461]For detailed background discussions on the Executive, see Republic of Uganda (1993). Report of the Proceedings of the Uganda Constitutional Commission: Analysis and Recommendations. Kampala.

In its analysis of the consultations and memoranda before it, the Constitutional Commission observed that there was an overwhelming desire to ensure "greater Separation of Powers between the Executive and the Legislature, and an effective system of checks and balances."[1463] The Commission further stated thus: "According to the people, [such Separation of Powers] would help in removing what they perceived to be pressures exerted on the Legislature by the Executive to approve the decisions of the Executive." In the end, the Commission decided to recommend what it referred to as "some separation of powers."[1464]

The fundamental question therefore is: What is the nature of "some Separation of Powers" that the Commission considered to be appropriate in the context of Uganda's Constitutional history?

First, the Commission recommended that the President should be directly elected and should not be a Member of Parliament. The President would also have Executive Powers as the Head of Government.[1465]The following Presidential Powers would be exercised subject to a wide range of checks and balances: major constitutional appointments; senior appointments in the state services; exercise of the prerogative of mercy; command of the armed forces; and declaration of war. The Commission also recommended a series of checks and balances to the powers and functions of the President with respect to the Legislature,[1466] including impeachment of the President by the Legislature.[1467]

Second, the Commission made wide-ranging recommendations that would in many ways have an impact on the size of the Executive. It recommended the creation of the Office of the Vice President, including a proposal that any Presidential candidate should choose a running mate for the post "so that people can pass a verdict on both" through the electoral process.[1468] The Commission further recommended the abolition of the post of Prime Minister which had been re-established at the time the National Resistance Movement Government came to power in 1986.

It observed that because the majority of Ugandans had proposed an Executive President with a Vice President and in order to avoid duplicity of work, duties and potential conflicts, there should be no post of Prime Minister or Deputy Prime Minister.[1469] Perhaps one of the most contentious issues is a direct impact on the size of the Cabinet which has been whether Ministers should be appointed from amongst the Members of Parliament. The Constitutional Commission observed in its report

[1463]Supra, note 63, pg. 321, Para 12.45
[1464]Supra, note 63, pg. 321, Para, 12.45
[1465]Supra, note 63, pg. 321, para12.46
[1466]For example, the Commission provided a series of recommendations to address potential interference of the President in the legislative process by stipulating timelines within which a Bill should be assented to or the Parliament bypassing the presidential assent where such assent is withheld.
[1467]Supra, note 63, pg. 333, Para 12.96. The Constituent Assembly did not take this recommendation and therefore the President appoints the Vice President after the elections.
[1468]Supra, note 63, pg. 336, Para 12.102 and 12.106
[1469]Supra, note 63, pg. 337, Para 12.109.

that "a substantial number [of people] are opposed to Ministers being members of the Legislature. They argue that once a representative of the people is chosen to be a Minister, his or her position is compromised by the President and the Cabinet under the principle of collective responsibility." However, having regard to the various proposals, the Commission recommended that the constitution should allow the President to appoint Ministers either from within Parliament or from elsewhere. It further recommended that Ministers should not exceed 21 and that the maximum number of Deputy Ministers ("other Ministers") should be 21.

As part of the checks and balances, the Commission recommended that ministerial appointments should be subject to approval by Parliament or its committee. Evidently, the Commission was also hostage to Uganda's history and the increasing ethnicization of political appointments. It recommended that "Ministerial appointments should take account of expertise, gender, regional and religious balance."[1470]Like many of the recommendations that are subject to abuse, this proposal found itself in the final constitution and, in a fundamental way, largely accounts for why appointments to Cabinet have increasingly become some form of tribal or ethno religious negotiating conferences.

It is therefore clear that Uganda's Constitutional history weighed heavily on the constitutional discourse that was triggered off by the inauguration of the Constitutional Commission in 1989. By May 1994 when the Constituent Assembly convened, the question of Separation of Powers and the exercise of executive authority was one of the fundamental issues that needed to be resolved.[1471] Consequently, drawing on the recommendations of the Constitutional Commission, the 1995 Constitution sought to establish broad contours of a new constitutional order that would; entrench People's Power, create appropriate boundaries for the exercise of Executive, Legislative and Judicial Authority and generally scale back on the excessive powers enjoyed by the President as originally enshrined in the 1967 Constitution.

Indeed, the 1995 Constitution clearly demonstrates the attempt by the Constituent Assembly to create appropriate restraint on the exercise of executive authority by the President. Chapter 7 of the 1995 Constitution covers constitutional issues relating to the Executive. Article 98 establishes the Office of the President and provides that "there shall be a President of Uganda who shall be the Head of State, Head of Government and Commander-in-Chief of the Uganda Peoples' Defense Forces and the Fountain of Honor."

[1470]Supra, note 63, pg. 340, Para 12.119

[1471]Discussions regarding the Executive were conducted in Select Committee II which also discussed the Legislature and the Judiciary. The committee was chaired by Hon. Joseph Mulenga with Hon. Sam Ringwegi and Mr. D.M. Byakutaga as Vice Chairman and Clerk respectively. See the Constituent Assembly Report (April, 1994 – November, 1995 (Report publisher not indicated. The Report was accessed from Stanford University Auxiliary Library under reference KTW 171 A11995 U33 1995).

Like the 1967 Constitution, the 1995 Constitution provides that the president takes precedence over all persons in Uganda and shall not be liable to any proceedings in court while holding office.[1472]Among other things, Article 99 of the Constitution provides that "the Executive authority of Uganda is vested in the President and shall be exercised in accordance with this Constitution and the laws of Uganda." The constitution obliges the President to "execute and maintain this Constitution and all laws made under or continued in force" under it. In addition, the constitution imposes a duty on the President to "abide by, uphold and safeguard this Constitution and the laws of Uganda and to promote the welfare of the citizens and protect the territorial integrity of Uganda."[1473]Other specific powers or functions of the President include: assent to Bills; approval of the budget; appointments to constitutional offices; declaration of a state of war; foreign deployment of the Uganda Peoples Defense Forces; declaration of a state of emergency; and negotiation of treaties and agreements. However, the Constitution also introduced a set of restraints intended to regulate the powers of the President in the exercise of executive authority.

In general, these powers include requirement for approval of key appointments; an annual State of the Nation Address; provisions regarding impeachment of the President for abuse of office, misconduct or misbehavior, and physical or mental incapacity. For the first time in Uganda's Constitutional history, the 1995 Constitution sought to create restraint on Presidential Powers regarding appointments. Most important, the Constitution introduced a Cap on the number of Ministers that could be appointed. Article 113 provides in part that "the total number of Cabinet Ministers shall not exceed twenty-one except with the approval of Parliament".

Article 114 provides for the position of 'other Ministers' stating that "the total number of Ministers appointed under this Article shall not exceed twenty-one except with the approval of Parliament." The specification of the number of Cabinet Ministers that could be appointed was essentially dictated by the concern that Presidents can abuse their appointing authority.

The adoption of the 1995 Constitution 33 years after independence may be fairly described as the epitome of Uganda's torturous three-decade journey to creating a perfect state where the people and the rule of law reign supreme. It had been a journey characterized by dictatorships, political cronyism, economic breakdown and inefficiency in government. As already alluded to, the constitutional restraints on the exercise of executive authority including powers on the appointment of the Cabinet were intended as safeguards to the sanctity of the Constitution and the supremacy of the people.

[1472]According to Article 98(5), the president can be subject to criminal or civil proceedings "in respect of anything done or omitted to be done in his or her personal capacity before or during the term of office of that person." For purposes of this Article, "any period of limitation in respect of any such proceedings shall not be taken to run during the period while that person was president."

[1473]Constitution of Uganda 1995, Article 98

However, since 1995, the President and the Parliament have conspired in an unholy alliance to re-write the relevant constitutional safeguards regarding executive appointments which almost tantamount to re-enacting the scenario under the 1967 Constitution. During this period, the Cabinet has been continuously expanded through resolutions of Parliament modifying Articles 113 and 114 of the Constitution. Both in 1996 and 2001, the increase in the size of the cabinet was achieved by the Members of Parliament conspiring with the Executive to amend Articles 113 and 114 of the 1995 Constitution. The debate on the relevant motions teaches us two key lessons that will shape the discourse on the size and cost of the Executive. First, the requirement for parliamentary approval to vary the number of Ministers clearly amounted to a form of "constitutional nuisance" for President Museveni. This explains why in the Constitutional reform process that followed the 2001 elections, the National Resistance Movement government sought to amend the Constitution to remove the Cap on ministerial appointments.[1474]

Second, the ease with which the resolutions passed through Parliament seems to have emboldened President Museveni to solve this "constitutional nuisance" once and for all thereby "liberating" the powers to appoint any number of Cabinet Ministers as he sees fit. This is exactly the position that obtained under the 1967 Constitution. The Constitutional Review Commission, also referred to as the Sempebwa Commission, which was established immediately after the 2001 Presidential and Parliamentary Elections,[1475] provided the main vehicle for reviewing the constitutional restraint on the appointment of the Cabinet by the President.

Although the Commission was given a broad mandate to review the 1995 Constitution, it is the outcome of the process and the debate surrounding its report that clearly shows that the argument over big government is likely to intensify especially in the run up to the next general elections. The Constitutional Review Commission addressed a number of major issues – the Office of Prime Minister; the constitutional limitations on the size of the cabinet; and the dual mandates (Ministers as members of the Executive and Members of Parliament) of Ministers – that have direct implications on the size of the Executive.

In particular, the Constitutional Review Commission addressed the issue of the size of the Cabinet. According to the commission's report,[1476] the majority of the citizens consulted expressed a desire for a small Cabinet largely on account of the need to cut down the costs associated with running a

[1474]Government White Paper on the Report of the Commission of Inquiry (Constitutional Review); Chapter 4, Para 4.3(c)(ii)
[1475]Commission of Inquiry (Constitutional Review), Legal Notice No. 1 of 2001
[1476]Republic of Uganda (2003); Report of the Commission of Inquiry (Constitutional Review) Findings and Recommendations, December 2003, Kampala

big government.[1477] This finding is clearly consistent with the proposals presented to the 1989 Constitutional (Odoki) Commission. Based on its observations, the Constitutional Review Commission recommended that the number of Cabinet Ministers, including the Prime Minister, be capped at 22. Ministers of State would also be capped at 22.

The Commission further recommended that Ministers should not be Members of Parliament.[1478]The more intriguing question, however, is the relationship between what obtains in constitutional terms vis-à-vis the practice. As already discussed in the foregoing section, in theory, the executive encompasses the various constitutional offices including the following: the Presidency, the Cabinet, the Office of Prime Minister and a host of other agencies and offices created through executive discretion. However, in practice, the Presidency has expanded to include a powerful State House, a host of Presidential Advisors and Assistants, Quasi-Public Service Officers such as the Resident District Commissioners and a number of "Special Officers" including in the Military and intelligence services.

It can be concluded, therefore, that the flexibilities built into the 1995 Constitution and a Parliament that has failed to assert its own powers and authority vis-à-vis those of the Executive have combined to create room for "strategic political opportunism" that the framers of the 1995 Constitution sought to mitigate. In effect, "strategic political opportunism" has been achieved through legal reforms and targeted administrative actions facilitated by those who believe that they are positioned to benefit from the resulting political opportunities. Given the consistency in the practice over the last decade, it is legitimate to argue that "strategic political opportunism" rather than judicious governance has become the new political ball game for achieving consensus among the governing political elite.

THE FINANCIAL COST OF AN OVER STUFFED EXECUTIVE

Since 1986, there have been deliberate attempts to reconfigure the Executive and create the necessary balance and Separation of Powers between the three traditional Arms of Government. However, the gains that were made through the constitution making process are progressively being eroded by an overzealous Presidency. The outcome of this overzealousness has been the reconstruction of a bloated executive that translates into substantial costs on the taxpayers in particular and the citizens in general. The costs imposed by this bloated Executive can be discussed from two standpoints: financial and governance.

Ascertaining the trends and full financial cost of Public Administration expenditure in general and the executive in particular is a painstaking undertaking given the scantiness or unavailability, but most important the undue secrecy, of the relevant financial information. The alternative, therefore, is to build on some of the previous work that has been undertaken in the recent past. For example, 2004 edition of the Poverty Eradication Action Plan estimates that the combined cost of Public Administration covering the Legislature and the Executive is in the range of USh34 Billion per month.[1479]

[1477]Id, p.5-51

[1478]For details on the Government of Uganda response to the Commission's proposals, see Government White Paper, Supra, note 77.

In aggregate terms, the impact of a bloated political bureaucracy on the budget and the taxpaying public is significant. Public Administration expenditure continues to claim the biggest share of the National GDP rising from 2.7% in 1988/99 to 3.2% in 2001/2002. The total share of Public Administration accounted for 20.2% of the budget out-turn by 2000/2001. This may be compared with a mere 7.3% for health where rates of infant and maternal mortality from preventable diseases such as malaria remain at obscene levels.

However, to get a better account of the cost burden imposed on Ugandan taxpayers, it is important to examine the cost of running some of the segments of the Executive. The Cabinet is one of the segments of the Executive that has expanded and become bloated over the last decade. Following the Public Service review exercise of 1990, the size of the Cabinet was reduced to 22 Ministers by 1994. However, after the first Presidential Elections in 1996, President Museveni sought the authority of Parliament to increase the size of Cabinet from the constitutionally mandated 21 Ministers and 21 Ministers of State hence raising the combined number of ministers to 56 and then to 67 after the 2001 Elections.

Today, the number of Cabinet Ministers stands at 32 and Ministers of State at 50.[1480] Before delving into an analysis of the cost of the Cabinet, it is important to examine the legal basis for determining the emoluments of Ministers. This is important because of the dual personality (being a Member of Parliament and Minister at the same time) that they possess. Ordinarily, Ministers as members of the Executive should be remunerated from funds appropriated for the functioning of the Executive or the Public Service. This seems to have been the case until 1997.

In June 1997 when Parliament considered a resolution to determine the remuneration of its members, the issue as to whether Ministers should be paid the salary and allowances of Members of Parliament was one of the hotly debated ones. Even if one were to consider the Ministers who are also Members of Parliament as clearly falling within the scope of the Administration of Parliament Act, it is apparent that the remuneration of Ministers who are not Members of [1480]Each ministry is considered in its own right and therefore where a minister holds two positions, such as 2nd Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Public Service, these are treated as two ministries.

[1479]Republic of Uganda (2004); Poverty Eradication Action Plan (2004/5-2007/8); Ministry of Finance and Economic Planning; Kampala; pg. 139

Parliament including the Prime Minister raises a prima facie legal question.

Remuneration of Members of Parliament is provided for under Article 85(i) which states thus: "A Member of Parliament shall be paid such emoluments and such gratuity and shall be provided with such facilities as may be determined by Parliament."[1481]Article 82(8) provides for the remuneration of the Speaker and Deputy Speaker. However, the motion for the resolution to determine the emoluments of Members of Parliament included a proposal for the payment of salaries and allowances for Ministers.[1482] Consequently, on top of the remuneration of UShs1.1 million for Members of Parliament, Members of Parliament who are Ministers would be paid an additional monthly consolidated allowance of UShs1.8 million by virtue of their positions as Ministers. This motion, therefore, raises two inter-related legal questions: First, why should the Parliament budget be used to pay for the services of a member who is exercising the functions of the Executive?

Second, although the Vice President and Ministers who are not Members of Parliament are considered ex-officio Members of Parliament by virtue of Article 78 (1) (d), their being in Parliament is purely to perform their duties as members of the Executive branch. This interpretation, adopted by Parliament, is clearly suspect because of the doctrine of Separation of Powers. It is suggested here that this position is a gross misrepresentation of the law, one of the many cases where Parliament continues to abuse its authority to accommodate the interests of its members and those of the Executive at the expense of the rule of law.[1483]

THE INCREASE OF STATE MINISTERS AND CABINET MINISTERS TO 82 MEMBERS AS AN ACT OF A PRESIDENTIAL POWER OVER REACH AND THEREFORE AN ABUSE OF THE EXECUTIVE AUTHORITY

The promulgation of the Uganda Constitution in 1995 shone as a path across the horizon. The Constituent Assembly declared in the preamble to the constitution that;

"WE THE PEOPLE OF UGANDA … committed to building a better future by establishing a socioeconomic and political order through a popular and durable national constitution based on the principles of unity, peace, equality, democracy, freedom, social justice and progress ..."

This declaration of triumph was based on a sustained Growth Domestic Product record averaging about 6% per annum over a number of years, the entrenchment of local governance structures through the decentralization process and, most importantly, the confidence generated through the public consultations and debates that culminated in the promulgation of the new supreme law of the land. Little did "THE PEOPLE OF UGANDA" know that the new Constitution would be a stillbirth; In spite of their declaration to establish a "durable" constitutional order, the 1995 Constitution was amended in 1997 to increase the number of people that could be appointed to the Cabinet.

[1481]See also Administration of Parliament Act, Cap 257, Laws of Uganda
[1482]Parliament of Uganda (1997); Hansards, June 10, 1997, Pg. 1841
[1483]For a detailed discussion on this issue, see Id, pg. 1844-1853.

In the effect, the freehand given to the President to appoint any number of Ministers opened a Pandora's box as similar appointments are made for Presidential Advisors, Presidential Assistants and Resident District Commissioners, without the oversight of the Parliament or the Public Service Commission. It is this expanded political bureaucracy that partly accounts for the growing increase in public administration expenditure. To begin with, this political bureaucracy has led to significant diversion of public funds and resources from critical social and economic sectors.

Its bloated nature has blurred the lines of accountability and responsibility hence breeding unprecedented corruption and mismanagement. The statistical evidence of this is overwhelming. In less than a decade, the size of the Cabinet increased from 42 Ministers originally provided for under the constitution to now approximately 82. The number of Presidential Advisors increased from 4 in 1994 to 71 in 2003. Different reports suggest that there are more than 278 Presidential Advisors, Presidential Assistants and Presidential Secretaries.

The central argument is that an over-size cabinet, and a growing Executive bureaucracy built around the Office of the President and State House, is the single most important threat to governance, and efforts to eradicate poverty and achieve economic transformation in Uganda today. In the beginning, the fear that a President as head of the Executive would abuse the appointing authority vested in his or her Office by the Constitution is the very reason why Articles 113 and 114 sought to put a Cap on the number of Ministers to be appointed to Cabinet. President Museveni, with the acquiescence of parliament, yielded to ethnic and religious pressures that have remained the under-current of Uganda's politics since independence. By the single act of passing a resolution to increase the size of the Cabinet, the President and the Parliament failed the "durability" litmus test of the 1995 Constitution.

But most importantly, the two institutions that were mandated to safeguard the sanctity of the Constitution set off a "Chain Reaction" that is threatening to wreck the new Constitutional order. The majority of these Ministers are voting Members of Parliament. The fact that Ministers sit in Cabinet meetings, formulate policy or legislation and then vote on it in Parliament is clearly a subversion of the checks and balances in the legislative process. In its report to the plenary on the Onapito Ekomoloit Motion to bar Ministers from doubling as Members of Parliament, the Committee on Legal and Parliamentary Affairs emphasized the fact that the current position promotes intrigue and opportunism as Members of Parliament are compromised by the desire to become Ministers.

Both the theory on Separation of Powers and the empirical evidence on the role of Uganda's Cabinet in undermining the Authority and autonomy of the Legislature mean that separating the two Institutions serves democracy better and Ugandans would be winners from improved efficiency and accountability of both the Executive and the Legislature. Besides governance, the uncontrolled expansion of the Executive is imposing a toll on the national budget. Expenditure on the Office of the President and State House has skyrocketed.

Expenditure on the Office of the President increased from approximately UShs6.6 billion in 1989 to an estimated UShs18.5 billion in 2008. Expenditure on State House, the official residence of the President increased from UShs14.8 billion in 1994 to UShs67 billion in 2008. The actual expenditure on Ministers, Presidential Advisors and Assistants, and Resident District Commissioners cannot be easily ascertained because much of the relevant information is held secret by government. Since the 1995 Constitution mandates the appointment of 42 ministers, it is argued that the extra 40 Ministers are an unnecessary cost on the taxpayer.

Over a five-year presidential term, taxpayers spend at least UShs13.95 Billion in salaries, selected allowances and vehicles for the 40 excess Ministers. Considering the 2008 tuition structure for Makerere University, this money is sufficient to cover the training of 930 doctors through a five-year course in human medicine. The cost of employing a single Presidential Advisor over a year is estimated at UShs48 million, an amount sufficient to construct a running health care center serving at least 5,000 people. An expenditure of approximately UShs1.9 billion on the salaries of 80 Resident District Commissioners per year is enough to provide malaria treatment to at least 63,333 children over the same period.

The main conclusion of the research is that the current bloated Public Administration in Uganda is a direct consequence of President Museveni's regime survival strategy built around six core elements: ethnic political pluralism; political mobilization camouflaged as political supervision of government programs; championing the representation of special interest groups; shifting actual legislative authority from Parliament to cabinet and the National Resistance Movement Caucus; implementing a set of welfare programs; and, for lack of a better phrase, what is referred to here as "strategic political opportunism."

Four specific recommendations are made as a contribution to address this complex problem.

a. First, parliament must reinstate the restraints on the exercise of Executive powers of appointment. In particular, the cabinet must be trimmed back to the constitutionally mandated 42 ministers. Parliament can take at least three actions to implement this recommendation. First, any future constitutional amendment should seek to limit the powers of parliament to increase the size of cabinet by setting special conditions on the basis of which such increase may be considered legitimate.

Secondly, it is clearly out of the ordinary that a nation's Constitution can be amended or even modified by a mere resolution of Parliament. To avoid future mutilation of the Constitution through unwarranted modifications, it should be required that any such amendments be executed through an Act of Parliament.

Thirdly, to create more accountability in the cabinet appointment process, it is important that parliament opens the vetting process so that the public can participate in the process and furnish information that may assist in the vetting.

b. Second, it is fundamental that Cabinet Ministers should not be Members of Parliament. The fact that a Minister formulates legislation, adopts it in Cabinet and then goes to vote on it in Parliament defeats any logic or rational reasoning. Parliament is clearly being held hostage as individual members perform unprecedented maneuvers to secure their spots in Cabinet. There is no evidence to show or even suggest that the appointment of Members of Parliament as Cabinet Ministers has served any positive role in the Legislature. On the contrary, this process is being used to reconstruct a strong Executive and subvert legislative authority, autonomy and accountability.

c. Third, to create discipline in future parliaments, the law should prohibit Members of Parliament from benefiting from any decisions that they make which may confer to them directly or indirectly any pecuniary benefits. In principle, it is important that Parliament determines its emoluments and hence avoid being subjected to other authorities. However, the actions of the Members of Parliament from the 6thParliament have showed that self-interest rather than public interests are likely to drive such determinations.

To mitigate such self-interests and ensure the integrity of the MPs in the face of the voters, it is recommended that any decision that results into pecuniary benefits should not benefit the sitting Members of Parliament. Such decisions should become effective upon the election of a new Parliament. Like in the case of other key offices such as the President and the Vice President, changes in the emoluments of legislators should be effected through an Act of Parliament rather than a resolution.

d. Fourth, the proliferation of political and public administration institutions and diversion of key financial and other resources from critical areas such as health, education and agriculture is a fundamental challenge for government. There is need for a full functional analysis of the government so that unnecessary institutions can been weeded out and relevant ones resourced appropriately to deal with the social and economic challenges facing ordinary Ugandans.

e. Finally, the issue of public administration expenditure and the associated expenditure touches on the power of vested interests. There should be no illusion that achieving reform in this area is an easy task. The major challenge is how to create opportunities for reform without threatening the survival of a sitting government. It has been argued that the positive gains in terms of financial resources saved and the enhanced delivery of goods and services achieved through government efficiency and effectiveness are the major incentives for reform. This then calls for civil society organizations to take the initiative to build an all-encompassing platform together with members of Parliament and supportive members of the Executive to push for these reforms.

To his credit, President Yoweri Museveni, more than any other President in Uganda's post-independence history, helped bring about tremendous economic progress, political stability and significant improvement in human development indicators; since his ascendance to power in 1986. However, no matter his good intentions, it is argued that a burgeoning Public Administration expenditure fueled by a growing political bureaucracy is one of the key factors inhibiting policy actions to bring about more robust economic growth and dramatic changes in the socio-economic conditions of the majority of the population.

In a space of 2½ decades, the number of persons employed in the Executive at Ministerial level positions increased from 53 to more than 100. From 1981 to 1985, this number included 30 Cabinet Ministers, 8Ministers of state, 11 Deputy Ministers and 4 others.[1484]Today, persons employed in the Executive at Ministerial level include 32 Cabinet ministers,[1485] 50Ministers of State and more than 200 Presidential Advisors. Besides, the Executive now encompasses a range of other Constitutional and Administrative appointees to the extent that it now constitutes one of the most extensive Executive bureaucracies in contemporary Africa.

While the expansion in the size of the Executive could pass off as a routine way of running government business, there is a legitimate debate to be had over the desirability of an ever-increasing size of the government, the associated cost burden on Ugandan taxpayers and, the implications of such a structure on governance trends in the country. The debate over the cost of the burgeoning size of the Executive has gained momentum over the last decade. First, what is the legal and administrative framework that provides the basis for the composition of the Executive and how has this framework changed over time?

[1484]These included the Leader of the House, Government Chief Whip, Leader of Opposition and Opposition Whip.
[1485]This includes one minister without portfolio, the ruling party Chief Whip and the Leader of Opposition.

Second, what is the cost of an oversize Executive to the taxpayer and the citizens in terms of both money and governance? The evidence shows troubling but consistent trends. In just a period of 10 years, starting in 1986 when President Museveni and the National Resistance Movement Government came to power, the Executive Arm of the State in both its narrow and broad sense expanded exponentially. During the first decade of the Museveni Presidency (1986- 1996), there were compelling political reasons for a political broad-baseness to allow political accommodation.

This accommodation was necessary to mobilize different opposition and fighting groups and the goodwill of citizens required to lift the country out of the political and economic quagmire that the past governments had created. In the absence of agreed rules and consensus, the obtaining political and economic conditions allowed President Museveni to engage in a continuous experiment in running the government. However, the promulgation of the 1995 Constitution established new contours of governance and a new national consensus upon which the people of Uganda wanted to be governed.

The Constitution also established new criteria upon which any form of political accommodation was to be based. Consequently, the apparent attempt to "mutilate" the 1995 Constitution is a major indictment on the durability of the impressive political and economic gains made by the National Resistance Movement Government over the last decades. The retreat into a new form of political broad-baseness premised on ethno-religious accommodation and clientalism constructed around a powerful Executive presidency undermines the very political foundation required to sustain a modern state and economy.

The relationship between public expenditure and public policy in Uganda has gained significant attraction over the last decades. Questions have emerged as to why, in spite of the tremendous economic achievements registered under Museveni's administration, poverty levels have remained high, socioeconomic indicators have stagnated and very limited investments have been made in public physical infrastructure, social infrastructure such as schools, hospitals and productive sectors of the economy such as agriculture and industry.

The Gross Domestic Product has averaged approximately 6 per cent per annum for more than a decade. Domestic revenue had increased dramatically from US$44 million in 1986 to approximately US$3 billion by 2007. Over the same period, inflows of international financing through aid and loans averaged to US$600 million per annum.[1486] By any measure, while the National Resistance Movement government was confronted by overwhelming social, economic and political problems, it is also reasonable to assert that it has had the biggest resource envelop compared to any previous government.

Yet, stagnation in key human development indicators and apparent democracy inertia has cast a shadow of pessimism about the success story that had begun to emerge at the promulgation of the 1995 Constitution. For example, while poverty levels were brought down from 56% in 1992 to 35% in 2002, the number of people living in poverty increased to 38% (approximately 14.4 million people) in 2004. Since then, though, the Uganda Bureau of Statistics suggests that poverty levels have declined again to 31%.[1487] While school enrollment statistics have gone up as a result of the introduction of Universal Primary Education[1488]and Universal Secondary Education, concerns have grown over issues of standards and quality as well as lack of investment in appropriate education infrastructure. For example, it is estimated that of the 2 million children who enrolled in Primary One when Universal Primary Education was introduced in 1997, only 406,000 sat Primary Leaving Examinations in 2003.[1489]

Of the 463,631 children who sat Primary Leaving Examinations in 2008, only 17,021 children, representing 3.7 percent, passed in Grade 1.[1490] While the government can be applauded for pursuing policies that brought about significant improvements in infant mortality and maternal mortality rates during the period 1990-2005, the indicators have stagnated in the last three years. For example, reduction in infant mortality has stagnated at around 69 per 1000 children since 2005 in spite of having three Ministers deployed in the Ministry of Health,[1491] or increased budget allocation to the Health Sector.

Although it is difficult to find accurate mortality rate figures and, those that exist are considered controversial, it is estimated that between 6,500 – 13,500 women and girls die each year due to [1486]ACODE data sets on foreign aid flows to Uganda for the period 1962-2004 (unpublished).

[1487]Republic of Uganda (2008); Statistical Abstract; Uganda Bureau of Statistics, Kampala

[1488]Total primary school enrollment increased from 3 million pupils in 1997 to 7.6 million in 2003. See Republic of Uganda (2004).Poverty Eradication Action Plan (2004/5-2007/08). Ministry of Finance, Planning and Economic Development; Kampala; Pg.155

[1489]USAID, 2005; USAID/Uganda Annual Report, 2005

[1490]The Ministry of Education has 1 full Cabinet Minister and two Ministers of State, one for primary and the other for higher education. The fact that with only 3.7 per cent of the primary school children passing in Grade 1, and neither the minister nor the deputy minister responsible for primary education takes responsibility and resigns demonstrates the lack of accountability for poor performance of government. In a cabinet reshuffle, announced on February 14, 2009, less than a month after the release of the PLE results, Minister Namirembe Bitamazire was retained in her position while State Minister for Primary Education Peter Lokeris was transferred to be Minister of State for minerals.

[1491]In the cabinet reshuffle referred to in note 9, Steven Malinga was retained as Minister of Health and Richard Nduhuura as State Minister for general duties. James Kakooza was brought in to replace Emmanuel Otala as the State Minister for primary health care.

pregnancy-related complications.[1492] In 2004, the United Nations Fund for Population Activities estimated that Uganda loses 505 women out of every 100,000 live births, ranking as the 8th country with the worst maternal death rates in the world.[1493]The number of stunted children of less than five years increased from 38% in 1995 to 39% in 2001.

Equally disturbing trends exist in key sectors like agriculture where output has declined consistently over the last decade notwithstanding the number of Ministers deployed in the Ministry of Agriculture. Even in the areas of governance, key indicators show emergence of inertia evidenced by increasing corruption and bureaucratic inefficiency.[1494] Indeed, the apparent stagnation in socio-economic indicators and apparent democratization inertia make the present debate on the cost of public administration expenditure, economic growth and governance one of the most legitimate public policy concerns in contemporary Uganda. Unfortunately, the debate has been less helpful in informing public policy because it lacks conceptual clarity and is largely based on anecdotal evidence. For example, there is apparent conceptual confusion between public expenditure and public administration expenditure. Although the budget process has attempted to draw this important distinction, it is apparent that the distinction has not filtered into the ongoing debate.

Equally unclear is what constitutes the "Executive" for purposes of establishing the full extent of the cost of the Executive branch of government on the taxpayer. Consequently, the challenge is to identify and distinguish between these key concepts and set appropriate conceptual boundaries to enable a more focused and policy relevant analysis and debate. The starting point to providing a conceptual framework for this paper is to define the concept of public administration. Public Administration is used to refer to the segment of the state that is responsible for the delivery of public goods and services.

It is mainly comprised of the Public Service and other Quasi-Public Service institutions such as public enterprises, constitutionally mandated agencies[1495] and statutory bodies.[1496]It is also important to note that while there can be a debate about the size and cost of these institutions to the taxpayer, their desirability is generally not contested. For example, the desirability of Judicial Officers, or Teachers or a National Police Force is accepted as having socially optimal tangible [1492]Futures Group (undated); Maternal and Neonatal Program Effort Index: Uganda. Glastonbury, USA.

[1493]Reported in The New Vision, July 7, 2004
[1494]ICPSR (2005); Afrobarometer Round 3: The Quality of Democracy and Governance in Uganda, 2005.
[1495]This includes agencies created under the Constitution such as the Inspectorate of Government, Uganda Peoples Defense Forces (Articles 208-210), Uganda Police Force (Articles 211-214), Uganda Prisons Services (Articles 215-217) and the intelligence services (Article 218), etc.
[1496]Statutory bodies are created by the Legislature and charged with specific mandates for the effective governance of the country. Some of the major statutory agencies in Uganda include: National Planning Authority (NPA), Uganda Revenue Authority (URA), Uganda Investment Authority (URA), National Environment Management Authority (NEMA).

benefits to society. In effect, the size and quality of Public Service in these areas is likely to lead to optimization of certain social outcomes.

For example, the net social gain of recruiting an extra judge or magistrate may be the increased number of detainees that may be prosecuted annually. Or the recruitment of one extra teacher could lead to a reduction in teacher-student ratio and hence lead to improvements in the quality of education. And when such changes in the size of the service are considered in aggregate terms, the optimization of social outcomes can be dramatic and compelling to justify public expenditure on these institutions. However, there is another segment of governmental administration that falls outside the mainstream public service. For the purposes of this paper, we call this segment "political administration".

Political administration is used here to denote the segment of governmental administration that is mainly political because of the way the institutions that operate in that space are constituted and their staff selected, or appointed. Ministers, Members of Parliament, Presidential Advisors, Presidential Assistants, and Resident District Commissioners are just but examples of the segment of the Public Service that falls under Political Administration. If Political Parties were funded from the Consolidated Fund, their staff would also be included under this category.

Institutions that fall under the Political Administration segment of the Public Service differ from the mainstream Public Service in some fundamental ways. First, their composition and structure can be altered without affecting the exercise of their aggregate mandate and potential impact on the delivery of public goods and services in the country. For example, selection of Members of Parliament could shift from the present county-based constituency structure to sub-county-based or district-based constituency structure without the aggregate mandate of Parliament changing. Or the composition, structure or numerical strength of the Cabinet can change but its aggregate constitutional mandate would remain intact.[1497]

Second and most importantly, because of the aggregate nature of their functions, the marginal value of increasing or decreasing the numerical strength of these institutions is almost zero. Consequently, their optimum numerical strength is more of a political question rather than a function of social optimization or rationalization in logic. For example, increasing the number of Prosecutors or Judges or Teachers or Doctors is predicated upon the desire to optimize certain social or economic outcomes. In this regard, society benefits directly from reduced crime, better student performance or efficiency in the delivery of health services.

On the contrary, the marginal utility of having an additional Minister for Justice or Education or Health is statistically insignificant or zero. In other cases, such an increase in the number of [1497]Article 111(2) of the 1995 Constitution (as amended) provides for the functions of the Cabinet.

Ministers could even be in the negative especially where a big number of Ministers in one Ministry leads to tension, conflict and overlap. Thirdly, in the case of non-elective offices, appointments into Political Administration Institutions or positions are at the absolute pleasure and discretion of the appointing authority. Political loyalty is the standard criterion, no formal interviewing is required and generally meritocracy becomes a secondary consideration or is completely ignored.

This is so notwithstanding the fact that Political Institutions or positions are established by law or by Administrative discretion. In the case of Uganda, the best examples are the positions of Resident District Commissioners[1498] and Presidential Advisors where recruitment is made at the pleasure of the President and loyalty is far more important than merit.[1499] The other two key concepts employed in this paper are "public expenditure" and "public administration expenditure". The term "public expenditure" is generally used to denote "the dispensation by the state [government], on non-market criteria, of economic resources"[1500] that it has acquired from taxpayers and other public sources of finance.

The traditional reference to public expenditure generally applies to public investments in key infrastructure and sectors that directly result into the production of public goods and services. In this regard, physical infrastructure such as highways and bridges, schools or hospitals, defense installations or public buildings such as courts fall under public expenditure. This is also true of investments in key productive sectors of the economy such as agriculture, industry or services. On the other hand, "public administration expenditure" covers the administrative costs associated with the functioning of both public administration and political administration. Public policy concerns about public administration expenditure are, therefore, concerns about economic rationale, cost, efficiency and political accountability associated with the performance of public administration institutions.

Finally, this study focuses on public administration expenditure on the Executive arm of the state. This raises the question as to the appropriate boundaries of "the Executive" as a unit of analysis. The term "executive" is often used in different contexts but practice shows that it is often used at three levels. First, the term is used in a very narrow sense to refer to the President or Prime Minister of a country. Hence, reference to an Executive President or Executive Prime Minister exercising all Executive powers of the state. In this narrow sense, the Executive includes the public officials [1498]The office of RDC is established under Article 203 of the Constitution.

[1499]It is important to recognize that many of the men and women who serve in these positions are in fact highly qualified. However, in the absence of formal recruitment procedures including interviews, it is tenable to assert that their loyalty to the president or appointing authority rather than qualification is the primary consideration for their appointment.

[1500]David Heald and Alasdair McLeod (2002), "Public Expenditure", in Constitutional Law, 2002, the Laws of Scotland: Stair Memorial Encyclopedia, Edinburgh, Betterworths, Para 482.

immediately surrounding the President including Cabinet ministers, presidential advisors and assistants and other similar officials.

In a second sense, the term is used to refer to the President or Prime Minister together with the whole body of public servants in the civil and military service. In this case, the institution of public service together with the coercive instruments of state power – the army, the police and the prisons – all fall within the ambit of the Executive. Finally, when considered in the context of the doctrine of separation of powers, the term Executive assumes its broadest meaning hence referring to all governmental officials capable of exercising Executive authority either in their official capacities or on behalf of the chief executive, hence excluding those acting in a legislative or judicial capacity.

For the purposes of this paper, the term "executive" is used in its narrow sense. This study is therefore mainly concerned with the composition, structure and numerical strength of the Office of the President, the Office of the Vice President, the Office of Prime Minister, State House, the Cabinet, and the various officials that form the core of the Executive in this narrow sense. Our analysis of public administration expenditure thus focuses on the costs of these institutions to the Ugandan taxpayers and the economy on the one hand and the implications for governance on the other.

PRESIDENTIAL ADVISORS, PRESIDENTIAL ASSISTANTS AND RESIDENT DISTRICT COMMISSIONERS

Consistent with the tendency towards building political patrimony through Cabinet appointments, the Museveni Government has sought to use other forms of politically based appointments to reward regime supporters or manage political dissent. This has been achieved through appointments of a network of Presidential Advisors, Presidential Assistants and Resident District Commissioners[1501] since the numbers and roles of these appointees defy any possible rationalization. In 1994, Uganda had only 4 known Presidential Advisors.

In 1997, their number was reported to have increased to 18. During the debate on the motion to determine the emoluments of Members of Parliament, a Member of Parliament Winnie Byanyima suggested that this was a redundant group of political elites and observed that the government could save money if the President load-shedded this "political excess baggage."[1502] By 2003, the number of Presidential Advisors (excluding Presidential Assistants) had increased to 71. Although it is difficult to ascertain the current number because of the secrecy of the information surrounding these offices, an official list published by the Office of the President showed that President [1501]Although the office of RDC is provided for in the Constitution under Article 203, appointment of RDCs is largely based on political loyalty and does not follow standard public service recruitment procedures.

[1502]Hansards, June 10, 1997. Pg. 1845

Museveni had a combined 200 and plus Presidential Advisors and Presidential Assistants as of now. Writing in "Inside Politics" section of The Daily Monitor newspaper in 2006, Angelo Izama estimated that these Advisors and Assistants cost the Ugandan taxpayer at least USh2.6 billion every year, which translates into approximately USh13 billion over a five-year presidential term.[1503] The "obscenity" of the number of Presidential Advisors and Assistants is not only in terms of the cost to the taxpayer but also in terms of the structure and hence the areas where a President requires advice and assistance.

According to the official list published by the Office of the President, the President has Advisors or Assistants on a range of mundane issues such as religious affairs, literary affairs, household and presidential farms. These issues are mundane from the perspective of the taxpayer because they are either outside the ambit of areas that require public investment or simply there is no marginal value or utility to the taxpayer in having persons specifically designated to advise the President on those issues. In any case, the fact that the President maintains a bloated Cabinet designed around similar issues clearly shows that the Ugandan taxpayer is being short-changed through double payment and lack of value for money.

As already pointed out, the marginal gain to the taxpayer of an additional advisor is clearly non-existent. On the contrary, the marginal loss to the taxpayer can be computed in the form of shillings lost or goods and services forgone. For example, it is estimated that the cost of a single Presidential Advisor at USh48 million (salary plus benefits) per year is equivalent to the cost of constructing a running health care center providing services to at least 5,000 people.[1504] An analysis of the cost of the Executive on the public purse is incomplete without analyzing the cost implications of the position of Resident District Commissioners.

The office is created under Article 203 of the Constitution as amended. Accordingly, the functions of Resident District Commissioners are to: coordinate the administration of government services in the district; advise the district chairperson on matters of a national nature that may affect the district or its plans and programs and particularly the relationship between the district and the government and to carry out such other functions as may be assigned by the President or prescribed by Parliament. Like the Cabinet and Presidential Advisors, the number of Resident District Commissioners has continued to grow both by design and by default. By design, the positions have been increased through the creation of numerous offices of Deputy Resident District [1503]The monthly salary of a presidential advisor, excluding allowances and other privileges, is estimated by the Public Service at UShs2 million.

[1504]Mugasha F., C. Kassami, B. Van Arkadie and A-M; Berger, 2002; Final Report of the Committee to Advise the President on More Effective Public Administration Budgeting, Kampala: Office of the Prime Minister and Ministry of Finance, Planning and Economic Development.

Commissioners and Assistant Resident District Commissioners. By default, the number of Resident District Commissioners has increased as a result of the increase in the number of districts. In 2003, there were at least 56 Resident District Commissioners, 48 Deputy Resident District Commissioners and 38 Assistant Resident District Commissioners representing the 56 districts that existed at the time. A 2008 list announcing the appointment of Resident District Commissioners showed that taxpayers were paying for the services of 80 Resident District Commissioners and 59 Deputy Resident District Commissioners.

The financial cost of Resident District Commissioners to the taxpayer can also be examined in the light of the amount of public funds expended on their salaries and other operational expenses, as well as the desirability or relevance of the office. From the outset, it may be argued that the poor functioning of key government institutions at the local level has made the presence of the Resident District Commissioners office necessary. Beyond the constitutional functions outlined above, Resident District Commissioners cover up for key institutions such as the police and community development offices because these institutions are either malfunctional or are not properly facilitated to discharge their duties.

Considered from this perspective, it is possible to sympathize with those who argue that Resident District Commissioners play an important role in the delivery of public goods and services. However, given that there are already public institutions mandated to perform these functions, the presence of Resident District Commissioners and more so in terms of the current numbers, creates an unjustifiable expenditure burden on the taxpayer. Independent analysis of public service pay shows that a Resident District Commissioner earns at least three times the gross monthly salary of a newly recruited doctor, or 10 times the gross monthly salary of the men and women who serve in the military at the rank of private or 11.5 times the gross monthly salary of a police constable.

The bloatedness of the Executive is also reflected in the growing expenditure on the Office of the President and State House over the last two decades. For example, expenditure on State House – the official residence of the President – has increased from UShs14.8 billion in 1994 and was projected to reach an estimated UShs58.8 billion by 2008.

CONCLUSION

This research has examined the financial and governance implications of a bloated Executive that has emerged since the ascendance to power of the National Resistance Movement government in 1986. It has been argued that despite the Constitutional restraints on the appointing powers of the President, the Executive and the Legislature have over the years conspired in a mutually beneficial relationship to remove those restrictions and allow the sitting President to construct one of the most extensive executive bureaucracies ever in Uganda's History.

Firstly, a bloated executive epitomized by an oversize cabinet, an extensive network of Presidential Advisors and Presidential Assistants and a host of quasi-public service appointments such as Resident District Commissioners is undermining good governance and cost-efficient government. Unrestrained appointments are used to construct an embedded political patrimony network, while mandate overlaps and diffusion of institutional responsibility have clearly undermined efficiency, accountability and fiscal discipline.

Secondly, although the National Resistance Movement Government brought about a rebound in the economy maintaining an average growth of 6% over the last decade, the increased government revenue has mainly gone into sustaining networks of political patronage instead of improving socio-economic conditions of the ordinary Ugandans. As argued in the paper, this is evident from the fact that socio-economic indicators have stagnated over the last decade, payroll taxes for people employed in the public sector have not reduced and, corruption has grown into a cancer that is consuming the fabric of society.

Thirdly, there is still a window of opportunity to change course and reverse the current trends. However, this is largely achievable if the sitting government focuses on the strategic long-term transformation of the country rather than short-term regime survival considerations. It is important to recognize that President Museveni, the National Resistance Movement party and Parliament have consistently expressed commitment to good governance and efficient government. However, tapping this potential goodwill requires the participation of third parties. In this case, organized civil society will be essential in creating the momentum for reform.

Finally, the issue of public administration expenditure is not only associated with the executive. There are a number of other areas that should be studied to provide evidence that can support necessary actions and reforms. Future studies should focus on enhancing the understanding of public administration expenditure at the local government level and the cost of key processes such as commissions of inquiry.

NRM INTERNAL PARTY CRISIS (ENEMY WITHIN)

No one could think at one point movement system of the NRM government could face challenges within the house. But as usual, the parties were merely seen by staunch supporters as a means of acquiring political power and wealth often for private interests but not as a mechanism to transform society. Perhaps this is the major cause of internal political crisis's. Many of the guerilla fighters in NRM started to see Museveni as a selfish person and an opportunist who did not want to hand over power to the natives yet this had been the idea of them all which was to be done in 4 years.

Many had hope that returning power to citizens would give them an opportunity to get involved in Uganda's politics and perhaps lead the country. Because of these varying interests, clashes occurred in NRM which led to movement of individuals from NRM and among these was Col Dr Kizza Besigye a leading exponent and one of the founding fighters of NRM.[1505] This was to form the basis for the disintegration of NRM which worsened after the adoption of multipartyism in Uganda.

DR KIZZA BESIGYE DROPS NRM "AN INSIDER'S VIEW OF HOW NRM LOST THE BROAD BASE"

In November 1999, the country was shocked when one of the strong fighters of NRM Col Dr Kizza Besigye authored a document "an insider's view of how NRM lost the broad base" This document drew a line between him and Museveni and eventually painted them political rivals.[1506] Indeed it was a lengthy missive against the establishment that was in power for 13 years. Museveni and the allies were infuriated and warned Besigye of misconduct by washing a dirty linen in public. His argument was that the movement philosophy and governance had been manipulated by those seeking to gain or retain political power in the same way that political parties in Uganda were manipulated.

The end result was loss of faith in the system, corruption and insecurity. To him, the main notion of NRM was to hold power for four years and then hand over power to the people. He stated that when Museveni started to manipulate the movement system, then he had betrayed the guerilla fighters.[1507]In his reaction, Museveni stated that Besigye could be court martialed for airing out his views in a wrong forum. But this seemed to be nothing. Besigye had opened doors for the many that were silent.

General David Tinyefunza now known as David Sejusa during the constituent Assembly also opposed the automatic extension of movement for another five years. He was left humiliated and forced to apologize and retract his comments during a meeting of the movement caucus a situation that he declined. As if this was not enough. In 2000, après conference was called for where Besigye declared his intentions to challenge Mr. Museveni on October 28th. This a bit confused Museveni who decided to leave the venue in Ntare where he was with Kagame celebrating its anniversary.

On 1st November 2000, Mr. Museveni issued a statement in which he lashed out at him for unilaterally declaring himself a candidate. "Besigye has gone about his intentions in an [1505]Kakuba Sultan Juma.Multiparty Politics dynamics in Uganda.African Journal of Political Science and International Relations Vol 4(3) pp109-114 March 2010.

[1506] Paul Mugume. July 7th 2017, Why Besigye left Museveni and NRM. National Politics. The Tower Post.
[1507] Col Dr Kizza Besigye November 1999.

indisciplined and disruptive way. He has without consulting any organ of the movement launched himself as a movement candidate although it I well known that he is in loose collaboration with multi partists. Let us however assume that col Besigye is not in cahoots with multipartists."[1508]

It seems that the president was defending himself. Besigye had started to obtain support from some of the insiders and masses as well as those that desired multi-party system. This increased and turned the movement system which started to affect its mass grassroots support. In 200 elections, though he lost to Museveni, it was clear to understand that NRM had created a strong grassroots structure which was hard for Besigye to dismantle. In her words, Proscovia Salaam Musumba remarked that "for 2001 race, Besigye was in the political laboratory, he was testing the system that they had built along way and he realized it had been hijacked."

When the elections were done, Besigye ran in exile in South Africa. When the room for multipartyism was created, the FDC was built in 2004 by him and others and begun its activities and forming the strongest opposition against Museveni replacing UPC and DP that had dominated the politics post-independence period. It became another force to reckon and in 2006, it is alleged that FDC won the presidential elections though they were rigged by NRM of Yoweri Museveni.[1509]

OTHERS DESSERT NRM (THE ENEMY WITHIN)

As the country thought issues had been settled in the NRM after Besigye, another veteran and strong legal puritan left the movement. Miria Rukuza Koborunga Matembe who was an ethics and integrity minister decided to drop off the bus in 2003. [1510]She was one of the many so loyal to Yoweri Museveni. She had previously been part of the Constitution Commission that oversaw the drafting of the 1995 Constitution. It is said that as a token of appreciation, she was made the ethics and integrity minister.

Her misunderstandings with NRM boss arose in 2003 when she started to oppose the removal of the "Presidential Term Limits" to aid Museveni contest for another term. She was part of the framers of the constitution and could not see this stand as it could be a violation of people's interests since they are the sovereign[1511]. In her 250 paged Memoir, she asserts that there was a lot of corruption and the more she fought corruption is the more she was fought by those close to the president. Perhaps her interests were different from those of the NRM staunch carders.[1512]

This was a manifestation that whatever Besigye had said was reality. There was no longer doubt

[15081508] Gen Yoweri Kaguta Museveni Nov 1st 2001
[1509] Dr Kizza Besigye. Portrait of a fighter by Guest Writer. Feb 17th, 2021. A look at the twenty years of Political action of the four time presidential candidate.
[1510]The Observer: Matembe: My time in MusevenisCabinet.Reported by Baker Batte Sept 18th 2009.
[1511] 1995 Constitution of Republic of Uganda, Article 1.
[1512] The Struggle for Freedom and Democracy betrayed : Memoir by Miria Matembe an Insider in Musevenis government.

that Museveni's government had been infected by the notorious vices of every government. The next group was to leave NRM within days.

In the same year, while at Kyakwanzi, the next was Bidandi Ssali then a powerful minister and member of president Museveni's inner sanctum. During the meeting, he questioned the president of when he would quit. Bidandi had led Museveni's campaign team in 2001 where he had asked masses to give him another chance. He was really going to feel betrayed if Museveni came back in 2006. It seems quite clear that he also had plans of contesting for presidency after Museveni but this seemed impossible. In Reply, Museveni banned him together with Augustine Ruzindwa and Eria Kategaya from the party.

After this move, many other strong heads that were frustrated decided to dessert the party. Among these was the former army commander Gen Mugisha Muntu, Augustine Ruzindana, Jack Sabiiti, Sam Njuba, Patrick Musinguzi and Amanya Mushega. In his address, Mr. Museveni informed the world that the NRM could do without them since they were a "mere spoke in the wheel" of the party.[1513]The conflicts and misunderstandings in NRM intensified and many continued to dessert the party.

Many thought the party was at the verge of collapse but surprisingly it has remained strong by recruiting many young politicians who have been inculcated into the party ideologies in Kyakwanzi to maintain the party strength. But worth to note is that though all this has been done the conflicts have continued to shake the party's strength and perhaps many claim it's the selfish interest of the big men in the party administration.

THE NRM REBEL MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT "THE REBEL MPS"

As already seen, ever since NRM started the stewardship of Uganda, it has been battling with conflicts within its confines. Many of these are staged by those that illusion themselves as staunch members but have different interests. In 2013, NRM party as a party underwent another stage of misunderstandings and class among its carders. Surprisingly these were the promising men in the fulcrum of the party that it held a lot of hope in them.

These were the famous "rebel MPs." These included Muhammad Nsereko, Barnabas Tinkasimire, Theodore Ssekikubo and Wilfred Nuwagaba. These continued to roar and protest loudly each time their party strayed politically not until the party decided to expelled them.

[1513]The Independent.Quitting NRM.Story by Haggai Matsiko.Retrieved 3rd June 2021.

M U H A M M A D N S E R E K O

The ruling party had struggled to make its make way in Kampala and when Muhammad Nsereko won the Kampala central members of parliament seat, the party thought it would now rest easy, sit back on its helms and enjoy some much needed peace because finally, one of their own was representing the most constituency in the Capital. Shockingly, it seems that all his intents and purposes fell on the silver plate for the opposition. He was an opposition politician donning an NRM tag.

One time, when he was arrested, he was seen brandishing a V-sign well known for FDC. He once announced that he would resign from NRM and re-run on another platform and went father to announce that he would start his own political party.[1514] This was right reflection of his opposition soul covered by the yellow color of NRM which hurt the NRM secretary general and Chairperson Mr. Museveni.

Despite warnings from the party, he was not willing to relax his moves against NRM. It's on record that when a bye election was organized in Bukoto South, Nsereko campaigned against NRMs Alintuma Nsamba something that made it bluntly clear that he had become a liability to the party.[1515]

B A R N A B A S I T I N K A S I M I R E

Just like Nsereko, Barnabasi Tinkasimire was yet another Judas in the realms of NRM. He was the Member of Parliament for Buyaga Constituency a seat that he had acquired as an NRM flag bearer. His career in the party was full of confrontation with some officials especially ministers that had been appointed by the chairperson of the party doubling as the president of Uganda. He had earlier confronted the late Dr Stephen Mallinga when he accused him of being too old to be a minister. The other was the state minister for Relief and Disaster Preparedness Musa Ecweru whom he constantly accused of defilement.

This did not appease the chairperson of the party and other henchmen of the party that enjoy its policies. The question was on what could be next for him but Barnabas was a hard rock indeed. He went on to raise ideas of need to revive the term limits and calling upon the president to resign and perhaps not to stand for presidency come 2016.[1516] This under looking of the party dogs left them with no option but to close doors for him.

[1514]Muhammad Nsereko while having an interview with The Observer a well knownnews paper in Uganda.
[1515]Daily Monitor. "Who are the Rebel MPs." Monday April 15,2013 Reported by John K Abimanya and retrieved on 6th June 2021.
[1516] Despite warnnings from CEC and NEC of NRM, he was not willing to halt his moves which eventually accelerated his dismissal from the party.

THEODORE SSEKIKUBO

One can largely say that his ideas were a reflection of Barnabasis ideas. At the time, he was the Member of Parliament for Rwemiyaga Constituent which he acquired as an NRM flag bearer. Despite the other two, Ssekikubo lived a life of close proximity with Museveni since childhood. He was a son of Sam Mwagala who was a close friend to Amos Kaguta the father to the president of Uganda.

Despite the history, he was never concerned and continued to blame the president for the poor governance and long stay in power. He attributed this to his removal of the term limits something that he always referred to as opportunitism. He went on to advise him to denounce his ambition to stand for presidency in 2016. This left many NRM officials wondering his conduct which they could not withhold.

DISMISSAL OF THE MPS

The president, who chairs NRMs Central Executive Committee, presided over the expulsion of the group on grounds of indiscipline resulting from differences in opinion. This development gave the public a face of a simmering conflict within a ruling party. Mr. Nsereko was accused of appearing on radio stations where he allegedly denounced president Museveni and vowed to fight his re-election in 2016.[1517] He was further accused willfully and intentionally disseminating false and malicious allegations that those who are not relatives of the president would remain beggers.

Theodore Ssekikubo was on accused of appearing on a radio station where he became over political. While appearing on Capital FM, he was quoted stating that Museveni was a lawyer for the corrupt and went further to give example of Temangalo and CHOGM scandals. Barnabasi was accused of forming clique factions and intrigue with others contrary to Rule 4(a) of the NRM code and acting contrary to rule 4(j) of the NRM Code. On that basis they were expelled from the party.

Upon their dismissal, the angry MPs continued to threaten on how they were to unseat Museveni Yoweri and some of his henchmen in 2016. "They will see us in 2016 general elections. We shall show them that we are not simple people. We will ensure that we take over leadership."[1518]

The Ugandan laws provide that if a legislator leaves the party from which he acquired a seat, then the party should write to the speaker advising that the said MP has been withdrawn and a vacancy will be declared.[1519]This meant that the rebels were to cease being members of Parliament which they declined.

[1517] It was alleged that he stated this while appearing on Radio stations shows on Dec 30th 2011 and Feb 1st 2012.
[1518]Barnabasi Tinkasimire while addressing journalists after being expelled.
[1519]Article 83(1) (g) of the 1995 Constitution of Uganda.

They went defiant against vacating Parliament, Ssekikubo, Nuwagaba and Tinkasimire turned up to the Legislature on Wednesday 17th April 2013 claiming that they were still members of Parliament. "We are still valid MPs and we still continue attending Parliament in our capacity as elected legislators despite NRM threats against us."[1520] They continued to acquire support from the public with the NRM being accused of failing to address corruption. The secretary general of NRM wrote to the speaker Right Honorable Rebecca Kadaga informing her of the expelled MPs requesting her to have them sent out of the August House.

In her letter still, the Secretary General demanded that the Speaker informs that Clarke to write to the electoral commission to organize a bye election for the vacancies. All their demands expressly stated were turned down by the Speaker when she declined. This meant that NRM had to divert and take another route if they were to succeed. The party petitioned the Constitutional Court to dismiss the MPs from Parliament. In his judgment, Richard Buteera ordered that the MPs should leave the House and not to receive any allowances because their continued stay was unconstitutional.

Being in discontent with the judgment, the parties decided to appeal the decision and the Supreme Court indeed overturned it. It ordered that the parties remain in Parliament for the word "leave" within the intent of the framers meant leaving the party willfully without being expelled or forced.[1521] This left the MPs jubilating. NRM had lost the battle and the MPs vowed to continue challenging NRM policies.

During the debate for the removal of the age limit in 2017, a bill that was introduced by Raphael Magyezi, a section of these angry MPs promised to undertake whatever is possible to prevent the amendment of Article 102(b). The provision barred any person beyond the age of 75 from contesting for presidency. This move was done to weaken the party for its amendment meant that Museveni was to contest in 2021 general elections.

These were later joined by John Baptist Nambeshe and Felix Ogong to challenge the move. They had spent year's fiercely opposing the NRM way of doing things and threatened to unseat Museveni a decision they were not to decline. [1522] The hard boys continued to storm NRM and voted for "No" in the Age Limit debate. This continued to torn NRM and increased support for the opposition. It seemed quite evident that NRM is full of wrangles though they are covered by its chairperson.

[1520] Ssekikubo said this before storming Parliament in 2013.
[1521] Supreme Court Constitutional Appeal No 1 of 2015.
[1522] Uganda: "Sacked rebel MPs insist they are still MPs." The africa report by Godfrey Olukya.

MONOLITHIC NRM AND THE DECEPTIVE RACE FOR SPEAKER OF PARLIAMENT

THE KADAGA-NAMUGANZA & OULANYA FEUD

For long, no one could narrate the center of curvature for the conflict between the Minister of State for Lands Persis Namuganza and the Speaker of Parliament Rebecca Kadaga. Namuganza had allegedly mounted a verbal war against the speaker and she had gone an extra mile to ask her voters of Bukono County, Namutumba district to boycott all activities organized by the speaker. She accused her of rebelling against the Kyabazinga. Their wrangles went viral on social media and perhaps were irritating requiring an explanation.

The conflict between the two started in the early March of 2018 at a function in Bukono. The function was organized to launch boreholes as a way of solving the water issues in the great Busoga region. At the function, Namuganza reportedly told off Kadaga and Busoga king Gabula Nadiope to concentrate on fighting jiggers in Kamuli which to her were serious threats than poking their noses into Namutumba affairs.

Besides, that Kadaga and the Kyabazinga had earlier gone to Namuganza's Bukono Constituency and installed a chief without her knowledge which the latter called an insult. In an angry manner, Namuganza rallied all her voters in Bukono to use stones and sticks to chase and dismiss Kadaga and the Kyabazinga if they over pope their noses in Bukono without her awareness.

> "Kadaga should have declared war on the famine and drought that has hit Busoga. She would have declared war on the jiggers that attacked Kamuli. But for her to Come and declare war on me, I will also declare war on her because she isn't immune from death" [1523]

Kadaga's political wing went ahead to threaten and warn Namuganza of her conduct. Her language was really alarming and this raised concern as to whether she was suit for the ministerial position and some went further to threaten a vote of censure in the minister if she could not control her conduct. For days, the misunderstanding could not be settled and cold war continued among the two. It was indeed irritating of how the speaker and the minister both of which were NRM carders could conflict to such an extent.

This forced the Deputy Speaker Jacob Oulanyah to ask the committee on Rules, Privileges and Discipline to investigate the conflict between Namuganza and Kadaga. In his words, he remarked that "the issues raised before affecting the speaker of the House, affect her as a member of [1523] Hon. Persis Namuganza the State Minister for land while addressing a press conference.

Parliament whose privileges are also guaranteed by our own rules and laws of this country including the Constitution."[1524]

The committee had to immediately commence its activities. It called upon Persis Namuganza to turn up and explain the hidden journey of the conflict.

While appearing before the committee on Rules, Discipline and Privileges, she remarked that ever since the passing away of the late Bukono chief Christopher Mutyaba who was her father, Kadaga and the Kyabazinga were planning a succession which left her family divided. She continued that she was hit to learn of a move by Kadaga who flew to Bukono just a day after the president halted the process and installed a chief which sparked the violence.

The wrangle between the two went on and did not spare the cultural leaders of Busoga. Though Namuganza is from one of the royal clans of Busoga, the tension between her and Kadaga points to a section of royals falling out with her to align themselves with Kadaga.

These cultural leaders from Kigulu chiefdom led by Princess Ruth Nakayima Nakidodo held prayers and handed over a spear and shield to Ms. Kadaga to enable her gain support and success over Persis Namuganza in the elections of Second National Vice Chairperson NRM(female) a post which the two were competing for. Though this was the case, it's worth noting that the conflicts between the two are noted to have begun in 2015 from the NRM party primaries and the 2016 elections in which Princess Persis Namuganza accused Kadaga of political interference in the affairs of her constituency Bukono.[1525]

In her final remarks while shading tears before the committee, Namuganza stated that the speaker should desist from politically interfering in the delicate matters of the royals in Busoga since she is not a royal.[1526]It seemed the war was not to end unless the parties had been called together to have a dialogue. Even after the committee, the parties continue to threaten each other. They were on headlines of every newspaper formed the talk shows of every television and radio show. This was so shameful to the party and the country at large as such learned and big people continued to portray such a nasty character in society.

Most of the officials called upon the president also doubling as the chairperson of the ruling party NRM to mediate two and if not another method should be adopted to solve the issues between the parties.

[1524]Mr. Jacob Oulanyah while addressing Parliament on the Conflict. Also see Daily Monitor March 15th 2018: Oulanyah direst rules committee to probe Kadaga-Namuganza conflict .

[1525] Kadaga camp plots attacking Namuganza suppoters outside Busoga. Timothy Sibasi..political risk analyst..africandussier.press

[1526]Persis Namuganza to Kadaga. " Leave the issues of the royals to the royals"

THE KADAGA-OULANYAH FEUD

The conflicts between the party candidates have continued to directly affect the cohesion of the ruling party. Perhaps one can argue that the party has failed to discipline its big dogs due to fear that they dessert the party which may weaken it. As the party was looking forward to masking the conflict between Persis Namuganza and Kadaga, another feud raised out between Kadaga and Oulanyah.

The misunderstanding between the two arose from the desire for stewardship of the legislative assembly or the August House of Uganda. In the aftermath of the 2021 general elections which were won by NRM with majority in Parliament, the question that remained un answered was on who was to become the speaker of the 11th Parliament. FDC presented Ibrahim Ssemuju Nganda, National Unity Platform was still holding meetings on who to bring as their flag bearer.

Challenges had befallen the ruling party over the conflict between Oulanyah and Rebecca Kadaga. Kadaga had served for speakership for a period of 10 years being deputized by Oulanyah who served the same period. But it seemed clear that Kadaga was not willing to give up despite the continued information she received from NRM that she was to give up and leave the floor for Jacob Oulanyah.

Indeed, there feud dominated both the formal and informal media for over two months. While there were many candidates, the race and the bitter contest was between the two and ended up leaving many parliamentarians divided over this matter. This brought about cracks among the different NRM regional Parliament caucuses such as those in Buganda, Acholi and Busoga over who they are to support for speakership.

It's worth noting that though it sprung after the 2021 general elections, it had been simmering since 2016. After the 2016 general elections, Oulanyah wanted to stand for speakership however the Central Executive Committee (CEC) resolved that Ms. Kadaga was to serve only 10 years and pass on the baton to Mr. Oulanyah.[1527]On several occasions after this decision, the two disagreed on who should chair the plenary sittings and taking trips abroad.

In an unprecedented move in June, Oulanyah attended a plenary session to demand that a displeasure motion against him is expunged from the records of Parliament. He said that the motion was passed in bad taste and handled in contravention of rules of procedure. When they met the president in Entebbe at State House, the two were pointing each other being responsible for the chaos.[1528]

It's the CEC to endorse the Speaker and Deputy speaker. Throughout the party's administration, the speaker and deputy speaker have always been coming from NRM. Mr. Kiwanda Ssuubi remarked that "indeed it is the duty of the CEC to provide candidates for the speaker and deputy speaker jobs" [1529]While using its mandate through the lengthy deliberations on 23rd May 2021, the NRM CEC members decided to back Mr. Oulanyah to be their flag bearer.

[1527] Daily Monitor of March 28th 2021. CEC must resolve Kadaga, Oulanyah feud. Retrieved on 4th June 2021
[1528]Ministerial team mediating Kadaga, Oulanya conflict. The Independent Retrieved on 7th June 2021.

Kadaga had lost the support. The whole country was silent on what Kadaga was to do next. She surprisingly had a press conference where she declared that she would contest as an independent. It seems she was not willing to stop her move. This was being violent and disrespectful to the CEC. She remarked that "it was undemocratic for CEC members to pre determine the party's flag bearer in the speakership and deputy speaker.[1530]

Her decision was not welcomed by officials in NRM but applauded by the opposition who expressed support for her. The final result was to be obtained from Kololo which saw Oulanyah become speaker with a total number of 310 votes. This proved how Museveni was; that whoever he endorses through CEC becomes the chair. Though practically she lost to Oulanyah, ideologically, she had lost to Museveni whose order she had defied.

In conclusion, no one can ideally understand whether the misunderstandings will ever end in NRM. This perhaps paints a picture that the party may not be able to stand if its chairperson happens to cease office.

UNLOCKING THE GATES FOR LIFE PRESIDENCY:THE HIDDEN AMBITION OF MUSEVENI

In the initial years of his leadership, the move for fundamental change was given life. This was witnessed by the creation of Ministry of Constitutional Affairs and later the Constitutional commission to draft a new Constitution which was a light against the past. This was later to face unprecedented amendments to favor the head of state.

The idea of creating a new constitution under NRM commenced from the creation of the Ministry of Constitutional Affairs in 1986. Its activities were however very slow not until 1989 when a Constitutional Commission was formed.[1531] The selection of members to the commission was ad hoc and was done in batches. Some appointed by the president were not approved by the minister for Constitutional Affairs and those appointed by the minister were not approved by the president. There was no nomination process allowing anyone else to suggest names.[1532]But nonetheless, its activities were to commence soon in what can be termed as constitutional making process. The

[1529]Mr. Kiwanda Ssuubi on a talk show at NBS TV. See also Uganda Speaker Race. Kadaga, Oulanyah moment of truth. The Monitor (Kampala)
[1530]Daily Monitor.Kadaga to run as independent in the speakership.Reported by Faith Amongin.
[1531] J. Katorobo, "Electoral choice in the Constituent Assembly Elections" in from Chaos to Order p.117.
[1532] Furley and Katalikawe, " Constitutional Reform in Uganda," pp 247-51.

commission was to be headed by Justice Ben Odoki under the direction of the minister for Constitutional Affairs.

The commission carried out popular engagements of the citizens in education seminars, debates, media discussions and submission of opinion memoranda that evidenced over constitutional making. At least 25,547 separate submissions of various views were sent to the commission. [1533] These submissions included Local Council Memoranda (10,134); essay competitions (5,544), seminars reports from district, Sub County and various other institutions (899), newspaper opinion Articles (290) and individual memoranda (2,553) and others.[1534] That is how Ugandans actively expressed their wish.

At the climax of its activities, the commission produced a draft constitution to the Constituent Assembly which saw many caucuses formed to deliberate on the draft. These included NRM caucus, the Buganda caucus, National caucus for democracy and Women's caucus.

The Constituent Assembly deliberations lasted that lasted for 29 months from the time the Assembly opened on February 16 1993 to its conclusion on August 25th 1995, when the 284 member Assembly adopted the new Constitution. The Constitution was enacted on September 22nd and promulgated on October 8th 1995 by the president. Finally, Uganda obtained a people based Constitution. [1535]

That said, important to note is the expression of people's ambitions under the Preamble which was later to be undermined by the father of the Supreme law. It states that " We the people of Uganda recalling our history which has been characterized by political and constitutional instability, struggles against forces of tyranny, oppression and exploitation and committed to build a better future by establishing a socioeconomic and political order, exercising our sovereign and inalienable right to determine the form of governance for our country, and having fully participated in the Constitution making process, do hereby in and through this Constituent Assembly solemnly adopt, enact and give to ourselves and our posterity, this Constitution of the Republic of Uganda."

The hope for the many Ugandans was expressed in those few wordings which they hoped to witness given the history of Uganda but unknown to them, they were to be betrayed by their own son; the war lord.

[1533] Republic of Uganda, Constituent Assembly Proceedings.
[1534] Mukholi, A Complete Guide 30.
[1535] The Politics of Constitutional Making in Uganda by Ali MaRI Tripp.

AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION (A BETRAYAL BY MUSEVENI)

Just like many African leaders, the ghost of staying in power for life as well haunted Mr. Museveni. In the beginning, it was silent among the few henchmen of the president not until he called for a meeting at the National Leadership Institute "Kyakwanzi" where he made it loud to others that he desired to have the constitution amended to allow him run for the third term in office. S0ome supported the idea while others opposed the move. These were some of the guerilla fighters that looked at it as a betrayal of the natives by them.

At the end of the meeting, those that opposed the idea were dismissed by Museveni out of his cabinet. They had become idiots. These included first Deputy Prime Minister Eriya Kategaya, Miria Matembe, Mugisha Muntu and Bidandi Ssali. As expressed in the preamble, the Constitution under Article 105(2) provided for a limit on the office of the president to two terms. Museveni was at the serving his second and final five year elective term. This meant that he was not eligible to contest for another term which was opposed to him.

Being disappointed in his ambitions, many of the dismissed carders started to express their opinion about this and among these were Museveni's longtime friend and almost a brother Eriya Kategaya. His words were few but expressed concern about the amendment. While attending a Parliamentary Advocacy Forum (PAFO) at Hotel Africana, He presented a paper titled "Political Transition in Uganda: The Stakes for Regional Integration in East Africa," he remarked that;

"I would like to deal with this transition under what is now popularly called third term or according to Salaam Musumba "sad term." What is referred to here is the vigorous attempts to amend Article 105(2) of the Constitution to remove the term limits on presidency…. In 2001 the promise made in writing that H.E President Museveni was going for his last and final term. What we need is the cool analysis of those who are trying to get jobs or trying to save what they have. These types of people are always compromised in their analysis."[1536] Eriya just like other citizens had seen this as a return to the dictatorial regime since one of its breeding places is long stay in power. As guerrilla fighters and nationalists, Museveni had betrayed them. They had wasted and risked their lives for nothing.

During an interview, Eriya said, "I never thought that the Museveni I knew would be involved in this type of games lam seeing, not at all. This is totally the opposite of what I knew of the man…One of the things you have to treasure is your credibility. The moment people begin doubting your credibility, there is a problem. President Museveni now has a problem of credibility. He may think he is popular but am not sure myself. He does not have the same credibility before."[1537]

[1536] Eriya Kategaya during a speech at Hotel Africana in Kampala. Nov 7th 2003
[1537] Eriya Kategaya during an interview with The Observer May 2004.

His words were not to halt the president's plans of amending the constitution. He and his allies orchestrated a successful political campaign which led to the removal of the presidential term limits in 2005. The removal of the term limit to give the president unlimited terms in power were launched in March 2003 during a Movement National Executive Committee (NEC) [1538] When the bill was tabled before Parliament, it was supported by Members of Parliament who had received a share of five million to support it. They were selling the nation to in favor of one person. The constitution was finally amended and the term limits buried in the dust. Museveni and his supporters had their way to success in what came to be known as a pro- Museveni project.

One can acknowledge the fact that removing the term limits was a mistake ever made by the legislators and those in other capacities that supported the move. In his words, Justice Owiny Dollo regrets the removal of the term limits and asserts that it was a mistake made that saw Uganda lose it all.

He one remarked, "I don't think this thing of the age limit was a big issue; but what I wept for this country was for the removal of the presidential term limits. That is where we lost it. The mistake we made in the Constituent Assembly was not to entrench, not to make it difficult for anyone to amend the provisions of the term limits."[1539]

In a further discussion, he noted that "I take responsibility and anybody else who was in the Constituent Assembly; that we should have secured, entrenched that provision so that if you want to amend that particular Article, you would go back to the people. We failed the people of Uganda as a consequence."

Truth be told, the removal of the presidential term limits opened flood gates for the current atrocities committed by the government where the country has witnessed arrest of political opposition members, trial of civilians in the court martial which is a reflection of the military decree number 12 of 1973 that mandated the military to arrest civilians and charge them in the military court martial, violation of separation of powers and increased assassination of political opponents. Such and many others are a reflection to the post-independence regimes that Ugandans desired to remedy under Article 105(2) of the constitution.

[1538] The Observer. How Term Limits were kicked out in 2005. May 13, 2012 by joomlasupport.
[1539] Justice Owiny Dollo during an interview with Daily Monitor at his Chambers in Kampala Tuesday October 13th, 2020.

CONSTITUTIONAL ABUSES AND THE 1995 CONSTITUTION

The new 1995 constitution was not made on a tabula rasa, but emanated out of a deeply rooted consciousness of a turbulent political past characterized by unlimited and costly abuse of powers. This time, the process of formulating the constitution involved wide consultation, participation and a specially elected Constituent Assembly (CA), hence 'a people's constitution'[1540]. Through a meticulous process guided by consensus, the delegates started with the preamble that succinctly reflect the tumultuous past as its point of departure. There was a general desire to entrench specific parameters and mechanisms for the operation of government against the backdrop of daunting past experiences[1541]. To ensure legitimacy and sustainability of the new constitution, the major task was to 'create viable political institutions that will ensure maximum consensus and orderly secession of government'[1542].

Ever since the abrogation of the independence constitution in 1966, the executive had exercised arbitrary power through repression and extermination. Accordingly, the ultimate motif of the new constitution was the enshrinement of people's desire to restrain executive power. The new constitution sought to entrench a strong Bill of Rights and mechanisms for their enforcement and democracy-promoting and horizontal institutions for good and accountable governance. Furthermore, the new constitution reflected the need for popular representation and aspirations that transcended mere abstraction and documentary value of a constitution. But to what extent was the new constitution a guarantee for stability and transformation of state-society relations in Uganda?

In 2005, the NRM government fundamentally amended the constitution to satisfy the narrow power interests of the ruling elite, yet the population did not defend 'their' constitution. In this regard, Moehler's study noted that citizens who were active in the process of constitution-making were no more supportive of the constitution than those who stayed at home, and stressed the importance of the political elite in shaping the constitutional perceptions of the citizens[1543]. Had constitutionalism, therefore, permeated the state and the socio-political fabric of Ugandan society? I argue that Ugandans are not passive victims, but actors with agency, challenging misrule and unconstitutionalism. However, the character of the state and political machinations often shaped their strategies of engagement. In this case, the population did not have much faith in the legalistic character of the constitution as a guarantee of a new constitutional and political order in Uganda.

[1540] Furley, Oliver and James Katarikawe, 1997, 'Constitutional Reform in Uganda: TheNew Approach', African Affairs, 96: 243-260.
[1541] Bazaara, Nyangabyaki, 2001, 'Mixed Results in Uganda's Constitutional Development: An Assessment'; Nassali, Maria, 2004, 'Constitutional Transition and the Movement System in Uganda',
[1542] Odoki, Benjamin, 2005, The Search for a National Consensus: The Making of the1995 Uganda Constitution, Kampala: Fountain.
[1543] Moehler, C. Devra, 2006, 'Participation and support for the Constitution inUganda', The Journal of Modern African Studies, 44: 275-308.

THE 1995 CONSTITUTION MIRAGE ON A TABULA RASA

On September 27, 1995, the Constituent Assembly adopted the new constitution. The 1995 constitution, establishes a quasi-parliamentary system of government, consisting of a President, Prime Minster, Cabinet, unicameral Parliament, Supreme Court and Constitutional Court. The preamble states that the constitution shall be based on the "principles of unity, peace, quality, democracy, social justice and progress" and includes a long chapter on "National Objectives and Directive Principles of State Policy". Moreover, Article 1 of the constitution proclaims the sovereignty of the people and according to Article 2[1544], the constitution "shall have binding force on all authorities and persons throughout Uganda". The constitution stresses the importance of the protection of human rights by stating that "fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual are inherent and not granted by the State" and guarantees specific rights and freedoms like, amongst others, the freedom from discrimination, freedom of religion, the prohibition of torture and slavery, the right to privacy, assembly and association.

In opposition to the Constitution of 1967, the current constitution contains a whole range of powers that are shared between the President, Parliament and other constitutional bodies. Amongst others, the presidential power of appointment regarding the Vice President and Ministers is subject to the approval of the Parliament and the appointment of Permanent Secretaries and heads of departments have to be made upon recommendation of the Public Service Commission. The Public Service Commission moreover has the power to appoint all other civil servants and judicial officers other than Judges of the High Court, Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court are appointed by the Judicial Service Commission. Also in other areas the power of the executive has been cut down extremely: The President no longer has the power to dissolve Parliament and in the area of legislation the Parliament can over-ride the presidential veto by two-thirds majority. The executive's powers to borrow money are also limited since Parliament now first has to approve borrowing.

In 2000 and 2005, important referenda on the system of government took place: The first referendum favored a "no-party" system of government but was invalidated by a court ruling some years after because of procedural shortcomings, whilst the second referendum approved a multiparty system and abolished the two-term limitation on the presidency.

[1544] Constitution of Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)

A FAULTY CONSITUTIONAL PROMISE

Matovu[1545] hangs like a spectre over Uganda's 1995 Constitution. It exemplifies the century-long ideology of judges that legitimised the spread of state law outwards in concentric circles from Kampala. Appellate court judges continue to interpret written state laws with great deference to the executive despite constitutional directives to the contrary. Only two reported cases challenged family law statutes a century old. In Buganda, as elsewhere, judges upheld a rigid divide between geocentric laws, customary or civil, applicable to rural "natives" and city-dwelling Kampalans, respectively. Yet Uganda's diverse Islamic laws have largely escaped effective codification by the archaic Marriage and Divorce of Mohammedans Act and unimplemented provisions in the 1995 Constitution. At the periphery, rebels face state-sanctioned violence or military rule. The near total absence of judicial infrastructure in the north belies the promised constitutional rights. For the Karamojong, successive colonial and nationalist governments have dispatched an administrator-warlord to introduce the "rule of law". This "lawless" frontier is really only the furthest reaches of state law where an ideology of uniform territorial validity justifies arbitrary force against a people bounded by an orality that is a distinct form of life.

Oloka-Onyango sums up the post-1962 legal history of Uganda as, "a dearth of constitutional cases - reflecting the fact that few litigants have sought redress for the excessive use of state power that has deprived them of their rights.

But as we have seen, this is not quite right. Few Ugandans had legal rights they could hold against the state until the 1995 Constitution. Instead they were segregated by customary laws outside the urban writ of civil laws. This continues to the present day as civil laws govern the property and marriage relations of few Ugandans, even if the Domestic Relations Bill had been passed. Few Muslim, for example, would engage with it if the courts continued their positivist interpretation of an ideal set of Islamic rules. Moreover, the General Court Martial creates a new, opaque state legal order. The few times political opposition leaders challenged the General Court Martial in the appellate courts, most judges appealed to an ideology that saw all state-sanctioned law as valid law, regardless of the de facto military tyranny enveloping civilians in the north. The greatest failure of the post- 1995 Constitution judiciary is to re-examine their interpretive presumptions.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

This is a sole responsibility of the legislature. The Constitution is the Supreme law of the land with guidance from Article 2. Prof Kanyeihamba defines a Constitution as the basic fundamental laws which the inhabitants of the state consider to be essential for their governance and wellbeing.[1546]Uganda has generally had four Constitutions that is the 1962 Constitution, the 1966 Constitution, the 1967 Pigeon Hall Constitution and the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda that was promulgated by the constituent assembly under the NRA Government of Y.K Museveni in 1986. This Constitution was a unique innovation in the political history of Uganda as it was adopted after consultations from the people.

[1545] Ex Parte Matovu: Uganda v. Commissioner of Prisons [1967] E.A.L.R. 514 (H.C.).

It was basically adopted to eradicate our sad and nasty experience characterized by political and constitutional instability struggles against the forces of tyranny, oppression and exploitation. The greatest desire or aim was to build a better future by establishing socio economic and political order through a popular and durable National Constitution based on the principles of unity, peace, equality. Democracy, freedom, social justice and progress.[1547].

The only better way of achieving this was through providing for a durable and rigid constitution that could not easily be amended. In their wisdom, the framers found it wise to as well include Article 3 which is a limitation to the unconstitutional change of government though it is not an absolute limitation. However because law evolves as society evolves and because there is need to serve the current and future generation, the framers found it wise to provide for clear procedure for the amendment of the Constitution whose mandate was only placed in the hands of the Legislature it being law making body to avoid the nasty past political history. Its amendment is provided for under Chapter eighteen. Article 259(1)[1548]gives mandate to the Legislature as the only organ to amend the Constitution. It provides that;

"Subject to the provisions of this constitution, Parliament may amend by way of addition, variation or repeal, any provisions of this Constitution in accordance with the procedure laid down in this Chapter"

The provision as well requires the amendment to be only through an Act of parliament whose sole purpose of which is to amend the constitution and that that Act must be passed in accordance with the law or chapter eighteen. The framers went ahead to prescribe the various ways in which parliament or legislature can amend the constitution. This is in three categories that is amendment under Article 260 which requires parliament to carry out a referendum. This mainly concerns provisions that are entrenched or that form the basic structure of the constitution. The second category is under Article 261 which requires approval by the district councils and lastly amendments under Article 262 whose amendments can be done by Parliament alone.

The constitution does not in any single line or any provision or under any chapter mandate any [1546]Kanyeihamba, G.W. Constitutional Law and Government 1975. East Africa Literature Bereau Publishers.

[1547] See the preamble of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.
[1548] 1995 Constitution of Republic of Uganda

other organ of the government to amend it. The Judiciary is only empowered to check on the legality of the amendment, that is whether the legislature in amending the constitution complied with the required legal procedure. Any non-compliance to that leads to nullification of the amendment[1549].The judiciary can also intervene where parliament or legislature in the amendment of the constitution ended up amending the basic structure of the constitution. By this I mean the provisions that form the basic features of the supreme law. It is because of the need to protect the spirit of the constitution and granting it recognition from the citizens[1550]

Due to the fact that at most times the ruling party tends to use the majority seats in the house to enforce amendments that favor its prolonged administration, the judiciary can shut down such amendments if they do form part of the basic structure and in particular where there has been noncompliance with the procedure.[1551]. The only express mandate pertaining the constitution granted to the judiciary to interpret the constitution and no any other organ has been mandated to do this. This authority is conferred under Article137 and it is done through the Constitutional Court. This Article is clear to the effect that any question as to the interpretation of the constitution shall be determined by the court of Appeal sitting as a Constitutional Court. It's therefore prima facie that the judiciary cannot amend the constitution but rather interpret it.

Any attempt by the executive to amend the constitution connotes an overthrow of the constitution and its legal order. The executive has no mandate in whatever sense to draw near the constitution in any matter concerning its amendment and if it does so, that is enough to suffice overthrow of the constitution. In 1966, Dr Apollo Milton Obote overthrew the 1962 constitution simply by removing the office of the president and vice president in order to deny them of authority and their offices. This alone was enough in his wisdom Justice Udo Udoma to affirm that it amounted to an overthrow of the 1962 Independence making the 1966 constitution valid[1552]. Therefore, the executive arm being responsible for the administration of the country, its responsibility is to preserve and protect as well as promoting the constitution and fulfilling its objectives rather than abrogating it.

It is important to write that because of its uniqueness as a statute that has to serve not only the current generation but over the coming generation it is supposed to be accorded respect for reason being its continuous amendment may lead to erosion of the basic structure of the Constitution

[1549] Justice Kanyeihamba in Paul Ssemwogerere and others v Attorney Genral General
[1550]Kenya supreme court in Njoya v Attorney General and others (2004) AHRLR 157. See also the decision in KesavanandaBharati v State of K erala AIR 1973 SC.
[1551] Male H.K.Mabiriziand Others v Attorney General Constitutiona;l Appeal No 2 of 2018
[1552]UdoUdoma in Uganda v Commissioner of Prisons ExparteMatovu [1967] EA 514

THE AGE LIMIT AMENDMENT.

Another block on the life presidency mission was knocked by NRM. This was the age limit. It was provided for under Article 102(b) of the constitution. This provision was a stumbling block to Museveni's administration. Proper steps had to be taken to amend such a provision if the mission was to be concluded. The provision prohibited any one above the age of 75 from running for presidency and well noted was the fact that Museveni was soon clocking 75 years of age which meant that he could not be eligible for the next general elections.

Out of the blue, in 2017, a bill was moved by way of motion by Mr. Raphael Magyezi an NRM carder and Member of Parliament for Igara west Constituency seeking the removal of the 75 year age limit for presidency. Mr. Museveni was due to turn the age. Having the majority in Parliament, the NRM used its position and other resources in terms of finance to enforce the success of the bill. The Bill was voted for and Article 102(b) was amended. This meant that the age limit ad been weakened. Every one that wished to contest for presidency was free so long as they were of an adult age of 18 years and above. This opened gets for many including John Katumba a 22-year-old that contested for presidency in the 2021 general elections.

A group of MPs and civil society members petitioned the Constitutional Court chaired by Owiny Dollo, the then deputy chief Justice but a majority verdict, the court upheld the amendment.[1553] The petition appealed to the Supreme Court but the verdict was the same.[1554] Uganda lost it for the second time. This was to prolong the administration of Museveni something that the natives had never desired.

This was a return to the past. It had opened gates for life presidency of Museveni which was a return to the reign of Idi Amin who declared himself the life president of Uganda. In 1976, he made it clear that he was to be the life president of Uganda, stepped up his suppression of various ethnic groups and political opponents in the military and elsewhere. [1555]This was what Museveni came to eradicate and perhaps which the framers wanted to remedy but unfortunately he was captured in the ponds of selfish interests which failed the fundamental change hope among natives looking at him as a traitor and hypocrite.

[1553] Male H.K Mabirizi and Others v Attorney General Constitutional Petition No 49 of 2017
[1554] Male Mabirizi and Others v Attorney General Supreme Court Constitution Appeal No 2 of 2018.
[1555] Idi Amin Takes power in Uganda. 1971 February 2nd. History.com editors. A&E Television Networks.

SCRAPPING OF TERM LIMITS

Article 105 of the 1995 Constitution (As amended) had clearly ring-fenced the five-year term limits for the office of a President, owing to Uganda's experience of personality cult presidents and totalitarianism. The Article 105, 1 & 2 succinctly stated thus:

1. A person elected President under this Constitution shall, subject to clause
2. Of this Article, hold office for a term of five years.
3. A person shall not be elected under this Constitution to hold office as President for more than two terms as prescribed by this Article.

Repeal of Article 105 (2)[1556] so as to give the president a third term (kisanja) and open-ended tenure was the most controversial and contentious amendment of Uganda's young constitution. The kisanja amendment proposal generated heated debates, protests, despondency and a deep sense of betrayal. Conversely, advocates of kisanja and open-ended tenure harped on the need for Museveni's continued stewardship and his 'progressive and visionary leadership' for the transformation of Uganda and for unity in East Africa.[1557]

To opponents, Museveni, the celebrated revolutionary fighter of past dictatorships, architect of the new constitution and on record for identifying Africa's problem being leaders overstaying in power [1558] was back-tracking to manipulate the constitution. But the proponents of lifting the term limits espoused the concept of a constitution as a 'living tree' that grows and adapts to contemporary dynamics, rather than that 'cast in stone' of textual rigidities like executive term limits that were not even in the Magna Carta. Bunya West MP William Kiwapama, for instance, reported that 'his people' saw in President Museveni a 'redeemer', hence the need to waive the restrictive term limits. Opponents like Betty Among (MP Apac women) retorted that MPs needed to transcend the simplistic reasoning of their rural constituents and contemplate why term limits were enshrined in the constitution[1559]. Advocates replied that wanainchi (citizens) should exercise their constitutional power to retain or change a leader, provided there were regular 'free and fair elections'. Museveni reiterated that: 'The issues of who leads Uganda is up to the people in regular elections'.[1560]

Parliamentary contestations over the removal of presidential term limits were bolstered by internal civil society and external pressures. On 23 March 2005, opposition groups organized a protest against the Third Term Bill, appealing to donor countries to exert pressure on the NRM government, which was accused of attempting to establish a 'dictatorial presidential monarchy'.

[1556] Constitution of Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As amended)
[1557] Sunday Vision, 6 February 2005
[1558] (Museveni 1989)
[1559] (The New Vision 10 February 2005:5)
[1560] The Daily Monitor 4 July 2005).

Foreign criticism mounted and Ugandans in the Diaspora Organized conferences and demonstrations against lifting presidential term limits. There were conferences in London, Sweden (27 August 2005) and North America (The Daily Monitor 27 September 2005). The US warned that: 'Democratization could suffer a setback if the NRM succeeds in removing presidential term limits from the constitution' (US State Department, Report, 2004/2005). The US Ambassador to Uganda, Jimmy Kolker, reportedly pointed out that President Bush had advised President Museveni about the Third Term and the need for a peaceful political transition in Uganda.

Before the British and Germans contended for control over the territory, Uganda had three different indigenous political systems: the Hima caste system, the Bunyoro royal clan system and the Buganda kingship system. In 1894, the British succeeded in establishing a protectorate and made the Buganda, also called the people of Buganda, administrators competent to collect taxes. A British-style high court of Uganda and an appeals court for all eastern African protectorates were established in 1902. At the same time, a special commissioner was installed to perform executive, legislative and judicial powers. In 1955, a constitutional monarchy with a ministerial government based on the British model and in 1957 political parties emerged and direct elections were held.

Uganda became an independent Commonwealth nation on October 9, 1962 under a constitution much influenced by the British. The constitution distributed powers between the centre and the regions, albeit disproportionately. The Buganda kingdom was given more powers at the expense of the other three kingdoms, namely the Ankole, Toro and Bunyoro, and the other districts. The powers granted to the four kingdoms also handicapped the Parliament, which was elected by direct universal suffrage, except for parliamentarians from Buganda who were indirectly elected through the Council of Buganda. Apart from the periodically elected Parliament, the constitution provided for a Cabinet, drawn from and responsible to Parliament, and defined the powers of major government organs, civil service and judiciary. One year later, an amendment introduced a ceremonial President to replace the Governor General as a head of state and Kabaka Mutesa became the first elected president on 9 October 1963.

The 1962 constitution was abrogated by Prime Minister Milton Obote in 1966, who declared himself President under an Interim Constitution of 1966. The Parliament was constituted into a Constituent Assembly and given a mandate to draft a new constitution for Uganda. On September 8, 1967, the new constitution came into force. It extended the life of the Parliament, declared the President then in office the President of Uganda for a term of 5 years. Other major changes by this constitution were the abolishment of the kingdoms and the introduction of a more centralized system of government. The election of Members of Parliament remained by direct universal suffrage across the entire country but the President was now elected indirectly by the Parliament.

Although the system of government had some democratic semblance, democratic principles were hardly observed in practice, and Obote ruled basically with army support. Shortly after the constitution of 1967, a state of emergency was declared and Uganda slowly shifted to one-party-rule under the Uganda People's Congress.

In 1971, General Idi Amin Dada seized power. Amin ruled the country through constitutional decrees and used the army as the main instrument of government. In 1979, Amin, too, was overthrown by a combination of Ugandan and Tanzanian forces. In the following years, the Ugandan military continued to participate actively in Ugandan political processes. In 1985 Obote was again elected president, but only to be deposed a year later by the Museveni-led National Resistance Movement – a rebel movement that had been fighting the regime for years.

On 21 December 1988 the National Resistance Council (NRC) enacted Statute No.5 of 1988 which established the Uganda Constitutional Commission and gave it responsibility to start the process of developing a new Constitution. The mandate of the Commission was to consult the people and make proposals for a democratic permanent constitution based on national consensus. In its final report of December 1992, the Commission stated that the majority of Ugandans preferred a Constituent Assembly directly elected by the people in order to be as full representative as possible and provide greater legitimacy. It proposed that an Assembly should be composed mainly of directly elected delegates plus representatives of some interest groups. The proposal was accepted by government and thus the Constituent Assembly consisted of 284 delegates elected by universal suffrage representing 214 electoral areas designated plus additional representatives of specific stakeholders. Nevertheless, some people feared that the delegates to the Constituent Assembly might tailor the constitution to suit their future political ambitions.

The elections to the Constituent Assembly took place in March 1994. Every registered voter who did not have a criminal record and could afford the required nominators and financial deposit was able to run for office. Apart from the decisions relating to national language, land, federalism and the political system, all provisions of the draft constitution were reached by consensus. The land question in Uganda emerged when the British took land away from the communities and gave it to a few individuals and was not resolved by the Constituent Assembly. The debate about the political system, on the other hand, was rooted in the bad experience of Ugandans with political parties in the post-independence era. On this basis, a "no party" politics, also known as "movement politics", was proposed. In this system, no one is denied the right to run for any political office of his or her choice. The stress is on personal merit and political parties are permitted to exist but are forbidden from electoral campaigning and sponsoring candidates. Movement politics were strictly opposed by multiparty supporters. As a compromise, the movement type of governance was agreed to be extended for another 5 years but at the end of 3 years a public debate should be held and after 4 years, the people of Uganda should choose between the two systems in a referendum. On the whole, the constitution making process in Uganda was highly participatory and an exercise to reconcile the society, reinstitute democracy, the rule of law and to place limits on misuse of state power.

E N T R E N C H E D P R O V I S I O N S

It's not in dispute that the 20th day of December 2017 marked the amendment of Article 102(b) of the Constitution releasing the chained hands of the Age limit. This followed the decision of Justices of the Constitution court that sat in Mbale. Before this court, there were a number of petitions made by various parties following parliamentary amendment of the above stated provision of the Constitution. The court sitting on 26th July 2018 dismissed the petitions. Having concluded their judgment, many appeals were submitted in the Supreme Court.

These were filed by Male H. K Mabirizi, Gerald karuhanga and 5 others and the appeal made by Uganda Law Society. It worth noting that these appeals were culminated and consolidated into one appeal which was Constitution Appeal No 2 of 2018 and all the grounds of Appeal presented in their memorandum of appeal were all merged an engulfed into six issues which were to be determined by Court. In all these appeals, the most adjoining point was on the validity of amendment following the procedure adopted by parliament and the circumstances that happened prior to the amendment not forgetting the historical developments of the military and other security agencies that invaded Parliament during the course of the debate on the Age limit bill natured and presented by Hon Rapheal Magyezi.

"The main issue was whether the learned justices of the constitution court miss directed themselves on the application of the basic structure doctrine."

It's on this point that I shall deal with the basic structured doctrine in line with the entrenched provisions of the constitution in its entirety relating to its importance limitation and manifestation in Uganda's 1995 Constitution born by the Constituent assembly in 1986 led by Justice Benjamin Odoki as he then was. Basically, my emphasis shall be placed on Article 260 which shall be the basis for other provisions which are entrenched in this Constitution.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

THE QUESTION OF POLITICAL REPRESENTATION: UGANDA'S TROUBLED HISTORY

The import of representation is the direct and indirect participation of citizens in the political and civic activities of their society. The principle of representation is stated in abstract and theoretical terms in Article 2 of the Constitution which stipulates that the power belongs to the people who shall exercise their sovereignty in accordance with the Constitution. In effect representation means the rights of people to choose their representatives who shall represent them at all levels of government i.e. from LC (Local Councils) at the grassroots to the election of President and MP's at national level.

Representation also imports the existence of popular will. The issue of representation entails a number of elements of both participatory and elective rights as well as the choice of modalities and processes for determining representation. Participating and elective rights are often covered under human rights and fundamental freedom which include:

i) The right to freedom of Assembly and Association under Article 29(1) paragraphs (d) and
ii) The right to participate directly or indirectly in the affairs of government under Article 38.
iii) The right to vote under Article 59.

The modalities of representation will invariably be elections and referendum by which the individual and the people chose those who will represent them in government and how they shall be governed.

Representation in Uganda has undergone dramatic changes since 1986. Prior to 1986, representation and election to public office was based on political parties platform and in effect representation and government was founded on candidature based on affiliation to political parties. However, since 1986, representation has been grounded or premised on the non-partisan principle in which the idea of individual merit is emphasized. Under the initial political system provided for under the Constitution and affirmed in 2000 by the referendum, the Movement political system is primarily premised on the principle of individual merit on the basis for the election to political office. This is stipulated in Article 70(1) (d) as the major attribute of the Movement political system. In effect, the individual merit principle was for many years the basis of representation in Uganda until subsequent events that altered it. Since its inception as the basis of representation however, the individual merit principle was under attack not just in political debates but also in petitions before the Courts of law.

It appears that from the very early years, the Movement government was to be the victim of court challenges. One of the earliest cases was Dr.Rwanyarare & 2 Ors V AG[1561]. In this case the Constituent Assembly Statute 6/1993 was unsuccessfully challenged. This was a constitutional petition by the UPC who sought to argue that the provisions adversely affected the right to free expression because campaigns on the basis of political parties or any other sectarian ground were outlawed and criminalized. Additionally, it was argued that the public would be deprived of the opportunity of hearing views except those considered right by government. It was argued that this violated the rights of assembly and association of the Petitioners which were guaranteed by Article 8 of the 1967 Constitution since they could not stand on individual merit as they belonged to their respective political parties. The Constitutional court held however, that the provisions were validly made by the NRC under LN No. 1/1986 and as such the Legal Notice was superior to the 1967 constitution and that rules made by the NRC to adapt the 1967 to the Legal Notice were valid. It was further held that the rules were temporary and part of an unusual and peculiar political process that would end with the promulgation of the new constitution. The court therefore expressed hope that at the end of the period, fresh considerations would arise and most likely during the debate of the draft constitution, all the burning issues would be resolved. Court also noted that the rights of the Petitioners of assembly and association were not absolute and could be restricted in the public interest. Mpagi Bahigeine J considered that the public interest in this case lay in the election of delegates to the Constituent Assembly to debate the Constitution for the good governance of the country and that this restriction was only transient and not permanent. The net effect was to facilitate the elections of Movement candidates to the CA.

Under the 1995 Constitution, it remained the basic argument that the individual merit principle remained a major factor of the restriction on multi-party activity especially given the provisions of Article 69, 70, 72, 269 and 271. This concern was raised in the case of Dr. Rwanyarare & Anor V AG[1562] in which the petitioners argued that the provisions of Article 69, 70, 72, 74, 269 and 271 were in contravention of their Constitutional rights to assembly and association under Article 29(i)(d) and (e) and 38 of the Constitution. In essence the argument was that since the elections had taken place on basis of the Movement system and specifically under the individual merit principle, this barred candidates based on political parties and therefore the right to association and assembly had been infringed upon. Court dismissed the petition on several grounds but the most significant was that the petition was incompetent since it purported to challenge the constitutionality of provisions of the Constitution.

[1561] MISC. APPLN. NO. 85 of 1993
[1562] Constitutional Petition 11/97

The individual merit principle as the basic foundation of the Movement system has been used in the election of the president and therefore replacing the quasi Westminster system that was previously in place for the president to be the leader of the party winning majority seats in parliament it has also been used for election of MP's and representatives at all levels of the local councils. In effect, the principle has become the basis for representation in present day Uganda.

There was always a question as to the effect and genuineness of the individual merit principle as a basis for representation and participation in the affairs of government even within the Movement camp itself. The first observation was that while the principle is stated in the Constitution it was sometimes sidelined in practice as illustrated in a number of instances.

i) election of Movement Chairman
ii) 2001 Presidential elections
iii) Candidatures for 2001 parliamentary election.
iv) 2001 Presidential elections.

The 2001 Presidential Elections

When Dr. Kiiza Besigye stood for the presidential 2001 elections, it was contended that the Movement was only supposed to field a single candidate in the personality of the incumbent Museveni in the Movement Delegates Conference. The arguments raised were that fielding 2 candidates was detrimental for the Movement system. It was not substantiated what this actual detriment was or would be. This was a great test to the principle of individual merit. As a result of the attempt to endorse a single candidate for the 2001 elections, a petition was filed before the Constitutional Court to challenge that attempt i.e. Onyango Odongo V AG CP 1/2000.This new development put the principle at stake and for the first time led the public to believe that the Movement did not itself subscribe to the very system it had so much endeavored to give publicity as being the better alternative to political parties.

Candidature for 2001 parliamentary elections.

The contention here was that in a constituency where 2 movement candidates were standing, one of them should stand down for the other who has better chances of winning. The issue of fielding a single candidate once again resurfaced and once again the principle of individual merit was not only tested, it was equally tremendously abused.

The other reason why it was thought that the principle could not work was that the politics in the country had now become polarized into Movementism Vs Multipartism replacing the previous polarization that was primarily between the political parties i.e. DP, UPC etc. The effect of this new polarization was that candidature for representation would eventually be understood in terms of whether the candidate ascribed to the Movement ideologies or was a staunch multipartist. The implication was that the individual merit principle was virtually rendered irrelevant and inconsequential in the electoral process and as a basis of representation

The principle of individual merit was this notwithstanding the foundation for the election of representatives since 1986 and became a fundamental principle of the Movement political system under Article 70(1)(d). The principle required that the individual competence or personal merit of the individual rather than political affiliation. On the other hand, it was considered that the principle of individual merit was inimical to freedoms of association and assembly as a basis for representation. This particular contention was raised by the petitioners in the Rwanyarare 1 case in 1994 on the election of delegates and representation to the CA and in Rwanyarare 2 in 1997 as regards the election of MPs and representation in parliament.

Uganda has also had several referendums which appeared to many to be sources of near political anarchy. One of the most important referendum cases was the case of Paul Kawanga Ssemogerere & Anor. V AG.[1563] The Referendum and Other Provisions Act No.2 of 1999 was challenged in this case. The AG raised a number of preliminary objections to its hearing on the merit. The Constitutional court upheld the objections and dismissed the Petition. The Petitioners appealed to the Supreme Court which reversed the ruling of the constitutional court and ordered that the petitioners be heard on the merits. The petition was eventually heard by the constitutional court. In a unanimous argument, it was held that the Referendum and Other Provisions Act, 1999 was passed in a manner inconsistent with Articles 88 and 89 of the constitution and was therefore null and void. That the Act was passed without the necessary quorum. The court added that the voice voting method of shouting 'ayes' or 'no' as applied in parliament contravened section 89 (1) of the constitution. This case indicated that the courts were increasingly standing up to the Executive and Legislature and it abuses of power.

NB: However, amidst the hearing another referendum law was passed before the challenged law was declared null and void. The new referendum law called The New Referendum (Political Systems) Act 9 of 2000 was presented to Parliament on June 7th 2000 and within 2 hours debated, read three times and passed into law. Under section 29 of the Act, all actions taken or purported to be taken in good faith for purposes of the referendum required to be held under Article 271 of the constitution but before publication of the Act in the gazette were deemed to have been taken or made under the Act. The new law was in substance a replica of the old one.

This new referendum law was immediately challenged by the case of James Rwanyarare And

[1563] Constitutional Appeal No. 3 of 1999

Badru Wegulo V AG[1564] The petitioners sought an interim order to prohibit the holding of an interim order to prohibit the holding of the referendum until the final disposal of the case. The background was that on July 2, 1999 parliament passed the Referendum and Other Provisions At in accordance with Article 271 (4) of the constitution. On June 7, 2000 it passed the Referendum (Political Systems) Act. On June 29th 2000, the second respondent organized and conducted a referendum. The petition was however not heard until the referendum was completed and was eventually dismissed in November, 2000. In the judgment of the Constitutional Court held inter alia that the enactment of 9 of 2000 did not contravene Article 79 (1) and (3) of the Constitution. Good governance required that since the legislation originally passed to cover the referendum was being challenged in Court, a specific Act had to be enacted for the holding of a referendum on political systems within the time limits set by the Constitution.

The political scene was also kept busier by the case of Ssemogerere & Zachary Olum V AG[1565]

In this case, the Petitioners sought a number of declarations and orders with respect to the constitutionality of the referendum on political systems and the Referendum and Other Provisions Act No.2 of 1999. Particularly, they contested the choice of a 'political system' through a referendum or an election under Article 69 of the Constitution as being inconsistent with and in contravention of Article 20, 21, 29 (1) (a), (b), (d), (e), 38 (2), 70 (f), 72 (1) and 75 of the Constitution. At the hearing of the petition, the AG raised several objections amongst which was that the constitutional court had no jurisdiction to interprete conflicting provisions such as Articles 269 and 29 and to reconcile them. The majority of their Lordships agreed with the objection. 2 of their Lordships dissented arguing that the Constitutional court has powers to interprete and harmonize the constitution which responsibility could not be abdicated from in the vain hope that other authorities will amend the Constitution and harmonize it. By a majority of 2 to 3, the Petition was dismissed. The majority view was that the Referendum provided for a free and fair contest that enabled both the multiparty and movement system advocates to organize as individuals or groups under referendum committees for purposes of canvassing for the referendum.

The 2 dissenting Justices, Twnomujuni and Okello argued that the critical point was not whether both sides had constituted their national referendum committees but whether the law as it stood provided both sides equal opportunity to constitute their campaign machinery and the national referendum committee. In their considered opinion, political parties were legally incapable of participating in any exercise to form the referendum committees and would so remain so long as Article 269 remained an interim provision for their bondage. To them, the framers of the constitution could not have intended such a monstrous result. They also noted that the Constitutional Court had powers and responsibilities to interpret and harmonize the Constitution and could not abdicate from this duty in the vain hope that other authorities will amend the Constitution or harmonize it.

[1564] Constitutional Petition No. 4 of 2000.
[1565] Constitutional Petition No.6 Of 1999

On August 31st 200, following the June 29th 2000 referendum, the Constitutional (Amendment) Act 2000 was passed to make legal the legislation under which the referendum was held i.e. The Referendum (Political) Systems) Act, 2000. The Democratic Party petitioned the Constitutional Court in Ssemogerere & Anor. V AG[1566] challenging the new Act but lost on a majority of 3 to 2. The court pronounced itself only on procedural issues and declared that it did not have jurisdiction to interpret one provision of the Constitution as against the other. The Democratic Party then appealed to the Supreme Court which on January 29th 2004 in Ssemogerere & Anor. V AG[1567] held that the Constitutional (Amendment) Act, 2000 was unconstitutional because of the procedures followed when it was enacted.

Thereafter, government claimed that the decision had been based on false information and that the Court should review its decision. Government claimed that the Constitutional (Amendment) Bill, 200 was not passed and assented to on the same day and that the certificate of the bill existed and further that the number of votes was physically counted rather than relying on a voice vote. Thus on August 3rd 2004, the government made an application to the Supreme Court to submit this additional evidence. The Supreme Court unanimously dismissed the application.

This decision in turn laid the ground for an unprecedented challenge against the Movement system. On June 22nd 2002, 2 weeks after the Act authorizing the June 29th referendum was passed, the high ranking leaders of DP again petitioned the Constitutional Court. Their contention was that the Act violated the constitution. On 17th October 2000 when the petition came up for hearing it was mutually agreed that that the parties should await a pronouncement on the constitutionality of the Constitutional (Amendment) Act, 2000. This decision however was not handed down by the Supreme Court until 29th January, 2004. Then on 25th June 2004, the Constitutional Court unanimously held that the Referendum Act 2000 violated numerous provisions of the 1995 Constitution. Accordingly, anything which had been done or which had purported to be done under the Authority of that Act was invalid. That to rule otherwise would amount to authorizing the stampeding of Parliament as the case was to pass kangaroo style legislation oblivious to the requirements of the Constitution and to perform unconstitutional acts under the authority of such legislation. This the Court found unacceptable.

[1566] Constitutional Petition No. 7 of 1999
[1567] Constitutional Petition No. 4 of 2002

The decision caused stampede in government circles because its ultimate effect was that the Act being invalid the referendum held under it was also invalid. Accordingly, no political system was put into place by the said referendum and ultimately the current government was illegally in power.
After the decision, President Museveni again publicly showed his anger at the decision and at the Justices. He vowed to disregard the decision and promised to deal with judges who were taking it upon themselves to usurp the power of the people granted to them by the constitution. This was followed by a demonstration by supporters of the Movement government. On the other hand, the Chief Justice called upon the government together with its organs to ensure that the courts in the dispensation of their judicial functions were not intimidated.
Following these events, the State appealed to the Supreme Court. In Attorney General V Ssemogerere &Ors, the Supreme Court over turned the decision of the Constitutional Court (which had proceeded along the lines of the doctrine of prospective ruling by finding that anything done by the illegal government was itself illegal) and declared that whereas the Act which set up the referendum had been unconstitutional, the results of the 2000 referendum were nevertheless valid

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS OF 2001: NEW CHALLENGES

The presidential election of 2001 also helped to bring to the fore front the question of political representation and to test the judiciary even more. In those elections Y.K. Museveni the incumbent president had been declared by the Electoral Commission as winner with a 69.3% majority over his closest and bitter rival Dr. Besigye who only polled 27.8%. The elections however were allegedly characterized by country wide electoral violence, malpractice and disenfranchisement. Dr. Besigye challenged the election of Museveni in Besigye V Museveni & The Electoral Commission[1568] wherein he alleged rigging of elections. The Supreme Court after a 2 weeks hearing dismissed the petition by majority of 3 to 2. The majority were convinced that although there had no doubt been irregularities in the elections to which they could not shut their eyes, they had not substantially affected the final outcome.
It was during this petition that it was also discovered that Article 104 (2) of the Constitution was seen to be fraught with practical difficulties. Where as Article 104 (1) allows any aggrieved candidate to petition the Supreme Court for an order declaring that the person elected was not validly elected, Article 104 (2) then unreastically proceeds to require such petition to be lodged in the Supreme Court Registry within 10 days after the declaration of the results. The Besigye petition showed that this can be an insurmountable task. In his case, the lawyers had to move from district to district taking evidence from various people. Many believe that had there been the chance to seek more evidence, the result may perhaps have convinced the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court is also required under Article 104 (3) to dispose of the petition in no more than 30 days from the date of its filing. It is also always opined that for a matter so grave and a matter going to the root of the question of representation of the people, that is perhaps so short a time within which to come to a well considered decision.

[1568] Election Petition No.1 of 2001

The political scene was yet to be dormant in Uganda after all these events. The 1995 Constitution under Article 271 (4), Parliament was mandated to make a law to give effect to that Article. The Article provided that the first presidential, parliamentary, local government and other public elections were after the promulgation of the constitution were to be held under the Movement political system. It was also provided that during the last month of the 4th year of the term of parliament referred to in paragraph (2) of that Article, a referendum was to be held t determine the political system the people f Uganda wish to adopt.

The first attempt at giving effect to this Article came with the tabling of the Political Organizations Bill in 1998 but it was never carried through. In June 2002, a new Political Parties Organization Act (PPOA) was then passed. It among others provided that no party or organization could open branches below national level and further that no party or political organization was allowed to hold more than one national conference in a year. The parties were further prohibited from holding public meetings except for the national conference, executive committees, seminars and conferences at national level.

This Act was later challenged by Paul Kawanga Ssemogerere & 5 Ors V AG[1569] , in which among other issues the Petitioners asked the Court to determine 'whether or not Sections 18 and 19 of the Act established a one party state, the party being the movement contrary to Article 75 of the Constitution'. The Petitioners sought to distinguish between the Movement refereed to and provided for in Article 70 and the Movement provided for in the Movement Act. Their contention was that the former was a political system while the latter was a political organization. The Constitutional Court accepted these arguments and found Sections 18 and 19 of the PPOA to be unconstitutional. The government appealed to the Supreme Court but on June 21st 2004 withdrew the appeal.

This development allowed political parties to participate more freely in the political affairs although they still had to register with the Registrar General.

The political scene was again full of activity. In February 2001, the State set up a Constitutional Review Commission (CRC). Its report was extensively debated by the relevant stakeholders. The Government subsequently issued a White Paper based on the Report which was debated y Parliament's Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee. On 15th February 2005, the Attorney General tabled an Omnibus constitutional amendment Bill before Parliament the object of which was to amend a wide range of constitutional provisions at ago. While the Bill was still before the Legal and Parliamentary Affairs Committee for consideration, a petition emerged challenging the constitutionality of the Omnibus Bill. This was in Miria Matembe, Ben Wacha & Abdu Katuntu V AG[1570]. At the time of hearing the petition, the Committee had not yet submitted its report on the Bill and the Attorney General contended that the petition was thus premature. The majority of the Constitutional Court accepted this view and held that before a bill is enacted into law and becomes an Act of Parliament, it is evidently premature to resort to court to challenge its constitutionality. Court also stressed the importance of the doctrine of separation of powers holding that the Constitution does not require the court to supervise the functioning of the legislature in every aspect and at all the stages of its work. Care must be taken to ensure that the principle of separation of powers is duly observed by the 3 arms of government to avoid erosion of each other's constitutional functions. The function of the court is not to interfere in the operations of the executive and the legislature but to ensure that they comply with their mandate. It was noted that 'the executive and legislature must be left to perform their constitutional duties without undue interference from the courts. This would guard against overzealous litigants from dragging these government organs to court prematurely each time a bill is tabled in Parliament. There is need to avoid unnecessary obstruction of the conduct of the affairs of state. We are mindful of the mandate of the Court to ensure that the Legislature complies with the legislative procedure of Parliament to keep it on the constitutional track. However, this must be done within the constitutionally recognized parameters'. Mpagi Bahigeine JA in her dissenting judgment thought that whereas separation of powers must be respected, in a Constitutional state, courts are the fountain of constitutionalism and have to remain vigilant about legislative procedures. They could not simply close their eyes because it was too early in the process to interfere. Despite these strong words, the petition was dismissed on a 3 to 2 majority.

[1569] Constitutional Petition No. 5 of 2002

The government eventually decided to withdraw the Omnibus Bill alleging that it had done so after wide consultations with government leaders, political parties and all stake holders.

[1570] Constitutional Petition No. 5 of 2005

THE 2005 REFERENDUM ON POLITICAL PARTIES

This referendum was meant to relax the restrictions that had been placed on political parties. Article 74 (1) of the 1995 Constitution provides for the holding of a referendum if requested by a resolution of more than half the members of Parliament. On May 3rd 2005, parliament passed a resolution directing the Electoral Commission to organize a referendum to enable Ugandans to decide if they wanted to retain or to change the Movement system. On May 5th 2005, the EC received the resolution and began making preparations.

During these preparations, the petition of Okello Okello & 6 Ors V AG & Anor.[1571] The Petitioners based their petition on the decision in Paul Kawanga Ssemogerere & 5 ors V AG[1572] in which the Court declared the Movement and its organs a Political Party. The Petitioners argument was that since the no-party Movement System was a legal fiction and did not really exist as such, there was then no basis for the referendum. They claimed that Article 69 (1) and (2) (a) of the Constitution which provides for the holding of a referendum to choose and adopt the Movement Political system offends the constitution. They wanted the court to stop the AG and the EC to organize the referendum. The court dismissed the applicant on a 3 to 2 majority. In its opinion, the holding of such referendum was a constitutional means enabling Ugandans to determine their political destiny. Despite the repugnancy of holding a referendum on human rights and freedoms, the one party system is so entrenched that it must be changed through a referendum. While there are cheaper ways of changing the prevailing political system, that was a decision for the Parliament to take and not the courts. The Electoral Commission was accordingly simply implementing a constitutional requirement and the impugned provisions of the Referendum and Other Provisions Act, 2005 did not in any way infringe any provision of the Constitution. The Petitioners appealed to the Supreme Court but the appeal was incapable of being heard as there was no sufficient quorum on the bench following the retirement of Kato JSC.

The greatest challenge to the new political opening up has been that the government has manifested its unwillingness to let political parties assemble even after the referendum decided that political space be opened up. This has been evidenced by the massive way in which the State has continued to disperse political rallies of the opposition political parties.

[1571] Constitutional Petition No. 4 of 2005
[1572] Constitutional Petition No. 5 of 2002

FORMAT AND PATTERNS OF ELECTIONS AS REGARDS REPRESENTATION

The basic function of representation is to ensure that peoples of a particular constituency and interest group are effectively and adequately represented. This therefore requires that the persons enjoined to represent the constituencies have the mandate of the people and that mandate is reflected in the popular will of those people. The issues and questions have arisen with regard to the format for the representation of interest groups by the use of electoral colleges. These particularly was regards to representation in parliament of representatives for women, the army, youth, workers and person with disabilities under Article 78(1) paragraphs (b) and (c). Consider the fact that the Electoral College for army representatives is the Army Council which is directly influenced by the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces. As such the representation of the army cannot be said to fully be effective. Similarly, the electoral colleges for women representatives usually constitutes of a bunch of elite women in urban centers. The grass root peasant woman is not only denied a chance to vote and exercise her will but even the right to stand.

THE COMING OF POLITICAL PARTIES

Regards the multiparty politics in Uganda, they provided for in Article 71 of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, Regards the literature review available, we look at privacy in the political system; perspectives from political science and Economics.

The IFES report of 2005 shows that in 2005 a referendum on resorting multiparty politics was held in Uganda on 4th May, 2005, while at the polls the voters voted on the question, ‘’Do you agree to open up the political space to allow those who wish to join different organisations/ parties to do so to compete for political power. The results were as in the table below,

CHOICE	VOTES	%
For	3,643,223	92.44
Against	297,865	7.56
Invalid/ blank votes	93,144	-
TOTAL	4,034,232	100
Registered voters/ turnout	8,524,234	47.33

Source. IFES

Following this referendum, a number of political parties begun to mushroom in the country following the enactment of the Political Parties and Organisation Act, 2005, an act to make provision for the regulating the financing and functioning of political parties and organisations, their formation, registration, membership and organisation under Article 71,72 and 73 of the Constitution; the prescription of a code of conduct for political parties and the organisations and the establishment of national consultative forum for Political Parties and Organisation Act 2002 and for related matters. This also builds the basis for the study since the parties in the study are legally registered in Uganda and are entitled.

THEY MAKE DESOLATION AND CALL IT PEACE- (UBI SOLITUDINUM FACIUNT PACEMAPPELLANT)

They make desolation and they call it peace The above attribute is attributed to Tacitus or (Gaius Cornelius Tacitus; C. 56-After 117AD, who was a Roman Orator. Lawyer and Senator) / historian to describe the devastation of Britain by the Roman Empire in the first century AD. It came after the Romans had actually invaded England and caused a lot of damage by plundering, butchering, stealing and making a complete waste of the area. They did it in such a way that even their fellow Romans looked and wondered how one could actual conquer and destroy a nation.

The same can be said about the so called liberators of our nation, much plunder has taken place within and out Uganda, a good example is the plunder that took place in Congo where the Ugandan soldiers unitary invaded a sovereign country, plundered its natural resources such as gold and timber[1573].

Albeit to note that such devastations stimulated by avarice have only benefited a few to the detriment of the majority. They have ravaged, slaughtered and usurped several resources under false titles under the disguise that “We now have sleep” “Twebaka kutulo”.

Interestingly, all these are illusions had been foreseen by the Chief Executive who is remembered to have said, “The problem with most African leaders stay in power for a long time”. Whether or not that is true is self-explanatory well evidenced by the Chief Executive having stayed in power for over 35 years. On the problem we face as a nation is lack of a stainable legacy because in the end, we learn nothing and forget nothing.

If a nation fails to build a legacy beyond an individual, such a nation is bound to fail and therefore the much need to create systems and rules that can give us our latitude and longitude “the in that shelters for the night is not the journey’s end. The law, like the traveler, must be ready for the morrow. It must have a principle of growth as stated by Benjamin Cardozo in 1924.

In instance what matters in every nation is the ideal of sustainability, every nation should strive to live beyond an individual because the legacy that you build today should not only affect our individual's selfish gains but for greater prosperity.

[1573] Refer to the Uganda-Congo Case where Uganda was sued by Congo for the illegal entry into Congo and consequent plunder of their national resources.

This temporary custody of executive power is only a mantle to act on behalf of the greater good in securing a sustainable tomorrow. If a leader premises all ambitions on today, then there will be no tomorrow. And the dream of every nation is that everyone's child regardless of the background should be able to dream of becoming a Chief Executive one day.

Tacticus, Agricola, 30.4 stated that Robbers of the world, now that the earth is insufficient for their all-devastating hands they probe even the sea, if their enemy is rich, they are greedy, if he is poor, they thirst for dominion, neither East nor west has satisfied them; alone of mankind they are equally covetous of poverty and wealth. Robbery, slaughter and plunder they falsely Name Empire; they make a desert and they call it peace.

Different interpretations of the dynamics of Roman conquest have been deployed to legitimize modern empire-building as just, defensive or accidental, and just as often cited in condemnations of overseas aggression or gunboat diplomacy. However, with the exception of Fascist propaganda presenting Roman domination of the Mediterranean as the template and justification for a new Italian imperialism, and Hitler's avowed admiration for their aggression ('In every peace treaty, the next war is already built in. That is Rome! That is true statesmanship!'), Roman conquests were not proposed or taken as models for actual modern practice.

The manner in which the Roman Empire was ruled was a quite different matter; indeed, Roman conquests were frequently excused as the necessary means to the establishment of peace and civilization across Europe, and modern imperialism justified because it created the possibility of equaling Rome's achievement as a ruler of other nations in other regions of the world. Rome's exemplary status as an empire was based above all on its longevity and the absence of serious internal opposition or conflict, and this was attributed to its benevolent and beneficent impact on the areas it had conquered.

As the English historian J.R. Seeley put it, 'Imperialism, introducing system and unity, gave the Roman world in the first place internal tranquility.' This theme was especially popular in nineteenth- and early twentieth-century British commentaries on empire: 'it's imperial system, alike in its differences and similarities, lights up our own Empire, for example in India, at every turn'. The example was not taken as universally relevant; in contrast to the British Dominions, the Romans.

These references to Roman rule constantly return to three crucial points: the establishment of order and peace, the integration of the conquered natives into the system, and the bringing of civilizations to primitive regions. For a number of these writers, the first of these is demonstrably the most important, both as the basis for future development and as an alibi for the undeniable disruption and destruction of conquest.

Wars, even if they once occurred, no longer seem real; on the contrary, stories about them are interpreted more as myths by the many who hear them. If anywhere an actual clash occurs along the border, as is only natural in the immensity of a great empire, because of the madness of the Getae or the misfortune of the Libyans or the wickedness of those around the Red Sea, who are unable to enjoy the blessings they have, then simply like myths, they themselves quickly pass and the stories about them. So great is your peace, though war was traditional among you. (Oration 26 'To Rome', 70–1).

It is indeed difficult to administer a vast empire unless it is turned over to one man, as to a father. In any event, the Romans and their allies have never lived and prospered in such peace and plenitude as Augustus afforded them, from the time that he assumed absolute authority; and now his son and successor Tiberius continues his legacy. (Geography, 6.4.2)

The natives were adapting themselves to orderly Roman ways and were becoming accustomed to holding markets and were meeting in peaceful assemblies. They had not, however, forgotten their ancestral habits, their native customs, their old life of independence or the power derived from weapons. Hence, so long as they were learning these customs gradually and by the way, one might say, under careful surveillance, they were not disturbed by the change in their way of life and were becoming different without knowing it. But when Quintilius Varus became governor in Germany and thus administered the affairs of those peoples, he strove to change them more rapidly. (Dio, 65.18.2–3)

Controlling the fairest parts of land and sea, they have on the whole tried to preserve their empire by diplomatic means rather than to extend their power without limit over poor and profitless barbarian tribes, some of whom I have seen negotiating at Rome in order to offer themselves as subjects. But the emperor would not receive them because they are useless to him. (Appian, Roman History, preface vii)

The process that had begun in the later centuries of the republic, whereby military glory ceased to be an essential source of political power and legitimacy, continued; expansionism ceased to be taken for granted as a goal, and became a matter of policy debate. More importantly, the fierce competition for glory had largely ceased.

Emperors had no contemporary rivals for status; they matched themselves against their predecessors or against an image of the ideal emperor, and so could be content with a single conquest in the course of their reign rather than year-on-year competitive slaughter. In order that a population scattered and uncivilized, and proportionately ready for war, might be habituated by comfort to peace and quiet, he would exhort individuals and assist communities to erect temples, market places and houses; he praised the energetic, rebuked the indolent, and the rivalry for his complements took the place of coercion. (Agricola, 21.1)

The province of Asia must be mindful of the fact that if it were not a part of our empire it would have suffered every sort of misfortune that foreign wars and domestic unrest can bring. And since it is quite impossible to maintain the empire without taxation, let Asia not grudge its part of the revenues in return for permanent peace and tranquility. (Letters to his Brother Quintus, 1.1.34)

Pliny to Trajan: We have celebrated with appropriate rejoicing, sir, the day of your accession, whereby you preserved the Empire; and have offered prayers to the gods to keep you in health and prosperity on behalf of the human race, whose security and happiness depends on your safety. We have also administered the oath of allegiance to the troops in the usual form, and found the provincials eager to take it too as a proof of their loyalty. If we oppose them, we shall alienate from ourselves and from the state an order that has deserved extremely well of us… and yet if we yield to them in everything, we shall be acquiescing in the utter ruin of those whose security, and indeed whose interests, we are bound to protect. (Letters to his Brother Quintus, 1.1.32)

In your province there are a great many who are deceitful and unstable, and trained by a long course of servitude to show an excess of sycophancy. What I say is that they should all of them be treated as gentlemen, but that only the best of them should be attached to you by ties of hospitality and friendship; unrestricted intimacies with them are not so much to be trusted, for they dare not oppose our wishes, and they are jealous not only of our countrymen but even of their own. (Letters to Quintus, 1.1.16)

I said I believed the day would come when our foreign subjects would be sending deputations to our people, asking for the repeal of the extortion court. Were there no such court, they imagine that any one governor would merely carry off what was enough for himself and his family; whereas with the courts as they now are, each governor carries off what will be enough to satisfy himself, his advocates and supporters, and his judges and their president; and this is a wholly unlimited amount. They feel that they may meet the demands of a greedy man's cupidity, but cannot meet those of a guilty man's acquittal. (I.41)

A proconsul need not entirely refrain from 'guest-gifts' (xenia), but only set some limit, not to refrain entirely in surly fashion nor to exceed the limit in grasping fashion… For it is too uncivil to accept from nobody, but contemptible to take from every quarter, and grasping to accept everything. (Digest, 1.16.6.3)

Timing is everything, according to the old adage. Yet in the field of classical studies there is a real hesitation to see a correspondence between the Judean rebellion against Rome in 66 C.E. and the literature and monuments produced at Rome subsequently, except when a Roman author explicitly mentions the ruined city of Jerusalem or one of its refugees (such as the Judean priest and general turned historian, Josephus), or when discussing the Arch of Titus, which displays obvious artifacts from the temple in Jerusalem. More subtle echoes of the effects of this war are difficult to prove when doing analysis of the Roman texts, since classics scholars are less apt to apprehend veiled references to Judean affairs in any text, especially canonical works such as the writings of Tacitus. It is as if classicists today were channeling Tertullian, with a slight alteration: "What indeed has Rome [instead of 'Athens'] to do with Jerusalem?" A lot, it turns out, and timing is everything.

Tacitus's most famous phrase about Roman imperialism, "When they make a desert, they call it peace," offers an excellent opportunity to analyze how timing might, partially at least, explain its inspiration and meaning. This senatorial historian survived the murderous reign of Domitian towards the end of the first century to enjoy the relative calm and success of the empire under Nerva and Trajan at the very end of the first into the early part of the second century.

The war in Judea lingered as a memory throughout the careers of all three of these emperors, with Domitian commemorating the triumph of his dead brother Titus, the conqueror of Jerusalem, on the famous Arch, while also allowing strip-searches of men to see if they were Judean and thus liable to pay the postwar tax. Nerva, however, advertised on coins that he was rescinding the power of false accusations made against people in order to force them to pay the post-war tax into the Fiscus Iudaicus, while Trajan eventually had to deal with a rebellion involving Judeans in Cyrene in 116 C.E. that echoed the troubles of decades before. Tacitus surely experienced the events related to the Judeans first-hand at Rome, where he served as a senator from the time of Domitian's father, Vespasian, and wrote his five works. In one of these, his Histories, he displays his knowledge about the Judean people and their mores at the beginning of Book Five, but sadly the text is abruptly lost during his description of the siege of Jerusalem and the counterpart revolt of Civil is in Germany. Suffice it to say that Tacitus lived through these times and clearly recognized that the Judeans, whom we nowadays call the Jews, were part of the history of his own people, the Romans.

It is in his earliest text that we find Tacitus's denunciation of Roman imperialism, a biography of his father-in-law, Gnaeus Julius Agricola, published around 98 C.E.4 The scene comes when Agricola is leading a military expedition into modern day Scotland where he is about to encounter the local warriors at Mons Graupius. Tacitus allows the Caledonian chief Calgacus to rally the troops with a scathing indictment of Roman actions in Britain. The "cynical," as Martin Goodman calls him, Roman senator is putting these words into the enemy's mouth;5 there were no transcripts of any Caledonian speech, so we are left with a Roman senator creating a speech for an enemy character ranting in hyper-eloquent rhetoric against the Roman army. Calgacus states:

Whenever I consider the origin of this war and the necessities of our position, I have a sure confidence that this day, and this union of yours, will be the beginning of freedom to the whole of Britain….But there are no tribes beyond us, nothing indeed but waves and rocks, and the yet more terrible Romans, from whose oppression escape is vainly sought by obedience and submission. Robbers of the world, having by their universal plunder exhausted the land, they rifle the deep. If the enemy be rich, they are rapacious; if he be poor, they lust for dominion; neither the east nor the west has been able to satisfy them. Alone among post-war tax into the Fiscus Iudaicus, while Trajan eventually had to deal with a rebellion involving Judeans in Cyrene in 116 C.E. that echoed the troubles of decades before. Tacitus surely experienced the events related to the Judeans first-hand at Rome, where he served as a senator from the time of Domitian's father, Vespasian, and wrote his five works.

In one of these, his Histories, he displays his knowledge about the Judean people and their mores at the beginning of Book Five, but sadly the text is abruptly lost during his description of the siege of Jerusalem and the counterpart revolt of Civilis in Germany. Suffice it to say that Tacitus lived through these times and clearly recognized that the Judeans, whom we nowadays call the Jews, were part of the history of his own people, the Romans.

It is in his earliest text that we find Tacitus's denunciation of Roman imperialism, a biography of his father-in-law, Gnaeus Julius Agricola, published around 98 C.E. The scene comes when Agricola is leading a military expedition into modern day Scotland where he is about to encounter the local warriors at Mons Graupius. Tacitus allows the Caledonian chief Calgacus to rally the troops with a scathing indictment of Roman actions in Britain. The "cynical," as Martin Goodman calls him, Roman senator is putting these words into the enemy's mouth; there were no transcripts of any Caledonian speech, so we are left with a Roman senator creating a speech for an enemy character ranting in hyper-eloquent rhetoric against the Roman army. Calgacus states:

Whenever I consider the origin of this war and the necessities of our position, I have a sure confidence that this day, and this union of yours, will be the beginning of freedom to the whole of Britain….But there are no tribes beyond us, nothing indeed but waves and rocks, and the yet more terrible Romans, from whose oppression escape is vainly sought by obedience and submission. Robbers of the world, having by their universal plunder exhausted the land, they rifle the deep. If the enemy be rich, they are rapacious; if he be poor, they lust for dominion; neither the east nor the west has been able to satisfy them. Alone among by monumentalizing Peace/ Pax after the total destruction of an enemy and an enemy's land, Romans reshaped landscape both at the site of battle and back home in the capital as well, bringing the conquests home, so to speak.

The Judean historian Josephus's account of the revolt in Judea is a primary witness to the Roman propensity to turn a place into a desert in the name of "peace." For several years before and after the dedication of the Temple of Peace in 75 C.E., Josephus wrote his history of the war, articulating the effects of Roman military might in terms related to the landscape of Judea that we find in Calgacus's speech: the "desert" as an image of war's destructive nature, especially when waged by Romans. The desert, however, plays a different role in the Judean scriptural tradition and identity formation, one celebrating the desert as a place of prophecy and even salvation for the Judean people.

Josephus melds his interpretation of this scriptural tradition with the ambivalent Roman vision of its imperial mission, as described later in Tacitus. This blend of cultural identities formed in landscape culminates in Josephus's text out in the desert at Masada just as it does physically at the Temple of Peace in Rome. The timing of this temple's dedication and the publication of Josephus's Judean War in the late 70's to early 80's have never been taken into account when discussing influences on Tacitus creating his most famous aphorism on imperialism. The time has come for a deeper examination of the historical context.

MONUMENTALIZING WAR AND PEACE

When Titus Flavius Vespasianus gained control of Rome after defeating two internal enemies, his competitors in the Roman civil war of 69 and the Judeans in the east, the emperor faced a challenge quite similar to that of Octavian exactly one hundred years before: how to represent this double victory through monuments. In some respects, the ensuing pax Flavia was a response to, an emulation of, and perhaps even a competition with the historical precedent of the pax Augusta and its monuments.

In a recent popularizing book, The Archaeology of War, the editors imply the similarity between Octavian and Vespasian when they cleverly embed a feature box on monuments to the first-century Judean War, the Arch of Titus and the Colosseum, into a chapter on "The Spoils of Actium" set up by Octavian in Greece. In the main body of this chapter, the authors Murray and Petsas discuss a massive war memorial dedicated by Octavian in 29 B.C.E. at his new city Nikopolis, Victory City, on the site of his old command post near Cape Actium where his fleet defeated Antony and Cleopatra.

After the archaeologists cut back the weeds from the monument that were still radioactive from the fallout of the Chernobyl disaster, they discovered twenty three slots of the original thirty three to thirty five that would have held the bronze rams of the defeated enemy ships, much like those on the Rostra in the Roman Forum, except far bigger. A huge inscription above this impressive display of rams ran 165 feet and announced that "IMPERATOR CAESAR … CONSECRATED TO NEPTUNE AND MARS THE CAMP FROM WHICH HE SET FORTH TO ATTACK THE ENEMY NOW ORNAMENTED WITH NAVAL SPOILS."

At home, Augustus continued this trend of honoring Mars by building a remarkable forum in downtown Rome, the focus of which was a temple to Mars Ultor. Containing cult statues of Mars, Venus, and the deified Julius Caesar, it was dedicated in 2 B.C.E. and fulfilled a vow Augustus had made forty years before to commemorate his vengeance against Caesar's assassins. Richard Beacham reports that "The completion of this complex…was celebrated with magnificent games (repeated annually thereafter on May 12), including the lusus Troiae and slaughter of 260 lions in the circus, gladiatorial combats in the Saepta, and a great naumachia, staged in a huge basin constructed beside the Tiber (Suet. Aug. 43.1; Dio 55.10.7-8; Ovid Ars Amat. 1.171-72)." Augustus himself explained in his Res Gestae (Achievements) that of all the many buildings he either restored or built from scratch (RG 19-21), "I built the temple of Mars the Avenger and the Forum Augustum on private ground from the proceeds of [war] booty."

War, however, found its balance in peace under the Augustan regime, since the Senate had also decreed in 13 B.C.E. that a magnificent Altar of Augustan Peace, Ara Pacis Augustae, which included a depiction of the god of war, Mars, be built on the Campus Martius to celebrate his return from pacifying Spain and Gaul, according to his Res Gestae.20 Augustus boasts:

It was the will of our ancestors that the gateway of Janus Quirinus should be shut when victories had secured peace (pax) by land and sea throughout the whole empire of the Roman people; from the foundation of the city down to my birth, tradition records that it was shut only twice, but while I was the leading citizen the senate resolved that it should be shut on three occasions. Thus, an ancient ritual was revived as a way of linking the presently peaceful Augustan Rome back to the good old days of King Numa and the middle Republic.

H.J. Rose has observed about this Augustan personification of political peace as Pax: Scarcely heard of before Augustus, she comes (as Pax Augusta) to represent one of the principal factors which make the imperial government both strong and popular, the maintenance of quiet at home and abroad (cf. Tac. Ann. 1.2.1: Augustus 'seduced everyone with the sweetness of peace'). The most famous, but not the only, monuments of the cult were the Ara Pacis Augustae and the Flavian Templum Pacis, dedicated in AD 75.23 In other words, as Brunt and Moore, the editors of the Res Gestae, explain:

"Pax means 'pacification' as much as 'no fighting'. But the citizens who enjoyed security at home could also take pride in the extension of Roman power to distant regions where Rome imposed peace." This sounds like the idyllic Vergilian vision of the Roman "arts" from the Aeneid Book 6. Vespasian will also close the gate of Janus in 70 C.E. as a sign of pax. In 75 C.E., on the fifth anniversary of the destruction of Jerusalem, he dedicated a Temple of Peace, which combined the physical use of large outdoor space with a temple and porticoes found in the Forum of Augustus as well as the concept of Peace behind the Altar of Augustan Peace. Pliny the Elder, in fact, paired this Temple of Peace with the Forum of Augustus as two of the three most beautiful places in Rome ever seen. Approaching the entrances to this Flavian Temple of Peace, a visitor would have encountered flanking palm trees, perhaps as a reminder of the land of Judea recently conquered, which was symbolized on Flavian coinage in this way as well. Inside the grounds of Vespasian's Temple of Peace, one would have enjoyed refreshing water channels and beds of roses, with statuary collected from many conquered regions scattered throughout the grounds for viewing pleasure an oasis from the hubbub of the city, serving as an art museum, religious center, and academic resource. A temple of Pax with its altar out front was the forum's centerpiece, along with a library, and most remarkably, Josephus tells us that at this complex the emperor Vespasian deposited the precious golden objects surviving from the Jerusalem Temple to be on display for all visitors to admire.

Shortly after the death of the last Flavian emperor Domitian, however, the senator Tacitus is able to put a far harsher assessment of the first century's pax Romana into the mouth of the Briton Calgacus, "When they make a desert, they call it peace."30 Is this renaming of a desert as Roman peace simply a literary echo from other Latin authors such as Curtius and Pliny the Elder, or has Tacitus also been affected by the sight of the Temple of Peace with its treasure of conquered nations, including Egypt and Judea, now on display in downtown Rome? And is it possible that the Roman historian had also been reading the works of Josephus, the Judean historian who described the recent war in nicely Atticized Greek for sophisticated readers to enjoy? We cannot know for certain, but an analysis of Josephus's account of the Roman army's devastation of his land certainly can shed light on how Tacitus's aphorism might have played in the minds of contemporary literati at Rome.

The Roman army ends the siege on Caesar's orders after it has nothing else "to murder or plunder." Titus commands that his soldiers "raze both all the city and its temple" leaving only towers of the city wall as a testament to its former grandeur. The booty from the devastated wasteland of Jerusalem brought back to Rome will not only decorate the Temple of Peace, dedicated on the fifth anniversary of Jerusalem's fall, but also provide the capital for the construction of the Colosseum, which will be dedicated by the now emperor Titus on the tenth anniversary of the city's destruction in 80 C.E. The timing for these monumental events at Rome was not coincidental but served as anniversary celebrations of Roman imperial greatness at the expense of rebellious Judea.

C O N C L U S I O N

This is the Rome Tacitus and Josephus lived and wrote in. It is hard to imagine that Tacitus would not have been affected as a man in his twenties by these current events, with Judea made a desert and the emperor calling it peace. Tacitus would have seen Vespasian building a Temple to Peace, as if reliving the glory of Augustus and his Altar of Peace, and then outdoing the first emperor by building the greatest arena ever, the Colosseum. Did Tacitus read Josephus's Judean War in Greek, see the prominence of the desert theme play out, and find inspiration? I cannot prove this definitively, but perhaps we can now appreciate the famous words of Tacitus's Caledonian chieftain Calgacus about imperialism in a new light and accept that Roman and Judean identity formation, as exhibited in texts and monuments, were clearly intertwined in the late first century.

Josephus continued to live and write at Rome for decades after the war, and his outlook for the future, imbued with trust in God, appears hopeful. At the end of Book 10 of his Judean Antiquities, he writes of the prophet Daniel:

E P I L O G U E

Five hundred years ago exactly from this past 2011 Advent season, a brave Dominican friar stood up in the church in Santo Domingo and preached a fiery sermon of social justice to the Spaniards gathered for mass. Bartolome de las Casas gives an account of the sermon: They set aside the fourth week of Advent for the sermon, since the Gospel according to St. John that week is "The Pharisees asked St. John the Baptist who he was and he said: Ego vox clamantis in deserto." ["I am a voice crying in the wilderness."]…. At the appointed time Fray Anton Montesino went to the pulpit and announced the theme of the sermon: Ego vox clamantis in deserto.

After the introductory words on Advent, he compared the sterility of the desert to the conscience of the Spaniards who lived on Hispaniola in a state of blindness, a danger of damnation, sunk deep in the waters of insensitivity and drowning without being aware of it. Then he said: "I have come here in order to declare it unto you, I the voice of Christ in the desert of this island. Open your hearts and your senses, all of you, for this voice will speak new things harshly, and will be frightening." For a good while the voice spoke in such punitive terms that the congregation trembled as if facing Judgment Day. "This voice," he continued, "says that you are living in deadly sin for the atrocities you tyrannically impose on these innocent people. Tell me, what right have you to enslave them? What authority did you use to make war against them who lived at peace on their territories, killing them cruelly with methods never before heard of? How can you oppress them and not care to feed or cure them, and work them to death to satisfy your greed?" Another island, another empire, same basic message as Tacitus. Times may change, but human nature corrupted by power remains relatively the same.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY

While quoting Samuel Issachar, Prof Graeme Orr stated that ‘’the law of electoral democracy encompasses the law and institutions governing representative elections (at whatever level), political parties, political finance and referendums. As a commonplace shorthand, ‘electoral law’ will be used in what follows. Occasionally, jostling for attention, people have tried on the term ‘the law of democracy’.[1574] The professor goes on to indicate that electoral democracy consists of democratic ideals namely participatory freedoms, political equality and deliberation, the right to vote and being attached to a political party which is to provide channels for creating groupings which promote a particular interest with a view off to electoral process.

Electoral democracy entails elections and an election is the process by which citizens elect the people to run government and political offices at all levels in a democratic government, elected officials are chosen by the people and serve for specific time called a term of office[1575]

In conclusion therefore, the available literature on the topic of study remains limited but the above is sufficient to establish a relationship between the right of privacy and electoral democracy in Uganda especially the opposition parties since they are legally operating.

AN EVALUATION ON HOW THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY HAS INFRINGED ON THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY IN UGANDA.

This chapter was triggered by an observation that I have been making on the right to privacy in our country, particularly by observing the political plateau in Uganda and the parties involved but most importantly how the parties in the opposition have enjoyed the afore said right. The general objective of the study is to analyse the effectiveness of the laws protecting the right to privacy on the political parties and the citizens therein.

In seeking to achieve the said objective, the study will look at how the enjoyment of the right to electoral democracy has led to the infringement of the right to privacy. The legal and institutional framework will be analysed from the premise of the fundamental human rights, the organisational effectiveness theory and determination on the extent to which the right is ingrained in its systems and process. Prior to the conclusion, the study makes a comparative analysis with the USA and Kenya.

[1574]Eg Samuel Issachar off et al, The Law of Democracy: the Legal Structure of the Political Process, 5th ed (New York, Foundation Press, 2016).

[1575]Gutman, 2000

Privacy was initially seen as the 'right to be left alone[1576]' a simple yet powerful concept. This negative view of privacy, has been surpassed by several developments in comparative constitutional law. Privacy is nowadays understood not only as a right to be free from outside interference or observation in one's own private sphere, but also as a right to define and construct one's identity, not only in isolation but in social relations[1577].

Privacy means the quality, state or condition of being free from public attention to intrusion into or interference with one's acts or decisions[1578]. This definition satisfies a lay man's understanding and passes the reasonable man test although there are several legal definitions to include among others the following Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[1579] is to the effect that ''No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has a right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

In an almost identical wording, Article 17 of the ICCPR provides that;

1. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour ad reputation.
2. Everyone has a right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

Moving on to Ugandan jurisprudence, Article 27 of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda (2006 as amended) provides that everyone has a right to privacy.

Democracy refers to a government by the people, either directly or through representatives elected by the people and involves a system in which everyone is equal and has the right to vote, make decisions among others[1580]. In Uganda for example, it is said that all power belongs to the people and is to be exercised in accordance with their laws[1581]

Following the above, a right of privacy accrues to political parties as well as we shall note with the political parties act. Uganda in 2005 adopted a multiparty system following a vote by the Ugandan Parliament to Conduct a Referendum on 4th May, 2005.

[1576]Byran A. Garner. (2019) Black's Law Dictionary, 11th Ed, Thomas Reuters Dallas Texas.
[1577]Manuel Jose Cepeda Espinosa, (2012) Privacy,'' in The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law 966, 969 (Micheal Rosenfeld &AndrasSajo
[1578]Byran A. Garner. (2019) Black's Law Dictionary, 11th Ed, Thomas Reuters Dallas Texas. .
[1579] 1948
[1580]Byran A. Garner, Black's Law Dictionary, 11th Ed, Thomas Reuters Dallas Texas, 2019 page 544
[1581] Article 1 of the 1995 Constitution of The Republic of Uganda (2006 as amended)

In the very early times, the law gave a remedy only for physical interference with life and property in its various forms; liberty meant freedom from actual restraint while the right to property secured to the individual his lands and his cattle. Later there came a recognition to man's spiritual nature, of his feelings and intellect. Gradually the scope of these legal rights to enjoy life broadened; and now the right to life has come to mean the right to enjoy life- the right to be left alone[1582] among others. The law continued to develop to encompass the intellectual and emotional life until recent inventions and business methods called for attention on the protection of the person, and for securing to the individual what Judge Cooley calls ''the right to be left alone''.

In a famous case of Prince Albert v Strange[1583]the court noted that the common law rule prohibited not merely the reproduction of the etchings which the plaintiff and Queen Victoria had made for their own pleasure, but also ''the publishing (at least by printing or writing), though not by copy or resemblance, a description of them, whether more or less limited or summary, whether in the form of a catalogue or otherwise. This in my opinion was to harness the development in the right to privacy amongst individuals and persons which I believe helped to up score the right.

Electoral democracy is said to involve, democracy that is controlled by representatives who are elected by the people of a country (the democratic process) and is organized on the principle that everyone has a right to be involved in making a decision (a democratic system of management) and lastly it organized according to the principle that all people in a society are equally important, whatever their material worth or social class (a democratic society)and involves political parties[1584]. Which is the case in Uganda every citizen of Uganda of eighteen years of age or above has a right to vote and it is the duty of the State to take all necessary steps to ensure that all citizens qualified to vote register and exercise their right to vote[1585].

Following a series of elections in Uganda especially the (2016 and 2021 general elections) the events leading to the elections and those preceding the elections have always affected the parties involved. The opposition political parties (FDC & NUP) and the members plus leaders therein have been the most affected to the extent that their right to privacy has be violated or rather heavily undermined which is occasioning this study, from the surveillance and house arrests, the raiding of these political party headquarters by security officials. This background leaves me wondering and questioning whether the right to privacy is indeed a right and forms the wider basis of this research because the right to electoral democracy seems to override the right to privacy although the rights are provided for in different chapters of the Constitution, they both remain rights accruing to human

[1582] Harvard Law Review, Volume iv, December 15, 1890 at page 193
[1583] [1849] High Court of Chancery
[1584]Bryan A. Garner, Black's Law Dictionary, 11th Ed, Thomas Reuters Dallas Texas, 2019 page 544
[1585] Article 59, of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda (2006 as amended)

beings and legal entities.

Following the 2021 general elections the army and Uganda Police Force raided the National Unity Platform (NUP) offices on 14th October, 2020. NUP officials say that the security took away shs23 million and 7,000,000 signatures the party had gathered to support the nomination of their presidential flag bearer Mr. Kyagulanyi Robert. The search warranties signed by Assistant Superintendent of Police Jane Imalingat and other police officers didn't capture money and the missing signatures[1586]. Immediately after the 14th January General Election Robert Kyagulanyi and his wife, Barbra were held under house arrest without being presented before a judge and for a non-cognizable offence[1587], suffice to note is the surveillance which was amounted around his house and the wife was reported in the media saying that the camera points straight to their bedroom and bathroom. This in my opinion jeopardises the right to privacy on the National Unity Platform and the citizens herein which calls for research on the institutional and legal framework that is to protect the said right. The said house arrests have also befallen the former FDC party leader Dr. Kizza Besigye at his home in Kasaganti which have intruded on his right to privacy plus that of his family. Similarly, on 20th November 2019, security operatives stormed and ransacked the office of the opposition political party the Forum for Democratic Change and confiscated items belonging to both journalist and two phones belonging to the chairperson of Kasese District, Saul Matte. The police however continued to deny the said allegations and this a lingering question as to whether the right to privacy is a myth or a constitutional right.

In relation to both rights, Raymond Mujuni a journalist with NTV Uganda tweeted on 9th January, 2021 on his official handle @qataharraymond asking MTN Uganda how Hon. Fr. Simon Lokodo MP of Dodoth West Constituency had acquired his phone data that had only given to MTN Uganda. This creates a lacuna in the law regarding both rights considering the extremes on how people have gone to enjoy both of the right of electoral democracy at the expense of the right to privacy.

It is hypothesized that the right privacy does not extend to electoral democracy because of the doctrine of state importance which calls for a balance on what is private and public but with the available literature review, the study will be able to result into a different finding and make recommendations that will stand to harness the simultaneous co-existence of both constitutional rights and causing their beneficial enjoyments.

The chapter will help to show the loopholes in the enjoyment of the right of electoral democracy on the citizens' right to privacy and will help the parties develop better frameworks that are in strict adherence to the laws during their operations.

[1586] Article by MichealKakumirizi/ Daily Monitor of 15th October, 2020. (also published on AllAfrica at https://allafricia.com/stories/202010160016.html)
[1587] https://www.amensty.org

The chapter will help widen the citizenry understanding of both the legal and institutional framework regards the right to privacy and electoral democracy in Uganda. The citizens will understand these rights better especially when one is supressing the other.

The chapter will lay future grounds for research because it is not wholly conclusive and it has several limitations that are cutting the in depth analysis.

Considering the recent events and attacks on the political parties where their properties are confiscated and meetings intruded and the citizenry therein, the right of privacy to an individual (through surveillance on their homes) and other correspondence has been left abused and without lawful justification but rather curtailing the parties and individuals right. The need to research on the afore said topic is to underscore on how the laws in place aid to harness the right to privacy but specifically when enjoying the right to electoral democracy.

THE INTERNATIONAL DEFINITION OF THE RIGHT OF PRIVACY.

Article 17 of the ICCPR provides that;

1. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation.
2. Everyone has a right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

The International Convention on Civil and Political Rights was ratified in Uganda in June 1995 without making any reservations and the very purpose and origins of human rights law were to place certain fundamental rights beyond the whims of the majority opinion, and to protect those who may find themselves in the minority.

THE DOMESTIC DEFINITION OF THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY

In our domestic Laws, the supreme Law of the land under Article 27 of the 1995 Constitution of The Republic of Uganda (2006 as it is written in black and white that no person shall be subjected to (a) unlawful search of the person, home or other property of that person or (b) unlawful entry by others of the premises of that person. The Article further stipulates that no person shall be subjected to interference with the privacy of that person’s home, correspondence, communication or other property. From the provisions of this Article it is clear that even political parties are accorded this right and so is the citizenry of Uganda.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY IN THE ENJOYMENT OF ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY.

Here in your mind you have complete privacy. Here there's no difference between what is and what could be _ Chuck Palahnuik, an Asian writer quoted.

The importance of privacy in electoral democracy is majorly maintaining boundaries amongst the different political players because having the right to establish boundaries is important and good for building healthy relationships and political careers in such a growing democracy like Uganda. In the long run as professionalism is achieved other rights such as the right of freedom of speech will be protected, this arises out of the fact that nothing will have to be monitored in as far as the enjoyment of the right to privacy by the citizenry in the political parties does not the affect the rights of others, or interfere with the states agenda. In Uganda the right to freedom of expression is provided for in the laws of Uganda.

In furtherance of the same, the right to privacy will then harness the liberty for the legally existing political parties to engage freely in politics. Politics can be best understood as the activity through which people make, preserve and amend the general rules under which they live and it is also partisan and involves arguing against each other.[1588]Towards the 2021 general elections in Uganda, the National Unity Platform (NUP) which was soundly the leading opposition at the time, faced a raid as indicated in the statement of the problem, where the army and Uganda Police Force raided (NUP) offices on 14th October, 2020 and they reportedly took away shs23 million and 7,000,000 signatures the party had gathered to support the nomination of their presidential flag bearer Mr. Kyagulanyi Robert[1589]. As indicated, the breach of this right consequentially affected the right of NUP to engage freely in electoral democracy considering that the signatures that were confiscated formed part of the elements and conditions to fulfil the nomination requirements. NTV Uganda reported 18th July, 2020 that by 8;00 Am police in Jinja City had deployed heavily blocking all the roads leading to Baba, a local radio Station where Kyagulanyi was expected to appear[1590]that blockage was instigated by a continued surveillance on Mr. Kyagulanyi and his correspondence.

We have to also appreciate in this non-legal framework that privacy is important in preserving and protecting the reputation of the citizenry involved in the electoral democracy involved in this study. Reputation is best understood as the esteem in which someone is held or the goodwill extended to or confidence reposed in that person by others, whether with respect to personal character, private or domestic life, professional and business qualifications among others[1591].

[1588] Heywood, what is Politics? GVPT September 10, 2007.
[1589]Article by MichealKakumirizi/ Daily Monitor of 15th October, 2020. (also published on AllAfrica at https://allafricia.com/stories/202010160016.html
[1590]http://www.ntv.co.ug
[1591]Ibid, footnote 10

The breach of the right of privacy in the short term ruins the reputation of the parties involved because it conjures up images of malice, disruption and even violence plus deceit on top of manipulation and lies on the affected parties. One might consider taking an action in defamation resulting from the breach of the right to privacy that leads to making of statements against that person and publish them on top of the breach which obviously causes serious harm to that person reputation. In the case of a political party, the action may not suffice in defamation because defamation as a tort remains one in persona, hence the party can take out a different cause of action. The Liberal democratic theory assumes that a good life for the individual must have substantial areas of interest a part from political participation so as to preserve the individual's reputation.

Lastly but not least, the right to privacy aids in protecting the finances of the political parties involved. As such, political parties have a treasury that is only viable to the concerned stakeholders in the parties and as opposed to the public or state having access to such accounts.

With regard to the infringement on the right to privacy during the enjoyment of the electoral process that forms part of the electoral democracy, the scenarios are many as laid out which has caused breach of other rights embedded in our laws but through the day to day actions, even without the slighted idea, the right to privacy is infringed on and the citizens remain in lieu of the same yet continue to suffer at the helm of seeing electoral democracy manifest.

DIFFERENT WRITERS ON POLITICAL PRIVACY

Following the above firm background on the existence and operation of political parties in the enjoyment of electoral democracy, Colin J. Bennet questions whether political privacy actually exists. In His book, Privacy and Political System; Perspectives from Political Science and Economics[1592] notes that a right to privacy indicates personal autonomy which furthers an understanding of private as meaning non-public and Political scientists have struggled for years to place some conceptual boundaries and their discipline. The issue of privacy, as it has framed within advanced industrial states, raises a number of fascinating political questions that overlap the disciplines of the political science and economies. The starting point, therefore, is not an abstract and inevitably contestable conception of the privacy, or an artificial definition of disciplinary boundaries.

The author notes that the following questions must be answered namely what is the relationship between attitudes towards privacy and political culture and ideology plus, what can political science tell us about the nature and extent of surveillance? When privacy is viewed as a regulatory issue, then privacy protection raises a range of fairly traditional questions about agenda settings, pressure and group politics, the adjudication and evaluation[1593].

[1592] Colin J. Bennett, Department of Political Science University of Victoria, Victoria, BC Canada

Edward Shils, a twentieth century proponent of this view of privacy, wrote in the 1950s that privacy is essential for the strength of American Pluralistic democracy because it bolsters the boundaries between competing and countervailing centres of power as well as reinforcing the barriers between the state and the individual and the state and civil society organisations.

Another writer, Westin, 1967 wrote on political privacy and emphasised that, 'it is a balance that ensures strong citadels of individual and group privacy and limits both disclosure and surveillance is a prerequisite for liberal democratic societies''. Westin went on to spell that privacy is important in political parties and democracy because it promotes freedom of association, and shields scholarship and science from unnecessary interference from the government and lastly, it restrains improper police conduct such as physical brutality and unreasonable searches and seizures.

THE CHALLENGE OF ILLEGAL SURVEILLANCE AND HOW IT HAS LED TO THE INFRINGEMENT OF THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY.

Surveillance started from a notion known as the Panoptic-on (which was developed to ensure a state of permanent and continued visibility that would maintain discipline) and is summarily known as having information about one's movements and activities recorded by technologies on behalf of the organisations and governments that structured our society.

Surveillance is also defined as a purposeful routine, systematic and focused attention paid to personal details for the sake of control, entitlement, management, influence or protection. Some authors have also in their opinions regarded surveillance as a total denial of one's right to freedom and control of life and this is so because to be under surveillance means that almost every aspect of an individual life is being watched, monitored and controlled by those who consider themselves superior. In relation to the study, we must note that surveillance takes three to four forms but the most important being the physical, data and video surveillance. In January, 2021 when the NUP party leader was under house arrest, he was placed under video surveillance where a CCTV camera was placed directly opposite his house and the wife Mrs.Kagulanyi was quoted in the media saying the camera pointed directly towards their bedroom and bathroom which was intrusion into their private lives. Back at the NUP headquarters' both physical and data surveillance where present as indicated in their findings in chapter 4 of this research paper.

Through his verified twitter handle (@HEBobwine), Robert Kyagulanyi tweeted on the 26th January, 2021 that '' this has been the situation at my house these past days. Aside from the military and police surrounding us, military and police helicopters have been consistently hovering over our residence in breach of our privacy rights. Cowards'' end of tweet. This a clear example of illegal surveillance that followed shortly after the announcement of the results of January, 2021 polls by the electoral commission.

[1593] Ibid, page 6

Like stated in the problem statement, several Ugandan citizens received messages from various contestants in the 2021 general elections requesting for their support and that was a complete abuse of their correspondence to a right to privacy and that is a complete breach of data protection. Considering raid that happened at the NUP offices on 14thOctober, 2020 several personal data especially the signatures, phone numbers of the party supporters were collected from the Kamwokya based head office of the National Unity Platform and this was against the laws protecting personal data and this was followed by a surveillance on the party's offices.

Under surveillance, in the report by CIPESA under paragraph 13 of which I will quote entirely as '' In the last few years, there has been an increased concern of political dissidents, human rights defenders and journalists in Uganda[1594], which surveillance has been heightened with the adoption of the Regulation of Interception of the Communications Act (RICA) and this has continued to cause a breach of the right to privacy on the political dissidents in the given opposition political parties. In regards to the same, the Independent Newspaper on 8th August reported that 'the police had been physically trailing Mr. Kyagulanyi Robert and eventually stopped him from appearing on a political talk show on BCU FM[1595]'' which contravenes two rights namely the right to privacy following the continued trailing and eventually infringed on his right to freedom of association which contributes greatly to electoral democracy.

In conclusion there is no way one can talk about surveillance without the issue of privacy. He maintains that privacy and surveillance cannot co-exist together without one being a hindrance to the other because surveillance cannot function properly without crossing the path of privacy and the concept of privacy cannot be enjoyed under surveillance.

THE CHALLENGE OF DATA INFRINGEMENT.

Raymond Mujuni a journalist with NTV Uganda tweeted on 9th January, 2021 on his official handle @qataharraymond asking MTN Uganda how Hon. Fr. Simon Lokodo MP of Doodoth West Constituency had acquired his phone data that had only given to MTN Uganda which is against the principles of data protection. Data protection aims at protecting any information relating to an identified or identifiable natural person, including names, dates of birth, photographs, video footage, email addresses and telephone numbers.

[1594] In a survey conducted in 2015 by CIPESA of human rights defenders, bloggers, journalist and others available at http://www.cipesa.org/?wpfb-d1=209

[1595]https://www.independent.co.ug/nup-condems-blockage-of-kyagulanyis-radio-talk-show

THE DOMESTIC REGIME ON THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY AND ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY

THE 1995 CONSTITUTION OF THE REPUBLIC OF UGANDA, 2006 AS AMENDED)

It is not in dispute that countries now attain their leads through elections and this has been dubbed as a democratic process and it is rooted in the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda under chapter 5 which is on the representation of the people

Every citizen of Uganda of eighteen years of age or above has a right to vote and it is the duty of the that citizen to register as a voter and the State shall take all necessary steps to ensure that all citizens qualified to vote register and exercise their right to vote[1596].

Having agreed that electoral democracy, involves political and systems they are provided for in Article 69 of the Constitution which is to the effect that the people of Uganda shall have the right to choose and adopt a political system of their choice through free and fair elections or referenda[1597] and in 2005 Ugandans adopted a multiparty political system and have a right to form political organisations[1598].

The electoral democracy in Uganda is managed by the Electoral Commission of Uganda as substantively provided for the Constitution under Article 60 with a major function of ensuring that regular, free and fair elections are held. The procedural Law governing the conducting of the Elections is the Electoral Commission Act[1599] which lies out the functions of the EC further on procedural law, The Parliamentary Elections Act, 2005 together with the Presidential Elections Act of 2005.

Having observed that the right to privacy has been infringed on by different state operations on the said political parties namely, the NUP and the FDC together with the leaders therein up to their homes and other correspondence, I sought it prudent to check on the available laws that provide for the right to privacy in Uganda.

Under chapter four of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda it provides that that no person shall be subjected to (a) unlawful search of the person, home or other property of that person or (b) unlawful entry by others of the premises of that person. The Article further stipulates that no person shall be subjected to interference with the privacy of that person's home, correspondence, communication or other property. From the provisions of this Article it is clear that even political

[1596] Article 59, the 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda. (2006, as amended)
[1597] The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda. (2006, as amended)
[1598] Article 72, The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 2006 as amended)
[1599] Chapter 140, of the Laws of Uganda.

parties are accorded this right and so is the citizenry of Uganda[1600]. Having observed the happenings and the events that unfold such as the political party's headquarters or instruct offices being raided without justifiable reasons by the state, because there after properties are returned and the said investigations aren't maturing since there hasn't been any official report or formal ruling on the same.

Privacy in political parties and on the citizenry involved is also abused and infringed on by continued physical and video surveillance, yet the right to privacy in politics is provided for under international laws.

Section 10 of the Data Protection and Privacy Act[1601] is to the effect that a data collector, data processor or data controller shall not collect, hold or process personal data in a manner which infringers on the privacy of a data subject.

INSTITUTIONAL FRAMEWORK

There are a number of institutions created in Uganda to help in the respect and promotion of human rights such as the police force, the Human Rights' Commission, Courts of Law and others.

Article 221 of the Constitution of Uganda[1602] obliges UPDF and any other armed force established in Uganda namely the Uganda Police Force and any other police force, the Uganda Prisons Service, all intelligence services and the National Security Council to Observe and respect human rights and freedoms in the performance of their functions. The UPDF and other police agencies are the first institutional frameworks in place to preserve the right privacy and the electoral democracy

The Police Act[1603] under section 4 which provides for the functions of the force which are to protect the life, property and other rights of the individual reaffirms that the police is another institution available to protect the rights of the individuals.

It must be appreciated everyone is entitled to protection against the attacks to their privacy but to the contrary this does not seem to be the case since the police which is under a legal duty to enforce the rights of the citizens is at the helm of infringing and abusing the constitutional right to privacy while trying to harness the right to electoral democracy. It is at this point that one could argue on that the security officials carry out these attacks and raids on their private life of the citizens on National Interest grounds but fail since laws are clear and there has not been any justification by the state for instance the High Court in Uganda on 25th January, 2021 ordered security forces to end the de facto house arrest of opposition leader Robert Kyagulanyi, calling it unlawful and the Deputy

[1600] Article 27 of the 1995 Constitution of the Republic Of Uganda (2006, as amended)
[1601] 2019
[1602] Ibid, note 34
[1603] Chapter 303

Court Register Jameson Karemani read the ruling, which said the detention of Kyagulanyi and his family was a violation of their rights'' '' it has been established that right to personal liberty has been infringed. Having found, as I do that the restrictions imposed on the applicant are unlawful, it is hereby ordered that they are lifted[1604],,

Following the above judgement, the courts of law form part of the institutions set out to promote the respect and protection of Human rights and have decided on a number of cases which have since then caused modification in the enjoyment of these human rights. The courts of Judicature are established under Article 129 of The Constitution of Uganda

The other institution available is the Human Rights Commission (UHRC) which is provided for in Article 51 to 58 of the Constitution[1605].The Commission has several functions as provided for in Article 53 and among others includes to investigate at its own initiative or on a complaint made by any person or group of persons against the violation of any human right. The right to privacy forms part of the rights envisaged in chapter four of our Constitution and deserves such protection.

Summarily, the legal framework on electoral democracy and the right to privacy is substantive and elaborate both internationally and domestically so is the institutional framework.

It is remarkably prudent that I compare the legally existing situations on how electoral democracy has affected the right to privacy of other jurisdictions with the Ugandan situation. This comparison will guide on the findings and their recommendations.

THE INTERNATIONAL REGIME ON THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY

The ICCPR was ratified in Uganda on 21st June 1995 and the advantages of waiting until a state ratifies a treaty before it becomes a binding document are basically two fold, internal and external. In the latter case, the delay between signature and ratification may often be advantageous in allowing extra time for consideration but it is in the internal aspect that is the most important, for it reflects the change in the political atmosphere[1606] and observation of the right being protected. The preamble of the ICCPR is to the effect that the rights under this convention, are derived from the Universal Declaration of human rights, the ideal of free human rights beings enjoying civil and political freedom and freedom from fear and want can only be achieved if conditions are created whereby everyone may enjoy his civil and political rights as well as his economic rights. Bearing this in mind, will help shape the analysis on the legal and institutional frame regards preserving the right of privacy in political parties.

[1604] Halima Athumani; Uganda Court Orders opposition Leader Released from House Arrest, January 25, 2021 09:10a AM on https://www.trtworld.com
[1605] The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda (2006, as amended)
[1606]Malcom N. Shaw, (2008), International Law 6th Ed, Cambridge University Press, New York page 912

Article 17 of the ICCPR provides that

1. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation.
2. Everyone has a right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

The same wording of the ICCPR was domesticated into Ugandan laws to maintain an international writing on the right to privacy.

THE UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS OF 1948

Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is to the effect that ‘’No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour ad reputation. Everyone has a right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

According to Prof. K.C Joshi the declaration of the UDHR must be noted as an important event in the history of human rights in international law. This ‘path finding’ instrument provides a generally acceptable catalogue of man’s inalienable rights[1607]. In the case of R Rajgopal v State of Tamil Nadu[1608] court observed that a right to privacy was not enumerated as a fundamental right in their constitution but was inferred from Article 21 of the Constitution of India and noted that every person has a right to privacy. In the judgment, court held that the right to privacy in 2018 is a well discussed concept however in the year in 1995, it was not very well-acknowledged in case laws or legislations. Privacy was not a fundamental right then and hence this case acknowledged it. This was very important for this principle to develop.

According to Bryan A. Garner, the Editor in Chief of the Black’s Law Dictionary, a right to privacy means the quality, state or condition of being free from public attention to intrusion into or interference with one’s acts or decisions[1609]. The same writer continues on page 1447 to allude to autonomy privacy and writes that autonomy privacy includes that an individual’s right to control his or her personal activities or intimate personal decisions without interference or intrusion. If the individual’s interest in an activity or decision is fundamental, the state must show a compelling public interest before the private interest can overcome and if need be, the individual and the state must approach court to use the balancing test[1610] prior to evading the right to privacy.

INTERNATIONAL REGIME ON ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY

[1607] Prof K.C. Joshi, International Law and Human Rights, Eastern Book Company, 2006 at page 310
[1608] (1994) 6 SCC 632: AIR 1995 SC 264
[1609] Bryan A. Garner, Black’s Law Dictionary, 11th Ed, Thomas Reuters, 2019.
[1610] Hill v NCAA, 865 P.2d 633, 653-54 (Cal. 1994)

Article 21 of the UDHR is to the effect that '' Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country, directly or through freely chosen representatives. Everyone has the right of equal access to public service in his country.

It is my opinion that this Article remains important because it prohibits the deprivation of rights according the procedures established by law because at the time of drafting this declaration, the framers focused on the right to personal liberty which springs to all other rights in a way in that by one's liberty they can freely engage in electoral democracy so long as they have the necessary qualifications.

In the background of this study I noted that the right to privacy sprung out of the right to life and personal liberty and with this, the right to privacy especially in electoral democracy entangles and co-exists with several rights for instance the right to freedom of expression and now the right to vote where one uses his personal information to enjoy his right.

THE NON-LEGAL ASPECTS ON THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY AND RIGHT TO ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY.

John Locke, and he wrote that '' I with my liberty; autonomy; rationality; and privacy, am assumed to know my interests; and should be allowed a sphere which I own untouched by others''. The interpretation we may allude to this maybe different and I thus choose to use the literal interpretation of the same to mean that the right of privacy is envisaged a human right.

As noted in the background of the study, the right to privacy has been noted a right to be left alone which has received several criticism which for this study are not in doubt but important to note is that privacy is definitely an issue whose time has since then come and I am in agreement that privacy protection now has all the characteristics of an important policy sector of comparable importance to the environmental protection[1611]. Be that is it may, if there be a politics of privacy, then it should follow that the discipline of political science should be able to add some important insights into questions about how privacy is treated with the political arena as public policy.

[1611]Colin J. Bennett, Department of Political Science University of Victoria, Victoria, BC Canada page 12

LEGAL REGIME GOVERNINGING THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY AND ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY IN COMPARISONS WITH OTHER JURISDICTIONS.

The legal regime is both substantive and procedural where by the former spells the law and the latter sets out how the general purposes and objectives identified in the former are to be accomplished ad this legislation contains regulations and directives[1612]. Laws are made by the legislative body of the government and the international conventions ought to be ratified by Uganda before they are operationalised.

Looking onto the institutional framework that is mandated with the enforcement of the existing legal regime, the available most thought of are the courts of judicature and the security agencies which are established substantively by the Constitution of the Republic of Uganda.

THE USA SITUATION ON THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY DURING THE ENJOYMENT OF ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY.

The Privacy Act of 1974 which was enacted on December 31st 1974 set a Code of Fair information practice that governs the collection, maintenance, use and dissemination of personally identifiable information about individuals that is maintained in the systems of records by federal states. The Privacy Act states in part that ‘’ No agency shall disclose any record which is contained in a system of records by any means of communication to any person or to another agency, except pursuant to a written request by, or with the prior written consent of, the individual to whom the record pertains[1613]’’.

The remarkable success of the Obama successes of the Obama campaign in 2008 and 2012 and its advanced uses of new technologies to persuade and target voters have not gone unnoticed in other democratic countries. While ‘’voter and citizen surveillance ‘’ is nowhere as extensive or sophisticated in other countries candidates and political parties elsewhere have reportedly looked with great envy on their activities of their U.S counterparts and longed for similar abilities to find and potential voters and to ensure that they vote[1614]. The right to privacy is on voter and citizen surveillance which I believe is a failure as opposed to what the Privacy Act of 1974.

[1612] Glanville Williams; Learning The Law, 6th Ed, Thomson Reuters (Sweet and Maxwell), London on page 58
[1613] https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wik/Privacy_Act_of_1974 visited on 31st May, 2021.
[1614] https://firstmonday.org

THE KENYA SITUATION ON THE ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY AND THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY ESPECIALLY ON DATA PROTECTION.

As fate may have it, Uganda enacted the Data Protection Act in 2019 and from the statement of the problem of this study, there are continued reports on privacy infringement during the enjoyment of electoral democracy, the same lies for Kenya which enacted a similar Law on 8th November, 2019 and the law came to cure the mischief that happened in 2013 and 2017 Kenya general elections.

Briefly, the 2013 and 2017 Kenyan presidential elections saw the re-election of President Kenyatta and were embroiled in a scam in which Cambridge Analytical illegally collected Facebook profile data from millions of Kenyans. In 2017 to be specific, the insights were used in a data-driven micro-targeted digital campaign to help Kenyatta get re-elected. The UK-based consulting company had been in the limelight since USA President Donald Trump's election victory in 2016 for harvesting data about millions of Facebook users and targeting them with information intended to sway them in Trumps' favour[1615]. This in pursuit with this study indicates a failure of the protection of the right to privacy during the enjoyment of electoral democracy in Kenya and the USA[1616].

In Uganda, the right to privacy is breached by communications companies mainly MTN Uganda and Airtel Uganda. This shows how the both Uganda and Kenya are languishing in preserving the rights at the expense of electoral democracy.

The new law, in Kenya is aimed to enforce the right to privacy by providing remedies against any breach so is the Ugandan situation.

In a nut shell, the legal framework establishing the right to privacy and electoral democracy both internationally and domestically is rich and profound as seen in the afore cited Articles. The institutional frameworks remain the EC that ensures that electoral democracy is occasioned and in Ministry of Information, Technology and National Guidance is the one in charge of ensuring data protection regards the right to privacy and crowning it all, are the courts of Judicature where aggrieved persons seek redress against those that breach their right to privacy during the enjoyment of electoral democracy.

[1616] https://advx-globalvoices-org.cdn.ampproject.org./v/s/advox.globalvoices.org/2019/12/24/kenya

APPRAISAL ON THE INTERNATIONAL AND DOMESTIC FRAME WORK ON THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY AND ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY

It appears that the laws on both rights laws exist internationally and domestically namely, the ICCPR under Article 17 which was ratified in Uganda in 1995 and the UDHR under Article 12 on the right to privacy and under Article 21 on the right to electoral democracy and that is not in dispute. The 1995 Constitution of the Republic of Uganda also provides for the right to privacy and right to electoral democracy in Article 27 and under chapter 5 starting from Article 59[1617] respectively. In the Supreme Court in Charles Onyango Obbo v Attorney General[1618] held that '' protection of the guaranteed rights is a primary objective of the Constitution. Limiting their enjoyment is an exception to their protection and is therefore a secondary objective. Although the Constitution provides for both, it is obvious that the primary objective must be dominant. It can be overridden only in the exceptional circumstances that give rise to that secondary objective. It that eventuality, only minimal impairment of enjoyment of the right, strictly warranted by the exceptional circumstances is permissible''. I therefore find that the security officials don't qualify in the exceptional circumstances to breach right to privacy during the enjoyment of electoral democracy.

ON THE RATIONALE OF THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY IN ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY

It was found that the right to privacy plays key roles in electoral democracy. Bearing in mind that electoral democracy involves different players the right to privacy aids in occasioning boundaries amongst the various players and in the long run helps to maintain their reputations as electoral democracy is being enjoyed by each one of them. In an interview, one of the respondents while responding to the question whether the right of privacy plays a big role in the enjoyment of electoral democracy? he said '' yes privacy is a very important factor when it comes to electoral democracy, we vote by secret ballot but as you may know there are some people who were voted for in the previous election under the observation of the police. He further stated that the surveillance by the police forces around our homes and offices is the biggest form of privacy infringement I know of , the police always alleges having intelligence and it is heavy during all elections, when Dr Kizza Besigye was placed under house arrest, he was living in the presence of police that was everywhere around even in his garden and I think the same happened to Mr. Kyagulanyi in January, so I believe that during elections us exercising our rights, the state through the security officials violates this right''.

[1617] 2006 as amended.
[1618] Constitutional Appeal No.2 of 2002

ON THE EXTENT TO WHICH ELECTORAL DEMOCRACY HAS INFRINGED ON THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY IN UGANDA

It was found that enjoyment electoral democracy has infringed on right to privacy majorly through physical and video surveillance on the citizens of Uganda by the security officials, namely the Police Force of Uganda and the Uganda Peoples Defence Forces. There was a clear image portraying a continued surveillance by the UDPF and the UPF over Kyagulanyi Sentamu Robert's home in Magere and the newspaper Article of the Daily Monitor written by Micheal Kakumirizi shows how personal data and other information belonging to citizens attached to NUP where confiscated by security officials which is in complete disregard of the provisions of Article 27 of the Constitution of Uganda.

In an interview with another respondent on the extent to which the enjoyment of electoral democracy has infringed the right to privacy? he said that '' first and foremost, the right to privacy one of the rights that are heavily undermined in Uganda and world over because in our day to day life, our accounts are hacked, banks systems are pirated and it worsens during election time because the NRM is afraid of the opposition, it has to do all it takes to sabotage the other political parties. So much surveillance is mounted on our members right from their homes, they are trailed on their journeys and on 14th October, as you may remember our offices were raid by the security officials who took our property even personal files. I must admit that the right to privacy especially in the election period is a myth, the state has gone further to place spies amongst our homes, offices so as to collect information. You must have seen in the media families reporting how they are being threatened and trailed. The right to privacy is fundamental just as any other right and ought to be protected whether during the exercise of promoting electoral democracy or not''.

Another finding from the respondents, was that most of them don't actually believe that a right to privacy exists because the actions security officials during the enjoyment of electoral democracy.

It was further found that Telecommunication companies for instance MTN Uganda issued personal data belonging to their clientele to politicians during the campaigns' of the 2021 general election which was a breach of the correspondence of the right to privacy having faulted on data protection.

It can be argued that electoral democracy plays a key role in providing for a direct relationship between the members of the legislature and the executive with the local constituency and continues to promote the right to vote since it is a constitutional right however the enjoyment of this part should not be at the expense of the rights for example the enjoyment of the right to privacy among others. Indeed the right to privacy has been infringed on in the enjoyment of electoral democracy, the citizenry should utilize the institutional frameworks available to ensure that the perpetuators are published by the realms of the available legal framework, this is because the citizenry may not be significantly aware of the extent the right to privacy as a human right and a fundamental human right which has since then extended to the political world.

Its therefore necessary for all political players to know that they are entitled to privacy as envisaged in Article 17 of the 1CCPR[1619]. Quoting Colin J. Bennett[1620] who writes and supports the notion of observing privacy in the political parties which forms part of electoral democracy gives firm ground for the affected citizens and the legally operating political parties to utilise the courts of law to protect their right to privacy.

THE NEED FOR THE HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION (UHRC) TO PERFORM BETTER AS NOTED IN THE CONSTITUTION OF UGANDA.

The UHRC is mandated to investigate on its own motion any complaint against the violation of any human right[1621] and has several powers that are granted by the Constitution so as to ensure a strict observance of human rights. Yes, the Commission has made reports but has not made any report regards the right to privacy on its own motion, if it did, maybe there would be a significant change and continuous upholding of this right.

THE NEED FOR CIVIC EDUCATION.

Civic education is broadly defined as the provision of information and learning experiences to equip and empower citizens to participate in democratic process[1622]. The citizenry, security agencies and all players involved in electoral democracy, need to be educated more how to enjoy the both rights, and how to protect them as well. The education can take very different forms including classroom-based training and mass media campaigns. The overall objective of civic education is to promote civic engagement and support democratic and participatory governance through civic knowledge, skills and disposition. This will help to create awareness on the existence of the rights and upholding them.

In the enjoyment of electoral democracy, having found that it involves parliamentary and presidential systems, surveillance of the citizens disregards the right to privacy both in their families and personal spaces and reduces the enjoyment of both constitutional rights effectively.

[1619] The international Convention on Civil and Political Rights
[1620] Colin J. Bennett, Department of Political Science University of Victoria, Victoria, BC Canada.
[1621] The 1995, Constitution of the Republic of Uganda (2006, as amended)
[1622] Jennifer Rietbergen-McCracken, Civic Education.

THE RIGHT TO INTERNET A FUNDAMENTAL HUMAN RIGHT

On Wednesday 13th January 2021, the eve of Uganda's General elections, Uganda's communications regulator UCC ordered telecoms operators and internet service providers in the country to suspend all internet gateways until further notice. According to Reuters Ugandans reported difficulties accessing the internet via mobile devices and wireless connections on Wednesday evening and internet monitor Netblocks said on twitter that the country was experiencing a nationwide blackout from 7:00pm (1600GMT).

The presidents Justification for the Internet shutdown was in retaliation for face book taking down some pro government accounts which is really frivolous and vexatious. Any internet shutdown should be grounded in the international human Rights principles of proportionality, necessity and legality internet shutdowns should not be used as an emotional retaliation tool.42% of Ugandans are internet users and 2.5 million Ugandans are active on social media via mobile tool devices.

Necessity means that only restriction of internet access must be limited to members that are strictly and demonstrably necessary to achieve a legitimate aim. It should be demonstrated that no other measure would achieve similar effects with more efficiency and less collateral damages.

Necessity also implies an assessment of the proportionality of the measures. Any restriction of internet access must also be proportional. A proportionality assessment should ensure that the restriction is the least intrusive instrument amongst those which might achieve the desired results. The limitation must target a specific objective and not unduly intrude upon other rights of targeted persons.

The internet has been ingrained into the tasks that Ugandans perform each day and the internet shutdown has caused detrimental effects to Uganda's economy and livelihoods at large. According to Net blocks an internet freedom monitor such a blackout could have already cost the Ugandan economy around USD 10million.

On 12th January, UMEME Uganda's 3 main electricity distribution company posted notice on its Twitter page asking its clients to purchase adequate amounts of electricity units as its service was being interrupted by the internet speed. During the five-day lockdown while the internet was fully shutdown, MEME customers were not able to access the prepaid service because the network was not available. The other services that were not available because of the shutdown were the Uganda Revenue Authority, National Social Security fund, banking services, medical emergency services like Rocket Health and E-commerce services in the form online transport services like Safeboda, Uber and Jumia.

If internet shutdowns are used as a blunt force means of blocking access locally to a specific service or application, access to other unrelated services may also be impacted as collateral damages. For example, shutting down the internet also directly disrupted access to internet based ride sharing and taxi hailing applications, likely creating a major disruption for transportation services.

Uganda has got a cumulative figure of over 39,000 cases of covid 19 and from the start of the pandemic, the internet has been a safe space offering the best platform that doubled as a social distance tool without the internet Ugandans who have been transacting online and communicating online had to switch and get things done physically. An example is the seven App that simplifies health care by bridging a gap between a patient and a doctor virtually in the comfort of one's home or office. With the internet shutdown one had to walk to the hospital physically. During the prevailing COVID 19 pandemic, Ugandan need the internet space more than ever before.

Mobile money services come to a standstill on 14th January2021, Election Day as a result of lack of internet availability and poor network conditions. Media companies that facilitate journalists while in the field rely on mobile money. Journalists that were already in the field to cover the 14-16th January elections couldn't be facilitated so they resorted to borrowing money from friends within the areas designated to them. Mobile money is a service used by almost every mobile phone user in Uganda. Uganda has about 26million active mobile subscriptions that resonate with mobile money usage.

People routinely depend on the internet to stay in touch with family and friends, create local communities of interest, report public information, hold institutions accountable and access and share knowledge. To that end, it can be argued that internet access cannot be distinguished from the exercise of freedom of expression and opinion.

When a complete internet shutdown occurs in a given country, the technical impact can extend beyond the country's borders to the rest of the global internet. Being part of an interconnected network means having a responsibility towards the network as a whole and shutdowns hold the potential to generate systemic risks. An internet shutdown has a ripple effect on the country's economy and persists beyond the days on which the shutdown occurs.

LAWS AND POLICIES

Uganda has passed several laws and policies, some of which contain progressive provisions that advance the rights to freedom of expression. Principally, the right to freedom of expression and access to information is constitutionally guaranteed under Articles 29 (1) (a) and 41, respectively. Other legal framework include; the Access to Information Act, 2005 that seeks to promote an efficient, effective, transparent and accountable government as well as to give effect to Article 41 of the Constitution by providing the right of access to information held by organs of the State; the Computer Misuse Act, 2011 that seeks to make provision for the safety and security of electronic transactions and information systems; to prevent unlawful access, abuse or misuse of information systems[1623]; the Uganda Communications Commission (UCC) Act, 2013 that mandates the Commission, under Section 5(l) to promote research into the development and use of new communications techniques and technologies, including those which promote accessibility to communications services for persons with disabilities, as well as the Uganda National Vision 2040 which clearly identifies ICT access and utilization not just as a cross development enabler but also as a major business opportunity, providing the highest policy level underpinning to the imperative for universality of ICT in Uganda.[1624]

Unfortunately, even with these progressive legal frameworks, there are a number of other laws, policies, and practices that have been adopted and have had a negative effect on the citizens' enjoyment of their rights to freedom of expression and online expression; for example, the An-Terrorism Act of 2002, under which interception of communications may be conducted on grounds such as safeguarding of the public interest; prevention of the violation of the fundamental and other human rights and freedoms of any person from terrorism; prevention or detecting the commission of any offence; and safeguarding the national economy from terrorism,[8] the 2011 Computer Misuse Act, which criminalised cyber harassment (section 24) and "offensive communication under section 25.

INTERNATIONAL LEGAL FRAMEWORK ON INTERNET RIGHTS AND FREEDOM

The right to freedom of expression (including on the internet) has been provided for under Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, that states that; "Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers."

[1623] hps://ulii.org/ug/legislaon/act/2015/2-6
[1624]MoICT (2018) RCDF Operational Guidelines 2017/18–2021/22 (RCDF III) at hps://www.ucc.co.ug/wp-content/uploads/2017/09/RCDF-Operaonal-Guidelines.pdf

This right is further articulated within Article 19 (2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), stating that; Everyone shall have the right to freedom of expression; this right shall include freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in wring or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media of his choice.

On the African continent, Article 9 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACHPR) states that; "Every individual shall have the right to receive information" (9(1); and "Every individual shall have the right to express and disseminate his opinion within the law." (9(2).

The ACHPR has also adopted several resolutions aimed at promoting the right to information and freedom of expression in Africa amongst which include; ACHPR/Res. 362 (LIX) 2016, adopted in Banjul on 4 November 2016. The resolution reaffirms the fundamental right to freedom of information and expression enshrined under Article 9 of the African Charter on Human and People's Rights and in other international human rights instruments and recognizes the role of the internet in advancing human and people's rights in Africa. This resolution came at a critical time when the region was witnessing regular internet shutdowns which impacted directly on freedom of expression and access to information.

AFRICAN DECLARATION ON INTERNET RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

The African Declaration on Internet Rights and Freedoms (AfDEC) is a Pan-African initiative to promote human rights standards and principles of openness in internet policy formulation and implementation on the continent. The Declaration is intended to elaborate on the principles which are necessary to uphold human and people's rights on the Internet, and to cultivate an Internet environment that can best meet Africa's social and economic development needs and goals.

human rights documents including the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights of 1981, the Windhoek Declaration on Promoting an Independent and Pluralistic African Press of 1991, the African Charter on Broadcasting of 2001, the Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression in Africa of 2002, and the African Platform on Access to Information Declaration of 2011.

The Declaration has identified 13 key principles that include; Openness; Internet Access and Affordability; Freedom of Expression; Right to Information; Freedom of Assembly and Association on the Internet; Cultural and Linguistic Diversity; Right to Development and Access to Knowledge; Privacy and Personal Data Protection; Security, Stability, and Resilience of the Internet; Marginalized Groups at Risk; Due Process; Democratic Multi stakeholder Internet Governance; and Gender Equity.

LAWS AND POLICIES AFFECTING INTERNET FREEDOM

Uganda has over the years enacted a number of laws aimed at regulating the use of the internet. Whereas the general purpose of the laws is to facilitate use of Internet and protect users from possible negative outcomes such as cybercrime, a number of laws have restrictions that limit the enjoyment of Internet freedom.

The Uganda Communications Act, 2013 seeks to consolidate and harmonise the regulation of communications and electronic media in Uganda.[1625]The Act sets up the Uganda Communications Commission (UCC) as a regulatory body for all electronic communication systems in Uganda. The law gives UCC several powers, which range from regulating the sector, setting up policy, monitoring of the sector, licensing and enforcing laws relating to the communications sector, fining and punishing those who violate the law. Although the Act provides for establishment of a Communications Tribunal whose role is to be an arbitration issues relating to the communications sector, to-date this has not been done.[1626]The lack of a tribunal has also resulted in a situation where the UCC can be a complainant and a judge in cases and this presents a potential for miscarriage of justice. In the last year, UCC used its powers under this Act to issue directives for the blocking of social media and mobile money access during national elections and at the swearing in ceremony of the president. The regulator claimed the blockage was necessary for the security of the country. The blockage was condemned by various human rights organisations as a violation of the right to freedom to expression and other Internet freedoms.

The General Comment 34 on State parties' obligations under Article 19 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights adopted on July 21, 2011 holds that the same rights an individual enjoys on line must be the same rights enjoyed online[1627]

In 2016, the United Nations passed a non-binding resolution on "the promotion, protection, and enjoyment of human rights on the Internet."[1628] The resolution specifically condemns measures to prevent or disrupt access and calls on all States to refrain from and cease such measures. It further recognizes the importance of access to information and privacy online for the realization of the

[1625] Act 1 of Uganda Communications Act, 2013
[1626] See Part X of Uganda Communications Act, 2013
[1627]Also see: General Comment no. 34 on Article 19 of the ICCPR
https://bangkok.ohchr.org/programme/documents/general-comment-34.aspx 1628 hps://www.arcle19.org/data/files/Internet_Statement_Adopted.pdf accessed on 20th December 2019

right to freedom of expression and to hold opinions without interference.[1629]

Although there is no express right of access to the internet under international law, the 2016 United Nations Resolution urges states to "consider formulating, through transparent and inclusive On February 26, 2016, the Minister of Information and Communications Technology gazetted the Communications (Amendment) Bill, 2016 that seeks to amend section 93(1) of the Communications Act, 2013 to enable the minister to make statutory instruments without seeking parliamentary approval. The current law requires the minister to lay regulations before parliament for approval, hence the amendment would be an attempt at ousting parliamentary oversight powers.[1630]The Amendment not only removes the requirement for parliamentary approval for regulations made by the minister under the Act, but also the requirement to inform parliament of the new legislation made through laying the regulation before parliament. This move violates Article 79 of the Constitution of Uganda, which gives parliament the overall powers to make laws and any other institution that makes laws such as subsidiary legislation can only do it with the consent of parliament. It is therefore important that the institution that delegates the powers to make laws remains with the powers to approve the laws, to be informed of the laws made and to withdraw or suspend the law made under delegation.

THE COMPUTER MISUSE ACT, 2011

This Act seeks to provide for safety and security of electronic transactions and information systems and to prevent unlawful access, abuse or misuse of information systems among other things.[1631]The Act has a broad definition of a computer, which covers all types of electronic or electromagnetic systems capable of storing or transmitting data. The broad definition of a computer means that any person using an electronic or electromagnetic system has a duty to act within the confines of the Act, failure of which is one of the several offences under the Act. The broad nature of this Act was tested in Nyakahuma vs. Uganda[1632]where, in a high court reference to determine whether posting materials on internet amounted to publication within the meaning of the Penal Code Act[1633],the judge ruled that the broad nature of the Computer Misuse Act captured all forms of posts made in cyber space irrespective of the tool used to post.

Section 25 of the Act calls for the punishment of "offensive communication" where "any person who willfully and repeatedly uses electronic communication to disturb or attempts to disturb the

[1629] hps://www.osce.org/fom/250656 accessed on 20th December 2019
[1630] HRNJ (2016) Analysis of the Uganda Communications (Amendment) Bill 2016
[1631] Act No. 2 of the Computer Misuse Act, 2011
[1632] High Court criminal reference No 1/2013 available at http://www.ulii.org/ug/judgment/high-court-criminal-division/2013/30-0
[1633] Cap 120, laws of Uganda

peace, quiet or right of privacy of any person with no purpose of legitimate communication whether or not a conversation ensues commits a misdemeanor and is liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding Uganda Shillings 480,000 (about USD140) or imprisonment not exceeding one year or both". This provision is broad and has been abused by authorities to limit freedom of speech by prosecuting individuals deemed to have violated this section. As such, this section has been challenged in the constitutional court for being overly broad and unnecessary and likely to result in abuse of freedom of expression.[1634]

On a positive note, the Act prohibits unauthorised access to a computer or computer systems and tries to regulate any form of hacking that may occur whether online or a standalone system. It also gives court powers to make a preservation order where data that is subject to investigation or a court case is at risk of being damaged or lost.

Other laws relating to cybercrime offenses include the Electronic Transactions Act, 2011 and Electronic Signature Act, 2011, which regulate e-commerce but remain mostly unimplemented.

ANTI- PORNOGRAPHY ACT 2014

Meanwhile, the Anti-Pornography Act, 2014prohibits the publication and circulation of pornographic content. Section 2 of the Act defines pornography as "any representation through publication, exhibition, and cinematography, indecent show, information technology or by whatever means of a person engaged in real or stimulated explicit sexual activities or any representation of the sexual parts of a person for primarily sexual excitement." This definition of pornography has been criticised for being too broad and open to misinterpretation.[1635]Section 13 makes it an offence to publish, broadcast, traffic in, procure, import or export pornography. The law is mostly unfavourable to women as section 13 is likely to discourage victims of revenge pornography from reporting cases to authorities in fear of retribution as the victim and perpetrator are equally liable.

Moreover, section 17 requires Internet Service Providers (ISPs) not to allow their protocols and systems to be used for publishing pornography. It places an obligation on ISPs to monitor and carry out surveillance on their subscribers for them to be able to identify and remove content considered pornographic. Generally speaking, the broad nature of an offence under the Anti-Pornography Act 2014 Act is bound to affect various Internet users who may in one way or the other be in possession [1634] See Andrew Karamagi and Shaka Robert Vs. AG. Constitutional Court Petition No. 5 of 2016. The background to this case is Shaka Robert was charged with offensive communication under Section 25 of the Computer Misuse Act after government officials believed him to be Tom Voltaire Okwalinga who pseudonymously posts information critical of government on Facebook. Shaka challenged the law under which he was charged and at the time of writing this report court decision was still pending.

[1635]See Lwawoko Jordan (2015) Gender and anti-pornography Act Uganda, of content considered pornographic. For example, whereas in some countries courts have ruled that using the "like" button on social media such as Facebook does not give rise to action in defamation, it is not clear if "liking" a page with pornographic content can be adjudged as publishing pornographic content hence giving rise to criminal liability. It is also not clear how the law will treat cases where a person is found in possession of content considered pornographic which they accessed through social media such as Whatsapp, where he or she had no control on the process of distribution or download of the said content.

The Anti-Pornography Act, 2014 also calls for the establishment of an anti-pornography committee and in July 2016, a committee of eight members was setup. In June and August 2016, claims of government purchasing anti-pornography detection software surfaced.[1636]However, the ethics minister later denied the statements saying the government did not have enough funds to procure the software. Whereas restricting pornography, especially child pornography, is warranted, such restrictions should fall within internationally accepted standards. Blanket surveillance to snoop out pornography has bigger consequences such as limiting the right to privacy.

ANTI- TERRORISM ACT 2002

The right to privacy is further limited by the Anti-Terrorism Act, 2002, which provides for interception of communications.[1637]The law does not define what an electronic system is; however, going by the definition provided by the Computer Misuse Act, any system capable of transmitting electronic or electromagnetic data can be considered an electronic system. This means acts associated with online demonstration or expression of discontent such as hacking and bringing down government websites or interfering with their functionality can amount to terrorism in Uganda.

In 2015, amendments were made to the Terrorism Act to align the law to international requirements by providing for aspects of terror financing and money laundering. The coming into force of the amendment means police now has powers to conduct surveillance on online transactions with the aim of establishing if they are funding terror activities in Uganda. The Regulation of Interception of Communications Act, 2010provides for lawful interception and monitoring of communications in the course of their transmission through a telecommunication, postal or any other related service or system. Section 3 provides for the establishment of a monitoring centre under the oversight of a minister.

The Act makes it a crime to unlawfully intercept communication of a person and lawful interception is only permitted by authorised officials upon issue of a warrant by a judge. The act also calls for service providers to technically assist government to intercept communications by installing hardware and software to enable interception of communications at all time or when required. Service providers are also required to provide services that render real time and full time monitoring facilities for the interception of communication where failure to do so is punishable with a fine of UGX 2,040,000 (about USD583) or imprisonment for a period not exceeding five years, or both; and a possible cancelation of their license.

[1636]Pornography detection machine arrives September –Lokodo, http://www.newvision.co.ug/new_vision/news/1431545/pornography-detection-machine-arrives-august-lokodo

[1637]Section 7of the Anti-Terrorism Act 2002

ABUSES OF THE RIGHT TO INTERNET IN UGANDA

Additionally, several provisions within these laws have been used to increasingly put pressure on private actors to censor content which the state deems illegal or simply "harmful to national security."[9]

In 2016, UCC ordered the shutdown of internet access on the eve of the presidential elections voting day in February, citing "national security", as well as during the inauguration in May 2016, affecting social media platforms including Facebook, WhatsApp, Twitter, and mobile money transfer services.[10]

In April 2018, the Ugandan communications regulator directed online data communication service providers, that include; online publishers, online news platforms and online radio and television operators, to apply and obtain authorisation from the commission within a period of one month or risk having their websites and/or streams being blocked by Internet Service Providers (ISPs).[11] The regulator later published a list of the licenced providers, who were each required to pay USD 20.

On 29, April 2019, UCC ordered internet service providers to shut down all unauthorized news sites following a directive requiring online data communication service providers, including publishers, news platforms, radio and television operators to obtain authorizaon.[12]

Later in 2019, another directive was issued by UCC requiring all "online publishers and influencers who have reached a capacity of sharing communication content and also using the online publication for commercial business" to register with regulator and pay a USD 20 levy.[13]

In May 2017, a famous movie translator, Marysmats Matovu alias VJ Junior and his colleague, Geoffrey Bbosa, were arrested and charged with cyber harassment and offensive communication based on allegedly provocative messages sent in a group message chain about the Uganda Film Producers Associaon.[14]

During the recently concluded 2021 General Elections, UCC shut down the internet for the entire week preceding and following voting of presidential candidates citing national security concerns. On January 13, 2021, the Uganda Communications Commission (UCC) ordered Internet Service Providers (ISPs) to enforce a temporary "Suspension of the Operation of Internet Gateways" citing Sections 5(1) and 56 of the Uganda Communications Act of 2013, which requires UCC to monitor, inspect, license, supervise, control, and regulate communications services, among other requirements.

The disruptions to digital communications began on January 09, 2021 with applications such as Google Play and the Apple App Store being made inaccessible. By January 11, social media platforms such as Facebook, Twitter, Instagram, and WhatsApp had been blocked. Efforts to bypass the blockage were also frustrated, as the government ordered the blockage of over 100 Virtual Private Networks (VPNs). The social media blockage was justified by President Museveni as retaliation against Facebook and Twitter for their blockage of pro- ruling party accounts for what they described as coordinated inauthentic behavior aimed at manipulating public debate ahead of the 2021 general elections.

Although the Internet was restored five days later, the government ordered that social media, app stores, YouTube, GitHub, and many VPNs remain blocked indefinitely. On January 21, the State Minister for ICT and National Guidance, Peter Ogwang, issued a warning threatening to arrest all Ugandans currently using social media as they are in violation of the blockage.

INTRODUCTION OF THE OTT AND ITS RAMIFICATIONS (AS WELL AS THE RECENTLY INTRODUCED 12% EXCISE TAX ON DATA)

In 2018, the Parliament of Uganda passed the Uganda Excise Duty (Amendment) Bill 2018, which introduced taxation of "over-the-top" (OTT) services, and raised taxes on other telecommunications services violated this principle which requires service providers to treat all internet traffic equally, and not block access to online content and services. According to figures from the UCC, the number of subscribers reduced by two and a half million from 16 million to 13.5 million subscribers between July and September 2018. The same trend was noted in the amount of revenue falling from Uganda Shillings (UGX) 5.6 billion in July 2018, to UGX 3.96 billion in September 2018 (see table below).

Starting 1st July, 2021, the Ministry of Finance slapped a harmonized excise duty rate of 12% on airtime, value-added services and internet data as substitute for Uganda's controversially approved Over The Top (OTT) tax.

Access to the Internet plays a vital role in the full realization of human development and facilitates the exercise and enjoyment of a number of human rights and freedoms, including the right to freedom of expression and information, the right to education, the right to assembly and association, the right to full participation in social, cultural and political life and the right to social and economic development. Accordingly, access and affordability policies and regulations that foster universal and equal access to the Internet, including fair and transparent market regulation, universal service requirements and licensing agreements, must be adopted, according to the AfDEC.

CONCLUSION

There indeed some positive steps, especially the legal framework that Uganda has adopted to ensure compliance to the key principles as laid out in the African Declaration on Internet Rights and Freedoms – including the ICT Policies, the Access to Information Laws, the Constitutional provisions, the Data Protection Act, the Income Tax Act of 2018 that introduced the social media tax among others. There are however other laws whose provisions are quite retrogressive and these need to be amended, especially those that infringe on privacy and personal data protection such as the Regulation of Interception of Communications Act, the Computer Misuse Act among others.

B I B L I O G R A P H Y

T E X T B O O K S

A.V Dicey (1915), Introduction to the study of the Law of the Constitution 284, (8th edition.)

Adoko, Akena. (1985) Gold Crisis, (New Delhi: Vikas.)

Adu, A.L. (1965) The Civil service in New African States (New York: Random House, 1965)

Andrew, H. (2007), Politics (Macmillan: Palgrave)

Anthony, D. (1957), An Economic Theory of Democracy (New York: Harper & Brothers)

Bienen, H., (1968) "Public order and the military in Africa: mutinies in Kenya, Uganda and Tanzania," in the military intervenes: case studies in Political Development, ed by H. Bienen. (New York: Russel sage Foundation)

Bratton, M. & Nicolas Van de Walle (1997), Democratic experiments in Africa: Regime Transitions in comparative perspective, (Cambridge University Press, 1997)

Bryan A. Garner, ed., Black's Law Dictionary, 7th ed. (St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing

Byran A. Garner. (2019) Black's Law Dictionary, 11th Ed, Thomas Reuters Dallas Texas.

Carl Schmitt, (2005) Political Theology: Four Chapters on the Concept of sovereignty (George Schwab trans, Univ. Chi Press 2005)

Chilver, E.M., "Feudalism in the Interlacustrine Kingdoms" in Richards (ed). East African Chiefs (London, 1959)

Christopher Reynolds (2011), Public and Environmental Health Law, the Foundation Press, Alexandria, Australia.

Claire Macken (2013), Counter Terrorism and the detention of suspected terrorists: Preventive detention and international human rights Law. Routledge, 2013

David Hubert (2020), Attenuated Democracy, Salt Lake Community College.

Denning, A. (1949), Freedom under the Law (London: Stevens & Sons Ltd)

Denning, MR. (1972), The Discipline of the Law. (London Butterworths, 1972)

Dole, S. (1963), Trade Blocks and Common Markets, (Constab London)

Earle, J and Carney,J.(2021). Catholic Uganda and the Gospel of Democracy. In Contesting Catholics: BenedictoKiwanuka and the Birth of Postcolonial Uganda

Edith, H. Whetham and Joan I. Currie (1969). The Economics of African Countries (Cambridge University Press, 1969)

Fallers, L.A. (1964), The King's Men (Oxford University Press, London)

Farrah, J., (1971) Introduction to Legal Methods (London: Sweet & Maxwell)

Franck T.M., (1965) East African Unity through Law (Yale University Press, 1965)

Furley, Oliver and James Katarikawe, 1997, 'Constitutional Reform in Uganda: TheNew Approach', African Affairs, 96: 243-260.

G. W. F. Hegel, The Philosophy of History, trans. J. H. Clarke (New York: Dover, 1956).

Garner, J.F. (1996), Garner's Administrative Law, 8th Edn, (Butterworth's, 1996)

Giorgio Agamben (2005), The state of exception (KevinAtelltrans, Univ of chi press 2005)

Glanville Williams (2010), Learning the Law, 6thEd, Thomson Reuters (Sweet and Maxwell), London.

Hakes, J.E. (1973) "Political Stability in East Africa: an evaluation." Current History

Hancock, I.R., (1966) "The Uganda Crisis, 1966." Australian outlook

Harris, P. (2003), An Introduction to Law, 7th Edn, (Cambridge University Press, 2003)

Hood, O.P, Jackson, P. and Leopold, P.(2001), Constitutional and Administrative Law, 8th edition, (Sweet & Maxwell)

Ibingira, G.S.K (1980), African upheavals since independence. (Westviews Press)

J Ogoola, (2009) "the rape of the temple'' from songs of paradise: a harvest of poetry and verse

J.N. Hays, (2005). Epidemics and Pandemics: Their Impacts on Human History, ABC-CLIO. Inc., Santa Barbara, California 93116-1911

Jaime Oraa (1992), Human Rights in states of Emergency in international law 1

Jain, M.P. (2003), Indian Constitutional Law, vol-I 5th Ed. (Wadhwa Nagpur)

James, P.S. (1989), Introduction to Law, 12th Ed (1989)

Jennings, I. (1963), The Law and the Constitution, (University of London Press)

John M. Barry (2005), The Great Influenza: The Story of the Deadliest Pandemic in History, Penguin Group (USA) Inc., 375 Hudson Street, New York.

Jones, J. W. (1941), The law and legal theory of the Greeks (Oxford, Clarendon,)

Kanyeihamba G.W (1975), Constitutional Law And Government in Uganda

Kanyeihamba, G.W. (2010), Constitutional and Political History of Uganda 1894 to present, (Law Africa Publishing Ltd)

Kanyeihamba, G.W., Kanyeihamba's Commentaries on Law, Politics and Governance (2nd Impression 2010) (LawAfrica Publishing Ltd, 2010)

Kiwanda, Y. (2013), The Exodus of Law and Legal Methods, (LawAfrica Africa Publishing Ltd)

Low, D.A. and Pratt, C.R.(1960) , Buganda and British Rule (Oxford University Press, London, 1960)

Malcom N. Shaw, (2008), International Law 6th Ed, Cambridge University Press, New York.

Mamdani (2002), M., When victims Become Killers: Colonialism, Nativism, and the Genocide in Rwanda (Princeton University Press)

Manuel Jose Cepeda Espinosa, (2012) Privacy,'' in The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law 966, 969 (Micheal Rosenfeld &AndrasSajo

Moehler, C. Devra, 2006, 'Participation and support for the Constitution in Uganda', The Journal of Modern African Studies, 44: 275-308.

Morin, J. Y. (1959), "Book Review: An Introduction to International Law, by J. G. Starke."Osgoode Hall Law Journal1.2

Morris, H.F. and Read, S.J. (1966) , Uganda: The development of its Laws and Constitution.

Morris, H.F. and Read, S.J. (1972), Indirect rule and search for justice: Essays in East African Legal History, (Clarendon Press. Oxford)

Mukwaya, A.B., Land Tenure in Buganda. (East African Studies, No. 1)

Mulira, E.M.K.(1953), Troubled Uganda. (Falian colonial Bureau, London, 1950)

Mutibwa, P. (2009), The Buganda Factor in Uganda Politics (Fountain Publishers, 2009)

Mutibwa, P.M (1992), Uganda since independence: A story of unfulfilled Hopes (United Kingdom, C. Hurst & Co)

Nassali, Maria, 2004, 'Constitutional Transition and the Movement System inUganda', Neale, Thomas H. (2009). "Presidential Terms and Tenure: Perspectives and Proposals for Change"

Noble Marara (2017), Behind the presidential curtain: inside Out of real Paul Kagame from his former bodyguard, Create Space Independent Publishing Platform

Obote, A. M., (1968) Myths and Realities: A Letter to a London Friend, Kampala (Uganda) (African Publishers Ltd.)

Odoki, Benjamin, 2005, The Search for a National Consensus: The Making of the1995 Uganda Constitution, Kampala: Fountain.

Ofcansky, T.P (1966), Uganda: Tarnished Pearl of Africa (Boulder: Westview. Press, 1996)

Okuku, J. A. (2002), Ethnicity, State power and the democratization process in Uganda. (Institute of Global Dialogue, Braamfontein)

Paul Craig (2021) Administrative law 17th edition, Sweet and Maxwell.

Preben V. Askgaard (1974), A Bibliography on Amin's Uganda. (Ufahamu: A Journal of African Studies 5(1))

Prof K.C. Joshi (2006), International Law and Human Rights, Eastern Book Company.

Robert, H. James, M. (2015), Magna Carta and its Modern Legacy (Cambridge University Press)

Samuel Issachar off (2016), The Law of Democracy: the Legal Structure of the Political Process, 5th Ed, Foundation Press, New York

Shears, P and Stephenson, G. (1996), James' Introduction to English Law, 13th Edition (Oxford University Press)

Smith, Ivan (1980), Ghosts of Kampala, (New York: St. Martin's Press)

Speke, J.H. (1864), Journal of the Discovery of the source of the Nile. (Edinburgh, London, W. Blackwood and Sons)

Starke, J. G. (1958), An Introduction to International Law. 4th edition, (London: Butterworth & Co. Ltd)

Thomas, H.B. and Scott (1935), R., Uganda (Oxford University Press, London)

Thomas, H.B. and Spencer (1938), A.E., A history of Uganda Lands and Surveys (Government Printer, Entebbe, 1938)

Trebilcock, M.J. and Daniels, R.J (2008) Rule of law reform and development: charting the fragile path of progress. Northampton: Edward Elgar.

Turner, G.J. (1922), Tudor Constitutional documents. (Cambridge University Press)

Uganda., The birth of the Second Republic of Uganda. (Entebbe Government Printer, 1971)

Wade, H.W.R (1980), on administrative law, 5th edition. (Oxford University Press, 1980)

Woodbridge, Suffolk (GB); Rochesteer NY (US): Boydell& Brewer.

Yardley, M.D. (1978), Introduction to British Constitutional Law, 7th Edition (1978)

JOURNAL ARTICLES

"Bunyoro Lost counties, Preliminary correspondence between the Mubende-Banyoro Committee and the Resident", "Buganda early in the 1920's" Entebbe National archives, REL/s/121

"Independence Constitution, Schedule 7", pp.10-13 Entebbe National Archives, C10736/ DGc 230 III.

"Parliament Hansards", 3rd Session 1966, Vol. 67, Uganda National Assembly Archives.

"Parliamentary Hansards", 3rd Session 1965 to 1966, Uganda National Assembly Archives.

"Report of the Constitutional Conference London", 1962, Police Functions Entebbe National Archives, C10628/7

Adams, George Burton (1920). "Origin of the English Courts of Common Law". Yale Law Journal. Yale University. 30 (1). ISSN 0044-0094

Africa Development, Vol XXXIX, No.2, 2014 pp2.1-46, council for the Development of Social Science Research in Africa, 2014(ISSN 0850-3907)

Amnesty International, Uganda: Failure to Safeguard Human Rights (Amnesty International, London, 1992) and "State of Pain: Torture in Uganda" in Human Rights Watch, March 2004, Vol.16No. 4 (A).

Announcement of the City Headquarters for the Prevention and Control of Pneumonia Epidemic Caused by New Coronavirus Infection (No. 1), [online] available at; http://www.wh.gov.cn/zwgk/tzgg/202003/t20200316_972434.shtml(accessed on May 27th, 2021)

Arnold, A., Bickler, G. & Harrison, T. S. 2019. The first five years of Part 2A Orders: the use of powers from court applications to protect public health in England 2010–15, Journal of Public Health, 41, 27–35.

Azari, J.(2013).Institutional Mandate. Social Science History, 37(4), 483-514. Retrieved May 30,2021,fromhttps://www/jstor.org/stable/24573940

Background, Public Health Agency Of Canada (PHAC), [online] available at; https://www.canada.ca/en/public-health/corporate/mandate/about-agency/background.html (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Bailey, K. (1994). Methods of Social Research, 4thed. New York: The Free Press.

Baker, J. H. (2002). An Introduction to English Legal History. Butterworths. ISBN 0-406-93053-8.

Bartoloni-Tuazon, Kathleen (2014). For Fear of an Elective King. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Bevan Shields, (2020) . 'A serious breach': Geoffrey Robertson says flight cap violates human rights, The Sydney Morning Herald, [online] available at; https://www.smh.com.au/world/europe/australia-s-covid-19-flight-caps-breach-human-rights-geoffrey-robertson-20201107-p56cc8.html (accessed May 27th, 2021)

Bickford, A. (2015). in International Encyclopedia of the Social & Behavioral Sciences. 2nd Ed.

Brian Shilhavy, 2019. https://www.cga.ct.gov/2020/phdata/tmy/2020HB-05044-R000219-Wrinn,%20Chris%208-TMY.PDF

Bull and A Watson (1984), Expansion of International Society, Clarendon Press, Oxford

Busingye K., (2020). The 1995 Constitution and Covid-19 by Dr BusingYEKKAbumba, [online], available at; https://observer.ug/viewpoint/64295-constitution-and-covid-19-are-presidential-directives-unconstitutional(accessed on 27th May 2021)

Cabinet Office, Departments Responsibilities for Planning, Response, and Recovery from Emergencies, 2011, at 6, [online] available at; https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/61028/Emergency_Preparedness_chapter5_amends_21112011.pdf(accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Cameron Stewart, et al. (2020), COVID-19: Restrictive practices and the law during a global pandemic – an Australian perspective, International Journal of Mental Health Nursing 29, 753–755

Carol Summers, 2018. Scandal and Mass Politics: Buganda's 1941Nnamasole Crisis, International Journal of African Historical Studies 51, no. 1 (2018): 63-83.

Caroli, Betty Boyd (2003). First Ladies. Oxford University Press US. p. 4. ISBN 978-0-19-516676-7.

Chayes, A. (1976), The Role of the Judge in Public Law Litigation. (Harvard Law Review,89(7))

Cheng VCC, et al. (2007). Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus as an Agent of Emerging and Re-emerging Infection. ClinMicrobiol Rev.20: 660-694

Chevigny, P., G. (1990). "Police deadly force as social control: Jamaica, Argentina, and Brazil." Criminal Law Forum, 1:389-425.

China Media Project (2020). The truth about "Dramatic Action", [online] available at; https://chinamediaproject.org/2020/01/27/dramatic-actions/(accessed on May 27th, 2021)

Christian W. McMillen (2016), Pandemics: A Very Short Introduction, Oxford University Press, New York.

Christopher Hibbert (1980), The Great Mutiny: India 1857

Chuter, D. &Gaub, F. (2016). Understanding African armies. Issue Report No. 27, April 2016. Paris: Jouve.

Clare Feikert-Ahalt, (2015), England: Legal Responses to Health Emergencies, Library of Congress, [online] available at; https://www.loc.gov/law/help/health-emergencies/england.php(accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Clarke S, Antonio V, et al. (2020), How Coronavirus spread across the globe-visualised, The Guardian; April 09, 2020, available at; https://www.theguardian.com/world/ng-interactive/2020/apr/09/how-coronavirus-spread-across-the-globe-visualised(accessed on May 17, 2021)

Coker, R. J. (2003), Public health impact of detention of individuals with tuberculosis: a systematic literature review. Public Health, 117, 281–287.

Colin J. Bennett, (2013), Department of Political Science University of Victoria, Victoria, BC Canada

Conflict Prevention Network, Peace-building and Conflict Prevention in Developing Countries: A Practical Guide (Berlin 2001).

Coote, M. The Kivu Mission, 1909 – 10. (Uganda Journal, 1956)

Corley, P., &Wedeking, J. 2014. The (Dis)Advantage of Certainty: The Importance of Certainty in Language. Law & Society Review, 48(1), 35-62. Available at; https://www.jstor.org/stable/pdf/43670375.pdf?refreqid=excelsior%3Aa0d4f9115320544cb232279f5f88fad9 (accessed on 27 May 2021)

Creswell, J., W. (2003). Research Design: Qualitative, quantitative and mixed methods approaches. London and New Dheli: Sage Publications, Thousand Oaks.

David G. Adler (1996), The judiciary and Presidential Power in Foreign Affairs: A Critique, 1 RICH.J.L & PUB.INT.1https://scholarship.richmond.edu.jolpi/vol1/iss1/3c

David MM, et al. (2020), The Origin Of Covid-19 And Why It Matters, The American Journal of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene, 103(3), 2020, pp. 955-959

David P Fidler, (2020), 'The World Health Organization and Pandemic Politics', available at; www.thinkglobalhealth.org/Article/world-health-organization-and-pandemic-politics(accessed on 24th May 2021.)

David P. Fidler, (2020), "To fight a New Coronavirus: The COVID-19 Pandemic, Political Herd Immunity, and Global Health Jurisprudence, Oxford University Press

Dep't of Health and Public Health England, November 2013. Framework Agreement Between the Department of Health and Public Health England, at p.1, [online] available at; https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/677457/Framework_agreement_between_DHSC_and_PHE_2018.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Difference Between Head of State and Head of Government | Difference Between http://www.differencebetween.net/miscellaneous/politics/difference-between-head-of-state-and-head-of-government/#ixzz6zIZYYufx

Dr Jane Ruth Aceng, (2020), Update on the Covid-19 response in Uganda, Ministry of Health Press Release, available on; https://www.health.go.ug/covid/2020/04/02/update-on-the-covid-19-response-in-uganda/(accessed on May 17, 2021)

Dr June Wang (2020), China's legal response to Covid-19, [online] Available at https://lexatlas-c19.org/chinas-legal-response-to-covid-19/(accessed on May 27th, 2021)

Dr. R.C. Majumdar, British Paramountcy and Indian Renaissance, Part–II,

Eleazu, Uma O. (1973) "The role of the Army in African Politics: A reconsideration of Existing Theories and Practices." (Journal of Developing Areas)

Enloe, C. (2000). Maneuvers: The International Politics of Militarizing Women's Lives. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Fareed Zakaria, (2020), Ten Lessons for a Post-Pandemic World, W.W. Norton & Company

G. W Kanyeihamba (1984), The rule of law, Judicialism , and Development.

Garcia, Micheal J, Devereaux, Caitlain, Nolan, Lewis Andrew, Totten, Meghan, Tyson, Ashley (Eds), (2017), "The constitution of the United States of America Analysis and Interpretation Centennial Edition" /PDF

George W.K.L Kasozi (2008), The concept of Rule of law and Protection of Human rights: The Ugandan Experience: 1986 to the Present. The Living Law journal, law reform Commission, June 2008. Vol.6, No.1

Gertzel, C. (1972), "Leadership and Institution building in Uganda." (The African ReviEW)

Ghai, Y. P (1972), Constitutions and the Political order in East Africa. (International and Comparative Law Quarterly)

Gian L Burci, (2020), The Legal Response to Pandemics: The Strengths and Weaknesses of the International Health Regulations, Journal of International Humanitarian Legal Studies 11 (2020) 204-217

Gingyera-Pinchwa. (1978), Apollo Milton and his Times. Nok.

Glenn Ames (2012). Ivana Elbl (ed.). Portugal and its Empire, 1250–1800 (Collected Essays in Memory of Glenn J. Ames).: Portuguese Studies Review, Vol. 17, No. 1. Trent University Press.

Halsbury's Laws of England, volume 12(1): "Crown and Royal Family"

Halsbury's Laws of England, volume 12(1): "Crown Proceedings and Crown Practice"

Hansen, H. B. (1977). Ethnicity and military rule in Uganda: A study of ethnicity as a political factor in Uganda, based on a discussion of political anthropology and the application of its results. Nordiska Afrikainstitutet.

Hanson, "Queen Mothers and Good Government," 219–32

Harvey, WB, (1961). "The Rule of Law in Historical Perspective," Articles by Maurer Faculty, Paper 1168 available at http://www.repository.law.indiana.edu/facpub/1168 (accessed May 17th, 2021)

Helen Davidson (2020), China's coronavirus health code apps raise concerns over privacy, The Guardian, [online] available at; https://www.theguardian.com/world/2020/apr/01/chinas-coronavirus-health-code-apps-raise-concerns-over-privacy(accessed on May 27th, 2021)

HM Government, Emergency Response and Recovery: Non-Statutory Guidance Accompanying the Civil Contingencies Act 2004, Oct. 2013, [online] available at; https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/253488/Emergency_Response_and_Recovery_5th_edition_October_2013.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Holden Furber (1976), Rival Empires of Trade in the Orient, 1600–1800, University of Minnesota Press.

Hughes, Siobhan; Wise, Lindsay (2021). "Most Republican Senators Reject Constitutionality of Trump Impeachment". Wall Street Journal.

Huq, Aziz; Ginsburg, Tom; Landau, David. "Designing Better Impeachments: How other countries' constitutions protect against political free-for-alls". Boston Review.

Hutson, James H. (1968). "John Adams' Title Campaign". The New England Quarterly. 41 (1): 30–39

IDLO, July 30, 2020. Rule Of Law In The Time Of Covid-19: Kenya, [online] available at; https://www.idlo.int/news/notes-from-the-field/rule-law-time-covid-19-kenya (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Ignacio Arana Araya (2019) , To Impeach or Not to Impeach: Lessons from Latin America, Georgetown Journal of International Affairs (December 13, 2019).

Ingham, K. (1994). Obote: a political biography. Psychology Press.

Ingham, K. (1994). Obote: a political biography. Psychology Press.

Interim edition: Analysis of cases decided by the supreme court of the united states to August 26, 2017. Washington, DC; U.S Government printing office p.II. 112th congress, 2nd session, senate document no.112-9. Retrieved Nov 24, 2019. On en.m.wikipedia.org on 2nd April, 2021.

International Development Law Organisation, 2020. The Vital Role of Law in the COVID-19 Response

International Humanitarian Legal Studies, 2020. “International Law in a Time of Pandemic”, Journal of International Humanitarian Legal Studies 11(2020) 187-191.

James A. Goldston (2006), Public Interest Litigation in Central and Eastern Europe. Human Rights Quarterly 28 (2006) 492 – 527. (John Hopkins University Press.)

James V. Saturno, Bill Heniff Jr., & Megan S. Lynch, Cong. Res. Serv., R42388, The Congressional Appropriations Process: An Introduction 19, [online] available at; https://perma.cc/2K5A-JNPT (accessed on 27th May 2021)

Jennifer K. Elsea et al., Cong. Res. Serv., R46379, Emergency Authorities under the National Emergencies Act, Stafford Act, and Public Health Service Act 1-2, [online] available at; https://perma.cc/XLU5-55UN (accessed on 27th May, 2021)

Jobbins, M., O, (2017). We need to learn from recent crises in West Africa: Local governance and civil society solutions. In Jobbins, M., Opalo, K. O., Mbaku, J. M. (2017). (eds) Upholding good governance: Democracy, elections, and local institutions under political and social uncertainty.[online].https://www.africaportal.org/publications/.

Johannessen, C. The Restoration of Kingship in Uganda: A comparative study of Buganda and Ankole.

John Finch (2020, Legal Aspects of Covid-19 Pandemic Management for Community Nurses.

John S. Mills.(1861), Representative Government.

Jorgensen, J. J. (1981) Uganda: A Modern History. Croom Helm Limited.

Justice Byaruhanga; Democracy in Uganda after 50 years of independence; Acknowledgement of Claudia Grossman (1986), A frame work for the examination of state of emergency under the American Convention on Human rights, 1 AM.U.J INT'L & POL'Y 35, 36(1986)

Kabumba, B. (2018). Key note presentation on Militarizing Public Service in Uganda: A Solution to the Governance Crisis? Symposium held at the School of Law, Makerere University Tuesday, April 17, 2018, 2:00-5:30pm.

Kanyeheimba, G.W. (2002). Constitutional and Political History of Uganda from 1894 to present. Centenary Publishing House.

Karugire, S.R. (1980). A political History of Uganda. Heinemann Educational Books

Kasozi, A. B. K. (2013). The Bitter Bread of Exile. The Financial Problems of Sir Edward Mutesa II during his final exile, 1966-1969: The Financial Problems of Sir Edward Mutesa II during his final exile, 1966-1969. Progressive Publishing House.

Kerridge, I., Lowe, M. & Stewart, C. (2013), Ethics and Law for the Health Professions, 4th edn. Sydney: Federation Press.

Kiran K.G., Donthagani V., and Veeraiahgari R.R., February 28th, 2021. COVID-19 and the legislative response in India: The need for acomprehensive health care law, [online] available at; https://onlinelibrary.wiley.com/doi/epdf/10.1002/pa.2669 (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Kittredge,J.(2003) Presidents, Congress, and the Use of Force: A Critique of Presidential Powers. The History Teacher, 37(1), 89-98. Doi:10.2307/ 1555603

Kjaer, Anne Mette, 'Old brooms can sweep too! An Overview of Rulers andPublic Sector Reforms in Uganda, Tanzania and Kenya', Journal of ModernAfrican Studies, 42 (3): 389-413.

Koshy, M.O. (1989). The Dutch Power in Kerala, 1729–1758. Mittal Publications. p. 61. ISBN 978-81-7099-136-6.

Kumar, R. (2015), Right to health: Challenges and opportunities. Indian Journal of Community Medicine, 40(4), 218–222

Lamont, S., Stewart, C. & Chiarella, M (2019), Capacity and consent: knowledge and practice of legal and healthcare standards, Nursing Ethics, 26, 71–83.

Landau, Sidney; Brantley, Sheila; Davis, Samuel; Koenigsberg, Ruth, eds. (1996). Funk & Wagnall's Standard Desk Dictionary. 1 (1996 ed.). United States: Harper & Row, Publishers, Inc. p. 322. ISBN 978-0-308-10353-5. 1

Laurence Juma and Chuks Okpaluba., Judicial Intervention in Kenya's Constitutional Review Process, 11 Wash. U. Global Stud. L. Rev.287 (2012)

Lawler, David. "What impeaching leaders looks like around the world". Axios.

Lawrence O Gostin and Rebecca Katz, (2016), The International Health Regulations: The Governing Framework for Global Health Security, 54(2) Milbank Q, 264-313.

Li Q, Guan X, et al (2020), Early transmission dynamics in Wuhan, China, of novel coronavirus-infected pneumonia, New England Journal of Medicine.

Lonsdale, J. (1983). Uganda: Recent History in James Bennett (ed.) Africa South of the Sahara. Europa Publications limited.

Lwanga-Lunyiigo, S. (2007). The Struggle for Land in Buganda: 1888-2005. Wavah Books.

M.V. Beusekom, (2020), Study: Contact tracing slowed COVID-19 spread in China, Centre for Infectious Diseases Research and Policy, [online] available at; https://www.cidrap.umn.edu/news-perspective/2020/04/study-contact-tracing-slowed-covid-19-spread-china(accessed on May 27th, 2021)

Manchester, A. H. (1980). Modern Legal History. Butterworths. ISBN 0-406-62264-7

Martha Butler & Marlisa Tiedemann, Sept. 2011; revised Sept. 2013. Library of Parliament, Legal and Social Affairs Division, The Federal Role in Health and Health Care § 1, Pub. No. 2011-91-E)

Memish ZA, et al. 2013. Family Cluster of Middle East Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus Infections, New England Journal of Medicine, 368(26): 2487-94

Michael J. Gerhardt (2019). The Federal Impeachment Process: A Constitutional and Historical Analysis (3d ed.). University of Chicago Press.

Ministry of Justice and Constitutional Affairs, March 2014. Manual On The Legislative Process In Uganda, First Parliamentary Counsel, available at; https://www.jlos.go.ug/index.php/document-centre/legislation/326-legislative-process-in-uganda/file (accessed on 27th May 2021)

Mittelman, J. H. (1975). Ideology and politics in Uganda: from Obote to Amin. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Modern India, Bipin Chandra

Mudoola, D. M. (1996). Religion, ethnicity, and politics in Uganda. Fountain Books

Muhammad AS. et al. 2020. Covid-19 Infection: Origin, Transmission and Characteristics of Human Coronaviruses, Journal of Advanced Research, 24 (2020) 91-98

Musisi F., Herbst R.O., & Mahajubu A., 2018, Unlocking The Mysteries Of The Origins Of The 1966 Ugandan Constitutional Crisis, Global Journal of Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences Vol.6, No.3, pp.14-25.

Mutibwa, P. M. (1992). Uganda since independence: a story of unfulfilled hopes. Africa World Press.

N.S. Bose (1976), India Awakening and Bengal

Nampewo, Z. (2018).Welcome and opening remarks at Symposium held at the School of Law, Makerere University on Militarizing Public Service in Uganda: A Solution to the Governance Crisis? Tuesday, April 17, 2018, 2:00-5:30pm.

Naomi Choi(2010), Rule of Law: Political Philosophy, SAGE Publications' Encyclopaedia of Political Theory University of Houston, [online] available at; https://www.britannica.com/topic/rule-of-law(accessed on 1st July, 2021)

Nectar Gan and David Culver(2020), China is fighting the coronavirus with a digital QR code. Here is how it works, CNN Business, [online] available at; https://edition.cnn.com/2020/04/15/asia/china-coronavirus-qr-code-intl-hnk/index.html(accessed on May 27th, 2021)

Neil Kodesh, "Renovating Tradition: The Discourse of Succession in Colonial Buganda," International Journal of African Historical Studies 34, 3 (2004), 512, 517.

NHS Commissioning Board, NHS Commissioning Board Emergency Preparedness Framework 2013, para. 1.4, [online] available at; https://www.wyccn.org/uploads/6/5/1/9/65199375/nhs_commissioning_board_eprr_framework_march_2013.pdf(accessed on May 28th, 2021)

NHS England, July 2014. NHS England Core Standards for Emergency Preparedness, Resilience and Response (EPRR), [online] available at; https://www.england.nhs.uk/wp-content/uploads/2015/11/eprr-framework.pdf(accessed on May28th, 2021)

Nsibambi, A. R. (2014). National integration in Uganda 1962-2013. Fountain Publishers.

O'Donnell, Guillermo A. (2004), "Why the Rule of Law Matters," Journal of Democracy 15(4); WeingastB.1997; The political foundations of democracy and the rule of law'. Am. Polit. Sci. Rev. 91(2):245–6

Oba, A., A. (2005). Human rights concerns in Museveni's Uganda. Journal of the Indian Law

Institute, Vol. 47, No. 3 July-September. (2005): 351-360.

Oloka Onyango (1993), Judicial Power and Constitutionalism in Uganda.

Oloka-Onyango, J. (2015), "Human rights and public interest litigation in East Africa: A bird's eye view." (The George Washington International Law Review, 2015)

Oloka-Onyango, Joe, 2004, 'New-Breed' Leadership, Conflict, and Reconstructionin the Great Lakes Region of Africa: A Sociopolitical Biography of Uganda'sYoweri Kaguta Museveni', Africa Today, 50 (3): 29-52;

Parry J. (2020), COVID-19: Cases surge as Official Admits Human-to-Human Transmission, British Medical Journal Publishing Group.

Patro, K. B., Tripathy, J. P., & Kashyap, R. (2013), Epidemic diseases act1897, India: Whether sufficient to address the current challenges? Journal of Mahatma Gandhi Institute of Medical Sciences, 18(2), 109–11

Paulo Kavuma, 1979. Crisis in Buganda 1953 the Story of the Exile and Return of the Kabaka Mutesa II, Rex Collings, London.

Payne, G., & and Payne, J. (2004). Key concepts in social research, London: Sage Publications.

Peiris J, et al. (2004), Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome, Nat Med; 10(12): S88-97;

Phan LT, et al. (2020), Importation and Human-to-Human transmission of a novel coronavirus in Vietnam, New England Journal of Medicine.

Pochhammer, Wilhelm von (1981), India's road to nationhood: a political history of the subcontinent, Allied Publishers, ISBN 978-81-7764-715-0

Possession of Land Law of 1908, Rev. L., 1951, vol. VII, 1219.

Power, T., Baker, A. & Jackson, D. (2020), Only ever as a last resort': Mental health nurses' experiences of restrictive practices, International Journal of Mental Health Nursing, 29, 674–684.

Pratt R.C., 1955. The Anatomy of a Crisis: Uganda, 1953-55, International Journal, Autumn, 1955, Vol. 10, No. 4 (Autumn, 1955), pp. 267-275.

Public Health England, Pandemic Influenza Response Plan 2014, paras. 1, 2, 2.3, 3.1, [online] available at; https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/344695/PI_Response_Plan_13_Aug.pdf(accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Pyrc K. et al. 2007. Identification of New Human Coronaviruses, Expert Review of Anti-infective Therapy; 5(2): 245-53

Rahman A & Sarkar A. 2019. Risk Factors For Fatal Middle East Respiratory Syndrome Coronavirus Infections In Saudi Arabia: Analysis Of The WHO Line List, 2013-2018, American Journal of Public Health, 109(9): 1288-93

Rai, K. S., April 2, 2020. How the epidemic diseases act of 1897 came to be. The Wire, [online] available at; https://thewire.in/history/colonialism-epidemic-diseases-act(accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Randall, C. (1975). Conflict Sociology. New York, NY: Academic Press.

Responding to an Infectious Disease Outbreak: Progress Between SARS and Pandemic Influenza H1N1, PHAC, [online] available at; https://www.phac-aspc.gc.ca/cpip-pclcpi/assets/pdf/report-rapport-2015-eng.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Riley, Russell L. "Bill Clinton: Domestic Affairs". millercenter.org. Charlottesville, Virginia: The Miller Center, University of Virginia

Riou J, et al. 2020. Pattern of early human-to-human transmission of Wuhan 2019 novel coronavirus (2019-nCov), Eurosurveillance; 25 (4)

Roshan, D., &Deeptee, P., R. (2009). Justifications for Qualitative Research in Organizations: A step forward. The Journal of Online Education, 06 January. New York,

RSTV Bureau, 2020. Epidemic Act and Disaster Management Act enforced to combat COVID-19, [online] available at; https://rstv.nic.in/epidemic-act-disaster-management-act-enforced-combat-covid-19.html(accessed May 28th, 2021)

Samuel E. Finer(1999), The History of Governments from the Earliest Times, Vol.3, Oxford University Press, p.1485-1491

Sanjay Subrahmanyam, (2012), The Portuguese empire in Asia, 1500–1700: a political and economic history

Sathyamurthy, T. V. (1986). The Political Development of Uganda, 1900-1985 (Vol. 1). Gower.

Saul David(2003), The Indian Mutiny, Penguin Books

Scott P. Sheeran, Reconceptualizing states of emergence under international Human rights Law: Theory, Legal doctrine and politics, 34 MICH.J.INT'L L. 491(2013)

Scott, W. P. (2018). Police Militarization. [Online]. Available at:DOI: 10.1093/obo/9780195396607-0249. Accessed on June 13, 2019.

Srinath Raghavan (12 November 2013). 1971. Harvard University Press. ISBN 978-0-674-73129-5.

Ssemwanga Kivumbi. (2013). Ssekabaka Muteesa II Eyeerabirwa. Grapet Traders.

Steiner, J., Woods, L. and Twigg-Flesner, C. (2003) Textbook on EC Law, Oxford, Oxford University Press, pp. 57--62.

Sunkin, Maurice (2003). "Crown immunity from criminal liability in English law". Public Law (Winter 2003): 716–729.

Symonds, Richard (1950). The Making of Pakistan. London: Faber and Faber. p. 74. OCLC 1462689.

Taubenberger JK, et. al. 2019. The 1918 influenza pandemic: 100 years of questions answered and unanswered, Sci Transl Med 11:eeaau5485

The Law Library of Congress, February 2015. Legal Responses to Health Emergencies, Global Legal Research Center, [online] available at; https://www.loc.gov/law/help/health-emergencies/health-emergencies.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

The Library of Congress, 2020. "Responses to COVID-19 in the United States", [online] available at; https://www.loc.gov/law/help/covid-19-responses/us.php(accessed on 27th May, 202) the problems and possible solutions pp. 10.

Tom R. Hickman (2005), Between Human rights and the Rule of Law: indefinite Detention and derogation Model of constitutionalism, 68 MOD.L.REV 655

Uganda Human Rights Commission. (2019). Uganda: Police remains top violator of human rights – UHRC. Available at: http://dispatch.ug/2018/06/08/uganda-police-remains-top-violator-human-rights-uhrc/. Accessed on June 10, 2019.

UNDP(2011), Strengthening the Rule of Law in Crisis-affected and Fragile Situations. New York: UNDP, at 8, 11.

United States Department of State (2018). Country Reports (Uganda) on Human Rights Practices for 2017. Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labour. Washington: United States Department of State.

Wang C, et al. 2020. A novel coronavirus outbreak of global health concern, The Lancet.

WHO, 2020. "The World Health Organisation and Pandemic Politics", available at; www.who.int/detail/30-01-2020-statement-on-the-second-meeting-of-the-international-health-regulations-(2005)-emergency-committee-regarding-the-outbreak-of-novel-coronavirus-(2019-ncov)(accessed on 24th May, 2021).

Wieviorka, M. (2013). Social conflict. Current Sociology, 61, 5-6, (696),

Wood, Gordon S. (2006). Revolutionary Characters. Penguin Press. p. 54. ISBN 978-1-59420-093-9. "Forms of Address: How to Address the President". HuffPost. 1 January 2013

PAPERS AND PRESENTATIONS

Amin, I. “Speech by His Excellency, General Amin to Asian Conference, December 1971.” (East African Journal. 9, 1972)

“Speech by the Prime Minister the Hon DR.AM Obote, MP,” on Thursday 3rd March 1966, Uganda National Assembly Archives.

Presented in partnership with the Richard Paul Richman center at Columbia University and the national constitution center.

Speech by President von der Leyen at the State of the Union conference of the European University Institute, 6th May, 2021, [online] available at; https://ec.europa.eu/commission/presscorner/detail/en/SPEECH_21_2284 (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

SECONDARY MATERIAL.

Africa's 'Constitutionalism Revival': False Start or New Dawn? (2007) 5 Int'lJ. Const. L. 469.

Orality in the Service of Karamojong Autonomy: Polity and Performace (2006) 18J. Afr. Cultural Studies 137.

The Isma'ili Khojas of East Africa (1964) 1 Middle Eastern Studies 21. Barrett-Gaines, Kathryn & Lynn Khadiagala, "Finding What You Need in Uganda's Archives" (2000) Hist. in Afr. 455.

The Role of Law in the Transition of Societies: The African Experience" (1991) 35 J. Afr. L. 8.

Two Early Surveys of Native Courts in Uganda" (1967) 11J. Afr. L. 159. (Burlington: Ashgate, 2005).

Achebe, Chinua. A Man of the People (London: Heinemann, 1966).

Allott, A.N., (1970) Judicial and Legal Systems in Africa, 2nd ed. (London: Butterworths).

Anderson, J.N.D (1970) Islamic Law in Africa (London: Cass)

Anderson, J.N.D. "Muslim Marriages and the Courts in East Africa" (1957) 1J. Afr. L.14.

Anna'im, Abdullahi A. (2001) "The Legal Protection of Human Rights In Africa: How To Do More With less".

Arendt, Hannah (1963), On Revolution (London: Penguin Books

Austin Sarat & Thomas R. Keams, (2001) Human Rights: Concepts, Contests, Contingencies (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2001).

Baker, G.P. & P.M.S. Hacker, (1985) Wittgenstein: Rules, Grammar and Necessity, Volume 2 an Analytical Commentary on the Philosophical Investigations (Oxford: Blackwell).

Barber, James (1968), Imperial Frontier: A SturdyRelations Between the British and the Pastoral TribesNorth East Uganda (Nairobi: East African Publishing House).

Bennett, T.W. (1991), A Sourcebook African Customary Law for Southern Africa (Cape Town: Juta).

Beyond Rights Talk and Culture Talk: Comparative Essqys on the Politics of Rights and Culture (New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000).

Blackwell, 1968).

Brookfield, F.M. "The Courts, Kelsen, and the Rhodesian Revolution" (1969) 19 U.T.L.J.326.

Bussey, Erica. "Constitutional Dialogue in Uganda" (2005) 49 J. Afr. L. 1. Cooke, Peter & Martin Doornbos. "Rwenzururu Protest Songs" (1982) 52 Africa: J. Int'l Afr. Institute 37.

Chanock, Martin. Law (1985), Custom and Social Order: The Colonial Experience in Malawi and Zambia(Cambridge: Cambridge University Press)

Citizen and Subject: Contemporary Africa and the Legacy of Late Colonialism (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1996).

Clark, David J. & Gerard McCoy (2000), The Most Fundamental Legal Right: Habeas Corpus in the Commonwealth (Oxford: Clarendon Press)

Coetzee, J.M. (1999) Waiting for the Barbarians (New York: Penguin Books)

Crabtree, W.A. "The Languages of the Uganda Protectorate" (1914) 13J. Royal Afr. Society 152.

Cullimore, Charles. "Uganda: The Making of a Constitution" (1994) 32 J. Mod. Afr. Studies 707

Date-Bah, S.K. "Jurisprudence's Day in Court in Ghana" (1971) 20 I.C.L.Q. 315. De Smith, S.A. "Southern Rhodesia Act 1965" (1966) 29 The Modern L. Rev. 301.

David, Rene and Camille Jauffret-Spinosi, (2002) Les grands systemes de droit contemporains, 11th ed. (Paris: Dalloz)

Dias, F.W.M. "Legal Politics: Norms Behind the Grundnoml' (1968) 26 Cambridge L.J. 233.

Dyson-Hudson, Neville (1966) Karimojong Politics (Oxford: Clarendon Press)

Eekelaar, J.M. "Rhodesia: The Abdication of Constitutionalism" (1969) 32 Mod. L. Rev. 19.

Fanon, Franz (1967) Towards the African Revolution: Political Essqys, trans. Haakon Chevalier (New York: Grove Press)

Fanon, Franz (1969) Pour Ia revolution cifricaine: Ecrits politiques (Paris: Francois Maspero)

Finnis, J .M. (1973) "Revolutions and Continuity in Law" in A.W.B. Simpson, ed., Oxford Essays inJurisprudence: Second Series (Oxford: Clarendon Press)

Fuller, Lon. The Morality Law, rev. ed. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1964). Glenn, H. Patrick. Legal Traditions the World, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press,2004).

Ghai, Yash. "Matovu's Case: Another Comment" (1968) 1 Eastern Africa L. Rev. 68.

Glenn, H. Patrick. "Doin' the Transsystemic: Legal Systems and Legal Traditions" (2005) 50 McGill L.J. 863 at 876.

Hailey, William Malcolm (1957) An African Survey: A Sturfy rif Problems Arising in Africa South

the Sahara, rev. 1956 (London: Oxford University Press)

Hanson, Holly Elisabeth (2003) Landed Obligation: The Practice if Power in Buganda (Portsmouth, N.H.: Heinemann).

Hart, H.L.A. The Concept rif Law (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1961)

Hassan, Farooq (1984) "A Juridical Critique of Successful Treason: A Jurisprudential Analysis of the Constitutionality of a Coup d'Etat in the Common Law" (1984) 20 Stan. J. Int'l L. 191.

Hatchard, John & Tunde I. Ogowewo.(2003) Tackling the Unconstitutional Overthrow rif Democracies: Emerging Trends in the Commonwealth (London: Commonwealth Secretariat)

Haydon (1960), E.S. Law and Justice in Buganda (London: Butterworths, 1960).

Hegel, George (1991), The Philosophy of History, trans. by]. Sibree (New York: Prometeus Books)

Herbst, Jeffrey (2000) States and Power in Africa: Comparative Lessons in Authority and Control(Princeton: Princeton University Press)

Hone, H.R. "The Native of Uganda and the Criminal Law" (1939) 21 J. Comp. Legs. & Int'l. L. 179.

Human Rights Institute, "Judicial Independence Undermined: A Report on Uganda" (September 2007), online: International Bar Association

Human Rights Watch, "'Get the Gun!': Human Rights Violations by Uganda's National Army in Law Enforcement Operations in Karamoja Region" (11 September 2007) vol.19, online: hrw.org <http:/ /hrw.org/reports/2007 /uganda0907 /index.htm>.

Hume, David. A Treatise of Human Nature (Bristol: Thoemmes Press, 2001).

Kanyeihamba, G.W. "The Culture of Constitutionalism and the Doctrine of Separation of Powers" (Lecture delivered at the Faculty of Law, Makerere University, 15 March 2007) [unpublished].

Kanyeihamba, George W. (1998) Reflections on the Muslim Leadership Question in Uganda (Kampala: Fountain Publishers)

Kasozo, A.B.K. The Spread of Islam in Uganda, 1844-1945 (D. Phil. Thesis, University of Santa Cruz, 1974) [unpublished].

Kelsen, Hans (1945) Genera/Theory ofLaw and State, trans. Anders Wedberg (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press)

Khadiagala, Lynn S. (2001) "The Failure of Popular Justice in Uganda: Local Councils and Women's Property Rights" 32 Development & Change 55.

Kirkby, Coel. "Linking Popular Participation and Democratic Representation in Constitution-Making in Eastern and Southern Africa" (Paper presented at the VIIth World Conference of the International Association of Constitutional Law, Athens, Greece, 11-15June 2007) [unpublished].

Knighton, Ben. "The State as Raider among the Karamojong: 'Where There Are No Guns, They Use the Threat of Guns"' (2003) 73 Africa: J. Int'l Afr. Institute 427.

Knighton, Ben. The Vitality of Karamojong Religion: Dying Tradition or Living Faith?

Law and Justice in a Multicultural Sociery: The Case of Mozambique (Dakar, Senegal: Council for the Development of Social Science Research in Africa, 2006).

Lewis, Julius. "Native Courts and British Justice in Africa" (1944) 14 Africa: J. Int'l Aft. Institute 448

Longman Dictionary of contemporary English

Lugard, Frederick. The Dual Mandate in British TropicalAfrica, 5th ed. (Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1965).

Macdonald, R.A. & M-M. Kleinhans. (1997) "What Is a Critical Legal Pluralism?" 12 Can. J. L. & Soc. 25.

Mahmud, Tayyab. "Jurisprudence of Successful Treason: Coup d'Etat & Common Law" (1994) Cornell Int'l L.J. 49.

Mamdani, Mahmood & Joe Oloka-Onyango, eds. Uganda: Studies in Living Conditions, Popular Movements and Constitutionalism (Vienna: Journal fur1994).

Mamdani, Mahmood (1984) Imperialism and Fascism in Uganda (Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press)

Marshall, H.H. "The Legal Effects of U.D.I. (Based on Madzimbamuto v. Lardner- Burke" (1968) 17 I.C.L.Q. 1022.

Martin, R.B. "In the Matter of an Application by Michael Matovu" (1968) 1Eastern Africa L. Rev. 61.

Max Knight (1967), Theory of Law (Berkeley: University of California Press)

Mirzeler, Mustafa & Crawford Young, "Pastoral Politics in the Northeast Periphery in Uganda: AK-47 as Agent of Change" (2000) 38 J. Modern Afr. Studies 407.

Mishambi, Sheila Kawamara. "Reply to President Yoweri Museveni's Views on the Reform of the Domestic Relations Bill" (17 April2003), online: Wougnet

Moore, Sally Falk. Law as Process: An Anthropological Approach, 2nd ed. (Oxford: James Currey, 2000).

Morris, H. F. (1966) "The Uganda Constitution, 1966" 10J. Aft. L. 112.

Morris, H.F. & James S. Read. Uganda: The Development rif its LawJ· and Constitution (London: Stevens & Sons, 1966).

Morris, H.F. Indirect Rule and the Searchfor justice: Essqys in East African Legal History

Natural Law and Natural Rights (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1980).

Nsereko, D.D. (1975), "The Nature and Function of Marriage Gifts in Customary African Marriages" 23 Am. J. Comp. L. 682.

Oded, Arye. Islam in Uganda: Islamization Through a Centralized State in Pre-Colonial Africa

Odoki, Benjamin J. The Searchfor a National Consensus: The Making of the 1995 Uganda Constitution (Kampala: Fountain Publishers, 2005).

Ong, Walter J. Orali!J and Literary: The Technologi:;jng of the Word, 2nd ed. (New York: Routledge, 2002).

Onoria, Henry (2005) "Review of Major Decisions on Fundamental Rights and Freedoms in Uganda in 2004" (2005) 11 E. Afr. J. Peace & H.R. 323.

Palley, Claire. (1967) "The Judicial Process: U.D.I. and the Southern Rhodesian Judiciary" 30 Mod. L. Rev. 263.

Jerusalem: Israel Universities Press, 1974).

Raz, Joseph. The Authoriry of Law: Essqys on Law and Morali! J (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1979).

Redmond, Sean. (1997) Book Review of Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile by John Hanning Speke, 3 J. Afr. Travel-Writing 87.

Santos, Boaventura de Sousa. Toward a New Legal Common Sense: Law, Globalization and Emanczpation, 2nd ed (London: Butterworths LexisNexis, 2002).

Sathyamurthy, T.V. The Political Development of Uganda: 1900-1986 (Brookfield, Vt.: Gower, 1986).

Taiwo, Olufemi (1998), "Exorcising Hegel's Ghost: Africa's Challenge to Philosophy" (1998) 1 Afr. Stud. Q. 4.

Tamanaha, Brian Z. A GeneralJurisprudence of Law and Sociery (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001).

Tamukedde, W.P. "My Life as a Chief and District Commissioner" in Robertson, A.F., ed., Uganda's First Republic: Chiefs, Administrators and Politicians, 1967-1971 (Cambridge: African Studies Centre, Cambridge University, 1982).

The Concept of a Legal System: An Introduction to the Theory of Legal System, 2d ed. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1980) 122-145.

The Concept of Law, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994).

The Law of Succession in Uganda: An Unreported Case" (1963) 7 J. Afr. L.201.

Tripp, Aili Mari. (2004) "Women's Movements, Customary Law, and Land Rights in Africa-The Case of Uganda" Afr. Studies Q. 1.

Twining, William. Globalization and Legal Theory (Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 2000).

Vinx, Lars. Hans Kelsen's Pure Theory of Law: Legaliry and Legitimary (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007) [forthcoming November 2007].

Wabwile, Michael Nyongesa. (2003) "The Place of English Law in Kenya" 3 Oxford U. Commonwealth L.J. 51.

Widner, Jennifer (2001) "Courts and Democracy in Postconflict Transitions: A Social Scientist's Perspective on the African Case" (2001) 95 American J Int'l L. 64.

Widner, Jennifer A. Building the Rule of Law (New York: W.W. Norton & Company, 2001).

Wittgenstein, Ludwig. Philosophical Investigations, trans. G.E.M. Anscombe (Oxford: Basil

Woodman, Gordon R. "Legal Pluralism and the Search for Justice" (1996) 40 J. Afr. L.152

Young, M. Crawford(1977), "Buganda" in Rene Lemarchand, ed., African Kingships in Perspective: Political Change and Modernization in Monarchical Settings (London: Frank Cass, 1977).

D O M E S T I C L A W S

The Constitution of the Republic of Uganda, 1995 (As Amended)

The Uganda Constitution1962

The Uganda Constitution 1966 (promulgated 15 April 1966)

The Uganda Constitution 1967

S T A T U T E S

Acts of Parliament Act, Cap.2, Laws of Uganda

Administration (Karamoja) Act, 1963, No. 17 of 1963.

Busoga Election Validation Act No. 9 1963

Constitution of the Republic of Uganda 1995. Constitution (Amendment Act) Act, No. 13 of 2000.

Constitution of Uganda (Amendment one) Act No. 16 of 1963

Constitutional Review Commission Legal Notice No. 1 of 2001

Criminal Procedure Code Act (Cap 116)

Criminal Procedure Code, No.8 of 1930.

Deportation Ordinance (Cap 46)

Divorce Act, chap. 249, vol. 10, Revised Ed. Laws 2000.

Fire Arms Act 1970

Foreign Jurisdiction Act of 1890

Islamic University in Uganda Statute, No. 8 of 1990.

Judicature Act (Cap.13)

Judicature Act, No. 3 of 2002.

Judicature Act,1962

Legal Notice 1/71.

Legal Notice No. 1/86 (NRM period)

Legal Notice No.1 of 1971.

Legal Notice, No. 4 of 1966.

Legal notices 1/79

Legislative Council (Elections)Ordinance of 1957

Local Council Courts Act, No. 13 of 2006.

Local Governments (Amendment) Act, No. 27 of 2006.

Local Governments Act, No. 52 of 1997.

LocalGovernmentAct (Cap 243)

Magistrate Courts Act (Cap.16)

Magistrates' Courts Act, 1964, Cap. 36.

Marriage and Divorce of Mohammedans Ordinance, (1906), c. 213.

Marriage of African Act, (1906), Cap. 212.

Military Tribunals Decree No. 12 of 1973.

National Assembly (PEM) Act1970.

National Assembly (Powers and Privileges) Act

National ResistanceCouncil(NRC)StatuteNo.5of1988

Parliament (Powers&Privileges) Act (Cap 258)

Penal Code (No. 7 of 1930).

Penal Code Act (Cap 120)

Prevention and Prohibition of Torture Act, 2012 (Act 3 of 2012)

Proceedings Against the Government (Protection) Decree No. 8 of 1972

Proceedings Against the Government (Protection) Decree, No. 8 of 1972.

Public LandsAct, 1969

Resistance Councils and Committees (Judicial Powers) Statute No. 1 of 1987.

Resistance Councils and Committees (judicial Powers) Statute, No. 1 of 1988.

StandingordersofNational Assembly

Succession Act, Cap. 139, Laws of Uganda (1964).

SuspensionofPolitical ActivitiesDecree. No.14of1971

The Civil Procedure and Limitation (Misc. Provisions) Act.1969

The Constituent Assembly Statute of 1993

The Data Protection and Privacy Act, 2019.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 2005.

The Police Act, Chapter 303.

The Political Parties and Organisation Act 2002.

The Presidential Elections Act, 2005.

The Public Health Act, Cap 281, Laws of Uganda

The Public Order Management Act, 2013

The Trade(Licensing)Act,1969

TheActofSettlementof1701

TheBritishNationalityActof1948

ThePensionAct (Cap 286)

ThePolice AmendmentOrdinanceof1946

Town and Country Planning Acts and Agriculture Act

Uganda Administration of Justice (Karamoja) Act, ch. 26, 1964 Laws of Uganda.

Uganda Independence Act 1962

Uganda Law Society Act (Cap 276)

Uganda People's Defence Forces Act, No. 7 of 2005.

Uganda Public Service Standing Orders, 2010.

S T A T U T O R Y I N S T R U M E N T S

Emergency Powers (Detention) Regulations, Statutory Instrument No. 65 of 1966.

Public Health (Notification of Covid-19) Order (17th March 2020)

Public Health (Prohibition of entry into Uganda) Order (24th March 2020)

Public Service Standing Order 2009

Public Service Standing Order 2010

Rules of Procedure of Parliament

The Public Health (Control of COVID-19) (Amendment) Rules, 2020 SI 57 of 2020

The Public Health (Control of COVID-19) Rules, 2020

Uganda Standing Order 1959

CASE LAW

Abdul Thassjon's case of 1947, 48 C.N.L.R. 121

Sobhuza II vs Miller, (1926) Privy Council Appeal No. 158 of 1924, from Swaziland Special Court Judgment.

Abubaker Kayama Mayanja v. R [1960] 1 EA 23 (HCU).

Gwao Bin Kilimo v Kisunda Bin Ifuti, 1938 1 TLR 403.

Mukwaba and other v Mukubira and others Civil case no. 50 of 1954.

R v Yowasi K Paulo (1922) U.L.R 987

Adekur v. Opaja (13 June 1997), Constitutional Petition No. 1 of 1997 (C.C.).

Alisemera Babiiha v R Election petition DIR MFP 1of1996

Amama Mbabazi v Museveni & ORS (Presidential Election Petition No. 01of 2016) [2016] UGSC 3(31march2016)

Amisi Musungu and Others v. Uganda (Uganda High Court Crim. App. No. 83 of 1968)

Anthony Edward Otoi v. Uganda. Criminal App. No. 163 of 1967 (E.A.), unreported

Association of Women Lawyers v. Attorney-General (2002), Constitutional Petition No. 2 of 2002 (C.C.).

Attorney General v. David Tinyefunza Constitutional Petition No.1 of 1997

Attorney General v. The Kabaka's Government, Uganda High Court Civil Case No.462of1963

Attorney General vs Salvatori Abuki and Richard Obuga, Constitutional Appeal No.1 of 1998

Attorney-Generalv. De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd[1920] AC 508

Aziz v. Maruku Civil Appeal No. 4 of 2002 (S.C.).

Benedicto K.M. Kiwanuka v.the Attorney-General of Uganda (unreported)

Besigye Kiiza v Museveni & Anor (Election Petition No.1 of 2001) [2001] UGSC4(6 July 2001)

Besigye Kiiza v Museveni Yoweri Kaguta and Another (Election Petition No.1 of 2001) [2001] UGSC 3 (21 April 2001)

Besigye Kiiza v. Uganda (2006), Criminal Misc. Application No. 76 of 2006 (H.C.).

Bibi v. Bibi, [1921] 8 K.L.R. 200 (H.C.).

Brigadier Henry Tumukunde V. Attorney General and Electoral Commission, Constitutional Appeal No.2 of 2006; [2008] UGCC 14

Bukenya v. Attorney-General (1972), (H.C.) [unreported).

Bush v Gore, 531 U.S. 98 (2000)

Charles Onyango Obbo and anor v Attorney General (Constitutional Petition No. 15 of 1997)

Charles OnyangoObbo v Attorney General (Constitutional Appeal No. 2 of 2002)

Christie v Leachinsky, [1947] AC 573

Consumer Education and Resource Centre v Union of India (1995) S.C.C. (3) (India)

Conway v. Rimrner[1968] AC 910 (HL)

Cooper v. Wandsworth Board of Works, and the case of Proclamations[1863] 143 ER 414

Costa v ENEL (1964) case 6/64European court of justice

D.P.P. v. Joyce (1946)115 L3. K.B.146

De Souza (Ralph C.) v. Mandavia (U.R.) [19641E.A. 682

De Souza v. Tanga Town Council, E.A. (1961)

Dhlamini v. Carter (2), [1968] 2 S.A. 464 (Rhod. H.C.)

Duke of Brunrwick v The King of Hanover,1844,6 Beau 1:3 BILC 113

Duncan v. Cammel Laird & Co.[1941] Res Jud 57

Edward Fredrick Ssempebwa v. Attorney-General (27 March 1986), Constitutional Case No. 1 of 1986 (H.C.).

Entick v. Carrington[1765] EWHC KB J98

Errington v. Minister of Health(1935) 1 KB 249

Eur. Court HR, Lawless Case (Merits), judgment of July 1961, Series A, No.3, Page.56, Para 28

Ex Parte Matovu: Uganda v. Commissioner of Prisons [1967] E.A.L.R. 514 (H.C.).

Gamoialieri Mubizo v. R(196l) E.A. 244

General Medical Council v. Spackman [1943] AC.627atp.644

Glasgow Corporation V. Central Land Board[1955] UKHL 7

Grace Ibingira and Others v. Uganda [1966] E.A 445(No.2)

Grace Ibingira v. Uganda, [1967] 3 E.A.L.J. 79 (H.C.).

Grace Stuart Ibingira v. Uganda [1966] E.A 306(C.A)

Grace Stuart Ibingira v.Uganda[1966] E.A 306(C.A)

Gwao Bin Kilimo v. Kisunda Bin Ifuti(1938)1TLR 405

Hamutenya v Hamutenya (PA-2004/195) [2005]

Harris & Others v. The Minister of the Interior& Another1952(2)428A.D. 185

Hon. Lady Justice Julia Sebutinde vs. Attorney General. Constitutional Court Const. Ref No. 5 of 2005

In Attorney- General for New South Wales v. Trethowen, [1932]AC526

Inland Revenue Commissioners v Hanthrook 1956)2QB641, 289,290

Insurance Company of North America v. Baerlein and James (l960)

Ireland V United Kingdom, Judgment of 18 January 1978, series A, No.25, P 78, Para 205

Joseph Kazaraine v. The Lukiiko [1963] EA 472

Jowet Lyagoba v. Bakasonga and Others[1963] E.A 57

Joyce v. D.P.P. (1946) A.C 347

Jyali Ltd V Attorney-General (1956), [1956] 1 Q.B. 1 [C.A.].

Kabaka's Government v. A.G. of Uganda, P.C. Appeal No.33 of 1964

Kabaka's Government V. Attorney-General (1965), [1966] 1 A.C. (P.C.).

Kabiru v Republic, Court of Appeal of Kenya. 2007 [1] EALR

Kagimu v. Lukziko (1949), N.S.D. 25 (H.C.).

Katabazi and 21 others v Secretary General of the East African community and another [2007] EA CJ 3

Katabazi v. secretary General of the East African community (2007) AHRLR 119(EAC 2007)

Katosi v. Kahiif (1907), 1 U.L.R. 22 (H.C.).

Kibuka v. Smith (1908), 1 U.L.R. 41 (H.C.).

King v. Holliday [1917] A.C.266

Lakanmi v. Attorney-General, [1971] U. He L.R. 201 (Nig. S.C.).

Lake v. King (1881)16 Nev. 215

Liversidge V Anderson (1942) AC 246

Law Advocacy for Women in Uganda v Attorney-General, Constitutional Petition Nos.13 of 2005 & 5 of 2006 (C.C.).

Lawless V Ireland [Lawless Commission] 1Eur.ct.H.R (Ser.B) at 82 & 90(1960-1961)

Liversidge v. Anderson [1941] UKHL1

Lutakome Kayira & Others v. Edward Rugumayo& Others Court of Appeal Const. Case No. 1 of 1979

Madzjmbamuto v. Lardner-Burke (1968), [1969] 1 A.C. 645 (P.C.).

Madzjmbamuto v. Lardner-Burke N.O. (1966), [1966] No. GD/CN/23/66 (Rhod. H.C.).

Madzjmbamuto v. Lardner-Burke N.O. (2), [1968] 2 S. Afr. L.R. 284 (Rhod. H.C.)

Madzjmbamuto v. Lardner-Burke N.O., [1966] R.L.R. 756 (Rhod. Gen. Div.)

Matovu v. Uganda (2005), Misc. Crim. Appl. No. 15 of 2005 (C.C.).

Mbowe v Elinfoo (1967) EA 240

McCulloch v Maryland, 22 U.S1(1824)

Mighell v. Sultan of Jahore,[1894] 1 QB 149

Mohamed v. Bhimji, [1956] 23 E.A.C.A. 369 (E. Afr. C.A.).

Mugisa v. Uganda (1979), H.C.B. 271 (H.C.).

Mukosa v. R. Uganda High Court. Crirn. App No. 69 of 1950

Muwanga Kivumbi v Attorney general (Constitutional Petition No. 9of2005)

Mwenge v Migadde (1933) ULR 97

NAHC1Hill v NCAA, 865 P.2d 633, 653-54 (Cal. 1994)

Nakkuda Ali v. Iayaralne, [1951] A.C.

Ndibarema v. Enganzj ofAnkole and others (1960), E.A. 47 (E. Afr. C.A.).

O'Brien v. Military Governor of Northern Ireland[1924] IR 32

Ojok v. Uganda (1991), Case No. 33 of 1991 (S.C.).

Olum v. Attorney General Const'l Petition No. 6 of 1999 (C.C.)

Onarna v The Argus Newspapers (Civil Appeal No. 33 of 1968) [1968] EACA 24

Paschim Banga Khet Mazdoor Samity v State of West Bengal (1996) (India)

Paul K Ssemogerere and Ors v Attorney General (Constitutional Appeal-2002/1) [2004] UGSC 10 (28 January 2004);

Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa: Re Ex parte Application President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (2) SDA 674 (CC) at 67 paragraph 85

Prescott v. Birmingham Corporation [1954] 8 W.L.R. 600, 990

Prince Albert v Strange [1849] High Court Chancery.

Pyler v. Doe 457 U.S.202 (1982)

Queen vs Big Drug mark Ltd1 SCR 295, 18 DLR (4th) 321,

R v Bukoba Gymkhana Club

R v. Amkeyo [1914] KLR14

R v. Baganda Cotton Company (1930), 4 U.L.R. 34 (H.C.).

R v. Ndhlovu (1968), 4 S.A. 515 (Rhod. S.C.).

R Vs Big M Drug Mart Ltd [1985] 1 SCR 295

R. v. Minister of Health exparteYafle,1930

Raila Odinga & 2others v Independent Electoral Commission & 3others[2013]e KLR

Re Alibhai (1941), 6 U.L.R. 89 (H.C.).

Re Din Estate (Deceased) (1949), Admin. Cause No. 36 (H.C.) [unreported].

Re Habash: Valisa v. Sophia (1920), 3 U.L.R. 26 (H.C.).

Re Ibrahim and 77others (1970) E.A. 162

Re Kyagulanyi Sentamu Robert & Barbra Kyagulanyi Itungo v AG, CDF & IGP HC Civil Division Misc. Cause No. 16 of 2021.

Re Mukasa-Mnymy'a (1989), Misc. Cause No. 29 of 1989 (H.C.).

Regina Vs Oakes [1986] 1 SCR 103

Riordan v. War Office [1959]1WLR1046

Rtd Col Dr. Kizza Besigye v Electoral commission, Yoweri Kaguta Museveni (Election Petition-2006/1) [2007] UGSC 24 (30 January 2007)

Sallah vAttorney General, [1970] C.C. 55 (Ghana S.C.).

Satardin v. Begum (1928), 11 K.L.R. 41 (H.C.).

Schneider v. The Queen, (1982) 2 S.C.R. 112

Selby v Maclennan,1961

Semwogerere and Kiwanuka V. the Attorney-General of Uganda, Civil SuitNo.226 of1966.Uganda High Court

Shaban Opolot v. Attorney General [1969]1 EA 631

Shah v. The Attorney General (1969) EA 261

Simmenthal v Italian Minister of finance 1978 (case106/77) European court of justice

Singh v. Kulurya (1963), [1964] 1A.C. (P.C.).

Sitenda Sebalu v Secretary General of the East African community Taxation CauseNo. 1of 2011

Srockdale v. Hansard, 1836 - 1839) 9 Ad & El 1

State of Punjab and others v Mohinder Singh Chawala (1996) 113 PLR 499

Stroud v. Bradbury [1952)2 All E.R. 76

Sultan of Jahore v Abubaker Tunku ArisBenllahara (1894)1Q.B. 149

Suzan Kigula and 3 Others vs. Attorney General. Constitutional Court; Constitutional Petit.No.6 of 2003

Sydney Municipal Council v.Campbell (1965) A.C.338

Thairus/a Muhoro, [1971] E.A.C.A.187

The State v. Dosso and Another (1958)2 Pakistan Supreme Court Reports 180 (Pak. S.C.).

Thomas v The Queen,1952] 2 S.C. R 344

Tumushabe v. Attomry General (2004), Constitutional Petition No. 6 of 2004 (C.C.) [unreported].

Uganda Law Society and Jackson Karugaba v Attorney-General, Constitutional Petitions 02 of 2002 and 08of2002

Uganda Law Society V. Attorney General (31 January 2006), Constitutional Petition No. 18 of 2005 (C.C.).

Uganda v Kalumba Charles& 2 others, Criminal Case No.8 of 2014

Uganda v Kalumba Charles& 2others, Criminal CaseNo.8 of 2014

Uganda v Kazinda,[2013]UGHACD 10

Uganda V Siza & 3Ors (HCT-05-CR-CRS-028-2010)

Uganda v. Commissioner of Prisons, Ex Parte Matovu [1966] 1 EA 514

Uganda v. Kabaka's Government [1965] EA 393

Uganda v. Walusekhe Crim. Rev.No. 6 of 1964 Uganda High Court

United States v. Wong Kim Ark (1898) K69 U.S.649(1898)

Wango v. Manana, [1958] E.A.L.R. 124 (H.C.).
Wilkes v. Lord Halifax, (1763)19How. St.Tr.1410
Wolf v Cook County, No.19-3169 (7th Cir.2020
Yerimia Kalirnedo v R. (1956) 123 E..A.C.A. at p.504)
Yia v. Yia (1997), Mengo Divorce Cause No.4 of 1997 (M.C.).
Yousseupoff v. Metro Goldwyn Mayer Pictures Ltd(1934) 50 TLR 581

COLONIAL AGREEMENTS

Ankole Agreement 1901, Ankole and United Kingdom, 1901, Rev. Laws of Uganda 1951, vol. VI at 66.
Buganda Agreement of 1955
"Uganda Protectorate, Secretariat Minute Paper No 322", Eastern Province, Entebbe National Archives, A46/133
"Uganda Protectorate, Secretariat Minute Paper No 2", the Kakungulu Estate Entebbe National Archives, C2588
"Uganda Protectorate, Secretariat Minute Paper no 898", Buganda, Entebbe National Archives, A46/16.
"Letter to Hon Chief Secretary from the Provincial Commissioner", Eastern Entebbe National Archives, C2577
Buganda Courts' Ordinance
Order in council 1902
Royal instructions of 1921
The Colonial laws Validity Act of 1865
The Native Authority Ordinance of 1919
ToroAgreement 1900, Toro and United Kingdom, 1900, Rev. Laws of Uganda 1951, vol.
Uganda Agreement 1900, Buganda and United Kingdom, March 1900, Rev. Laws of Uganda 1951, vol. VI at 12.
Uganda Order in Council1902, 1902, Rev. Laws of Uganda, vol. VI at 82.

INTERNATIONAL TREATIES AND CONVENTIONS

1996 European Social Charter.
African Charter on Human and Peoples Rights 1981
American Convention on Human Rights 1969
Backgrounder Security Sector Governance and Reform October 2005

Constitution of the World Health Organization. 1946

European Convention on Human Rights 1953

General Comment No.29 on Article 4 of ICCPR adopted at the 1950th meeting, on 24th July 2001

International Covenant on Civil and political Rights 1966

International Health Regulations, 2005

Siracusa Principles on the limitation and derogation provisions in the ICCPR 1985

FOREIGN JURISDICTION LAW

Amendments to the Constitution of the People's Republic of China (2004), [online] available at; http://www.npc.gov.cn/wxzl/wxzl/2004-04/19/content_334620.htm(accessed May 28th, 2021)

Civil Contingencies Act 2004, Laws of England

Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act [Australia], 9 July 1900

Constitución De La Nación Argentina, Dec 15, 1994

Constitution of the People's Republic of China (1982)

Constitution of the United States of America, 17 September 1787

Decree 355/2002, amending Law 25,233, Law of Ministries, February 21, 2002

Disaster Management Act (DMA) of 2005 (India)

Epidemic Disease Act (EDA) of 1897 (India)

FederalConstitutionofNigeria,1963

Health and Social Care Act 2012, Laws of England

Law of the People's Republic of China on Public Security Administration Penalties, September 5, 1986

National Health Security Act 2007 (Australia)

National Health Services Act 2006, Laws of England

Notice on the prevention and control of the new crown pneumonia epidemic in accordance with the law, scientifically and accurately, [online[available at; http://www.gov.cn/xinwen/2020-02/25/content_5483024.htm (accessed on May 27th, 2021) (People's Republic of China)

Standing Senate Committee On Social Affairs, Science, And Technology, Canada's Response To The 2009 H1n1 Influenza Pandemic (Dec. 2010), [online] available at; https://sencanada.ca/content/sen/Committee/403/soci/rep/rep15dec10-e.pdf (accessed on May 28th, 2021)

Tanganyika Order in Council,1920

The Constitution Act, 1867 (Canada)

The Constitution of India [India], 26 January 1950

The Coronavirus Aid, Relief, and Economic Security (CARES) Act (Pub. L. No. 116-136) (USA)
The Coronavirus Preparedness and Response Supplemental Appropriations Act (Pub. L. No. 116-123) (USA)
The Data Protection and Privacy Act, 2019 of Kenya.
The Families First Coronavirus Response Act (FFCRA) (Pub. L. No. 116-127) (USA)
The Law on Ministries of 1999Law 25233, December 10, 1999 (Argentina)
The Privacy Act of 1974, of the United States of America

R E P O R T S

Amnesty International, Report; Freedom of Assembly, 23/February/2015-16
Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2012. Health Care Delivery and Financing, in 1301.0, Year Book Australia.
Hallward-Driemeier, M., Khun-Jush, G. and Pritchett, L., 2010. "Deals versus Rules: Policy ImplementationUncertainty and Why Firms Hate It", NBER Working Paper No. 16001
KauitiKayinga, Andrew S.Z Kiondo, The new Local Level Politics in East Africa (Studies on Uganda, Tanzania and Kenya) research Report No.95 pp.11.
Presented at the 391Ordinary Session of the Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights, Banjul, Gambia, May 2006), online: Centre for Human Rights Speke, John Hanning. "Map of the Routes in EASTERN AFRICA between Zanzibar, the Great Lakes, and the Nile" John Murray, Royal Geographic Society, 1864).
Uganda Government, Report of the Uganda Relationship (Munster) Commission (Entebbe: Government Press, 1961).
Uganda Government, Report to the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights
Uganda Human Rights Commission, Special Report 2004 (2004), Uganda, Sessional Paper No. 1 of1963 (Entebbe: Government Press, 1963). Uganda Government, Report of the Karamoja (Bataringqya) Commission (Entebbe: Government Press, 1961).
Uganda. Commission of Inquiry into the allegations against Obote, Amin et al. (4th February, 1966)

N E W S P A P E R A R T I C L E S

Jimmy Komakech, "People Power blocked from consulting in Gulu," Eagle Line, January 7, 2020.
O'Connell, Oliver. "Trump impeachment lawyers quit after he 'demanded they repeat election fraud claims'". The Independent MichealKakumirizi, (2020) Security Officials raid NUP Headquarters, Daily Monitor of 15th October.

Halima Athumani, (2021) Uganda Court Orders opposition Leader Released from House Arrest, January 25.

Gwokto, Peter-Rhaina. "Illiterate Karimojong Girls Fetch Higher Bride Price" The Monitor (27 October 2006), online: Ugandanet <http:/ /www.mail- archive.com/ugandanet@kym.net/ msg23879.html>.

<http:// allafrica.com/ stories/200703040027.html>.

Nsambu, Hillary, "Appeal Cases Stall in Supreme Court" Sundqy Vision (6 October 2007), online: Sunday Vision

<http://www.sundayvision.co.ug/detail.php?mainNewsCategoryld=7&newsCatego ryid=125&newsid=590569>.

<http:/ /news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/africa/4574692.stm>.

Nganda, Ssemujju Ibrahim. "A Biography Abu Mayanja Never Lived to Read" The Weekly Observer(10 November 2005), online: Weekly Observer

<http://www.ugandaobserver.com/new/archives/2005arch/features/spec/nov/spec200511102.php>.

<http:/ /www.economist.com/obituary/displaystory.cfm?story_id=8584604 >.

<http:// news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/ africa/ 4391067.stm>.

"Ugandan Cult Carrying Out Suicide Raids" New York Times (5 November 1987), online: The New York Times

Baker, Peter (February 13, 1999). "The Senate Acquits President Clinton". The Washington Post. The Washington Post Co.

"Judges Agree to Re-open Courts- Museveni" The Monitor (6 March 2007), online: allAfrica.com <http:// allafrica.com/ stories/200703060264.html>.

"Museveni Election Rival Released" BBC (2 January 2006), online: BBC News

"Court Ruling That Got Besigye Out" New Vision (3 January 2006), online: New Vision Online <http:/ /www.newvision.co.ug/D/8/516/474116>.

"Obituary: Alice Lakwena" (25 January 2007) Economist, online: Economist.com

'judges on Strike Over Court Siege" The Monitor (4 March 2007), online: allAfrica.com

Abid, Abdul Majeed (29 December 2014). "The forgotten massacre".

Glass, Andrew (October 8, 2017). "House votes to impeach Clinton, Oct. 8, 1998". Politico

Daily Monitor, 23rd June, 2018. KyabazingaNadiope jailed for fraud, [online] available at; https://www.monitor.co.ug/uganda/magazines/people-power/kyabazinga-nadiope-jailed-for-fraud-1763982 (accessed on 1st July, 2021)

Daily Monitor, 6th May 2019, Voters fault MPs on age limit removal, [online] available at; https://www.monitor.co.ug/uganda/news/national/voters-fault-mps-on-age-limit-removal-1824194

(accessed on 1st July 2021)

Davidson, Roger (2005). "Impeachment". World Book Encyclopedia. I 10 (2005 ed.). Chicago. p. 92. ISBN 0-7166-0105-2.

Sunday Vision, 6 February 2005

The New Vision 10 February 2005

The Daily Monitor 4 July 2005

Daily Monitor, 14th October, 2020. I regret removal of term limits for president – Chief Justice, [online] available at; https://www.monitor.co.ug/uganda/news/national/i-regret-removal-of-term-limits-for-president-chief-justice-2480632 (accessed on 1st July, 2021)

Fandos, Nicholas (January 8, 2021). "How to Impeach a President in 12 Days: Here's What It Would Take". New York Times.

Fandos, Nicholas (January 13, 2021). "Trump Impeached for Inciting Insurrection". New York Times.

"Impeachment". UK Parliament Glossary. Retrieved 5 February 2021

Fandos, Nicholas (February 13, 2021). "Trump Acquitted of Inciting Insurrection, Even as Bipartisan Majority Votes 'Guilty'". New York Times.

Ross, Will. "Ugandan 'Polygamy' Bill Protest" BBC News (29 March 2005), online: BBC

BBC News, 30th June, 2021. Ex-President Jacob Zuma sentenced by South Africa's top court, [online] available at; https://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa-57650517 (accessed on 1st July 2021)

O N L I N E A R T I C L E S

https://quizlet.com/186592643/three-theories-of-presidential-power-flash-cards/

2021 Elections: Government declines to declare a state of emergency July 1, 2020 https://www.independent.co.ug/2021-election-government-decline-to-declare-state-of-emergency/

Amy Lauren Fairchild, the Ohio state University, Marian Moser Jones University of Maryland. What does a state of emergency mean in the face of the corona virus? March 26,2020http://theconversation.com/amp/what-does-a-state-of-emergency-mean-in-the-face-of-the-corona-virus134439 Viewed on 28/7/2020 at 9:59pm Cornell Law School http://law.cornell.edu/Wex/stateofemergency viewed 27/7/2020 at 20:55pm.

Edwin Sabiiti. Makerere Law student demand for justice for killed university student. July 6, 2020.https://thelegalreports.com/2020/07/06/Makerere-law-students-demand-justice-for-killed-university-student/ viewed on 7/30/2020 at 5:36pm

Elliot Bulmer. Emergency powers .International IDEA Constitution Building Primer 18 page 6

(2018)

Ethiopia declares a state of emergency to fight corona virus.8 April 2020 GMT +3 www.aljazeera.com/news/2020/04/ethiopia-declares-state-emergency-fight-covid-19-200408142519485.html Viewed on 7/31/2020 at 8:38am

Ethiopia Declares State of Emergency to curb transmission of corona virus 14 April 2020 https://www.ethioembassy.org.uk.ethiopia-declares-state-of-emergency-to-curb-transmission-of-coronavirus/ viewed on 7/31/2020 at 8:31am

Humanitarian Health Action. Effects and Response priorities in different types of emergency. WHO http://Who.int/hac/techguidance/tools/manuals/Who_field_handbook/annex_2/en/

Joan L Cassman, Cecillia M .Quick. Declaring a state of emergency: What you need to know May 1, 2011.Viewed on 28th July, 2020 at 10:59pm.

Kenneth Kazibwe. Lawyer drags government to court over existence, recruitment of LDUS. August 13, 2019 at 9:07am https://nilepost.co.ug/2019/08/13/lawyer-drags-government-to-court-over-existence-recruitment-of-ldus/ Visited on 7/30/2020 at 5:56pm

Reynolds, John, "The long shadow of colonialism: The origins of the doctrine of emergency in international human rights law"(2010) Comparative Research in law and political economy. Research paper No.19/2010. Page 5 http://digitalcomons.osgoode.yorku.ca/clpe/86

https://globalhealth.duke.edu/

http://www.ihi.org/

http://centerforpolicyimpact.org/our-work/coronavirus-covid-19-and-pandemic-preparedness/

https://www.independent.co.ug/Museveni-succession-plot-in-Oulanyah-Kadaga-battle/

https://www.monitor.co.ug/uganda/oped/commentary/of-monolithic-nrm-and-the-deceptive-race-for-speaker-3411242

https://allafricia.com/stories/202010160016.html visited on 23rd May, 2021

https://www.independent.co.ug/nup-condems-blockage-of-kyagulanyis-radio-talk-show visited on 26t May, 2021

https://advx-globalvoices-org.cdn.ampproject.org./v/s/advox.globalvoices.org/2019/12/24/kenya visited on 30th May, 2021.

https://www.sohu.com/a/373152524_100199096

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wik/Privacy_Act_of_1974 visited on 31st May, 20

https://courses.lumenlearning.com/boundless-politicalscience/chapter/the-powers-of-the-presidency/

https://www.uscourts.gov/eductaional-resources/educational-activities/overview-rule-of-law

https://www.history.com/topics/us-government/executive-order

https://www.khanacademy.org/humanities/ap-us-governmnet-and-politics/resurces-and-exam-preparation/required-documents-and-cases/a/fedralist-no-70

Seven LDUs convicted over brutality. The independent April 15 2020 http://www.independent.co.ug/seven-LDUs-convicted-over-brutalityVisited on 30/7/2020 at 5:25pm

"Amins Row Over Inheritance" BBC News (25 August 2003), online: BBC < http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/world/africa/3179085.stm>.

https://africasacountry.com/2018/11/presidential-power-and-the-museveni-state-in-uganda

https://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/2019/01/presidential-emergency-powers/576418/

Brighten Abaho. LDUs another form of insecurity. July 7, 2020https://www.pmldaily,co/oped/2020/07/brighten-abaho-ldus-another-form-of-insecurity.html viewed on 7/30/2020 at 5:45pm

https;//www.hrw.org/news/2020/09/10/Rwanda-rusesabagina-was-forcibly-disappeared

MPs call for declaration of state of emergency posted on 02 April 2020. http://www,parliament.go.ug/news/4590/mps-call-declaration-state-emergency visited on 28/7/2020 at 12:19 pm

https://www.amensty.org visited on 23rd May, 2021

https://www.trtworld.com visited on 26th May, 2021

http://www.ntv.co.ug visited on 26th May, 2021

https://firstmonday.org visited on 30th May, 2021

APPENDIXES

APPENDIX A: PICTORIAL OF THE EXECUTIVE

Ugandan Flag

THE TRUTH BEHIND UGANDA'S NAME

12 SATURDAY VISION June 5, 2021

Commentary

MPORORO, NOT BUGANDA, GAVE UGANDA ITS NAME

OPINION
KAREBU KAHIRITA

There is a common misconception that the name Uganda came from Buganda, which was the main kingdom at Independence. That is not true!

The name Uganda was the colonial creation from the word Ruganda, which refers to a cultural relationship, called clan in the Mpororo language.

Among the people of the Great Lakes Region, the Bantu were unified under the clan identification called Abanya-Ruganda.

To mention the word Ruganda was an indication for true intimacy in society.

It went beyond blood relations because any reasonable people, a part from females, were expected to perform the blood friendship ritual to enhance the trust against the human betrayal.

The ancient and original gateway into the Great Lakes Region was south of Lake Victoria through Karagwe in Mpororo.

The first Arab traders, who penetrated Mpororo, were denied free trade because Bahororo did not fancy their cowrie shells.

They deemed their cowrie shells to be inferior in value compared to the tradition cattle – ente.

PROCEEDING TO BUGANDA

Around 1840, some of the Arabs, led by Ahmed Bin Ibrahim, crossed over to Buganda where their cowrie shells were accepted. Baganda called then Nsimbi.

The Arabs became friendly to Kabaka Suuna and taught of Islamic religion.

They also started and controlled slave trade caravans and guided the European explorers.

The first British explorers – John Speke and Grant – came in around 1861. They were followed by Henry Stanley in 1887 and Captain Lugard in 1902.

The two travelled through Mpororo and made contacts with prominent chiefs.

When the chiefs met the white men, in order to disarm the White men of any sinister moves, they encouraged the visitors to perform the traditional blood friendship, known as kusharana aha nda.

The pact couple would test the blood of another using a coffee berry, in a ritual indicating an artificial creation of blood brotherhood. Hence forth, the two would become clan mates. This clan membership was referred to as Ruganda.

The word Ruganda, the social unified name had an accent implications to the foreigners. They hardly pronounced the letter R and instead, combined the RU as U-ganda.

However, the blood friendship initiative never persuaded the chief's attitude towards accepting colonial rule.

The British also did not place as much value in it because it was not their culture. They instead preferred signed agreements, which Bahororo also did not find value in.

The monarchies in Mpororo rejected colonial rule. These tradition rulers who resisted, include Kahaya Ntare Rugingiza, Mutware Rwabugiri, Mutware Nyindo, Mukama Makobore, Mukama Rumanyika, Chief Mutsinga and Chief Ndibarema.

Some of them were eliminated/murdered or deported out of their territories. These include the guerilla fighter, Ntokibiri, who was killed in 1919.

In other incidents, the colonialists used allied agents, like Nuwa Mbaguta who signed British treaties on behalf of Kahaya Ntare Rugingiza.

BRITISH IN BUGANDA

The two Kabakas of Buganda, Sunna and Mutesa I, hosted the Arab traders and Christian missionaries respectively.

Buganda kingdom then became the base for the British colonial expansion over Uganda. The successor to the throne, Kabaka Mwanga, abused the religious code to stay in Mengo Palace.

Between 1884 and 1886, were years of persecution, against Christian believers. Some were burnt alive at Namugongo on June 3, 1886.

The functionaries for religious believers, joined arms and ousted Kabaka Mwanga around 1889.

While Kabaka Mwanga and the defected forces were in hiding in Buddu, they met the Germany Carl Peters and requested for military assistance.

Meanwhile, the Christians – Catholics and Protestants, were overwhelmed by the Muslims in leadership, led by Kabaka Kalema. The two reunited and re-instated Kabaka Mwanga.

HELIGOLAND TREATY OF 1890

While the ousted Kabaka Mwanga planned to fight back by engagement the foreign forces, the German agent, Carl Peters, promised the military assistance against the religious forces.

The secret military enforcement agreement was signed, including the protection measures over Buganda Kingdom.

Before the German forces entered the battle, Kabaka Mwanga had regained the throne although an agreement remained binding.

The revelation of secret agreement anguished the British who regretted the period of years they stayed in Buganda without written documents.

The British saw the Germans occupation over Buganda as a bold plan to control the source of the River Nile.

Instead, the two colonial powers negotiated about the fate caused by Kabaka Mwanga.

They both agreed on the exchange of the British Island found in the North Sea with Buganda.

The agreement, known as Heligoland Treaty, was signed in 1890 and it placed Buganda under the British Monopoly.

THE 1900 BUGANDA AGREEMENT

The British got concerned and appointed Captain Lugard to be in charge of Buganda affairs.

The same year, they established the security Fort on Old Kampala Hill.

Next, measures were taken, which involved the declaration of Buganda/Uganda under British control.

The British Union Jack was raised by Sir Gerald Portal at Old Kampala Fort on March 3, 1893.

On April 12, 1894, the Buganda/Uganda was declared a British Protectorate.

Five years later, Queen Victoria, appointed the first British commissioner, Sir Harry Johnston on July 1, 1899.

Johnston immediately got involved into Buganda Kingdom land Tenure, a clear indication that British acted justified by the Heligoland Treaty.

The original Mulwahwa monarchy, with the traditional three territories of Kyadondo, Busiro and Mawokota were added to the 18 counties of the present day Buganda Kingdom.

The British colonial master, helped by Buganda militia, enforced the extended boundaries in all comers.

In the North, Buganda reached the Victoria Nile, from the westwards to River Kafu and in the South, across River Katonga into the present Buddu/Bwera region of ancient Mpororo.

The negotiated Buganda Agreement was implemented in absence of Kabaka Mwanga.

The royal monarchy was supervised by the Kattikiro, Sir Apollo Kagwa, assisted by Stanislaus Mugwanya and Zakaria Kisingiri.

The three years vacuum after the deposed Kabaka Mwanga, ended with the infant Kabaka Chwa, who was enthroned in 1899.

In the same year, Kabaka Mwanga was captured by his previous subject, Andereya Kwandaga, on the colonial orders.

DISASTER AGREEMENT

The Buganda Agreement of 1900 was signed in bad faith between the British colonial representatives and the Buganda monarchy.

It reduced the Kabaka's powers over the kingdom land which was shared as follows: 10,500 sq. miles of forest and wetlands became protectorate government land.

The Kabaka was given 350 sq. miles, members of his royal family, 148 sq. miles, the 20 saza chiefs 8 sq miles each (total 160 sq. miles) and the regents; Sir Apollo Kagwa, Stanislaus Mugwanya and Zakaria Kisingiri got 16 sq. miles each, totalling to 48 sq. miles.

Nuhu Mbogo and Islam got 48 sq. miles, Kamushwaga of Koki 24 sq. miles, 1,000 chiefs got eight sq. miles each (total 8,000 sq. miles), missionary churches got 92 sq. miles and land that remained under the protectorate government was 50 sq. miles.

In simple analysis, the crown land, estimated at over 9,000 sq. miles, was scattered in different allocations.

The need for the 1900 Buganda Agreement resulted from the secret treaty Kabaka Mwanga made with the Germany agent, Carl Peters.

The territories which belonged to Bunyoro Kitara, Koki, Kabura/Lyantonde, Bwera/Kyanzanga/Ngoma/Ishembabure, Bigobyamugyenyi/Ntutsi cattle corridor, remained an unsolved historical factor.

The British introduced indirect rule which also favoured Buganda colonial agents.

They became warlords in the districts of western Uganda and beyond.

It is the period after the First World War (1914-1918), which suppressed the tradition leadership under Baganda colonial agents.

The public outcry forced the colonialists to withdraw their Baganda agents from the districts of greater Kigezi, Ankole, between 1920 and 1923.

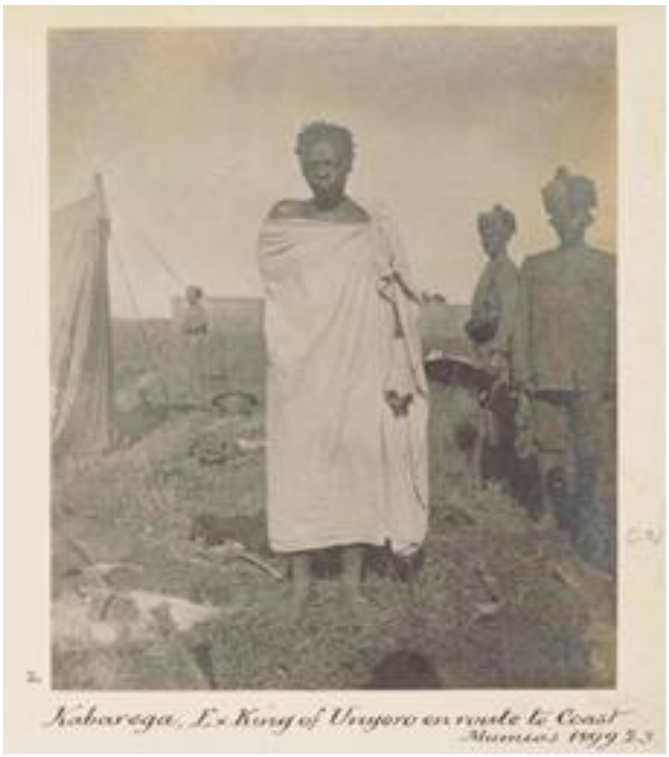
Accordingly, the land grabbing in Uganda, which was begun by selective hoax landlords, resulted into landless citizens in their own country.

The sidelined indigenous population included the ones whose counties were annexed into Buganda Kingdom. The Baganda colonial agents, who were warlords, used the chances of being appointed chiefs in the counties of greater Kigezi, Ankole and elsewhere in the country, to acquire a lot of land outside Buganda.

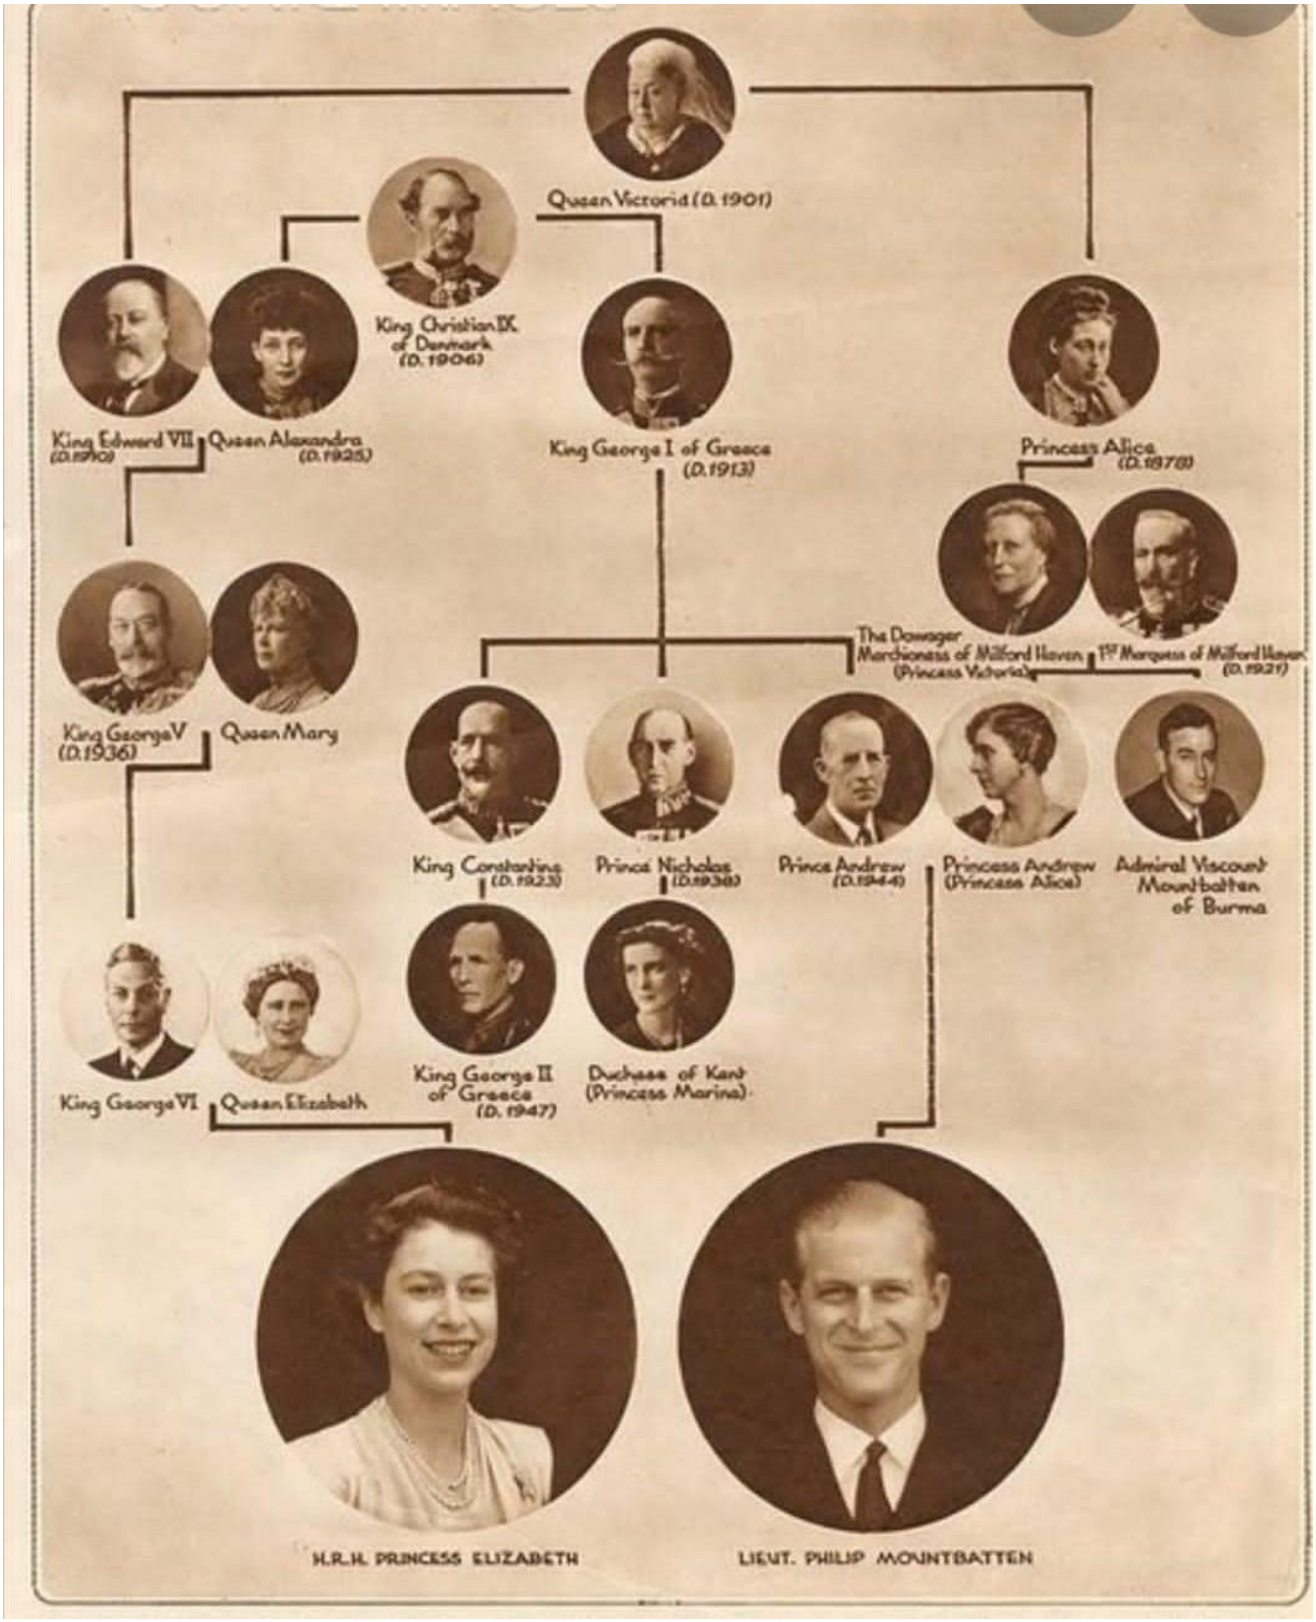
The 1900 Buganda Agreement, therefore, became inconsistent with the tradition land ownership. My personal proposal is that it should be revisited constitutionally to harmonise the land dispossession in the country including federation.

Kabaka Mwanga of Buganda

OMUKAMA KABAREGA

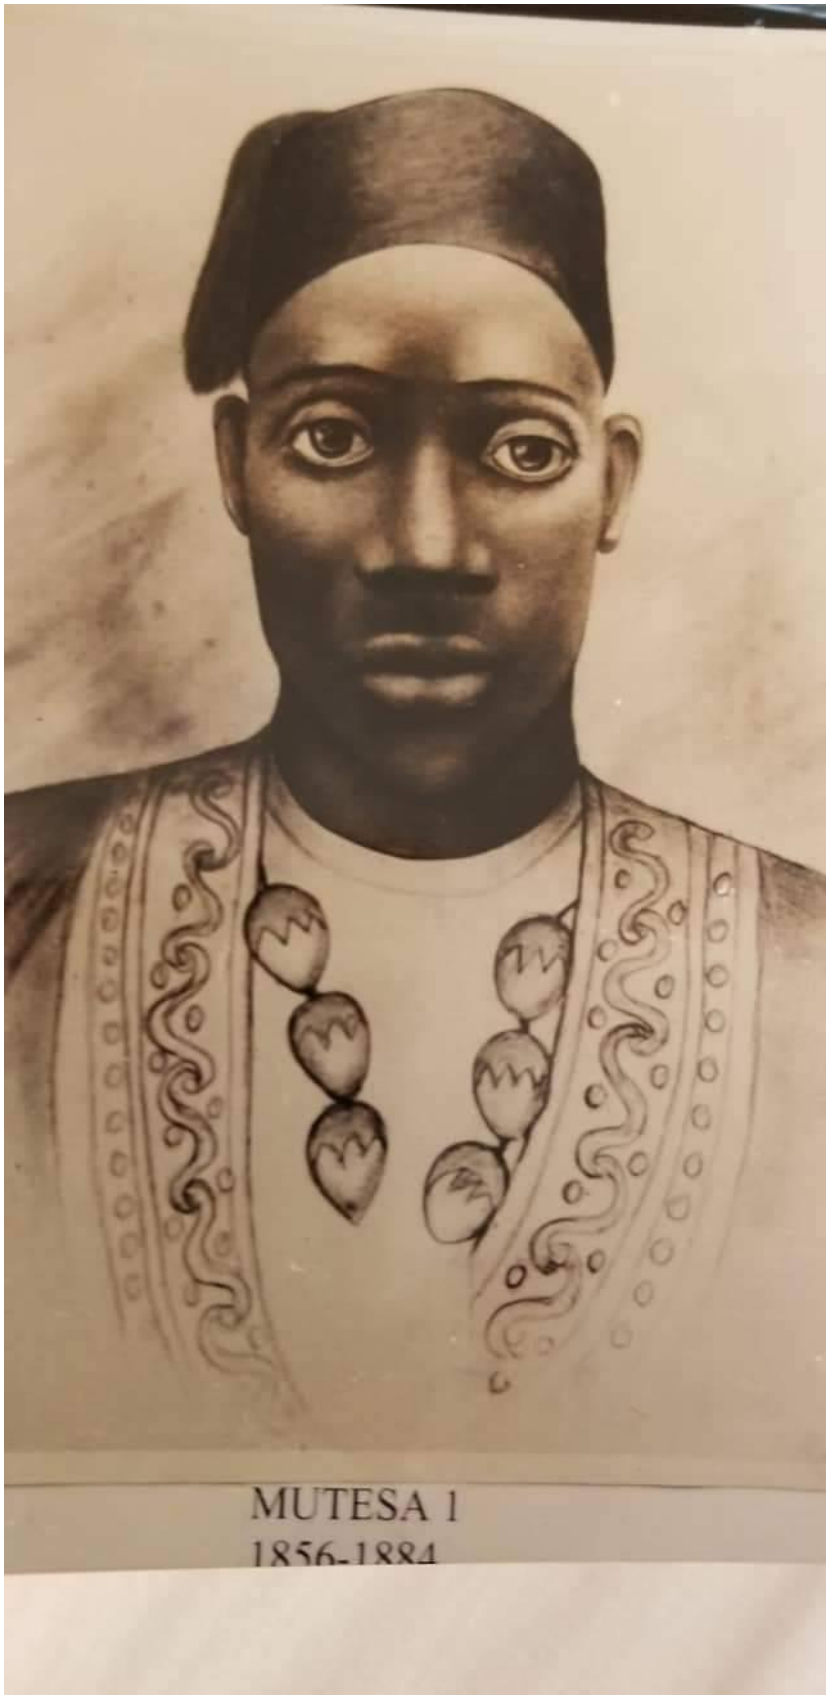


BRITISH LEADERSHIP

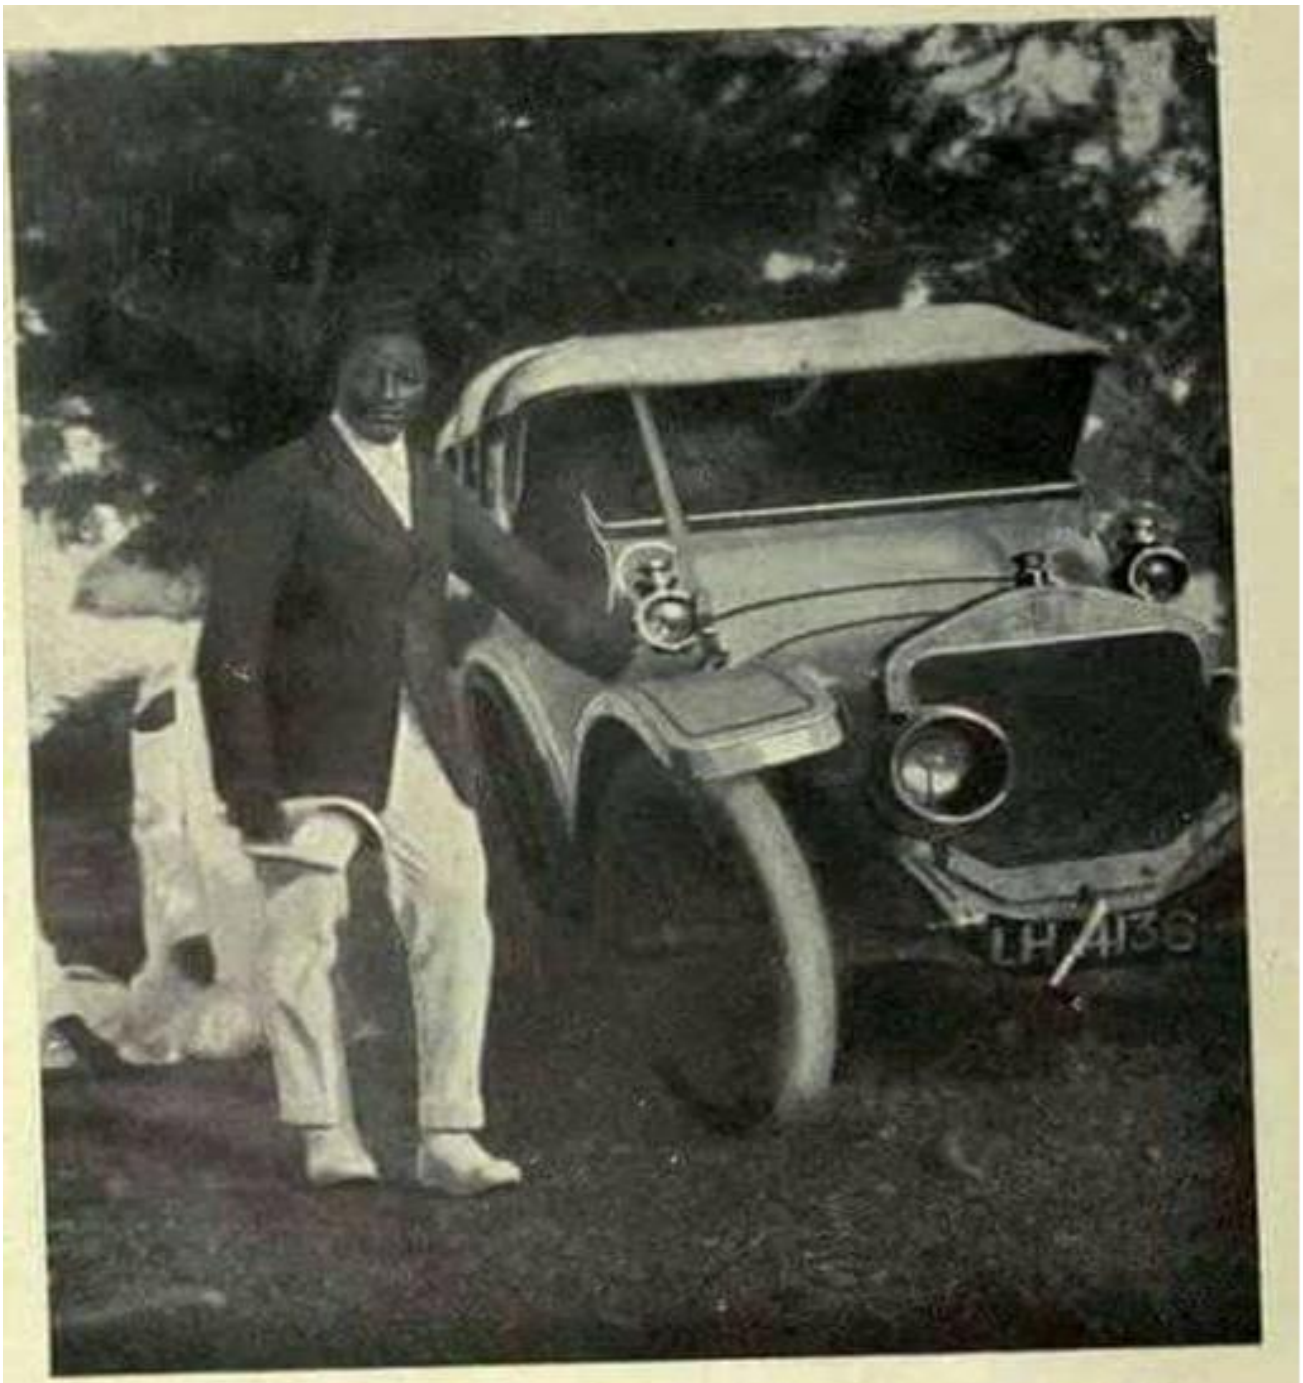


BUGANDA LEADERSHIP

K A B A K A M U T E S A I

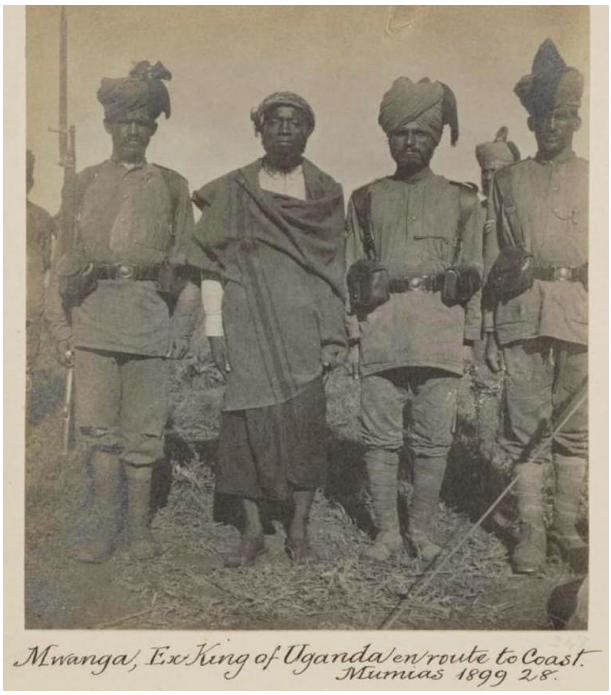


KABAKA DAUDI CHWA

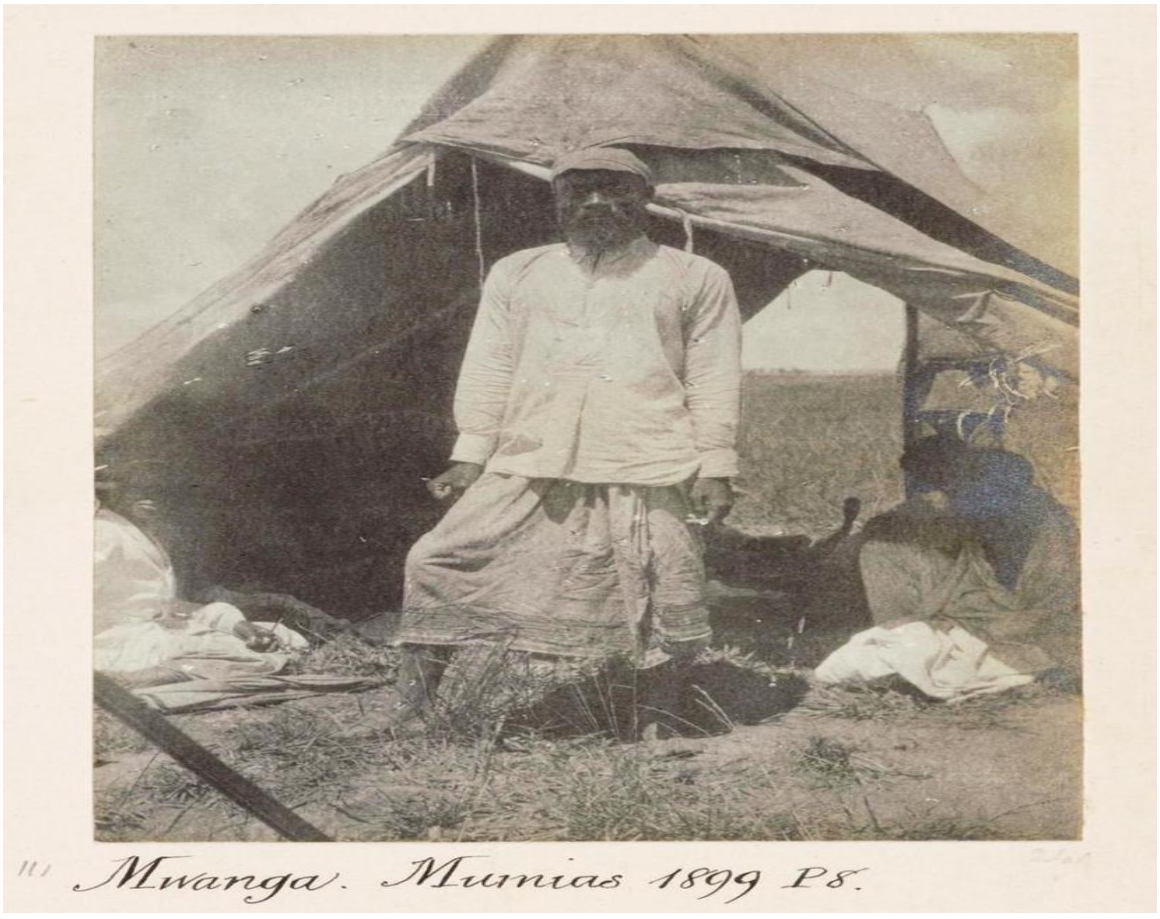


DAUDI CHWA, KABAKA (KING) OF UGANDA WITH HIS MOTOR CAR

K A B A K A M W A N G A



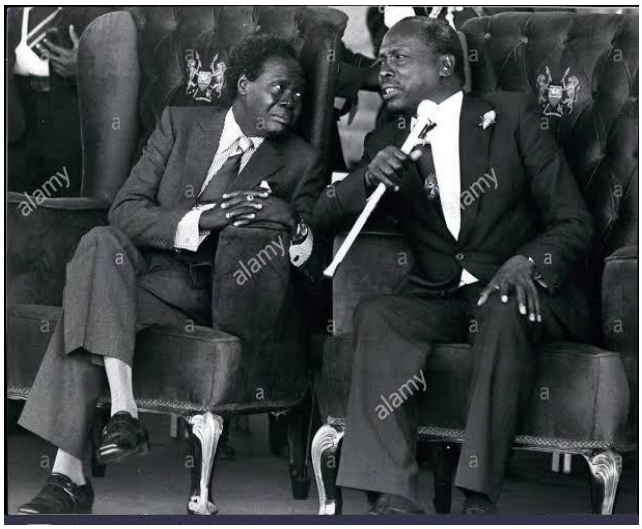
Mwanga's Favorite Wives. Mumias 1899 R11.



Mwanga. Mumias 1899 P8.

SIR EDWARD MUTESA II

DR. MILTON OBOTE



gettyimages
Rolls Press/Popperfoto

EXIT

His Excellency the Hon. Dr. A. Milton Obote, M.P.
President of Uganda
His Excellency the Hon. J. K. Bakiika, M.P.
Vice-President of Uganda-Minister of Animal Industry, Game and Fisheries
DEPUTY MINISTERS

IDI AMIN DADA

THE REPUBLIC OF UGANDA
(THE GOVERNMENT OF THE SECOND REPUBLIC OF UGANDA—AS AT SEPTEMBER 1, 1972) CABINET MINISTERS

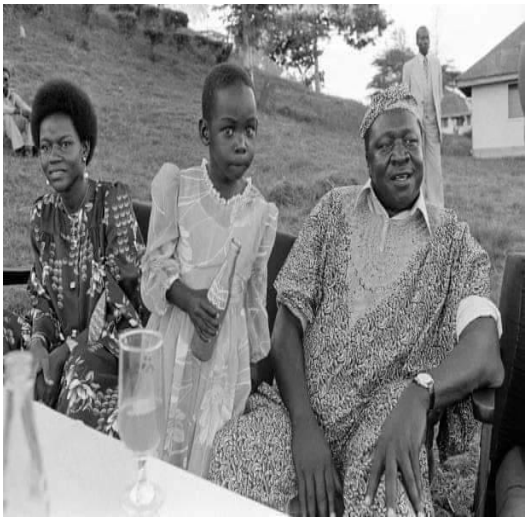
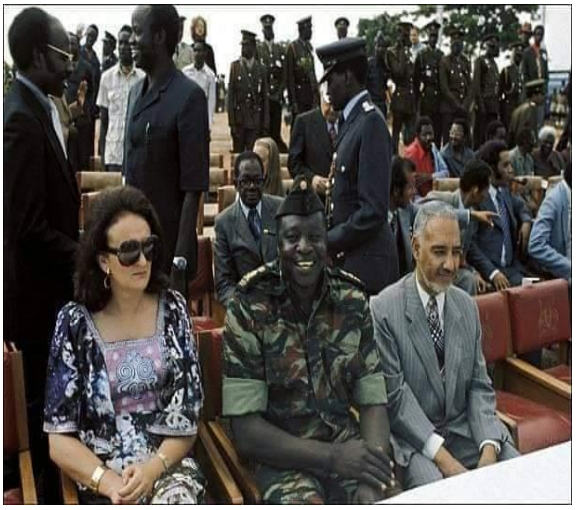
gettyimages
Bettmann





UGAND
1975 gettyimages

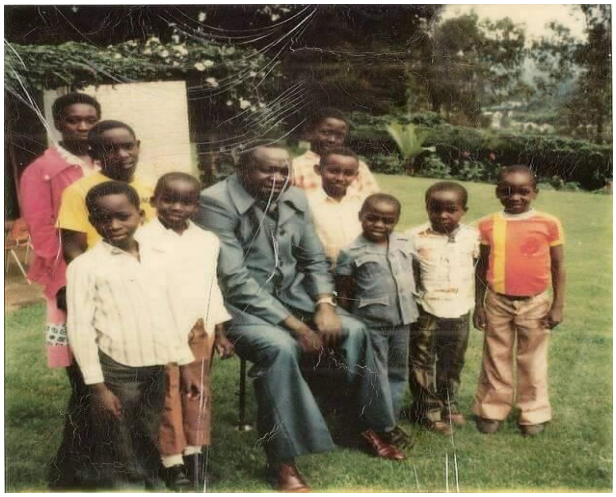
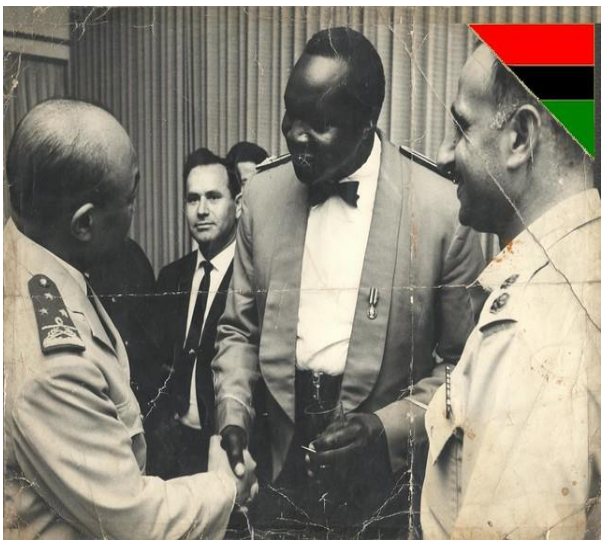
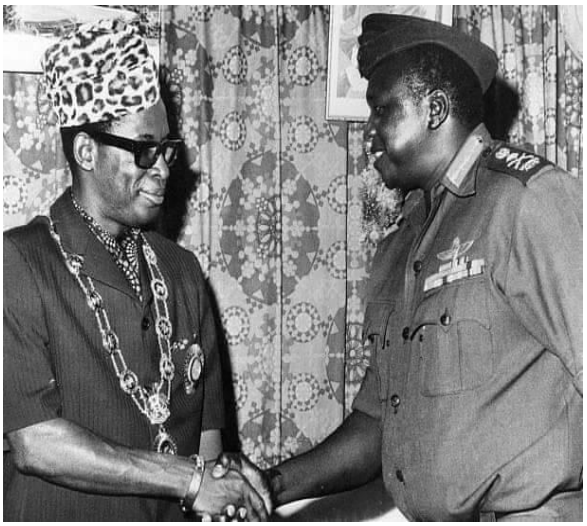
Douglas Miller

gettyimages
Keystone



UGANDA





gettyimages
Universal History Archive

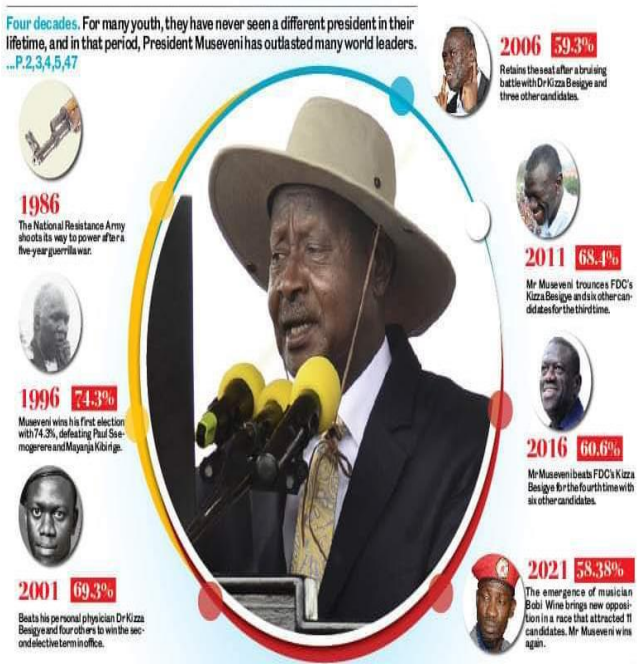
YUSUF LULE

GODFREY BINAISA

TITO OKELLO LUTWA

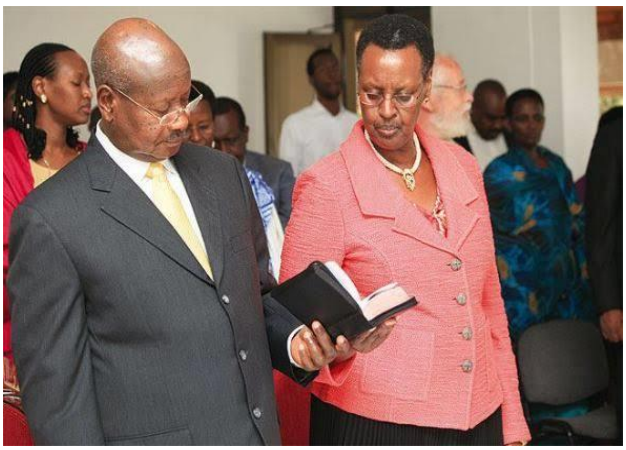
YOWERI KAGUTA MUSEVENI

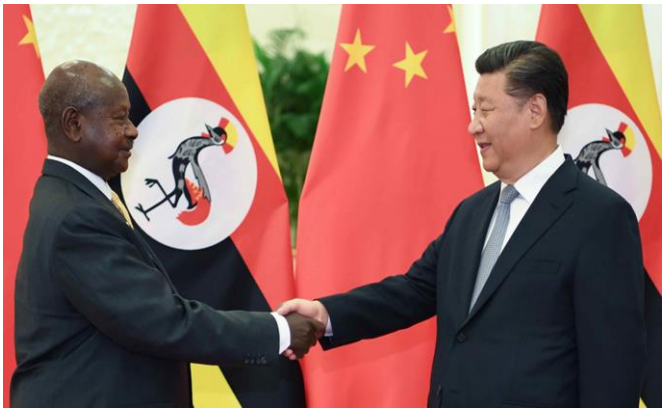
AP

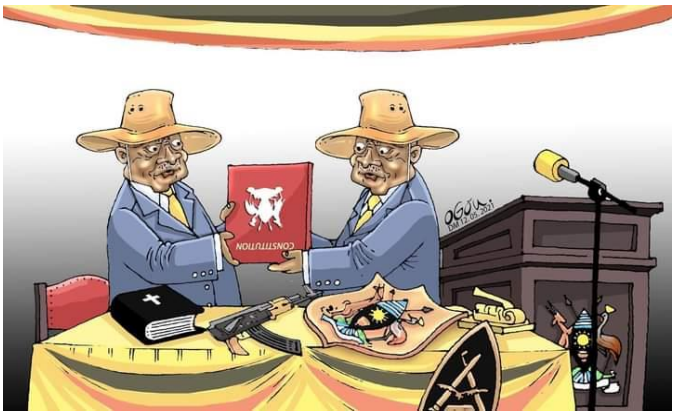


Four decades. For many youth, they have never seen a different president in their lifetime, and in that period, President Museveni has outlasted many world leaders.
...P.2,3,4,5,47
1986
The National Resistance Army shoots its way to power after a five-year guerrilla war.
1996 74.3%
Museveni wins his first election with 74.3%, defeating Paul Ssemogerere and Mayanja Kibirige.
2001 69.3%
Beats his personal physician Dr Kizza Besigye and four others to win the second elective term in office.
2006 59.3%
Retains the seat after a bruising battle with Dr Kizza Besigye and three other candidates.
2011 68.4%
Mr Museveni trounces FDC's Kizza Besigye and six other candidates for the third time.
2016 60.6%
Mr Museveni beats FDC's Kizza Besigye for the fourth time with six other candidates.
2021 58.38%
The emergence of musician Bobi Wine brings new opposition in a race that attracted 11 candidates. Mr Museveni wins again.

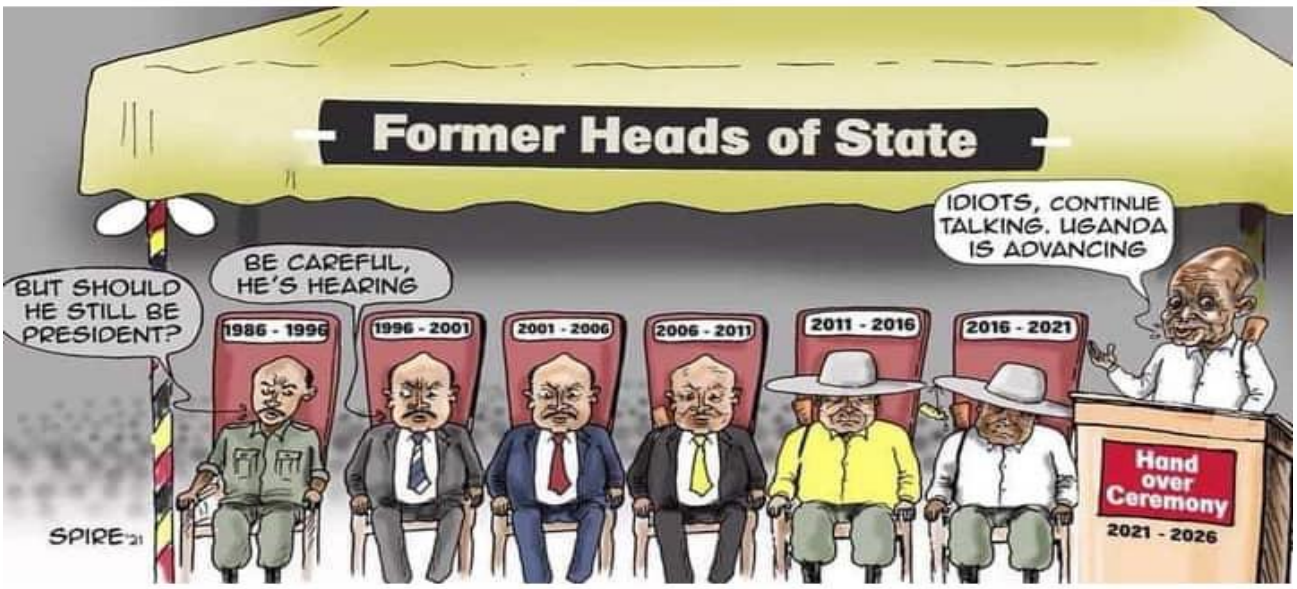
AP







CONSTITUTION



Former Heads of State
BUT SHOULD HE STILL BE PRESIDENT?
BE CAREFUL, HE'S HEARING
IDIOTS, CONTINUE TALKING. UGANDA IS ADVANCING
1986 - 1996
1996 - 2001
2001 - 2006
2006 - 2011
2011 - 2016
2016 - 2021
Hand over Ceremony
2021 - 2026
SPIRE

STATE HOUSE OF UGANDA

S O M E I N T R E S T I N G Q U O T E S O V E R Y E A R S

1981

"Obote has rigged my votes and so I'm going to the bush to fight his illegitimacy"

1986

"Africa's problem is not poverty but leaders who over stay in power"

1987

"I will not preside over a country where a person is killed or tortured and I don't know who the offender is"

1995

"This Constitution is the best in the whole world and if anyone tries to tamper with it, I'll go back to the bush"

1996

Am like a bicycle quarter pin. It enters by force and removed by force.

1998

"I will retire next year"

2000

"Gadaffi will attend my retirement ceremony."

2001

"I still need your support for only this term to accomplish NRM goals"

2006

"Uganda will be a middle income country by 2017".

"How can akapapura obupapura (just a ballot paper) remove someone from power?"

2011

"I dont need votes because I have the army and the money."

2014

"I dont work for Ugandans, I am working for myself and my grandchildren"

"I cannot hand over power to wolves (emishega)"

2015

"Those saying agende, they want to come and steal my oil"

2016

"I will smash anyone trying to joke around with my throne"

I am not a servant of any one. I am a freedom fighter fighting for my freedom, and what I believe in”

"Arrest those pigs who are killing Ugandans"

2017

"This Constitution is barring me from developing Uganda. Let's amend it"

"There's no money for menstrual pads for girls"

2019

"The enkonome is pheeewwwww" Finance minister

2020

"Every worker should contribute 10k to fight Corona virus.

A P P E N D I X B

UGANDA: KEY HISTORICAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENTS

1877: First Church Missionary Society (CMS) Christians came to Buganda.

1879: First White Father French Catholics visited Buganda.

1888: Kabaka Mwanga deposed by armed religious converts.

1890: Britain and Germany signed a treaty giving Britain rights to what was to become Uganda.

1894: Uganda became a British protectorate.

1892 January: Fighting broke out between Protestant and Catholic Baganda converts.

1900: The 1900 Buganda Agreement: between the British and Buganda. It gave Baganda chiefs a lot of personal land; imposed a tax on huts and guns; designated chiefs as tax collectors.

1900: Toro Agreement: An agreement similar to the 1900 Buganda Agreement but less generous without large-scale private land tenure. Other similar agreements signed were the 1901: Ankole Agreement and 1933: Bunyoro Agreement.

1902: An order in Council of 1902 was passed. It established a system of legislation through the promulgation of personal decrees by representatives of the British Crown. The Eastern province of Uganda transferred to the Kenya.

1920: Another Order in Council passed. It created a legislative body (the LEGCO) with a membership of 7 Europeans and headed by the Governor.

1921 March 23: First LEGCO (Legislative Council) meeting.

1926 May 26: First Asian Mr. Chrunabai Jekabhai Amin was sworn in as Member of LEGCO.

October 23, 1945: The Governor Sir John Hall announced an approval of a scheme for the nomination of three Africans as members of the Legislative Council, to represent Buganda, Eastern and Western Provinces.

December 4, 1945: The first African to join the LEGCO were sworn in and were: Micheal Ernest Kawalya- The Katikiro of Buganda; Petero Nyangabyaki- The Katikiro of Bunyoro and Yekonia Zirabamuzale- Secretary General of Busoga.

1947: Uganda African Farmers Union founded by I.K. Musaazi.

1949: An African representing the Northern region of Uganda joined the LEGCO making the total number of Africans.

1949: Riots in Buganda challenging the by passing of government price controls on the exports sales of cotton; urging the removal of the Asian monopoly over cotton ginning and the right to have own representatives in local government to replace chiefs appointed by the British.

1952: Musaazi's Uganda National Congress replaced the Uganda African Farmers Union.

1961: First direct elections of LEGCO. The election returned an African majority in the LEGCO. The Democratic Party (DP) led by Ben Kiwanuka formed the majority party and Uganda Peoples' Congress (UPC) led by Apollo Milton Obote formed the opposition.

1962: General elections held. UPC won 37 seats against 24 of DP excluding Buganda. Buganda region had opted for indirect election hence its Lukiko nominated 21 representatives to the National Assembly. The Buganda representative struck an alliance with UPC - the UPC /Kabaka Yekka (KY), to form a coalition government with Apollo Milton Obote as Prime Minister. DP led by Ben Kiwanuka led the opposition. It is the UPC/KY alliance government that received instruments of Independence.

1962 October 9: Uganda's Independence.

1962: The independence Constitution 1962 was promulgated based on compromise of various political interests namely the UPC/KY alliance to win state power from DP. A federal arrangement for Buganda was entrenched in the 1962 Constitution. Under this arrangement, Buganda retained powers over the local police, primary education, and local forests. The national assembly was partly elected and partly nominated. However, Buganda representatives to the national parliament continued to be directly elected by the Lukiko. Executive powers were vested in the Prime Minister.

1963: Posts of President and Vice President were created and Kabaka Edward Muteesa became the first president and William Nadiope , the Kyabazinga of Busoga became Vice President. Both posts were ceremonial.

1964: Referendum “over lost counties" between the kingdoms of Bunyoro and Buganda held.

1966 February 4: While on a trip in the north, a no confidence vote was passed against Obote by UPC MPs.

1966 May: The Independence Constitution was abrogated and an interim one introduced pending the promulgation of the Republic Constitution.

Otherwise known as the pigeon -hole constitution, introduced without discussion, and merely dropped in the pigeon holes of MPs.

Parliamentary and judicial powers were usurped by the Executive, by government trying to make laws instead of Parliament as was in the case of the debate on the Administrations (Kingdom) Bill.

Diminishing of the power of the judiciary, a case in point was that of the 5 ministers who had been arrested and deported to Karamoja. Much as the High court had declared the 1966 Interim Constitution unconstitutional, the East African Court of Appeal upheld the contrary in conformity with government's position. In the case of Matovu who had been arrested for calling on central government to remove its capital from Mengo, the High Court was frightened from declaring the 1966 Interim Constitution unconstitutional.

1967: The Republic Constitution came into force. It abolished the Kingdoms. Buganda was divided into 4 districts. The Constitution maintained a multi- party system of government. It stipulated that after a general election, the party with the greatest numerical strength of elected members would form government. Members of the National Assembly were deemed to have been elected for another term of 5 years. Concentration of power in the hands of the executive was further revealed in the 1967 Constitution which exempted the president from any court proceedings whatsoever.

1969 December: Assassination attempt on Obote.

1971 January 25: Military coup by Idi Amin Dada toppled Obote.

1972 September: Idi Amin Dada expelled 50,000 Asians form Uganda and seized their property.

1998 November 1: Amin invaded Tanzania territory and annexed a section across River Kagera boundary.

1979: Uganda National Liberation Army (UNLA) overthrew of Idi Amin regime. An interim parliament, the National Consultative Council (NCC) was put in place as the supreme legislative body till the 1980 election. The NCC was composed of 30 members elected in Moshi Tanzania. The NCC was later expanded to 120 members. Yusufu Lule was made head of state, but was replaced a few months later by Godfrey Binaisa.

1980 May 10: Binaisa was overthrown as president. The Military Commission headed by Paul Muwanga governed Uganda for 6 months leading to the national elections of December 1980.

1980 December: General elections took place. UPC came into power and DP was in the opposition. Apollo Milton Obote was President and Paulo Muwanga was Vice- President and Minister of Defence.

1983: Death of General Oyite Ojok, Chief of staff and right hand man of Apollo Milton Obote.

1985 July 27: The UPC governement was overthrown in a military coup by General Tito Okello and Bazilio Okello.

1986 January 26: The National Resistance Movement came to power by Legal Notice 1 of 1986. Legislative power was vested in the National Resistance Council. NRC initially had 38 historical members of the National Resistance Movement and National Resistance Army. Through nationwide elections, the NRC's membership later expanded to 270 comprised of 38 Historicals, 149 county representatives, 19 city/municipal Council representatives; 20 nominated members and 34 District women representatives. Membership later included district and youth representatives.

1988: The NRC passed the Constitutional Commission Statute that created a 21 member Constitutional Commission, a body set up primarily to study and review the Constitution with a view to making proposals for the enactment of a national Constitution.

1993 December: The Constitutional Commission presented the draft Constitution to the President as the document from which the new Constitution was to emerge.

1993: NRC passed the Constituent Assembly (Statute) providing for elections to the Constituent Assembly in March 1994, to be organized by an Interim Electoral Commission. Museveni restored traditional institutions and kingdoms, but without giving them political power.

1993 March: Election of the Constituent Assembly.

1995 October: 1995 Constitution promulgated. The constitution legalised political parties, although it maintained the ban on political activity.

1995: An Interim Electoral Commission constituted under the Interim Electoral Commission Statute 1995.

1996 May 7: Interim Electoral Commission organized the first direct presidential elections.

1996 May 12: Elected President Yoweri Museveni Kaguta was sworn in.

1999 July: The Referendum and other Provisions Act was passed as the legal framework under which the Referendum would be held.

1999 July 30: The Referendum and other Provisions Act 1999 was challenged in court for being invalid first for lack of quorum at the time of its enactment and secondly, being enacted after the expiry of the date stipulated in the constitution.

1999 September 23: The Constitutional Court threw out the petition on the invalidity of the Referendum and other Provisions Act 1999 on the ground that parliamentary records (Hansards) could not be used as evidence without the permission of the Speaker. That according to the rules of procedure of parliament, courts of law had no jurisdiction to inquire into the internal workings of parliament.

2000 May 31: Supreme Court overturned the decision of the Constitutional Court. It was held that the need to get permission of the speaker to use parliamentary records was unsustainable. That the matter called for constitutional interpretation by the Constitutional court. The petition was sent back to the constitutional court to be heard on its merits.

2000 June 7: The Referendum (Political Systems) Bill was tabled before parliament. Rules of procedure were suspended to enable the Bill to proceed to the second reading and was passed at 5:30 pm the same day.

2000 June 22: A petition contesting the validity of the Referendum (Political Systems) Act 2000 was filed.

2000 June 29: Referendum to determine best system of governance for Uganda held The ruling Movement system was declared 90.7 % victor as against 9.3% for multiparty.

2000 August 10: The constitutional court declared the Referendum and other provisions Act 1999 unconstitutional on the grounds that the method of voice voting offered no precise vote and there was no quorum at the time of voting.

2000 August 29: The Constitution (Amendment) Bill 2000 was tabled. Rules that require a bill to go to the Sessional Committee were suspended to enable immediate passing of the bill without waiting for 14 days. The intention of the amendment was to validate previous laws, resolutions and actions of parliament that had been challenged by the Constitutional Court decision. The Constitution was amended without taking it back to the people. Quorum was required only during the time of voting and not during debate. Leave of the Speaker had to be got before using parliamentary records as evidence. This put these two matters out of the ambit of judicial inquiry.

2000 December: Presidential Elections Act passed.

2000 October: Aggrey Awori and Dr. Kizza Besigye announced their candidature for presidential elections.

2001 January: Uganda, along with the Tanzania and Kenya inaugurated the East African Community (EAC) in Arusha, Tanzania.

2001 February 6: Uganda's Sixth parliament presented the Political Parties and Organizations Bill to the president for assent. Parliament had allowed parties to open branches at district level.

2001 February 7: Constitutional Review Commission was elected in the heat of the presidential elections.

2001 March 12: Presidential elections held and President Museveni was re-elected as president.

2001 March: Uganda classified Rwanda, a former ally in the civil war in DR Congo, a hostile nation because of fighting in 2000 between the two countries' armies in DR Congo.

2001 April 10: The President returned the Political Parties and Organizations Bill to parliament for reconsideration arguing that political parties should restrict their activities to national headquarters.

2001 June 21: Parliamentary elections for District Women Members of Parliament held.

2001 June 27: Parliamentary elections held.

2002 March 9: Political Parties and Organisations Act was passed by parliament.

2002 March: Uganda and Sudan signed an agreement to contain the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), active along the Sudan/Uganda border.

2002 April 24: New Leadership Code 2002 and IGG Act 2002 passed. The Leadership Code covers wider category of public servants and introduces sanctions for non - compliance including loss of jobs and confiscation of property acquired as a result of abuse of office. The IGG Act regulates the procedure for the making of complaints by members of public and ensuring access to services of IGG by the government.

2005 April: Uganda refuted DR Congo’s allegations at the International Court in The Hague that Uganda invaded its territory in 1999, killing citizens and looting.

2005 July: Parliament approved a constitutional amendment removing presidential term limits.

2005 July: Referendum held with a majority of Ugandans voting for the return to multi- party politics.

2005 October: International Criminal Court issued arrest warrants for Joseph Kony and 4 other LRA commanders.

2005 November: Forum for Democratic Change (FDC) President and the main opposition leader Kizza Besigye was imprisoned and charged in a military court with terrorism and illegal possession of firearms.

2005 December: The International Court in The Hague ruled that Uganda should compensate DR Congo for rights abuses and the plundering of resources in the five years leading to 2003.

2006 January: Kizza Besigye released from prison on bail.

2006 February: Multi-party elections held and Museveni re-elected president.

2006 July: The government commenced peace talks with the LRA. In Southern Sudan mediated by Riek Machar.

2006 August: The government and the LRA signed an agreement to end conflict and agreed to a ceasefire.

2006 November: A United Nations report stated that the Ugandan army used indiscriminate and excessive force in its campaign to disarm tribal warriors in northeastern region of Karamoja. Government refuted these claims.

2006 November: The First addendum to the Cessation of Hostilities Agreement between LRA representatives and the Ugandan government signed.

2007 March: Ugandan peacekeepers deployed in Somalia as part of an African Union mission in the country.

2007 April: Ugandans protested against the planned give away of the Mabira forest. Several people died as a result.

2007: Kizza Besigye petitioned the constitutional court on the legality of his detention and trial by the Court Martial and High Court.

2008 February: Government and the Lord's Resistance Army signed a permanent ceasefire at talks in Juba, Sudan.

2008 November: Joseph Kony failed to appear to sign the anticipated Final Peace Agreement. The Final Peace Agreement included Agreements on disarmament, demobilization, reintegration, implementing and monitoring protocols, and the Comprehensive Solutions and Accountability and Reconciliation agreements.

2009 January: The Supreme Court ruled in a case involving more than 400 death row inmates that the death penalty is constitutional. It however stated that hanging was cruel and recommended parliament consider another means of execution.

2009 September: Rioting erupted in Kampala following government ban on Kabaka of Buganda over a planned visit to Kayunga an area where the Banyala ethnic group are opposed to the Kabaka's authority.

2009 October: The Al-Shabab threatened to attack Bujumbura and Kampala, following rocket attacks by Burundi and Uganda who are part of the peacekeeping forces in Somalia.

2009 October 14: Member of Parliament David Bahati submitted the Anti- Homosexuality bill as a private members bill in parliament. The Bill attempts to strengthen the criminalization of homosexuality and in cases of "aggravated homosexuality" proposes the death penalty.

2009 November: Human rights activists condemned the Anti-Homosexuality Bill.

2009 December: Parliament voted to ban female circumcision. The law prescribes a sentence of 10 years or life imprisonment for cases of an aggravated nature for instance if the person died, is disabled or contracts HIV as a result of the circumcision.

2010 January: President Museveni distanced himself from the anti-homosexuality Bill, noting it was a private members bill.

2010 March 16: Fire gutted the Kasubi tombs, the burial grounds for Buganda kings. This sparked riots in Kampala over allegations of arson. The tombs are a world heritage site under UNESCO.

2010 April, 9: The Prohibition of Female Genital Mutilation Act, 2010 passed into law.

2010 June: The Director of Public Prosecutions opened corruption investigations against top government officials and private businessmen including Vice-President Gilbert Bukenya, Foreign Minister Sam Kutesa and several other ministers and officials over alleged abuse of public fund during the 2007 Commonwealth Heads of State Summit.

2010 July: Approximately 74 people killed and many others injured following two bomb attacks on people watching World Cup final at the Ethiopian village restaurant and the Kampala rugby club in Kampala. The Al-Shabab were behind the attacks.

2010 August: National Resistance Movement primary elections for parliamentary and local candidates were suspended following irregularities and violence.

2010 October: The Constitutional Court dismissed treason charges against FDC president, Kizza Besigye and ten others.

2010 December: Security tightened after a grenade explosion on a Kampala-bound bus in Nairobi, Kenya.

2010 January: President Museveni signed the controversial Land (Amendment) Act 2010 in law amidst protests by some factions especially Buganda rejecting the Act. The Press and Journalist (Amendment) Bill, 2010 tabled in Parliament. The Bill proposes mandatory registration and licensing of newspapers by the Media Council.

2010 March: The Domestic Violence Act, 2010 enact

2010 April: The Whistleblowers Protection Act, 2010 enacted.

2010 June: The Presidential Elections (Amendment) Act, 2010 enacted.

2010 August: Constitutional Court nullified Uganda's sedition law.

2010 September: Public criticised the purpose of the Public Order Management Bill 2009. The outcry was triggered by an announcement by the Metropolitan Police Chief that due to the threat of terrorism, public gatherings would require sanction of the Inspector General of Police (IGP). The Bill sought to regulate public gatherings and demonstrations. It also sought to reintroduce provisions of the Police Act, Cap 303 which were nullified by the 2008 Constitutional Court in the case of Muwanga Kivumbi v. Attorney General of Uganda.

2010 December: Institution of Traditional and Cultural Leaders Bill, 2010 was introduced in Parliament amidst controversy over its intentions. It sought to regulate the activities of traditional leaders and purports to operationalise Article 246 of the 1995 Constitution.

2010: The Electoral Commission (Amendment) Act, 2010 was passed. Its amendment provisions permit political parties or organizations and representatives of independent candidates to be accredited by the Electoral Commission as election observers.

2011 January: The Institution of Traditional and Cultural Leaders Bill was passed in parliament despite opposition members of parliament attempting to block it.

2011 February 1: The Constitutional Court ruled based on Article 83 (1) (g) and (h) of the Constitution, that all members of parliament who crossed from their respective parties to other parties or chose to contest as independents without resigning from their previous parties, could not contest in the 2011general elections. Approximately 77 members were affected by the Constitutional Court's ruling.

2011 February 11: Speaker of Parliament Edward Ssekandi directed the 77 MPs affected by the Constitutional Court ruling of February 1, 2011 to vacate their seats immediately. The MPs were also required to refund the salary (about 13m shillings per month) they had received since their nomination as candidates.

November 2010. The Supreme Court granted an interim stay of execution of the Constitutional Court's ruling.

2011 February: Presidential elections conducted and Museveni won his fourth presidential election amidst allegation by FDC president of vote rigging.

2011 April: Kizza Besigye arrested several times over "walk-to-work" protests against rising cost of living.

2011 May: Inspectorate General of Government forwarded charges against former vice president Gilbert Bukenya to the Anti-corruption court over abuse of office in relation to the procurement of the cars for the 2007 Commonwealth Summit.

2011 July: Rebecca Kadaga the Speaker of Parliament elected the vice chairperson of the Commonwealth Women Parliamentarians.

2011 September: Parliamentarians petition Speaker of Parliament to recall parliament from recess in order to discuss issues relating to the oil sharing agreements.

2011 October: Former Vice president Gilbert Bukenya committed to the High Court and remanded in prison following cancellation of bail.

2011 October: The Inspector General of Government forwarded charges against Foreign Affairs Minister Sam Kutesa, Government Chief Whip John Nasasira and Labour State Minister Mwesigwa Rukutana to the Anti-corruption Court in relation to the Shs14billion tender for fixing Speke Resort Munyonyo, ahead of the 2007 Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting in Kampala.

2011 October 5: The High Court in Kampala nullified the election of former Vice - President Gilbert Bukenya as Busiro north MP over allegedly bribing voters.

2011 October 11: Former Vice president Gilbert Bukenya released on bail. In an unprecedented debate that commenced at 11:00am and ended at 10:15pm Parliament, the members of parliament resolved that a moratorium on executing oil contracts and transactions be placed on the government until necessary laws have been passed by Parliament to give effect to the National Oil and Gas policy. The laws must be tabled in Parliament within 30 days, government to forward all agreements signed with oil companies, reviews the Product Sharing Agreements, accounts for revenues received from oil sector and all Ministers implicated in corruption allegations relating to the oil dealings to step down from office until investigations completed.

2011 October 12: Foreign Affairs Minister Sam Kutesa, Government Chief Whip John Nasasira and Labour State Minister Mwesigwa Rukutana took leave of their offices pending investigation on charges of abuse of office and causing financial loss relating to CHOGM.

2011 October 17 & 18: Dr. Kizza Besigye arrested by police over attempts to continue the “walk-to-work” campaign, taken to a police station to record a statement and later returned to his home where he was placed under preventive house arrest. No charges were preferred on him.

2011 October 25: Public Order and Management Bill 2011 tabled in Parliament.

2011 October 25: In conformity with the Parliamentary resolutions for government to produce all Agreements executed with oil companies, and proceeds, the Finance Minister tabled statements from Bank of Uganda showing revenues that government received from the oil industry.

2011 October 26: Production Sharing Agreements for Petroleum exploration, development and production between the government and nine oil companies tabled in Parliament.

2011 October 27: The Magistrates Court ruled that the incarceration of Dr. Kizza Besigye at his residence was unlawful since was not kept in lawful detention and beyond the constitutional 48 hours requirement.

2011 October 28: Dr. Kizza Besigye petitioned the constitutional court to declare Article 26 of the Criminal Procedure Code Act and Section 24 of the Police Act unconstitutional. Article 26 of the Criminal Procedure Code Act empowers the police to arrest any person whom the police highly suspects is about to commit an offence, and Section 24 of the Police Act grants powers to a police officer to conduct an arrest of any person where the police officer has reasonable cause to believe that the arrest and detention of such person is necessary to prevent them from causing physical injury to themselves or others and causing damage to property.

2011 October 31: Dr. Kizza Besigye arrested outside his home by police over attempts to continue the "walk-to-work" campaign. He was taken to a police station where he was detained for nine hours before being returned to his home. No charges were preferred against him.

2011 October: Civil society organisations petitioned the Constitutional court against government and Tullow Oil over lack of oil regulatory framework and eviction of people from exploration sites without compensation.

2011 October: Foreign Affairs Minister Sam Kutesa, Government Chief Whip John Nasasira and Labour State Minister Mwesigwa Rukutana filed a petition in the constitutional court challenging the powers and jurisdiction of the Inspector General of Government and the powers of the Magistrates Court to cancel bail of suspects.

2011 November 1: Amnesty International released a report titled Stifling Dissent: Restrictions on the Rights to Freedom of Expression and Peaceful Assembly in Uganda, in which it criticizes the government of repression.

2011 November: IGG discontinued the case against Former Vice President Gilbert Bukenya in which he was accused of abuse of office.

2011 November 9: Prof. Dani Wadada Nabudere died. Parliament passed a motion in his remembrance. He was Minister of Justice in 1979 and minister of Culture and Community Development and Rehabilitation in 1979 and 1980.

2011 December 20: The speaker of Parliament, Rt. Hon. Rebecca Kadaga announced that Uganda will host the Inter-Parliamentary Union (IPU) Assembly between 31st March and the 5th April.

The agenda for the conference are issues surrounding the current political, social and economic situations in the world under the theme: "Parliament and people: bridging the gap."

2011 December: The constitutional court halted the investigation by a parliamentary ad hoc committee investigating alleged ongoing oil scam which involved Prime Minister Amama Mbabazi, and Ministers Sam Kutesa and Hillary Anek. The court issued a temporary injunction in order to consider a request by the Parliamentary commission to be added as respondents to the petition. FDC officials Ingrid Turinawe and others charged with treason released on bail. Inspector General Police, Kale Kayihura called for a revision of the Public Order Management Bill.

2012 January 24: CHOGM Ministers' case adjourned to August pending the outcome of the Constitutional Court's ruling over the interpretation of their prosecution by the Inspectorate of Government which they allege is not properly constituted.

2012 February: Petroleum (refining, gas processing and conversion, transportation and storage) Bill and the Petroleum, Exploration and Production Bill, 2012 was tabled in Parliament repealing the 1985 Petroleum, Exploration and Production Act cap 150.

2012 March 6: Parliament cleared Bank of Uganda Governor Emmanuel Tumusiime Mutebile of a heavy compensation payment made to city business man Hassan Basajjabalaba.

2012 March 14: Seven opposition MP's spearhead a petition to impeach President Museveni over allegations of abuse of office.

2012 March: The High Court at Nakawa set March 28 to rule on an application by four civil society organizations seeking to be joined on an appeal case asking government to make public agreements it signed with oil prospecting companies in the Lake Albert basin.

2012 March: Government drafted a new media Bill titled "The Uganda Communications Regulatory Authority Bill, 2012," which would regulate radios and television stations including any broadcasting which would infringe on the privacy of any individual.

2012 March: The High Court granted a temporary order to bar any activities held by a splinter group of the Conservative party on its behalf.

2012 March 20: The High Court allowed the National Security Fund (NSSF) to amend pleadings that seek to overturn the award of $8.9 million to Alco International Ltd for construction of Workers House. Radio owners in the country publicly oppose the new Media Bill that is claimed will hand government the power to control the operations of broadcasts in the country. Parliament voted to amend rules of procedure to allow the media to use their electrical gadgets in Parliament sessions.

2012 March 21: 25 civil society organizations launched a country wide campaign supporting the opposition Mp's in attempts being made to impeach President Museveni and intend to collect signatures from Uganda.

2012 March 28: FDC opposition leader Dr. Kizza Besigye was jointly charged with Kampala Mayor Erias Lukwago and three others for organizing an unlawful assembly that led to the death of Assistant Inspector of Police John Michael Ariong on March 21, 2012 in Kampala. Nakawa High Court dismissed the application by four civil society organizations that had sought to join an appeal case pushing for government to make public oil production agreements it signed with oil exploration companies.

2012 April 02: The 24 suspects accused of participating in the Buganda riots of September 2009 started, more than two years after their arrest.

2012 April 02: Opposition leaders from FDC succeeded in gaining entry and an audience with delegates attending the 126th Inter- Parliamentary Assembly in Kampala and used this opportunity to call for political and economic reform in the country.

2012 April 04: The Attorney General cited Section 56 (2) (c), Cap 120 of the Penal Code Act to declare the A4C an unlawful society, rendering its activities illegal. However, A4C national coordinator Mr. Mathias Mpuga (also Masaka Municipality independent MP) termed the declaration an abuse of their constitutional rights. He noted that the law applied is a colonial law and that banning the group and its activities is a violation of human rights that are clearly protected in Article 29 of the constitution.

2012 April 05: Constitutional court ruled that the Inspectorate General Government could not prosecute ministers, Sam Kutesa, John Nasasira and Mwesigwa Rukutana or any one because it was not fully constituted.

2012 April 19: A copy of the draft proposed Bill titled: “The Constitution Amendment Bill 2012”, was handed over to the speaker of Parliament by Western youth MP Mr. Gerald Karuhanga (the architect of the Bill) in an attempt to start a debate on restoration of term limits as provided for by Article 105 (2) of the 2005 constitution.

2012 April 20: The judiciary warned media houses not to discuss any of the Buganda riot case proceedings in their presentations or programs as this could amount to contempt of court which would in the long run see presenters charged with a maximum sentence of 6 months in jail.

2012 April 25: Parliament approved the selection of Justice Irene Mulyagonja as Inspector General of Government (IGG). She was the former High Court Judge in the Commercial division and is to replace acting IGG, Raphael Baku.

2012 April 26: Parliament passed the Prevention and Prohibition of Torture Bill, 2010.

2012 May 3: The NRM ruling party endorsed provisions in the proposed Public Order Management Bill, a proposed law which has been highly criticized by human rights activists in and outside the country.

2012 May 11: The East African Court of Justice placed an injunction on Parliament a stopping them from conducting elections for Uganda's representatives to the East African Legislative Assembly and ordered Parliament to adopt Rules of Procedure that conform to Article 50 of the East African Community Treaty.

2012 May 13: Members of the opposition walked out of Parliament in protest of a debate on rules to formulate procedures of electing members of parliament to EALA, hence leaving the process to be decided by members of the ruling party and the independents.

2012 May 30: Parliament voted on EALA Parliament seats. The ruling NRM party was allocated 6 seats, the opposition parties 3 seats and the independents one seat.

2012 May 30: While meeting a delegation of Tanzanian MPs in Uganda, the speaker of Parliament, Ms. Rebecca Kadaga, took the chance to lobby support for Uganda's candidature for the position of speaker of EALA.

2012 May 30: Leader of the opposition in Parliament Hon. Nadala Mafabi sacked the Democratic Party (DP) shadow ministers in a disagreement over representatives for the EALA speakership. In total eight ministers from the Uganda People's Congress (UPC) and DP opposition parties were sacked.

2012 June: The Kampala High Court issued an order to freeze KCC revenue accounts citing claims of unpaid terminal benefits by former employees in accordance with a court ruling made in 1995. The benefits owed by the council total up to 1.5 billion Uganda Shillings.

2012 June 1: Government announced Ms. Dora Byamukama as its preferred candidate for the EALA speakership race.

2012 June 05: Hon. Margret Nantongo Zziwa from Uganda was elected and sworn into office as EALA speaker. She is the first female to hold the office.

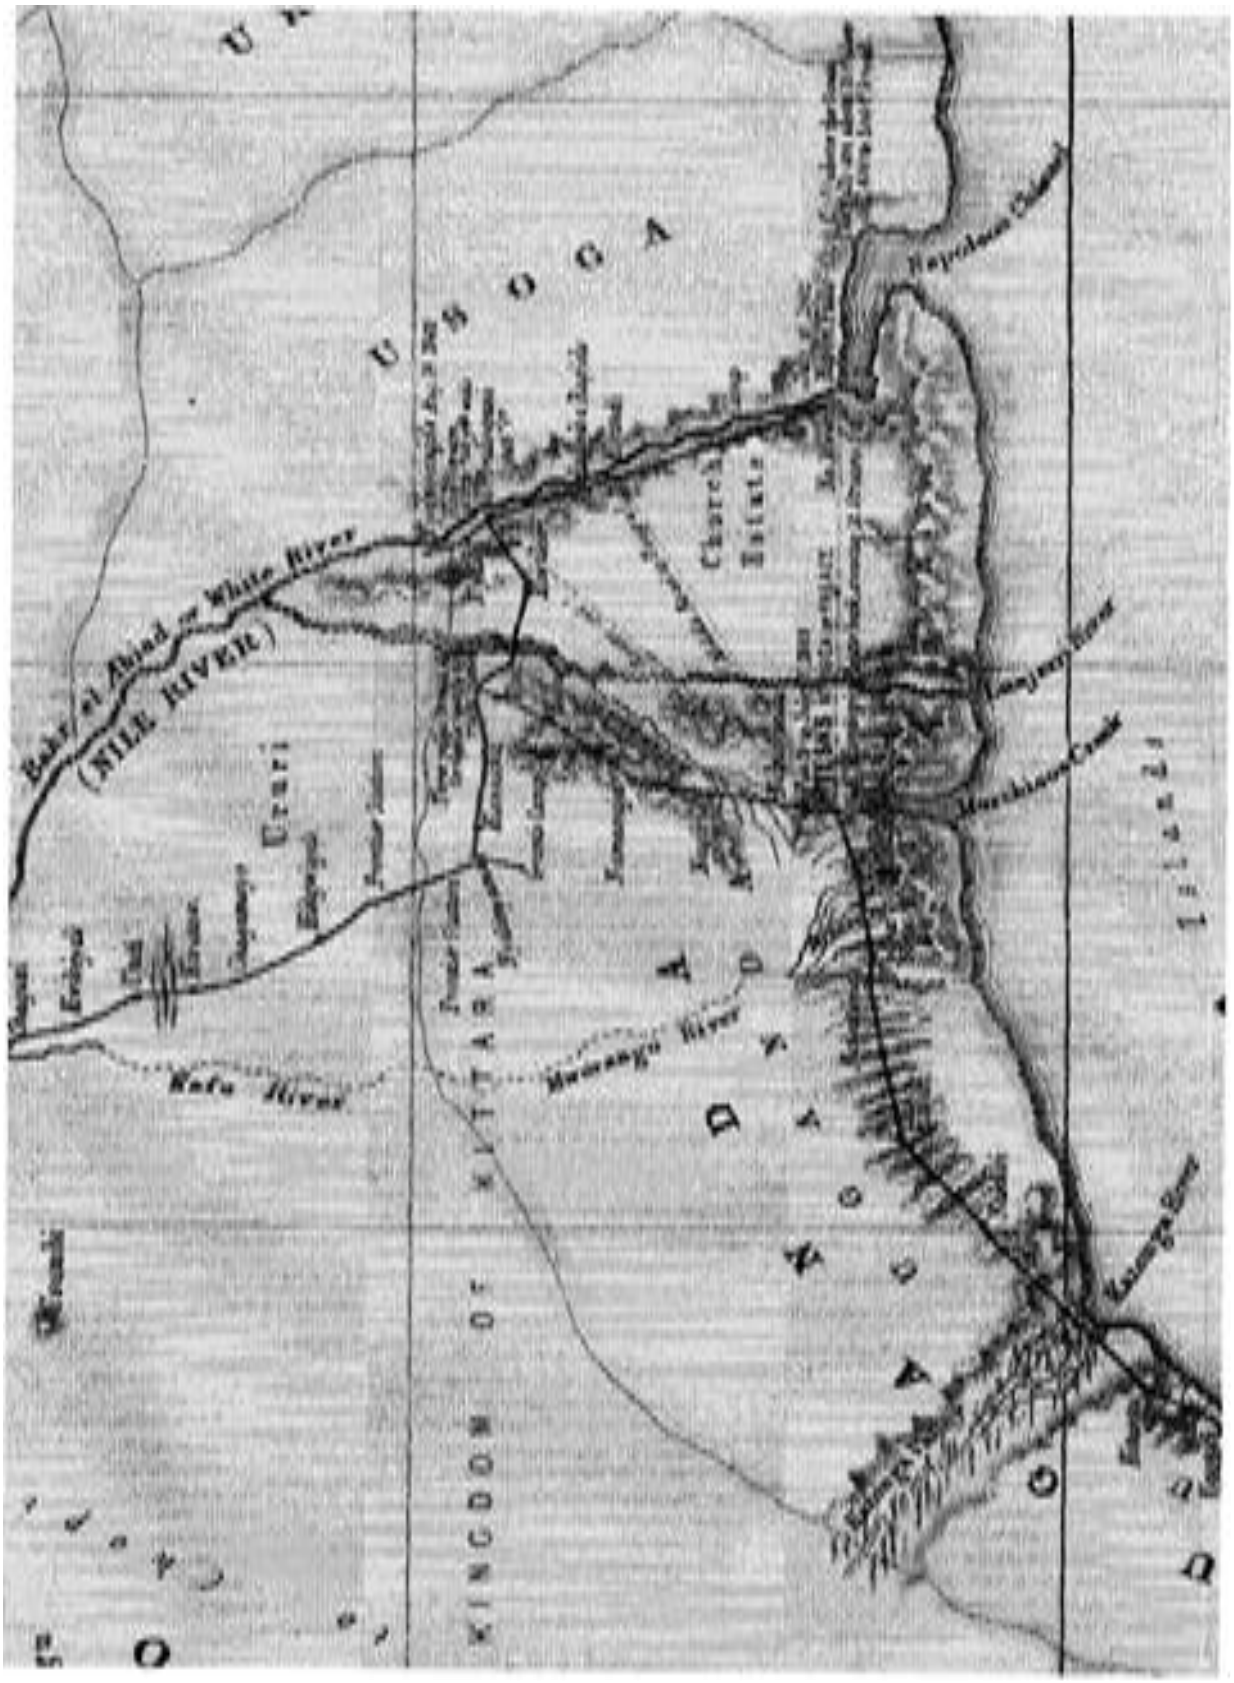
2012 June 20: Uganda's ranking among world's failed states moved from the 'in danger" status to a "critical condition" status on the 2012 failed states index. It was noted that the perceived loss on the legitimate use of force, inability to provide reasonable public services, etc informed the Uganda's categorisation.

2012 June 21: Uganda Revenue Authority (URA) petitioned Parliament seeking a review of the Retirement Benefits Sector Bill 2011. A petition signed by over 1,000 URA workers was presented to the speaker of Parliament Hon. Rebecca Kadaga

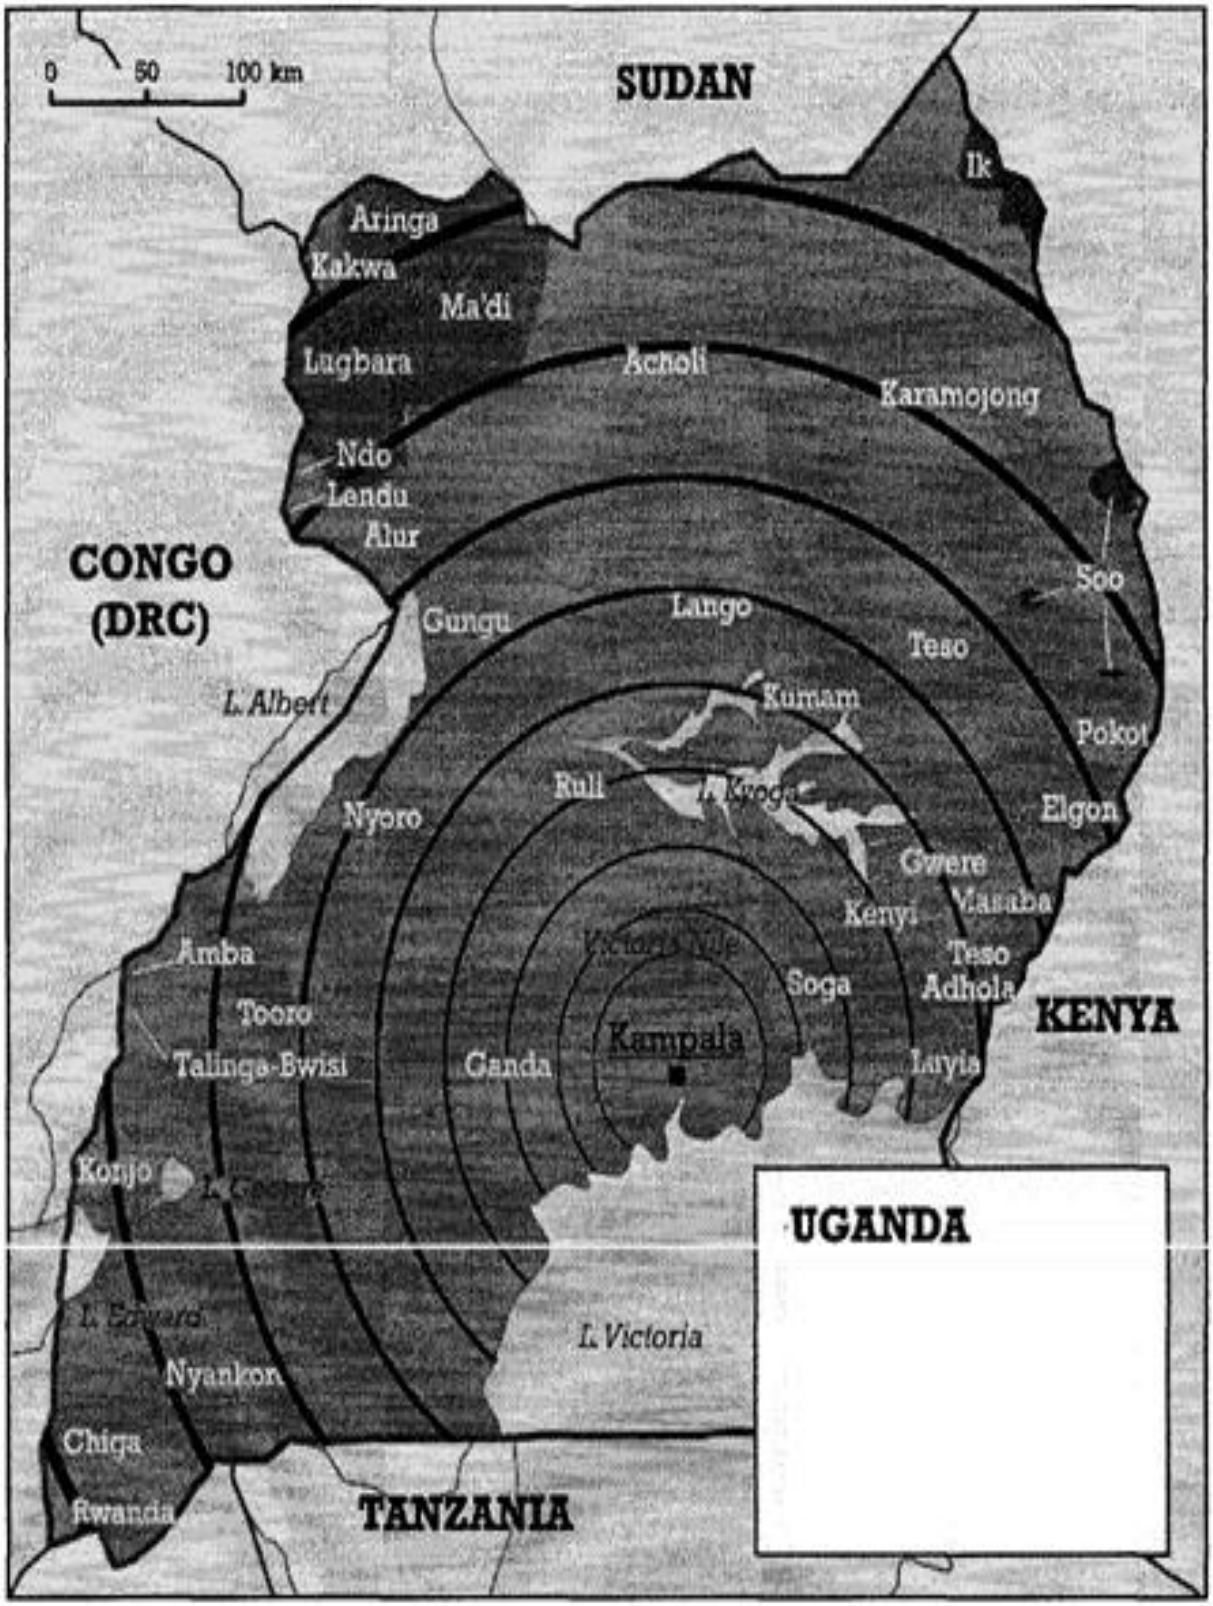
APPENDIX C

LIST OF MAPS

MAP 2A -DETAIL OF SPEKE'S MAP OF EASTERN AFRICA, 1864



ETHNO-LINGUISTIC MAP OF UGANDA



IMPORTANT CONSTITUTIONAL DOCUMENTS

APPENDIX D

The Magna Carta(The Great Charter)

Abuses by King John caused a revolt by nobles who compelled him to execute this recognition of rights for both noblemen and ordinary Englishmen. It established the principle that no one,including the king or a law maker,is above the law.

This is but one of three different translations I found of the Magna Carta; it was originally done in Latin, probably by the Archbishop, Stephen Langton.It was inforceforonly afew months, when it was violated by the king. Just over ayear later, with no resolution to the war, the king died, being succeeded by his 9-year oldson, HenryIII. The Charter (Carta) was reissued again, with some revisions, in 1216, 1217and 1225.As near as I can tell, the version presented here is the one that preceeded all of the others; nearly all of its provisions were soon superceded by other laws, and none of it is effective today. The two other versions I found each professed to be the original, as well. The basic intent ofeach is the same

Preamble:

John, by the grace of God, King of England, Lord of Ireland, duke ofNormandyand Aquitaine, and count of Anjou, to the archbishop, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justiciaries, foresters, sheriffs, stewards, servants, and to all his bailiffs and liege subjects, greetings.

Know that,having regard to God and for the salvation of our soul,and those of all our ancestors and heirs,and unto the honor of God and the advancement of his holy Church and for the rectifying of our realm, we have granted as underwritten by adviceofour venerable fathers,Stephen,archbishop of Canterbury,primate of all England and cardinal of the holy Roman Church,Henry, archbishop of Dublin,William of London,Peter of Winchester, Jocelynof Bathand Glastonbury,Hugh of Lincoln, Walter of Worcester,WilliamofCoventry, Benedict of Rochester,bishops; of Master Pandulf, subdeacon and member of the household ofour lord the Pope,of brother Aymeric(master of the Knights of the Templein England),and of the illustrious men William Marshal, earl of Pembroke,William,earl of Salisbury,William, earl of Warenne,William, earl of Arundel,Alanof Galloway(constable of Scotland),Waren Fitz Gerold, Peter Fitz Herbert, Hubert De Burgh (seneschal of Poitou),Hugh de Neville,Matthew Fitz Herbert,Thomas Basset, Alan Basset,Philip d'Aubigny,Robert of Roppesley,John Marshal,John Fitz Hugh,and others,our liegemen.

In the first place we have granted to God,and by this our present charter confirmed for us and our heirs forever that the English Church shall be free, and shall have her rights entire,and her liberties inviolate; and we will that itbe thus observed;which is apparent from this that the freedom of elections, which is reckoned most important and very essential to the English Church,we,of our pure and unconstrained will, did grant,and did by ourcharterconfirmanddid obtain the ratification of the same from our lord,Pope Innocent III, before the quarrel arose between us and our barons: and this we will observe, and our will is that it be observed ingood faith by our heirs forever.We have also granted to all freemen of our kingdom,forus andour heirs forever,all the underwritten liberties,to be had and held by them and their heirs,of us and our heirs forever.

If any of our earls or barons, or others holding of us in chief by military service shall have died, and at the time of his death his heir shall be full of age and owe"relief", the shall have his inheritance by the old relief, to wit, the heir or heirs of an earl, for the whole baronyofan earl by £100; the heir or heirs of a baron, £100 for a whole barony; the heir or heirs of a knight, 100s, at most, and whoever owes less let him give less, according to the ancient custom offees.

If, however, the heir of anyone of the aforesaid has been underage and inwardship, let him have his inheritance without relief and without fine when he comes of age. The guardian of the land of an heir who is thus underage,shall take from the land of the heir nothing but reasonable produce,reasonable customs,and reasonable services,and thatwithout destruction or waste of men or goods; and if we have committed the wardship of thelands of any such min or to the sheriff, or toanyotherwhoisresponsibletousforitsissues,and he has made destruction or waster of what he holds in wardship,we will take of him amends,and the land shall be committed to two lawful and discreet men of that fee,who shall be responsiblefor the issues to us or to him to whom we shall assign them;and ifwehave given or sold the wardship of any such land to anyone and he has therein made destruction or waste,he shall lose that wardship, and it shall betransferredtotwo lawful and discreet men of that fief,who shall be responsible to us in like manner as aforesaid.

The guardian, moreover, so long as he has the wardship of the land, shall keep up the houses, parks, fish ponds, stanks, mills, and other things pertaining to the land, out of the issues of the sameland; and he shall restore to the heir, when he has come to full age, all his land, stocked with ploughs and wainage, according asthe season of husbandry shall require, and the issues of the land can reasonable bear.

Heirs shall be married without disparagement, yet so that before the marriage takesplace the nearest in blood to that heir shall have notice. A widow, after the death of her husband, shall forthwith and without difficulty have her marriage portion and inheritance; nor shall she give anything for her dower, or for her marriage portion, or for the inheritance which her husband and she held on the dayofthedeath of that husband; and she may remain in the house of her husband for forty days after his death, within which time her dower shall be assigned to her.

No widow shall be compelled to marry, so long as she prefers to live without a husband; provided always that she gives security not to marry without our consent, if she holds of us, or without the consent of the lord of whom she holds, if she holds of another.

Neither we nor ourbailiffs will seize any land or rent for any debt,as longas thechattelsofthe debtor are sufficient to repay the debt;nor shall thesuretiesofthedebtorbedistrained solongas the principal debt or is able to satisfythedebt;and if the principal debt or shall fail to pay the debt, having nothing where withto pay it,then the sureties shall answer for the debt;and let them have the lands and rents of the debtor, if they desire them,until they are indemnified for the debt which they have paid for him, unless the principal debtor can show proof thatheisdischarged thereofasagainstthe said sureties.

If one who has borrowed from theJews any sum, great or small, die before that loan be repaid, the debt shall not bear interest while the heiris under age, of whomsoever he may hold; and if the debt fall into our hands, we will not take anything except the principal sum contained in the bond.

And if anyone die indebted to the Jews, his wifeshall haveher dowerandpaynothingof that debt; and if any children of the deceased are left underage, necessaries shallbeprovided for the min keeping with the holding of the deceased; and out of there sidue the debt shall be paid, reserving, however, service duet of eudal lords; in like manner let it be done touching debts due to others than Jews.

No scutagenot aid shall be imposed on our kingdom, unless by common counsel of our kingdom, except for ransoming our person, for making our eldest son a knight, and for once marrying our eldest daughter; and for these there shall notbe levied more than a reasonable aid. In like manner it shall be done concerning aids from the city of London.

And the city of London shall have all it ancient liberties and free customs, as well bylandasby water; furthermore, we decree and grant that all other cities, boroughs, towns, and ports shall have all their liberties and free customs.

And for obtaining the common counsel of the king domanent the assessing of anaid (except in the three cases aforesaid)or of ascutage,wewill causetobe summoned thearchbishops,bishops, abbots,earls,and greater barons, severally by our letters; and we will move over cause tobe summoned generally, through our sheriffs and bailiffs, and others who hold of us in chief,for a fixed date, namely, after the expiry of atleast forty days,anda ta fixed place;and in all letters of such summons we will specify the reason of the summons. And when the summons hasthusbeen made, the business shall proceed on the day appointed, according to the counsel of such as are present, although not all who were summoned have come.

We will notfor the future grantto anyone license to take anaid from his own free tenants, except toransom his person, to make his eldestson a knight, and once to marryhis eldest daughter; and on each of these occasions there shall be levied only a reasonable aid.

No one shall be distrained for performanceof greater service for a knight's fee, or for any other free tenement, than is due there from. Common pleas shall not follow our court, but shall be held in some fixed place.

Inquests of novel disseisin, of mortd'ancestor, and of darrein presentment shall not be held elsewhere than in their own county courts, and that in manner following; We, or, if we should be out of the realm, our chief justiciar, will send two justiciariesthrough every county four timesayear, who shall alone withfour knightsofthecounty chosenby the county, hold the said assizes in the county court, on the day and in theplaceof meeting of that court.

And if any of the said assizes cannot be taken on the day of the county court, let there remain of the knights and freeholders, who were present at the county court on that day, as many as maybe requiredfor the efficient making of judgments, according asthebusinessbemoreorless. Afreeman shall not be amerced for as light offense, except in accordance with thedegree of the offense; and for agrave offenseheshall be amerced in accordance with the gravity of the offense, yet saving always his"contentment”; and a merchant in the same way, saving his "merchandise”; andaville in shall beamerced in the same way, saving his "wainage"if they have fallen into our mercy:and none of the aforesaid amercements shall be imposed except by the oath of honest men of the neighborhood.

Earlsand barons shall not be amerced except through their peers, and only in accordance with the degree of the offense. A clerk shallnot be amerced inrespectofhislay holdingexceptafter the manner of the others aforesaid; further, he shall not be amerced in accordance with the extent of his ecclesiastical benefice.

No village or individual shall be compelled to make bridge satriver banks, except those who from of old were legally bound to do so.
No sheriff, constable, coroners, or other so four bailiffs, shall hold pleas of our Crown.

All counties, hundred, wapentakes, and trithings (except our demesne manors) shall remain at the old rents, and without any additional payment.
If anyone holding of usalay fief shall die,and our sheriffor bailiff shall exhibit our letters patent of summons for a debt which the decease dowed us,it shall be lawful for our sheriff or bailiff to attach and enroll the chattels of the deceased,found upon the lay fief,to the value of that debt,at the sight of law worthy men, provided always that nothing whatever be hence removed until the debt which is evident shall befully paid to us;and the residue shall be left to the executors to fulfill the will of the deceased;and if there be nothingduefrom him to us,all the chattels shall go to the deceased,saving to his wife and children their reasonable shares.

If any freeman shall die intestate, his chattels shall be distributed by the hands of his nearest kinsfolk and friends, under supervision of the Church, saving to everyone the debts which the deceased owed tohim.

No constable or other bailiff or fours shall take corn or other provisions from anyone without immediately tendering money therefor, unless he can have postponement thereof by permission of the seller.

No constable shall compel any knight to give money in lieu of castle-guard, when he is willing to perform it in his own person, or (if he himself cannot do it from any reasonable cause) then by another responsible man.

Further, if we have ledor sent him upon military service, he shall be relieved from guard in proportion to the time during which he has been on service because of us.

No sheriff or bailiff of ours, or other person, shall take the horses or carts of any freeman for transport duty, against the will of the said freeman.

Neither wen or our bailiffs shall take, for our castles orfor any other work of ours, wood which is not ours, against the will of the owner of that wood.

We will not retain beyond one year and one day, the lands those who have been convicted of felony, and the lands shall thereafter have behanded over to the lords of the fiefs.

Allkydells for the future shall be removed altogether from Thames and Medway, and throughout all England, except upon the seashore.

The writ which is called praecipe shall not for the future be issued to anyone, regarding any tenement whereby a freeman may lose his court.

Let there be one measure ofwine throughout our whole realm; and one measure of ale; and one measure of corn, to wit,"the London quarter”; and one width of cloth (whether dyed, or russet, or "halberget"), to wit, two ellswithin the selvedges; of weights also let it be asofmeasures.

Nothing in future shall be given or takenfora writ of inquisition of life or limbs, but freely it shall be granted, and never denied.

If anyone holds of us by fee-farm, either by socageor by burage, or of any other land by knight's service,we will not (by reason of that fee- farm,socage,or burgage),have the wardship of the heir,or of such land of his as if of the fief of that other;nor shall we have wardship of that fee-farm,socage,or burgage, unless such fee-farm owes knight's service.We will not by reason of any small serjeancy which anyone may hold of usby the service of rendering to us knives, arrows, or the like,have wardship of his heir or of the land which he holds of another lord by knight's service.

No bailiff for the future shall, upon his own unsupported complaint, put anyone to his "law", without credible witnesses brought for this purposes.

No freemen shall be taken or imprisoned or disseised or exiled or in anyway destroyed, nor will we go upon him nor send upon him, except by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.

To no one will we sell, to no one will were fuse or delay, rightorjustice.

All merchants shall have safeand secure exit from England, and entry to England, with the right to tarry there and to move about as well by land as by water, for buyingand selling by the ancient and right customs, quit from all evil tolls, except (in time of war) such merchants as are of the land at war with us. And if such are found inour land at the beginning of the war, they shall be detained, without injury to their bodies or goods, until information be received by us, or by our chief justicia, how the merchants of our land found in the land at war with us are treated; and four men are safe there, the others shall be safe in our land.

It shall be lawful in future for anyone (excepting always those imprisoned or outlawed in accordance with the law of the kingdom, and natives of any country at war with us, and merchants, who shall be treated as if above provided) to leave our kingdom and to return, safe and secureby land and water, exceptforashort period in time of war, on grounds of public policy- reserving always the allegiance due to us.
If anyone holding of some escheat (such as the honor of Wallingford, Nottingham, Boulogne, Lancaster, or of other escheats which are in our hands and are baronies) shall die, his heir shall given or other relief, and perform or other service to us than he would have done to th ebaron if that barony had been in the baron's hand; and we shall hold it in the same manner in which the baron held it.
Men who dwell without the forest need no thence forthcome before our justiciariesofthe forest upon a general summons, unless they are in plea, or sureties of one or more, who are attached for the forest.
We will appoint as justices, constables, sheriffs, or bailiffs only such as know the law of there alm and mean to observe it well.

All barons who have founded abbeys, concerning which they hold charters from the kings of England, or of which they have long continued possession, shall have the wardship of them, when vacant, as they ought to have.

All forests that have been made suchinour time shall forthwith be disafforsted; and a similar course shall be followed with regard to riverbanks thathavebeenplaced"indefense"byusinour time. All evil customs connected with forests and warrens, foresters and warreners, sheriffs and their officers, river banks and their wardens, shall immediately by inquired into ineachcounty by twelves worn knights of the same county chosen by the honest men of the same county, and shall, within forty days of the said inquest, beutterly abolished, so as never to be restored, provided always that we previously have intimation thereof, or our justiciar, if we should not be in England.

We will immediately restore all hostages and charters delivered to us by Englishmen, assureties of the peace of faithful service. We willentirelyremovefromtheirbailiwicks, the relations of Gerard of at hee (so that in future they shall have no bailiwick in England); namely, Engelard of Cigogne, Peter, Guy, and Andrew of Chanceaux, Guy of Cigogne, Geoffrey of Martigny with his brothers, Philip Mark with his brothers and his nephew Geoffrey, and the whole brood of the same.

As soon as peace is restored, we will banish from the kingdom all foreign born knights, crossbowmen, serjeants, and mercenary soldiers who have come with horses and arms to the kingdom's hurt.

If anyone has been dispossessed or removed by us, without the legal judgment of his peers, from his lands, castles, franchises, or from his right, we will immediately restore the unto him; and if a dispute arise over this, then letitbe decided bythefiveand twentybaronsof whom mention is made below in the clause for securing the peace. Moreover, for all those possessions, from which anyone has, without the lawful judgment of hispeers,beendisseisedor removed, by our father, King Henry,or by our brother, King Richard, and which we retain in our hand(or which as possessed by others,to whom we are bound towarrantthem)weshall have respite until the usual term of crusaders;excepting those things about which a plea has been raised,or an inquest made by our order,before our takingof the cross;but as soon as we return from the expedition,we will immediately grant full justicetherein.

We shall have, more over, the same respite and in the same manner in rendering justice concerning the disafforestation or retention of those forests whichHenryour father and Richard our broter afforested, and concerning the wardship of lands which are of the fief of another (namely, such wardships as we have hitherto had byreason of a fief which anyone held of usby knight's service), and concerning abbeys founded on other fiefs than our own,in which the lord of the fee claims to have right;and when we have returned,or if we desist from our expedition,we will immediately grant full justice to all who complain of such things.

Noone shall be arrested or imprisoned upon the appeal of a woman, for the death of any other than her husband.

All fines made with us unjustly and against the law of the land, and all amercements,imposed unjustly and against the law of the land,shall been tirely remitted, or else it shall be done concerning them according to the decision of the five and twenty barons whom mention is made below in the clause for securing the pease, or according to the judgment of the majority of the same,along with the aforesaid Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury,if he can be present,and such others as he may wish to bring with him for this purpose, and if he cannot be present the business shall nevertheless proceed without him,provided always that if anyone or more of the aforesaid five and twenty barons are in a similar suit,they shall be removed as far as concerns this particular judgment, others being substituted in their places after having been selected by theres of the same five and twenty for this purpose only,and after having been sworn.

If we have disseised or removed Welshmen from lands or liberties, or other things, without the legal judgment of their peers in England or in Wales, they shall be immediately restored to them; and if a dispute arise overthis,then let it be decided in the marches by the judgment of their peers; for the tenements in England according to the law of England, for tenements in Wales according to the law of Wales, and for tenements in the marches according to the law of the marches.Welsh men shall do the same to us and ours.

Further, for all those possessions from which anyWelshman has, without the lawful judgment of his peers, been disseised or removed by King Henryourfather,orKing Richard our brother,and which we retain in our hand(or which are possessed by others,and which we ought to warrant),we will have respite until the usual term of crusaders;excepting those things about which aplea has been raised or an inquest made by our order before we took the cross;but as soon as we return (or if per chance we desist from our expedition),we will immediately grant full justice in accordance with the laws of the Welsh and in relation to the foresaid regions.

We will immediately give up the son of Llywelyn and all the hostages of Wales, and the charters delivered to us as security for the peace.

We will do towards Alexander, kingofScots, concerning the return of his sisters and his hostages, and concerning his franchises, and his right, in the same manner as we shall do towards our where barons of England, unless it ought to be otherwise according to the charterswhich we hold from William his father, formerly king of Scots; and this shall be accordingtothejudgmentofhis peersinourcourt.

Moreover, all these aforesaid customsand liberties, the observances of which we have granted in our kingdom as far as pertains to us towards our men, shall be observed ball of our kingdom, as well clergy as laymen, as far as pertains to them towards their men.

Since, moveover, for God and the amendment of our kingdom and for the better allaying of the quarrel that has arisen between us and our barons, we have granted all the seconcessions, desirous that they should enjoy them incomplete and firm endurance forever,we give and grant to them the underwritten security, namely, that the barons choose five and twenty barons of the kingdom, whomsoever they will,who shall be boundwith all their might,to observe and hold,and cause to be observed,the peace and liberties we have granted and confirmed to them by this our present Charter, so that if we,or our justiciar,or our bailiffs or any one of our officers, shall in anything be at fault towards anyone, or shallhave broken any oneof the Articlesofthis peace or of this security, and the offense be notified to four barons of the foresaid five and twenty, the said four barons shall repairto us (or our justiciar,if we are out of the realm)and, laying the transgression before us, petition to have that ransgression redressed without delay.And if we shallnot have corrected the transgression (or, intheeventofour being out of the realm,if our justiciar shall not have corrected it)within forty days, reckoning from the time it has been intimated to us (or to our justiciar, if we should be out of the realm), the four barons aforesaid shall refer that matter to the rest of the five and twenty barons, and those five and twenty barons shall, together with the community of the whole realm, distrain and distress us in all possible ways, namely, by seizing our castles,lands,possessions, and in any other way they can, until redress has been obtained as they deem fit, savingharmlessourownperson, and the persons of our queen and children; and when redress has been obtained,they shall resume their old relations towards us.And let whoever in the country desires it,swear to obey the orders of the said five and twenty barons for the execution of all the aforesaid matters, and along with them,to molest us to the utmost of his power; and we publicly and freely grant leave to everyone who wishes toswear,and we shall never forbid anyone to swear.All those, move over,in the land whoof themselves and of their own accord are unwilling to swear to the twenty fiveto help the min constraining and molesting us, we shall by our command compel the same to swear to the effect foresaid. And if anyone of the five and twenty barons shall have died or departed from the land, orbe incapacitated in any other manner which would prevent the foresaid provisions being carried out, those of the said twenty-five barons whoare left shall choose another in his place according to their own judgment, and he shall be sworn in the same way as the others. Further, in all matters, the execution of which is entrusted, to these twentyfive barons,if per chance these twenty five are present and disagree about anything, or if some of them,after being summoned, are unwilling or unable to be present,that which the majority of those present or dain or command shall be held as fixed and established,exactly as if the whole twenty fivehad concurred in this; and the said twentyfive shall swear that they will faithfully observe all that is aforesaid, and cause it to be observed with all their might. And we shall procure nothing from anyone, directly or indirectly, whereby any part of these concessions and liberties might be revoked or diminished; and ifanysuch thingshasbeen procured, let it be void and null, and we shall never use it personally or b yanother.

And all the will, hatreds, and bitterness that have arisen betweenus and our men, clergy and lay, from the date of the quarrel, we have completely remitted and pardoned toeveryone. Moreover, all trespasses occasioned by the said quarrel, from Easter in the sixteenth year of our reign till the restoration of peace, we havefully remitted to all, both clergy and laymen, and completely forgiven, as far as pertains to us. And on this head, we have caused to be made for them letters testimonial patent of the lord Stephen, arch bishop of Canterbury, of the lord Henry, archbishop of Dublin, of the bishops aforesaid, and of Master Pandul fastouching this security and the concessions aforesaid.

Wherefore we will and firmly order that the English Church be free, and that the men in our kingdom have and hold all the aforesaid liberties, rights, and concessions, well and peaceably, freely and quietly, fully and wholly, for themselves and their heirs, of us and our heirs, in all respects and in all places forever, as is aforesaid. Anoath, moreover, has been taken, as wellon ourpartas on the art of the barons, that all these conditions aforesaid shall be kept in good faith and without evil intent.

Given under our hand- the above named and many others being witnesses-in the meadow which is called Runnymede, between Windsor and Staines, on the fifteenth day of June, in the seventeenth year of our reign.

PETITION OF RIGHT (1628)

In 1628 the English Parliament sent this statement of civil liberties to King Charles I.

The next recorded milestone in the development of constitutionalism was the Petition of Right, produced in 1628 by the English Parliament and sent to Charles I as a statement of civil liberties.

Refusal by Parliament to finance the king's unpopular foreign policy had caused his government to exact forced loans and to quarter troops in subjects' houses as an economy measure. Arbitrary arrest and imprisonment for opposing these policies had produced in Parliament a violent hostility to Charles and to George Villiers, the Duke of Buckingham. The Petition of Right, initiated by Sir Edward Coke, was based upon earlier statutes and charters and asserted four principles:

1. No taxes may be levied without consent of Parliament,
2. No subject may be imprisoned without cause shown (reaffirmation of the right of habeas corpus),
3. No soldiers may be quartered upon the citizenry, and
4. Martial law may not be used in time of peace.

APPENDIX E

THE UGANDA AGREEMENT OF 1900

(See Native Agreement and Buganda Native Laws, Laws of the Uganda Protectorate, Revised Edition 1935 Vol. VI, pp. 1373-- 1384; Laws of Uganda 1951 Revised Edition, Vol. VI, pp. 12-26)

We, the undersigned, to wit, Sir Henry Hamilton Johnston, K.C.B., Her Majesty's Special Commissioner, Commander-in-Chief and Consul-General for the Uganda Protectorate and the adjoining Territories, on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, on the one part; and the under-mentioned Regents and chiefs of the Kingdom of Uganda on behalf of the Kabaka (King) of Uganda, and the chiefs and people of Uganda, on the other part: do hereby agree to the following Articles relative to the government and administration of the Kingdom of Uganda.

1. The boundaries of the Kingdom of Uganda shall be the following: starting from the left bank of the Victoria Nile at the Ripon Falls, the boundary shall follow the left bank of the Victoria Nile into Lake Kioga, and thence shall be continued along the centre of Lake Kioga, and again along the Victoria Nile as far as the confluence of the River Kafu, opposite the town of Mruli. From this point the boundary shall be carried along the right or eastern bank of the River Kafu, up stream, as far as the junction of the Kafu and Embaia. From this point the boundary shall be carried in a straight line to the River Nkusi, and shall follow the left bank of the River Nkusi down stream to its entrance into the Albert Nyanza. The boundary shall then be carried along the coast of the Albert Nyanza in a south-westerly direction as far as the mouth of the River Kuzizi, and thence shall be carried up stream along the right bank of the river Kuzizi to near its source. From a point near the source of the Kuzizi and near the village of Kirola (such point to be finally determined by Her Majesty's Commissioner at the time of the definite Survey of Uganda) the boundary shall be carried in a south-westerly direction until it reaches the River Nabutari, the left bank of which it will follow down stream to its confluence with the River Katonga. The boundary shall then be carried up stream along the left bank of the River Katonga, as far as the point opposite the confluence of the Chungaga, after which, crossing the Katonga, the boundary shall be carried along the right bank of the said Chungaga River up stream to its source; and from its source the boundary shall be drawn in a south-easterly direction to the point where the Byoloba River enters Lake Kachira; and shall then be continued along the centre of Lake Kachira to its south-eastern extremity, where the River Bukova leaves the lake, from which point the boundary shall be carried in a south-easterly direction to the Anglo-German frontier. The boundary shall then follow the Anglo-German frontier to the coast of the Victoria Nyanza and thence shall be drawn across the waters of the Victoria Nyanza in such a manner as to include within the limits of the Kingdom of Uganda the Sese Archipelago (including Kosi and Mazinga), Ugaya, Lufu, Igwe, Buvuma, and Lingira Islands. The boundary, after including Lingira Islands, shall be carried through Napoleon Gulf until it reaches the starting point of its definition at Bugungu at the Ripon Falls on the Victoria Nile. To avoid any misconception it is intended by this definition to include within the boundaries of Uganda all the islands lying off the north-west coast of the Victoria Nyanza in addition to those specially mentioned.

2 The Kabaka and chiefs of Uganda hereby agree henceforth to renounce in favour of Her Majesty the Queen any claims to tribute they may have had on the adjoining provinces of the Uganda Protectorate.

3 The Kingdom of Uganda in the administration of Uganda Protectorate shall rank as a province of equal rank with any other provinces into which the Protectorate may be divided.

4 The revenue of the Kingdom of Uganda, collected by the Uganda Administration, will be merged in the general revenue of the Uganda Protectorate, as will that of the other provinces of this Protectorate.

5 The laws made for the general governance of the Uganda Protectorate by Her Majesty's Government will be equally applicable to the Kingdom of Uganda, except in so far as they may in any particular conflict with the terms of this Agreement, in which case the terms of this Agreement will constitute a special exception in regard to the Kingdom of Uganda.

6 So long as the Kabaka, Chiefs, and people of Uganda shall conform to the laws and regulations instituted for their governance by Her Majesty's Government and shall co-operate loyally with Her Majesty's Government in the organization and administration of the said Kingdom of Uganda, Her Majesty's Government agrees to recognize the Kabaka of Uganda as the native ruler of the province of Uganda under Her Majesty's protection and over-rule. The King of Uganda shall henceforth be styled His Highness the Kabaka of Uganda. On the death of a Kabaka, his successor shall be elected by a majority of votes in the Lukiko, or native council. The range of selection, however, must be limited to the Royal Family of Uganda, that is to say, to the descendants of King Mutesa. The name of the person chosen by the native council must be submitted to Her Majesty's Government for approval, and no person shall be recognized as Kabaka of Uganda whose election has not received the approval of Her Majesty's Government. The jurisdiction of the native Court of the Kabaka of Uganda, however, shall not extend to any person not a native of the Uganda province. The Kabaka's courts shall be entitled to try natives for capital crimes, but no death sentence may be carried out by the Kabaka, or his Courts, without the sanction of Her Majesty's representative in Uganda. Moreover, there will be a right of appeal from the native Courts to the principle Court of Justice established by Her Majesty in the Kingdom of Uganda as regards all sentences which inflict a term of more than five years' imprisonment or a fine of over £100. In the case of any other sentences imposed by the Kabaka's Courts, which may seem to Her Majesty's Government disproportioned or inconsistent with humane principles, Her Majesty's representatives in Uganda shall have the right of remonstrance with the Kabaka, who shall, at the request of the said representative, subject such sentence to reconsideration.

The Kabaka of Uganda shall be guaranteed by Her Majesty's Government from out of the local revenue of the Uganda Protectorate a minimum yearly allowance of £500 a year.

During the present Kabaka's minority, however, in lieu of the above-mentioned subvention, there will be paid to the master of his household, to meet his household expenditure, WO a year, and during his minority the three persons appointed to act as Regents will receive an annual salary of £400 a year. Kabaka's of Uganda will be understood to have attained their majority when they have reached the age of 18 years. The Kabaka of Uganda shall be entitled to a salute of nine guns on ceremonial occasions when such salutes are customary.

7 The Namasole, or mother of the present Kabaka. (Chua), shall be paid during her lifetime an allowance at the rate of £50 a year. This allowance shall not necessarily be continued to the mothers of other Kabaka's.

8 All cases, civil or criminal, of a mixed nature, where natives of the Uganda province and non-natives of that province are concerned, shall be subject to British Courts of Justice only.

9 For purposes of native administration the Kingdom of Uganda shall be divided into the following districts or administrative counties:

(1) Kiagwe	(6) Buyaga	(11) Butambala (Bweya)	(16) Sese
(2) Bugerere	(7) Bwekula	(12) Kiadondo	(17) Buddu
(3) Bulemezi	(8) Singo	(13) Busiro	(18) Koki
(4) Buruli	(9) Busuju	(14) Mawokoto	(19) Mawogola
(5) Bugangadzi	(10) Gomba (Butunzi)	(15) Buvuma	(20) Kabula

At the head of each county shall be placed a chief who shall be selected by the Kabaka's Government, but whose name shall be submitted for approval to Her Majesty's representative. This chief, when approved by Her Majesty's representative, shall be guaranteed from out of the revenue of Uganda a salary at the rate of E200 a year. To the chief of a county will be entrusted by Her Majesty's Government, and by the Kabaka, the task of administering justice among the natives dwelling in his county, the assessment and collection of taxes, the upkeep of the main roads, and the general supervision of native affairs. On all questions but the assessment and collection of taxes the chief of the county will report direct to the King's native ministers, from whom he will receive his instructions. When arrangements have been made by Her Majesty's Government for the organization of a police force in the province of Uganda, a certain number of police will be placed at the disposal of each chief of a county to assist him in maintaining order. For the assessment and payment of taxes, the chief of a county shall be immediately responsible to Her Majesty's representative, and should he fail in his duties in this respect, Her Majesty's representative shall have the right to call upon the Kabaka to dismiss him from his duties and appoint another chief in his stead. In each county an estate, not exceeding an area of 8 square miles, shall be attributed to the chieftainship of a county, and its usufruct shall be enjoyed by the person occupying, for the time being, the position of chief of the county.

10 To assist the Kabaka of Uganda in the government of his people he shall be allowed to appoint three native Officers of State, with the sanction and approval of Her Majesty's representative in Uganda (without whose sanction such appointments shall not be valid)-a Prime Minister, otherwise known as Katikiro; a Chief Justice; and a Treasurer or Controller of the Kabaka's revenues. These officials shall be paid at the rate of £300 a year. Their salaries shall be guaranteed them by Her Majesty's Government from out of the funds of the Uganda Protectorate. During the minority of the Kabaka these three officials shall be constituted the Regents, and when acting in that capacity shall receive salary at the rate of £400 a year. Her Majesty's chief representative in Uganda shall at any time have direct access to the Kabaka, and shall have the power of discussing matters affecting Uganda with the Kabaka alone or, during his minority, with the Regents, but ordinarily the three officials above designated will transact most of the Kabaka's business with the Uganda Administration. The Katikiro shall be ex officio the President of the Lukiko, or native council; the Vice-President of the Lukiko shall be the native Minister of Justice for the time being; in the absence of both Prime Minister and Minister of Justice, the Treasurer of the Kabaka's revenues, or third minister, shall preside over the meetings of the Lukiko.

11 The Lukiko, or native council, shall be constituted as follows: 'In addition to the three native ministers who shall be ex officio senior members of the council, each chief of a county (twelve in all) shall be ex officio a member of the Council. Also each chief of a county shall be permitted to appoint a person to act as his lieutenant in this respect to attend the meetings of the council during his absence, and to speak and vote in his name. The chief of a county, however, and his lieutenant may not both appear simultaneously at the council. In addition, the Kabaka shall select from each county three notables, whom he shall appoint during his pleasure, to be members of the Lukiko or native council. The Kabaka may at any time deprive any individual of the right to sit on the native council, but in such a case shall intimate his intention to Her Majesty's representative in Uganda, and receive his assent thereto before dismissing the member. The functions of the council will be to discuss all matters concerning the native administration of Uganda, and to forward to the Kabaka resolutions which may be voted by a majority regarding measures to be adopted by the said administration. The Kabaka shall further consult with Her Majesty's representative in Uganda before giving effect to any such resolutions voted by the native council, and shall, in this matter, explicitly follow the advice of Her Majesty's representative. The Lukiko, or a committee thereof, shall be a Court of Appeal from the decisions of the Courts of the First Instances held by the chiefs of counties. In all cases affecting property exceeding the value of £5, or imprisonment exceeding one week, an appeal for revision may be addressed to the Lukiko. In all cases involving property or claims exceeding £100 in value, or a sentence of imprisonment exceeding five years, or sentences of death, the Lukiko shall refer the matter to the consideration of the Kabaka, whose decision when countersigned by Her Majesty's chief representative in Uganda shall be final. The Lukiko shall not decide any questions affecting the persons or property of Europeans or others who are not natives of Uganda. No person may be elected to the Lukiko who is not a native of the Kingdom of Uganda. No question of religious opinion shall be taken into consideration in regard to the appointment by the Kabaka of members of the council. In this matter he shall use his judgement and abide by the advice of Her Majesty's representative, assuring in this manner a fair proportionate representation of all recognised expressions of religious belief prevailing in Uganda.'

12 In order to contribute to a reasonable extent towards the general cost of the maintenance of the Uganda Protectorate, there shall be established the following taxation for Imperial purposes, that is to say, the proceeds of the collection of these taxes shall be handed over intact to Her Majesty's representative in Uganda as the contribution of the Uganda province towards the general revenue of the Protectorate.

The taxes agreed upon at present shall be the following:

'(a) A hut tax of three rupees, or 4s. per annum, on any house, hut or habitation used as a dwelling-place.

(b) A gun tax of three rupees, or 4s. per annum, to be paid by any person who possesses or uses a gun, rifle or pistol.'

The Kingdom of Uganda shall be subject to the same Customs Regulations, Porter Regulations, and so forth, which may, with the approval of Her Majesty, be instituted for the Uganda Protectorate generally, which may be described in a sense as exterior taxation, but no further interior taxation, other than the hut tax, shall be imposed on the natives of the province of Uganda without the agreement of the Kabaka, who in this matter shall be guided by the majority of votes in his native council. This arrangement, however, will not affect the question of township rates, lighting rates, water rates, market dues, and so forth, which may be treated apart as matters affecting municipalities or townships; nor will it absolve natives from obligations as regards military service, or the up-keep of main roads passing through the landson which they dwell. A hut tax shall be levied on any building which is used as a dwelling-place. A collection of not more than four huts, however, which are in a separate and single enclosure and are inhabited only by a man and his wife, or wives, may be counted as one hut. The following buildings will be exempted from the hut tax: temporary shelters erected in the fields for the purposes of watching plantations; or rest houses erected by the roadside for passing travellers; buildings used solely as tombs, churches, mosques or schools, and not slept in or occupied as a dwelling; the residence of the Kabaka and his household (not to exceed fifty buildings in number); the residence of the Namasole, or Queen Mother (not to exceed twenty in number); the official residences of the three native ministers, and of all the chiefs of counties (not to exceed ten buildings in number); but in the case of dispute as to the liability of a building to pay hut tax, the matter must be referred to the collector for the province of Uganda, whose decision must be final. The collector of a province may also authorize the chief of a county to exempt from taxation any person whose condition of destitution may, in the opinion of the collector, make payment of such tax an impossibility. By collector is meant the principal British official representing the Uganda Administration in the province of Uganda.

The representative of Her Majesty's Government in the Uganda Protectorate may from time to time direct that in the absence of current coin, a hut or gun tax may be paid in produce or in labour according to a scale which shall be laid down by the said representative. As regards the gun tax, it will be held to apply to any person who possesses or makes use of a gun, rifle, pistol, or any weapon discharging a projectile by the aid of gunpowder, dynamite or compressed air. The possession of any cannon or machine gun is hereby forbidden to any native of Uganda. A native who pays a gun tax may possess or use as many as five guns. For every five or for every additional gun up to five, which he may be allowed to possess or use, he will have to pay another tax. Exemptions from the gun tax will, however, be allowed to the following extent: 'The Kabaka will be credited with fifty gun licences free, by which he may arm as many as fifty of his household. The Queen mother will, in like manner, be granted ten free licences annually, by which she may arm as many as ten persons of her household; each of the three native ministers (Katikiro, Native Chief Justice, and Treasurer of the Kabaka's revenue) shall be granted twenty free gun licences annually, by which they may severally arm twenty persons of their household. Chiefs of counties will be similarly granted ten annual free gun licences; all other members of the Lukiko or native council, not Chiefs of counties, three annual gun licences, and all landed proprietors in the county, with estates exceeding 500 acres in extent, one free annual gun licence.'

13 Nothing in this Agreement shall be held to invalidate the preexisting right of the Kabaka of Uganda to call upon every ablebodied male among his subjects for military service in defence of the country; but the Kabaka henceforth will only exercise this right of conscription, or of levying native troops, under the advice of Her Majesty's principal representative in the Protectorate. In times of peace, the armed forces, organized by the Uganda Administration, will probably be sufficient for all purposes of defence, but if Her Majesty's representative is of opinion that the force of Uganda should be strengthened at any time, he may call upon the Kabaka to exercise in a full or in a modified degree his claim on the Baganda people for military service. In such an event the arming and equipping of such force would be undertaken by the administration of the Uganda Protectorate.

14 All main public roads traversing the Kingdom of Uganda and all roads the making of which shall at any time be decreed by the native council with the assent of Her Majesty's representative, shall be maintained in good repair by the chief of the Saza (or county) through which the road runs. The chief of a county shall have the right to call upon each native town, village, or commune, to furnish labourers in the proportion of one to every three huts or houses, to assist in keeping the established roads in repair, provided that no labourers shall be called upon to work on the roads for more than one month in each year. Europeans and all foreigners whose lands abut on established main roads, will be assessed by the Uganda Administration and required to furnish either labour or to pay a labour rate in money as their contribution towards the maintenance of the highways. When circumstances permit, the Uganda Administration may further make grants from out of its Public Works Department, for the construction of new roads or any special repairs to existing highways, of an unusually expensive character.

15 The land of the Kingdom of Uganda shall be dealt with in the following manner: Assuming the area of the Kingdom of Uganda, as comprised within the limits cited in this agreement, to amount to 19,600 square miles, it shall be divided in the following proportions:

	Square miles
Forests to be brought under control of the Uganda Administration	1,500
Waste and uncultivated land to be vested in Her Majesty's Government, and to be controlled by the Uganda Administration	9,000
Plantations and other private property of His Highness the Kabaka of Uganda	350
Plantations and other private property of the Namasole (Note.-If the present Kabaka died and another Namasole were appointed, the	16 existing one would be permitted to retain as her personal property 6 square miles, passing on 10 square miles as the endowment of every succeeding Namasole.)

Plantations and other private property of the Namasole, Mother of Mwanga	10
To the Princes: Joseph, Augustine, Rarnazan, and Yusufu-Suna, 8 square miles each	32
For the Princesses, sisters, and relations of the Kabaka	90
To the Abamasaza (chiefs of counties), twenty in all 8 square miles each (private property): 160 Official estates attached to the posts of the Abamasaza, 8 square miles each: 160	320
The three Regents will receive private property to the extent of 16 square miles each: 48 And official property attached to their office, 16 square miles each, the said official property to be afterwards attached to the posts of the three native ministers: 48	96
Mbogo (the Muhammedan chief) will receive for himself and his adherents	24
Kamswaga, chief of Koki, will receive	20
One thousand chiefs and private landowners will receive the estates of which they are already in possession, and which are computed at an acreage of 8 square miles per individual, making atotal of	8,000
There will be allotted to the three missionary societies in existence in Uganda as private property, and in trust for the native churches, as much as	92
Land taken up by the Government for Government stations prior to the present settlement (at Kampala, Entebbe, Masaka, etc., etc.)	50
Total	19,600

After a careful survey of the Kingdom of Uganda has been made, if the total area should be found to be less than 19,600, then that portion of the country which is to be vested in Her Majesty's Government shall be reduced in extent by the deficiency found to exist in the estimated area. Should, however, the area of Uganda be established at more than 19,600 square miles, then the surplus shall be dealt with as follows:

'It shall be divided into two parts, one-half shall be added to the amount of land which is vested in Her Majesty's Government, and the other half will be divided proportionately among the properties of the Kabaka, the three Regents or native ministers, and the Abamasaza, or chiefs of counties.

'The aforesaid 9,000 square miles of waste or cultivated, or uncultivated land, or land occupied without prior gift of the Kabaka or chiefs by bakopi or strangers, are hereby vested in Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, and Protectress of Uganda, on the understanding that the revenue derived from such lands shall form part of the general revenue of the Uganda Protectorate.

'The forests, which will be reserved for Government control, will be, as a rule, those forests over which no private claim can be raised justifiably, and will be forests of some continuity, which should be maintained as woodland in the general interests of the country.

'As regards the allotment of the 8,000 square miles among the 1,000 private landowners, this will be a matter to be left to the decision of the Lukiko, with an appeal to the Kabaka. The Lukiko will be empowered to decide as to the validity of claims, the number of claimants and the extent of land granted, premising that the total amount of land thus allotted amongst the chiefs and accorded to native landowners of the country is not to exceed 8,000 square miles.

'Europeans and non-natives, who have acquired estates, and whose claims thereto have been admitted by the Uganda Administration, will receive title-deeds for such estates in such manner and with such limitations, as may be formulated by Her Majesty's representative. The official estates granted to the Regents, native ministers, or chiefs of counties, are to pass with the office, and their use is only to be enjoyed by the holders of the office.

'Her Majesty's Government, however, reserves to itself the right to carry through or construct roads, railways, canals, telegraphs or other useful public works, or to build military forts or works of defence on any property, public or private, with the condition that not more than 10 per centum of the property in question shall be taken up for these purposes without compensation, and that compensation shall be given for the disturbance of growing crops or of buildings.'

16 Until Her Majesty's Government has seen fit to devise and promulgate forestry regulations, it is not possible in this Agreement to define such forests rights as may be given to the natives of Uganda; but it is agreed on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, that in arranging these forestry regulations, the claims of the Baganda. people to obtain timber for building purposes, firewood, and other products of the forests or uncultivated lands, shall be taken into account, and arrangements made by which under due safeguards against abuse these rights may be exercised gratis.

17 As regards mineral rights. The rights to all minerals found on private estates shall be considered to belong only to the owners of these estates, subject to a 10 per centum ad valorem duty, which shall be paid to the Uganda Administration when the minerals are worked. On the land outside private estates, the mineral rights shall belong to the Uganda Administration, which, however, in return for using or disposing of the same must compensate the occupier of the soil for the disturbance of growing crops or buildings, and will be held liable to allot to him from out of the spare lands in the Protectorate an equal area of soil to that from which he has been removed. On these waste and uncultivated lands of the Protectorate, the mineral rights shall be vested in Her Majesty's Government as represented by the Uganda Administration. In like manner the ownership of the forests, which are not included within the limits of private properties, shall be henceforth vested in Her Majesty's Government.

18 In return for the cession to Her Majesty's Government of the right of control over 10,550 square miles of waste, cultivated, uncultivated, or forest lands, there shall be paid by Her Majesty's Government in trust for the Kabaka (upon his attaining his majority) a sum of £500, and to the three Regents collectively, £600, namely, to the Katikiro £300, and the other two Regents £150 each.

19 Her Majesty's Government agrees to pay to the Muhammedan Uganda Chief, Mbogo, a pension for life of £250 a year, on the understanding that all rights which he may claim (except such as are guaranteed in the foregoing clauses) are ceded to Her Majesty's Government.

20 Should the Kingdom of Uganda fail to pay to the Uganda Administration during the first two years after the signing of this Agreement, an amount of native taxation, equal to half that which is due in proportion to the number of inhabitants; or should it at any time fail to pay without just cause or excuse, the aforesaid minimum of taxation due in proportion to the population, or should the Kabaka, Chiefs, or people of Uganda pursue, at any time, a policy which is distinctly disloyal to the British Protectorate; Her Majesty's Government will no longer consider themselves bound by the terms of this Agreement.

On the other hand, should the revenue derived from the hut and gun tax exceed two years running a total value of £45,000 a year, the Kabaka and chiefs of counties shall have the right to appeal to Her Majesty's Government for an increase in the subsidy given to the Kabaka, and the stipends given to the native ministers and chiefs, such increase to be in the same proportional relation as the increase in the revenue derived from the taxation of the natives.

21 Throughout this Agreement the phrase 'Uganda Administration'shall be taken to mean that general government of the Uganda Protectorate, which is instituted and maintained by Her Majesty's Government; 'Her Majesty's representative' shall mean the Commissioner, High Commissioner, Governor, or principal official of any designation who is appointed by Her Majesty's Government to direct the affairs of Uganda.

22 In the interpretation of this Agreement the English text shall be the version which is binding on both parties.

Done in English and Luganda at Mengo, in the Kingdom of Uganda, on the 10th March, 1900.

H. H. JOHNSTON, Her Majesty's Special Commissioner, Commander-in-Chief and Consul-General, on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India.

APOLLO, Katikiro, Regent.

MUGWANYA, Katikiro, Regent.

MBOGO NOHO, his X mark.

ZAKARIA KIZITO, Kangawo, Regent.

SEBAUA, Pokino.

YAKOBO, Kago.

PAULO, Mukwenda.

KAMSWAGA, of Koki, his X mark.

(On behalf of the Kabaka, Chiefs, and people of Uganda.) Witness to the above signatures:

F. J. Jackson, Her Majesty's Vice-Consul.

J. Evatt, Lieutenant-Colonel.

James Francis Cunningham.

Alfred R. Tucker, Bishop of Uganda.

Henry Hanlon, Vicar Apostolic of the Upper Nile.

E. Bresson (for Mgr. Streicher, White Fathers).

R. H. Walker.

Matayo, Mujasi.

Latusa, Sekibobo.

Matayo, Kaima.

Yokana, Kitunzi

Santi Semindi, Kasuju.

Anderea, Kibugwe.

Sereme, Mujasi, his X mark.

Coprien Luwekula.

Nova, Jumba Gabunga.

Ferindi, Kyabalango.

Saulo, Lumana.

Yokano Bunjo, Katikiro of Namasole.

Yosefu, Katambalwa.

Zakayo, Kivate.

Hezikaya, Namutwe.

Ali, Mwenda, his X mark.

Nselwano, Muwemba.

Sernioni Sebuta, Mutengesa.

Njovu Yusufu, Kitambala, his X mark.

Kata, Nsege.

Note: The term "Uganda" is from the Swahili and means "Land of the Ganda". Originally, (and as used throughout the above agreement) this term applied only to the Buganda kingdom. As British colonial control expanded outwards from this central territory, the term was retained for the whole Protectorate. The central territory was distinguished from the wider colony by using its indiginous name of Buganda.

APPENDIX F

COLONIAL OFFICE REPORTUGANDA PROTECTORATE: BUGANDA PRESENTED BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES TO THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT BY COMMAND OF HER MAJESTY NOVEMBER 1954

1. In recent months two new factors have emerged in Uganda. One is the agreement reached on constitutional matters at the conference between the Governor of Uganda and the Buganda Constitutional Committee appointed by the Lukiko and presided over by Sir Keith Hancock. The other is the judgment in the case brought in the Uganda High Court to test the validity of the action taken last year by Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Kabaka Mutesa II (Cmd. 9028).

2. It was announced on the 1st March that Sir Keith Hancock, Director of the Institute of Commonwealth Studies at London University, had agreed, at the invitation of the Rt. Hon. Oliver Lyttelton, now Lord Chandos, and of the Governor of Uganda, to visit the Protectorate to consult with representatives of the Baganda and with the Protectorate Government on various constitutional questions relating to Buganda. For three months, from the 24th June to the 17th September, Sir Keith Hancock presided over discussions first alone with the Constitutional Committee appointed by the Buganda Lukiko, and later with the Committee and the Governor together. This Conference took place at Namirembe, near Kampala, and resulted in complete agreement. The Conference recommended, among other things, that the Kingdom of Buganda, under the Kabaka's government, should continue to be an integral part of the Protectorate; that the conduct of public affairs in Buganda should be in the hands of Ministers; and that, while all the traditional dignities of the Kabaka should be fully safeguarded, Kabaka’s in future should be constitutional rulers bound by a Solemn Engagement to observe the conditions of the Agreements regarding the Constitution and not to prejudice the security and welfare of the Buganda people and the Protectorate. These Agreed Recommendations are attached at Appendix A.

3. The Governor, in a Statement attached at Appendix B, has made a number of separate recommendations regarding the Executive and Legislative Councils of the central Protectorate Government, as an immediate step forward to implement Her Majesty's Government's policy of constitutional development for Uganda as a whole. The Governor has recommended the introduction of a Ministerial system. The Executive Council would consist of 14 members (including the Governor) : nine of these would be Officials, six or seven of them with Ministerial status, and there would be five Ministers, of whom three would be Africans, drawn from the public. There would also be two African Parliamentary Under-Secretaries. At the same time the Legislative Council would be slightly enlarged, to permit of increased African representation for Buganda, Busoga and one other district, and the proportion of African members would be increased to half the total. African members would sit on both sides of the House and the present balance, which gives the Government side the majority through the Governor's vote, would be preserved.

4. In the light of the Governor's recommendations the Buganda Constitutional Committee have agreed to recommend to the Lukiko that Baganda members should be elected to the Protectorate Legislative Council by the Lukiko.

5. The effect of the constitutional proposals made in the Governor's Statement and the Agreed Recommendations taken together is explained in a memorandum issued by the Namirembe Conference and attached at Appendix C.

6. The Governor's recommendations for the Legislative and Executive Councils are accepted by Her Majesty's Government who propose that they should be put into effect as early as possible. The Agreed Recommendations dealing with Buganda are also acceptable to Her Majesty's Government and are now being placed before the Great Lukiko. The implementation of these two sets of recommendations should settle satisfactorily the points of difference which have arisen from time to time between the Buganda and the Central Protectorate Governments; in particular the willing acceptance of the continued integration of Buganda with the Protectorate as a whole, which should be ensured under these proposals, together with the transfer of executive power and responsibility from the person of the Kabaka to his Ministers will, it is hoped, create a new and healthier political situation.

7. Her Majesty's Government are greatly indebted to Sir Keith Hancock, whose wise and patient guidance contributed much to the success of the Namirembe Conference.

8. The second new factor is the recent judgement of the Uganda High Court. The plaintiffs sought five declarations. Those directly relating to the withdrawal of recognition from the Kabaka were the first and fifth: -

"1. A declaration-

(a) That H.H. Mutesa II is, and has at all material times since 30th November 1953, been native ruler of the Province of Buganda....;

or alternatively

(b) That H.H. Mutesa II is, and has at all material times since 17th December, 1953, been, native ruler of the Province of Buganda.....

5. A declaration (a) that the purported withdrawal by H.E. the Governor of Uganda of recognition of H.H. Mutesa II as native ruler of the Province of Buganda was unlawful, ultra vires and void or alternatively (b) that such withdrawal was of no effect as from the 17th December 1953."

9. The Chief justice refused all the declarations asked for by the Plaintiffs. He held that the 1900

Agreement did not give the Kabaka a legal right to recognition enforceable by the Court. In case he was held wrong as to this on appeal, he said it, was convenient that he should deal with the question whether or not any right on the part of Her Majesty's Government to withdraw recognition under Article 6 of the Agreement had arisen on the 30th November, 1953. He expressed the view that a right under that Article to withdraw recognition had not arisen on the 30th November.

10. He said: - "At that stage" (i.e. November) "a position had been reached wherein the Secretary of State had made known his decisions on policy, and the Kabaka was called upon to refrain from opposition to the decisions on policy, notably on the question of time-table for independence, whether that opposition be expressed by public pronouncement to the Lukiko or by consultation with the Lukiko, before signing the undertakings which the Kabaka had been called upon to give. The Kabaka's refusal to abide by the decisions on policy as communicated to him, clearly, at that stage, constituted disregard on his part of his duty under the terms of the Agreement to acknowledge and abide by the over-rule of the Crown through the Protectorate Government, which by the Agreement had been acknowledged. It is manifest that the Kabaka having evinced intention to pursue a disloyal policy it was clearly within the right of Her Majesty's Government to exercise the rights reserved by Article 20 of the Agreement and declare the Agreement to be at an end. Again there could have been a withdrawal of recognition as an Act of State. In fact withdrawal of recognition was declared, and declared to be made, under Article 6 of the Agreement."

11. As the Chief Justice indicated, Her Majesty's Government did not terminate the Agreement under Article 20: nor did they claim to withdraw recognition as an Act of State independent of the terms of the Agreement. They regarded themselves as bound by the terms of that Agreement and as entitled by reason of the Kabaka's conduct to withdraw recognition under Article 6.

12. The termination of the Agreement under Article 20 would have meant that neither the Crown nor the Kabaka, Chiefs and People of Buganda would any longer have been bound by any of the provisions of the Agreement or entitled to rely on their rights under that Agreement. This extreme step Her Majesty's Government were not disposed to take and did not take.

13. By Article 6 of the Agreement Her Majesty's Government agreed to recognise the Kabaka, of Buganda as the native ruler of the province of Buganda under Her Majesty's protection and over-rule "so long as the Kabaka, Chiefs and People of Buganda shall conform to the laws and regulations instituted for their governance by Her Majesty's Government, and shall cooperate loyally with Her Majesty's Government in the organisation and administration of the said Kingdom of Buganda." Action by Her Majesty's Government under this Article did not consequently involve any question of the termination of the whole Agreement.

14. The Chief Justice held that reliance upon Article 6 was mistaken and that a right to withdraw recognition under that Article had not arisen on the 30th November, 1953 on two grounds; firstly, that to entitle Her Majesty's Government to withdraw recognition under Article 6, there had to be a failure not on the part of the Kabaka alone but on the part of the Kabaka. Chiefs and People to comply with that Article; and secondly, that the Kabaka's conduct did not involve failure to cooperate loyally in relation! to "organisation and administration" of the Kingdom of Buganda.

15. Thus it was the view of the Chief Justice that the conduct of Mutesa II entitled Her Majesty's Government to take action under the Agreement but that on his interpretation Article 6, Her Majesty's Government were mistaken in relying upon that Article.

16. This judgment and the constitutional proposals for Buganda (which if accepted by the Lukiko will settle satisfactorily the points of difference which arose last year) create a new situation in which there is both need and opportunity for a new approach to the question of the Kabaka. Her Majesty's Government, after full consultation with the Governor, have therefore decided that subject to certain conditions and after a suitable interval the Lukiko should be given the opportunity to choose whether a new Kabaka should be elected or whether Kabaka Mutesa II should return as Native Ruler of Buganda. These conditions are as follows:

(1) The Agreed Recommendations of the Namirembe Conference should be accepted as a whole by the Great Lukiko.

(2) Her Majesty's Government and the Lukiko should agree the terms of the Solemn Engagement recommended by the Namirembe Conference to be entered into by the Kabaka. The amendments and additions to the 1900 Agreement to give effect to the Agreed Recommendations should also be agreed by Her Majesty's Government and the Great Lukiko and the amending Agreement should be formally executed by the Governor on behalf of Her Majesty's Government and by the Regents and representatives of the Lukiko on behalf of Buganda and be brought into effect.

(3) In order that the new arrangements may be well established before it is called on to make the decision, the choice of the Great Lukiko whether Kabaka Mutesa II should return as Native Ruler or whether a new Kabaka should be elected should be made nine months after the new arrangements have been brought into effect. Her Majesty's Government will however be glad to shorten the period if they are convinced before the end of it that the constitutional arrangements have become well established and are working satisfactorily. Her Majesty's Government will make every effort to ensure that they are brought into effect by the 31st March next year.

17. When the choice of the Lukiko has been made, the Kabaka will be required to enter into the Solemn Engagement and to sign and thereby confirm the amending Agreement before he is recognised by Her Majesty's Government.

STATEMENT BY THE GOVERNOR

This is the statement referred to in Article 43 of the Agreed Recommendations of the Namirembe Conference

The Secretary of State for the Colonies on behalf of H.M. Government stated in the House of Commons on the 23rd February, 1954, that "the long-term aim of H.M. Government is to build the Protectorate into a self-governing state" and that "when self-government is achieved the government of the country will be mainly in the hands of Africans." He also stated that "when the time for self-government eventually comes H.M. Government will wish to be satisfied that the rights of the minority communities resident in Uganda are properly safeguarded in the constitution, but this will not detract from the primarily African character of the country."

2. In accordance with this statement of policy the ultimate aim of constitutional development in Uganda is a responsible Government answerable to an elected Legislature of the whole Protectorate, with proper safeguards in the constitution for the rights of the minority communities resident in Uganda. As an immediate stop towards this eventual aim I propose to make certain recommendations to the Secretary of State.

3. I am anxious that members of the public should be more closely associated than they are at present in the formation and execution of policy. Not only is this desired by many members of the public; I am convinced that by bringing the Government closer to the people such a step would promote the orderly and smooth progress of the country.

4. I accordingly propose to make the following recommendations to the Secretary of State:

(1) A Ministerial system should be introduced.

(2) Seven members of the public, of whom five would be Africans, should be invited to join the Government and to sit on the Government side of the Legislative Council.

(3) Of these seven persons joining the Government, five, of whom three would be Africans, would be members of the Executive Council with the status of Ministers. Of these five Ministers, two -one African and one other- would have full executive responsibility under the Governor for groups of departments; one, an African, while he would be a full member of the Executive Council, would be an Assistant Minister dealing under the Minister concerned with the large portfolio of Social Services covering Education, Health, African Housing and Labour; while the other two would not have executive responsibility, but would, I should hope, concern themselves with particular spheres of Government activity. In addition there would be two African Parliamentary Under-Secretaries.

(4) The selection of these Ministers and Parliamentary Under-Secretaries and the allocation of responsibilities to them would be in the Governor's discretion. He would choose them, on grounds of merit, either from the representative side of the Legislative Council, at which he should, I suggest, look particularly, or from the cross-bench or from outside the Council.

(5) There would be nine official members of the Executive Council, as against ten at present, of whom six or seven would have Ministerial status. All these six or seven other than the Attorney General, who is the Government's principal Legal Adviser, would have executive responsibility for departments.

(6) The membership of the Council, including the Governor, would thus be fifteen, with nine official members other than the Governor and three Africans and two others drawn from the general public as against one African and four others at present.

(7) The Executive Council would be the principal instrument of policy and the members would be required publicly to support any policy decided upon by it. The Governor would consult the Executive Council on all important matters save in exceptional circumstances and, although he would continue to have the constitutional right to act against the advice of members of Executive Council, he would not, I should assume, do so save in exceptional circumstances.

(8) Ministers with executive responsibility, whether officials or members of the general public, would have the function under the Governor of forming and directing policy within their spheres of responsibility. But heads of departments would retain their full present status and responsibility for the administration of their departments.

(9) Parliamentary Under-Secretaries would have the functions of assisting their Ministers in the presentation of Government measures in Legislative Council, in answering questions and in debate; of assisting their Ministers generally in their work, including the formation of policy; and of travelling round the country and keeping in close touch with the public in connection with the work with which they were concerned.

5. The Legislative Council has recently been reorganised and enlarged and now has 56 instead of 32 members in addition to the Governor

APPENDIX G
AGREED RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE NAMIREMBE CONFERENCE

CONSTITUTIONAL ARRANGEMENTS IN BUGANDA

CHAPTER I: CONSTITUTIONAL ARRANGEMENTS IN BUGANDA.

Article 1

The Kingdom of Buganda under the Kabaka's Government shall continue as heretofore to be an integral part of the Protectorate of Uganda.

Article 2

Wheresoever in these Articles the term "Buganda Government" appears, it shall bear the same meaning as "Kabaka's Government".

Article 3

The Kabaka shall succeed as heretofore to the throne of Buganda by descent and election of the Great Lukiko. The name of the person chosen by the Great Lukiko must be submitted to Her Majesty's Government for approval, and no person shall be recognised as Kabaka of Buganda whose election has not received the approval of Her Majesty's Government.

Article 4

The Kabaka shall retain all his traditional titles and dignities and shall continue to be the symbol of unity of the people of Buganda and between their past, present and future; and all rules governing ceremonies and customs appertaining to such dignities of the Kabaka shall be observed.

Article 5

Such constitutional reforms as may be brought into effect shall be consistent with the maintenance of the proper interests and dignity of the Royal House.

Article 6

Permanent provision shall be made whereby the Namasole, the Sabalangira and the Speaker of the Great Lukiko shall be appointed as Regents in the event of the infancy, absence or total incapacity of the Kabaka.

Article 7

Clan and succession cases shall be determined as heretofore, subject to the modifications shown in Appendix A.

Article 8

The conduct of the affairs of the Kabaka's Government shall be the responsibility of Ministers. All public acts done by the Kabaka's Government shall, so far as law and custom so ordain be done in the name of the Kabaka. Formal communications with the Protectorate Government shall be transmitted to and by the Buganda Ministers in accordance with this arrangement.

Article 9

The constitutional powers of the Kabaka shall, as far as is practicable, be exercised by the promulgation of written instruments signed by the Kabaka and counter-signed by a Minister. To signify final enactment, laws passed by the Great Lukiko shall be signed by the Kabaka.

Article 10

A Minister shall be legally and politically responsible for every act commanded or authorised to be done by him or by an instrument to which he has put his signature.

Article 11

Each Minister shall be politically responsible for the conduct of affairs in his own Department and the Ministers shall together be responsible as a Ministry within the functions assigned to the Kabaka's Government.

Article 12

There shall be six Ministers, namely the Katikiro, the Omulamuzi, the Omuwanika, the Minister of Health, the Minister of Education and the Minister of Natural Resources who shall together constitute the Ministry. The designations and departmental responsibilities of the six Ministers may be varied within the sphere of responsibility of the Ministry.

Article 13

The Ministers shall be appointed in the following manner: -

(1) Names of candidates for the office of Katikiro, shall be submitted to the Speaker of the Great Lukiko by a given date. Candidates must be nominated by not less than five members of the Great Lukiko.

(2) The list of candidates will then be presented by the Speaker to the Governor, who will be entitled to remove the name of any candidate whom he deems to be unacceptable.

(3) The list of candidates, excluding any names removed by the Governor, will then be placed before the GreatLukiko. Five week-days after the day upon which the names of candidates are placed before it by the Speaker, the Great Lukiko will proceed to elect by secret ballot from the list placed before it a person (hereinafter called the Katikiro Designate) who will be charged with the duty of forming a Ministry.

(4) Names of candidates for ministerial will then be submitted to the Speaker of the Great Lukiko, each candidate requiring to be nominated by not less than three members of the Great Lukiko. Any member of the Great Lukiko may nominate up to three candidates. The Katikiro Designate will be entitled to add further names to the list.

(5) Three week-days after the day on which names of candidates for ministerial office have been placed before it by the Speaker, the Great Lukiko will elect by secret ballot forty persons.
(6) The Katikiro Designate, after consultation with the Governor and such other persons as he thinks fit, will choose five ministerial colleagues from among the list of persons elected by the Great Lukiko. At least one of the persons chosen by him must be a serving Saza Chief.
(7) After the Governor has signified his approval of the persons thus chosen, the Kabaka will formally appoint the Katikiro Designate as Katikiro by handing him the Ddamula in accordance with custom, and will also formally appoint his five colleagues as Ministers. The Kabaka will then hand to each of the six Ministers the seal of his office.
(8) A Minister need not be a member of the Great Lukiko at the time of his appointment to office; if he is not already a member of the Great Lukiko he will become a member of the Great Lukiko ex official if he is appointed Katikiro, Omulamuzi or Omuwanika, and by nomination by the Kabaka if he is appointed one of the other three Ministers.

Article 14

The duration of a Lukiko, and the term of office of A Ministry appointed at the beginning of the life of a Lukiko, shall be five years. The term of office of a Ministry appointed other than at the beginning of the life of a Lukiko, shallbe such period as remains until the expiry of the life of the Lukiko. The life of the Lukiko that is in existence when these Articles come into effect shall be prolonged from four to five years.

Article 15

A Ministry shall tender its resignation to the Kabaka through the Katikiro if a vote of no confidence in the Ministry on an important matter is proposed by twenty members and is carried in the Great Lukiko with the support of not less than two-thirds of the whole membership of the Great Lukiko. Fourteen days' notice shall be given of any motion of no confidence in the Ministry. It shall lie within the discretion of the Speaker of the Great Lukiko, to determine whether a motion of no confidence raises an issue that is important enough to justify its being debated.

Article 16

A Ministry may be collectively dismissed by the Governor in Council if in the opinion of the Governor in Council the Ministry has failed to accept or to act upon formal advice given to it by the Governor in Council thereby prejudicing peace, order or good government. Upon the dismissal of a Ministry by the Governor in Council the offices of the Ministers will become vacant.. The Governor shall notify the Kabaka accordingly, whereupon the Katikiro shall return the Ddamula and the Ministers shall return their seals of office to the Kabaka.

Article 17

(1) A Minister shall be dismissed by the Kabaka, upon conviction of a criminal offence for which the punishment is imprisonment without the option of a fine or which involves moral turpitude; or upon the production of a medical certificate that the Minister is incapacitated by reason of physical or mental infirmity from discharging the duties of his office.

(2) If in the opinion of the Katikiro a Minister has failed to carry out the policy or decisions of the Ministry either persistently or in an important matter he may propose to the Ministry that the said Minister be dismissed. If a majority of votes is cast in favour of the proposal (the Katikiro having an original and a casting vote), the Katikiro may dismiss the said Minister.

Article 18

The Katikiro shall give the Kabaka all necessary information on matters of public importance.

Article 19

Ministers shall be assisted by Permanent Secretaries who, in the case of the Departments administering services to be transferred to the Buganda Government, may be officers seconded by the Protectorate Government.

Article 20

The Permanent Secretary to the Katikiro, who will be who will be selected either from among Saza Chiefs or from among other senior officers of the Kabaka's Government shall be the Head of the Buganda Civil Service.

Article 21

There shall be established a Buganda Appointments Board, consisting of the Permanent Secretary to the Katikiro as chairman and four other members who will be persons experienced in public affairs but not at the time of their appointment actively engaged in politics. When the Board is constituted for the first time, the appointment of all of the members shall be made by the Kabaka on the advice of the Katikiro, subject to the approval of the Governor. Subsequent appointments of its members other than the chairman shall be made in the manner aforesaid; but the chairman, who will hold his office by virtue of his appointment as Permanent Secretary to the Katikiro, shall be appointed to his departmental post in the same manner as other Permanent Secretaries. Members other than the chairman shall hold office for five years and may be re-appointed; but arrangements for the rotation of membership shall be made. Members shall be dismissible by the Kabaka on the grounds specified in Article 17 (1) above.

Article 22

In order that officers of the Kabaka's Government shall stand outside the sphere of politics and shall have proper security of tenure, the Appointments Board and not the.Ministers shall be the authority that will make decisions regarding the appointment, promotion, transfer, dismissal and disciplinary control of all public officers serving under the Kabaka's Government, including Saza Chiefs but not including officers seconded by the Protectorate Government. Appointments of Chiefs and Permanent Secretaries shall be made by the Kabaka in conformity with the decisions of the Appointments Board. The approval of the Governor shall be required for the appointment and dismissal of Permanent Secretaries; but his approval of the decisions of the Appointments Board shall not be withheld save in exceptional circumstances. The Permanent Secretary to the Katikiro shall be dismissible by the Kabaka upon the recommendation of the Katikiro, subject to the approval of the Governor, should he fail to carry out the policy of the Kabaka's Government in matters other than those falling wholly within the purview of the Appointments Board.

Article 23

The regulations to be followed by the Appointments Board in the matters falling within it's jurisdiction shall be agreed between the two Governments. If either Government considers that the regulations have been infringed in any way, the two Governments shall consult together. If the matter cannot be settled by such consultation, a committee to examine the matter shall be set up in consultation between the two Governments, should either Government so desire.

Article 24

The Saza, Gombolola and Miruka Chiefs shall remain the backbone of public administration in Buganda and shall be responsible to the Katikiro, subject to the Governor's ultimate authority, for the maintenance of law and order. As soon as is practicable, the Protectorate Government shall put at the disposal of each Saza Chief, either in or in proximity to his saza, a unit of the Protectorate Police to assist in the maintenance of law and order. The Protectorate Government shall arrange training courses for the Buganda Government Police with a view to raising standards of efficiency.

Article 25

The composition and method of election of the Great Lukiko shall for the present time remain unaltered. Before the next general election of the Great Lukiko, however, consideration shall be given to the questions whether the present system whereby three representatives are elected from each saza should be varied in cases where there are large differences in population between sazas; and whether the requirement that representatives of a saza must be resident in the saza should be abolished.

ArticIe 26

There shall be a Speaker of the Great Lukiko, who shall receive a salary to be determined by law. The first business of the Great Lukiko after a general election shall be the election of a Speaker. The Speaker shall be chosen from among former Buganda Ministers, former Saza Chiefs or other persons who have had long experience of membership of the Great Lukiko. The Great Lukiko shall elect a Deputy Speaker with similar qualifications from among its own members. Either the Speaker or the Deputy Speaker shall preside at every meeting of the Great Lukiko. If the Speaker is acting as a Regent the Deputy Speaker shall preside.

Article 27

There shall be the following Committees of the Great Lukiko: Finance Committee, Public Works Committee, Education Committee, Health Committee, Natural Resources Committee, Community Development and Local Government Committee and such other committees, permanent or, for a particular purpose, as the Great Lukiko deems expedient. Each permanent Committee shall be under the chairmanship of the appropriate Minister and shall have attached to it the Permanent Secretary or Secretaries of the Department or Departments concerned and such other administrative and technical officers and other persons as it requires for its efficient working. Officers or other persons attached to a Committee shall have the right to speak but not to vote. It shall be the function of each Committee to study policy in the field of government with which it is concerned, and to give advice to the Minister responsible. The existence of these committees shall in no wise detract from the individual responsibility of Ministers for the conduct of their Departments or from the responsibility of the Ministry as a whole for the general course of policy in matters committed to it. The recommendations in this Article do not affect the position of the Standing Committee.

Article 28

Every Kabaka shall henceforward on becoming Kabaka enter a Solemn Engagement with the Great Lukiko and people of Buganda and, with Her Majesty's Government, formally accepting and agreeing to be bound by these Articles and by the Uganda Agreement, 1900, and any amendments thereto, and undertaking not to prejudice the security and welfare of his people and the Protectorate.

Article 29

So long as the Kabaka shall observe his Solemn Engagement, Her Majesty's Government agrees to recognise the Kabaka as the ruler of the Kingdom of Buganda.

CHAPTER II: RELATIONSHIP OF BUGANDA WITH THE PROTECTORATE

Article 30

The functions entrusted to the Kabaka's Government shall be formally defined in a document that shall be brought into operation simultaneously with the Agreement, amending or supplementing' the Uganda Agreement, 1900, which will be negotiated after the recommendations of this Conference have been accepted by Her Majesty's Government and the Great Lukiko. At the outset these functions shall be those at present carried on by the Kabaka's Government, together with those listed in paragraph 2 of the Memorandum on Constitutional Development and Reform in Buganda, issued in March, 1953. Local government in the sazas shall be the responsibility of the Buganda Government, with the advice and assistance of the Protectorate Government; the position in townships and trading centres will be examined in accordance with Article 47. In community development the Buganda Government and its officers shall work in co-operation with the Protectorate Community Development Department. The list of functions may subsequently be varied by agreement between the Protectorate and Buganda Governments.

Article 31

The Buganda Government shall administer the services for which it is responsible in accordance with the general policy of the Protectorate Government and (subject to Article 5 of the Uganda Agreement, 1900) in conformity with the lawsgoverning those services. It shall initiate policy in the spheres of responsibility thus committed to it, provided that its policies shall not be opposed to the general policies of the Protectorate Government. In the formulation of Protectorate policies in relation to those services from time to time, expression will be given to the views of the people of Buganda by the representatives of Buganda on the Legislative and Executive Councils and by the representatives of the Buganda Government on the Consultative Committees referred to in Article 32 below.

Article 32

There shall be established Consultative Committees on education, medical and health questions, natural resources, local government and community development. Buganda shall be represented by the Minister and Permanent Secretary concerned and by two or three unofficial members of the Great Lukiko Committee dealing with the subject. The Protectorate shall be represented by the Member of Executive Council, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary (if any) and the head or heads of the Departments concerned, and the Resident, Buganda.

Article 33

The functions of Consultative Committees shall be:

(a) to enable the Buganda Government to express its views on Protectorate policy;

(b) to secure that Protectorate and Buganda policy are not in conflict;

(c) to discuss all matters of common interest.

The Committees shall meet at regular intervals.

Article 34

The Protectorate Government, through the Departments concerned, shall be entitled to inspect the administration of the services to be transferred.

Article 35

Officers of the Protectorate Government shall be seconded to the Buganda Government for the purpose of giving assistance in the administration of the services to be transferred, under the conditions envisaged by paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Memorandum on Constitutional Development and Reform in Buganda, issued in March, 1953.

Article 36

The functions of officers of the Protectorate Government (other than seconded officers) in their relations with the Buganda Government and its officers shall be those of advice and assistance.

Article 37

If, upon any disagreement arising between the two Governments, differences cannot be resolved by use of the machinery of a Consultative Committee, the matter shall be referred to a joint meeting, under the chairmanship of the Governor, of Members of the Executive Council and the Buganda Ministers. Such a meeting shall not only have regard to the general interests ofthe Protectorate but shall also take fully into account and give due weight to the views of Buganda. Such a meeting may also, if necessary, be convened in order to resolve any disagreement arising out of a reply by the Governor to a resolution of the Great Lukiko, if the matter cannot be settled by the ordinary process of consultation between the Buganda Minister concerned and the Resident.

Article 38

If, after the exhaustion of the above consultative processes, an issue remains unresolved which, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, affects peace, order or good government, it shall be open to the Governor in Council to give formal advice to the Buganda Ministry. If the Ministry then refuses or fails to act in accordance with such advice, it shall be open to the Governor in Council to dismiss the Ministry, as was explained in Article 16. The Governor shall be entitled to act in his discretion in agreeing to laws passed by the Great Lukiko, although upon any question arising out of any such law which he considers to be a question of principle he will consult with his Executive Council.

Article 39

The Resident shall be the Governor's representative in dealing with the Kabaka's Government. His functions shall be to advise and assist the Kabaka's Government, to keep it informed of Protectorate Government policy in so far as this is not covered by the Consultative Committees, and to ensure that the Protectorate Government is kept fully aware of its views and of important developments in Buganda. He shall be assisted by a Deputy Resident.

Article 40

A programme for the development of local government bodies responsible to the Buganda Government in the sazas, in accordance with paragraph 14 of the Memorandum on Constitutional Development and Reform in Buganda issued in March, 1953, shall be drawn up by the Katikiro and Resident in consultation and considered by the Consultative Committee on Local Government referred to in Article 32. After this programme has been approved by the Buganda and Protectorate Governments and the necessary legislation passed by the Great Lukiko, the Katikiro and Resident shall consult regularly together to ensure that the development of local Government bodies in Buganda proceeds according to the approved programme. The Senior Assistant Residents and Assistant Residents shall advise and assist the Chiefs, and through them the Councils, in the development of local government bodies in accordance with the approved programme, as part of their general function of advising the Chiefs in the different areas of Buganda (East and West Mengo, Masaka and Mubende).

It shall be the aim of policy that, when the system of local government has been firmly established in Buganda, with the devolution by the Buganda Government to the local government bodies in Buganda of appropriate financial and administrative responsibility, the function of guiding and inspecting these local government bodies shall be assumed by the Buganda Government, with whatever secondment of Protectorate officers may at that time be necessary for the purpose. A review of progress in local government in Buganda to determine whether the Buganda Government should then assume this responsibility shall form part of the review, to be undertaken in six years' time, referred to in Article 48. Meanwhile, steps shall be taken as soon as is practicable, in consultation with the Buganda Government, to appoint suitably qualified, Baganda as Assistant Residents so that these officers may be among those seconded or transferred to the Buganda Government when this responsibility is assumed by the Buganda Government.

Article 41

The supervisory powers of the Protectorate Government over expenditure by the Buganda Government shall be limited to approval of the annual estimates and of schedules of supplementary provision submitted quarterly, to audit of accounts and to questions affecting financial grants and loans made by the Protectorate Government to the Buganda Government.

Article 42

The financial needs of Buganda shall be reviewed from time to time by the Protectorate and Buganda Governments so that as far as practicable the grants made to Buganda by the Protectorate Government may be on a firm basis for a period of not less than three years. In accordance with paragraph 6 of the Memorandum on Constitutional Development and Reform in Buganda, issued in March, 1953, the Protectorate Government will ensure that the Buganda Government is placed in no worse position financially than at present by accepting the transfers of services which is to take place in accordance with that Memorandum. The Protectorate Government recognises the need for adequate remuneration of Buganda Government servants in order that officers of the right calibre may be attracted.

In view of the decision already taken by the Great Lukiko to impose graduated taxation in Buganda, the Protectorate Government, apart from the other measures referred to in paragraph 6 of the Memorandum of March, 1953 and apart from such grants as may be agreed upon between the two Governments in respect of the transfer of services, will recommend that the rate of poll tax payable to it in Buganda shall be reduced from Shs. 11/25 (i.e., Shs. 15/- less the 25 per cent rebate) to Shs. 6/- per annum (on the understanding that this reduction will be absorbed in the graduated tax payable to the Buganda Government). The protectorate Government will also recommend that payments shall be made to the Buganda Government in respect of Crown Land revenue and mining rents and royalties on Crown Land on the same basis as such payments are already made to the District Councils in the rest of the Protectorate. The Protectorate Government will examine the position with regard to Crown Land in Buganda with a view to determining whether the status of any part of that Crown Land can be modified.

Article 43

The Buganda Constitutional Committee recommends in the light of His Excellency the Governor's recommendations to Her Majesty's Government which are set out in Appendix B to these Articles, and the pledge on East African Federation there referred to, that the Great Lukiko agree to the representation of Buganda on the Legislative Council of the Protectorate. The Committee recommends that the representatives of Buganda be elected by the Great Lukiko by secret ballot, and that after the election the Great Lukiko shall assign each of the members elected to a particular area.

CHAPTER III: CITIZENSHIP

Article 44

Her Majesty's Government shall be requested to consider the question of creating a citizenship of Uganda, whereby a sense of unity may be fostered.

CHAPTER IV: ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE ANDLOCAL ADMINISTRATION IN BUGANDA

Article 45

The work of separating the Judiciary from the Executive shall be proceeded with immediately.

Article 46

A committee including legal experts shall be appointed to examine means by which the court system in Buganda can be gradually developed into a system of courts of common jurisdiction in which no distinction will be made between persons of different races or between the inhabitants of urban and rural areas. The committee will also examine methods whereby justice may be dispensed as expeditiously as possible and whereby facilities for legal training may be provided for Africans.

Article 47

A committee including local residents and representatives of the Buganda Government shall be set up to consider, as a question of urgency, the establishment of a new local authority, under the Buganda Government, for the administration of the Kibuga. This committee will be instructed to explore means by which such an authority may include representatives of all sections of the community resident in the Kibuga and may have jurisdiction, for local government purposes, over all sections of the community resident in the Kibuga. After it has completed its work on the Kibuga, this committee, with some revision of membership, will be instructed to report on the establishment of local authorities representing all sections of the community in townships and trading centres in Buganda (other than Kampala, Entebbe, Masaka and possibly Mubende) and to advise on the means of bringing them under the Buganda Government.

CHAPTER V: REVIEW

Article48

In order that a period of stability may be secured, no major changes in the constitutional arrangements prescribed in the foregoing. Articles shall be introduced for a period of six years, after which there shall be a review; that is, in 1961, assuming that the arrangements recommended in these Articles are brought into force in 1955.

CHAPTER VI: UGANDA AGREEMENT, 1900

Article 49

The Uganda Agreement, 1900, shall be amended to the extent that such amendment becomes requisite upon the approval of the foregoing Articles by the parties concerned, but shall otherwise continue in its present form.

Each Member of the Namirembe Conference approves these Agreed Recommendations by appending his signature. The Governor agrees to recommend them to Her Majesty's Government. The members of the Buganda Constitutional Committee agree to recommend them to the Great Lukiko.

The Buganda Constitutional Committee:

M. MUGWANYA	Y. KYAZE.
A. K. KIRONDE	THOMAS A. K. MAKUMBI.
E. M. K. MULIRA	E. B. KALIBALA.

J. P. MUSOKE Y. K. LULE.

J. K. MASAGAZI + J. KIWANUKA.

J. G. SENGENDO-ZAKE Mgr. J. KASULE.

A. B. COHEN,

Governor.

W. K. HANCOCK, Chairman.

S. W. KULUBYA.

J. P. BIRCH.

S. A. DE SMITH,

E. Z. KIBUKA,

Secretaries.

15th September, 1954

EXPLANATORY MEMORANDUM ISSUED BY THE NAMIREMBE CONFERENCE

The Agreed Recommendations of the Namirembe Conference are a short document, but they embody three months of intense thought and discussion. The work fell into two stages:

(1) from 24th June to 28th July, during which time the Buganda Constitutional Committee met alone under the chairmanship of Professor Hancock and with Mr. S. A. de Smith. The Buganda Constitutional Committee consisted of:

Mr. M. MupVanya, Omulamuzi.

Bishop J. Kiwanuka.

Mr. A. K. Kironde.

Dr. E. Kalibala.

Mr. E. M. K. Mulira.

Mgr. J. Kasule.

Mr. T. A. K. Makumbi.

Fr. J. K. Masagazi.

Mr. Y. K. Lule.

Mr. J. G. Sengendo-Zake.

Mr. Y. Kyaze.

Mr. J. P. Musoke, Saza Chief, Kyambalango.

Mr. E. Z. Kibuka-Secretary.

The Committee also held meetings at Mengo under the chairmanship of Mr. M. Mugwanya, Omulamuzi.

(2) from 30th July to 17th September, during which time the Committee held discussions with the Governor and two members of his Executive Council, Mr. J. P. Birch, the Resident, and Mr. S. W. Kulubya.

These meetings, which were also under the chairmanship of Professor Hancock, were called the Namirembe Conference. Forty-nine, meetings in all were held under the chairmanship of Professor Hancock.

2. The forty-nine Articles which make up the recommendations are not the report of an aloof expert or body of experts. They are the agreed proposals of men closely concerned with the public life of Buganda and the Protectorate. By signing the Articles the Governor has undertaken to recommend them to Her Majesty's Government and the Buganda Constitutional Committee has undertaken to recommend them to the body from which it derives its authority, namely the Great Lukiko.

3. The Articles are divided into the following chapters: -

Chapter I- Constitutional Arrangements in Buganda.

Chapter II- Relationship of Buganda with the Protectorate.

Chapter III-Citizenship.

Chapter IV- Administration of Justice and Local Administration in Buganda.

Chapter V- Review.

Chapter VI- Uganda Agreement. 1900.

Chapters III, V and VI each consist of one Article only; Chapters I and II contain the greatest number of Articles.

CHAPTER I

4. Article 1 declares that the Kingdom of Buganda under the Kabaka's Government shall continue as heretofore to be an integral part of the Protectorate of Uganda. Article 2 declares that the term "Buganda Government", wherever it is used shall bear the same meaning as "Kabaka's Government". The Articles immediately following emphasise the monarchical constitution of Buganda and the traditional status of the Kabaka.

5. In recent years political development has been going forward in Buganda and the Great Lukiko now has a majority of elected members. The Conference has had to consider how to safeguard the dignity of the Kabaka's office in these circumstances. The Buganda Constitutional Committee decided to recommend that this should be done by placing responsibility for the conduct of public affairs in the hands of the Kabaka's Ministers so that if mistakes are made, the Ministers and not the Kabaka himself will bear the responsibility for them. Articles 8 to 11 lay down the methods and procedures by which this purpose is achieved. Each Minister will be individually responsible for the conduct of policy in his own department and the Ministry will together be responsible for the acts of the Kabaka's Government.

6. The Kabaka will formally appoint the Ministry by handing the Ddamula to the Katikiro, in accordance with custom, and by handing to each Minister the seal of his office. Before formal appointment takes place, however, certain things must be done to ensure that the Ministers will be men who possess the confidence of the country. Article 13 establishes a procedure which may appear at first sight to be rather, complicated but in practice the procedure will prove easy to understand and to work.. The Lukiko elects the Governor approves, the Kabaka appoints the Ministry.

7. The arrangements recommended in Article 13 for the formation of a Ministry suit the conditions of the present time, in which political parties are still unformed or in a very early stage of formation. But the arrangements will also remain workable when political parties have been firmly established. However, if and when that time comes, it will be open to the Protectorate and Buganda Governments to consider together whether a different system should be established of finding a Ministry which possesses the confidence of the Lukiko.

8. Great care has been taken to ensure stability of Government. Under the recommendations, a Ministry, like the Lukiko itself, will be appointed for five years. During this period an individual Minister can be dismissed by the Kabaka or the Katikiro only in exceptional cases. Only in exceptional cases (Articles 15 and 16) can a Ministry be obliged to tender its resignation to the Kabaka or be dismissible by the Governor in Council. The former contingency would arise if the Ministry were defeated on a motion of no confidence in an important matter by a two-thirds majority of the whole Lukiko. The latter contingency would arise if a Ministry failed to accept or to act upon formal advice tendered to it by the Governor in Council, thereby endangering peace, order or good government. The Articles in Chapter II establish a new system of consultation between the Protectorate and Buganda Governments, which will in practice enable them to iron out any difficulties and differences, thus making it unlikely that a situation could arise in which the Governor in Council would have to consider tendering formal advice.

9. The Ministers, in assuming responsibility for the conduct of policy of the Buganda Government, will require the support of a strong civil service; and each of the Ministers will be assisted by a Permanent Secretary (Article 19). Permanent Secretaries and all other civil servants must have both security of tenure and the freedom to carry out their administrative duties without political interference, subject of course to the control of Ministers in matters of policy. It is most important that the appointment, transfer, dismissal and. disciplinary control of civil servants should be free from all danger or suspicion of political pressure or influence. For this reason these matters are put into the hands of an Appointments Board, to be appointed by the Kabaka on the advice of the Katikiro and with the approval of the Governor (Articles 21 to 23). The Appointments Board will act in accordance with Regulations drawn up by agreement between the Protectorate and Buganda Governments and will have the power to make decisions on appointments and the other matters concerned. The appointments Board will be under the chairmanship of the Permanent Secretary to the Katikiro, who will be the Head of the Buganda Civil Service. It will have four other members experienced in public affairs, but not actively engaged in politics. Appointments of Chiefs and Permanent Secretaries to departments will be made by the Kabaka in accordance with the decisions of the Appointments Board, the Governor's approval being required only in the case of Permanent Secretaries, although such approval will not be withheld save in exceptional circumstances.

10. These arrangements for public administration in Buganda will ensure continuity with the past. The Saza, Gombolola and Miruka Chiefs will remain the backbone of public administration and will be given the support of the Protectorate Police which they require for the fulfillment of their responsibilities (Article 24). At the same time the departments of the Kabaka's Government at Mengo (including the three new ones that will be set up in fulfilment of the policy agreed upon in March, 1953) will have the reliable staff which they need for the performance of their responsibilities in the future. In Article 42 in Chapter II the Protectorate Government recognises the need for adequate remuneration of. Buganda Government servants in order that officers of the right calibre may be attracted.

11. The Kabaka's Government needs to be efficient. It needs also to keep in close touch with the Lukiko which has elected it and whose confidence it must strive to retain. Members of the Lukiko themselves have a contribution to make in the formation of policy on such important subjects as finance, education, health, local government, etc. For this reason, Article 27 makes provision for committees of the Lukiko which will meet under the chairmanship of the appropriate Minister and have attached to them the administrative and technical officers who are required for their efficient working. These committees will be advisory. They will in no way detract from the individual responsibility of Ministers for the conduct of policy in their departments or from the general responsibility of the Ministry as a whole. At the same time they will be an effective means both of keeping Ministers in touch with the needs and wishes of the people and of giving elected members of the Lukiko practical knowledge of the business of government.

12. The Buganda Constitutional Committee thought that, while the position of civil servants in the Lukiko would have to be reviewed at the appropriate time, it would be premature at present to make any change in the composition and method of election of the Lukiko. The Conference did however, recommend (Article 25) that certain points (the number of members representing each saza and the question whether persons not resident in a saza might be elected) should be examined before the next general election. The appointment of a Speaker and a Deputy Speaker, to be elected by the Lukiko is recommended in Article 26.

13. No alteration at all is made in the traditional dignities and ceremonies of the Kingdom of Buganda. The effect of the Articles in Chapter I is to reconcile the high status of the Kabaka with the conduct of a Ministry answerable to a mainly elected Lukiko. Article 4 recognises the Kabaka as the symbol of unity of the people of Buganda and of continuity between their past, present and future. The other Articles which have been explained above raise the Kabaka above the turmoil and danger of political conflict. New conditions are established which bring the principles of monarchy and democracy into harmony.

14. It is essential that these conditions shall be clearly understood and accepted by all the parties concerned. To make certain of this, Article 29 provides for a Solemn Engagement which every Kabaka will henceforward enter into with the Great Lukiko and the people of Buganda and with Her Majesty's Government. Article 30 follows in logic and provides that so long as the Kabaka shall observe his Solemn Engagement, Her Majesty's Government agrees to recognise the Kabaka as the ruler of the Kingdom of Buganda.

CHAPTER II: RELATIONSHIP OF BUGANDA WITH THE PROTECTORATE

15. The Agreement of 1900 recognised a sphere of operation belonging to, the Buganda Government; but this sphere was largely determined by customs of the past. Most of the big changes that have taken place since then in education, medical services, commercial organisation and economic development have belonged to the sphere of Protectorate policy. The Buganda Government and the Lukiko have remained in general concerned with the old order of things, while the Protectorate Government and the Legislative Council have been concerned with the new order of things. Yet this new order of things is of immense importance to every Muganda in his day-to-day tasks of earning a living, bringing up his children and equipping them to make the best of their opportunities in a rapidly changing world.

16. The Conference has considered this state of affairs and recognised that there are three needs. In the first place the Buganda Government and the Lukiko must have a substantial place in the new order as well as in the old order. In the second place there must be intimate contact and consultation between the Buganda Government and the Protectorate Government. In the third place the Protectorate Government and the Legislative Council must become increasingly representative of the people of the country both in Buganda and throughout the Protectorate. This last process cannot be completed immediately; time must be left for growth and change. Nevertheless it is possible to do something immediate and practical to carry the process forward and to make people confident that, when it is completed, the process will have the results which they desire.

17. The Articles in Chapter I, which have been described already, are a guarantee that the Kingdom of Buganda, while remaining deeply rooted in its own customs and culture, will be in a position to play an increasing part in the new order of things in the Protectorate. Chapter II describes how it will play that part. Article 30 reaffirms the arrangement made with the Protectorate Government in March, 1953, whereby important new functions will be taken over by the Buganda Government. It also makes provision whereby the division of functions may be varied from time to time by agreement between the two Governments.

18. Article 31 provides that the Buganda Government shall administer the services for which it is responsible in accordance with the general policy of the Protectorate Government; subject to this proviso, it will initiate policy within its sphere of operation. At the same time, it will be given new opportunities for bringing its influence to bear upon the policies of the Protectorate.

19. Articles 32 and 33 establish important new procedures through which this influence will be exercised. From henceforward Ministers and permanent officials of the two Governments will be in close touch with each other through Consultative Committees for education, local government and community development, medical and health questions and natural resources. On the Buganda side the Lukiko itself will have a part to play in this process of consultation because each committee will include two or three elected members of the Lukiko. (the committees will discuss all matters of common interest and will enable the Buganda Government to express its views on Protectorate policy. Normally they will prevent conflicts of policy arising between the two Governments. If nevertheless any serious difference should arise between them beyond the competence of a single Consultative Committee to solve, it will be referred to a joint meeting of the members of the Proteatorate Executive Council and the Buganda Government under the chairmanship of the Governor (Article 37). Only if all these processes of consultation fail to (produce agreement -which appears a very unlikely contingency- will it be open to the Governor in Council to give formal advice to the Buganda Government (Article 38).

20. The Protectorate Government will help the Buganda Government and the people of Buganda in their progress forward, through the advice given by Protectorate officers (Article 36), through the inspection of the services transferred to the Buganda Government (Article 34) and through the secondment of Protectorate officers to the Buganda Government (Article 35). The Resident (Article 39) will continue to be the Governor's representative with the Kabaka's Government. Senior Assistant Residents and Assistant Residents (Article 40) will have a specially important part to play in advising and assisting the Chiefs, and through them the Councils, in the development under the Buganda Government of local government bodies in the sazas, along the lines envisaged by the Memorandum of March, 1953, and in accordance. with a programme to be drawn up by the two Governments in consultation. When these local government bodies have been firmly established and the powers of running local services have been handed to them by the Buganda Government, it is the aim of policy that the function of guiding and inspecting them should be assumed by the Buganda Government itself, with whatever secondment of Protectorate Government officers may at that time be necessary. The progress achieved in local government will be reviewed (as well as all the other subjects dealt with in these Articles) six years from the time when the Articles come into force, to determine whether the Buganda Government should then assume this responsibility. Meanwhile steps will be taken as soon as is practicable to appoint suitably qualified Baganda as Assistant Residents so that these officers may be among those to be seconded or transferred to the Buganda Government when this responsibility is assumed by the Buganda Government.

21. The financial needs of Buganda will be reviewed by the two Governments periodically (Article 42) so that protectorate grants to Buganda may be on a firm basis for periods of at least three years. This Article also proposes that the poll tax payable to the Protectorate Government should be reduced to 6s. per year and that revenue from Crown land and minerals under Crown land should be payable to the Buganda Government on the same basis as in other parts of the Protectorate. The Protectorate Government will re-examine the status of Crown land in Buganda.

22. While these changes are taking place in the structure of the Buganda Government and in its relations with the Protectorate Government, equally important changes will be under way in the Protectorate Government itself and in the Legislative Council. These changes are announced in the statement made by the Governor which is issued as a separate document and also printed with the Agreed Recommendations as Appendix B. This statement deals not simply with Buganda, but with the whole Protectorate.

23. In his Statement the Governor first refers to the declaration by the Secretary of State for the Colonies in the House of Commons on the 23rd February, 1954, that "the long-term aim of H.M. Government is to build the Protectorate into a self-governing state" and that "when self-government is achieved the government of the country will be mainly in the hands of Africans." The Governor then describes the ultimate aim of constitutional development in Uganda as a responsible Government answerable to an elected Legislature of the whole Protectorate, with proper safeguards in the constitution for the rights of the minority communities resident in Uganda.

24. The Governor goes on to describe the recommendations which he proposes to make to the Secretary of State as an immediate step towards this eventual aim. These are designed first to associate representatives of the public more closely with the Executive Government of the country, and secondly to increase the African membership on the Legislative Council.

25. With regard to the Executive the Governor proposes that a Ministerial system should be introduced; and that seven members of the public, of whom five would be Africans, should be invited to join the Government and to sit on the Government side of the Legislative Council; these seven persons would be selected by the Governor. Out of the seven, five, of whom three would be Africans, would become members of the Executive Council with the status of Ministers. Of these five Ministers, two -one African and one other- would have full executive responsibility under the Governor for groups of departments and one, an African, while he would be a full member of Executive Council, would be an Assistant Minister dealing under the Minister concerned with the large portfolio of Social Services covering Education, Health, African Housing and Labour. In addition there would be two African Parliamentary Under-Secretaries. There would be nine official members of the Executive Council as against ten at present of whom six or seven would have Ministerial status. The membership of the Council, including the Governor, would thus be fifteen, with nine official members other than the Governor, and three Africans and two others drawn from the general public, as against one African and four others at present. The Executive Council would be the principal instrument of policy and the members would be required publicly to support any policy decided upon by it.

26. The Legislative Council was enlarged early in 1954 and now has fifty-six instead of thirty-two members in addition to the Governor as President. There are twenty African members on the Council as against eight in the previous Council: The Governor now proposes to increase the membership of the Legislative Council to sixty, of whom half would be Africans.

27. On the representative side of the Council the Governor proposes that instead of fourteen Africans, seven Asians and seven Europeans, there should be eighteen Africans, six Asians and six Europeans. Of the four new African seats two should go to Buganda, provided that the Great Lukiko agrees that Buganda should participate fully in the Legislative Council through elected members. This would increase the number of representative members from Buganda from three to five; in order to make this possible the present European and Asian representative members have stated their willingness each to give up one of their seven seats, the two members concerned transferring to the Government side of the Council on what is at present the cross-bench. One of the other new African seats will go to Busoga, the district with the largest African population outside Buganda; this will be on the assumption that the Busoga District Council will agree to elect members for the Legislative Council. The further new African seat will go to one of the most heavily populated districts outside Buganda.

28. On the Government side of the Council the number of official members would be reduced from seventeen to ten or eleven. The Government side would also include the seven members of the public, five Ministers and two Parliamentary Under-Secretaries, who would join the Government as explained above. In all the Governor proposes that there should be twelve Africans on the Government side of the Council. With the introduction of a substantial element drawn from the general public on to what has hitherto been the official part of the Council the Governor sees no reason for the retention of the cross-bench in its present form and proposes that it should be converted into a Government back-bench, the members still being free as at present to speak and vote as they like except on a motion of confidence.

29. On East African federation the Governor quotes the solemn assurance given by H.M. Government in November, 1953, the last sentence of which reads as follows:

"But Her Majesty's Government can and does say that, unless there is a substantial change in public opinion in the Protectorate, including that of the Baganda, the inclusion of the Protectorate in an East African federation will remain outside the realm of practical politics even in the more distant future."

The Governor proposes to recommend to the Secretary of' State that it should be laid down now that, should the occasion ever arise in the future to ascertain public opinion in terms of this pledge, the Protectorate Government would at that time consult fully with the Buganda Government and the other Authorities throughout the country as to the best method of ascertaining public opinion.

30. The Buganda Constitutional Committee has studied the Governor's Statement carefully and, in the light of the Governor's recommendations to Her Majesty's Government and of the pledge on East African federation referred to in the statement, has recommended in Article 43 that the Great Lukiko should agree to the representation of Buganda on the Legislative Council of the Protectorate. The Committee has also recommended that the representatives of Buganda should. be elected by the Lukiko by secret ballot.

CHAPTERS III TO VI

31. Chapter III contains only one Article. It deals with the question of citizenship, a complicated matter which concerns all the countries of the British Commonwealth. Article 44 recommends that Her Majesty's Government shall be requested to consider creating a common citizenship for Uganda. Examination of this recommendation must be in the first place a matter for the Colonial Office, but if and when the work proceeds the principle underlying it will be discussed in Uganda also.

32. Articles 45 and 46 recommend that the work of separating the Judiciary from the Executive in Buganda should be proceeded with immediately and that a committee including legal experts should be appointed to examine means by which the court system in Buganda can be gradually developed into a system of courts in which no distinction will be made between persons of different races or between the inhabitants of urban and rural areas.

33. Article 47 the Conference propose that a representative committee should be set up to consider as a question of urgency the establishment of a new local authority, under the Buganda Government, for the administration of the Kibuga. This authority should it is suggested include representatives of, and have jurisdiction for local government purposes over all sections of the community resident in the Kibuga. The Article goes on to recommend that the committee should later report on the establishment of local authorities representing all sections of the community in townships and trading centres in Buganda other than Kampala, Entebbe, Masaka and possibly Mubende, and should advise on the means of bringing such local authorities under the Buganda Government.

34. In Article 48 the Conference recommends that, in order to secure a period of stability for the country, no major changes in the constitutional arrangements proposed in the Articles should be introduced for a period of six years, after which there should be a review. The Article makes it clear that the review would be in 1961, assuming that the proposals of the Conference are brought into force in 1955. This six-year period of stability, to be followed by a review, is also provided for in the Governor's Statement about the Executive and Legislative Councils of the Protectorate.

35. The Conference expressed the hope during its meetings that the Agreed Recommendations may be accepted without undue delay by the Great Lukiko and Her Majesty's Government and that the Articles may come into effect as soon as the necessary legal instruments have been agreed and in any case not later than, the 1st July, 1955. It was the understanding of the Conference that as soon as the Articles come into effect a new Ministry should be appointed in accordance with the procedure proposed in Article 13, for the remainder of the life of the present Lukiko. Article 14 recommends that the life of the present Lukiko should be extended from four to five years.

36. Finally Article 49 proposes that the Uganda Agreement, 1900, should be amended to the extent necessary to give effect to the recommendations of the Conference, but should otherwise continue in its present form.

37. The Agreed Recommendations of the Namirembe Conference are closely interrelated with one another. It was the understanding of the Buganda Constitutional Committee, of the Governor and of Professor Hancock that these Agreed Recommendations would be considered and decided upon as a whole by the Great Lukiko and Her Majesty's Government.

APPENDIX H

IN CONGRESS, JULY 4, 1776

THE UNANIMOUS DECLARATION OF THE THIRTEEN UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

 hen in the Course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness. — That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, — That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shewn that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security. — Such has been the patient sufferance of these Colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former Systems of Government. The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States. To prove this, let Facts be submitted to a candid world.

He has refused his Assent to Laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his Governors to pass Laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his Assent should be obtained; and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other Laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of Representation in the Legislature, a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their Public Records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected, whereby the Legislative Powers, incapable of Annihilation, have returned to the People at large for their exercise; the State remaining in the mean time exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

He has endeavoured to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the Laws for Naturalization of Foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new Appropriations of Lands.

He has obstructed the Administration of Justice by refusing his Assent to Laws for establishing Judiciary Powers.

He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of New Offices, and sent hither swarms of Officers to harass our people and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in times of peace, Standing Armies without the Consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil Power.

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his Assent to their Acts of pretended Legislation:

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us:

For protecting them, by a mock Trial from punishment for any Murders which they should commit on the Inhabitants of these States:

For cutting off our Trade with all parts of the world:

For imposing Taxes on us without our Consent:

For depriving us in many cases, of the benefit of Trial by Jury:

For transporting us beyond Seas to be tried for pretended offences:

For abolishing the free System of English Laws in a neighbouring Province, establishing therein an Arbitrary government, and enlarging its Boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these Colonies

For taking away our Charters, abolishing our most valuable Laws and altering fundamentally the Forms of our Governments:

For suspending our own Legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated Government here, by declaring us out of his Protection and waging War against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large Armies of foreign Mercenaries to compleat the works of death, desolation, and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of Cruelty & Perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the Head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow Citizens taken Captive on the high Seas to bear Arms against their Country, to become the executioners of their friends and Brethren, or to fall themselves by their Hands.

He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian Savages whose known rule of warfare, is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions.

In every stage of these Oppressions We have Petitioned for Redress in the most humble terms: Our repeated Petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A Prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a Tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Nor have We been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity, which denounces our Separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, Enemies in War, in Peace Friends.

We, therefore, the Representatives of the united States of America, in General Congress, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the Name, and by Authority of the good People of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, That these united Colonies are, and of Right ought to be Free and Independent States, that they are Absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is and ought to be totally dissolved; and that as Free and Independent States, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do. — And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes, and our sacred Honor.

New Hampshire:

Josiah Bartlett, William Whipple, Matthew Thornton

Massachusetts:

John Hancock, Samuel Adams, John Adams, Robert Treat Paine, Elbridge Gerry

Rhode Island:

Stephen Hopkins, William Ellery

Connecticut:

Roger Sherman, Samuel Huntington, William Williams, Oliver Wolcott

New York:

William Floyd, Philip Livingston, Francis Lewis, Lewis Morris

New Jersey:

Richard Stockton, John Witherspoon, Francis Hopkinson, John Hart, Abraham Clark

Pennsylvania:

Robert Morris, Benjamin Rush, Benjamin Franklin, John Morton, George Clymer, James Smith, George Taylor, James Wilson, George Ross Delaware:

Caesar Rodney, George Read, Thomas McKean

Maryland:

Samuel Chase, William Paca, Thomas Stone, Charles Carroll of Carrollton

Virginia:

George Wythe, Richard Henry Lee, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Harrison, Thomas Nelson, Jr., Francis Lightfoot Lee, Carter Braxton

North Carolina:

William Hooper, Joseph Hewes, John Penn

South Carolina:

Edward Rutledge, Thomas Heyward, Jr., Thomas Lynch, Jr., Arthur Middleton

Georgia:

Button Gwinnett

ABOUT THE BOOK

The story goes that MarcusAurelius hired an assistantto follow him as he walked through the Roman towns square. The assistant's only rolewas to, whenever Marcus Aureliuswaspraised;whisper inhis ear, "You're just a man. You're just a man."

They say two things define us. Our patience whenwe have nothing and our humility whenwe have everything. The first thing I would like to ask my readers is to imaginea different President in office. If they support the current President and believe those who oppose him are doing so for partisan or otherwise illegitimatereasons, they should visualize a President whom they completely distrust. Conversely, if they dislike the current President, they should conceive of thePresident in power as someone they support and that those opposing him are actingillegitimately.This exercise is helpful, I believe, for focusing attention on the underlying constitutional issues rather than upon the wisdom, or lack thereof, of a particular President's policies.

Views as to whether or not an exercise of presidential power is legitimate tend to be based less upon legal abstractions than upon perceptions of the particular President in power. Someone supporting a particular President, for example, is likely to believethat parliament should not have the powerto interfere with the President's unilateral decision to send troops into armed conflict or that parliament should not have the authority to demand the President to extend or remove histerm limits. Conversely, someone who believes a President's agenda is improperly motivated or ill-advised is more likely to support constitutional principles that provide significant checks and balances upon the President's exercise of power.

In this way, views on presidential powertend to be more variablethan views on other constitutional issues because they intuitively relate to who is in power in a waythat views on other controversial constitutional issues – such as freedom of speech and assembly, or freedom of religion – do not. For this reason, this book on presidential power is well timed. Because the question of who will hold the Presidency after the next election should always be much in doubt, this is the perfect opportunity to examine the nature of presidential power as an abstract matter, rather than as a criticismor as an apologia of a specific President's actions. This is what I intend to do in this book. Specifically, I contend that the power of the Presidency has been expanding since the Founding, and that we need to consider the implications ofthis expansion within the constitutional structure of separation of powers. No matter which party controls power.

This book makes the descriptive case by briefly canvassing a series of factors that have had, and continue to have, the effect of expanding presidential power.

It further suggeststhis expansion in presidential power has created a constitutional imbalance between the executive and legislative branches, calling into doubt the continued efficacy of the structure of separation of powers set forth bythe Framers.

The book offers some suggestions as to how this power imbalance can be alleviated, but it does not presenta silver bullet solution. Because many, if not all, the factorsthat have led to increased presidential powerare the products ofgreed and selfish needs.

Thus, this book ends with only the modest conclusion thatregardless ofwho wins the Presidency,it is critical that those on both sides of theaisle workto assure thatthe growth in presidential poweris at least checked, if not reversed.

JESCHO PUBLISHING HOUSE
P.O. Box 24554
KAMPALA (U), E.A.
Tel: +256414 660 286(Office line)/+256702 285 283(WhatsApp)
+256782 855 211/+256752 855 211/+256714 655 211
Email: jeschogroupltd@gmail.com

ISBN 978-9970-9800-4-8
9 789970 980048